

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

ADI PARVA.

CHAPTER I.

(ANUKRAMANIKA PARVA.)

Having saluted the Supreme Deity (Narayana), and the highest of all male beings (Nara) and also the Goddess of Learning (Saraswati), let us cry success!

1-2. One day when the great sages of hard austerities, who had been present at the twelve years' sacrifice of Kulapati Saunaka, were comfortably sitting in the Naimisharanya, Rishi Lomharshana's son, Ugrasrava, popularly known as Souti,—well-read in the Puranas,—came to them with all humility.

3. (Thereupon) desirous of hearing his wonderful stories, the ascetics addressed him who had come to their hermitage of Naimisharanya.

4. Having been welcomed with due respect by those holy Rishis, Souti, with joined hands, asked them all how their devout penances were progressing.

5. After the Rishis had taken their seats, Lomharshana's son humbly took the seat assigned to him.

6. Seeing that he had been comfortably seated and observing that he had had some rest after the fatigue, one of the Rishis started the conversation, saying,

7. "O Lotus-eyed, whence have you come? Where have you been, Souti? Tell me, I ask you, (all the particulars of your travels)."

8. When the accomplished speaker Souti was thus questioned, he gave before that great assembly of contemplative Rishis a full and proper reply in words becoming their nature.

Souti said :—

9-11. "After listening to the various red and wonderful stories of the Mahabharata composed by Krishna Dwaipayana, —those that were fully recited by Vaishampayana at the great snake-sacrifice held by that noble-hearted royal sage, the prince of all princes, the son of Parikshit, Janamejaya,—

12. (O holy Rishis,)—I wandered about and visited many holy shrines and sacred waters, and came (at last) to Samantapanchaka, a place venerated by the twice-born,

13. And where in the days of yore the sons of Kuru and Pandu had fought a deadly battle, in which all the Chiefs of India joined one side or the other.

14-15. Being anxious to see you (all), I have now come before your (august) presence. O Reverend Sages, to you who are all to me as Brahma, to you who are greatly learned and highly blessed, who shine with the fire of the Sun in this holy place of sacrifice, who are pure by sacred ablutions, who have performed and finished the deep meditation, who have kept up the sacred fire, who are beyond all cares,—to you, O twice-born ones, what shall I speak?

16. Shall I repeat to you the sacred stories of the Puranas, bearing on religious precepts and worldly profit,—or shall I recount to you the wonderful deeds of the great sages and saints and the sovereigns of mankind?"

The Rishis replied :—

17. The Purana which was first told by the illustrious sage, Dwaipayana, and which was greatly esteemed by the celestials and Bramharsis when they heard it,

18. And which, being full of various dictions and divisions, is (undoubtedly) the most eminent narrative (amongst all narratives) that exist, containing (as it does) subtle and logically combined meanings, enriched with (the essences of) the Vedas, is a sacred work.

19-21. It is composed in beautiful language, and it includes all other works. It is explained by all Sastras, and contains the sense of the four Vedas. (But Souti,) we desire to hear Bharata, the sacred history that drives away all fear,—the holy composition of great Vyasa,—just as it was beautifully narrated at the great snake-sacrifice of Raja Janamejaya by Rishi Vaishampayana as directed by Krishna Dwaipayana himself."

Souti then said:—

22. "Bowings (most reverentially) my head to the original first being Isran, who is adored by all and to whom all make offerings, who is the true unchangeable One, who is manifested and unmanifested, eternal and everlasting Brahma,

23. Who is both non-existing and existing—non-existing, who is the (existing) universe, and still distinct from both the existing and the non-existing world, who is the originator of all, both high and low,

24. Who is the ancient, great, undecaying One,—who is Vishnu, the good and the goodness, who is worthy of all worship, pure and sinless, who is Hari, the lord of the faculties, the guide of all the moveable and the immoveable,

25. (O Rishis), I shall now describe to you the holy thoughts of the great Rishi of the wonderful deeds, (the sage) Vyasa, who is worshipped by all of you here.

26. Some bards have already sung this history, and some again are teaching it to others; others will no doubt do the same hereafter on earth.

27. It is a great source of knowledge all through the three worlds. It is possessed by the twice-born, both in detailed and condensed form.

28. It is embellished with elegant expressions, with human and divine conversations, and with various poetical measures. It is, therefore, the great delight of the learned.

29. In this universe, when there was no brightness and no light, and when all was enveloped in darkness, there came into being a Mighty Egg, the one inexhaustible Seed of all created beings.

30—31. It is called Mahadivya, and was created at the beginning of the Yuga. In it existed the true Light, Brahma, the eternal One, the wonderful and inconceivable Being, the omnipresent, invisible, and subtle Cause, the Entity, and Non-entity-natured Self.

32. From this Egg was born the Lord Atamaha, Brahma, the one only Prajapati, with Suraguru and Sihanu,

33. With Manu, Ka and Parameshthi with Procheta and Daksha, and the seven sons of Daksha.

34. Then also appeared twenty one Prajapatis, and the man of inconceivable nature, whom all the Rishis know. Then appeared Vishvadevas, the Adityas, the Vasus, the Asvins,

35. The Vakshas, the Sadhys, the Pishchas, Gahyaks and the Pitris.

36. Then were produced the wise and the most holy Brahmarshis, and the numerous Rajarsnis, distinguished for every noble quality; then the water, the heavens, the earth, the air, the sky, and the points of the heavens,

37. The years, the seasons, the months, the fortnights, and the day and night in succession.

38. And again, at the end of the world and of the Yuga, whatever is seen in the universe, all created things,—both animate and inanimate,—will be turned into chaos.

39. And at the beginning of other (new) Yugas, all things will be again produced; and like the various fruits of the earth will succeed one another in the due order of their seasons.

40. This mysterious wheel, which cause the destruction and production of all things, revolves thus perpetually in the world, without beginning and without an end.

41. To cite a brief example,—The generation of Devas, was thirty three thousand, thirty three hundred and thirty three.

42. The sons of Div were Brihadbhanus, Chakshus, Atma, Vibhavasus, Savita, Richika, Arka, Bhanu, Ashabaha, and Ravi.

43. Of these Vivasvans of old Mahya was the youngest whose son was Devabrata.

44. Devabrata had one son, named Subrata who had three sons, namely Dasajyoti, Satajyoti, and Sahasrajyoti, each of whom gave birth to innumerable offsprings.

45—46. Famous Dasajyoti had ten thousands, Satajyoti had ten times that number, and Sahasrajyoti, ten times the number of the offsprings of Satajyoti.

47. From them descended the race of the Kurus, Yadus and Bharata, and also that of Yajati and Ikshwaku and all the Rajarsnis. There were also produced numerous other generations,

48. And innumerable creatures and their abodes. There were produced the three-fold Mysteries, the Vedas, Yoga and Vijnana;—Dharma, Artha and Kama,

49. The various books on Dharma, Artha, and Kama; the rules for the conduct of mankind,

50. The histories and discourses and various Smritis. These are the signs of this work (Mahabharata).

51. All this, having been seen by Rishi Vyasa, is mentioned here in due order as a specimen of the book.

52. Rishi Vyasa declared this mass of knowledge in both abridged and detailed forms. The learned of the world wish to possess both the detailed and the abridged accounts.

53. Some read the Bharata from the first Mantra, some from the story of Astika, some again from Uparichara, while some Brahmans read the whole.

54. Learned men display their various knowledge of Smritis in commenting on this composition. Some are skilful in explaining it, while others in remembering it.

55. The son of Satyabati (Vyasa,) by penances and meditation, having classified the ever-lasting Veda, composed this holy history.

56. When the learned and the strict-vowed Brahmarshi, Dwaipayana Vyasa, the son of Parasara, completed this greatest of narrations, he began to consider how he could teach it to his pupils.

57. Then did the Preceptor of the world, the possessor of the six attributes, Brahma, knowing the anxiety of Rishi Dwaipayana, come in person to the place where the Rishi was, so that he might gratify the Saint and benefit the people.

58. When Vyasa, who was surrounded by all the classes of Munis, saw him, he was much surprised. Standing with his joined hands, he bowed at his feet and ordered a seat to be brought.

59. Then going round to the side of the distinguished seat on which sat Hiranyagarva, he stood near it.

60. But being commanded by Parameshti, Brahma, full of love, he sat down near the seat, smiling in joy.

61. Then addressing Brahma, the greatly glorious Vyasa thus said:—"O Divine Brahma, a poem, which is greatly respected, has been composed by me.

62. (It contains) the mystery of the Vedas and other subjects that have been explained by me; (it contains) the various hymns of the Vedas, Upanishadas with their Angas,

63. And a compilation of the Puranas, and the history which has been composed by me and named after the three divisions of time, namely, Past, Present and Future.

64. And it contains the nature of decay, death, fear, disease, existence and non-existence; a description of creeds, and the account of various modes of life.

65. And it also contains the rules for the four castes and the essence of all the Puranas, an account of asceticism, and rules for the religious student, the dimensions of the earth, of the sun and moon,

66. Planets, stars and constellations and the length of the duration of the four Yugas, and it further more contains Rik, Shaman, Yajur Vedas, the Adhyatma,

67. Naya, orthodoxy and pathology,

Charity, Pashupata, and celestial and human births for particular purposes.

68. It contains a description of pilgrimages and holy places, of rivers, mountains, forests, seas,

69. Of celestial cities, and of the Malpas; the art of war, different kinds of nations, and the languages and the manners of the people.

70. All this has been placed in this poem, but a writer for this work is not to be found on earth.

Brahma said:—

71. "For your knowledge of the Divine Mystery, I have the highest regard for you amongst all the celebrated Rishis who are famous for their holy lives.

72. I know, you have revealed in the language of truth the divine words, even from the first of them. You have called your present work, a poem; why should it be called a poem?

73. There will be no poets in this world whose works will equal this poem, as the three other Asramas are never equal to the domestic Asrama.

74. Let Ganesha be remembered, O Rishi, to write this poem."

Souti said:—

Having thus spoken to Vyasa, Brahma went away to his own place.

75—76. Then began Vyasa to remember Ganesha in his mind. As soon as he was thought of, the expeller of obstacles, Ganesha, who is always ready to fulfil the desires of his worshippers, came at once to the place where Vyasa was seated.

77. When he was saluted and when he took his seat, Vyasa thus addressed him, "O guide of the Ganas, kindly become the writer of the Bharata, which I have composed in my mind, but which I shall now repeat."

78. On hearing this, Ganesha thus replied:—"I shall become the writer of your work, provided my pen is not made to stop even for a moment."

79. And Vyasa told him, "Stop writing only when you will not be able to understand a passage." Ganesha assented, by saying "Om." He proceeded to write and Vyasa began to dictate.

80. To take time to rest, Vyasa sometimes knit the knots of composition very close. Thus he went on dictating his work as he made engagement.

81—82. I know eight thousand eight hundred verses, so does Suka, and perhaps Sanjaya also knows this number. O Muni, none is able to understand to this day the closely knit stokas for the mysteriousness of their meaning.

83. Even all-knowing Ganesha had to take time to think (over their meaning), while Vyasa continued to compose other verses in great numbers.

84. The wisdom of this work, like the stick used for applying collyrium, has opened the eyes of the world which were covered by the darkness of ignorance.

85. As the sun drives away the darkness, so does this Bharata, by its discourses on Dharma, Artha, Kama and Moksha, drive the ignorance of men.

86. As the Full-Moon with its mild light opens the buds of the water-lily, so does this Purana with the light of Sruti expand the human intellect.

87. The whole house of the womb of nature is properly and completely lighted by the lamp of history which destroys the darkness of ignorance.

88. This work is a tree, the chapter of contents is its seed, the divisions Paulama and Astika are its roots, the Sambhava is its trunk, the books (Parva) Sava and Aranya are the roosting perches, Arani is the knitting knot,

89—90. Virata and Udyoga the pith, Bhisma the main branch, Drona the leaves, Karna its beautiful flowers, Sailya their fragrance, Stri and Aishika are its cooling shades, Santi its great fruit,

91. Ashwamedha is its immortal sap, Asramavasika the place where it grows, and Mausala is the epitome of the Vedas.

92. This tree will be highly respected by all virtuous Brahmans. This tree of Bharata will be as inexhaustible as the clouds and be the means of livelihood of many illustrious poets.

Santi continued:—

93. I shall speak to you about the everlasting, fruitful and flowery productions of this tree. They are of pleasant and pure taste, and they are to be tasted even by immortals.

94. Requested by his own mother and the son of Ganga, Bhisma, the mighty and holy Krishna Dwaipayana became the father of three sons, who were like three fires, by the two wives of Vichitravirya.

95. Having thus begotten Dhritarashtra, Pandu and Vidura, he returned to his hermitage to prosecute this religious studies.

96. The great Rishi Vyasa did not publish this Bharata to the world of mankind until these his sons were born, grown up and (died) (went on the supreme journey).

97. When he was earnestly solicited by

Janamejaya and thousands of Brahmanas, he taught it to his disciple Vaishampayana.

98. Vaishampayana, sitting together with his comrades, recited the Bharata at the intervals of the Sacrifice, and he was repeatedly asked to proceed when he stopped.

99. Vyasa has fully described the greatness of the Kuru race, virtues of Gandhari, the wisdom of Vidura and constancy of Kunti.

100. He has also described the divinity of Vasudeva (Krishna), the goodness of the sons of Pandu, and the evil conduct of the sons of Dhritarashtra.

101. Vyasa originally compiled the Bharata, exclusive of episodes, in twenty-four thousand verses, and this much only is called by the learned as the real Bharata.

102. He subsequently composed an epitome in one hundred and fifty verses,—an index of the chapters of contents.

103. He first taught this epitome to his son Suka, and then to others of his disciples who had the same qualifications.

104. He then completed another compilation, consisting of six hundred thousand slokas. Of these, thirty hundred thousands are known in the world of Devas,

105. Fifteen hundred thousands in the world of Pitris, fourteen hundred thousands in the world of Gandharvas, and one hundred thousands in the world of mankind.

106. Narada recited them to the Devas, Devala to Pitris, and Suka to the Gandharvas, Yakshas and Rakshas.

107. One of the pupils of Vyasa, Vaishampayana, a man of just principles, the first amongst the learned in the Vedas, recited them in this world of mankind. Know, I (Souti) have also recited one hundred thousand verses of this great work.

108. Duryodhana is a great tree created out of passion, Karna is its trunk; Sakuni is its branches; Dushasana is its fruit and flowers, and weak Dhritarashtra is its root.

109. Judhishira is a great tree, created out of virtue and religion; Arjuna is its trunk; Bhima is its branches; two sons of Madri are its flowers and fruits; and Krishna, Brahma, and Brahmans are its roots.

110. Pandu, after conquering many countries by his valour and wisdom, retired into a forest and took up his abode with the Rishis.

111. As a sportsman he brought upon himself a very great misfortune by killing a stag when it was with its mate. Pandu's misfortune served as a warning for the conduct of all the princes of his house as long as they lived.

112. His two wives, (Kunti and Madri), according to the ordinance of the Sastras, admitted to their embraces the celestials, Dharma, Vayu, Sakra and two Aswinas, so that the race of Pandu might not be extinct.

113—114. When these offsprings of the celestials were grown up under the care of their two mothers, and in the society of holy Rishis, in the midst of sacred groves and in the holy hermitage, they were taken by the Rishis into the presence of Dhritarastra and his sons. They followed them in the garb of Brahmacharis, and as students; their hairs were tied in knots on their heads.

115. "Our these pupils," said they, "are your sons, your brothers and your friends. They are the Pandavas." So saying they went away.

116. When the Kuru people saw that they were introduced by Rishis as the sons of Pandu, the higher class amongst them loudly shouted with joy.

117. Some, however, said they were not the sons of Pandu; others said they were. Some said how they could be the sons of Pandu who was dead long ago.

118. Voices, however, were heard from all sides, crying, "They are welcome. Through divine providence, we see before us the sons of Pandu. Let their welcome be proclaimed."

119—120. When the acclamations of the people ceased, tremendous plaudits of invisible spirits were heard, echoing every point of the heavens. Showers of fragrant flowers fell, and conches and kettle-drums were sounded. Such wonders happened when the princes arrived.

121. The joyous cry, of the citizens in expression of their pleasure for the happy event, was so great that it reached the very heavens.

122. Without any apprehension from any one, and much respected by all the people, the Pandavas lived there, having studied the whole of the Vedas and various other Sastras.

123. The chief men of the city were highly pleased with the purity of Yudhisthira, the strength of Bhima, the gallantry of Arjuna,

124. The submissiveness of Kunti to all her superiors, and the humility of Nakula and Sahadeva. All other people were rejoiced to see their heroism.

125. A few years after, Arjuna, after performing a difficult feat of archery, obtained the hands of Draupadi at the Sayamvara in the midst of a great assemblage of kings and princes.

126. From that day he was very much respected by all men as a great bow-man.

Like the sun he appeared in the field of battle, and was difficult to be beheld by enemies.

127. He defeated all the neighbouring potentates and chief tribes, and thus accomplished all that was necessary for the king (Yudhisthira) to perform the great Raj-suya Sacrifice.

128—129. After killing Jarasandha, proud of his powers through the wise counsel of Krishna and by the prowess of Bhima and Arjuna, Yudhisthira acquired the right to perform the Raj-suya Sacrifice, which abounded in provisions and offerings and was full of transcendent merits.

130—32. Duryodhana came to this sacrifice. When he saw on all sides the great wealth of the Pandavas,—the offerings, the precious stones, gold and jewels, elephants and horses; valuable textures, garments and mantles; shawls and furs, carpets made of the skin of the Rankava,—he was filled with envy, and became very angry.

133. When he saw the hall of assembly, beautifully constructed by Moya after the celestial Court, he became exceedingly sorry.

134. (To chagrin him more) when he was confused at certain architectural deceptions, Bhima sneered at him, before Vasudeva, saying he was of low birth.

135. It was represented to Dhritarastra that his son, notwithstanding he was partaking various objects of enjoyments and valuable things, was becoming pale, lean and meagre.

136. Out of affection for him the blind king gave his son permission to play at dice (with the Pandavas). When Krishna came to know this, he became very angry.

137. And being displeased, he did nothing to stop the dispute, but overlooked the fatal game and other horrible unjust deeds that were the result of it.

138. In spite of Bhisma, Drona, Vidura and the son of Sardwan, Kripa, he made the Kshatryas kill one another in the great battle that followed.

139. (At the end of the battle) Dhritarastra, hearing the news of the Pandavas' success, and recollecting the vows that Duryodhana, Karna and Sukani had taken,

140. Thought for a while and addressed Sanjaya thus:—"Listen to me, O Sanjaya, listen to all I am now about to say. You will then find it is not fit to treat me with contempt.

141. You are learned in Sastras, you are intelligent, and you are possessed of wisdom. (Hear), my inclinations were never for war, nor did I feel pleasure in the destruction of my race.

142. I felt no difference between my sons and the sons of Pandu,

143. My own sons were wayward, and they hated me, because I was old and blind. I bore all on account of my miserable state, and for paternal affection. I was foolish and thoughtless, and Duryodhana grew in folly.

144. My own son was a spectator of the great wealth of the powerful sons of Pandu, and was sneered at for his awkwardness in entering into the hall.

145—46. Being unwilling to bear all this, and at the same time being incapable of vanquishing the Pandavas in the field, he planned a most unjust game at dice, instead of being willing to obtain fortune by his own exertion and with the help of the King of Gandhara.

147. Hear, O Sanjaya, all that happened afterwards and all that came to my knowledge. When you hear all that I say, recollecting everything, you will then know me to be a man having prophetic eyes.

148. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Arjuna, having bent the bow, had pierced the mark, and brought it to the ground, and had carried away the princess Krishna in the presence of the assembled chiefs and potentates.

149. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Subhadra of the Madhu race had been forcibly carried away by Arjuna, and had been subsequently married by him in the city of Dwarka, and the two heroes of the Vrisni race, instead of being angry, had come to Indraprasta as friends.

150. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Aryuna had satisfied Agni by giving him the forest of Khanda, preventing at the same time by his celestial arrows the downpour made by Indra, the king of the celestials.

151. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the five Pandavas with their mother Kunti had escaped from the house of lac, and that Vidura had helped them in their escape.

152. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Aryuna had obtained the hands of Draupadi by piercing the mark and the brave Panchalas had joined the Pandavas.

153. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the foremost king of the Maghada dynasty, the shining star of all the Kshatryas Jarasandha had been killed by Bhima alone with his bare arms.

154. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the sons of Pandu had conquered all the chiefs and potentates in a general campaign, and had celebrated the victory by the performance of the grand sacrifice of Rajsuya.

155. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that weeping and sorrowing, Draupadi, in the season of her impurity, had been dragged into court with but one cloth on, and treated as if she had none in this world, though she had her protectors.

156. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the wicked wretch Dusyasana had been able to drag out only a heap of clothes without finding its end when he had attempted to strip her of her single cloth.

157. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Yudhishthira had been defeated by Saubala at dice and had been deprived of his kingdom as its result, but still he was attended by his powerful brothers.

158. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the four Pandava brothers, weeping in sorrow, had followed their eldest brother and had tried every means to mitigate his discomfort.

159. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Yudhishthira had been followed into wilderness by Snatakas and by holy Brahmanas.

160. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that, Aryuna, after pleasing in combat the god of gods, the three-eyed Siva who appeared before him in the guise of a hunter, had obtained the great weapon pashupati.

161. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the just and famous Aryuna had gone to the land of the celestials and had there obtained celestial weapons from Indra, the king of the gods.

162. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Aryuna had then defeated the Kalakeyas and the Paulamas who were proud of the boon they had received from Shiva, and through which they had been unconquerable even by celestials.

163. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the chastiser of foes, Arjuna, had gone to the land of Indra to kill the Asuras and had come back successfully.

164. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Bhima and other sons of Kunti, accompanied by Vaisravana, had come to that country which was inaccessible by nten.

165. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that my sons were taken prisoners by the Gandharvas on their journey to Alakshajatra, but were rescued by Aryuna.

166. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Dharma had come in the guise of a Yaksha and asked some questions of Yudhishthira.

167. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that my sons had failed to discover the Pandavas when they lived in disguise with Draupadi in the kingdom of Virata.

168. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that all the chief warriors of my side had been defeated by Aryuna on a single chariot while he was in the kingdom of Virata.

169. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the king of Matsya (Virata) had offered his virtuous daughter Uttara to Arjuna, and Aryuna had accepted her for his son Avimanyu.

170. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Yudhisthira, who was defeated at dice and deprived of his wealth, who was exiled and separated from his relatives and friends, had collected an army of seven Akshauhitis.

171. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Vasudeva of the Madhu race, who covered the whole universe with his but one foot, had been heartily engaged to do good to the Pandavas.

172. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Narada declared that Krishna and Aryuna are Nara and Narayana, and they had been seen together in the region of Brahma.

173. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that being anxious to bring about peace for the welfare of mankind, Krishna had come to the Kurus, but had gone away being unsuccessful in his mission.

174. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Karna and Duryodhana had determined to make Krishna a prisoner, but he had shown the whole universe in himself.

175. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Kunti had received consolation from him when she stood near his car, weeping in sorrow.

176. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Vasudeva and Santanu's son Bhishma were their advisers and Bharadwaya's son Drona had pronounced blessings on them.

177. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Karna had said to Bhishma, "I will not fight when you fight," and so saying had gone away.

178. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Vasudeva, Aryuna and powerful Gandiva, these three of fearful energy, had come together.

179. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Krishna had shown Arjuna all the worlds within himself when he, full of pity, sank down upon his chariot.

180. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the great destroyer of foes, Bhishma, killing ten thousand car-warriors every day, had not killed any Pundava hero of note.

181. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the virtuous son of Ganga, great Bhishma, had himself told the enemies of the means of his own death, and it had been joyfully adopted by the Pandavas.

182. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Aryuna, having placed Shikhandin before him on his chariot, had wounded the infinitely courageous and the unconquerable Bhishma.

183. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that, after reducing the Shomakas to a few, the old hero Bhishma had been overcome with innumerable wounds and was lying on arrows.

184. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that having been requested, Aryuna, piercing the ground, had allayed the thirst of Bhishma when he very much longed for water.

185. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Vayu, with Indra and Surya, had united in alliance for the success of the Pandavas, and even the beasts of prey were putting us to fear.

186. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Drona, though he displayed many modes of fight, had not killed any of the chief Pandavas.

187. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the mighty car-warriors Sansaptakas, appointed to defeat Aryuna, had been all killed by him.

188. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Subhadra's brave son had singly penetrated into our Buha, impenetrable by others and defended by well-armed Drona himself.

189. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that our great car-warriors, being unable to defeat Aryuna, had enjoyed joy after jointly surrounded and slain the boy Abhimanyu.

190. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the blind Kauravas were shouting with joy for killing Abhimanyu, and that Aryuna had taken his celebrated vow about Saindhava.

191. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Aryuna had taken the vow of killing Saindhava, and he had fulfilled his vow in the presence of his enemies.

192. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Vasudeva, finding the horses of Aryuna fatigued, unyoked them in the field of battle, gave them water to drink, and re-yoking them, drove the chariot as before.

193. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Aryuna had kept back all his assailants when his horses were taken away for drink.

194. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Yuyudhana of the Vrśni race went back to the place where Krishna and Aryuna were, after having thrown the army of Drona into disorder, having none to withstand the attack on account of powerful elephants.

195. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Karna, having got Bhima in his power, had allowed him to escape only with some contemptuous terms and having dragged him with the end of his bow.

196. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Drona, Kritavarma, Kripa, Karna, Ashwathama and Salya had allowed Saindhava to be killed before their presence.

197. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that through the machinations of Krishna, the celestial weapon Sakti, given to Karna by Indra, had been hurled against Ghatatkacha of a dreadful face.

198. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that in the fight between Karna and Ghatatkacha, the Sakti had been hurled against Ghatatkacha by Karna, the weapon which should have certainly killed Arjuna.

199. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Dhristadyumna, violating all the rules of war, had killed Drona while insensible on his chariot and bent on death.

200. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Nakula, the son of Madri, had driven the chariot of the son of Drona all around the place, having engaged with him in a single combat before the whole army and proving himself fully equal to him.

201. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Drona's son had mis-used the weapon, named Narayana and had failed to kill the Pandavas.

202. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Bhima had drunk the blood of his cousin Dushyasana and none was able to prevent him.

203. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the exceedingly brave, and unconquerable in war, Karna had been killed by Arjuna in the war of brothers, which was mysterious even to celestials,

204. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Yudhishthira had defeated the son of Drona, Dushyasana and fearful Kritavarma.

205. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Yudhishthira had killed the king of Madra, who always challenged Krishna.

206. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Suvala, the man of magic power and the root of the gaming and the feud, had been killed by Sahadeva.

207. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Duryodhana, having been spent with fatigue, his strength being gone out and without even a chariot, had gone to a lake and had taken refuge in its waters.

208. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the Pandavas accompanied by Krishna had gone to that lake and had begun to address my son contemptuously, who was never able to put up with any affront.

209. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that while displaying various modes of attack and defence in a club-fight, he had been unjustly slain through the counsels of Krishna.

210. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that the sons of Drona and others had committed a horrible and infamous deed by killing the Panchalas and the sons of Draupadi in their sleep.

211. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that Ashwathama, having been pursued by Bhima, had discharged the greatest of weapons, named Aishika, by which the son in the womb of Uttara was wounded.

212. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya when I heard the weapon Brahmasira, discharged by Aswathama, had been repelled by Aryuna with another weapon, on which he had uttered the word Sasti, and that Ashwathama had to surrender the Jewel that was on his head.

213. I had no hope of success, O Sanjaya, when I heard that for wounding the son in the womb of Uttara both Krishna and Dipayana had cursed him.

214. Alas! Ghandhari is to be pitied! She has lost all her children, grand children, parents, brothers, and kindred. A most difficult work has been performed by the Pandavas. A kingdom has been gained by them without a rival.

215. Alas! I have heard that only ten persons are alive in this war on our side and seven on the side of the Pandavas. Eleven Akshauhinis of Kshatryas have been slain in this fearful battle.

216. Utter darkness is all around me, a faintness comes over me. O Suta, consciousness is leaving me, my mind is distracted.

Souti said :—

217. Bewailing his fate thus, Dhritarastra was overcome with the greatest sorrow, and lost his senses for a time. But being revived, he addressed Sanjaya in these words.

Dhritarastra said :—

218. After what has happened, O Sanjaya, I desire to abandon this life without any further delay. I do not see any good by keeping it alive any longer.

Souti said :—

219. While thus talking and bewailing, sighing like a serpent and fainting every moment, the wise son of Gavalgana (Sanjaya) addressed the pitiable king of the earth in words instinct with deep meaning.

Sanjaya said :—

220. From wise Narada and Vyasa you have heard, O King, of immensely powerful men, men of great exertions,

221. Men born of great royal dynasties, men full of great qualities, men well-versed in the art of using celestial weapons, 222-223. Men who, having conquered the world by righteous war and performing sacrifices with proper offerings, obtained fame in this world and finally succumbed to death.

224-227. Such men were Saivya, the brave car-warrior Srinjaya, the great amongst all conquerors Suhatra, Rantideva, Kakshivanta, greatly glorious Damana, Valhaka, Sarjati, Ajita, Nala, Vishyamitra, the killer of enemies, the greatly strong Amvarisha, Maruta, Manu, Ikshwaku, Goya, Bharata, Parushurama, the son of Dasharatha Rama, Sashabindu, Bhagiratha, Krityavirja, Janamejaya, and Yayati of good deeds, who performed sacrifices, assisted by the celestials themselves, and by whose sacrificial altars and stakes the habitable and inhabitable regions of this earth were all over marked.

When Saivya was much afflicted for the loss of his children, (the histories of) these twenty four Rajas were told to him in the olden time by the celestial sage, Narada.

228—229. But besides these, other kings, who were great car-warriors, who were more powerful than the above, who were noble in mind and full of every good quality, had also fallen into the grasp of Death.

230—236. They were Puru, Kuru, Yadu, Sura, Bishyagashya, Mabadyuti, Anuha, Yuvanashwa, Kakustha, Vikrami, Raghu, Vijaya, Vitihotra, Anga, Bhava, Shweta, Vrihatguru, Ushinara, Shataratha, Kanka, Duliduha, Druma, Dambhodvaba, Para, Vena, Sagara, Sankriti, Nimi, Ajeya, Parashu, Pundra, Sambhu, Devavridha, An- agha, Debabhaya, Supratima, Supratika, Vri- hadratha, Mahotshaha, Vinitatma, Sukratu, the King of Nishad Nala, Satyabrata, Santa- vaya, Sumitra, Subala, Janujangha, Anara- nya, Arka, Pryavrattya, Shuchivrata, Bala- bandru, Niramarda, Kotusinga, Brihatbala, Dhristaketu, Brihatketu, Diptaketu, Nira- maya, Abikshita, Chapala, Dhurta, Krita- bandhu, Dridhishudhi, Mahapuransambhava, Pratanga, Paraha and Sruti. These kings, and hundreds and thousands others, 237-238. Who were greatly powerful and wise, had met death like your sons, quitting immense wealth and pleasure.

239. Even those men, who possessed all the noble virtues, and whose heavenly valour, generosity, magnanimity, faith, truth, purity, simplicity and mercy, are published in the Puranas by the sacred bards of great learning, gave up their lives.

240-241. Your sons were wicked, en- vious, avaricious, of passionate temperament and vicious disposition; you are well-versed in the Sastras, you are intelligent and wise; those men whose understanding follows the dictates of the Sastras, never succumb to grief or misfortune.

242. You know, O king, the severity and levity of fate. You know what anxiety you showed for the safety of your sons. There- fore, this grief is unbecoming of you. It is not fit for you to grieve for that which must happen.

243. Who can avert by his cleverness the decrees of fate? None can go beyond the path marked for him by Providence.

244. Existence and non-existence, plea- sure and pain, come by Time.

245. Time creates all things and Time destroys them all. Time burns all creatures and Time again extinguishes that fire.

246. All things, good and bad, in the three worlds, are created by Time. Time destroys them and Time creates them again.

247. Time alone is awake when all is asleep. Time cannot be overcome by any- one. Time walks in everything without being retarded.

248. Knowing that all things, past, pre- sent and future, are the outcome of Time, it is not fit for you to be overcome with grief.

Souti said :—

249. Gavalgana's son, (Sanjaya), having thus comforted the royal Dhritarastra, who was overwhelmed with grief for the death of his sons, restored peace to his mind.

250. Great Dwaipayana composed a holy Upanishada on these facts; and it has been published to the world by the learned and sacred bards in the Puranas.

251. The study of Bharata is such an act of piety that even he who reads only one line of a verse with reverence has his sins all destroyed.

252. In this Bharata, sinless and immaculate Devas, Devarshis, and Brahmanas have been described as well as Yakshas and great Nagas.

253. In it has also the possessor of six attributes, the eternal Vasudeva, been described. He is true and just, pure and holy.

254. In it is described the eternal Brahma, the great true light, whose great and divine deeds the wise and learned men declare,

255. From whom has been produced the non-existent, and existent-non-existent universe with the principle of reproduction and progression, birth, death and rebirth.

256. In it has also been described He who is Adhyatma, and who pertakes the attributes of the five elements, and He to whom unmanifested and other such words cannot be applied;

257. And also He whom the Yogis, possessed of meditation and Tapa, behold in their hearts as the reflection of an image in a mirror.

258. The man of faith, ever devoted, ever employed in the exercise of virtue, is freed from sin on reading this chapter of the Bharata.

259. The believer who always hears this introductory chapter of the Bharata from the beginning, never meets with any difficulties (in this world).

260. The man, who repeats any part of its introduction at the morning and evening twilights, at the time of repeating, is freed from sins collected during the day and night.

261. In the body of Bharata this chapter is truth and ambrosia; as butter is among curds, and a Brahmana among bipeds,

262. As Aranyaka among the Vedas, as ambrosia among medicines, as the ocean is great among all lakes, as cow among all quadrupeds,

263. So is Bharata, among all histories. He, who causes to be recited by a Brahmana even one line of it during a Sradh, gives to the dead ancestors his offerings of food and drink which become inexhaustible.

264. The Vedas are expounded by the aid of history and Purana,

265. But the Veda is afraid of men of little learning, lest they hurt it. The learned man, who recites this Veda, (Bharata) gains advantage.

266. Even the sin of killing embryo is destroyed of those who read it with reverence at every change of the moon.

267. I tell you, the whole Bharata has been read by the man who reads this chapter. The man who with reverence hears every day these sacred words, 268-269. Gains long life, and goes to heaven. In time gone by, the celestials met together and placed the four Vedas on one side and this Bharata on the other side of a scale, and the Bharata weighed heavier.

270. From that time, it is called Mahabharata. It is considered superior to the Vedas, both in substance and gravity of import.

271. It is called Mahabharata from this superiority in substance and gravity of import. He, who understands its real meaning, is freed from all sins.

272. Tapa is not a sin, study is not a sin, the ordinances of the Vedas are not sins, the acquisition of wealth by exertion is not a sin; when they are abused, then do they become the sources of evil.

Thus ends the Anukramanika Parva in the Adi Parva of the blessed Mahabharata.

CHAPTER II.

(PARVA SANGRAHA PARVA).

The Rishis said:—

1. We wish to hear, O son of Suta, all about the place you called Samantapanchaka.

Souti said:—

2. Hear, O Brahmanas, the sacred words I say. You are fit, O best of men, to hear them.

3. At the end of Treta and in the beginning of Dwapara Yuga, the greatest of all that ever wielded arms, Parushurama, being impatient of wrongs, repeatedly destroyed all the Kshatrya races of the world.

4. That fiery Rama, after destroying the Kshatryas by his own prowess, made five lakes of blood at Samantapanchaka.

5. We have heard, that being senseless with anger, he offered oblations to the manes of his ancestors, standing in the bloody water of these lakes.

6. Thereupon Richika and other of his ancestors appeared and said, "Rama, O blessed Rama, O son of Vrigu, we are pleased

7. With your filial piety and prowess. O mighty one, blessing be upon you. O illustrious one, ask the boon you desire to have.

Rama said :—

8—9. If, O fathers, you are pleased with me, the boon, I ask, is that I may be freed from the sin of annihilating the Kshatryas, and that the lakes, that I have made, may become celebrated shrines in the world.

10. The ancestors then said, "It would be as you have wished. But be pacified."

11. The region, that lies near those five bloody lakes, has become famous from that day by the name of holy Samantapanchaka.

12. The wise men have said that every place should be known by a name significant of something which may have made it famous.

13. At the end of Dwapara and in the beginning of Kali, a great battle was fought between the Kurus and the Pandavas, here at this holy Samantapanchaka.

14. In that holy place, where there was not the least ruggedness, were assembled eighteen Akshauhinis of soldiers, all eager for battle.

15. O Brahmanas, they were all killed in that place. Thus, O Brahmanas, its name is explained.

16. I have described to you that beautiful and holy place. I have told you, O best of Brahmanas, all about this place,—a place famous in the three worlds.

The Rishis said :—

17. We wish to know, O Son of Suta, all about Akshauhini which you have mentioned to us.

18. Tell us the numbers of horse and foot, chariots and elephants, which make an Akshauhini, for you know every thing.

Sauti said :—

19. One chariot, and one elephant, five foot soldiers and three horse-men, form a Patti.

20. Three Pattis make a Senamukha, three Senamukhas make a Gulma.

21. Three Gulmas make a Gana, three Ganas a Bahini, three Bahinis taking together, form a Pritana.

22. Three Pritanas make a Chamu, three Chamus an Anikini, and ten times one Anikini is called by the learned as one Akshauhini.

23—24. O best of Brahmanas, mathematicians have calculated that there are twenty one thousand eight hundred and seventy chariots in an Akshauhini. The number of elephants is also the same.

25—26. Know, the number of foot soldiers is one hundred nine-thousand three hundred and fifty; the number of horses is sixty-five thousand six-hundred and three.

27. Those who are acquainted with the principle of numbers call the above, explained fully by me, the numbers of an Akshauhini.

28. O best of Brahmanas, the eighteen Akshauhinis of the Kurus and the Pandava soldiers were composed according to this calculation.

29. Time brought them all together in this place, and making the Kauravas the cause, destroyed them all.

30. Bhishma, skillful in arms, fought for ten days. Drona defended the Kuru army for five days.

31—32. The destroyer of enemy's soldiers, Karna, fought for two days; Sailya for half a day, and for a half a day then lasted the club-fight of Duryodhana and Bhima. At the close of that day, Ashwathama, Kirtavarma and Kripa,

33. Destroyed the army of Yudhisthira when his soldiers were unsuspectingly sleeping. O Saunaka, the best of narrations, the Bharata, which is narrated here at your sacrifice,

34. Was formerly narrated at the sacrifice of Janamejaya by the learned pupil of Vyasa. In it has been fully described the fame and valour of the kings of the world.

35. There are three Parvas in the beginning (of this great work), namely Paushya, Paulama and Astika, which contain many wonderful dictions and descriptions and senses.

36. As men desirous of final release, accept Vairagya, so it is accepted by the wise. As Self is among things to be known, as life among things that are dear,

37. So is it the best among all histories and also among all Sastras. There is not a story current in the world which does not depend on it.

38—39. As the body depends on the food it partakes, as the servant who wishes for promotion serves a master of good birth, so all poets serve and cherish this Bharata.

40. As the words, constituting the various branches of knowledge and the Vedas, display vowels and consonants only, so this excellent history displays the highest knowledge.

41. Hear the outlines of the Parvas (chapters) of this Bharata history which is full of subtle meaning and logical connection, and which is rich with the meanings of the Vedas.

42. The first is called Anukramanika, the second Parva Sangraha; then come Paulama, Paushya, Astika, Adivansavatarana,

43. After this the wonderful and thoughtful Sambhava, then Yatugriha-daha, then Hairimba,

44. Then Baka-badha, and then Chaitra-ratha, then Panchali-shaimvara Parva,

45. Then after defeating the rivals in rightful battle Baibahika Parva, then Vidura-gamana and Rajya-lava,

46. Then Arjuna-vanabasha, Subhadra-harana, Haranya-harika,

47. Then Khandava-daha, and Moyadarsana, then come Shava Parva, and Mantra Parva,

48. Then Farasandha-badha, and Digbijaya; after Digbijaya comes the Parva called Rajsuika.

49. Then Arghyaviharana, Shisupala-badha, Dyuta, Anudyuta Parva;

50. Then Aranyaka, Kirmira-badha, Arnavigamana;

54. Then Markandeya-samashya, then the Parva of the meeting of Draupadi and Setyavama;

55. Then Ghoshajatra, Mriga-swapna, then Brihidrauniakhyana and Aindra-drumna;

56. Then Draupadi-harana-Parva, then Faidratha-bemochana, then the story of Savitri, illustrating love of husband and chastity;

57. After this the story of Rama, then Kundala-harana Parva;

58. That which comes next is Aranaya, and then Virata, where the Pandavas went (in disguise) and fulfilled their promise.

59. Then the Kichaka-badha, then Gogrohana, then the marriage of Abhimanyu with the daughter of the king of Virata.

60. Then is the most wonderful Parva Udyoga. The next one is Sanjaya-yana.

61. Then comes Prujagara, the anxieties of Dhritarashtra, then Sanatsujata, the mysteries of Philosophy.

62. Then Yansandhi, the arrival of Sri-krishna. Then the story of Malati and that of Galava;

63. Then the stories of Savitri, Vamadeva and Vainya; then the stories of Yamadagni and Shodasharajika;

64. Then the arrival of Krishna at the court, then Bidula-Putra-shashana, then the assemblage of troops and the story of Seta;

65. Then comes the quarrel of the noble Karna, then the march of the Kuru and Pandava armies to the field of battle.

66. Then Ratharathi-Sankhya Parva, then the arrival of wrath-inspiring messenger Uluka;

67. Then the story of Amba, then the wonderful instalation of Bhisma;

68. Then (the account of) the creation of Jambu and Blumi, then the account of islands.

69. Then Vagabata-Gita Parva, then Bhisma-badha, then the instalation of Drona, and then the death of Sansaptakas;

70. Then Abhimanyu-badha, then Praligma Parva, then Faidhratha-badha and Ghatatkacha-badha;

71. Then the hair-stirring Drona-badha, then the discharge of Narayana weapon;

72. Then Karna Parva, and then next to it is Sallya Parva. Then Hrada Prabesha Parva, then Gada-yudha;

73. Then Saraswata, and the description of Thirtha and Bangsa, and then Souptika, describing the disgraceful conduct of the Kurus.

74. Then dreadful Aishika Parva, then Fala-pradana, then Stribilapa;

75. Then Sradha Parva, describing the funeral rites for the killed Kurus; then Charvaka-badha who appeared as a Brahmana.

76. Then the coronation of wise Yudhisthira, then Griha-prabivaga;

77. Then Santi Parva, then Rajadharm-anushashana, then Apadharna and Mukshyudharma;

78. Then come Suka prasna-avigamanam, Brahma-prasna-anushashana, the origin of Durvasha, and colloquy with Maya.

79. Next comes Anushashana, then the ascension of wise Bhisma to heaven.

80. The next one is all sin-destroying Ashwamedha, and then Anu-Gita, containing spiritual philosophy.

81. Next come Asramvasha, Putra-darsana, and the arrival of Narada;

82. Then comes Mausala, full of cruel and terrible incidents; then Mahaprasthana; and the ascension to heaven.

83. Then follows the Purana which is called Khila Haribansa, in it is Vishnu Parva, describing the early life of Vishnu and the destruction of Kansa.

84. The last of all is Vavishya Parva which contains future prophecies. These are the one hundred Parvas, composed by the noble and great Vyasa.

85. Having placed them in eighteen Parvas, the son of Lomharsana, the descendant of Suta, recited them in the forest of Naimisha ;

86. Of which the above is an abridgement. Adiparva contains Paushya, Paulama, Astika, Adivansavatara,

87. Shamvaba ; the burning of the house of lac, the destruction of Hirimba and Baka, and Chaitraratha, the Shwamvara of Draupadi ;

211. The first seizure of Virata's kine by the Trigartas, the fearful battle that followed;

212. The capture of Virata by the enemy and his rescue by Bhima; the release of his kine also by the Pandava (Bhima);

213. The seizure of Virata's kine by the Kurus, the defeat of the Kuru warriors by single handed Aryuna, 214—215. The release of the king's kine by Aryuna's valour; the bestowal by Virata of his daughter to Aryuna for his acceptance of her for his son by Subhadra, Abhimanyu, the destroyer of foes. These are the contents of the extensive fourth Parva Virata.

216—217. The great Rishi has composed it in sixty seven chapters and it contains two thousand and fifty slokas.

218. Hear now, the contents of the fifth Parva, named Udyoga. When the Pandavas were living at Upaplavya,

219. Desirous of battle, both Aryuna and Duryodhana went to Krishna, and said, "You should help us in this war."

220. On these words being uttered, the high-souled Krishna replied, "O best of men, a counsellor (myself) who will not fight,

221. And one Akshauhini of my soldiers, between these two which shall I give to you?" Blind to his own interest, the foolish Duryodhana asked for the soldiers.

222. Aryuna asked to possess Krishna as a counsellor, although he will not fight. Then is related the coming of the king of Madra for the assistance of the Pandavas.

223. Having deceived him on the way by presents, Duryodhana induced him to grant him a boon, and for that boon he asked his help in the war.

224. Then it narrates how Salya went to the Pandavas and how he consoled Yudhisthira by recounting the victory of Indra (over Vitra.)

225—226. Then is told the despatch of the Purohita by the Pandavas to the Kurus. Greatly powerful Dhritarastra, having heard the story of Madra's victory from the Purohita, decided to send his Purohita, but finally sent Sanjaya to the Pandavas to ask for peace.

227—228.—Dhritarastra heard all about the Pandavas, their friends, Krishna and others; and his great anxiety and sleeplessness in consequence. Vidura's sound, wise and various counsels given to the wise king, Dhritarastra.

229. It then contains the excellent truths of spiritual philosophy that were told by Sanatsujata

230. To the anxious and sorrowing king. Next morning in the Royal court, Sanjaya spoke

231. Of the great friendship between Aryuna and Krishna. It was then that great Krishna, moved by pity and being desirous of bringing peace,

232. Went himself to Hastinapur, the capital of the Kurus. (It then relates) the rejection of the peaceful offer of Krishna by prince Duryodhana,

233. An offer which was for the benefit of both parties. Then is related the story of Damvodvava;

234. Then the search for a bridegroom by Matali for his daughter; then follows the history of the great Rishi Galava.

235. Then the story of the training of the son of Bidula; having heard of the evil counsel of Duryodhana and Karna and others.

236. Krishna's display of his Yoga powers; then his taking Karna on his chariot and giving him sound advice;

237. Karna's rejection of Krishna's advice out of pride; then the chastiser of his enemies, Krishna returned to Upaplavya from Hastinapur.

238—239. He told the Pandavas all that had happened. It was then the greatly powerful Pandavas, the chastisers of their foes, after consulting properly with one another, made all preparations for war.

240. Then follows the march of infantry, cavalry, elephants and charioteers from Hastinapur; the review of troops by both parties; the sending of Uluka to the Pandavas by the prince (Duryodhana)

241. As an envoy on the day before the great battle; then the number of charioteers of different classes was related. Then is told the story of Amba.

242. These are the matters that have been dwelt on, the fifth Parva of the Bharata in full of incidents regarding both peace and war.

243—244. O Great Rishis, the great Vyasa has composed this Parva in one hundred and eighty six chapters. The number of slokas composed in it by the great Rishi is six thousand six hundred and ninety eight.

245. Then is told the wonderful Bhisma Parva. Sanjaya related in it the creation of Jambu country.

246. Then is narrated the great depression of the army of Yudhisthira and the fierce battle that raged for ten successive days.

247. The high souled Krishna dispelled in this Parva the great compunction which was felt by Aryuna towards his relatives, by citing reasons based on the philosophy of final emancipation.

248—249. In it is also narrated how the magnanimous Krishna, seeing the loss inflicted on the Pandava army, jumped from the chariot and ran swiftly, with dauntless breast and his driving whip in hand, to kill Bhisma. In this Parva also, Krishna smote Aryuna,

250. The bearer of the Gandiva and the greatest warrior in battle among all wielders of weapons. In it also is narrated how the bow-man Aryuna, placing Shikhandi before him

251. Wounded Bhisma with his sharpest arrows and felled him from his chariot, and how Bhisma lay on his bed of arrows.

252—254. This extensive Parva is the sixth in the Bharata. It is composed of one hundred and seventeen chapters. Its number of slokas is five thousand eight hundred and eighty-four as composed by Vyasa, well-learned in the Vedas. Then comes Drona Parva, full of wonderful incidents.

255—256. It relates the installation of greatly powerful instructor Drona as the commander of the army; the vow of making Yudhisthira prisoner was taken by the great warrior to please Duryodhana; the retreat of Aryuna before the Sansaptakas;

257. The overthrow by Aryuna of the great king Vagadatta, as great a warrior as Indra himself, with his elephant Supratika;

258. The death of the boy-hero, Abhimanyu in his teens, alone and unsupported, at the hands of many great car-warriors, including Jayadrata.

259. On the death of Abhimanyu, the destruction by Aryuna of seven Akhaninis of soldiers with Jayadrata in a great battle.

260. Then in order to search Partha, greatly powerful Bhima and the great car-warrior Satyaki, by command of king Yudhisthira,

261. Entered into the Kaurava ranks, impenetrable even by the celestials; the destruction of the rest of the Sansaptakas.

262—263. In this Drona Parva is narrated the deaths of Alambusa, Srutayus, Shomdatti, Birata, great car-warrior Drupada, Ghatat-kacha and others. Being exceedingly angry on account of the death of Drona in battle, Ashwathama also,

264. discharged his fearful weapon Narayana. Then is told the story of Rudra, in connection with the burning of the cities.

265. The arrival of Vyasa, and the glories of Partha and Krishna are told by him.

266. These are the matters elaborately narrated in the seventh Parva of the Bharata, in which all the chiefs and potentates mentioned were killed.

267—268. The number of chapters in this Parva is one hundred and seventy. The number of slokas composed in the Drona Parva by the great Rishi, the son of Parasara and the master of great knowledge, is eight thousand and nine hundred.

279. Then comes the most wonderful Parva, named Karna. In it is described the appointment of king of the Madra as the charioteer (of Karna).

270. Then is told the old story of the death of Tripura; the interchange of strong words between Karna and Sallya on their setting out to battle.

271. Then is narrated the story of the swan and the crow as an insulting allusion to Karna. Then is the death of Pandya at the hands of the high souled Ashwathama.

272—273. Then the death of Dandasen and then that of Danda, then the imminent risk of Yudhisthira in single combat with Karna which took place before all the warriors; the anger of Yudhisthira and Aryuna towards each other;

274—275. Krishna's pacification of Aryuna; Bhima's fulfilment of his vow by drinking the heart's blood of Dushasana after ripping open his breast; the slaying of Karna by Aryuna in single combat.

276—277. The readers of the Bharata calls this Parva the eighth Parva. The number of its chapters is sixty nine, and that of the slokas is four thousand nine hundred and sixty four.

278. Then is told the wonderful Parva, called Sallya. After the death of all great warriors, the king of Madra became the commander.

279. Then is described one after the other the encounters of various charioteers; then the deaths of the chief warriors of the Kuru army.

280. Then the death of Sallya at the hands of Yudhisthira, the death of Sakuni at the hands of Sahadeva.

281. When only a small remnant of his troops remained alive, Yuyudhana retired into a lake, and there creating room for himself, lay hidden.

282—283. The receipt of this news by Bhima from a hunter. Then is related how Duryodhana, ever unable to bear affronts, came out of the water, being angered by the insulting words of Yudhisthira. Then is described the fight of Bhima and Duryodhana with clubs.

284. The arrival of Balarama at the time of the fight is next described. Then is told the sacredness of the Saraswati.

285—286. The continuation of the club fight; the breaking of Duryodhana's thighs by Bhima by a fearful hurl of his club. All this has been described in the wonderful ninth Parva.

287—288. The number of chapters in this Parva is fifty-nine, and the number of slokas composed by the great Vyasa, the spreader of the fame of the Kuru Dynasty, is three thousand two hundred and twenty.

289—290. I shall now describe the contents of the fearful tenth Parva, named Sauptika. On the departure of the Pandavas, the great car-warriors, Kritavarma, Kripa and the son of Drona (Ashwathama) came to the field of battle in the evening.

291. They saw King Duryodhana lying on the ground, his thighs broken, and his body covered with blood. The great car-warrior, fearfully angry son of Drona vowed,

292. "I will not take off my armour without killing all the Panchalas with Dhristadyumna, and the Pandavas with their allies."

293. Having said these words, the three warriors left Duryodhana and entered into the great forest just when the sun was setting.

294. While they were resting under a large banyan tree, they saw an owl killing innumerable crows one after the other.

295. Seeing this, Ashwathama, his heart being full of rage, remembering the death of his father, determined to kill the sleeping Panchalas.

296. Going to the gate of the camp, he saw a fearful Rakshasa, his head reaching to the very skies, guarding the door.

297. Seeing also that the Rakshasa obstructed him in his discharge of weapons, he began to worship the three-eyed divinity, and it pacified him.

298—300. Then accompanied by Kripa and Kritavarma, he entered the camp and killed all the sons of Draupadi and all the family of Panchalas, including Dhristadyumna, when they were all unsuspectingly sleeping on their beds. Only Satyaki and the five Pandavas escaped through the counsel of Krishna.

301. The charioteer of Dhristadyumna brought to the Pandavas the news of the massacre of the slumbering Panchalas by the son of Drona. Draupadi, agrieved by the death of her father, brother and sons.

302. Sat before her husbands and resolved to die of fasting. Then Bhima of fearful deed, being moved by the words of Draupadi,

303. Determined to please her. He speedily took up his club and ran in pursuit of the son of his preceptor.

304. The son of Drona, out of fear of Bhima, and as fate would have it, discharged the celestial weapon, crying "Let it make the world free of all the Pandavas."

305. Krishna neutralised the words by saying, "This shall not be," and Aryuna neutralised the weapon by one of his own.

306. Seeing the wicked intention of Ashwathama, Dwaipayana cursed him, and he too cursed Dwaipayana.

307. The Pandavas took the Jewel on the head of Ashwathama, and they with much pleasure presented it to the agrieved and sorrowing Draupadi.

308—309. These matters are dwelt on in this tenth Sauptika Parva. The great Vyasa composed it in eighteen chapters. The numbers of slokas composed in it by the great reciter of the sacred truths, is eight hundred and seventy.

310. The great Rishi has put together two Parvas, namely Sauptika and Aishika in this Parva. Then the most pathetic Parva called Stree is next told.

311—313. Then greatly wise Dhritarastra, being much afflicted by the death of his sons, moved with vengeance, crushed into pieces an iron statue, the substitute for Bhima,—placed before him by Krishna. Then Vidura consoled the great king by removing his wordly affections with reasons pointing to final emancipation.

314. Then is described the journey of Dhritarastra with the ladies of his house, to the field of battle.

315. Then were the pathetic and heart-rending lamentations of the wives of the heroes. The wrath of Gandhari and Dhritarastra, and their falling into a swoon.

316. Then did the ladies see those heroes,—their slain sons, brothers and fathers,—lying on the field of battle.

317. The pacification by Krishna of the wrath of Gandhari, who was greatly afflicted by the death of her sons and grandsons.

318. The cremation of the chiefs and potentates by king Yudhishthira, the greatly wise and the foremost of all virtuous men, according to due rites.

319. When the presentation of water to the deceased princes was commenced, Kunti acknowledged Karna as her son born in secret.

320. All this has been described by the great Rishi Vyasa in the most pathetic eleventh Parva.

321—322. Its perusal moves every heart and draws tears from every eye. It contains twenty-seven chapters, and its number of slokas is seven hundred and seventy-five.

323. Then comes the Santi Parva, the twelfth in number, which increases the understanding. It relates the despondency of Yudhishthira

324—325. On his having slain his fathers, brothers, sons, maternal uncles and relations by marriage. There is related how Bhishma, on his bed of arrows, told various systems, of laws and duties, worth the study of kings who desire to possess knowledge.

326. If a person understands them, he attains to consummate knowledge. The mysteries of final emancipation is also elaborately discussed.

327. This twelfth Parva, the favourite of the wise, contains three hundred and thirty nine chapters.

328—329. O Rishis, the wise son of Parasara has described this Parva in fourteen thousand seven hundred and thirty two slokas. Next comes the excellent Anushashana Parva.

330. The king of the Kurus, Yudhishthira was consoled by hearing the expositions of duties by the son of the Bhagirathi, Bhishma.

331. It then treats of the rules of Dharma and Artha in detail, then the various rules of charity and its different merits;

332. The different merits of charity according to the subjects of charity; the rules of living, the ceremonials of individual duty, and the matchless merit of truth.

333. It describes the great merit of Brahmanas, and kine, and it reveals the duties in relation to time and place.

334. All these excellent matters have been treated in this Anushashana Parva containing variety of incidents. It also describes ascension of Bhishma to heaven.

335. It contains one hundred and forty six chapters.

336. The number of slokas in it is eight thousand. Then comes the fourteenth Parva, called Ashwamedhika.

337. It relates the beautiful story of Samvasta and Marutta; the discovery of treasures (by the Pandavas). Then is described the birth of Parikshit,

338. Who was burnt by the weapon (of Ashwathama and therefore almost dead), but he was revived by Krishna; Aryuna's journey with the sacrificial horse let loose,

339. And his fight with various chiefs and potentates who seized it in wrath, the encounter of Aryuna with the son of Chitrangada,

340. And his great risk in the fight with Vabruvahana. Then follows the story of the mongose in the horse-sacrifice.

341. Thus is described the wonderful Parva, called Ashwamedhika. Its number of chapters is one hundred and three.

342. The number of slokas, composed by the greatly wise Rishi, is three thousand three hundred and twenty.

343—345. Then comes the fifteenth Parva, named Asramvasika, in which, abdicating the kingdom and accompanied by Gandhari and Vidura, the King Dhritarastra went to the forest. Seeing this, virtuous Pritha (Kunti), ever engaged in serving her superiors, left the kingdom of her sons and followed the old couple.

346. His wonderful seeing of the spirits of the slain heroes through the favour of Vyasa.

347. On this the old monarch abandoned his sorrow, and acquired with his wife the highest fruits of his virtuous deeds. Vidura also attained to the highest state, having leaned on virtue all his life.

348. The learned son of Gavalgana, the wise and learned Sanjaya also, attained to the highest state. Then it relates the meeting of the just king Yudhisthira with Narada.

349. Yudhisthira heard from him the destruction of the Vrisni race. Thus is described this wonderful Parva, called Asramvasika.

350-351. The number of chapters in it is forty two and the number of slokas, composed by the great Rishi, learned in truth, is one thousand five hundred and six. Then is told the terrible Mausala Parva.

352-353. It relates how on account of the Bramhana's curse, when they were all deprived of their senses with drink, those tigers of men (belonging to the Vrisni race), with many scars of battle on their bodies, slew one another on the shores of the salt-sea with Eraka grass which became deadly thunders in their hands.

354. It then relates that Rama and Krishna, after destroying their race, did not rise superior to the sway of all-destroying Time.

355. Then is described the arrival of Aryuna, the foremost of men, at Dwarka, and his sorrow and affliction on seeing the city destitute of the Vrisnis.

356. Performing the funeral ceremony of his maternal uncle Basudeva, the foremost man of the Yadu dynasty, he saw the Yadu heroes lying dead where they had been drinking.

357. He then performed the cremation ceremonies of the illustrious Krishna and Balarama, and of the other chief men of the Yadu race.

358. Then is described the journey of Aryuna from Dwarka with the women, and children, the old and the decrepit, and the great calamity he met with on the way. He also saw the overthrow of his Gandiva.

359. He also saw unpropitiousness of his celestial weapons. Seeing that it was impossible to protect the Yadu women,

360. And seeing all this, he went to Yudhisthira by the advice of Vyasa, and asked permission to adopt the life of an ascetic.

361-362. Thus is described the sixteenth Parva, called Mausala Parva. Its number of chapters is eight and the number of slokas, composed by Vyasa, learned in truth, is three hundred and twenty. The next is Mahaprasthanika, the seventeenth Parva.

363. It relates that the best of men, the Pandavas, abdicating their kingdom went with Draupadi in their great journey (Mahaprasthanika.)

364. They met with Agni when they arrived at the sea of red waters. Asked by Agni, the high-sould Partha,

365-366. After worshipping him duly, returned to him the great celestial bow Gandiva. Yudhisthira went on his journey, and did not look back when one after the other his brothers, including Draupadi, dropped down dead. Thus is told the seventeenth Parva, called Mahaprasthanika.

367. There are three chapters in it, and the number of slokas, composed by all truth-knowing Vyasa, is three hundred and twenty.

368. Know, the Parva that comes next is called Sarga, full of heavenly matters ; in which is related how the celestial car came to take Yudhisthira.

369—370. He, however, declined to ascend it without the dog that accompanied him. Seeing the steady adherence of the illustrious Yudhisthira to virtue Dharma giving up the form of the dog, showed himself to the king. Then Yudhisthira, attaining to the celestial regions, felt much pain.

371. The celestial messenger showed him hell by deception, where the virtuous minded king heard the heart-rending lamentations of his brothers,

372. Suffering in that region by the laws of Yama. This was shown to Yudhisthira by Indra and Dharma.

373. Then Yudhisthira, after bathing in the celestial Ganga, gave up his human body and gained that state which his acts merited.

374. He lived in happiness, honoured by Indra and the celestials. This is the eighteenth Parva narrated by the illustrious Vyasa.

375—376. The number of chapters in it is five, and its number of slokas, O Rishis, composed by the great Vyasa, is two hundred and nine. These are the contents of the eighteen Parvas.

377—378. There are Harivansa and Vavisya in its appendix. The number of slokas, composed by the great Rishi in the Harivansa, is twelve thousand. These are the contents of the chapters called Parva Sangraha in the Bharata.

Souti said :—

379. Eighteen Akshauhinis of soldiers assembled to fight and the battle raised for eighteen days.

380. He who is learned in the four Vedas with all the Angas and Upanishadas, but does not know this history, cannot be considered to be wise.

381. The greatly intelligent Vyasa has spoken it as a treatise on Dharma, Artha and Kama.

382. Those who have heard it can never listen to other histories, as those who have heard the sweet voice of the male Kakila (bird) can never listen to the harsh cawing of the crows,

383. As the three worlds have eveloped from the five elements, so inspiration of all poets proceeds from this excellent work.

384. O Brahmanas, as the four kinds of creatures depend on space for their existence, so all the Puranas depend on this history.

385. As all the senses are dependent on the wonderful workings of the mind, so all the acts and moral qualities depend on this treatise.

386. As the body depends on the food it takes, so all the stories current in the world depend on this work.

387. As servants, willing to have preferment, always depend on their noble masters, so do all poets depend on this Bharata.

388. As the blessed domestic Asrama cannot be surpassed by the other Asramas, so can no poet surpass this poem.

389. O Rishis, be up and doing. Let your hearts be fixed in virtue, for virtue is the only friend in the other world. Even the most intelligent men can never make their wealth and wives their own by carefully cherishing them. They are not things lasting.

390. The Bharata, uttered from the lips of Dwaipayana is matchless, it is sacred, it is virtue itself. It destroys sins and produces good. What is the necessity for him, who hears it when it is being recited, to bathe in the sacred Pushkara !

391. Whatever sin is committed in the day by a Brahmana through his senses are all purged off, if he reads the Bharata in the evening.

392. Whatever sins also he may commit in the night by deeds, words or mind are all purged off, if he reads the Bharata in the first twilight of the morning.

393. He who gives to a Brahmana, learned in the Vedas and other sciences, one hundred cows with their horns plated with gold, and he who listens daily to the sacred histories of the Bharata, gain equal merit.

394. As the wide ocean can be easily crossed by men having boats, so this extensive history of great excellence and deep meaning can be understood by the help of this chapter which is called Parva-Sangraha ;

Thus ends the Chapter second Parva-Sangraha in the Adiparva of the blessed Mahabharata.

CHAPTER III.

( PAUSHYA PARVA. )

Souti said :—

1. The son of Parikshit, Janamejaya, with his brothers, was attending his long sacrifice in the field of Kurukshetra.

2. His brothers were three, namely,—Srutasena, Ugrasena, and Bhimasena. When they were sitting at the sacrifice, there came the son of Sarama.

3. He, being belaboured by the brothers of Janamejaya, went to his mother weeping.

4. His mother, seeing him weep, asked him, "Why are you weeping, who has beaten you?"

5. Being thus questioned, he replied to his mother, "I have been beaten by the brothers of Janamejaya."

6. And then his mother said, "You must have committed some fault, for which you have been beaten."

7. He replied, "I committed no fault. I did not drink the sacrificial ghee, I did not cast even a look at it."

8. Hearing this her mother, being very sorry for the affliction of his son, went to the place where Janamejaya with his brothers were attending his long sacrifice.

9. She angrily addressed Janamejaya thus, "My son did not commit any fault. He did not drink your sacrificial ghee, he did not even look at it. Why did you then beat him?"

10. They did not (condescend) to reply to her. On this she said, "As you beat my son who did commit no fault, so will evil come to you when you least expect it."

11. Janamejaya, having been thus cursed by the celestial bitch Sarama, was very much alarmed and dejected.

12. After finishing the sacrifice, he returned to Hastinapur and took great pains to find out a priest who could neutralise the effect of the curse by procuring absolution from his sin.

13. Janamejaya, the son of Parikshit, when out in hunting, saw in one part of his dominion a holy hermitage,

14. Where lived a Rishi, named Srutasrava; he had a son who was named Som-srava, who was deeply engaged in austere penances.

15. Being desirous to make the son of the Rishi his priest, Janamejaya,

16. Saluted him and said, "O Vagabana, allow your son to be my priest."

17. Being thus addressed by Janamejaya, the Rishi replied, "O Janamejaya, my son is accomplished in the study of the Vedas, endued with my full asceticism, and deep in devotion, but he is born in the womb of a serpent who swallowed my vital fluid.

18. "He is able to absolve you from all sins except those committed against Mahadeva.

19. But he observes a particular rule,—namely he grants to a Brahmana whatever he asks from him. If you can allow him to do it, you can then take him."

20. Janamejaya thus addressed by the Rishi, said "It shall be as you say."

21. He then took him as his priest and returned to his capital. He then addressed his brothers thus, "I have chosen this person as my priest. Whatever he will command to do must be obeyed by you without questioning."

22. The brothers did as they were requested. Giving these instructions to his brothers he marched against Takshasila and conquered that country.

23. About this time there was also a Rishi, named Ayuda-Dhoumya. He had three disciples, namely Upamanyu, Aruni, and Veda.

24. One day the Rishi asked one of these three disciples, Aruni of Panchala, to go and stop a breach in the water-course in his field.

25. Thus ordered by the preceptor, Aruni of Panchala went to the spot, but could not stop the breach.

26. He was very sorry that he could not carry out his preceptor's bidding, but at last he saw a means, and he said, "I shall do it in this way."

27. He entered into the breach, and there laid himself down, and thus the water was stopped.

28. Sometimes after, the preceptor Ayuda-Dhoumya enquired of his other disciples where Aruni of Panchala was.

29. Having been thus addressed, they replied, "Sir, he has been sent by you to stop the breach of the water-course in the field." Dhoumya, thus reminded, said to his pupils, "Let us all go to the place where he is."

30. Having gone there, he cried, "O Aruni of Panchala, where are you? Come here, my child."

31. Having heard the voice of his preceptor, Aruni rose speedily from the breach and stood before him.

32. Addressing his preceptor, Aruni said, "I was in the breach of the water-course. Having been unable to stop it by any other means, I entered myself into the breach to prevent the water from running out. It is only when I heard your honour's voice that I have left it, and allowed the waters to escape. I salute you, great teacher, tell me what I am to do now."

33. The preceptor, thus addressed, said, "As you have opened the water-course in getting from the ditch, you shall be henceforth known as Uddalaka as a mark of your preceptor's favour."

34. And as you have obeyed my command, You shall obtain good fortune.

35. All the Vedas will shine in you, and so will all the Dharma Sastras."

36. Being thus blessed by his preceptor, Aruni went away to the country where his heart longed to go. The name of another Ayuda Dhoumya's disciples was Upamanyu.

37. Him the preceptor thus addressed, "Go, my child, look after my kine."

38. As ordered by his preceptor, he went to look after the cows. Having tend them all day, he came back to the preceptor's house in the evening. He then stood before him and respectfully saluted him.

39. His preceptor, seeing him in the best of health, asked, "Upamanyu, my child, by what means you support yourself? You are exceedingly plump?"

40. He answered to his preceptor, "I support myself by begging."

41. The preceptor said, "You should not appropriate what you receive by begging without offering it to me." Being thus told he went away and offered all that he got by begging to his preceptor;

42. And the preceptor took from him all that he got. He, being thus treated, went away to look after the cattle. And after having tend them all day he came back in the evening. He stood before his preceptor and respectfully saluted him.

43. The preceptor, seeing him still as plump as before, said, "Upamanyu, my child, I take from you all that you get by begging. How do you contrive to support yourself now?"

44. Being thus questioned, he answered to his preceptor, "Sir, after giving you all I get by begging, I go again to beg to support myself."

45. The preceptor, said "This is not the way you should obey your preceptor. You diminish the support of others who live by begging. Having thus supported yourself you have showed that you are covetous."

46. Having assented to all his preceptor's words, he went away (again) to tend the kine. Having done it, he stood before the preceptor and respectfully saluted him.

47. His preceptor saw that he was still plump and said, "Upamanyu, my child, I take from you all that you get by begging. You do not also go out begging for the second time. How do you now manage to support yourself?"

48. Upamanyu, thus questioned, replied, "Sir, I now support myself with the milk of these cows." Hearing which the preceptor said, "It is not proper for you to drink the milk without first asking my consent."

49. He assented to his preceptor's words and went to tend the cattle. Having done it he stood before his preceptor and respectfully saluted him.

50. The preceptor saw that he was still fat, and he asked, "Upamanyu my child, you do not support yourself by alms, nor do you go begging for the second time, nor do you drink the milk of my cows, but you are still fat, how do you support yourself now?"

51. Thus questioned he said, "I now drink the froth that the calves throw out when they suck their mothers' teats."

52. The preceptor replied, "The good calves, out of kindness towards you, throw out a large quantity of froth. You should not stand in the way of their full meal. Know, it is not proper for you to drink the froth." Upamanya assented to this and went to tend the cattle.

53—54. Thus prevented by his preceptor (from supporting himself,) he did not feed on alms, he did not drink the milk, or taste the froth, he had thus nothing to eat. One day being very much oppressed by hunger he ate the leaves of Arka tree in a forest. His eyes were affected by the pungent, acrimonious, crude and saline qualities of the leaves, and he became blind. When he was thus walking about feeling his way he fell into a deep well.

55. As he did not return that day to the Rishi's house when the sun was sinking down behind the summit of the western mountain, the preceptor said to his pupils that Upamanyu had not yet returned. And they replied that he had gone to tend the cattle.

56. On this the preceptor said, "Upamanyu is displeased, because he has been prevented from the use of every thing. He is, therefore, making late to come home. Let us go and find him out." Having said this, he went with his pupils into the forest and called aloud. "Ho, Upamanyu, where are you? My child, come here."

57. Having heard the voice of his preceptor he replied, "I have fallen into this well." The preceptor asked, "How have you fallen into this well?"

58. He answered to the preceptor, "I have become blind by eating the leaves of Arka tree, and thus fallen into this well."

59. On this the preceptor replied, "Worship the twin Aswinas, the physicians of the celestials, and he will restore you your sight." Thus addressed, Upamanya began to worship the twin Aswinas by reciting the following words from the Rig Veda.

60—70. "You have existed before the creation, O you first-born beings; you are manifest in this wonderful universe of five elements. You are infinite, you are the course of Nature and intelligent Soul that pervaders all. I desire to obtain you by the knowledge, derived from hearing and meditation.

You are birds of beautiful feathers, that roost on the body which is like to a tree. You are free from the three common attributes of all souls. You are beyond all comparison. You pervade the universe through its spirit in every created thing.

You are golden eagles. You are the essence in which all things disappear. You are free from error and you do not deteriorate. You are of beautiful beaks, which will not unjustly wound and which are ever victorious in all fights. Having created the sun, you weave the wonderful cloth of night and day by the black and white threads. You have established with the cloth thus woven two courses of action; one regarding the Devas, and the other regarding the Pitris. You set free the bird of life, seized by Time representing the infinite soul, so that it may be delivered to great happiness. Those that are greatly ignorant on account of the delusion of their senses, think that you, who have no attributes of matter, have forms.

Three hundred and sixty cows as represented by three hundred and sixty days give birth to one calf which is year. This calf is the creator and destroyer of all. Those that search after truth, through following different routes, draw the milk of true knowledge with its help.

The year is a nave of the wheel with seven hundred and twenty spokes, representing as many days. The circumference of this wheel is without an end and is represented by twelve months. This wheel is full of delusion and does not know deterioration. It affects all creatures belonging to this or the other world. O Aswinas, set this wheel in motion.

The wheel of Time represented by the year has also a nave, the six seasons. It has twelve spokes represented by the twelve signs of the Zodiac. This wheel of Time displays the fruits of all beings' actions. The Presiding Deities of Time obey this wheel.

Bound as I am to its bond, O Aswinas, make me free from this wheel of Time. O Aswinas, you are this universe of five elements. You are the objects that are enjoyed in this and the next world. Raise me beyond the influence of the five elements. You are the supreme Brahma, but you move on earth in forms and enjoy that pleasures that the senses give.

You created ten points of the universe in the beginning of the creation. You have placed the sun and the moon above. The Rishis perform their Yagmas according to the course of the sun. The celestials and men also perform their Yagmas as settled for them, and they enjoy the fruits of those acts.

Mixing the ten colors, you have produced all the objects of sight. The universe has sprung from these objects in which both the celestials and men and all creatures endued with life are engaged in their respective works. O Aswinas, I worship you. I also worship the sky that is your handi-work.

You are the ordainers of the fruits of all acts from which even the celestials are not free; you are, however, free from the fruits of your actions. You are the parents of all. You as males and females swallow the food which subsequently develops into the vital-fluid and blood. The new-born babe sucks her mother's breast, it is you who take the shape of the babe. O Aswinas, restore my sight and protect my life."

71. When Upamanyu thus adored the twin Aswinas, they appeared and said. "We are pleased with your devotion. Here is a cake for you. Take it and eat it."

72. Thus addressed he replied, "O Aswinas, your words never prove untrue. But I cannot take this cake without offering it to my preceptor."

73. The Aswinas said,— "Your preceptor also once invoked us, we gave him a cake and he took it without offering it to his teacher. Do what your preceptor did."

74. Thus addressed he said, "O Aswinas, I ask your pardon. I cannot take this cake without offering it to my preceptor."

75. The Aswinis said, "We are pleased with your this devotion to your preceptor. Your teacher's teeth are of black iron, yours will be those of gold. Your sight will be restored and you will possess good fortune."

76. Having been thus addressed by the Aswinis he regained his sight. He then went to his preceptor, saluted him and told him all that had happened. And his preceptor was very much pleased with him and told him that he would obtain immense prosperity as the Aswinis had said.

77. All the Vedas will shine on him and so also all Dharma Sastras. This was his trial.

78. The other pupil of Ayudha Dhaumya was called Veda. One day his preceptor addressed him thus, "Veda, my child, remain in my house and serve your teacher. It will be to your profit."

79. Veda, having assented to it, remained long in the family of his preceptor, being always mindful to serve him. Like an ox under the burden of his owner, he bore heat and cold, hunger and thirst, without any complaint at all times; and many years thus passed before his preceptor was satisfied.

80. Veda obtained good fortune and universal knowledge as the result of his preceptor's satisfaction. This was his trial.

81. Having received his preceptor's permission he left his house after the completion of living at his house and entered the domestic mode of life.

82. When he was living in his house he got three pupils. But he never asked them to perform any work or to serve him in any way.

83. Having himself suffered much woe when living in the family of his preceptor, he did not like to treat his pupils with severity.

84. Once on a time both the kings Janamejaya and Paushya came to his house and appointed him as their preceptor.

85. One day when he was going to depart on a sacrificial business, he employed one of his pupils, named Uttanka, to look after his house and family.

86. He said, "Uttanka, whatever should be required to be done in my house, let it be done by you without neglect." Having given him these instructions, Veda went away on his journey.

87. Uttanka, being always mindful of the service, as asked by his preceptor, lived in the family of his teacher. While he was staying there, the females of his preceptor's house assembled near him and addressed him thus.

88. "O Uttanka, the wife of your preceptor is in the state in which she might bear a child. Your preceptor is absent, therefore you are requested to stand in his place and do what is needful."

89. Uttanka, having been thus addressed, said to the women, "It is not proper for me to do it at the request of women. I have not been asked by my preceptor to do anything which is not proper."

90. Some time after, his preceptor returned from his journey. He heard all that had happened and was much pleased.

91. He said, "Uttanka, my child, what favour may I bestow on you? I have been properly and faithfully served by you. Our friendship for each other has, therefore, increased. I grant you permission to go. Depart and let your wishes be fulfilled."

92. Uttanka, thus addressed, replied, "Let me do something which you wish to be done."

93. It is said, he who bestows instructions, but does not receive Dakshina, and he who receives it without giving Dakshina—contrary to usage—one of these two dies, and bitter enmity is created between them.

94. I, who have got your permission to go, wish to bring some Dakshina for you." On hearing this, his preceptor said, "Uttanka, my child, then wait some time."

95. Some time after, Uttanka again said to his preceptor, "Command me to bring what you wish to have as Dakshina."

96. His Preceptor then said, "My beloved Uttanka, you have repeatedly expressed your desire to bring something as an acknowledgement of the instructions you have received from me. Go to your mistress and ask her what you will bring for Dakshina." Thus directed by his preceptor, Uttanka went to his teacher's wife and said, "Madam, I have received permission of my preceptor to depart, and I am desirous to bring some thing that would be agreeable to you as my Dakshina for the instruction I have received, so that I may be free from my debt of gratitude."

97. "Therefore, command me what am I to bring as Dakshina." His preceptress, thus addressed, said, "Go to king Paushya and beg from him the ear-rings that are worn by his queen;"

98. "And bring them here. Four days hence is a sacred day; on that day I wish to appear before the Brahmanas and distribute their food wearing those ear-rings. Do this, O Uttanka. If you be successful, good fortune will be yours. If not, what good can you expect?"

99. Thus ordered, Uttanka took his departure. When he was passing along the road he met with an extraordinary large bull and a man of extraordinary large stature riding on it. The man addressed Uttanka thus.

100. "O Uttanka, eat the dung of this bull." But Uttanka was not willing to eat it.

101. The man again said, "O Uttanka, eat it without hesitation. Your teacher ate it before."

102. When he was thus addressed, he expressed his willingness (to eat,) and ate the dung and drank the urine of the bull, and then respectfully rose and washed his hands as he went on.

103. He arrived at the palace of king Paushya who was seated on his throne. Uttanka went to him and saluted him; and pronouncing blessings said,

104. "I have come to you and stand before you a petitioner." King Paushya, returning his salutations said, "Sir, what shall I do for you?"

105. Uttanka replied, "I have come to beg from you your queen's ear-rings as a Dakshina to be given to my preceptor. You should give me those ear-rings."

106. King Paushya said,—“Go into the inner-apartment, and ask it from the queen.” He went there, but could not see her.

107. He again said to the king, "You should not deceitfully treat me. Your queen is not in the inner-apartment and I could not find her."

108. Paushya thought for a while and then replied, "Carefully recollect, Sir, whether you are defiled with the impurities of a repast. The queen is a chaste woman, and therefore she cannot be seen by one who is defiled by the impurities of a repast. She does not appear before one who is so defiled."

109. Uttanka, thus addressed, thought for a while and then replied, "Yes, it is so. As I was in a hurry, I performed my ablutions when I was walking." Paushya said, "This is a transgression. Ablutions can not properly be performed standing or walking in a hurry."

110. Uttanka assented to what fell from the king and sat with his face turned towards the east. He washed his hands and feet thoroughly. He then without sound thrice sipped water which was free from scum and froth and which was not warm. He took only so much of it as to reach his stomach. He then wiped his face twice. He then touched his eyes, ears &c., with water.

Having done all this he again went to the inner-apartment.

111. He saw the queen this time. Seeing him, she saluted him reverentially and said, "Welcome, Sir; command me what I shall do for you."

112. Uttanka said to her, "You should give me your ear-rings. I beg them from you as I wish to present them to my preceptor." The queen, having been highly pleased with the conduct of Uttanka, thought that he was a very good man and he could not be refused. Therefore, she took off her ear-rings and handed them over to him. On giving them to Uttanka she said, "These ear-rings are very much sought after by Takshaka, the King of the Nagas. Therefore take them with the greatest care."

113. Uttanka, being thus told, replied to the queen, "Madam, you need not be under any apprehension. Takshaka, the king of the Nagas, cannot overcome me."

114. Having said this, he took leave of the queen and went back to the king, whom he addressed thus, "Paushya, I am much pleased." Paushya replied,

115. "A proper man on whom charity can be bestowed is got at long intervals. You are a guest with many qualifications, therefore I wish to perform a Sradh. Kindly wait a little."

116. Uttanka said, "Yes, I shall wait. Bring soon the provisions that are ready." The king, having signified his assent, duly entertained Uttanka.

117. Uttanka, seeing that the food that was brought before him was cold and had hair in it, considered it unclean, and said to Paushya, "You give me food that is not clean, therefore you will lose your sight."

118. Paushya replied, "As you impute uncleanness to the food which is clean, you will be without a child." Uttanka said,

119. "It is not proper for you to curse me after having given me unclean food. You can satisfy yourself by ocular proof." Thereupon Paushya by seeing it personally satisfied himself that the food was unclean.

120. Having seen that the food was really unclean, cold and mixed with hair,—because it was prepared by a woman whose hair was not braided,—Paushya began to pacify the Rishi Uttanka, saying,

121. "Sir, the food placed before you is cold and has really hair in it, having been prepared without sufficient care. Therefore, I pray you, kindly pardon me. Let me not become blind." Uttanka replied,

122. "What I say must happen. Having become blind, you may however regain your sight soon. Grant also that your curse on me may not take effect."

123. Paushya said, "I am not capable of revoking my curse. My anger is not appeased even now. But you do not know it."

124. Bramhana's heart is as soft as butter even though his words are like sharp razors. But contrary is the case with the Kshatrya. His words are as soft as butter, but his heart is like a sharp instrument.

125. Such being the case, I cannot revoke my curse, as my heart is very hard. You may go." Uttanka replied, "I showed you the uncleanness of the food placed before me. I am also pacified by you."

126. Besides you said that I should be without issue, because I falsely imputed uncleanness to the food. The food, being really unclean, your curse cannot take effect. I am sure of it."

127. Uttanka, having said this, went away with the ear-rings. On his way he saw a naked beggar, coming towards him. He was sometimes coming in view and sometimes disappearing.

128. Uttanka, having occasion to have some water, placed the ear-rings on the ground and went for it. In the mean time the beggar came quickly to the place and taking up the ear-rings ran away.

129. Having completed his ablutions and purified himself, and having bowed down to the divinities and spiritual masters, he ran after the thief as fast as possible.

130. Having overtaken him, he seized him with all his might, but the disguised Takshaka, suddenly quitting the form of the beggar, assumed his own real form, and quickly disappeared into a large hole in the ground.

131. Entering the region of the Nagas, he proceeded to his own home. Uttanka, remembering the words of the queen, pursued Takshaka.

132. He began to dig open the hole with a stick, but did not make much progress. Seeing his distress Indra sent his thunderbolt to his assistance.

133. Saying, "Go and help that Brahmana." The thunderbolt entering into the stick enlarged the hole.

134. Uttanka entered into the hole after the thunderbolt; and thus entering it he saw the land of the Nagas, with hundreds of palaces, elegant mansions, with turrets and domes, and gateways, with wonderful arenas for various games and entertainments.

135. To please the Nagas, he uttered the following slokas, "O serpents, subjects of the king Airavata, you are brilliant in battles, you shower weapons like clouds, charged with lightning and driven by wind."

136. Beautiful, variously formed, decked with many colored ear-rings, O children of Airavata, you shine like the sun in the sky.

137. There are many settlements of Nagas on the northern banks of the Ganges, and there do I often worship the great Nagas.

138. Who but Airavata can desire to move in the burning sun? When Dhritarastra goes out, twenty eight thousand Nagas follow him.

139. I salute you all that have Airavata for their elder brother,—whether you live near him or stay at a distance from him.

140. In order to get back my ear-rings I worship you, Takshaka, the Naga-king, who formerly lived in Kurukshetra and the forest of Khandhava.

141. Takshaka and Ashwasena were constant companions when they lived in Kurukshetra on the banks of the river Ilskumati.

142. I also worship Takshaka's younger brother Sutasena, who dwelt at the holy place called Mahadyumna with the intention of becoming one of the chiefs of the Nagas."

143. After having thus saluted the chief Nagas, the Brahmana Rishi Uttanka did not get his ear-rings; and he became very thoughtful.

144. When he saw that he did not get the ear-rings, although he had worshipped the Nagas, he looked around him and beheld two women working in a loom with a fine shuttle and weaving a piece of cloth. There were black and white threads in the loom. He also saw a wheel, with twelve spokes, which was turned round by six boys. He also saw a man with a horse. In order to please them all he uttered the following Mantras.

145. "This wheel, the circumference of which is marked by twenty-four divisions, representing twenty-four lunar changes, contains three hundred spokes. It is continually set in motion by six boys."

146. These maidens, representing universe, are continually weaving a cloth with white and black threads, creating innumerable worlds and millions of beings to inhabit them.

147. O, the master of thunder, the protector of the universe, the slayer of Vitra and Namuchi, O illustrious one, wearing the black cloth, O Deity, who displays truth and untruth in the universe,

148. Who owns the horse that was obtained from the depths of the ocean and which is but another form of Agni,—I bow to you, O supreme being, O Lord of the three worlds, O Purandara."

149. Then said the man with the horse, "I have been much pleased with your adoration. What good can I do to you?"

150. Uttanka replied, "Let the Nagas be brought under my power." The man then said, "Blow into this horse."

151. Thereupon Uttanka blew into the horse, and thousands of flames and fires with smoke issued forth from every aperture of the horse thus blown into.

152. The land of the Nagas was at the point of being burnt down, when Takshaka, taking the ear-rings, hastened to Uttanka, from his palace and said,

153. "Pray, Sir, take back your ear-rings. "Receiving back his ear-rings Uttanka thought,

154. "To-day is the sacred day mentioned by my preceptress. I am at a distance,—how can I, therefore, show my regard for her (by presenting her with the ear-rings)!" When he was thus meditating the man said,

155. "Uttanka, get on this horse. He will take you in a moment to the family of your preceptor."

156. Uttanka signified his assent, mounted the horse and reached his preceptor's house in a moment's time. The preceptress, after bathing, was dressing her hair, sitting and thinking that if Uttanka did not come, she would curse him.

157. At this very time Uttanka entered the house of his preceptor and made proper salutation to his preceptress. When he presented her with the ear-rings, she said.

158. "Uttanka, you have come at the proper time. Welcome, my child. As you are innocent, I do not curse you. Good fortune will come to you. Let your wishes be crowned with success."

159. Then did Uttanka salute his preceptor, and his preceptor said, "Uttanka, my child, welcome to you. What made you to be so long away?"

160. Uttanka replied to the preceptor, "The king of the Nagas, Takshaka, offered obstruction to the business I went, and therefore I had to go to the land of the Nagas.

161. There I saw two maidens working in a loom and weaving a cloth with black and white threads. What may it be?

162. I then saw a wheel, with twelve spokes, which was being continually turned by six boys. What does it mean? I also saw a man,—who is he? I saw also a horse of extraordinary size,—what is that horse?

163. On my way I saw on the road a man mounted on a bull. He lovingly addressed me thus, "Uttanka, eat the dung of this bull, which was eaten by your preceptor."

164. Thus requested by him, I ate the dung of that bull. Who is this man? Being instructed by you I wish to hear all about them."

165. His preceptor thus addressed said to him, "The two maidens you saw are Dhata and Bidhata. The black and white threads represent night and day. The wheel, with twelve spokes turned by six boys, is the year, having six seasons.

166. The man is Parjanya (the deity of rain); the horse is Agni, (deity of fire). The bull which you saw on the road is the Airavata, the king of elephants.

167. The man who rode it is Indra. The dung of the Bull, which you ate is Ambrosia. Certainly on account of this (eating) you were not slain in the land of the Nagas.

168. Indra, with six attributes, is my friend; he, being moved by kindness towards you, showed you this favour; therefore, you have been able to return safely with the ear-rings.

169. Now, mild-natured Uttanka, I give you permission to go. You will obtain good fortune." Uttanka, thus obtaining his preceptor's leave, and being deadly angry against Takshaka, went towards Hastinapur, resolved to take revenge on the king.

170. The good Brahmana's son reached Hastinapur. Uttanka then went to see king Janamejaya,

171. Who had only recently returned victorious from Takshasila. He saw him seated surrounded by his ministers.

172. He uttered blessings in proper time and addressed him in speech of correct accent and melodious sound.

Uttanka said:—

173. O best of kings, you are spending your time like a child when a most important matter urgently demands your attention.

Souti said :—

174. Having been thus addressed by the Brahmana, king Janamejaya duly saluted him and said to the best of Brahmanas.

Janamejaya said :—

175. I perform the duties of my Kshatrya race, by looking after my these subjects. Tell me what is the business that I am to perform and by which you are led to come here.

Souti said :—

276. Having been thus addressed by the best of kings, Janamejaya, the best of Brahmanas, distinguished for good deeds, thus replied, "O king, the business is your own that demands your attention. Therefore do it."

Uttanka said :—

177. O king of kings, your father was killed by Takshaka, therefore take revenge on that vile serpent for the death of your noble father.

178. The time has come, I say, for your taking vengeance, ordained by Fate. Go, O king, and avenge the death of your noble father,

179. Who was unoffending, but who died like a tree stricken by thunder, having been bitten by this vile serpent.

180. The worst of the serpent race, Takshaka, being intoxicated with power, committed an wicked act when he bit your father.

181. Wicked in his deeds, he even made Kashyapa run away when he was coming for the relief of your god-like father, the protector of the race of royal usages.

182. It is proper for you to burn the wicked wretch in the blazing fire of a Snake-Sacrifice. Therefore, O king, soon do the needful for it.

183. You can thus revenge your father's death. O king, you can thus do me a great favour.

184. O king of the world, my business was obstructed on one occasion by that wretch when I was going (to get a present for my preceptor.)

Souti said :—

185. The King, having heard these words, got angry on Takshaka. Uttanka's speech inflamed him as ghee does the sacrificial fire.

186. Even before the presence of Uttanka, he sorrowfully asked his ministers the particulars of his father's going to heaven (death).

187. When he heard all the circumstances of his father's death, the king of kings was overcome with sorrow and pain.

Thus ends the third chapter, Paushya, in the Adi Parva of the blessed Mahabharata.

CHAPTER IV.

(PAULAMA PARVA).

1. Lomharshana's son Ugrasrava Souti, well-read in the Puranas, being present at the twelve years' sacrifice of Kulapati Saunaka in the forest of Naimisha, stood before the Rishis in attendance.

2. Having read the Puranas with great pains he was very learned in them. Now with joined hands he addressed them thus, "What, Reverend Sirs, do you wish to hear? What am I to relate?"

3. The Rishis replied, "O son of Lomharshana, we shall ask you, and you will relate to us, who are anxious to hear, some excellent stories.

4. But noble Kulapati Saunaka' is now engaged in the room of the holy fire.

5. He knows the divine stories relating to the Devas and Asuras. He also knows the stories relating to men, Nagas and Gandharvas.

6. O Souti, that Kulapati Brahmana is the chief in this sacrifice; he is able, faithful to his vows, wise, and a master of the Sastras and Aranyakas.

7. He is truthful, a lover of peace, a Rishi of hard austerities, and an observer of the ordained penances.

8. He is respected by all of us and we should, therefore, wait for him.

9. When he will sit on the highly honoured seat for the preceptor, you will reply to what that best of the twice-born will ask you."

Souti said :—

10. So be it. When the noble Rishi will be seated, I shall relate sacred stories relating to variety of subjects as I shall be asked by him.

11. The best of Brahmanas (Saunaka), after having performed all his duties,—having adored the divinities with prayers and the Pitris by offering water,—came back to the place of sacrifice where Souti was seated before the assembly of Rishis of rigid vows.

12. When Saunaka was seated in the midst of Ritwikas and Sadasyas who also had come to their places, Souti spoke as follows.

CHAPTER V.

Saunaka said:—

1. Your father read the whole of the Puranas in the days of yore. O Son of Lomharshana, have you also made them your study?

2. There are in the Puranas interesting stories and the history of the first generations of the wise men. We have heard them all recited by your father.

3. I am desirous of hearing the history of the Vrigu race. Tell us that history. We are all attention to listen to you.

Souti said:—

4. That which was formerly studied by the noble Brahmanas, which was studied and narrated by Vaishampayana,

5—6. Which was also studied by my father, has been acquired by me. Hear with all attention, O descendant of the Vrigu race, the history of your race, respected by Indra and all the celestials, all the Rishis and the Marutas. In this great race the great and blessed Rishi Vrigu was born.

7-8. I shall properly relate, O great Rishi, the history of this race, as it is in the Puranas. We are told that great Vrigu was begotten by self-existing Brahma from the fire at Varuna's sacrifice. Vrigu had a beloved son, named Chyavana.

9. Chyavana had a virtuous son, named Pramati. He had a son, named Ruru by Ghritachi.

10. Ruru had a son by his wife Pramadvara. O Saunaka, he was your grandfather; he was very virtuous and greatly learned in the Vedas.

11. He was devoted to asceticism, had great repute, was learned in the Sruti, truthful, virtuous, well-regulated in his meals and was the most eminent amongst the learned in the Vedas.

Saunaka said:—

12. O Son of Suta, why was the illustrious son of Vrigu named Chyavana? I ask you, tell me all about it.

Souti replied:—

13. Vrigu had a very beloved wife,

(named Puloma) who became quick with child by him.

14—15. When the virtuous and chaste Puloma was in that condition, one day the greatly famous and virtuous Vrigu, leaving her at home, went to perform his ablutions. And it was then that a Raksha, named Paulama, came to the Rishi's hermitage.

16. He, having entered into the hermitage, saw the irreproachable wife of Vrigu. Seeing her he was filled with lust and lost his reason.

17. Seeing that a guest had come, beautiful Puloma, entertained him with roots and fruits of the wood.

18. O Rishi, the Raksha, having seen her, burnt in lust. He was very much delighted, and he determined to carry away the irreproachable lady.

19. He said, "My desire is fulfilled." So saying he seized that beautiful lady, and carried her away. And in fact that lady of captivating smiles, was formerly betrothed to the Raksha by her father.

20. But he afterwards gave her away to the Rishi Vrigu in due rites. Since then, O descendant of the Vrigu race, this wound rankled deep in the heart of the Raksha.

21. He thought this was a very good opportunity to carry the lady away. Then he entered into the room of the holy fire where it was brightly burning.

22. The Raksha asked the burning fire, "O Agni! tell me whose rightful wife this lady is.

23. You, O Agni, is the mouth of celestials; tell me, I ask you. This beautiful lady was formerly betrothed to me;

24. But her father subsequently gave her to the vile Vrigu. (Tell me truly) if she can be truly called the wife of Vrigu.

25. As I have found her alone in the hermitage, I am determined to carry her away by force. My heart burns with rage when I think that Vrigu has obtained this beautiful woman who was betrothed to me.

26. Thus did the Raksha ask the flaming fire again and again, whether the lady was Vrigu's wife.

27. "O Agni, you always dwell in every creature as the witness of their piety and impiety. Answer my question truthfully.

28. Bhrigu has appropriated her who was chosen by me as my wife. Tell me truly therefore, whether she is not truly my wife by first choice.

29. Hearing from you whether she is Vrigu's wife or not, I shall carry her away from the hermitage even before your presence. Therefore, answer me truthfully."

Souti said :—

30. Having heard his words, the seven flamed Deity felt himself very much in difficulty. He was afraid to tell an untruth and was equally afraid of Vrigu's curse. He at last slowly said.

Agni said :—

31. "O Raksha, it is true that this Puloma was first betrothed to you, but she was not taken by you with (the necessary) holy rites and invocations.

32. And her father gave this famous Puloma to Vrigu in gift. He did not give her to you.

33. O Raksha, she was duly taken by Vrigu as his wife in my presence with all the Vedic rites.

34. This is she, I cannot tell a falsehood. O best of Rakshas, falsehood is never respected in this world.

CHAPTER VI.

(PAULAMA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. O Brahman, having heard these words of Agni, the Raksha assumed the form of a boar and carried her away as fast as the wind or the mind.

2. The child, of Vrigu, who was in her womb, was very much enraged at this violence, and he dropped down from his mother's womb. For this reason he got the name of Chyavana.

3. On seeing that the child had dropped from her mother's womb as shinning as the sun, he quitted the grasp of the lady. But he fell down and was burnt to ashes.

4. O descendant of Vrigu, the beautiful Puloma, being afflicted with grief, took up her child Chyavana and walked away.

5. The Grandfather of all beings, Brahma himself saw the faultless wife of Vrigu weeping with eyes full of tears.

6. The Grandfather of all beings, noble Brahma consoled his own daughter-in-law (Puloma), and a great river was formed from the tears that fell from her eyes.

7-8. The river followed the foot-steps of the wife of the great Rishi Vrigu; and the Grandfather of the worlds, seeing it follow the path of his son's wife, named it himself. He called it Vadhusara, and it passed by the hermitage of Chyavana.

9. In this way was born Chyavana, the son of Vrigu of great power. And Vrigu saw his son Chyavana and his beautiful mother. He asked his wife Puloma in a rage,

Vrigu said :—

10. Who made you known to the Raksha resolved to carry you away? O lady of captivating smiles, he could not (himself) know you to be my wife.

11. Tell me who it was that told the Raksha of you, so that I may curse him from anger.

Puloma said :—

12. O Lord, I was made known to the Raksha by Agni. He carried me away weeping like the Kurari.

13. I was rescued only by the extraordinary brightness of your son. The Raksha quitted his grasp, and falling to the ground, was turned into ashes.

Souti said :—

14. Having heard this from Puloma Vrigu became exceedingly angry, and out of anger he cursed Agni, saying, "Be an all-devouring (element).

"Thus ends the sixth chapter, "Curse on Agni" in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER VII.

(PAULAMA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. Thus being cursed by Vrigu, Agni said in anger, "What do you mean, O Brahmana, by this rashness that you have shown towards me?"

2. What transgression is committed by me, who tried to do justice and to speak the truth impartially? Being asked, I told the truth.

3. A witness, who being asked about a thing which he knows, says something else than what it (really) is, ruins his ancestors and descendants, both to the seventh generation.

4. He, who, knowing a thing full well, does not disclose what he knows when asked is undoubtedly tainted with sin.

5. I can also curse you, but Brahmanas are held in respect by me, Although,

O Brahmana, these are known to you, I shall yet speak them to you. Please attend.

6. Having multiplied myself by Yoga power, I am present in many forms. (I am present) in the Agnihotra, Yoga, in Karma, and in other sacrifices.

7. The Devas and Pitris appear from the ghee that is poured in my flame, according to the ordinances of the Vedas.

8. The Devas are waters, the Pitris are also waters. The Devas have equal rights with the Pitris to perform the sacrifices, called Darsas and Purnamashas.

9. Therefore the Devas are the Pitris and the Pitris are the Devas. They are identical beings, and they are also separately worshipped at Parvas (changes of the moon).

10. The Devas and the Pitris eat what is poured upon me. I am, therefore, called the mouth of the Devas and the Pitris.

11. At the new-moon the Pitris, and at the full-moon the Devas are fed through my mouth with the ghee that is poured on me. Being their mouths, how can I be the eater of all things?"

Souti said:—

12. After reflecting for some time, Agni withdrew himself from all places in the world. (He withdrew himself) from the Agnihotra of the twice-born, from Yagma, from places of holy rites and from other ceremonies.

13. Being deprived of Oms and Vashats, of Swadhas and Swahas, all creatures became very much distressed for want of fire.

14-15. Thereupon the Rishis went to the celestials in great anxiety, and addressed them thus, "O immaculate beings, the three worlds have been confounded at the cessation of their sacrifices and ceremonies for the loss of fire. Therefore, be pleased to do the needful. There should not be any loss of time." The celestials and the Rishis then went together before the great Brahma.

16. They told him all about the curse on Agni and consequent interruption of all ceremonies. They said, "O Mahabhaga, Agni has been cursed by Vrigu for some reason.

17. How is it possible for Agni, who is the mouth of the celestials, who eats the first part of what is offered in sacrifice, who eats also the sacrificial ghee to become the eater of every thing promiscuously?"

18. The creator of the world having heard all this, called Agni to his presence. He said to Agni, who is eternal like him and who is creator of all, in gentle words.

19. "You are the master of all creatures, you are their distroyer, you preserve the three worlds, you are also the promoter of all sacrifices and ceremonies,

20. Therefore act in a way, so that world's ceremonies are not interrupted. O the eater of sacrificial ghee, you being the Lord of all, how have you become so foolish?"

21. You are always pure in the Universe, you are the stay of all creatures. You shall not be the eater of all thing with all your body.

22. O Diety of flames, only the flames, that are in the vilest part of your body, will eat all things alike, and the part of your body which eats flesh will also eat all things. As all things become pure, touched by the sun-beams,

23. So will every thing be pure that will be burnt in your flames. O Agni, you are the supreme energy, born of your own power.

24. By that power, make the Rishi's curse true. Continue to receive your portion and that of the celestials offered into your mouth."

Souti said:—

25. Agni then replied to the Grandfather, "Be it so" and he went away to obey the command of the Paramesti (Supreme Lord).

26. The Rishis and the celestials also in great delight returned to the place whence they went. And the Rishis continued to perform their ceremonies and sacrifices as before.

27. The celestials in heaven and all creatures on earth were exceedingly rejoiced; and Agni too was rejoiced, because he became free from the curse.

28. Thus in the days of yore, O possessor of the six attributes, was Agni cursed by Vrigu. Such is the ancient history founded thereon, which contains the account of the destruction of Paulama and the birth of Chyavana.

CHAPTER VIII.

(PAULAMA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said:—

1. O Brahmana, Chyavana, the son of Vrigu begat a son on his wife, named Sukanya. And son of Sukanya was the illustrious and the resplendently energetic Pramati.

2. Pramati begot a son called Ruru on Ghritachi. Ruru begot a son called Sunaka on his wife, Pramadvara.

3. I shall tell you at length, O Brahmana, the history of the resplendently energetic Ruru. Listen to it in detail.

4. In the days of yore, there was a Rishi, named Sthulokesha, who was possessed of ascetic powers and learning, and engaged in doing good to all creatures.

5. At this time, O Brahmana Rishi, Menaka became quick with child by the king of the Ghandharvas, named Viswasu.

6. O Descendant of Vrigu, the Apsara Menaka, when the time came, delivered her child near the hermitage of Sthulokesha.

7. And, O Brahmana, the cruel and shameless Apsara Menaka, after dropping the child on the banks of the river, went away.

8—9. The great Rishi saw the girl lying forsaken in a lonely place on the banks of the river, blazing in beauty; she was as beautiful as a child of an immortal. And the great Brahmana, Sthulokesha, the chief of Munis, finding it a female child,

10. Out of compassion, took it home and brought it up. The lovely child grew up in the hermitage of the great Rishi.

11. The great Rishi, the blessed Sthulokesha, performed for her in succession all the ceremonies with that of her birth, as ordained in the Sastras.

12. As she surpassed all others in beauty, in goodness and in every good quality, the great Rishi gave her the name of Pramadvara.

13. Ruru saw her in the hermitage and the pious man fell in love with her.

14. He made his father Pramati, the son of Vrigu, acquainted with his love through his companions. Thereupon Pramati asked the illustrious Sthulokesha to give Pramadvara to his son.

15. The Rishi betrothed Pramadvara to Ruru, fixing the day of marriage when the star Varga Daivata would be in ascendant.

16. A few days before the date fixed for the nuptials, while the lovely girl was playing with her companions,

17. Her time having come and impelled by Fate, she trod upon a snake. She did not perceive it, as it lay coiled.

18. The snake, to fulfil the will of Fate, stung the heedless girl with its venomous fangs.

19. Stung by the snake, she suddenly fell senseless on the ground with her color faded and all her beauties gone,

20. Her hair dishevelled, a spectacle of woe to her friends and companions. She, who was so handsome when alive, became in death what was too painful to look at.

21. The slender-waisted girl, as she lay on the ground as one asleep, looked more beautiful than she was when alive.

22. Her father and other ascetics, who were present, saw her lying motionless on the ground with the beauty of a lily.

23. Then there came all the noted Brahmanas, filled with compassion. Swastya-treya, Mahajana, Kushika, Sankhyamekhala,

24. Uddalaka, Katha, and the renowned Sweta, Bharadwaja, Kaunakutsya, Arshitsena, Goutama,

25. Pramati and Pramati's son Ruru, and other inhabitants of the forest were filled with compassion and they all wept when they saw the maiden lying on the ground overcome by the poison of the snake. And Ruru, being exceedingly pained, left the scene.

Thus ends the eighth chapter, Paulama, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER IX.

(PAULAMA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti replied :—

1. While the noble Brahmanas were sitting round the dead body, Ruru, much agrieved, retired into a deep forest and swept aloud.

2. Overwhelmed with grief, he indulged in much piteous lamentations. Remembering his beloved Pramadvara, he thus lamented in grief,

3. "Alas! The slender-bodied beauty who increases my grief, is now lying on the bare ground. What can be more painful than this to all her friends!

4. If ever have I bestowed charity, if ever have I observed penances, if ever have I showed respect to my superiors, let the merits of these acts restore to life my beloved one.

5. If ever have I controlled my passions from my birth, if ever have I stuck to my vows, let the beautiful Pramadvara rise from the ground."

6. While he was thus lamenting in sorrow for the loss of his bride, a heaven's messenger came to him in the forest and addressed him thus;—

The Devaduta said :—

7. O Ruru, the words that you are uttering in grief can have no effect ; for, O noble-minded (Rishi), one belonging to this world, whose days are run out, cannot come back to life again.

8. This poor child of the Gandharva and the Apsara has her days run out ; therefore, O child, do not give yourself up to grief.

9. The great dieties, however, have provided beforehand a means. If you comply with it, you may get back your Pramadvāra.

Ruru said :—

10. O messenger of heaven, (tell me) what means have been provided beforehand by the dieties. Tell me in full, so that I may comply with it. You should save me.

The Devaduta said :—

11. O Descendant of Vriḡu, give up half of your own life to your bride and, O Ruru, your Pramadvāra will then rise from the ground.

Ruru said :—

12. O best of heaven's messengers, I give up half of my life to my bride. Let my beloved one rise in the dress and the form of love.

Souti said :—

13. The king of the Gandharvas and the greatly qualified messenger of heaven, both went to the Diety Dharma and addressed him thus :—

14. "O king Dharma, if it pleases you, let the beautiful bride of Ruru, Pramadvāra, rise up endued with a moiety of Ruru's life."

The Dharmaraja said :—

15. "O messenger of heaven, if it be your wish, let the bride of Ruru, Pramadvāra, rise up endued with a moiety of Ruru's life.

Souti said :—

16. When Dharma thus spoke, the beautiful Pramadvāra, the betrothed bride of Ruru, rose up as from a slumber.

17. It was seen afterwards that the bestowal of a moiety of his own life to resuscitate his bride by Ruru of long life, led to a curtailment of his own life.

18. Thereupon their fathers gladly married them with due rites, and the couple passed their days devoted to each other.

19. Thus having obtained a wife, difficult to be obtained, who was beautiful and bright as the filaments of the lotus, the Rishi of hard austerities (Ruru) made a vow to destroy the serpent race.

20. Whenever he saw a snake, he was filled with great anger, and he always killed it with a weapon.

21. One day, O Brahmana, Ruru entered into a very large forest. He saw an old Dunduva snake lying on the ground.

22. Thereupon with the intention of killing it, Ruru raised his staff in anger,—a staff like the staff of Death. The Dunduva then said to the angry Brahmana,

23. "O Rishi, I have done you no harm. Why should you kill me in anger?"

Thus ends the ninth chapter, Paulama, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER X.

(PAULAMA PARVA.)—Continued.

Ruru said :—

1. My wife, who was as dear to me as my life, was stung by a snake ; on which I took, O snake, a fearful vow ;

2. Namely that I would kill every snake that I might meet with. Therefore I shall strike you and you shall be deprived of your life.

The Dunduva said :—

3. O Brahmana, there are other snakes which bite man. The Dunduvās are only snakes in name. Therefore, you should not kill the Dunduvās.

4. Subject to the same calamity, but not sharing the same good fortune, being same in woe, but different in joy, you should not kill the Dunduvās, for you cannot judge between right and wrong.

Souti said :—

5. Hearing those words of the snake, and seeing that the snake was really of the Dunduva kind, and that it was terribly frightened, Ruru did not kill it.

6. Then Ruru, the possessor of six attributes, cheering up the snake, said to it, "Who are you, tell me, O snake, that have been thus metamorphosed?"

The Dunduva said :—

7. O Ruru, I was formerly a Rishi, named Shahasrapata. It is by the curse of a Brahmana that I have become a snake.

Ruru said:—

8. O best of snakes, why were you cursed by an angry Brahmana? And how long will your this body continue?

Thus ends the tenth chapter, Paulama, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XI.

(PAULAMA PARVA.)—Continued.

The Dunduva said:—

1. In time gone by, I had a friend, a Brahmana, by name Khagama. He was truthful, and possessed spiritual powers by penances.

2. When he was engaged in Agnihotra, out of boyish frivolity, I made a snake of the blades of grass and tried to frighten him. He fainted away (when he saw this mock snake).

3. Recovering his senses, that truthful and penance-performing Rishi exclaimed in anger,

4. "As you made a powerless mock snake to frighten me, you will yourself turn into a venomless serpent by my curse."

5. O Rishi, I was well aware of the power of penances that he possessed. Therefore, with an agitated heart, I addressed him thus,

6. Bending low and joining both hands, "As I am your friend, I have done this only as a joke to make you laugh.

7—8. You should, O Brahmana, pardon me and revoke your curse." Seeing me very much distressed, the ascetic was moved; and breathing hot and hard, he said, "What I have said must happen.

9. O ascetic, listen to what I say; and hearing it, O pious man, always lay it to your heart.

10. When Ruru the holy, the son of Pramati will appear, you will be immediately relieved of the curse on seeing him."

11. You are the very Ruru, the son of Pramati. Now regaining my natural form, I shall speak something for your benefit.

Souti said:—

12. That illustrious man and the best of Brahmanas then left his snake-body and attained his own form and original brightness.

13. He then addressed Ruru of incomparable power; saying, "O, best of beings, the highest morality is 'Not to destroy Life.'

14. Therefore, a Brahmana should never take the life of any creature. The injunction of the Sruti is that a Brahmana should always be mild.

15. Learned in the Vedas and the Vedangas and an inspirer of confidence in all creatures, kind to all, truthful, and forgiving;

16. And a great retainer of the Vedas in memory,—these are the natural duties of a Brahmana. The natural duties of Kashtrya are not those of yours.

17. To be stern, to hold scepters, to rule the subjects, are the natural duties of the Kshatrya. Listen to me, O Ruru.

18. In days of yore, the snakes were destroyed in the sacrifice of Janamejaya, but the terrified snakes were saved by a Brahmana.

19. It was by Astika learned in the Vedas and the Vedangas and mighty in spiritual power."

Thus ends the eleventh chapter, Paulama, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XII.

(PAULAMA PARVA.)—Continued.

Ruru said:—

1. O best of the twice-born, why did king Janamejaya become the destroyer of the snakes, and how did he destroy them?

2. Why were they saved by wise Astika, the best of Brahmanas? I am desirous of hearing all this.

Rishi said:—

3. O Ruru, you will hear the important history of Astika from the Brahmanas. Saying this he disappeared.

Souti said:—

4. Ruru rushed in search of the Rishi, but he did not find him in all the forest. Finding him not, he sat down on the ground, much fatigued.

5. He felt himself confounded and seemed to lose his senses. He repeatedly pondered over the Rishi's words.

6. Regaining his senses, he came home and asked his father (to relate the history), and his father related to him the story.

Thus ends the twelfth chapter, Paulama in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XIII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)

Saunaka said :—

1. Why did that best of kings, king Janamejaya, resolve to destroy the snakes in a Snake-sacrifice ?

2. O Souti, tell us in full the true story. Why did the best of the twice-born Astika, the foremost of ascetics, rescue the snakes from the blazing fire ?

3. Whose son was the monarch who performed the Snake-sacrifice ? Whose son was that best of the twice-born, (who saved the snakes) ? Tell us this.

Souti said :—

4. O best of speakers, the story of Astika is very long, I shall relate it in full. O Listen.

Saunaka said :—

5. I am desirous of hearing in detail the interesting history of Astika, the illustrious Brahmana.

Souti said :—

6. The Brahmanas call this history, recited by Krishna Dwaipayana, a Purana. To the dwellers of Naimisharanya,

7. Was it formerly narrated by my learned father Lomharshana, the disciple of Vyasa, as requested by the Brahmanas.

8. I was present at the time, O Saunaka. As you ask me, I shall recite it exactly as I heard it.

9. (Listen) to this all sin-destroying history. Astika's father was as powerful as the Prajapati.

10. He was a Brahmachari, always engaged in austere penances, regular in meals, a great Rishi of controlled sexual desire. He was known by the name of Jaratkaru.

11. He was the foremost of Yayavaras, a man of rigid vows, highly religious and endowed with great ascetic powers. Once at a time this great ascetic,

12. Being Yatra Shayan Grila (living in the place where night overtook him), roamed all over the world, bathed in many sacred waters and visited many holy shrines.

13. He practised difficult austere penances; and feeding on air, remaining in fast, and renouncing sleep forever, he roamed (over the world.)

14. As bright as a blazing fire, he roamed about, and thus roving about, he one day saw his ancestors,

15. Hanging their heads down in a great hole, their feet pointing upwards. On seeing them, Jaratkaru addressed his ancestors thus,

16. "Who are you thus hanging in the hole, your heads downward, by a rope of the Birana fibre which has been eaten by the rats that live secretly near this hole ?"

The Ancestors said :—

17. We are Rishis of austere penances, called Yayavara. We are sinking down into the earth for the want of an offspring.

18. We have a son, named Jaratkaru. Unfortunate we are, that wretch has adopted asceticism.

19. And therefore that fool does not think of marriage to raise up offspring. It is for this reason, namely the want of offspring, that we are thus suspended in the hole.

20. Having means, we are like sinners who have no means. O excellent man, who are you that are sorrowing for us like a friend ?

21. O Brahmana, we wish to know who you are that stand near us, and why, O excellent man, are you sorrowing for us ?

Jaratkaru said :—

22. You are my sires and grand-sires, I am that very Jaratkaru. Tell me what I shall do.

The Ancestors said :—

23. Try your best to do that by which you can raise up an offspring to extend our line. You will then do an act meritorious both for you and for us.

24. O Son, not by the fruits of virtue, not by the hoarded-up ascetic penances, does one acquire such merit as is acquired by one who is a father.

25. Therefore, O son, set your mind upon marriage and offspring at our command. It will do us the highest good.

Jaratkaru said :—

26. I shall not marry, nor shall I earn money for my own self. But I shall marry to do you good.

27-28. If a bride can be had whose name will be the same as mine, whose friends will give her to me willingly and as a gift,—O fathers, under these conditions, if I get a girl, your command will be obeyed. I shall duly marry her according to the ordinances of the Sastras.

29. But who will give his daughter to a poor man like me to be my wife ? I shall, however, accept the girl who will be given to me as a gift.

30. O Sires, I shall try to marry such a girl. Having said so, I shall not act otherwise.

31. O fathers, I shall beget offspring on her for your release, so that you may attain to the heaven, called Saswata, and rejoice there at will.

Thus ends the thirteenth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XIV.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. The Brahmana of hard austerities (Jaratkaru) roamed over the world for a wife, but wife he did not get.

2. One day he went into the forest, and remembering the words of his ancestors, he thrice begged for a bride in a faint voice.

3. Thereupon, Vasuki appeared and offered his sister for the Rishi's acceptance. But the Rishi hesitated to accept her, thinking her to be not of the same name with himself.

4. The high-souled Jaratkaru thought within himself, "I will take none for my wife who does not bear my name."

5. Then Jaratkaru, the great ascetic of rigid austerities, said, "O snake, tell me truly what is the name of your sister?"

Vasuki said :—

6. O Jaratkaru, my sister's name is also Jaratkaru. Given as a gift by me, accept this girl of slender waist for your wife. O best of the twice born, I had kept her in reserve for you. Therefore, take her.

7. Saying this he offered his beautiful sister to Jaratkaru, who then married her according to the ordained rites.

CHAPTER XV.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. O Foremost of Brahma-knowing men, the mother of the snakes, in the days of yore, cursed the Naga race, saying, "He whose charioteer is wind (Agni) will consume you at Janamejaya's sacrifice."

2. To neutralise the effect of that curse, the best of snakes (Vasuki) married his sister to the high-souled Rishi of rigid vow.

3. Accepting her according to the ordained rites, he begot on her a high-souled son, called Astika,

4. Who was a great ascetic, who was vastly learned in the Vedas and the Vedangas, who removed the fears of his parents, and who saw everything with an equal eye.

5. Then after a long time, a descendant of the Pandavas, celebrated a great sacrifice, known as the Snake-sacrifice.

6. When the sacrifice for the destruction of the snakes had begun, the great ascetic Astika rescued the Nagas,

7. His brothers, his maternal uncles, and other snakes. He also delivered his fathers by begetting a child.

8. O Brahmana, he freed himself from their debts by rigid austerities, by various vows and the study of the Vedas. He propitiated the celestials by sacrifices in which various presents were made.

9. He pleased the Rishis by his Brahmacharya and his ancestors by begetting offspring. Thus discharging the heavy debt that he owed to his ancestors,

10. Jaratkaru, of great austerity, attained heaven with his forefathers. Begetting the son, Astika, and acquiring great religious merit, the best of the Munis,

11. The greatly noble Jaratkaru, after a long course of years, went to heaven. This is the story of Astika. I have briefly narrated it (to you). Now, tell me, O best of the Vrigu race, what else I shall narrate.

CHAPTER XVI.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. O Souti, once more relate to us in detail the history of the learned and virtuous Astika. Great is our curiosity to hear it.

2. O gentle one, you speak very sweetly with proper accent and emphasis. We are very much pleased with your speech. You speak like your (late) father.

3. Your father was always ready to please us. Tell us, therefore, the story that your father had related.

Souti said :—

4. O long-lived ones, I shall narrate the story of Astika as I heard it from my father.

5. O Brahmana, in the golden age, Prajapati had two fair daughters. O sinless one, the two sisters were endued with great beauty.

6. They were named Kadru and Vinata, and they were the wives of Kashyapa. Their husband, who was like Prajapati, having been pleased with him, gave each a boon.

7. Kashyapa derived much happiness from his wives. Hearing that their husband Kashyapa was willing to bestow on them boons,

8. The most beautiful damsels felt a transport of joy. Kadru wished to have one thousand snakes as her sons, all of equal splendour.

9. Vinata asked for two sons, equal to all the sons of Kadru in strength, energy, size and prowess.

10. On Kadru did her husband bestow the boon of the multitude of sons; and to Vinata he said, "Be it so."

11. Vinata, having got the boon, was much pleased, and having obtained two greatly powerful sons, he regarded her boon granted.

12. Kadru also obtained one thousand sons, all of equal splendour. "Bear the embryos carefully." So saying the great ascetic Kashyapa went into the forest, leaving his two wives much gratified with his boons.

Souti said :—

13. O best of Brahmanas, after a long time Kadru gave birth to one thousand eggs and Vinata two eggs.

14. Their maid-servants kept them separately in warm vessels, and thus five hundred years passed away.

15. After five hundred years, the sons of Kadru came out of the eggs, but Vinata's eggs did not produce anything.

16. Thereupon the ascetic lady Vinata, feeling shame, broke open one of the eggs, and saw her offspring,

17. As an embryo with the upper part developed, but the lower part undeveloped. Thereupon the child grew angry and cursed its mother, saying,

18. "O mother, as you have prematurely broken this egg, and did not allow my body to be fully developed, being jealous (of Kadru), you will have to serve as the slave (of that very Kadru).

19—20. O mother, if you wait with patience five thousand years and do not destroy the other egg, the illustrious child within it will deliver you from your slavery.

21. O mother, If you are desirous of having your son strong, take tender care of the egg for five thousand years.

22—23. Thus cursing his mother Vinata; the child rose to the sky. O Brahmana, Aruna (this child) became the charioteer of the Sun, and he is to be seen in the hour of the morning. At the stipulated time was also born the snake-eater Garuda.

24. As soon as he was born, he left his mother, and the king of the birds, being hungry, mounted on his wings to seek for the food assigned to him by the great Ordainer.

Thus ends the sixteenth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XVII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. O ascetic Rishi, about this time the two sisters one day saw Uchaisrava approaching towards them.

2. (It was horse) who was worshipped by the celestials, who was the gem among all horses, who rose at the churning of the ocean for the Ambrosia,

3. Who was divine, graceful, ever-young, irresistible, vigorous, who was creator's masterpiece, and who was blessed with all the auspicious marks.

4. Why and where did the celestials churn the ocean for the Ambrosia, in which did rise, as you say, this best of steeds, so powerful and resplendent? Tell me this.

Souti said :—

5. There is a very great mountain, called Meru of blazing and effulgent appearance. The rays of the sun are scattered away when they fall on its golden summit.

6. Decked with gold, and exceedingly beautiful, this mountain is frequented by the Devas and Gandharvas; it is immeasurable and unapproachable by men of many sins.

7. It is illuminated with many medicinal plants; and fearful beasts of prey roam on its heights.

8. It is unapproachable even by mind; it is graced with many trees and streamlets, and resounds with the sweet melody of innumerable birds.

9. It stands high for infinite ages. Once did the celestials sit on its golden summit and held a conclave.

10. They, who had practised penances and observed vows, came in quest of the Ambrosia. They consulted together about the possession of the Ambrosia and seeing them in this mood Narayana addressed Brahma saying ;

12—13. "Churn the ocean with both the Devas and the Asuras. By doing so, the Ambrosia and all durgs and gems will be obtained. O celestials, churn the ocean you will then get the Ambrosia.

Thus ends the seventeenth chapter, Amritamanthana, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XVIII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. There is a mountain called Mandara with peaks like the clouds. It is the best of mountains and adorned with innumerable creepers.

2. On it do many birds pour forth their melody and many beasts of prey roam about ; it is frequented by the Kinnaras, Apsaras and celestials.

3. It rises eleven thousand Yojanas upwards and descends eleven thousand Yojanas downwards.

4. The celestials, having failed to uproot it, came to Vishnu and Brahma who were sitting together, and said to them.

5. "Devise some means you yourselves. Do try to uproot Mandara for our good."

6. O son of Vrihu, "Let it be so" said both Narayana and Brahma. The lotus-eyed (Vishnu) laid the hard task on the king of the snakes, (Ananta.)

7—8. Being directed by both Brahma and Narayana to do it, the mighty Ananta uprooted the mountain with all the woods and the denizens of woods that were on it.

9. Then came all the celestials with Ananta to the shores of the ocean. Addressing it they said,— "O Ocean, we have come to churn you for the Ambrosia.

10. The ocean replied, "Be it so, as I shall get a share of it. I am quite able to bear the great agitation arising out of the churning of my water by Mandara.

11. The Devas and the Danavas then went to the Tortoise king and said, "You will have to hold the mountain on your back."

12. The Tortoise king having agreed, Indra placed that mountain on its back by means of instruments.

13—14. The Devas and the Danavas having made Mandara the churning staff and Vasuki the rope, O Brahmana, in days of yore, began to churn the ocean for the Ambrosia. The Asuras held him by the head and the Devas by the tail.

15. And Ananta, who was a manifested form of Narayana, again and again raised and lowered the hood of the Naga.

16. On account of the great agitation received at the hands of the celestials, black vapours with flames issued from the mouth of the Naga Vasuki.

17. From these vapours were created clouds with lightning ; and they poured showers on the tired celestials who were thus refreshed.

18. The flowers that fell from the trees on the mountain-sides on the Devas and the Danavas also refreshed them.

19. There rose from Mandara, dragged by the Devas and the Danavas, a terrible roar like the roar of the clouds (at the Universal dissolution.)

20. Various aquatic animals were crushed by the great mountain and gave up their lives in the salt sea.

21. Many denizens of the lower region and those of the land of Varuna were killed by the mountain.

22. From the whirling Mandara large trees, being struck at one another, were torn from their roots and fell into the ocean with all the birds (that roosted on their branches.)

23. And great fires were produced from the mutual friction of the trees that frequently blazed up, and the Mandara mountain looked like black clouds charged with lightning.

24. It burnt the lions, elephants, and other various creatures that were on the mountain and killed them (on the spot.)

25. Then the best of the celestials, Indra began to extinguish the blazing fire by pouring heavy showers.

26. Then the gums of various great trees and herbs mingled with the waters of the ocean.

27. The celestials became immortal by drinking the water mixed with the liquid extract of gold and those gums which had the quality of the Ambrosia.

28. The milky water of the churned ocean by degrees produced clarified butter by virtue of those gums and juices.

29. Thereupon the Devas came to the boon-granting God who was comfortably seated on his seat and said, "O Brahman, we are spent out but the Ambrosia has not yet arisen."

30. Except Narayana, both the Devas and the Danavas have no strength to churn the ocean (any longer).

31. Then did Brahma say to Narayana, "Kindly give the celestials strength to churn the Ocean again with Mandara mountain."

Narayana said:—

32. I grant you all necessary strength. Go, insert the mountain and churn the Ocean.

33. Thus hearing the words of Narayana, and being re-equipped with fresh strength the celestials recommenced churning.

34. Then from the ocean rose the mild and brilliant Moon of thousand rays.

35. Then rose from Ghee, the lotus-seated Lakshmi; then Sura Devi (Wine) then the great Steed.

36. Then from the Ghee rose the celestial gem Kaustava which adorns the breast of Narayana.

37. Then rose, O Brahmana, Parijat tree and Suravi, all giver of every thing.

38. Lakshmi, Wine, Moon, Horse (Uchaisrava), fleet as the mind, all directed by Aditya went to the place where the celestials were.

39. Then rose the divine Dhanyantari with a white vessel in his hand, and (there in that vessel) was the Ambrosia.

40. Seeing this wonderful phenomenon, the Danavas raised a great uproar for the Ambrosia, saying "It is ours."

41. Then rose the great elephant Airavata, with two white tusks and a huge body, and he was seized by the wielder of thunder (Indra).

42. The churning was still continued; and then appeared deadly poison, which soon covered the whole earth and blazed up like a fire with fumes.

43. The three worlds were stupified by its terrible smell; and then Shiva, asked by Brahma, swallowed it to save the creation.

44. The great Deity Maheshwara of Mantra-form held it in his throat, and it is said that from the very day he was called Nilkantha (blue-throat.)

45. Seeing all those wonderful phenomena; the Danavas were filled with despair. They raised up great hostilities with the celestials for the possession of Lakshmi and Ambrosia.

46. Thereupon Narayana assumed a form of a ravishing beauty by the aid of Maya, and he began a flirtation with the Danavas in the form of a female.

47. The foolish Danavas and Daityas becoming fully enamoured of her, placed the Ambrosia in her hands.

CHAPTER XIX.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said:—

1. Then the Daityas and Danavas, in best armours and with various weapons, pursued the celestials.

2. In the meantime the greatly powerful Lord Vishnu, accompanied with Narayana, took away the Ambrosia from the mighty Danavas.

3. Thereupon all the celestials, in that great struggle, drank the Ambrosia receiving it from Vishnu.

4. When the celestials were drinking the much longed-for Ambrosia, a Danava, named Rahu, drank it in the guise of a celestial.

5. When the Ambrosia has only reached his throat, Chandra and Surja (recognised him and) informed the celestials of what had happened.

6. Narayana immediately with his discus cut off the well-adorned head of the Danava who was drinking the Ambrosia.

7. The huge head of the Danava, cut off by the discus, rose up to the sky like a mountain peak, and it uttered terrible cries.

8. The headless body of the Danava fell on the earth, shaking it with all her mountains, forests, and islands.

9. From that day a great enmity was created between the head of Rahu and Chandra and Surja. To this day it swallows Chandra and Surja (causing eclipses.)

10. Then Hari, quitting his matchless female form, made the Danavas tremble by hurling at them various weapons.

11. Thus began the terrible battle between the Devas and Danavas on the shores of the salt sea.

12. Thousands of sharp javilins and lances and various other weapons were hurled on all sides.

13. Cut by the discus and wounded by swords, darts and maces, the Asuras vomited blood and lay prostrate on earth.

14. The heads, adorned with bright gold, cut off by the discus, fell continually in the fearful battle.

15. The great Asuras, covered with blood, lay dead everywhere, and they looked like red dyed mountain peaks.

16. When the sun grew red, the piteous cries of distress issued from everywhere and from the dying Asuras.

17. The roars, of the warriors that cut one another down by missiles when at a distance, and by blows of their fists when at close quarters, rose to the sky.

18. "Cut down," "pierce them", "pursue", "advance" these fearful war-cries were heard everywhere.

19. When this fearful battle was raging, Nara and Narayana entered the field.

20. Seeing the celestial bow in the hand of Nara, Narayana thought of his Danava-destroying discus.

21. As soon as it was thought of the discus Sudarshana, the destroyer of enemies, effulgent as Agni, and dreadful in battle, came down from the sky.

22. When it came, Achyuta, of fearful energy (Narayana) as bright as the blazing fire, with arms like the trunk of an elephant, hurled with great force that weapon, as bright as the blazing fire, dreadful, of extraordinary lustre, capable of destroying hostile towns.

23. That discus, blazing like the fire at the great dissolution of the universe, being hurled by the hand of Narayana, continually falling everywhere, destroyed the Daityas and the Danavas by thousands.

24. Sometimes it blazed like fire and consumed them all; sometimes it struck them down like a goblin; sometimes it drank the blood of the slain Danavas as it travelled through earth and sky.

25. The greatly powerful and bold Danavas, looking like the rainless clouds, rose to the sky and continually hurled down thousands of mountains, on the celestials, thus harrassing them (with terrible vengeance).

26. And those fearful mountains, with their forests and flat tops, like masses of clouds, fell from the sky, collided with one another and produced a tremendous roar.

27. And when thousands of warriors continually shouted on the field of battle, and mountains, with forests thereon, fell all around, the earth with her forests began to tremble.

28. Then the divine Nara, appearing in the fearful battle of the Asuras and Ganas, and reducing to dust those mountains by means of his gold-headed arrows, covered the heavens with

29. Then the mighty Danavas, having been overpowered by the celestials and having seen the fearful discus roving over the fields of heaven like a blazing fire, entered into the bowels of the earth; and some of them plunged into the salt-sea.

30. The celestials, having gained the victory, placed with due respect Mandara on its own base; and the clouds, making the heaven resound with their shouts, went to their own abodes.

31. The celestials returning to heaven, were greatly rejoiced and kept the Ambrosia in great care.

32. Indra and other celestials made over the vessel containing Ambrosia to Nara to keep it with all care.

This ends the nineteenth chapter, Anvitamanthan, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XX.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said:—

1. Thus have I narrated to you how the Ambrosia was churned out of the Ocean, in which the beautiful and powerful horse (Uchaisrava) was produced.

2. Respecting this horse Kadru asked Vinata, saying, "Tell me, sister, without delay, what is the color of Uchaisrava?"

Vinata said:—

3. This king of the horses is of white colour. What color do you think, sister? Say what is its color; let us lay a wager on it.

Kadru said:—

4. O sweet lady of smiles, I think the horse is black in its tail. Let us lay this wager that she, whose words will be untrue, will become the slave of the other.

Souti said:—

5. Thus wagering that one will be the slave of the other, they went home, saying "We shall see the horse to-morrow."

6. Wishing to play a deception, Kadru ordered her thousand sons to be black hair;

7. And speedily cover the horse's tail, so that she might not become a slave. But on their refusal to do her bidding, she cursed the snakes, saying,

8. "In the Snake-sacrifice of the royal sage, wise Janamejaya of the Pandava race, Agni will consume you all."

9. The Grand sire (Brahma) himself heard this exceedingly cruel curse, denounced by Kadru, impelled by Fate.

10. And he (Brahma), out of kindness for creatures, and seeing that the snakes had enormously multiplied, approved of this curse with all the dieties.

11—12. "Considering their virulent poison, excessive strength, great prowess, biting propensity, their mother's curse had been very proper for the good of all creatures."

13. "Fate always inflicts death on those who seek the death of others." Talking thus, the celestials much praised Kadru.

14—15. Then calling Kashyapa, the Diety said. "O sinless one, O powerful one, the snakes of virulent poison, of huge bodies, and of biting propensity whom you have begotten have been cursed by their mother. O child, you should not be least sorry for it.

16. The destruction of the snakes in the sacrifice (of Janamejaya) has been told in the Purana." Saying this, the Divine creator of the Universe propitiated Kashyapa and bestowed on that great man the knowledge of neutralising poison.

CHAPTER XXI.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. O Rishi, when the night was gone and the sun rose in the morning, the sisters, Kadru, and Vinata,

2. Having laid an wager of slavery, and burning in jealousy, started to see the horse Uchaisrava.

3. On their way they saw the great ocean, vast and deep, agitated by wind, making a tremendous roar.

4. It was full of whales, fishes large enough to swallow whales, Makaras, tortoises, and creatures of various forms by thousands.

5. It was inaccessible by any creatures on account of the presence of terrible, monster-shaped, dark and fierce aquatic animals. It was full of crocodiles and tortoises.

6. It abounded with all kinds of gems ; it was the home of Varuna, the beautiful and excellent abode of the Nagas ; it was the lord of all rivers.

7. It was the abode of subterranean fire, the friend of the Asuras, the terror of all creatures, the great reservoir of waters, having no deterioration,

8. It was holy, it was beneficial to the celestials, it was the great mine of Ambrosia, it was infinite, inconcievable, sacred and highly wonderful,

9. It was fearful with the terrible roars of aquatic creatures, tremendously roaring, and full of deep whirlpools. It was an object of terror to all creatures.

10. Moved by winds, heaving high with agitation and disturbance, it seemed to dance everywhere with uplifted hands represented by its waves.

11. It was full of heaving billows, caused by the changes of the moon, it was the parent of (the great conch of Krishna) Panchajanya, it was the great mine of gems.

12. It was in days of yore disturbed by the greatly powerful Lord Govinda (Vishnu) when he assumed the form, of a boar for raising the earth.

13. The Rishi Atri of great austerity could not fathom its bottom, lower than the nether regions, though he tried to do it for one thousand years.

14. It became the bed of lotus-navelled Vishnu when at the end of every Yuga the immeasurably powerful Deity fell asleep in spiritual meditation.

15. It was the asylum which (the hill) Mainaka took under the fear of the falling thunder. It was the retreat of the Asuras, overcome (by the celestials) in the fearful battle.

16. It was the ghee, in the shape of its waters, in the (sacrificial) fire that issued forth from the mouth of Varava. It was without limits, fathomless, vast, immeasurable and the lord of rivers.

17. They saw that thousands of great rivers were rushing into it in great pride like rivals of its love. They saw that it was full, always dancing in its waves.

18. They saw that it was deep and resounded with the terrible uproar of Makaras, Timees, and other aquatic creatures ; they saw it was vast, unlimited as space, unfathomable, infinite and the great reservoir of waters.

Thus ends the twenty-first chapter, Sauparna, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XXII.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. The Nagas, after a consultation, came to the conclusion that they should obey their mother's command, for if her wish was not gratified, she, abandoning her love towards them, would burn them all.

2. If she was gratified, she might free them from curse. They said :—“ We shall undoubtedly make the horse's hair black.”

3. It is said that they then went and became hairs on the tail of the horse (Uchaisrava). In the mean time the two co-wives laid the wager.

4. And having laid the wager, O best of Brahmanas, the two sisters proceeded in great delight to the other side of the great ocean.

5. Kadru and Vinata, the daughters of Daksha, saw on their way the ocean, incapable of being easily disturbed,

6. (But) greatly agitated all on a sudden by the wind. (It was) terribly roaring, full of Timingils and Makaras,

7. And thousand other creatures of various forms ; it was frightful for the presence of horrible monsters, ; it was inaccessible, fearful and terrible,

8. The mine of all gems, the home of Varuna, the beautiful habitation of the Nagas, the Lord of rivers,

9. The abode of subterranean fire, the home of the Asuras and many fearful creatures, the reservoir of waters.

10. It was holy, the great receptacle of the Ambrosia of the celestials, immeasurable and inconceivable, full of holy waters.

11. Filled with many thousands of rivers, and thus disturbed, dacing in its waves.

12. Such was the ocean full of liquid waves, (it was) vast as the sky, deep, lighted with the flames of subterranean fire, roaring ;—they (the sisters) passed quickly over it.

Thus ends the twenty-second chapter, Sauparna in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XXIII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. Kadru, of swift speed, accompanied by Vinata, having crossed the ocean, very soon came to the horse.

2. They then saw that swift and the best of horses, as white as the rays of the moon but with black hairs (in the tail.)

3. Seeing many black hairs in the tail, Kadru put much dejected Vinata into slavery.

4. Thus having lost wager, Vinata became a slave exceedingly sorry.

5. Meanwhile, when the time came, Garuda of great splendour came out bursting the egg without the help of his mother.

6. He enkindled all the points of the universe, he was the bird endowed with strength, capable of assuming any form at will, of going every where at will, and calling any amount of energy to action at will.

7. He looked terrible like a heap of blazing fire,—of lustre equal to that of the fire at the end of Yuga. His eyes were bright like the flush of lightning.

8. As soon as born, the huge bird, increasing his body, rose to the sky, fearfully roaring like a second ocean-fire.

9. All the celestials seeing him, sought the protection of Vibhavasru (Agni). They bowed down to that Deity of Universal form who was seated on his seat and addressed him thus :—

10. “ O Agni, do not extend your body. Have you resolved to consume us ? Lo, the huge heap of your flames is spreading wide !”

Agni said :—

11. O persecutors of the Asuras, it is not as you think. It is mighty Garuda, equal to me in splendour.

12. He is born endued with great energy to promote the joy of Vinata. Seeing this heap of effulgence, your this delusion has come (in you.)

13. He is the mighty son of Kashyapa, he is the destroyer of the Nagas, the enemy of the Daityas and Rakshashas, he is ever engaged to do good to the celestials.

14. Do not be afraid in the least. Come with me and see him.

Souti said :—

15. Thus asked, the celestials went with the Rishis towards Garuda and from a distance addressed him thus.

The Celestials said :—

16. O Lord of birds, you are a Rishi, you are the partaker of the largest portion of the sacrifice, you are Deity. You are Lord, you are the sun of hot rays, you are Parameshthi, you are Prajapati,

17. You are Indra, you are steed-necked Vishnu, you are the Lord of the universe, you are the principal, you are Brahma and Brahmanas, you are Agni, you are wind,

18. You are Dhata, and Bidhata, you are Vishnu the best of celestials, you are the great Truth, you are fearless, you are ever unchanged, you are great glory,

Kashyapa said :—

8. My son, are you doing well ? Do you get sufficient food every day. Is there plenty of food for you in the world of men ?

Garuda said :—

9. My mother is well ; and so is my brother and so am I. But, father, I do not get sufficient food, and therefore my happiness is not complete.

10. I have been sent by the snakes to get the Ambrosia, which is not easy to get. (However) I shall bring it to-day in order to emancipate my mother from her slavery.

11. My mother commanded me to eat the Nishadas. I have eaten them by thousands, but my hunger is not appeased.

12. O great one, point out to me some other food, by eating which, O Lord, I can bring the Ambrosia by force. You should point out some food which can appease my hunger and thirst.

Kashyapa said :—

13. This lake you see before you is very sacred. It is even known in the celestial regions. There is an elephant with its face downwards continually dragging a tortoise which is his elder brother.

14. I shall speak to you in detail their hostility in the former life. Hear from me the true story, the proof of which is their presence here.

15. There was in the olden time a great Rishi, named Vivavasu, who was of exceedingly angry disposition. He had a younger brother, named Supratika, a great ascetic.

16. That great Rishi was not willing to keep his wealth joint with his brother. Supratika always spoke of a partition.

17. Some time after Vivavasu told his brother Supratika, " It is from foolishness, blinded by wealth, that many wish to divide (paternal) wealth.

18—19. But as soon as it is partitioned, they begin to quarrel from the blindness arising from wealth. And enemies in the guise of friends, cause estrangement between ignorant and selfish brothers. They confirm their quarrels by pointing out faults, and thus they fall one by one.

20. Absolute ruin very soon overtakes those (brothers) that are separated. Therefore, good men never approve of the partition amongst brothers,

21. Who, when divided, do not have any regard for Sastras or Gurus. As you, without regarding my advice, impelled by the desire of separation, wish to partition the wealth,

22. For this, O Supratika, you will become an elephant." Thus being cursed Supratika told Vivavasu,

23. "You will become an aquatic tortoise." Thus being cursed by each other Supratika and Vivavasu,

24. Both fools now live as a tortoise and an elephant. Owing to their wrathful nature they have both become inferior animals.

25. They are both engaged in hostilities with each other. Proud of their great strength and the weight of their body, in this lake, these two huge creatures are now engaged in their old hostilities.

26—27. Look, the handsome elephant is coming to the lake. Hearing his roar the huge tortoise rises up, violently agitating the water of the lake ; and seeing him the elephant, coiling his trunk, rushes into the water.

28. The greatly powerful elephant, with the motion of his tusks and forepart of his trunk and with tail and feet, violently agitates the water of the lakes full of fishes.

29. The greatly powerful tortoise also, with its head up, comes to the fight. The elephant is six Yoyonas in height and twice that measure in circumference.

30. The tortoise is also three Yoyonas in height and his circumference is ten yoyonas. Eat up both of these animals, madly engaged in battle and bent upon killing each other.

31. (After eating them), accomplish the task you desire to perform. Eating the fearful elephant which looks like a huge mountain and a huge mass of clouds, go and bring the Ambrosia.

Souti said :—

32. Having said this to Garuda, he blessed him, saying,

33—34. "O oviparous one, let good come to you when you engage in battle with the celestials. Let water-pots filled to the brim, let Brahmanas, kine and other auspicious objects bless you. In the battle with the powerful celestials,

35. Let Riks, Yajus, Shaman, the sacred sacrificial ghee, all the mysteries, and all the Vedas become your strength."

36. Having been thus addressed by his father, Garuda went to the side of the lake. He saw it full of clear water and full of birds of various kinds flying all around.

37. Remembering his father's words, the swift-flying great bird seized the elephant and the tortoise, one in each claw,

38. The great bird then soared high into the sky. Coming to a holy shrine, called Alamva, he saw many celestial trees.

39. Struck by the wind raised by his wings, the trees began to tremble in fear. Those trees, with golden boughs, feared that they would be broken down.

40. Thereupon the bird, seeing the trees that are capable of giving every thing, were trembling in fear, went to other trees of matchless appearance.

41. And those big trees were adorned with fruits of gold and silver, and with branches of precious gems; and they were washed by the waters of the sea. There was a big banian amongst them.

42. The great tree spoke to the best of the birds, who was flying away with the speed of the mind, saying,

43. "Sit down on this big branch of mine which extends a hundred yoyanas; and eat the elephant and the tortoise."

44. When the best of birds, huge as a huge mountain and of great swiftness, alighted on the tree, the abode of thousands of birds, it trembled; and the bough, full of leaves, was broken.

Thus ends the twenty ninth chapter, Sauparna, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XXX.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. The moment the branch of the tree was touched by the greatly powerful Garuda with his feet, it broke down. As it was about to fall, it was caught by him.

2. As he cast his eyes in wonder on the broken branch of the tree, he saw that the Valikhilya Rishis were hanging from it, with their heads downwards.

3. Having seen the holy Rishis thus suspended, he said to himself, "These Rishis of great penances must not be killed."

4. If the bough fell down, the Rishis will be killed." Reflecting thus, the mighty bird held more firmly the elephant and the tortoise.

5. The king of birds, from the fear of killing the Rishis, and from the desire of saving them, held the bough in his beaks and rose on his wings.

6. The great Rishis, seeing this act which was beyond the powers of the celestials, was filled with wonder, and they gave the great bird a name.

7. They said,—“As this great bird rises on its wings with a heavy burden, let the best of the birds, the eater of snakes, be called Garuda.”

8. Then shaking the mountains, the bird slowly moved onward in the sky, and when he was thus going he saw many countries underneath.

9. Wishing to save the Valikhilyas he could not find a (proper) place to sit on. At last he went to that best of mountains, called Ushnisha.

10. There did he saw his father, Kashyapa, engaged in ascetic devotions. His father also saw that great bird of divine form,

11. And of great splendour, strength and energy, as swift as the wind or the mind, huge as a mountain peak, a ready smiter as a curse of a Brahmana,

12. Inconceivable, indescribable, fearful to all creatures, possessed of great powers, terrible, as full of splendour as Agni himself,

13. Incapable of being overcome by the Devas and Danavas, capable of splitting mountains, and of sucking the ocean,

14. Capable of destroying the three worlds, and as fierce-looking as Yama himself. The greatly illustrious Kashyapa, seeing him approach, and knowing his intention, thus addressed him,

Kashyapa said :—

15. My son, do not commit a rash act, for you will then have to suffer pain. The Valikhilyas, that support on the rays of the sun, if angry, can blast you.

Souti said :—

16. Therefore, Kashyapa for the sake of his son, propitiated the greatly fortunate, exceedingly ascetic and sinless Valikhilyas.

Kashyapa said :—

17. O great Rishis, the rise of Garuda is for the good of all creatures. He is trying to accomplish a great act, and therefore, you should give him permission.

Souti said :—

18. The great ascetics, having been thus addressed by the illustrious Kashyapa, quitting the bough, went to the sacred Himalayas to observe ascetic penances.

19. When the Rishis went away, the son of Vinata, his voice choked by the bough in his beaks, asked his father Kashyapa,

20. "O illustrious one, where shall I throw this great bough of the tree" illustrious one, point me out a place where there is no man."

21. Kashyapa told him of a mountain without human beings, with caves and dales, always covered with snow, and inaccessible by ordinary men even in thought.

22. The great bird, carrying the bough, the elephant and the tortoise, proceeded in great speed towards that mountain of broad waist.

23. The great bough with which the huge bird flew away could be girt round with a cord made of a hundred hides.

24. The king of the birds, Garuda, flew away one hundred thousand yoyonas in the shortest time.

25. Going almost within a moment to the mountain as directed by his father, the bird let fall the great bough. And it fell with a great noise.

26. That king of the mountains trembled, having been struck with the storm, raised by Garuda's wings. The trees thereon dropped showers of flowers.

27. And the peaks of that great mountain, decked with gems and gold, were loosened and fell down on all sides.

28. The falling bough struck down many trees, which, with golden flowers amid their dark leaves, looked like clouds charged with lightning.

29. And these trees, bright as gold, falling down upon the ground and dyed with the mountain metals, looked as if they were bathed in the rays of the sun.

30. Then the best of birds sat on the summit of that mountain and ate both the elephant and the tortoise.

31. The son of Tarksha (Garuda), having thus eaten the elephant and the tortoise, rose on his wings from the top of that mountain summit.

32. Various evil omens appeared before the celestials foreboding fear. Indra's thunder-bolt blazed up in a fright.

33—34. Meteors with flames and smoke, loosened from the welkin, shot down during the day; and the weapons of the Vasus, the Rudras, the Adityas, the Sadhyas, the Maruts and of all other classes of celestials began to fight among one another.

35. Such things had never happened, —no, not even during the war between the Devas and the Danavas. The winds blew with thunder; meteors fell in thousands;

36. The cloudless sky made a tremendous roar. Even he who was the god of the gods, dropped blood.

37. The garlands in the necks of the celestials grew pale and dim, and their splendour was lost. And terrible masses of clouds vomitted thick showers of blood.

38. The dust, raised by the winds, darkened the splendour of the coronets worn by the celestials. Thereupon, Indra with the other celestials, perplexed with fear on account of these evil omens, addressed Vrihaspati thus.

Indra said:—

39. O illustrious one, why have these great disasters suddenly arisen? I do not see any enemy who will oppress us in a war. |

Vrihaspati said:—

40. O king of the celestials, O Satakratu, it is from your carelessness and from your fault, and owing to the penances of the illustrious Rishi Valikhilyas,

41. That the son of the Rishi Kashyapa and Vinata, the great bird, capable of assuming any form at will, is coming to take away the Soma.

42. And the strongest of all the strong, that bird is capable of taking away the Soma. Everything is possible in him. He can achieve even the unachievable.

Souti said:—

43. Having heard this, Indra spoke to those that guarded the Ambrosia, "A greatly powerful bird has determined to take away the Soma;

44. I warn you beforehand, so that he may not succeed in taking it by force. Vrihaspati has told me that his strength is matchless."

45. The celestials, when they heard it, were astonished, and they took precautions. They stood surrounding the Ambrosia, and the greatly powerful Indra stood with them,—thunder-bolt in hand.

46. The celestials wore wonderful and greatly valuable breast-plates of gold, set with gems;

47. They wore bright leather armours of great toughness, and wielded various sharp weapons of terrible forms,

48. All emitting fire with smoke, and all raised up by the best of the celestials.

49. They were armed with many discuses, iron maces, spikes, lances, tridents, battle-axes and various other sharp-pointed missiles, polished swords and maces of terrible forms, all suited to their respective bodies.

50. Armed with these bright weapons and adorned with all celestial ornaments, the celestials, having their fear allayed, waited there (ready to meet Garuda).

51. The celestials of matchless strength, energy and splendour, capable of splitting the cities of the Asuras, displayed themselves in forms resplendent as the blazing fire; they all resolved to protect the Ambrosia (at all hazard).

52. And in consequence of the celestials' standing there, and owing to hundreds of thousands of maces furnished with iron spokes, that battle-field looked like another firmament illuminated by the rays of the sun.

Thus ends the thirtieth chapter, Sauparna, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XXXI.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Saunaka said:—

1. O son of Suta, what was the fault of Indra and what was his carelessness? How was Garuda born owing to the penances of the Valikhilyas?

2. Why had Kashyapa, a Brahmana, the king of the birds for his son? Why was he invincible of all creatures and indestructible of all?

3. Why was that bird capable of going every where and mastering any measure of strength at will? I am willing to hear all this, if they are narrated in the Puranas.

Souti said:—

4. What you ask me is narrated in the Puranas. O Brahmana, listen to them. I shall briefly narrate them all.

5. When Prajapati Kashyapa from the desire of begetting offspring was engaged in a sacrifice, the Rishis, the Devas, and the Gandharvas all gave him help.

6. Indra with Valikhilya Rishis and other celestials were appointed by Kashyapa to bring fuel for the sacrifice.

7. And Lord Indra, taking up according to his great strength a weight which was mountain-like, brought it without any fatigue.

8. He saw on the way some Rishis, as small in size as the thumb, carrying one single stalk of Palasa leaf all together.

9. They were exceedingly lean for want of food, and they were much distressed when they fell into an indentation in the road caused by the hoop of a cow.

19. Purander (Indra), madly proud of his strength, saw them with surprise, and laughing at them in derision, passed them, crossing over their heads, and thus grossly insulting them.

11. On this the Rishis became exceedingly angry and was filled with sorrow. They began a great act which was a terror to Indra.

12. Hear, Sir, these excellent Rishis poured ghee in the sacrificial fire loudly reciting Mantras, saying,

13. "There will be another Indra of all the celestials, capable of going everywhere at will, mustering any measure of strength at will and imparting fear to the present Indra.

14. By the fruit of our penances, let there be born an Indra fearfully strong and fleet as the mind."

15. The Lord of the celestials Satakratu, becoming very much alarmed, went to ask the protection of the great ascetic, the self-controlled Rishi Kashyapa.

16. Prajapati Kashyapa, having heard every thing from Indra, went to the Valikhilyas, and asked whether their act had been successful.

17. Thus addressed, those truthful Rishis said, "Yes, it is done." Then Prajapati Kashyapa pacified them and said,

18. "The present Indra has been appointed the lord of the three worlds by Brahma. O Rishis you are also trying to create another Indra.

19. O excellent men, you should not make the words of Brahma untrue, and I too do not wish to make your desire futile.

20. Let there be an Indra of the winged creatures, endued with great strength. Be gracious to Indra who is suppliant to you."

21. Having been thus addressed by Kashyapa, the Valikhilya Rishis saluted the great Prajapati and spoke thus,

The Valikhilyas said:—

22. O Prajapati, our this action (penance) is for creating an Indra. It is also meant for a son being born to you.

23. Let this successful act be accepted by you; and in this matter, do whatsoever you think good and proper.

Souti said:—

24-25. At this time, the good and illustrious daughter of Daksha, named Vinata, being desirous of having an offspring and having purified herself by bathing after her season of impurity, came to her husband; and Kashyapa spoke to her thus,

26. "O Lady, the sacrifice, commenced by me, has borne fruit. What you desired to get, you will get. Two heroic sons will be born in you who will be the lords of the three worlds.

27. Owing to the penances of the Valikhilyas, and by virtue of the desire with which I had began my sacrifice, those sons will be of exceeding good fortune, and they will be worshipped by the three worlds."

28. The illustrious Kashyapa again spoke to her, "Carefully bear these auspicious seeds.

29. These two will be the lords of all the winged creatures. They will be birds, capable of assuming any form at will, and they will be great heroes, respected by all the worlds."

30. The Prajapati then addressed Indra thus,—“You will have two brothers of great power and strength, who will be your helps.

31. O Purander, by them will no injury be done to you. Let your sorrow cease. O Indra, you will remain as the only one Indra in the world.

32. But let not the utterers of Brahma, Brahmanas be ever slighted by you. Let not those, whose words are like the thunderbolt, be again insulted by you."

33. Having been thus addressed, Indra, his fear being dispelled, went to heaven; and Vinata was much pleased, because her desire was accomplished.

34. She gave birth to two sons, Aruna and Garuda, and the undeveloped-bodied Aruna became the fore-runner (charioteer) of the sun.

35. Garuda became the king of the birds. O descendent of Vrigu, listen to his great deeds.

CHAPTER XXXII.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said:—

1. O best of the twice born, the celestials, having stood prepared for battle (in the way already narrated), the king of the birds Garuda soon came upon them.

2. The celestials, having seen him of excessive strength, began to tremble in fear; and (having been confused) struck one another with all their weapons.

3. Amongst those that were guarding the Soma was Bhaumana (Viswakarma) of matchless strength and of great energy. He was as effulgent as the electric fire.

4. But after a moment's fight he lay as dead, mangled by the king of the birds with his beaks, talons and wings.

5. The great bird, darkening the worlds with the dust raised by the great storm created by his wings, overwhelmed the celestials.

6. Having been overwhelmed with that dust, the celestials fainted away. Those that were guarding the Ambrosia could not see Garuda on account of the dust.

7. Thus Garuda agitated the celestial regions and mangled the celestials with his wings and beaks.

8. Thereupon the celestial, the god of thousand eyes (Indra), commanded Vayu, saying, "O Maruta, it is your work to drive the dust away."

9. Then the mighty Vayu drove the dust; and when darkness thus disappeared, the celestials attacked the bird.

10. When he was attacked by the celestials, he roared in the sky, like the great cloud, frightful to every creature.

11-13. The greatly powerful king of birds, the slayer of enemies, rose on his wings and stayed in the sky over the heads of the celestials, with their lord Indra, who showered on him double edged swords, iron maces, sharp lances, bright arrows and discuses of the form of the sun. Being thus attacked from every side,

14. The king of birds fought the great battle without being weary for a moment, and the greatly powerful son of Vinata, blazing in the sky, attacked the celestials on all sides by his wings and breast, and scattered them in all directions.

15. Mangled by the talons and the beaks of Garuda, copious blood began to flow from the bodies of the celestials.

16. Thus overcome by the king of birds, the Sadhyas fled with the Gandharvas towards the east, the Vasus with the Rudras towards the south,

17. The Adityas towards the west, and the Ashwinis towards the north. Gifted with great powers, they retreated fighting, and looking back every moment at their enemy.

18-19. Garuda fought with the greatly courageous Ashwakranda, and Ranuka, the bold Krathana, and Tapanas, Uluka and Sashana, Nemesha, Puruja and Pulina.

20. The son of Vinata mangled them with his wings, talons and beaks, like the chastiser of foes, the angry Penaki (Siva) at the end of the Yuga.

21. Those greatly powerful and energetic celestials, mangled all over by that great bird, looked like masses of black clouds, dropping showers of blood.

22. Thus making the celestials almost dead, the best of the birds went where the Ambrosia was. He saw it surrounded on all sides by fire.

23. The terrible flames of that fire covered whole of the sky, and moved by violent winds, they bent on burning the very sun.

24-25. The illustrious Garuda assumed ninety times ninety mouths, and drinking in many rivers by those mouths, and coming back in great speed, having wings for his vehicle, extinguished the fire with those rivers' water. And extinguishing that fire, he assumed a very small form, wishing to enter into the place where the Ambrosia was.

Thus ends the thirty second chapter, Sauparna, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said:—

1. The great bird, assuming a golden body, bright as the rays of the sun, entered (where the Soma was) with great force as a torrent enters the sea.

2. He saw near the Ambrosia a wheel, keen-edged and sharp as the razor, revolving incessantly (round it.)

3. And that fearful instrument of fearful form, as blazing as the blazing sun, was skilfully created by the celestials to cut down the robbers of the Ambrosia.

4. The great bird saw a passage through it, and stopped for a while. Diminishing his body within an instant, he passed through the spokes of that wheel.

5—6. He beheld, within the line of the wheel, stationed there to guard the Soma, two great snakes as blazing as the blazing fire, having tongues like lightning, power incomparable, face and eyes emitting fire, poisonous, terrible, always in anger and always in activity.

7. Their eyes were winkless and always inflamed in anger. He who was even seen by any of the two was instantly reduced to ashes.

8. The great bird (Suparna) suddenly covered their eyes with dust, and thus making them blind, he attacked them from all sides.

9. The son of Vinata, that ranger of the sky, attacking their bodies, mangled them into pieces; and he then without the least delay came to the place where the Soma was.

10. The mighty son of Vinata, taking up the Ambrosia from the place where it was, rose on his wings, breaking the instrument into pieces.

11. He soon came out, but he did not drink the Ambrosia. He then proceeded on his way without the least fatigue, darkening the splendour of the sun.

12. The son of Vinata then saw Vishnu on his way in the sky, and Narayana was pleased with him for his self-denial.

13. The undeteriorating Diety said to the great bird, "I am willing to grant you a boon." Thereupon the bird said, "I want to stay above you."

14. He again said to Narayana, "I want to be immortal, and free from disease without drinking the Ambrosia."

15. Vishnu said to the son of Vinata, "Be it so." Receiving these two boons, Garuda said to Vishnu,

16. "I shall also grant you a boon." Thereupon Vishnu asked the mighty carrier of great weights to become his vehicle.

17. He placed the bird on the flag-staff of his car saying, "Thus shall you stay above me." And the bird said to Narayana, "Be it so,"

18. Mocking the wind with fleetness, he then swiftly proceeded on his way, and when the great bird was thus going away, Indra hurled at him his thunder-bolt.

19. The best of birds, Garuda, when carrying away the Ambrosia, was thus struck with the thunder-bolt; and being greatly angry, he laughingly spoke to Indra

20. In sweet words, "I shall respect the Rishi, with whose bones the thunder-bolt is made.

21. I shall respect the thunder-bolt and you also. O Indra, I cast a feather of mine, end of which even you will never find.

22. I have not felt the slightest pain being struck by your thunder-bolt." Having said this, the king of birds threw out one of his feathers.

23—24. Seeing that beautiful feather, cast by Garuda, all creatures became exceedingly pleased, and they said, "Let this bird be called Suparna (bird with beautiful feathers)." Seeing this, the diety of thousands eyes, Parandara, was much surprised, and he thought the bird must be a great being. He then addressed him thus,

Indra said :—

25. "O best of birds, I desire to know the limit of your strength. I also desire to form an eternal friendship with you.

Thus ends the thirty third chapter, Sauparna, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Garuda said :—

1. "O Purander, Let there be friendship between us as you desire. Know, my strength is great and is hard to bear.

2. O Satakratu, the learned do not approve of speaking highly of their own strength or of their own merits.

3. O friend, as we are now made friends, and as you ask me, I will tell you, although self-praise without reason is always improper.

4. O Indra, I can bear, on a single feather of mine, this earth with her mountains forests, oceans, and even you with it.

5. Know, my strength is such that I can bear, without fatigue, even all the worlds put together, with their mobile and immobile objects.

Souti said :—

6. O Saunaka, when the great hero (Garuda) said all this, the great Lord, the king of the celestials, the wearer of the heaven's crown, the possessor of wealth, the benefactor of all the worlds said :—

7. "It is true what you say. Every thing is possible in you. Accept now my sincere and eternal friendship.

8. If you do not require the Soma, kindly return it to me. Those to whom you will give it will always quarrel with us.

Garuda said :—

9. There is a reason why I am taking away the Soma. I shall not give the Soma to any body to drink.

10. O diety of thousand eyes, after I shall place it down, O king of heavens, you can instantly take it up and bring it away.

Indra said :—

11. O oviparous One, I am highly pleased with what you have just now said. O best of birds, accept from me any boon you like to have.

Souti said :—

12. Being thus addressed, Garuda recollecting the sons of Kadru and the slavery of his mother by deception said,

13. "Though I have power to do every thing over all creatures, yet, O Indra, I shall do your bidding. Let the mighty snakes be my food."

14. "Be it so," said the destroyer of the Danavas, and he went to Hari, the god of gods, the great Soul, the lord of Yogees.

15. He (Vishnu) sanctioned all that was said by Garuda. The illustrious lord of all the worlds thus spoke to him,

16. "I shall take away the Soma when you will place it down." Having said this he bade farewell to Garuda, And Suparna (Garuda) went to the presence of his mother with great speed.

17. He then said to all the snakes in joy, "Here have I brought the Ambrosia. I shall place it on the (sacred) Kusha grass.

18. O snakes, drink it after performing your ablutions and religious rites. I have done what you asked me to do.

19—20. Therefore, as you promised, let my mother become free from this day." "Be it so," said the snakes and went to perform their ablutions. In the meantime, Indra taking up the Ambrosia, went away to heaven.

21. The snakes, after performing their ablutions, their daily devotions, and other sacred rites, came in joy to drink the Ambrosia.

22. They saw that the Kusha grass on which the Ambrosia had been placed was empty. It had been taken away by a counter act of deception.

23. They began to lick with their tongues the Kusha grass in which the Ambrosia had been placed ; and by that act, their tongues became divided into two.

24. The Kusha grass, from the contact of the Ambrosia, became sacred from that day. Thus did the illustrious Garuda bring the Ambrosia, and bring it for the snakes, but thus were their tongues divided by what he did.

25. Then Suparna (Garuda) lived in that forest with his mother in great joy. The son of Vinata delighted his mother by becoming the eater of snakes, by being respected by all birds and by doing other great acts.

26. He, who will listen to this story or read it to an assembly of Brahmanas, must surely go to heaven, acquiring great merit from its recitation.

Thus ends the thirty fourth chapter, the conclusion of Sauparna, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XXXV.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Saunaka said :—

1. O son of Suta, you have told us why the snakes were cursed by their mother ; and why Vinata also cursed her son.

2. You have told us the bestowal of boons on Kadru and Vinata by their husband ; you have also told us the names of the two sons of Vinata.

3. O son of Suta, you have not told us the names of the snakes (the sons of Kadru). We are anxious to know the names of the chief ones.

Souti said :—

4. O Rishi, for fear of being lengthy, I shall not mention the names of all the snakes. But hear, I shall only mention the names of the chief ones.

5-16. Shesha was born first and then Vasuki. (There were born) Airavata, Takshaka, Karkotaka, Dhananjaya, Kalakeya, Mani, Purana, Pinjaraka, Elapatra, Vamana, Nila Anila, Kalamasha, Savala, Aryaka, Ugraka, Kalaspotaka, Suramukha, Dodhimukha, Vimalapindaka, Apta, Karotaka, Sankha, Valisikha, Nisthanaka, Himaguha, Nahusa, Pingala, Vahyakarna, Hastipada, Mudgarapindaka, Kamvala, Ashwatara, Kalijaka, Vritta, Samvartaka, Padma, Mahapadma, Sankhamukha, Kushamandaka, Kshemaka, Pindaraka, Karavira, Pushpadanshtraka, Vilwaka, Vilwapandara, Mushikada, Sankhasiras, Purnabhadra, Haridraka, Aparajita, Jyotika, Srivaha, Kauravya, Dhritarastra, Sankhapinda, Virajas, Suvahu, Salipinda, Probhakara, Hastipinda, Pitharaka, Sumukha, Kaunapashana, Kuthara, Kunjara, Kumuda, Kumudakshya, Tettiri, Halika, Kardama, Vahumulaka, Karakara, Akarkara, Kundodara and Mahodara.

17. O best of the twice-born, I have told you the names of the chief snakes. For fear of being tedious, I have not told you the names of the rest.

18. O Rishi, the sons and the grandsons of the snakes were innumerable, therefore, I shall not mention their names to you.

19. O Rishi, the number of snakes defies calculation in this world. There are many thousands and millions of the snakes.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Saunaka said :—

1. O child, you have told us of many greatly powerful and unconquerable serpents. What did they do after hearing of the curse ?

Souti said :—

2. Illustrious and famous Shesha, having left (his mother) Kadru, practised austere penances, living on air and rigidly observing vows.

3. He practised his penances, going to Gandhamadana, Vadari, Gokarna, the forest of Pushkara and the foot of the Himalayas.

4. He passed his days in these sacred places, rigidly observing his vows, completely controlling his passions and concentrating his mind.

5. The Grandsire saw him with knotted hair, clad in rags, his flesh, skin and sinews dried up owing to the austere penances he was practising.

6. The Grandsire, addressing that penance-practising ascetic, said, "O Shesha, what are you doing ? let the welfare of the worlds also engage your thoughts."

7. O sinless one, you are giving pain to all creatures by your austere penances. O Shesha, tell me the desire of your mind."

Shesha said :—

8. My brothers are all of wicked hearts. I do not wish to live with them. Kindly sanction this.

9. They are jealous of one another like great enemies. I am, therefore, engaged in penances. I shall not even see them.

10. They never show any kindness for Vinata and her son, who is our other brother, the bird of the air.

11. They always envy him. He too is much stronger than (all of us), owing to the boon granted by our father, the illustrious and noble Kashyapa.

12. Therefore, I am practising penances, and I shall cast off this body of mine, so that I may not live with them even in another life.

Souti said :—

13. When Shesha thus spoke, the Grandsire told him, "O Shesha, I know the character of your brothers. . . ."

14. (And I know also) their great danger owing to their offence against their mother. O snake, a remedy has been already provided by me.

15. You should not grieve for your brothers. O Shesha, whatever you desire, ask it from me.

16. I am highly pleased with you and I shall grant you a boon to-day. O best of snakes, it is very good that your heart has been set on virtue. Let your heart be more and more firmly set on virtue."

Shesha said :—

17. O divine Grandsire, O lord of all, I ask this boon,—let my heart always delight in virtue and in blessed penances.

Brahma said :—

18. O Shesha, I am highly pleased with your self-denial and love of peace. By my command let the following act be done by you for the good of all creatures.

19. Bearing properly and well, this earth which is so very unsteady, towns, retreats and seas, with all her mountains and forests, with her O Shesha, remain in the way as she may be steady.

Shesha said :—

20. O divine lord of all creatures, O granter of boons, O lord of the earth, O the lord of every created thing, O the lord of the universe, I shall hold the earth steady, as you command. O Prajapati, place it upon my head.

Brahma said :—

21. O best of snakes, go underneath the earth. She herself will make a passage for you. O Shesha, you will certainly do what is highly valued by me by holding the earth (on your head.)

Souti said :—

22. The elder brother of the king of the snakes, entering into a hole, went to the other side of the earth. He held that goddess (earth) with her belt of seas all around her.

Brahma said :—

23. O Shesha, O best of snakes, you are the Dharma, because you hold the earth alone with your huge body, with every thing on her, what I myself and Indra can do.

Souti said :—

24. Thus does the snake, Shesha, the greatly powerful lord Ananta, live underneath the earth, alone supporting the world at the command of Brahma.

25. Then the Grandsire, the illustrious lord of the immortals, gave Sarpāna (Garuda), the son of Yanata, at Ananta's help.

Thus ends the thirty-sixth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. The best of snakes, Vasuki, hearing the curse of his mother, pondered over how to make it abortive.

2. He held a consultation with all his brothers, Airayata and others, who were virtuous.

Vasuki said :—

3. O sinless ones, the curse on us is well-known to you. We should try to neutralise it.

4. Remedies exist for all curses, but no remedy can avail those who are cursed by their mother.

5. Hearing that this curse was uttered before the immutable, the infinite and the true one, my heart trembles.

6. Our annihilation has certainly come; otherwise the immutable Lord should have prevented our mother from uttering the curse.

7. Therefore, let us consult to-day how we may secure the safety of the snakes. Let us not waste time.

8. You are all wise and discerning. We shall all consult together, and find out a means of deliverance.

9. As did the celestials, in the days of yore, to regain the lost Agni who had concealed himself within a cave, so that the sacrifice of Janamejaya for the destruction of the snakes may not take place, and so that we may not meet with our destruction.

Souti said :—

10. Thus addressed, all the offspring of Kadru assembled together; they were all wise in counsel, and they gave their opinions (one after the other.)

11. One party said, "We shall assume the guise of Brahmana Rishis and asked Janamejaya not to hold the sacrifice."

12. Others, thinking themselves wise, said, "We shall all become his favourite counsellors.

13. He will then certainly ask our advice in all things, and we shall then give him such advice as may obstruct the sacrifice.

14. The king, thinking us wise, will certainly ask our advice about his sacrifice, and we shall say, "Don't hold it."

15. We shall point him out many serious evils in this world and the next, with reasons and causes, so that the sacrifice may not take place.

16—17. (We can do this also) ; let one of the snakes by biting kill the persons, who will try to do good to the king, and who will be well-acquainted with the rites of the Snake-sacrifice and who will be appointed as the sacrificial priest. And by their death, the sacrifice will not be completed.

18. We shall also bite those who are acquainted with the Snake-sacrifice and who may be appointed as the Ritwijas of the sacrifice. Thus we shall obtain our object."

19. Some other snakes, who were kind-hearted and virtuous, said, "Your this advice is not good. It is not proper to kill Brahmanas."

20. That remedy is proper in a danger which rests on righteousness. Unrighteousness finally destroys the world."

21. Other snakes said :—" We shall extinguish the sacrificial fire by becoming clouds luminous with lightning, and pouring down showers."

22. Other good snakes said, " Let us go in the night and steal away the vessel of the Soma. This will obstruct the sacrifice.

23. Or let the snakes go in hundreds and thousands to the sacrifice, bite every one, and thus create a terror.

24. Or let the serpents defile the pure food with their urine and dung."

25. Others said, " Let us become the Ritwijas of the king and obstruct the sacrifice by saying at the very outset,—'Give us our Dhakshina."

26. The king, being placed in our power, will do whatever we will ask him to do." Other said, " When the king will play in the waters,

27. Let us carry him to our home and kept him bound, so that the sacrifice may not take place." Others, thinking themselves wise, said,

28. " Let us go to the king and bite him, so that our object may be accomplished. By his death the root of all evil will be destroyed.

29. O snake, that hears by the eyes, this is the final result of our deliberations. O king, do speedily what you think proper.

30. Having said this, they all eagerly looked at the best of the snakes, Vasuki. And Vasuki, after reflecting a while, told the snakes,

31. " O snakes, your this final determination does not seem worthy of adoption. The advice, that you all give, are not to my liking.

32. What can I suggest which would be for your good ! I think the favour of (our father) the illustrious Kashyapa can alone do us good.

33. O snakes, my mind does not know which of your suggestions to adopt for the welfare of my race and mine.

34. It is this that makes me so anxious, for the credit and the discredit of the act will rest on me alone.

Thus ends the thirty-seventh chapter Astika, in the Ardi Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. Having heard the words that fell from the snakes and also what fell from Vasuki, Elapatra addressed them thus,

2. " That sacrifice is not such as would be prevented, and Janamejaya of the Pandava race, who is our great terror, is not such as he can be obstructed.

3. O King, he who is afflicted by Fate, has his recourse to Fate alone. Nothing else can be his refuge.

4. O best of the snakes, the root of our terror is Fate, and therefore, Fate alone must be our refuge. Listen to what I say.

5—6. O best of the snakes, when that curse was uttered, I lay in fear, crouching on my mother's lap. O best of the snakes, O Lord, O snake of great splendour, I heard from that place the sorrowing gods speaking to the Grandsire saying,

The Celestials said :—

7. O Grandsire, O god of gods, who but Kadru, after getting such dear children, can curse them even in your presence !

8. O Grandsire, you have also said, " Be it so." We wish to know the reason why you did not prevent her.

Bramha said :—

9. The snakes have multiplied, they are cruel, terrible in form, and deadly poisonous. I did not prevent Kadru (from uttering the curse) from the desire of doing good to all creatures.

10. The poisonous serpents that have always the biting propensity, those that bite for little faults, and those who are sinful, will be destroyed, but not those that are virtuous.

11. Hear, how the snakes may escape from this dreadful calamity when the time will come,

12. There will be born in the race of Yayavaras, a great Rishi, known by the name of Jaratkaru, who will be intelligent, greatly ascetic and self-controlled.

13. That Jaratkaru will have a son, named Astika, who will also be a great Rishi. He will put a stop to the Snake-sacrifice. Those snakes that will be virtuous will escape (from the Snake-sacrificial fire.)

The Celestials said :—

14. O Brahma, in whom will Jaratkaru, the foremost of the Rishis, gifted with great powers and asceticism, beget that illustrious son ?

Bramha said :—

15. The best of Brahmanas, the greatly powerful (Jaratkaru) will beget a greatly powerful son on his wife who will bear the same name as his.

16. Vasuki, the king of the snakes, has a sister, named Jaratkaru ; the son I speak of will be born in her womb, and he will save the snakes.

Elapatra said :—

17. The celestials said to the Grandsire, "Be it so," and the lord Brahma, having said all this to the celestials went to heaven.

18—19. O Vasuki, I see before me your that sister, known by the name of Jaratkaru. To save us from this great calamity, give her as a gift to the Rishi Jaratkaru of rigid vows, who will roam about begging for a bride. This means of our safety has been heard by me.

Thus ends the thirty eighth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. O best of the twice born, hearing what Elapatra said, all the snakes exclaimed in joy, "Well said! Excellent man!"

2. From that day Vasuki carefully kept that maiden, his sister Jaratkaru, and he took great pleasure in rearing her up.

3. Not long after this, the Devas and the Asuras churned the abode of Varuna (Ocean.)

4. And the greatly powerful Vasuki became its churning cord. As soon as this work was done, he appeared before the grandsire.

5. The celestials with Vasuki addressed the Grandsire thus,—“O lord, Vasuki is suffering from the fear of the curse.

6. You should draw out the dart, begotten by his mother's curse, which pierces the heart of Vasuki who is desirous of the weal of his race.

7. The king of the snakes is always our friend and benefactor ; O lord of the gods, be gracious to him, and remove the fever of his mind.

Bramha said :—

8—9. O immortals, I have thought in my mind what you have said. Let the king of the snakes do what Elapatra had told him before. The time has come. The wicked only will be destroyed, and not the virtuous.

10. Jaratkaru is (already) born ; that Brahmana is now engaged in penances. Let him (Vasuki), at the proper time, give his sister to Jaratkaru.

11. O celestials, what had been said by Elapatra for the weal of the snakes is true. It is not otherwise.

Souti said :—

12. The king of the snakes, afflicted with the curse, having heard what the Grandsire said, commanded all the snakes,—

13. A large number of them who are always attentive to their duties,—to watch the Rishi Jarakaru. He said,—

14. "When the Lord Jaratkaru will ask for a wife, come immediately and inform me of it. The weal of our race depends upon it."

Thus ends the thirty-ninth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XL.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Saunaka said —

1—2. O son of Suta, I desire to know why the illustrious Rishi whom you call Jaratkaru came to be so called. You should tell us the Etymology of the name of Jaratkaru.

Souti said :—

3—4. Jara, means "waste"—Karu means "huge." The body of this Rishi was huge, but he reduced it by severe penances. O Brahmana, because he thus reduced his body, he was called Jaratkaru. The sister of Vasuki was called Jaratkaru for the same reason.

5. When the pious Saunaka heard this, he smiled, and addressing Ugrasrava (Souti) said, "It is true."

Saunaka said :—

6. I have heard all that you have narrated. Now I wish to hear how Astika was born.

Souti said :—

7. Vasuki, wishing to bestow his sister on Rishi Jaratkaru, gave the snakes (all necessary) orders.

8. Many years rolled away, but the Rishi of rigid vows, deeply engaged in ascetic devotions, did not seek for a wife.

9. That high-souled Rishi, his sexual passion completely under control, engaged in deep study and devoted to rigid asceticism, fearlessly roamed over the world, having no desire for a wife.

10. O Brahmana, once upon a time there was a king, named Parikshit, born in the race of the Kurus.

11. He was like his grandfather, mighty in arms, the best of all bow-men in battle, and was very fond of hunting.

12. That king of the world roamed about, hunting deer, wild boars, hyena and buffaloes, and various other wild animals.

13. One day, having pierced a deer with an arrow, he slung his bow on his back and entered into a deep forest.

14. He searched for it in the forest here and there, as Rudra did in heaven for the sacrificial deer which was pierced with his arrow.

15. Never had a deer, pierced by Parikshit, escaped in the forest with life. This deer, however, wounded as the others, were fled away with speed. It shows the proximity of the king's going to heaven (death).

16. The deer, that the king of men, Parikshit wounded, was soon lost out of his sight, and the king went in pursuit it far into the forest.

17—19. Fatigued and thirsty he came upon a Rishi, in the forest, seated in a cowshed, drinking the froth oozing out of the mouths of the calves sucking the milk of their mothers. Coming to him with all haste, the king asked that Rishi of great austerity, "O Brahmana, I am king Parikshit, the son of Abhimanyu.

20. Have you seen where the deer pierced by me has gone?" But the Rishi, observing the vow of silence, did not reply to him.

21. The king being angry took up a dead snake with the end of his bow and placed it round the neck of the Rishi, but the Rishi did not prevent him from doing it.

22—23. He did not even say a word, either good or bad. Seeing him in that state, the king cast off his anger and became very sorry. He went away to his capital, and the Rishi remained as he was. The forgiving great Rishi knowing him, that best of kings,

24—25. To be true to the duties of his order, did not curse him. That best of kings, the best of the Bharata race, also did not know that the Rishi was a virtuous man. It is for this that he thus insulted him. This Rishi had a young, greatly powerful and exceedingly ascetic son,

26—27. Who was named Sringsi. He was full of wrath, severe in his vows and difficult to be appeased. He sometimes worshipped with great attention his (preceptor) Brahma, seated on his seat and ever engaged in doing good to all creatures. Commanded by him, he was coming home one day, 28—29. When his friend (Krisha) in a playful mood, laughingly spoke to him about his father. The Rishi's son, ever wrathful and like poison itself, hearing what had happened to his father, blazed up in a rage.

Krisha said :—

30. O Sringsi, do not be proud. Ascetic as you are and possessed of great powers, (go and see) your father is carrying a dead body (on his shoulder),

31. Don't speak with the sons of the Rishis like ourselves, who are deep in asceticism, who have knowledge of truth and who have attained success.

32. Where is your that manliness, and where are your those proud words, when you see your father carrying a dead snake?

33. O best of Rishis, your father did nothing to meet with this treatment. I am pained as if it has been done to me.

Thus ends the fortieth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XLI.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. Being thus addressed, and having heard that his father was bearing a dead snake, the powerful Sringsi grew exceedingly angry.

2. Looking at Krishna, he softly asked him, "Why does my father bear a dead snake?"

Krishna said :—

3. O dear friend, when Parikshit was roving for the purpose of hunting, he placed the dead snake on the shoulder of your father.

Sringi said :—

4. What harm was done by my father to that miscreant king? Tell me this, O Krishna, and (you will then) see my ascetic powers.

Krishna said :—

5. King Parikshit, the son of Abhimanyu, having wounded a fleet stag with an arrow while hunting, chased it alone.

6. He lost sight of the stag in the wilderness of the forest, and seeing your father he accosted him.

7. But he (your father) was then observing the vow of silence. Oppressed by hunger, thirst and fatigue, the king repeatedly asked your father about the missing deer.

8. But the Rishi, being then under the vow of silence, did not make any reply. Thereupon the king, becoming angry, placed the snake on his shoulder, taking it up with the end of his bow.

9. O Sringi, your father, engaged in devotion, is still in that posture. The king has, however, gone away to his capital (Hastinapur), named after the elephant.

Souti said :—

10. Having heard that a dead snake had been placed on his father's shoulder, the Rishi's son looked like a blazing fire, his eyes reddened with anger.

11. Inflamed with anger, the powerful Rishi, touching water, cursed the king thus,

Sringi said :—

12.—14. He who has placed the dead snake on the shoulder of my old and lean father,—that miscreant of a king, that insulter of the Brahmanas, the destroyer of the fame of the Kuru race,—will be taken within seven days from to-day to the land of Yama by the snake Takshaka, the powerful king of the serpents, stimulated by my words.

Souti said :—

15. Having thus cursed the king from anger, Sringi went to his father, and saw that he was sitting in the cow-shed, the dead snake (was still) on his shoulder.

16. Seeing that the dead snake was on the shoulder of his father, he was again inflamed with anger.

17. He shed tears in grief; and addressed his father thus, "O father, hearing the insult offered to you by the miscreant,

18. King Parikshit, I have cursed him from anger. That wretch of the Kurus richly deserves my potent curse. Within seven days from this date the king of snake, Takshaka

19. Will take the sinner to the fearful house of Death." And the father said to the enraged son,

Samika said :—

20. O child, I am not pleased with your act. It is not proper for ascetics to act thus. We live in the domains of that king;

21. We are righteously protected by him, and therefore, we should not mind his faults. The reigning kings should always be pardoned by men like us.

22. O son, if you destroy Dharma, (piety), Dharma will certainly destroy you. If the king does not protect us, we meet with many afflictions.

23. O son, we cannot then perform our religious rites as we desire. Protected by virtuous kings,

24. We achieve great merits; and a share of it always goes to such kings. Therefore, reigning kings are always to be forgiven;

25. Specially Parikshit, who, like his grandfather, protects us as a king should protect his subjects.

26. That penance-practising king was oppressed by hunger and thirst, and he did not know that I was observing the vow of silence.

27. Disasters always befall on a country where there is no king. The king punishes those who grow wicked.

28. The fear of punishment brings in peace, and men thus perform their duties and their rites undisturbed.

29. The king establishes the kingdom of heaven. The king protects all sacrifices, and the sacrifices please the celestials;

30. The celestials cause rain, and rain produces medicinal herbs; the medicinal herbs do immense good to mankind.

31. Manu said,—'The ruler of the destiny of men is equal to ten Veda-knowing Brahmanas.'

32. That penance-observing king, oppressed by hunger and thirst, has done this through ignorance of my vow.

33. Why have you, through childishness, done rashly this unrighteous action? O son, that king in no way deserves a curse from us.

Thus ends the forty first chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XLII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Sringi said :—

1. O father, whether my act was rash or improper, whether you like it or dislike it, the words spoken by me shall never be vain.

2. O father, I tell you, this can never be otherwise. I have never spoken a lie even in jest.

Samika said :—

3. My child, I know, you are greatly powerful, and you are very truthful. You have never spoken a falsehood in your life, and therefore your curse will never be false.

4. But the son, even when he is grown up, should always be advised by his father, so that adorned with good qualities, he may earn great renown.

5. You are mere child, and therefore, how much more do you stand in need of counsel! You are always engaged in asceticism. Even the anger of illustrious and high souled men increases with the increase of their powers.

6. O best of pious men, considering that you are my son and a mere boy, and seeing your rashness, I see I must give you advice.

7. Live, O son, having your mind inclined to peace; live on fruits and roots of the forest. Destroy your anger; but do not destroy the fruits of your asceticism (by giving vent to anger.)

8. Anger diminishes the merits that ascetics acquire with great pains. There is no hope for those who are deprived of virtue.

9. Peacefulness produces success to the forgiving ascetics. Good come to the forgiving men, both in this world and in the next.

10. Therefore, you should always live, being forgiving in your temper and self-controlling of your passions. By forgiveness you will attain to worlds that are beyond the reach of even Brahma.

11. O my son, having adopted peacefulness, I shall do as much as lies in my power.

I shall do this. I shall send words to the king, telling him,

12. "O king, you have been cursed by my son, who is a mere child and whose intellect is not yet developed. Seeing your disrespect towards me, (he has done this) in anger."

Souti said :—

13. That great ascetic, observant of vows, moved by kindness, sent a disciple to Parikshit with proper instructions.

14. He sent his disciple, named Gaurmukha, a young man of good manners and of ascetic penances, instructing him to enquire first about the welfare of the king, and then to communicate the real business.

15. Going (to Hastinapur) he soon came to the king, the head of the Kuru race. He entered the king's palace, having first sent the notice of his arrival through a servant.

16. The Brahmana, Gaurmukha, was received in all honours. And then after resting for a while, he told the king in the presence of his ministers, the terrible words of Samika, exactly as he was instructed.

Gaurmukha said :—

17. O king of kings, there lives within your dominions, a Rishi, named Shamika.

18—19. He is greatly virtuous, very peaceful, his passions under control, and a great ascetic. O best of men, a dead snake was placed by you with the end of your bow on the shoulder of this Rishi who was then observing the vow of silence. He himself forgave the act, but his son did not.

20. O king of kings, you have been to-day cursed by him without the knowledge of his father. Takshaka will be your death within seven nights.

21. Shamika repeatedly asked his son to save you, but there is none to falsify his curse.

22. As he has been unable to pacify his angry son, therefore, O king, I have been sent by him to you for your good.

Souti said :—

23. Having heard these terrible words, and recollecting his own sinful act, the king, the descendant of the Kuru race, a great ascetic himself, grew exceedingly sorry.

24. Having heard that the best of the Rishi (Shamika) had been observing the vow of silence, he was doubly afflicted with sorrow.

25. Seeing also the great kindness shown to him by the Rishi, and recollecting his own great sinful act, the king became very penitent.

26. The king, who looked like a celestial, did not grieve so much for hearing that he would die, as for having done that (insulting) act to the Rishi.

27. The king then sent away Gaurmukha, saying "Let the adored Rishi be gracious to me!"

28. When Gaurmukha had gone away, the king in great anxiety consulted with all his ministers without delay.

29. Having consulted with his ministers, the king himself, wise in counsels, caused a palace to be erected on a pillar, guarded day and night by men.

30. For his protection, he placed all around the palace, physicians, medicines and Brahmanas skilled in Mantras.

31. Thus being protected on all sides, the king discharged his royal duties, surrounded by his virtuous ministers.

32. None could approach that best of kings there (in that palace.) The air even could not go there, being prevented from entering.

33. When the seventh day came, the best of Brahmanas, Kashyapa, was coming with the intention of treating the king, (if bitten by the snake.)

34. He had heard all that had happened; he had heard that the best of snakes, Takshaka would take the king to Yama's, abode.

35. He thought, "I will cure the king bitten by the best of the snakes. By this I may gain both wealth and virtue."

36. The king of the snakes, Takshaka, saw on the way, Kashyapa, going with the intention of curing the king. He appeared before him in the form of a Brahmana.

37. Thereupon the king of the snakes spoke to the best of the Rishis, Kashyapa, saying, "Where are you going with such speed? What is the business upon which you are going?"

Kashyapa said:—

38. The best of snakes, Takshaka, will to-day burn the chastiser of his enemies, king Parikshit of the Kuru race;

39. O amiable man, I am going in haste without loss of time, to curate that king of immeasurable prowess, the sole representative of the Kuru race, when he will be bitten by the king of snakes, who is as powerful as Agni.

Takshaka said:—

40. O Brahmana, I am that very Takshaka, who will kill that king of the earth, Stop, you cannot cure one who is bitten by me.

Kashyapa said:—

41. I am possessed with the power of learning. Going there, I am sure I shall cure the king bitten by you.

Thus ends the fifty second chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XLIII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Takshaka said:—

1. O Kashyapa, if you are able to cure any creature bitten by me, then revive this tree bitten by me.

2. O best of Brahmanas, I burn this banian tree in your sight. Try your best; and show me your skill in Mantras of which you have just spoken.

Kashyapa said:—

3. O snake, if you are so minded, bite (the tree then). I shall revive it, though bitten by you.

Souti said:—

4. The king of the snakes, thus addressed by the illustrious Kashyapa, bit that banian tree.

5. The tree, bitten by the illustrious snake, and having embibed his poison, blazed up all around.

6. Having thus burnt the tree, the snake spoke again to Kashyapa, "O best of Brahmanas, try your best, and let this lord of the forest (the banian tree) be revived."

7. The tree was reduced to ashes by the poison of the king of snakes. But taking up the ashes, Kashyapa spoke these words.

8. "O king of snakes, behold my power of learning in this lord of the forest. O snake, I shall revive it in your very presence."

9. And then that best of Brahmanas, the illustrious and learned Kashyapa, revived by his learning the tree which was reduced to a heap of ashes.

10. He first created the sprout, he then created two leaves in it. He then made the stem, then the branches, and then the full-grown tree with leaves and all.

11. Seeing that the tree was really revived by the illustrious Kashyapa, Takshaka said, "O Brahmana, it is not (at all) wonderful.

12. That you should destroy my poison or the poison of others like me. O king of Brahmanas, O Rishi, wishing to gain what wealth, are you bent on going there?

13. I shall give you the wealth you hope to get from that best of kings, however difficult may it be to get it.

14. O Brahmana, your success is doubtful, for that king is affected with a Brahmana's curse, and the period of his life is also shortened.

15. Your blazing fame, that has overspread the three worlds, will (then) disappear the sun deprived of his splendour.

Kashyapa said :—

16. I go there for wealth. Give it to me, O snake, so that I may go back receiving it from you.

Takshaka said :—

17. O best of Brahmanas, I shall give you wealth more than you hope to get from the king. Therefore do not go.

Souti said :—

18. Having heard what Takshaka said, the best of Brahmanas, the wise and greatly powerful Kashyapa, sat in meditation.

19—20. The greatly powerful man (Kashyapa), ascertaining by his ascetic powers that the period of the life of the king of the Pandava race had really run out, went back, after receiving from Takshaka as much wealth as he desired to possess. On the great Rishi Kashyapa's departure, Takshaka went with speed towards Hastinapur.

21. Takshaka heard, on his way, that the king of the world was living very carefully, protected by poison-neutralising Mantras and medicines.

22. Thereupon the snake reflected, saying. "The king must be deceived by me by my Maya (power of delusion). But what must be the means?"

23. Takshaka then sent some snakes in the guise of Brahmanas with fruits Kusha grass and water as presents.

Takshaka said :—

24. Go you all to the king, saying that you have urgent business, and showing no impatience, as if you want to make him a present of the fruits, flowers and water.

Souti said :—

25. The snakes, thus commanded by Takshaka, did (as they were ordered to do)

They took to the king, Kusha grass, water and fruits.

26. The greatly powerful king of kings accepted their presents, and when their business was finished, he said, "Now retire."

27. When those disguised snakes had gone away, the king addressed his ministers and friends, saying.

28. "Eat with me all these fruits of excellent taste, brought by the ascetics."

29. Empelled by Fate, and the words of the Rishi, the king with his ministers desired to eat those fruits.

30—31. He himself ate the fruit within which Tashaka lay hidden. O Saunaka, when he was eating the fruit, there appeared from the fruit an ugly insect, of shape scarcely discernable, of black eyes and coppery color. The best of kings, taking up the insect, said to his councillors, 32—33. "The sun is setting. I have no longer any fear from the poison to-day. Therefore, let this insect, becoming Takshaka, bite me, so that my sinful act be expiated and the word of the ascetic may be true. And those councillors, impelled by Fate, approved of the speech of the king.

34. The monarch smiled and placed the insect on his head. His hour (of death) having come, he lost his senses.

35—36. And when the king was smiling, Takshaka, who had come out of the fruit that was offered to the king, coiled himself round the neck of the king. Uttering a tremendous roar, the king of the snakes immediately bit that protector of the world.

Thus ends the forty-third chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XLIV.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. The ministers, seeing their king in the coils of Takshaka, became pale with fear, and they wept in great grief.

2—3. Hearing the roars of Takshaka the ministers all fled. And as they were running away, they saw the king of the snakes the wonderful serpent Takshaka, going away through the sky like a streak with the color of the lotus. His coursing through the sky looked like the vermilion line in the middle of the dark masses of a lady's hair.

4. The palace, in which the king was living, blazed up with the poison of the snake. The ministers left it and fled in fear, and the king fell down as if struck by lightning.

5. When thus the king fell with the poison of Takshaka, the ministers, with the royal priest and holy Brahmanas performed all his last rites.

6. All the citizens of the capital met together and placed the young son of the deceased king on the throne. They called that chastiser of foes, the hero of the Kuru race, Janamejaya.

7. That best of kings, Janamejaya, though he was but a boy, was very intelligent and wise. With his ministers and priest, the eldest son of Parikshit, the best of the Kuru race, ruled his kingdom (as powerfully and well) as his grandfather (Yudhishtir)

8. Seeing that the young king could now keep his enemies in check, his ministers, went to Suvarnavarmana, the king of Kashi, and asked him to give his daughter, Vapustama in marriage with him.

9. The King of Kashi, after due enquiries bestowed with ordained rights his daughter Vapustoma on the mighty hero of the Kuru race. And he too was exceedingly happy to get her. He did not give his heart to any other women at any time.

10. The greatly powerful hero roamed happily in pursuit of pleasures in lakes, in woods and in flowery fields. He passed his time in pleasure as Pururava of olden time did on receiving Urvashi.

11. When he thus passed his days in pursuit of pleasure, ever-renowned for her beauty, devoted to her husband, the fairest of the fair, Vapushtoma, having gained a desirable husband, pleased him with the excess of her love.

CHAPTER XLV.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. About this time, the great ascetic Jaratkaru, becoming a Fatra Shayan Ghriha, roamed over the world.

2. The greatly powerful Rishi roamed about, bathing in various sacred waters and practising various vows, difficult to be practised by others.

3. The Rishi lived on air and was completely free from all worldly desires, thus becoming daily lean and emaciated. Thus did he see his ancestors, hanging in the hole, their heads downwards,

4. By a cord of Virana roots, having only one thread entire. Even that one thread was gradually being eaten away by the rat, living in that hole.

5. They were in the hole without food; they were emaciated, pitiable and eagerly desirous of emancipation. Jaratkaru, in humble guise, came near these pitiable ones, and asked them,

6—7. "Who are you that are hanging by the cord of Virana roots,—of which the single weak root that is still left is gradually being eaten away by the rat that lives in this hole.

8. The little that remains of the single thread will soon be cut away. It is quite evident that you will then fall into the pit with your heads downwards.

9. I have been moved with pity, seeing that you hang with your faces downwards and that you are overtaken by a great calamity. What good can I do to you?

10. Tell me without delay whether your this great calamity can be relieved with a fourth, or a third or even a half of my this asceticism.

11. O relieve yourselves even with the whole of my asceticism. I consent to it. Do as you please.

The Ancestors said :—

12. O Venerable Brahmachari, you wish to relieve us. But, O best of the twice-born, you cannot relieve us with your asceticism.

13. O child, O best of speakers, we have also the fruits of our asceticism, but O Brahmana, we are falling down into this hell for the want of offspring.

14. The Grandsire has said, 'the offspring is the great Dharma.' O child, hanging as we are in this hole, our intellect has grown dim.

15. Therefore we cannot know you, although you are known for your greatness all over the world. You are venerable, you are of good fortune, you sorrowfully grieve for us.

16. Hear, O Brahmana, who we are, and for whom you are lamenting. We are Rishis of the name of Yayavara of rigid vows.

17. O Rishi, we have fallen from a holy region for want of offspring. Our great penances have not been destroyed, therefore, we have still one cord left (to hang from.)

18-19. We have only one thread (son) now, but it matters little whether he is or he is not. Unfortunate we are! We have a thread in one, known as Jaratkaru, well-read in the Vedas and Vedangas, who has adopted asceticism. He is high-souled, he has his senses under complete control, he is a man of rigid vows, a great ascetic.

20. But from his temptation for the merits of asceticism we have been reduced to this state. He has no wife and no son, no friend, no relatives.

21. This is the reason why we hang in this hole, our consciousness gone, like one having no one to look after. If you meet him, tell him out of kindness for us.

22. "Your ancestors are hanging in grief with their faces downwards. O holy man, take a wife and beget offspring.

23. O Rishi, O holy man, you are the only thread in the line of your ancestors." O Brahmana, the Virana root that you see and on which we hang,

24-25. Is the cord representing our race. O Brahmana, these threads of the Virana roots which yee see eaten up (by the rat) are we ourselves, who have been eaten up by Time. This root which you see half eaten,

26. And by which we are hanging in this hole is he who has adopted asceticism. The rat which you see is Time of infinite strength.

27. He (Time) is slowly killing the wretch Jaratkaru, engaged in asceticism, having been tempted by its merits but wanting in prudence and heart.

28. O excellent one, his asceticism cannot save us. The roots being torn, falling off from heavens, deprived of consciousness by Time.

29. Behold like sinful wretches we are going downwards. On our going with all our relatives down into this hole,

30. Eaten up by Time, he too will sink with us into hell. Whether it is asceticism, or sacrifice, or other holy acts,

31. O child, they are inferior and cannot be equal to a son. O child, seeing all this, tell every thing to the Rishi Jaratkaru.

32. O Brahmana, becoming our saviour, you should, out of kindness towards us, tell him in detail all that you have seen, so that it might induce him to take a wife and beget offspring.

33. O excellent man, who are you? You may be one of his friends, for you grieve for us like a friend and as one belonging to our race. We wish to hear who you are that stand before us.

Thus ends the forty fifth chapter Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XLVI.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. Having heard all this, Jaratkaru became exceedingly sorry. He spoke to the pitres in sorrow and his words were choked by tears.

Jaratkaru said :—

2. You are my fathers and grandfathers who are gone before. Tell me, therefore, what I can do for your welfare.

3. I am that Jaratkaru, your sinful son. I am a worthless man, a man of sinful deeds. Pray, punish me.

The Ancestors said :—

4. O son, you have come by good luck at this spot in your travel. O Brahamana, why have you not taken a wife?

Jaratkaru said :—

5. O Pitris, I have this desire always in my heart, that having kept my sexual passion under complete control, I shall take this body to the other world.

6. My mind is possessed with the idea that I must not take a wife. But having seen you, my sires, hanging like birds,

7. O grandfathers, my mind has been diverted from Brahmacharja. I shall certainly do your favourite work.

8—9. (I shall certainly marry), if I get a bride of my own name, who will bestow herself on me of her own accord, who will come to me as a gift, and whom I shall not have to maintain.

10. Otherwise I shall not marry. O grandsires, I speak to you the truth. The offspring that will be begotten on her shall be the means of your salvation, and O my fathers, you will then live for ever in blessed happiness and without the apprehension of a fall.

Souti said :—

11. The Rishi (Jaratakaru), having said all this to the ancestors, (left the place and) roamed over the world again. O Saunaka, although he grew old, he did not get a wife.

12. He was very sorry that he was not successful, but directed by his ancestors he continued the search. He went into the forest and wept aloud in grief.

13. Having gone into the forest, the wise Rishi, moved by the desire of doing good to his ancestors, said, "I shall ask for a bride, distinctly uttering the words thrice.

14. Whatever creatures are, mobile or immobile, visible or invisible, O you all, hear my words.

15. I am a man, engaged in severe penances, but my ancestors, afflicted with grief, have told me, "Get yourself married to beget a son."

16. Directed by my ancestors, I am roaming in poverty and sorrow all over the world for wedding a maiden whom I shall get as a gift.

17. Let any of those creatures, whom I (now) address, if he has a daughter, bestow her on me who am roving all over the world for a bride.

18. A bride, who bears the same name with me, who will be given to me as a gift, and whom I shall not have to maintain,—(If there is such a bride), O bestow her on me.

19. Thereupon those snakes, who had been appointed to watch Jaratkaru, knowing his intention, gave information to Vasuki.

20. The king of the snakes immediately went to the place where the Rishi was, taking with him his sister, decked with various ornaments.

21. O Brahmana, the king of the snakes Vasuki, having gone there, offered the maiden as a gift to that high-souled Rishi. But he did not at once accept her.

22. The Rishi, thinking her not to be of the same name with himself, and seeing also that the question of her maintenance was not settled, reflected for a while and hesitated to accept her.

23. O descendant of Vriṣṇu, he then asked Vasuki the name of the maiden, and he told him also,—“I shall not maintain her.”

Thus ends the forty sixth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XLVII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said:—

1. Thereupon Vasuki said to the Rishi Jaratkaru, "This maiden has the same name as yours. She is my sister and is an ascetic.

2. I shall support her, O best of Brahmanas and therefore accept her. O Rishi, I shall protect her with all my abilities. O best of Rishis, she has been brought up by me for you."

The Rishi said:—

3. It is settled between us that I shall not maintain this maiden and she will not do anything that would be displeasing to me. If she does, I shall leave her.

Souti said:—

4. When a promise was given by the snake that he would maintain his sister, Jaratkaru went to the house of the snake.

5. Thereupon the virtuous and veteran Rishi, learned in Mantras and observant of rigid vows, accepted her hands, given to him in due rites.

6. He then being much adored by the Rishis lived with his wife in the beautiful house set apart for him by the king of the snakes.

7. In that house was a bedsted covered with valuable coverlets. Jaratkaru slept (in that bedsted) with his wife.

8. The excellent man (Jaratkaru) made an agreement with his wife, saying "You should not do any thing or say any thing that will be displeasing to me."

9. I shall then leave you and no longer live in the house, if you do any such thing. Bear in mind these words that I have spoken.

10. The sister of the snake, in great anxiety and sorrow said, 'Be it so.'

11. The illustrious girl, moved by the desire of doing good to her relatives, served her husband of hard life with the means of Sweta Kakiya, (i.e. with the wakefulness of the dog, the timidity of the deer and the sharp instinct of crows to understand signs.)

12. One day the sister of Vasuki, when her season of impurity came, bathed according to custom, and went to the great Rishi, her husband.

13. Thereupon she became quick with child, and the embryo was like fire. It was greatly effulgent and was as resplendent as the god of fire himself.

14. It began to grow like the moon of the white fortnight. A few days after, the greatly famous Jaratkaru,

15. Placing his head on the lap of his wife, slept, looking like one fatigued. When the Brahmana was thus sleeping, the sun entered the summit of the western mountain.

16. O Brahmana, as the day was fading away, fearing the loss of (Jaratkaru's virtue, the excellent sister of Vasuki grew very anxious.

17. (She thought) "What shall I do now? Shall I wake my husband or shall I not? He leads a hard life, and he is virtuous. How can I act so that I may not offend him?"

18. On the one hand is his anger, and on the other is his loss of virtue. The loss of virtue is the greater evil of the two; this is my belief.

19. But if I wake him, he will surely be angry. If the time for prayer passes away (without his doing it,) he will certainly sustain the loss of virtue.

20.—21. Having thus thought over the matter, the sweet-voiced snake Jaratkaru, thus spoke to the Rishi, resplendent with asceticism and lying like a mass of flame, "O great Lord, arise, the sun is setting."

22. O illustrious man, O Rishi of rigid vows, perform your Sandha (prayer) after touching water. The time for Agnihotra has come. These moments are beautiful, and fearful also.

23. O Lord, the evening is now gently covering the western sky. Having been thus addressed, the illustrious great ascetic Jaratkaru,

24. His lips quivering in anger, spoke these words to his wife, "O snake, you have insulted me.

25—26. I shall no longer live with you. I shall go away whence I came. O lady of the snake-race, I know it for certain, the Sun has no power to set (at the usual time) if I remain asleep. A man cannot remain in the place where he is insulted,

27. Far less can remain a man like me, who am religious and those who are like me. Being thus addressed by her husband, the heart of the sister of Vasuki began to tremble (in fear).

28. She spoke to him, "O Brahmana, I have not waken you from any desire of insult.

29—30. I have done it lest your virtue suffer any loss." Thus being addressed by his wife, the great Rishi Jaratkaru,—possessed with anger and desirous of forsaking his wife, said to the snake, "O lady of the Naga race, I have never spoken a falsehood, therefore I shall go.

31. This was my agreement made with you and your brother. O amiable lady, I have passed happily with you. O fair lady, tell your brother,

32. When I am gone, that I have left you. On my going away, you should not grieve for me."

33—35. Having been thus addressed, the beautiful Jaratkaru, was filled with anxiety and sorrow. Her eyes were full of tears, her face was colourless with fear and her voice choked with sobs. She mustered courage, but her voice was trembling. She joined her hands and thus addressed the Rishi Jaratkaru, "O virtuous man, it is not proper for you to leave me.

36. You are always in virtue, so am I,—I am always engaged in doing good. O best of Brahmanas, the object for which I was bestowed on you,

37—38. Has not been as yet accomplished. Unfortunate am I! What shall I speak to Vasuki? O excellent Rishi, the son, desired by my relatives afflicted by their mother's curse, to be begotten by you on me, is not as yet born. The welfare of my relatives depends on the son begotten by you.

39. Moved by the desire of doing good to my race, so that my connection with you be fruitful, O Brahmana, I entreat you not to go away.

40. O excellent one, high-souled as you are, why should you leave me who have committed no fault? My conception is not yet apparent."

41. Thus addressed, the great ascetic Rishi spoke to his wife Jaratkaru, these words, proper and suitable to the occasion.

42. O fortunate lady, the being that is now in your womb, is like the god of fire himself. He is a Rishi, greatly virtuous and a master of the Veda and the Vedangas."

43. Having said this, the virtuous and great Rishi Jaratkaru went away, his heart firmly fixed on practising severest asceticism again.

Thus ends the forty seventh chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. O ascetic Rishi, as soon as her husband was gone, Jaratkaru went to her brother and told him all that had happened.

2. Hearing this greatly evil news, the king of the snakes spoke to his miserable sister, he being more miserable than she was.

Vasuki said :—

3. O amiable sister, you know the object for which you were bestowed (on the Rishi;) If a son be born for the good of the snake race,

4. That greatly powerful being will be able to save us from the Snake-sacrifice. The Grandsire told this to the celestials in olden times.

5. O Fortunate one, are you quick with child by that best of Rishis? My heart's desire is that my bestowal of you on that wise man may not be fruitless.

6. It is not proper for me to ask you such a question, but I ask you from the gravity of the matter.

7. Knowing that it is not possible to get back your husband, ever engaged in severe asceticism, I shall not follow him; he may curse me.

8. O amiable sister, tell me all that your husband has done, and thereby (relieve me by drawing out the terribly painful dart that is implanted in my heart.

9. Jaratkaru, having been thus addressed, consoled the king of the snakes, Vasuki and spoke thus.

Jaratkaru said :—

10. Asked by me about offspring, the high-souled great ascetic said, "It is there," and went away.

11. I do not remember him to have spoken a falsehood even in jest. O king, why should he then speak a falsehood in such a serious matters. He said,

12. "O Lady of the Naga race, do not grieve for the result of our union. A son will be born in you like a blazing fire.

13. O Brother, having said this, the Rishi, my husband, went away; therefore, let the great grief in your mind be removed.

Souti said :—

14. Having heard this, Vasuki, the king of the snakes, accepted the words of his sister, saying "Be it so."

15. O Brahmana, the best of the snakes then adored his sister with best regards, with fitting eulogies and gifts of wealth.

16. O Best of the twice born, the greatly powerful and effulgent embryo began to develop like the moon in the white fortnight.

17. O Brahmana, the sister of the snake in due time gave birth to a son with the splendour of a celestial boy, the destroyers of the fears of (the relatives of) his father and mother.

18. He grew up in the house of the king of the snakes. He studied the Vedas with their Angas from the great Rishi Chyavana, the son of Vrigu.

19. Though he was a mere boy, his asceticism was great; he was gifted with great intelligence and many virtues. He was known in the world by the name of Astika.

20. He was known by the name of Astika, because his father had gone away to the forest, saying Astika (one is there), when he was in his mother's womb.

21. Though he was only a boy, yet he was grave and intelligent. He was kept with great care in the palace of the snake-king.

22. He was like the illustrious lord of the celestials, Shulapani (Shiva). He grew up day by day to the infinite delight of all the snakes.

Thus ends the forty eighth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Para.

CHAPTER XLIX.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Saunaka said :—

1. Tell me again in detail all that king Janamejaya asked his ministers to say about his father's ascension to heaven.

Souti said :—

2. O Brahmana, hear all that the king asked his ministers and all that they said about the death of Parikshit.

Janamejaya said :—

3. You know all that happened to my father, and how my illustrious father met with his death.

4. Hearing from you all about my father, I shall do what is proper and good. I shall not do otherwise.

Souti said :—

5. Being asked by that high-souled king Janamejaya, the virtuous and wise ministers thus replied.

The Ministers said :—

6. Hear, O King, what you have asked. Hear an account of that king of the world, your illustrious father's life, and how he left this world.

7. Your father was virtuous, and noble, and a protector of his subjects. Hear, how that high-souled king conducted himself on earth.

8. That virtuous king, virtuously inclined, protected, like Virtue and Justice themselves, the four castes, keeping them in the duties of their respective orders.

9. Blessed with fortune and with matchless prowess, he protected the goddess earth. He hated none and had none to hate him.

10. Like Prajapati he looked at all creatures with equal eyes. The Brahmanas, Kshatryas, Vaisyas and Sudras,

11. Engaged in their respective duties, O king, were all impartially protected by him. He maintained widows, orphans, the maimed and the poor.

12. He was handsome, and was like a second Soma to all creatures. All were contended and blessed with good fortune by that truthful and greatly powerful king.

13. He was the disciple of Saradatwa in the science of arms. O Janamejaya, your father was the beloved of Govinda (Krishna).

14. He was the favourite of all men and was greatly renowned. He was born in the womb of Uttara when the Kuru race was almost destroyed.

15. Therefore the mighty son of Abhimanyu was called Parikshit. He was learned in the treatise on the duties of kings, and was adorned with all the noble qualities.

16. He had his passions under control, he was intelligent, he was gifted with great memory, he was practiser of all virtues, a conquerer of six passions, a greatly intelligent man, fully acquainted with the science of ethics.

17—18. Your father ruled over his subjects for sixty years. When he died, all the people were extremely sorry. After him, O best of men, you have acquired this hereditary kingdom of the Kurus, (who have been ruling over it) for the last thousand years. O protector of every creature, you were installed when you were a child.

Janamejaya said :—

19. None was born in our dynasty who did not look after the good of his subjects and who was not beloved by them. See specially the conduct of my grandfathers (five Pandava brothers) who were ever engaged in great deeds.

20. How did my such a noble father meet with his death? Describe it to me. I am desirous of hearing it.

Souti said :—

21. Thus asked by the king, the ministers, the well-wishers of the king, told him everything as it had happened.

The Ministers said :—

22—23. O king, that monarch, the lord of the world, greatly obedient to all Sastras like the first of all beings, became addicted to sports like the best of bow-men, the great warrior and exceedingly powerful Pandu. He made over to us all state affairs.

24. Once on a time he went into the forest and pierced a deer with an arrow. Having thus wounded the deer, he followed it armed with sword and quiver,

25. Alone on foot. But he could not, however, come upon that lost deer.

26. He, being sixty years old, and therefore fatigued and hungry, saw a great Rishi in that great forest.

27. The King accosted that Rishi, who was then observing the vow of silence, but the Rishi did not make any reply.

28. The fatigued and the hungry king grew angry with the Rishi who sat motionless as a piece of wood in observance of his vow of silence.

29. Knowing not that the Rishi was observing a vow of silence, your father, being angry, insulted him.

30. O excellent one of the Bharata race, he took up from the ground a dead snake with the end of his bow and placed it on the shoulder of that holy Rishi.

31. But that wise man did not speak a word, good or bad, and he did not become angry. He remained as he was, bearing the snake on his shoulder.

Thus ends the forty ninth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER L.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

The Ministers said :—

1. O king of kings, that tired and hungry monarch, having placed the snake on the shoulder of the Rishi, came back to his own capital.

2. The Rishi had a son, born of a cow, named Sringi. He was greatly renowned, exceedingly powerful, and greatly energetic and very wrathful.

3. He used to go to Brahma and worshipped him. Commanded by him, Sringi was one day returning home,

4—5. When he heard from his friend how his father had been insulted by your father. He heard that he was bearing on his shoulder a dead snake as motionless as a piece of wood, without doing any injury to the man who had insulted him thus.

6. O king, (he heard that your father had insulted the Rishi) who was a great ascetic, the best of Rishis, a controller of his passions, a pious and holy man, a doer of wonderful deeds, his soul enlightened with asceticism, and his senses and their functions under his complete control.

7. His practices were pious, his speeches pure. He was contented and had no avarice; he had not the least meanness, nor had he any avarice. He was old, and observant of the vow of silence.

8. And he was the refuge of all creatures. Such was the Rishi whom your father insulted. The son of that Rishi, however, cursed your father in anger.

9. Though that son of the Rishi was but a boy, he had the splendour of mature age. He speedily touched water and spoke thus in anger,

10—12. With reference to your father, burning as if in effulgence,—“Behold my ascetic powers. The angry and effulgent snake Takshaka, as spoken by me, will burn with his poison, within seven nights hence, the wretch who has placed a dead snake on the shoulder of my sire.” Having said this, he went to the place where his father was.

13. Seeing his father, he told him of the curse uttered by him. That best of Rishis sent to your father,

14. A well-mannered and virtuous disciple, named Gaurmukha. After having taken rest for a while, he (Gaurmukha) told every thing to the king (your father),

15. (Saying in the words of his preceptor) “O king, you have been cursed by my son. Takshaka will burn you with his poison. O great king, be careful.

16. O Janamejaya, your father, having heard these terrible words, took every precaution against the powerful snake Takshaka.

17. When the seventh day arrived, a Brahmana Rishi, named Kashyapa, wished to come to the king.

18. The king of the snakes, Takshaka, saw Kashyapa, and that king of the snakes asked that Brahmana, “Where are you going in a hurry? And what is your business for which you go?”

Kashyapa said :—

19. O Brahmana, I am going where the best of the Kurus, the king named Parikshit is. He will to-day be killed by the snake Takshaka.

20. I am going in a hurry to cure him, so that he, being treated by me, may not be killed by the snake.

Takshaka said :—

21.—22. O Brahmana, I am that very Takshaka. Why do you wish to revive the king bitten by me. Behold my wonderful power. You are incapable of reviving the king bitten by me.” Having said this, Takshaka there and then bit a lord of the forest (a banian tree).

23. The tree was reduced to ashes as soon as bitten by the snake; but, O king, Kashyapa, however, revived it.

24. Thereupon Takshaka, in order to tempt him, said, “Tell me what is your desire.” and Kashyapa replied to Takshaka,

25. “I am going there with the desire of (getting) wealth.” The illustrious Takshaka, (thereupon) told him in sweet words,

26. “O sinless one, take from me more wealth than you expect to get from that king. And then go back.”

27. The best of men, Kashyapa, being thus addressed by the snake, and having received from him as much wealth as he desired to get, went back.

28—29. When the Brahman went back, Takshaka went in disguise to that best of kings, your virtuous father, who was then staying with all precautions in his palace; and he burnt him with the fire of his poison. After this (most lamentable event,) you, O best of kings, were installed on the throne.

30. O best of kings, we have told you all that we saw and heard, though the account is terrible and cruel.

31. O best of kings, you have now heard how (your father) the great king of the world was killed, and how Rishi Uttanka was insulted, do what is proper.

Souti said :—

32. Thereupon the chastiser of foes, Janamejaya addressed all his ministers thus.

Janamejaya said :—

33—34. From whom have you heard this wonderful account of the lord of the forest, burnt to ashes by Takshaka, and revived again by Kashyapa? My father could not have certainly died were the poison neutralised by the Mantras of Kashyapa.

35. The sinful wretch, the worst of the snakes (Takshaka), thought in his mind,—If the Brahmana revives the king bitten by me,

36. “All the world will laugh at me saying, Takshaka had no poison any longer.” Certainly having thought so, he gratified the Brahmana.

37—38. I have, however, devised a means by which I shall punish him. I now wish to hear how you heard and how you saw what happened in the solitude of the forest,—especially the conversation between Takshaka and Kashyapa. Having heard this, I shall devise means for the destruction of the snakes.

The Ministers said :—

39. O king, hear from whom we heard the conversation between that king of the Brahmanas and the king of the snakes.

40. O king, a certain man had climbed that lord of the forest to collect its dry twigs for sacrificial fuel.

41. He was not seen by the Brahmana or the snake. O king, he too was reduced to ashes with the tree.

42. O king of kings, he was revived with the tree by the power of the Brahmana. That man, a servant of a Brahmana, came to us,

43. And told us in detail what happened between Takshaka and the Brahmana. O king, we are thus able to tell you what we saw or heard. O best of kings, having heard it, do what should be done now.

Souti said :—

44. Having heard the words of the ministers, the king Janamejaya began to weep in grief and squeezed his hands.

45. The lotus-eyed king breathed long and hot breaths ; the king shed tears and wept aloud.

46. The king, afflicted with grief and sorrow, shed tears, and touching water according to the form, thought for a while as if sifting something in his mind. Then addressing all his ministers, he said :—

Janamejaya said :—

47. I have heard your account of my father's ascension to heaven.

48—49. Know now what is my fixed resolve. No time should be lost to avenge the wretch Takshaka who killed my father. The wretch killed the king, making Sringsi a mere pretext.

50. Out of malignity alone he prevented Kashyapa from coming. If that Brahmana had come, my father would have certainly lived.

51. What harm could have possibly come to him if the king had revived by the grace of Kashyapa and the precautions taken by the ministers ?

52. He, being ignorant of my anger, prevented that best of Brahmanas, Kashyapa, from coming to my unconquerable father.

53. The aggression of the wretch Takshaka is great, for he gave wealth to the Brahmana, so that he might not revive the king.

54. I must avenge myself on my father's enemy, to please myself, to please Uttanka and you all.

Thus ends the fiftieth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LI.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued,

Souti said :—

1. The illustrious king having said so, the ministers expressed their approbation. The king expressed his determination of performing a Snake-sacrifice.

2. The Lord of the earth, the best of the Kurus, king (Janamejaya) the son of Parikshit, then called his priest and Ritwijas.

3. And that accomplished speaker spoke on the accomplishment of his great task. (He said), "I must avenge on that wretch Takshaka.

4—5. Tell me what I must do. Do you know any act by which I can throw Takshaka with all his friends and relatives in the blazing fire ? I want to burn that wretch of a snake as he burnt my father with his poison.

The Ritwijas said :—

6. O king, there is a sacrifice devised by the celestials for you. It is known as the Snake-sacrifice, and is spoken of in the Puranas.

7. O king, you alone can accomplish it, and no one else. The men, learned in the Puranas, have told us that there is such a sacrifice.

Souti said :—

8. O excellent one, thus addressed, that royal sage thought Takshaka already thrown into the blazing fire and burnt to ashes.

9. The king then told these Brahmanas, learned in Mantras, "I shall perform that sacrifice. Tell me the things that are necessary.

10. O best of Brahmanas, thereupon his wise Ritwijas, learned in the Sastras, measured, according to the ordinances, a piece of land for the sacrificial platform.

11—13. It was graced by the presence of holy Brahmanas ; it was decked with much valuable wealth ; it was full of wealth and paddy. On this sacrificial platform they according to rites installed the king in the Snake-sacrifice. But before the commencement of the sacrifice happened

14—15. An incident which foreboded a hinderance to it. For when the sacrificial platform was being built, a man, Suta by caste, well acquainted with the Puranas and learned in the art of masonry and of laying foundations, said.

" 16. The land in which the platform was made and the time when it was measured indicate that this sacrifice will not be completed. A Brahmana will be its cause."

17. Having heard this, the king, before he was installed in the sacrifice, ordered the gate keepers, saying, "None must be allowed to enter here without my permission."

Thus ends the fifty first chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER L II.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said :—

1—2. The Snake-sacrifice then began in due form. The sacrificial priests, expert in their respective duties according to the ordinance, their bodies with black garments, and their eyes red from the smoke, poured ghee in the blazing fire, uttering the Mantras.

3. Making the hearts of all the snakes tremble in fear, they began to pour ghee in the mouth of the Agni, uttering the names of the snakes.

4. Thereupon the snakes fell into the blazing fire one after another, each benumbed and crying piteously to one another.

5. Breathing hard, swelling to enormous sizes, intertwining one another with their heads and tails, they came in large numbers, and fell into the blazing fire.

6.—7. The white, the black, the blue, the old and the young, those measuring a cross those measuring a yoyana, and those measuring a gokarna, all fell violently into that blazing fire uttering various cries.

8. Hundreds and thousands, tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands came benumbed and perished on that occasion.

9. Amongst those that perished, there were some that were like the horse, some like the trunks of elephants, and others with the huge bodies and strength of mad elephants.

10. The snakes of various colours, and of virulent poison, of terrible look, like maces furnished with iron spikes, of enormous strength and of the greatest biting propensity, fell into the fire as the result of their mother's curse.

Thus ends the fifty-second chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER L III.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Saunaka said :—

1. Who were the great Rishis that became the Ritwijas in the Snake-sacrifice of the wise king Janamejaya of the Pandava dynasty ?

2. Who became the Sadashyas in that terrible Snake-sacrifice, so fearful to the snakes and so sorrowful to them ?

3. O child, you should describe all this in detail, so that, O Souti, we may know who were acquainted with the rituals of the Snake-sacrifice.

Souti said :—

4. I shall tell you the names of those wise men who became the Ritwijas and Sadashyas of the king.

5. The Brahmana, named Chandra Garva, born in the race of Chyavana, greatly illustrious and the foremost man amongst all the learned in the Vedas, became the Hota in that sacrifice.

6. The learned old Brahmana, Kautsa became the Udgata, Jaimini became the Brahman, Sranagarava and Pingala became the Adhvaryus.

7—9. Vyasa with his son and disciple, Uddalaka, Pramataka, Swetaketu, Pingala Asita, Devala, Narada, Parvata, Atriya, Kundajathara, Kalaghata, Vatsya, old Srutasrava, ever engaged in Japa and the study of the Vedas, Kohala, Devasarmana, Maudgalya, Samasaurava.

10. These and many others, who were vastly learned in the Vedas, became the Sadashyas in the sacrifice of the son of Parikshit.

11. When the Ritwijas began to pour ghee on the fire in that Snake-sacrifice, fearful snakes, striking fear into every creature, began to fall into its fire.

12. The fat and the marrow of the snakes, thus burnt in the sacrificial fire, flowed like rivers, and the whole atmosphere was filled with an insufferable stench, owing to this continual burning of the snakes.

13. Incessant were the piteous cries of the snakes that fell into the fire, and of those that were in the air about to fall into it.

14. In the meanwhile, as soon as Takshaka heard that Janamejaya had been installed in the sacrifice, he, the king of snakes, went to Indra.

15. That best of snakes told every thing to Indra and having acknowledged his fault, asked his protection in fear,

16. Indra, being much pleased, told him, "O Takshaka, O king of the snakes, you have nothing to fear here from the snake-sacrifice.

17. The Grandfather was pacified by me for your sake. Therefore, you have no fear. Drive away this fever of fear from your mind."

18. Thus being encouraged by him, the best of snakes, Takshaka, lived in Indra's abode in joy and happiness.

19—20. Here did Vasuki become exceedingly sorry, seeing that the snakes were continually falling into the fire and that his race had been reduced to only a few. That best of the snakes were confounded with grief and thus spoke to his sister,

21. "O amiable sister, my body is burning. I can no longer see the points of the heavens. I am about to fall owing to the loss of consciousness. My mind is whirling.

22. My sight is failing, my heart is trembling. Being benumbed, I may fall into the blazing fire (of the sacrifice) to-day.

23. This sacrifice of the son of Parikshit is begun for the extermination of our race. It is evident I also shall have (soon) to go to the land of the dead.

24. That time has come, O sister, for which I bestowed you on the Rishi Jaratkaru; O sister, protect us with all our race.

25. O best of the women of the snake race, Astika will put an end to this sacrifice which is being performed. The Grandsire himself told me this in time gone by.

26. Therefore, O sister, ask your dear son, who is exceedingly learned in the Vedas and respected even by the old, to protect me and those dependent on me.

Thus ends the fifty third chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LIV.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. The snake-lady, Jaratkaru, then calling her son, told him what was spoken to her by Vasuki, the king of the Nagas.

2. (She said) "O son, the time has come for the accomplishment of that object for which I was bestowed by my brother on your father. Therefore, do what is needful."

Astika said :—

3. For what object, O mother, were you bestowed by my uncle on my father? Tell me all, so that I may do what is proper.

Souti said :—

4. Jaratkaru, the sister of the snake-king, ever desirous to do good to her race and much moved by the general distress said,

Jaratkaru said :—

5. O son, the mother of all the snakes was Kadru. Hear, why she cursed her sons in anger.

6—7. Addressing her sons she said, "As you have refused to change the color of Uchaisrava, the king of horses, thus making me a slave to Vinata according to the wager, the god of fire will consume you all in the sacrifice of Janamejaya. Thus being killed, you will go to the land of the dead.

8. The Grandsire of all creatures approved her curse, and when she was uttering it, he said, "Be it so."

9. O child, Vasuki, having heard this curse and the words of the Grandsire, sought the protection of the celestials after the completion of the churning of the ocean.

10. The celestials, having their object gained, for they had obtained the excellent Ambrosia, came to the Grandsire, placing their brother (Vasuki) at the head.

11. All the celestials, with the snake-king Vasuki, tried to induce the great Diety, born of the lotus to grace in a way so that the curse might be made futile.

The Celestials said :—

12. O lord, the king of the snakes; Vasuki, is sorry for his relatives. How may his mother's curse be made futile?

Bramha said :—

13. Jaratkaru will marry a wife named Jaratkaru. That Brahmana, who will be born of her, will save the snakes.

Jaratkaru said :—

14. The best of snakes, Vasuki, having heard this, O illustrious son, bestowed me on your noble father, long before the commencement of this sacrifice.

15. As the result of that marriage, you were born of me. That time has now come. You should now protect us from this danger.

16. You should protect my brother and myself from the fire, so that the object (our protection) for which I was bestowed on your wise father, may not remain unfulfilled. O my son, what do you think (proper now)?

Souti said :—

17. Thus addressed, Astika said to his mother, "Yes, I will (save the snakes)." He then addressed Vasuki, thereby infusing life unto him, and said,

18. "O Vasuki, the best of snakes, I shall protect you. I tell you truly that I shall relieve you from the curse.

19. O snake, be at your ease. There is no longer any fear. I shall try my utmost to do you good.

20—21. None can say that my words even in jest have ever been false,—not to speak of my words on serious occasions. O uncle, going to that best of kings, Janamejaya, now installed in the sacrifice, I shall please him with words mixed with blessings, so that, O excellent one, that king will refrain from the sacrifice.

22. O king of the snakes, O high-minded one, believe all I say. Believe me, my resolve can never remain unfulfilled.

Vasuki said :—

23. O Astika, being afflicted with my mother's curse my head is whirling, my heart is breaking. I cannot see the points of the heavens.

Astika said :—

24. O best of snakes, you should not grieve any longer. I shall dispell your fear of the blazing fire.

25. I shall extinguish this (fire), this terrible punishment,—blazing as the fire of the end of the Yuga. You should not entertain any fear any longer.

Souti said :—

26—27. In order to save the king of the snakes, the best of Brahmanas, Astika, dispelling the terrible fever of Vasuki's heart, and taking it as it were upon himself, went with speed to the sacrifice of Janamejaya which was adorned with all merits.

28. Having gone there, Astika saw the excellent Yagma place, full of numerous Sadashyas, as effulgent as the sun or Agni.

29. But the best of Brahmanas, (Astika) was denied admittance by the door-keepers; and the mighty ascetic, wishing to enter into the (enclosed sacrificial place), pleased them (with blessings and sweet words.)

30. Thus having entered the excellent sacrificial place, that best of Brahmanas, the foremost of all virtuous men, began to adore the king of illustrious deeds, the Ritwijas, the Sadashyas and the sacred fire.

Thus ends the fifty fourth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LV.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Astika said :—

1. O son of Parikshit, O best of the Bharata race, Soma, Varuna and Prajapati performed sacrifices at Prayaga in the days of yore, but your sacrifice, is in no way inferior to them. Blessing be upon those who are dear to us!

2. O son of Parikshit, O best of the Bharata race, Indra performed one hundred sacrifices, but your sacrifice, is fully equal to his sacrifice. Blessings be upon those who are dear to us!

3. O son of Parikshit, O best of the Bharata race, your this sacrifice is like the sacrifices of Yama, Harimedha, and king Rantideva. Blessings be upon those who are dear to us!

4. O son of Parikshit, O best of the Bharata race, your this sacrifice is like the sacrifices of Goya, king Sashavindu, and king Visravana. Blessings be upon those who are dear to us—

5. O son of Parikshit, O best of the Bharata race, your this sacrifice is like the sacrifices of Nriga, Ajameda, and (Rama) the son of Dasaratha. Blessings be upon those who are dear to us!

6. O son of Parikshit, O best of the Bharata race, your this sacrifice is like the sacrifice of king Yudhisthira, the son of a deity and a descendant of Ajameda race, famous even in heavens. Blessings upon those who are dear to us!

7. O son of Parikshit, O best of the Bharata race, your this sacrifice is like the sacrifice of Krishna Dwaipayana, the son of Satyavati, in which he himself acted as the chief priest. Blessings be upon those who are dear to us!

8. These (learned men), that are sitting here, are as effulgent as the sun, and they make your this sacrifice like the sacrifice of the slayer of Vitra (Indra). There is nothing for them to know, and gifts made to them become inexhaustible.

9. There is not a Ritwija in all the worlds equal to your Ritwija Dwaipayana. His disciples, becoming Ritwijas, competent in their duties, travel over the earth.

10. The noble bearer of libations, Viva-vasu and Chitravanu (Fire), having gold for his vital seed and black smokes on its way, carries these your libations of ghee to the celestials.

11. There is no other king in this world equal to you in protecting his subjects. I am well pleased with your continual abstinence. You are either Varuna, Yama or Dharmaraja.

12. You are the protector of all creatures in this world, like Indra himself, thunder-bolt in hand. There is no man in this world so great as you. There is no king who is your equal in sacrifices.

13. You are like Khalwanga, Nobhaga, and Deelip. You are like Jayati and Mandhata in prowess. You are equal to the sun in splendour. O royal sage of excellent vows, you are like Bhishma.

14. You are like Valmiki of power concealed. Like Vasishtha you have controlled your anger. Your sovereignty is like that of Indra and your splendour like that of Narayana.

15. You are learned in the administration of justice like Yama, and you are adorned with all qualifications like Krishna. You are the home of the wealth that belongs to the Vasus, you are the main-spring of all sacrifices.

16. You are equal to Damvodvava in strength, you are learned both, in Sastras and arms like Parasurama. You are equal to Aurva and Trita in strength. You inspire terror with your looks like Vagiratha.

Souti said:—

17. Having thus adored them, Astika gratified and pleased them all, the king, the Sadashyas, the Ritwijus and the sacrificial fire. And king Janamejaya, seeing the signs and indications manifested on all sides, addressed them thus.

Thus ends the fifty-fifth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LVI.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Janamejaya said:—

1. Though this (Rishi) is but a boy, he speaks like a wise old man. He is not a boy; I think he is wise and old. I wish to bestow on him a boon. Therefore, O Brahmanas, give me necessary permission.

The Sadashyas said:—

2. A Brahmana, though he may be a boy, deserves the respect of kings,—more so if he is learned. This boy deserves to have his all desires fulfilled, but not before Takshaka is here with all speed.

Souti said:—

The king, being willing to grant a boon to the Brahmana boy, said, "Ask from me a boon." The Hota, being rather displeased at this, said, "Takshaka has not as yet come to this sacrifice.

Janamejaya said:—

4. Try your best to bring this my sacrifice to a successful completion; exert your might, so that Takshaka may come here without further delay. He is my enemy.

The Ritwijus said:—

5. O king, Takshaka is now living in fear in the abode of Indra. The Sastra declares this to us, and the Fire also says it.

Souti said:—

6. The illustrious Suta, Lohitakshya, well-versed in the Puranas, had also said this before. Asked by the king again on this occasion, he told him what he said before.

7. (He said), "O king, what the Brahmanas have said is true. Knowing as I do the Puranas, I say, O king, Indra has granted him a boon, saying, 'Live here in concealment and fire will not be able to burn you.'"

8. Having heard this, the king, installed in the sacrifice, became very sorry and urged the Hota to do his duty. He too, with Mantras, began to pour the ghee into the fire. Thereupon Indra himself came to the place.

9. The illustrious god came on his car, adored and worshipped by all the celestials standing around his chariot, and entertained by masses of clouds, celestial singers and various classes of celestial dancing girls.

10. The snake (Takshaka), however, kept himself hidden within the garments of Indra. Thereupon the king, being desirous of the destruction of Takshaka, spoke to his Mantra-knowing Brahmanas thus,—

Janamejaya said:—

11. O Brahmanas, if Takshaka be in the abode of Indra, throw him into the fire with Indra also.

Souti said:—

12. Thus urged by king Janamejaya (to destroy Takshaka), the Hota again and again poured libations (into the fire), calling the snake (Takshaka) by name who was then staying there (hidden within the garments of Indra.)

13. As the libations were continually poured into the fire, Takshaka with Indra, anxious and afflicted, became visible in a moment in the sky.

14. Having seen that sacrifice, Indra was filled with fear, and casting off Takshaka, he hastened back to his own abode.

15. On the departure of Indra, the king of snakes, Takshaka, insensible with fear, was brought near the sacrificial fire by virtue of the Mantras.

The Ritwijās said :—

16. O king of kings, O Lord, your this act (sacrifice) is being properly performed. It is now proper for you to grant a boon to this best of Brahmanas (Astika).

Janamejaya said :—

17. O immeasurable one, you are of such child-like and handsome features, that I desire to bestow upon you a worthy boon. Therefore, ask that which you desire in your heart to possess. I promise you, I will grant it if it be even ungrantable.

The Ritwijās said :—

18. O king, behold, Takshaka has come under your control. His terrible cries and loud roars are heard.

19. The snake has been forsaken by the wielder of thunder-bolt (Indra). His body has been disabled by our Mantras. (Behold), he is falling from the heavens, (behold) the king of snakes, deprived of his consciousness, comes rolling in the sky breathing loudly.

Souti said :—

20. When the king of snakes, Takshaka, was at the point of falling into the sacrificial fire,—within that very short moment,—Astika spoke thus,—

Astika said :—

21. O Janamejaya, if you will at all grant me a boon,—let your this sacrifice be stopped, and let no more snakes fall into the fire.

Souti said :—

22. O Brahmana, the son of Parikshit, having been thus addressed, became exceedingly sorry and spoke to Astika thus,

Janamejaya said :—

23. O illustrious man, I shall give you gold, silver, kine, or whatever else you desire to possess. But let not my this sacrifice be stopped.

Astika said :—

24. O king, I do not ask from you gold, silver or kine. Let your this sacrifice be stopped, so that my maternal relatives are saved.

Souti said :—

25. Thus addressed by Astika, the son of Parikshit (Janamejaya,) again and again said to that best of speakers, Astika,

26. "O best of the best Brahmanas, O blessed one, O illustrious man, ask some other boon." But, O descendant of the Vrigu race, he did not ask any other boon.

27. Thereupon, all the Sadashyas, learned in the Vedas, told the king in one voice, "Let the Brahmana receive the boon (asked by him.)"

Thus ends the fifty-sixth chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LVII.

(ASTIKA PARVA.)—Continued.

Saunaka said :—

1. O son of Suta, I desire to hear the names of those snakes, that fell into the fire of the Snake-sacrifice.

Souti said :—

2. O best of the twice-born, they were many thousands, tens of thousands and millions and billions; so great was their number that I am unable even to count them.

3. As far as I remember, hear, I shall mention the names of the principal snakes that fell into the fire.

4. Hear first the names of the chief ones of Vasuki's family, they were of colour, blue, red, and white; they were of terrible forms, huge bodies, and dreadful poisons.

5—6. Helpless and miserable, affected with their mother's curse, they all fell into that sacrificial fire as libations of Ghee. (They were) Kotisa, Manasa, Purna, Sala, Pala, Halimaka, Pichchhala, Kaunapa, Sakra, Kalavega Prakalana, Hiranyavahu, Carana Kakshaka, and Kaladantaka.

7. These are the snakes, born of Vasuki, that fell into the fire. O Brahmana, numerous other fearful and powerful snakes, born in the family of Takshaka, were burnt in the blazing fire. Hear, I shall mention their names now.

8—11.—Pachandaka, Mandalaka, Pindasektri, Ravenaka, Uchchika, Sarava, Bhangas, Vilewateyas, Virohana, Cili, Kalakara, Muka, Sukumara, Pravepana, Mudgara, Cisuroman, Soroman and Mahahanu.

12. These snakes, born of Takshaka, fell into the fire. Parvata, Parijata, Pandara, Harina, Krishna, Vihanga, Sarabha, Meda, Promoda, Canhatapan—these, born in the family of Airavata, fell into the fire.

13—14. Now hear, O best of Brahmanas, the names of the snakes, born in the family of Kauravya, that I mention. Eraka, Kundala Veni, Vinishandha, Kumaraka, Vahuka, Sringavera, Dhurtaka, Pratar, and Ataka,—these, born in the Kauravya family, fell into the fire.

15. Now hear, O Brahmana, I mention those born in the family of Dhritarashtra,—they were all exceedingly powerful, as swift as the wind and full of virulent poison.

16—19. Sankakarna, Pitharaka, Kuthara Sukhana, Shechaka, Purnaughada, Purnamukha, Prahasa, Sukuni, Dari, Amahatha, Kamathaka, Sushena, Manasa, Vyaya, Vairava, Mandavedanga, Pishanga, Uduparuka, Rishaba, Vegabata, Pindaruka, Mahahanu, Raktanga, Sarvasaranga, Samridha, Patha, Vasaka, Varahaka, Viranaka, Suchitta Chitravegika, Parashara, Tarunka, Maniskandha, and Aruni.

20. O Brahmana, thus have I recited the names of the chief snakes, all famous for their great deeds. I have not been able to mention all, their number being countless.

21. I am unable to mention the names of the sons of these, and again the sons of their sons that fell into the blazing fire. They are countless.

22. Some of them had three heads, some seven, and some ten. They had poison like the fire at the end of the Yuga, and they were all terrible in appearance.

23. They had huge bodies, and great speed, they were as tall as mountain peaks. Some of them were as long as a Yama, some a yoyana and some two yoyanas.

24. They were capable of assuming any form at will, and of mustering any strength at will,—they had the poison like the blazing fire, (such were the snakes that) that were burnt in the great sacrifice, affected by Brahma's punishment, (their mother's curse.)

Thus ends the fifty-seventh chapter, Astika, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LVIII.

(ASTIKA PARVA).—Continued.

Souti said :—

1. Now hear, (I shall mention) another wonderful incident in connection with Astika. When the son of Parikshit, the king (Janamejaya) was about to grant the boon (to Astika),

2. The snake, (Takshaka) though thrown off from Indra's hands, remained in the air without falling. Thereupon, king Janamejaya became thoughtful,

3. For Takshaka, though benumbed with fear, did not at once fall into the fire, although libations were poured into the blazing sacrificial fire in his name and in the proper form.

Saunaka said :—

4. O Suta, were not the Mantras of those wise Brahmanas propitious? Why did not Takshaka fall into the fire?"

Souti said :—

5. Astika had said thrice, "Stay, stay, stay," to the unconscious Takshaka, the best of snakes, when he was cast off from Indra's hands.

6. And afflicted with grief he remained in the sky like a person who hang between the heaven and the earth.

7. Being again and again urged by his Sudashyas, the king said, "Let it be done as asked by Astika.

8. Let the sacrifice be stopped, let the snakes be saved, let this Astika be gratified, and let the words of the Suta be true."

9—10. When the boon was granted to Astika, loud acclamations of joy rose into the sky, and the sacrifice of the son of Parikshit, the king of the Pandava dynasty, came to an end. And king Janamejaya of the Bharata race was much pleased with himself.

11. The king bestowed money by hundreds and thousands on the Ritwijas and Sadashyas and on all that were present there (in that great sacrifice).

12—13. And he bestowed much wealth on Suta Lohitaksha, who was learned in the science of masonry and foundations, and who had said at the very commencement of the Snake-sacrifice that a Brahmana would be the cause of its interruption. He gave him various things,—food and wearing apparel.

14. The king of immeasurable kindness was thus much pleased, and he concluded the sacrifice according to the rites of the ordinance.

15. He sent back home in much joy the wise Astika, whom he treated with every respect. He too was exceedingly pleased, because his object was attained.

16. The king said to him, "You must come again to become a Sadashya in my great Horse-sacrifice."

17. And Astika replied, "Yes." He then returned home in great joy, having achieved his great object, by pleasing the king.

18. Having returned in great joy to his uncle and mother, he touched their feet and told them all that had happened.

19. Having heard all he said, those snakes, that assembled there, were much delighted, and their fear was dispelled. They were greatly pleased with Astika and insisted him to ask a boon.

20. They all again and again asked him, "O learned one, what good can we do to you? We are exceedingly pleased with you, for we have been all saved by you. O child, (tell us) what can we do for you?"

Astika said :—

21. Let those Brahmanas, and other men, who will cheerfully and with attention read this sacred account of my this act, have no fear from you."

22. They said in joy, "O nephew, as regards the boon asked by you, let it be exactly as you say. O nephew, we shall all cheerfully do what you ask us to do.

23. Those that will recall to their minds, Asita, Astiman, and Sunitha, in the day or in the night, will have no fear from snakes.

24. He will have no fear from snakes, who will say,—'Astika, the son of Jaratkaru, born of Jaratkaru,—Astika who saved the snakes from the Snakes-sacrifice.—I recall him to my mind. Therefore, O illustrious snakes, you should not bite me.

25. O blessed snake, go away,—go away, O snake of virulent poison. Remember the words of Astika spoken after the Snake-sacrifice of Janamejaya."

26. Having heard the words of Astika mentioned, the snake, that will not cease to bite, will have his hood divided into one hundredfold like the fruit of Singsha tree."

Souti said :—

27. Thus addressed by the chief snakes, that best of Brahmanas, (Astika), was very much pleased, and the illustrious (boy) then thought of going away.

28. That virtuous and the best of the twice born, having thus saved the snakes from the Snake-sacrifice, died at the proper time, leaving sons and grandsons behind him.

29. Thus have I narrated to you the history of Astika, exactly as it happened,—a history, which if narrated, dispells all fear of snakes.

30. O Brahamana, O best of the Vrigu-race, as your ancestor Pramati had gladly narrated it to his enquiring son Ruru,

31. And as I heard it (from my father), I have narrated this blessed history of the learned As.ika from the beginning (to the end.)

32. O Brahman, O chastiser of foes, (now you have) heard this sacred history of Astika,—a history which increases virtue,—and which you asked me to narrate after hearing the story of the Dunduva, let now your great curiosity be satisfied.

Thus ends the fifty-eighth chapter, Snake-sacrifice, and thus ends the Astika Parva in the Adi Parva of the blessed Mahabharata.

CHAPTER LIX.

(ADIVANSABATARANA PARVA.)

Saunaka said :—

1. O child, O Souti, you have narrated to me this great and extensive history of the Vrigu race from the birth of Vrigu. I am much pleased with you.

2—3. O son of Suta, I ask you now to recite to me that wonderful and varied narrations composed by Vyasa, which were recited by the illustrious Sadashyas in the intervals of the long-extending ceremony (Snake-sacrifice).

4. O son of Suta, I wish to learn from you the object of those narrations. Therefore, recite them to me in full.

Souti said :—

5. The Brahmanas spoke of many things, founded on the Vedas, in the intervals of their duties, but Vyasa recited the wonderful and great history, called the Bharata.

Saunaka said :—

6.—7. I desire to hear that sacred history, called Mahabharata, that spreader of the fame of the Pandavas, which Krishna Dwai-payana, asked by Janamejaya, caused to be duly recited in the intervals of the sacrifice.

8. It was born in the ocean-like mind of the great Rishi of purified soul. O best of men, recite it to me, for, O son of Suta, my thirst has not been appeased by all that you have narrated.

Souti said :--

9. I shall recite from the beginning the great and excellent history, called Mahabharata, composed by Krishna Dwaipayana.

10. Listen to it in full, O Brahmana, as I recite it. I myself feel a great pleasure in reciting it.

Thus ends the fifty-ninth chapter, Adivansabatarna, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LX.

(ADIVANSABATARANA PARVA.)

Continued,

Souti said :—

1. Having heard that Janamejaya had been installed in the Snake-sacrifice, the learned Rishi Krishna Dwaipayana went there.

2. The grandfather of the Pandavas, (Krishna Dwaipayana) was born in an island of the Yamuna, in the womb of the maiden Kali by Sakti's son Parasara.

3. As soon as born, the illustrious man developed his body by his will alone, and mastered the Vedas and the Vedangas and all the histories.

4. He achieved that which could not be achieved by asceticism, or by the study of the Vedas, by vows, by fasts, by progeny or by sacrifice.

5. The best of the best Veda-knowing men first divided the Vedas into four parts. He was a great Brahma-knowing Rishi, a great poet, a truthful man, a holy ascetic.

6. That great Rishi of sacred deeds and great fame, in order to continue the line of Santanu begot Pandu, Dhritarashtra and Vidura.

7. This illustrious man accompanied by his disciple, learned in the Vedas and the Vedangas, entered the sacrificial grounds of the royal sage Janamejaya.

8. He saw there seated king Janamejaya surrounded by his numerous Sadashyas like a Indra surrounded by the celestials.

9. He was surrounded by kings of various countries who had undergone the sacred baths and by competent Ritwijas, like Brahma, himself all seated comfortably in the sacrificial grounds.

10. The best of the Bharata race, the royal sage Janamejaya, seeing the Rishi approaching, advanced quickly in great joy with all his relatives and followers.

11. The king, with the approval of the Sadashyas, offered a golden seat to the Rishi as did Indra to (his preceptor) Vrihaspati.

12. When the boon-granting and the adored of the celestials, the Rishis (Vyasa) took his seat, the king of kings (Janamejaya) worshiped him according to the ordinances.

13. The king then offered to his grandfather Krishna (Dwaipayana) in due form water to wash his feet and mouth, Argha and kine.

14. Vyasa was much pleased on accepting the offerings from the Pandava Janamejaya, and he ordered that the kine should not be slaughtered.

15. Thus having worshipped him the king bowed to his greatest grandfather. And having seated himself in joy, he asked him about his welfare.

16. The illustrious Rishi also looked (graciously) at him and asked him about his welfare. He then worshipped the Sadashyas who had already worshipped him.

17. Thereupon with joined hands, Janamejaya, with all his Sadashyas, addressed the best of the Brahmanas (Vyasa) thus :—

Janamejaya said :—

18. O Brahmana, you saw with your own eyes the great deeds of the Kurus and the Pandavas. I desire to hear them narrated by you.

19—20. What was the cause of the quarrel between them? They were all of great deeds and virtuous mind. Why did that great battle, which was the cause of the death of countless men, occur among my grandfathers, their sense being (surely) overclouded by Fate? O best of Brahmanas, tell me all this in full as they happened.

Souti said :—

21. Having heard these words of Janamejaya, Krishna Dwaipayana addressed his disciple Vaishampayana, seated by his side saying,—

Vyasa said :—

22. Repeat, exactly as you heard from me the account of the quarrel between the Kurus and the Pandavas of old.

Souti said :—

23. That best of Brahmanas, (Vaishampayana), having been thus commanded by his preceptor, recited the whole of that old history,

24. To the king, to the Sadashyas, and to all the chiefs and potentates present there.

He told them all about the quarrel and the utter extinction of the Kurus and the Pandavas.

Thus ends the sixtieth chapter, Adivansabatarana, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XLI.

(ADIVANSABATARANA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1-2. Bowing down first to my preceptor with the eight parts of my body touching the ground, and then worshipping with devotion, reverence and singleness of mind all the Brahmanas and learned men (present here), I shall now recite in full the narration, I heard from the best of intelligent men, the high-souled great Rishi, Vyasa.

3. O king, you are a proper person to hear the history of Bharata. I feel no fear to perform this great act (reciting the Bharata,) encouraged as I am by my preceptor.

4. Hear, O king, why the quarrel between the Kurus and the Pandavas occurred and how occurred the exile (of the Pandavas) as the result of the game at dice, prompted by the desire of the Kurus to gain the kingdom,

5. And how the battle was fought to exterminate all men. O best of the Bharata race, I shall relate all this to you as you ask me.

6. On the death of their father, these heroes (the Pandavas) came back to their own home from the forest. They became experts in the science of archery within a very short time.

7. The Kauravas became jealous of the Pandavas, who were all gifted with great physical strength, energy, and power of mind. They were also very popular with the citizens.

8. Thereupon, the wicked-minded Duryodhana, with Karna and the son of Suvala, (Sakuni), tried to banish them, and persecuted them in various ways.

9. The wicked-minded Duryodhana, guided by that bird of the evil omen, (Sakuni), persecuted the Pandavas by various means in order to have the undisputed possession of the kingdom.

10. That wretch of the son of Dhritarastra gave poison to Bhima with his food, but that hero digested it.

11. That wretch one day bound the sleeping Bhima on the bank of the Ganges.

and throwing him into the water, went away.

12. But when the strong-armed Bhima, the son of Kunti, awoke, he tore up the strings with which he was bound, and his pains were all gone.

13. While asleep, he was caused to be bitten in every part of his body by black snakes of virulent poisons, but that chastiser of foes did not still perish.

14. In all these various persecutions of the Pandavas by the Kurus, the high-souled Vidura was always engaged in counter-acting their evil designs and in saving the persecuted Pandavas.

15. As Indra keeps the heavens and earth in happiness, so did Vidura always keep the Pandavas in happiness.

16—17.—When Duryodhana found himself incapable of destroying the Pandavas who were protected by Fate and kept alive for graver objects, by various secret and open means he called together his councillors, Karna, Dushyasana and others. He then caused a house of lac to be built with the knowledge of Dhritarastra.

18. That king, the son of Ambika, (Dhritarastra), out of affection for his sons and being tempted by the desire of sovereignty, sent them (the Pandavas) to exile.

19. They (the Pandavas) went away with their mother from Hastinapur, and when they went away, the son of the Vaisya woman (Vidura) became the adviser of those illustrious men.

20. Being saved through him from the house of lac, they fled at the dead of night to a deep forest. They, the sons of Kunti, came to a city, called Varanavata ;

21. And those chastisers of foes, those illustrious men, lived there with their mother in the house of lac, as commanded by Dhritarastra.

22. They lived in the house for one year, watchfully protecting themselves from Purochana. In the meantime they dug a subterranean passage according to the directions of Vidura.

23. They then set fire to the house of lac and burnt Purochana. They, those chastisers of foes, then fled with their mother in anxiety and in fear.

24—25. They saw, near a fountain in the forest, a fearful Rakshasa named Hirimba. They killed that king of Rakshasas. They, the sons of Pritha, afraid of the sons of Dhritarastra, then fled in the darkness, so that they might not run the risk of being seen by any body. Here did Bhima acquire Hirimba of whom Ghatatkacha was born.

26. The Pandavas of rigid vows, learned in the Vedas, then came to a place, called Ekchakra, and lived there as Brahmacharies.

27. They, those best of men, with their mother lived there for some time in the house of a Brahmana, in temperance and in abstinence.

28. It was here that the mighty-armed Bhima met with a greatly powerful, and hungry man-eating Rakshasa, named Vaka.

29. The best of men, the son of Pandu, Bhima, soon killed him with the strength of his arms, and thus made the citizens safe and fearless.

30. They then heard of the Sayamvara of Krishna, (Draupadi) the daughter of the king of Panchala. Having heard it, they went there and obtained her.

31. Having obtained Draupadi, they lived there for a year. And then those chastisers of foes, having been known, went back to Hastinapur.

32. They were then told by the son of Santanu, king Dhritarastra, as follows:— "O dear children, so that dissensions may not take place among you all brothers and cousins, 33—35. We have settled that Khandavaprastha will be your abode. Therefore, casting of all jealousies go to live at Khandavaprastha, which contains many towns and broad roads, " Having heard these words, they (the Pandavas), with all their friends and followers, went to Khandavaprastha, taking with them many jewels and precious stones. And the sons of Pritha lived there for many years.

36. They brought by the force of their arms many chiefs and potentates under their subjugation. Setting their hearts on virtue and firmly adhering to truth,

37. Being unexcited by wrath, being calm in demeanour, and putting down numerous evils, the Pandavas gradually rose in power. The greatly illustrious Bhima subjugated the East.

38. The heroic Aryuna conquered the North; Nakula the West and the slayer of heroic foes, Sahadeva, the South.

39. Having done this their kingdom extended over the whole world. Each like a sun in splendour, they looked like five suns;

40-41. And the earth appeared to have six suns on account of the presence of the heroic Pandavas. Then for some reasons the just king Yudhisthira sent to the forest his greatly powerful and heroic brother Shabyashachi (Aryuna), dearer to him than life itself.

42. That best of men, the self-controlled and virtuous (Aryuna) lived in the forest for eleven years and ten months.

43. Thus roving about in many places, on one occasion, he went to Krishna in Dwarka and he obtained there for his wife the lotus-eyed,

44. And sweet-speached younger sister of Krishna, named Suvadra. Like Sachi with the great Indra and like Lakshmi with Krishna,

45—46. Suvadra was much pleased to be united with Aryuna, the son of Pandu. O best of kings, the son of Kunti with Krishna then gratified Agni by giving him the Khandava to burn. The task did not at all appear heavy to Aryuna, assisted as he was by Krishna,

47. As nothing is a heavy task to Vishnu, in the matter of destroying his enemies. Agni gave to the son of Pritha the excellent bow Gandiva,

48. An inexhaustible quiver, and one warchariot, bearing an ape as its standard. On this occasion did Aryuna rescue the frightened great Asura Moya.

49. And he (Moya) built the beautiful assembly-room, adorned with all sorts of jewels and precious stones. Seeing this building, the wicked Duryodhana was tempted to possess it.

50. Thereupon he deceived Yudhisthira by means of a game, played by the son of Subala (Sakuni), and he sent him to the forest for twelve years,

51. And another additional year to live in concealment, thus making the period (of banishment) complete thirteen years. On the fourteenth year, when they (the Pandavas) returned and claimed their kingdom,

52—53. O King, they did not get it. Thereupon war was declared, and the Pandavas, after exterminating the whole race of Kshatryas, and killing king Duryodhana obtained back their kingdom. This is the history of the Pandavas, who never acted under the influence of evil passions. O best of kings, this is the account of the dissension that ended in the loss of their kingdom by the Kurus and of the victory of the Pandavas.

Thus ends the sixty first chapter, Advansabatarana, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXII.

ADIVANSABATARANA PARVA.—

Janamejaya said:—

1. O best of Brahmanas, you have told me in brief the history called Mahabharata, containing the great deeds of the Kurus.

2. O great ascetic, recite now fully this wonderful history. I feel a great curiosity to hear it.

3. You should, therefore, recite it in full. I am not satisfied with hearing in the abstract this great history.

4. It could not be a trifling cause for which the virtuous Pandavas killed those whom they should not have killed and for which they are still praised by men.

5. Why did those best of men, (the Pandavas), capable of avenging themselves on their enemies, though innocent, quietly suffered the persecutions of the wicked Kurus?

6. O best of Brahmanas, why did the mighty armed Bhima, having the strength of ten thousand elephants, though persecuted, patiently kept his anger down?

7. Why did not the chaste Krishna, the daughter of Drupada, though persecuted by the wicked (Kurus), burn the sons of Dhritarastra by her angry eyes,—capable as she was to do it?

8. Why did the two sons of Pritha, (Bhima and Aryuna) and the two sons of Madri (Nakula and Sahadeva) those best of men, though persecuted by the wretches, follow Yudhishtira, who was addicted to the evil habit of gaming?

9. Why did Yudhishtira, the best of all virtuous men and the son of Dharma himself, though acquainted with all duties, suffer great afflictions?

10. Why did the son of Pandu, Aryuna, Krishna himself being his charrioteer and who could by his arrows send to the other world hosts of fighting men, suffer so many persecutions?

11. O great Rishi, tell me all this as they happened. (Tell me) everything that those highly mighty car-warriors did.

Vaishampayana said:—

12—13. O great king, appoint a time (to hear it). This history is very extensive. This is but the beginning. I shall recite the whole of this history, composed by the illustrious Krishna Dwaipayana, the great Rishi, Vyasa of immeasurable mental power, who is adored by all the world.

14. This (Bharata) contains one lac sacred slokas, composed by the son of Satyawati, Vyasa of immeasurable mental power.

15. The learned man who reads it to others, and those that hear it read, go to the world of Brahma and become equal to the celestials.

16. This (Bharata) is equal to the Vedas; it is holy and excellent; it is the worthiest of all that should be listened to. It is a Purana, adored by the Rishis.

17. It contains many useful instructions on Artha and Kama. This sacred history makes the heart desire to attain salvation.

18. The learned men earn much wealth by reciting this Veda to those who are noble, liberal, truthful and believing.

19—20. Sins, even of killing embryo, is destroyed by (reading or hearing) it. Even a greatly sinful man, by hearing this history, escapes from all his sins, like the sun from Rahu. This history is called Jaya (victory); it should be heard by those that desire victory.

21. Hearing it, a king can bring the whole world under his subjection and defeat all his foes. It is a mighty act of propitiation; it is a great sacrifice, productive of blessed fruits.

22. It should be heard by the crown-princes with their wives, for then they beget a heroic son and a daughter who occupies a throne.

23. It is the Dharma Sastra, it is also the sacred Artha Sastra, it is also the great Moksha Sastra, so said Vyasa of immeasurable intelligence.

24. It is recited in the present age and will be recited in future ages. He, who hears it, gets sons and survivors, who perform their favourite works.

25. He who hears it escapes immediately from all his sins that are committed by him in body, word or mind.

26. He who hears the history of the Bharata race without being fault-finding, can have no fear from diseases,—let alone the fear of the other world.

27—30. In order to extend the fame of the high-souled Pandavas and other kshatriyas, learned in all branches of knowledge, high-spirited and already famous in the world for their great deeds, Krishna Dwaipayana, moved by the desire of benefitting the world, has composed this excellent, sacred, and big work which spreads one's fame and gives one a lengthy life. He who, from the desire of acquiring virtue, causes this history to be heard in this world by holy Brahmanas, gains inexhaustible virtue.

He who recites the history of the Kurus, becomes immediately pure and holy,

31. He acquires large family and becomes respected in the world. The Brahmana, who reads the holy Bharata regularly,

32. For the four rainy months of the year, is cleansed of all his sins. He, who has read the Bharata, may be regarded as one who has studied the Vedas.

33. In it have been described the celestials, the royal sages, the holy and regenerate Rishis, the sinless Keshava (Krishna.)

34. The god of gods, (Mahadeva) the goddess Parvati, the birth of Kartikeya, who had many mothers,

35. And the greatness of Brahmanas and kine. It is a collection of all Srutis, and a work worthy to be heard by virtuous-minded men.

36. The learned man, who recites it to Brahmanas during the sacred Parvas (lunar changes), is cleansed of all his sins, and being victorious over heaven (not caring for it) attains to an union with Brahma.

37. He who causes even a single line of it to be heard by Brahmanas at a Sradh, that Sradh becomes inexhaustible, and the Pitris (ancestors) become gratified with food presented to them.

38. The sins that are committed daily by our senses and by our mind, and those that are committed knowingly or unknowingly by any man,

39. Are all destroyed by hearing the Mahabharata.—The history of the great births of the Bharata princes is called Mahabharata.

40. He who knows the etymology of the name (Bharata) is cleansed of all his sins. As this history of the Bharata race is wonderful,

41. Therefore, when recited, it purifies men from their sins. The Rishi Krishna Dwaipayana completed it in three years.

42. Rising daily (in the morning), purifying himself (by ablutions), and performing all his religious duties, (he composed this Mahabharata).

43. Therefore, the Brahmanas should hear, with prescribed rules, this holy history, this excellent narration of Bharata, composed by Krishna (Dwaipayana.)

44. The Brahmanas who recite it for others to hear it, and those who hear it, in whatever state they may be, can never be affected by the fruits of good or bad deeds.

45. The man, who is desirous of acquiring virtue, should hear it all. It is equal to all histories in the world, and he who hears it acquires purity of heart.

46. The bliss that one enjoys in attaining heaven is scarcely equal to that which one derives from hearing this greatly holy history.

47. The virtuous man, who hears or causes it to be heard with reverence, obtains the fruits of a Rajshuya or Ashwamedha sacrifice.

48. This Bharata is said to be a mine of gems, as the illustrious ocean or the great mountain.

49. This (Bharata) is sacred and excellent, and it equals the Vedas in sanctity. It is worthy of being heard, it is pleasing to the ear, it is sin-cleansing and virtue-increasing.

50. O king, he who gives a copy of Mahabharata to one who asks for it, does give (not a copy of a book, but) the whole of the earth having a belt of seas.

51. O son of Parikshit, this pleasant and sacred history that secures victory, (to the hearer), I shall now recite to you in full. Listen to it.

52. The Rishi Krishna Dwaipayana, regularly rising (every morning) for three years, composed this wonderful history, called Mahabharata.

53. O best of the Bharata race, whatever about Dharma, Artha and Kama, that is contained in this Bharata, may be met with elsewhere ; but whatever is not in it, is not to be found any where.

Thus ends the sixty second chapter, Adivansabatarana, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXIII.

(ADIVANSABATARANA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. There was a king, ever devoted to virtue, named Uparichara. He was very much addicted to hunting.

2. That son of Paurava, (Uparichara) called also Vasu, directed by Indra, conquered the beautiful and excellent kingdom of Chedi.

3. The king, sometime after, giving up the use of arms, and dwelling in a secluded retreat, practised severe asceticism. The celestials with Indra at their head one day came to the king.

4. Believing that he sought to be the king of the celestials by practising severe austerities, the celestials, appearing before him, succeeded with sweet words in winning him from his asceticism.

The Celestials said :—

5. O king of the world, you should see that piety may not sustain a diminution in your hands. Protected by you, piety will protect the universe.

Indra said :—

6. Protect attentively and rigidly piety on earth. Protecting virtue on earth, you will see many sacred regions (in after-life.)

7—8. Though I belong to heaven and you to earth, yet you are my friend and you are dear to me. O king of men, live in that place in earth which is delightful, which is full of animals, wealth and corn, which is sacred, which is well-protected like heaven, and which is blessed with fertility, which has agreeable climate and every object of enjoyment.

9. O king of Chedi, this Chedi, your kingdom, is full of riches, gems, and precious stones. It contains much mineral wealth.

10. The cities in this kingdom are all devoted to virtue. The people are honest and contented. They never speak falsehood even in jest.

11. The sons never divide their wealth here with their fathers. They are always mindful of their parent's welfare. Lean kine are never yoked to the plough or to the cart engaged in carrying merchandise.

12. They are all well-fed and fat. O reverencer of the celestials, the four castes are engaged in doing their respective duties in Chedi. Let nothing in the three worlds remain unknown to you.

13. I shall give you an excellent and great crystal car, which the celestials alone possess, and which is capable of carrying you through the sky.

14. You only, among all mortals on earth, will ride on that best of cars, and go through the sky like a celestial, though possessing a physical body.

15. I shall also give you a victory-producing garland of unfading lotuses; wearing which you shall not be wounded by weapons.

16. O king of men, this excellent, matchless and great garland, widely known as Indra's garland, will be your distinctive badge.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. The slayer of Vitra (Indra) gave him also a bamboo-stick to protect the honest and the peaceful.

18. After the expiration of a year, the king planted it on the ground for the purpose of worshipping the giver, (Indra.)

19. O king, from that day up to this day, all kings, following the example of Vasu, began to plant a bamboo-stick on the ground to worship Indra.

20. After planting the stick, they cover it with golden cloths, perfume it with scents, and decorate it with garlands and various ornaments.

21—23. The god Indra was thus worshipped in due form with garlands and ornaments. The god, assuming the form of a swan, came himself to accept the worship thus offered. The great Indra was much pleased to see the auspicious worship thus made by Vasu, the best of kings, and said to him, "Those men and kings who will worship me,

24. And will observe this my festival like the king of Chedi, will gain wealth and victory for their countries and kingdoms.

25—26. Their cities will also expand, and will be ever in joy." O king, Vasu, the great monarch, was thus blessed by the high-souled chief of the celestials, Maghavat Indra. Those men, who cause this festival of Indra to be observed

27. With the gifts of lands, gems, and precious stones, like king Vasu, become much respected in the worlds.

28.—29. Vasu, the King of Chedi, thus being blessed by Indra, and bestowing boons and performing great sacrifices, continued to observe the festival of Indra. He had five greatly powerful, and immeasurably effulgent sons.

30. The emperor (Vasu) installed his sons in many kingdoms. His illustrious son Vrihadratha,—a great car-warrior,—was installed in the kingdom of Magadha.

31. His other sons were Pratyagriha, and Kusamva, who was also called Manivahana. Two others were Mavilla and Yaduk who was greatly powerful and invincible in battle.

32. O king, these were the sons of that greatly effulgent royal sage. The five sons founded kingdoms and cities after their names.

33. And they thus created separate dynasties that lasted for long ages. When he travelled through space in the crystal car,

34. The Gandharvas and Apsaras came to adore that illustrious man. And because he moved through the upper regions (in his car), he was called Uparichara.

35. The river which flowed by his capital, was once attacked by a living mountain called Kolahala Suktimuti, who was maddened by lust.

36. The mountain was kicked by Vasu, and the river came out of the embrace of the mountain by the indentation caused by his kick.

37. From this embrace of the mountain, the river gave birth to a twin,—a son and a daughter, and the river, grateful to Vasu, gave them both to him.

38. The best of royal sages and the giver of wealth and the punisher of enemies, (Vasu) made the son of the river the generalissimo of his army.

39—40. The King made the daughter of the river who was called Girika his wife; and Girika, the wife of Vasu, purifying herself by a bath when her season of impurity came, told her state to her husband. But that very day the ancestors of Vasu came to him;

41. And they asked that best of kings and foremost of wise men to kill deers to perform their sradh; and the King, thinking that the command of his ancestors should not be disobeyed,

42. Went out to hunt (the deer), thinking of Girika who was exceedingly beautiful and was like Sree herself.

43. There were (in the forest in which the king went to hunt) many Asoka, Champaka, Chutas, Atimuktas, Punnagas, Karnikaras, Vakula, Divya-patala,

44. Patala, Narikela, Chandana, Arjuna and various other beautiful, sacred and great trees, full of fragrant flowers and sweet fruits.

45. The whole forest was maddened by the sweet notes of Kokilas and echoed with the hum of intoxicated bees. It was the season of spring, and the forest in which the king was roaming was as beautiful as the gardens of Kuvera.

46. The king was filled with desire, but he did not find Girika by him. Maddened by desire the king roamed here and there; and he saw,

47. "A beautiful Asoka tree, decked with immense foliage and its branches so covered with flowers that they can not be seen.

48. The king comfortably seated himself under its cool shade and enjoyed the sweet fragrance of the flowers mixed with the fragrance of honey.

49. He breathed the delicious breeze blowing slowly all over the forest. He became so much excited—(Slokas 50 to 52 not translated for obvious reason.)

53. The king, learned in the subtle truths of Dharma, Artha, and Kama, saw a swift hawk resting very near him. He addressed the bird thus,

54. "O amiable one, take this to my wife Girika, and give it to her. She is now in her season.

55. The swift hawk took it from the king and flew rapidly through the sky.

56. When he was thus flying through the sky, he was seen by another hawk, and thinking that he was carrying some meat he flew at him.

57. The two birds fought together with their beaks, and when they were thus fighting, the seed fell into the waters of the Yamuna.

58. There in the Yamuna lived an Apsara, known by the name Adrika, who dwelt in the water of the river as a fish,—it was the result of the curse of a Brahmana on her.

59. The fish, Adrika, rapidly came to the spot where Vasu's seed fell from the claws of the hawk, and she swallowed it at once.

60. Some time after, this fish (Adrika) was caught by the fishermen. O best of the Bharata race, it was the tenth month after she swallowed the seed.

61. There came out from the stomach of this fish two children of human form,—one a boy and the other was a girl. The fishermen were very much astonished (to see this wonderful phenomenon), and they went to king Uparichara (Vasu).

62. They said, "O king, these two,—(the boy and the girl) have been born in the womb of a fish. The king Uparichara took the male child.

63. That child became afterwards the virtuous and powerful monarch, named Matsa. The Apsara was also released from her form as soon as the children were born,

64. Because she had been told before by the illustrious one that she would be released from her piscatorial form after giving birth to two human children.

65. Now according to these words, having given birth to the two children and being killed by the fishermen, she left the form of the fish and assumed her own celestial form.

66. The excellent Apsara then rose on the path trodden by Siddhas, Rishis and Charanas. The fish-smelling daughter of the fish-form Apsara

67. Was then given by the king to the fishermen, saying, "Let this (child) be your daughter." She was gifted with great beauty, and possessed of every virtue.

68. That girl of sweet smiles, was known by the name of Satyavati; but owing to her association with fishermen, she was for years of fishy smell.

69. Wishing to serve her father (the fisherman), she plied a boat on the waters of the Yamuna. Parashara when going to the pilgrimage, saw her one day.

70. She was exceedingly beautiful,—an object of desire with even a Siddha. As soon as the wise Rishi saw the girl of sweet smiles, he desired to have her.

71. The best of Rishis (Parashara) addressed the daughter of Vasu, the girl of celestial beauty and tapering thighs, saying, "O blessed girl, accept my embraces."

72. She replied, "O holy Rishi, see, the Rishis are standing on both the banks of the river. Seen by them, how can I grant your wish?"

73. Thus addressed by her, the illustrious lord (Parashara) created a fog, by which the whole place was covered with darkness.

74. Seeing the sudden creation of the fog by the great Rishi, the girl was very much astonished and became suffused with blushes of bashfulness.

Satyavati said :—

75. O holy Rishi, know me to be a girl under the control of my father. O sinless man, my virginity will be sullied by accepting your embraces.

76. O best of Brahmanas, O Rishi, my virginity being sullied, how shall I be able to return home? I shall not then be able to bear life. O illustrious one, take all this into your (kind) consideration, and do what is proper.

Vaishampayana said :—

77. That best of Brahmanas, (Parashara), having been much pleased with all that she said, replied "You shall remain a virgin even after associating with me.

78. O timid girl, O beauteous maiden, ask from me any boon you desire to have. O beauty of sweet smiles, my favour (boon) has never proved fruitless."

79. Having been thus addressed, the maiden (Satyavati) asked for the boon that her body might be sweet-scented; and the illustrious Rishi granted that wish of her heart.

80. Having obtained the boon, she became exceedingly pleased. She was in her season, and she accepted the embraces of that Rishi of wonderful deeds.

81. Thenceforth she became known among men by the name of Gandhavati (sweet-scented.) Men could smell sweet scent of her body from a distance of a Yoyona.

82. Thence she was also called Yoyana-gandha. After all this, the illustrious Parashara went away to his home (hermitage).

83. Satyavati was exceedingly pleased to receive the excellent boon, and she thereupon, on that very day, conceived through the embraces of Parashara.

84. She gave birth on an island in the Yamuna, a greatly powerful child, begotten on her by Parashara; and the child with the permission of her mother adopted asceticism.

85. He went away saying, "As soon as I shall be remembered by you on any occasion, I shall (immediately) appear before you." Thus was born Dwaipayana in the womb of Satyavati by Parashara.

86. Because he was born on an island, he was called Dwaipayana. That learned man (Dwaipayana), knowing that Dharma would become lame by one leg at each Yuga,

87. And that the period of human life and strength would follow the Yuga (by becoming shorter and lesser), and moved by the desire of obtaining the favour of Brahma and the Brahmanas,

88. Arranged the Vedas, and thence he came to be called Vyasa. He then taught the Vedas and the fifth Veda Mahabharata.

89. To Sumanta, Jaimini, Paila, his own son Suka, and his disciple Vaishampayana (myself).

90. The Bharata Sanhita was published by him separately through these men. Then was born in the womb of Ganga by Santanu, Bhishma,

91. Of great energy, fame and immeasurable prowess. There was an illustrious and famous Rishi, learned in the interpretation of the Vedas,

92. That greatly famous man was known by the name of Animandavya. Though innocent, he was accused of theft and was put on a shula.

93. Thereupon, the great Rishi called Dharma and addressed him thus,—“In my childhood I pierced a little fly with a blade of grass.

94. O Dharma, I remember this sin of mine; I cannot remember any other. I have since practised asceticism thousand fold. Has not that one sin of mine been expiated by my great asceticism?

95. The killing of a Brahmana is more heinous than any other sin in the world ; (As you kill me) O Dharma, you shall take birth on earth, (and that too) in the Sudra caste.

96. Thus being cursed, Dharma was born a Sudra as Vidura who was learned, virtuous and pure-bodied.

97. The Suta, Sanjaya, who was like a Rishi, was begot by Gavalgana, and the greatly powerful Karna was begot by Surja on Kunti when she was a maid.

98. He came out of his mother's womb with a natural coat of mail and with a face beautified by ear-rings. For the benefit of the whole world, the world-wide famous,

99. Vishnu himself, the worshipped diety of all the worlds, was begot by Vasudeva on Devaki. He is the great God without birth and death ; he is the creator and lord of the universe.

100. He is called by the learned the invisible cause of all, he knows no deterioration, he is the first Brahma, he is the abode of the three qualities (Satya, Raja and Tama), he is the great soul, he is undeteriorating, he is the first, the cause of the creation, the Nature, the controlling Lord.

101. He is the Purusha, the Creator himself, he is the centre of Satya Guna, he is infinite, he is incapable of being moved, he is the diety, he is Lord Narayana ;

102. He is Dhata, he is undeteriorating, he is effulgent, he is the best, he is the great combiner, the increate, the invisible essence of all, and the great immutable. He is bereft of those attributes that are knowable by the senses, he is the universe itself without beginning, birth and decay.

103. This great being, possessed of infinite wealth, this Grandsire of all creatures, took his birth in the race of Andhaka—Vrishnis, in order to increase the piety in the world.

104. Satyaki and Kritavarma, learned in the science of arms, possessed of great prowess, well versed in all the Sastras, ever obedient to Narayana, 105—107. And expert in the use of arms, were begot by Satyaka and Hridika. The seed of the great ascetic Rishi Varadwaja was kept in a pot, and there it began to develop. From that seed was born Drona. From the seed of Goutam, fallen on a heap of reeds, were born a twin, Kripa of great strength and (Kripa), the mother of Ashwathama ; and then was begot mighty Ashwathama by Drona.

108. Then was born, from the sacrificial fire, Dhristadyumna, as effulgent as the fire itself.

109. The mighty hero was born, a bow in his hand, in order to kill Drona hereafter. From the sacrificial altar was born Krishna (Draupadi), resplendent and handsome,

110. A girl of fascinating features and great beauty. Then was born the disciples of Pralhad, namely Nagnajit and Suvala.

111. Suvala begot a son, named Sakuni, who through the curse of the celestials, became an enemy of virtue and a destroyer of creatures. And (Suvala begot) a daughter,

112. Who became the mother of Duryodhana, and both of them were well versed in acquiring worldly profits. From Krishna Dwaipayana was born Dhritarastra, the king of men,

113—114. And Pandu of great strength, both in the womb of the wife of Vichitra-virja, and from him was also born in the womb of a Sudra woman, the wise and intelligent Vidura, learned in both Dharma and Artha and free from all sins. Five sons were born of Pandu

115. In the wombs of his two wives. Yudhisthira was the son of the eldest. Yudhisthira was born of Dharma, Brikodara Bhima was born of Maruta ;

116—117. The first of all, the best wielder of the arms, illustrious Aryuna was born of Indra ; and Nakula and Sahadeva of handsome features, ever-engaged in the services of their superiors, were born of the twin Ashwinis. One hundred sons were born to the wise Dhritarastra,

118. Namely Duryodhana and others and another son, named Yuyutsa (born of a Vaisya woman)

119—120. O descendant of the Bharata race, amongst those one hundred sons, eleven, namely Dushyasana, Dussaha, Durmarshana, Vikarna, Chitrasena, Viving-sati, Yaya, Satyavrata, Purumitra, and Yuyutsa of Vaisya wife, were all great car-warriors. Abhimanyu was born of Suvadra,

121. The sister of Vasudeva (Krishna), begot by Aryuna, and therefore he was the grandson of Pandu. Five sons were born to the five Pandavas by Draupadi, the daughter of Panchala.

122. These princes were all very handsome and learned in all the Shastras. From Yudhisthira was born Pritivindhaya, from Bhima was born Sutashoma ;

123. From Aryuna was born Srutakiriti, from Nakula was born Satanika, and from Sahadeva was born the greatly powerful Srutasena.

124. Bhima begot a son in the forest on Hirimba, named Ghatatkacha. Draupadi gave birth to a daughter also, named Shikhandini, and she was transformed into a male child.

125—127. She was thus transformed into a male child by a Yaksha, named Sthuna, who did it from the desire of doing her good. In that great battle of Kurus assembled many hundreds of kings and potentates to fight among one another. I am unable to recount the names of those innumerable hosts. I have named only the principal ones who have been mentioned in this history (Mahabharata).

Thus ends sixty third chapter, Adivansabatarana, in the Adi Parva,

CHAPTER LXIV.

(ADIVANSABATARANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. O Brahman, I wish to hear in detail the accounts of those that you have named and of those that you have not named and other kings and potentates by thousands.

2. O great man, you should tell me in full the object for which these great car-warriors, all equal to the celestials, were born on earth.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. O king, we have heard that what you ask is a mystery even to the celestials. I shall however, speak of it, after bowing my head to the Self-Born (Brahma).

4. The son of Jamadagni, (Parashurama), after making the earth bereft of Kshatryas for twenty-one times, went to the best of the mountains, named Mahendra, and began his penances.

5. O king, when the earth was thus bereft of Kshatryas, the Kshatrya women used to come to the Brahmanas for offspring.

6. O best of men, the Brahmanas had connections with them only at their seasons, and not when they were not in their seasons, and they the Brahmanas did not do it with lust.

7. Thus thousands of Kshatrya women conceived through these connections with the Brahmanas, and O king, thus were born many Kshatryas of great prowess,

8. And many boys and girls, in order to thrive the Kshatrya race. Thus sprang the Kshatrya race from Kshatrya women from their connections with ascetic Brahmanas.

9. The new generation, blessed with long life, began to thrive in virtue, and thus were again established the four castes having Brahmanas at their head.

10—11. At the time (of which I speak), every man went to his wife only at the time of her season and never from lust or when she was not at her season. Other creatures also,—even those that were born in the race of birds,—followed this example. O best of the Bharata race, thus were born hundreds and thousands of creatures, and they all thrived in virtue.

12. O lord of the earth, all creatures were virtuous and religious, and all men were free from sorrow and disease.

13. O king having the walk of an elephant, thus once more was governed by the Kshatrya the wide earth, with the ocean for her boundaries, with her mountains and woods and towns.

14. When thus was earth again governed virtuously by the Kshatryas, the other castes, having Brahmanas at their head, were filled with great joy.

15. All the kings (of the world), becoming free from vices born of lust and anger, and punishing those that deserved punishment, protected the earth.

16. And (Indra) the deity that performed one hundred sacrifices and who has one thousand eyes, seeing that all the Kshatrya sovereigns ruled their kingdoms very virtuously, poured down vivifying showers of rains at the proper time and at the proper place, and thus protected all creatures.

17. O king, no one died in early age and none took to wife before attaining to age.

18. O best of the Bharata race, thus was filled the earth to the very shores of the sea with long-lived men.

19. The Kshatryas performed great sacrifices and bestowed much wealth on the Brahmanas, and all the Brahmanas also studied the Vedas and the Vedangas and the Upanishadas.

20. O king, no Brahmana ever sold the Vedas, and none of them ever read them aloud before a Sudra.

21. The Vaisyas tilled well the earth with the help of bullocks, and they never yoked kine to the plough. They carefully fed the lean ones.

22. Men never milched the cows as long as the calves could only live on the milk of their mothers. No merchant sold his goods with false scales.

23. O best of men, all men, thus virtuously inclined, did every thing with their eyes fixed on virtue.

24. O king, all men of all castes were mindful of the respective duties of their respective castes. O best of men, their virtue never sustained any diminution.

25. Both women and kine gave birth to offspring at the proper time, and trees bore flowers and fruits at their proper seasons.

26. O king, the Krita (Satya) Yuga having come into the world, the whole earth was filled with numerous creations.

27. O best of the Bharata race, O lord of men, when such was the happy state of the world, the Asuras began to take birth in royal dynasties.

28. The sons of Diti, (the Asuras), having been continually defeated by the sons of Aditi, (the celestials) and deprived of sovereignty and heaven, began to take birth on earth.

29—30. O king, wishing to enjoy sovereignty in this earth, the powerful Asuras took birth among cows, horses, mules, camels, buffaloes, elephants, deer; they also took birth as Rakshasas and others.

31. O protector of the world, owing to the birth of those (Asuras) that were already born and those that were being born, the Earth became incapable of supporting herself.

32. Amongst the sons of Diti and Danu, some, being thrown off from heaven, took birth as men, and became proud and insolent monarchs on earth.

33. Possessed of great prowess, they covered the earth in various shapes. They, becoming great oppressors, filled the earth to the very shores of the sea.

34. They began to oppress the Brahmanas, Kshatryas, Vaisyas, and Sudras; they began to persecute all other creatures with their strength.

35. O king, frightening and killing all creatures, they roamed over the earth.

36. Bereft of virtue and truth, proud of their strength, intoxicated with their insolence, they even insulted the holy Rishis in their hermitages.

37. O king, the earth, thus oppressed by the Asuras of great strength, energy and abundant means, thought of appealing to Brahma.

38. The united strength of the Naga, Shesha, and other creatures (such as the tortoise and the elephant), could not support the earth, attacked by the powerful Danavas.

39. O protector of the world, thereupon the Earth, afflicted with fear and oppressed by the weight (of the Danavas), went to the Grandfather of all creatures and asked his protection.

40—41. She saw the divine Brahma,—the creator of the worlds,—who is undeteriorating,—seated (on his seat), surrounded by the celestials and great and illustrious Rishis, and adored by the delighted Gandharvas and Apsaras who are always engaged in the services of the celestials.

42. The Earth adored the Grandsire, and O best of the Bharata race, telling him all that had happened, before all the regents of the world she asked his protection.

43. O king, the object (for which she came) was already known beforehand to the Omniscient, Self-created, and Supreme Lord.

44. O descendant of the Bharata race, he is the creator of the universe, why should he not know fully what is in the minds of the creatures, including the very Devas and the Danavas?

45. O great king, the Lord of the earth, Prajapati, Isha, Shambhu, then thus spoke to her.

Brahma said:—

46. O Vasundhara (the holder of wealth,) I shall appoint all the dwellers of heaven in the work for which you have come to me.

Vaishampayana said:—

47—48. O king, having thus addressed the Earth, the divine Brahma, bade her farewell. Then the Creator commanded all the celestials, saying, "Go all of you, and take your birth on earth to free her from her burden. Go according to your respective parts and seek battles (with the Danavas).

49. Then the creator of all the creatures, calling all the tribes of the Gandharvas and Apsaras, spoke to them thus, "Go all of you and take your birth amongst men according to your respective parts and in the forms you prefer.

50. All the celestials—with Indra at their head, having heard these words of the lord of the celestials,—words that were true, that were desirable under the circumstances, and which were fraught with benefit,—accepted them.

51. Having then resolved to take birth on the earth according to their respective parts, they all went to Baikuntha to the slayer of foes, Narayana,

52. Who bears the discus and the mace in his hands, who wears yellow colored cloth, who is greatly effulgent, who has the lotus on his navel, who is the slayer of the foes of the celestials, who is fixedly staring at his wide chest,

53. Who is the lord of the Prajapati (Brahma) himself, who is the sovereign of all the gods, who is of infinite strength, who has the mark of the auspicious wheel on his breast, who is the central force of every one's faculties, and who is adored by all the dieties ;

54. To him, this most exalted of all persons, Indra said, " Be incarnate." And Hari replied, " Be it so."

Thus ends the sixty fourth chapter, Advansabatarana, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Thereupon, Hari held a consultation with Indra regarding his incarnation on earth with all the celestials according to their respective parts.

2. Having then ordered the celestials, (what they should all do), Indra returned from the abode of Hari (Baikuntha).

3. The dwellers of heaven then, one after the other, took birth on earth for the destruction of the Asuras and for the welfare of the three worlds.

4. O best of kings, the celestials, as each preferred, took birth in the races of Brahmarshis and Rajarshis.

5. They killed the Danavas, Rakshasas, Gandharvas, Nagas and other calibons and creatures.

6. O best of the Bharata race, the Danavas, Rakshasas, Gandharvas and Nagas could not kill the (incarnate) celestials, even in their infancy, so strong were they.

Janamejaya said:—

7—8. I desire to hear the accounts of the births of the Devas, Danavas, Gandharvas, Apsaras, Manavas, Jakshas, and Rakshasas from their beginning. Therefore, you should tell me all about the births of creatures.

Vaishampayana said:—

9. Bowing down my head to the Self-created (Brahma), I shall narrate to you in detail the origin of the celestials and of all creatures.

10. Brahma had six mind-born sons, (created out of his mind), namely Marichi, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha and Kratu.

11. Marichi had a son, named Kashyapa, and from Kashyapa have sprung all creatures. Daksha begot thirteen illustrious daughters.

12—13. O best of kings, the daughters, of Daksha were Aditi, Diti, Danu, Kala, Danayu, Sinhika, Krodha, Pradha, Viswa, Vinata, Kapila, Muni and Kadru. The sons and grandsons of these daughters, all of exceeding prowess, were infinite in number.

14. O descendant of the Bharata race, from Aditi were born the twelve Adityas,—who were all lords of the Universe. I shall now mention them to you according to their names.

15. (They were) Datha, Mitra, Aryamana, Sakra, Varuna, Angsa, Vaga, Vivaswata, Pusha, and Savitri, the tenth (daughter).

16. The eleventh was Tashtri, and the twelfth was Vishnu. The youngest, however, was the best in merit.

17. Diti had one son, named Hiranyakashipu, and the illustrious Hiranyakashipu had five sons, famous all over the world.

18. The eldest was Prahlada, the next was Sanghladha, the third was Anuhlada, the fourth was Sivi, and the youngest was Vashakala.

19. O descendant of the Bharata race, it is known everywhere that Prahlada had three sons, namely Virochana, Kumbha, and Nikumbha.

20. Virochana's son was greatly powerful Vali, and the son of Vali was the great Asura Vana.

21. He (Vana) was blessed with great fortune ; he was a follower of Rudra, and was also known by the name of Mahakala.

22—26. O descendant of the Bharata race, Danu had forty sons, the eldest of them was the famous King Viprachitti. The others were Samvara, Namuchi, Puloma, Asiloma, Keshi, Durjaya, Ayasiras, Aswasiras, Aswasanku, Gaganamurdhan, Vegavan, Ketuman, Swarbhanu, Aswa, Aswapati, Vrishaparva, Ajaka, Aswagriva, Sukshma, Tuhunda, Ekapada, Ekachakra, Virupaksha, Mahodara, Nichandra, Nikumbha, Kupata, Kapata, Sarabha, Salabha, Surja and Chandrama.

27—28. These were the well-known sons of Danu. Surja and Chandrama (the sun and the moon) of the celestials were other persons and they were not the sons of Danu. Besides the above, there were ten more powerful and great sons of Danu, namely, Ekaksha, heroic Amritapa, Pralamva, Naraka,

30. Vatapi, Satrutapana, the great Asura Satha, Garistha, Danayu and the Danava, named Dirghajihva.

31. O descendant of the Bharata race, the sons and grandsons of the above were numberless. Sinhika gave birth to a son, called Rahu, the persecutor of the sun and the moon.

32. And (she gave birth to) three others, namely Suchandra, Chandrahantri and Chandrapramardana. The numberless progeny of Krodha was much wicked as she herself was.

33. Their race was wrathful, of crooked deeds, and the persecutors of foes. Danayu had four sons, the best among the Asuras.

34. (They were) Vikshara, Vala, Vira, and the great Asura Vritra. The sons of Kala were like Yama himself, all the slayers of their enemies.

35. They were greatly famous and powerful amongst the Danavas and were great oppressors of their enemies.

36. (They were) Vinasana, Krodha, Krodhanantri and Krodhasatru. These were the sons of Kala. As it is heard, there were also many others among the sons of Kala. Sukra, the son of a Rishi was the great preceptor of all the Asuras.

37. The illustrious Sukra had four sons who were also the preceptors of the Asuras. Their names were Tashtadhara and Atri, and two others of fearful deeds.

38—39. They were as effulgent as the sun himself. They were always engaged in acquiring the regions of Brahma. Thus have I narrated to you, as I heard them from the Purana, the accounts of the progeny of the Devas and the Danavas of great strength and power. The sons and grandsons, of these (Devas and Danavas) were so numberless that I am incapable of counting them.

40. O protector of the world, the Tarkshya, Arishtanemi, Garuda, Aruni,

41. And Varuni were known to be the sons of Vinata. Shesha or Ananta, Vasuki, Takshaka,

42. Kurma, and Kulika are known to be the sons of Kadru. Bhimasena, Ugrasena, Suparna, Varuna,

43. Gopati, Dhritarastra, Suryavarcha, Satyavarcha, Arkaparna, Prayuta,

44. Bhima and Chitraratha, all greatly famous, learned and self-controlled, then O king, was Shalishira, then fourteenth in the least, Paryana,

45. The Fifteenth, Kali and the sixteenth Narada;—these Devas and Gandharvas were known to be the sons of Muni.

46. O descendant of Bharata race, I shall now mention many others. Anavadya, Manu, Vansa, Asura, Marganapria,

47. Anripa, Subhaga and Vasi were the daughters of Pradha. Sidhya, Purna, Varhi, and famous Purnayu,

48. Brahmachari, Ratiguna and Suparna, Vishwavasu, Bhanu, and Suchandra ;—

49—50. These Devas and Gandharvas were also known to be the progeny of Pradha. It is also known that, that lady of good fortune Pradha, through the celestial Rishi (Kashyapa), brought forth the holy race of Apsaras, namely, Alamvusha, Misrakeshi, Vidyutaparna, Tilottoma,

51. Aruna, Rakshita, Rambha, Monoroma, Keshini, Suvahu, Surata,

52. Suraja and Supria,—these were the daughters (of Pradha). And Ativahu, celebrated HahaHuhu, and Tumvuru, these four best of Gandharvas (were also the sons of Pradha.)

53. The Ambrosia, Brahmana, the kine the Gandharvas, and Apsaras were the offspring of Kapila, so is stated in the Purana.

54. Thus have been narrated to you duly the births of all the creatures,—and of the Gandharvas, Apsaras.

55. Nagas, Suparnas, Rudras and Maruts, of the kine, and of the fortunate and holy Brahmanas.

56. This history, (if read or heard) extends the period of life. It is sacred, it is worthy of all praise, it gives pleasure, if heard. It should be always heard and recited to others in a proper frame of mind.

57. He, who properly reads in the presence of the deities and Brahmanas, this account of the births of noble creature, obtains large progeny, good fortune and fame. He attains to the higher worlds hereafter.

Thus ends the sixty-fifth chapter, Sambhava, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXVI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. It is known that the mind-born sons of Brahma were six great Rishis. There was another (mind-born son of Brahma,) named Sthanu. He had eleven sons gifted with great energy,

2. Namely, Mrigavyadha, Sarpa, famous Niriti, Ajaikapata, Ahivardhana, the chastiser of his foes Pinaki.

3. Dahana, Iswara, and greatly effulgent Kapali, Sthanu and the illustrious Bhaga. These eleven are called eleven Rudras.

4. (It has been already said that) Marichi, Angiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, and Kratu, these powerful Rishis were six mind-born sons of Brahma.

5. It is well-known in the world that the sons of Angiras were three, namely Vrihaspati, Utathya, and Samvarta, all of great asceticism.

6. O king, it is said that the sons of Atri were countless; they were all great Rishis and they were all learned in the Vedas, they were crowned with ascetic successes and their souls were in perfect peace.

7. O best of kings, the offspring of greatly wise Pulastya were the Rakshasas, Monkeys, Kinnaras, and Jakshas.

8. O king, the offspring of Pulaha were, it is said, the Shalavas (the winged-insects) the lions, the Kimpurushas (half lions and half men) tigers, bears and wolves.

9. The sons of Kratu (Balkhilyas), who were as sacred as sacrifice, were the companions of Surja. They were known to the three worlds, and they were all devoted to truth and vows.

10. O protector of the world, the illustrious Rishi Daksha, having his soul in complete peace and possessing great asceticism, sprang from the right toe of Brahma.

11. The wife of the illustrious Daksha sprang from the left toe of Brahma. He then begot fifty daughters on her.

12. They were all lotus-eyed and of faultless features and limbs. As he (Daksha) had no sons of his own, he made these daughters his Putrikas.

13. He (Daksha) bestowed in due form, ten of his daughters on Dharma twenty-seven on Chandra, and thirteen on Kashyapa.

14. Hear, O king, the names of the wives of Dharma as I mention them. (They were) Kirti, Lakshmi, Dhriti, Medha, Pushti, Sraddha, Kria,

15. Budhi, Lajja, and Mati. These were the ten wives of Dharma, as appointed by the self-created (Brahma).

16. It is known throughout the world that the wives of Chandra were twenty-seven. They were all of rigid and holy vows, they were employed to indicate time.

17. They are the Nakshatras and yogonis. They were engaged in assisting the course of nature. The Grandsire (Brahma) had another son, named Manu. Manu had a son, called Prajapati.

18. The sons of Prajapati were eight and they were called the Vasus. I shall name them in detail. (They were) Dhara, Dhruva, Soma, Aha, Anila, Anala,

19. Pratyusha, and Provasha. These are known to be the eight Vasus. Dhara and the Brahma-knowing Dhruva were born of Dhumra.

20. Soma and Anila were born of the wise Swasa. Aha was the son of Rata, and Anala of Sandilya.

21. Prutyusha and Provasha were the sons of Provata. Dhara had two sons, namely, Dravina and Hutahavyavaha.

22. Dhruva's son was the illustrious Kala, the destroyer of the world. Soma's son was Varcha, Varcha's daughter is Varchi.

23. The fascinating Varchi had three sons, namely Sishera, Prana, and Ramana. The sons of Aha were Jyoti, Shama, Shanta and Muni.

24—25. Agni's son was the handsome Kumara who was born in the forest, and as he was reared up by Kirtika and others, he was called Kartikeya. After him were (born his three brothers, namely) Shakha, Vishakha and Naigameya. Anila's wife was Shiva, and her sons were Monojava.

26. And Avijnatagati. These two were the sons of Anila. Know, Pratyasu's son was the Rishi, named Devala.

27. And Devala had two sons, both greatly wise and forgiving. The sister of Vrihaspati, the first of women, the utterer of the sacred truth,

28. And an austere ascetic, roamed over the world, having no attraction for the world. She (the sister of Vrihaspati) became the wife of the eighth Vasu, Provasa.

29—30. She gave birth to the illustrious Bishwakarma, the founder of all arts, the creator of thousand arts, the artist of the celestials, the maker of all kinds of ornaments, the best of all artists, and the maker of the celestial cars of the gods.

31. Mankind was enabled to live in consequence of the arts of this illustrious man, and for this reason he was worshipped by all men. This Bishwakarma is everlasting and immutable.

32. The illustrious Dharma, the dispenser of all happiness, came out of the right breast of Brahma, assuming the form of a man.

33. He (Dharma) had three excellent sons, charming to all creatures. (They were) Sama, Kama, and Harsha, who supported the worlds by their energy.

34. The wife of Kama was Rati, that of Shama was Prapti, and that of Harsha was Nanda ; upon these the worlds were made to depend.

35. Kashyapa was the son of Marichi, and Kashyapa's offspring were the Suras (celestials) and Asuras. O best of kings, therefore, he is the progenitor of all the worlds.

36. Tashtri, who had the form of a mare, became the wife of Savita. She gave birth in the sky to a twin Ashwinis.

37. O king, the sons of Aditi were twelve with Indra at their head, The youngest of the them was Vishnu, upon whom the worlds depend.

38. These were the thirty-three celestials. I shall now mention to you their progeny according their Pakshas, Kulas, and Ganas.

39. The Rudras, the Sadhyas, the Marutas, the Vasus, the Vargavas, and the Viswadevas were each a Paksha.

40. Vinata's son, Garuda and the Aruna also, and illustrious Vrishaspati were counted amongst the Adityas.

41. The Ashwinis, all annual plants and all beasts were counted among the Guhyakas. O king, these are the Ganas of the celestials, narrated to you.

42—44. Which narration cleanses men of all their sins. The illustrious Vrigu sprang forth, ripping open the breast of Brahma. Vrigu's son was the learned Sukra, a poet himself and the son of a poet. He, being commanded by the Self-created (Brama) to pour rain and withhold it, and to dispense and remit calamities, became a planet, and he (still) traverses the sky in order to sustain the lives of all creatures in the three worlds. That preceptor of Yoga philosophy, that greatly intelligent man, that wise and self-controlled Brahmachari became the preceptor of the Devas and the Danavas.

45. Thus appointed by Brahma to look after the well-fare (of Daityas), Vrigu's son (Sukra) begot another son,

46. Named Chyavana, who was greatly famous, very virtuous-minded and as effulgent as the sun. O descendant of the Bharata race, he came out of his mother's womb in anger, and thus released his mother.

47. Arushi, the daughter of Manu, became the wife of the wise Chyavana, and the greatly illustrious Aurva was born in her, ripping open her thighs.

48. His (Aurva's) son was Richika, who became, even in his boyhood, very powerful, energetic and virtuous. He (Richika) begot Jamadagni.

49. The illustrious Jamadagni had four sons, the youngest of them was Parashurama. He was superior to all his other brothers in good qualities.

50. He was self-controlled, but was expert in the use of all weapons, and he became the destroyer of the Kshatryas. Aurva had one hundred sons, the eldest of them being Jamadagni.

51. These hundred sons begot offspring by thousands and filled the whole world. Brahma had two other sons, who had victory as their signification.

52. They are known as Dhata and Bidhata, who lived with Manu. Their sister is the auspicious Lakshmi who lives in the abode of lotuses.

53. The mind-born sons of Lakshmi are the sky-ranging horses. Varuna's eldest wife was the daughter of Sukra, named Divi.

54—55. She gave birth to a son, called Vala, and a daughter, named Sura, who gives joy to the celestials. And all destroying Adharma was born (of her), when creatures began to devour one another. Nriti was his wife, from whom were born the Rakshasas, called Nairitas.

56. She had also three other fearful and cruel sons, always engaged in sinful deeds. (They were) Vaya, Mahavaya and Mrityu, the destroyer of every created thing.

57. This all-destroying being (Mrityu) had no wife or son. Kaki, Sweni, Bhasi, Dhritarastra, and Suki,—

58. These five are known in the world as the daughters of Tamara. Kaki brought forth the crows ; Sweni the hawks ;

59. Bhashi gave birth to the cocks and the vultures ; and Dhritarastra all ducks and swans,

60—61. And she gave birth to also the Chakrabakas. The fair and illustrious Suki of amiable qualities and auspicious signs gave birth to all parrots. Krodha gave birth to nine daughters of wrathful temper.

62. (They were) Mrigi, Mrigamada, Hari, Bhadrmana, Matangi, Sarduli, Sweta, Suravi,

63. And the beautiful Surasa of every auspicious sign. O best of men, the offspring of Mrigi are all beasts of deer species.

64. O chastiser of foes, the offspring of Mrigamada are all beasts of bear species, and also of those beasts, called Srimara. Bhadramana gave birth to her son Airavata.

65. And Airavata is the great celestial elephant. The offspring of Hari are the horses and the beasts of the monkey kind which are endued with great activity.

66. Those animals that are called Golangula also are said to be the offspring of Hari. Sarduli gave birth to innumerable lions and tigers,

67. And also to leopards and all other animals. O king, the offspring of Matangi are all elephants.

68. And Sweta gave birth to the large elephant, known by the name of Sweta which possesses great speed. O king, Suravi gave birth to two daughters,

69. Namely, the beautiful Rohini and illustrious Gandharvi. O descendant of the Bharata race, she had two other daughters, named, Vimala and Anala.

70. All kine were born from Rohini and all horses from Gandharvi. And Anala gave birth to the seven kinds of trees which produce pulpy fruits.

71—72. Anala had another daughter named Suki. Surasa gave birth to a son, named Kanka. Aruna's wife Shweni gave birth to two very energetic and powerful sons, named Sampati and the mighty Jatayu. Surasa also gave birth to the Nagas and Kadru the Pannyagas.

73—74. Vinata had two sons, the world known Garuda and Aruna. O king of men, O best of all wise men, thus have I fully described to you the genealogy of all the principal creatures. He who hears it is cleansed of all his sins. He acquires great knowledge, and finally attains to the highest state in after-life.

60. O king, many heroic monarchs, were born on earth from the race of Asuras, called Krodhavasha, of whom I have already spoken to you.

61—66. (They were) Madraka, Karnaveshta, Sidhartha, Kitaka, Suvira, Suvahu, Mahavira, Vahlika, Kratha, Vichitra, Suratha, handsome Nila, Chiravasa, Bhumipala, Dantavakra, Durjaya, Rukmi, Janamejaya, Ashada, Vayuvega, Vuriteja, Ekalavya Sumitra, Vatadhana, Gomukha, Karushakas, Khamdhurti, Srutayau, Udvaha, Vrihatsena, Kshema, Ugrathirtha. the king of Kalinga and Matimana, the king who was known as Iswara.

67. These greatly fortunate, powerful and illustrious and best of monarchs were all born on earth of the race of Asuras, called Krodhavasa.

68. That great Danava who was known as Kalnemi became the son of Ugrasena, king Kansa, on earth.

69. That Asura who was known as Devaka and who was effulgent as Indra himself, became the best of the kings of the Gandharvas on earth.

70. O descendant of the Bharata race, Drona, the son of Varadwaja, who was not born of any woman, sprang from the celestial Rishi Vrihaspati.

71. O best of kings, he was a hero of great achievements, and the best of all those that were learned in the ways of using arms. He was most illustrious and most powerful.

72. He was called learned, in the Vedas, as well as in the Science of arms by all men well-versed in the Vedas. He was a doer of wonderful deeds and a pride of his race.

73—74. O descendant of the Bharata race, O king, his son, the heroic, surpassingly energetic and lotus-eyed Ashwathama, the terror of all his foes, and the great oppressor of all enemies, was born on earth from the united portions of Mahadeva, Yama, Kama, and Medha.

75. Begot by her husband Santanu, the eight Vasus were given birth to by Ganga, on account of the curse of Rishi Vasishtha and also from the command of Indra.

76. The youngest of them was Bhishma, who was the dispeller of the fears of the Kurus, who was greatly intelligent, who was a great scholar in the Vedas and a best of speakers and the destroyer of the enemy's ranks.

77. That best of men, being learned in the science of arms and endued with great energy, fought with the illustrious (Purusha) Rama, the son of Jamadagni.

78. O king, that Brahmana Rishi, who was known in the world as Kripa, was the embodiment of all manliness, was born of of the Rudras.

79. O king, that king and great warrior, that chastiser of foe, who was known as Sakuni in the world, know him to be the Dwapara himself.

80. He who was known as Satyaki, the upholder of the pride of Vrishnis and the chastiser of foes, was born of the portion of celestial Marutas.

81. That royal sage, king Drupada, the best of all the wielder of arms, was also born of the portions of the same celestials (Marutas).

82. O king, know that Kritavarma that king of men, that man of matchless deeds, that best of best Kshatryas,

83. That chastiser of foes, was also born of the same celestials. The king Birata, the conqueror of other kingdoms, was also born of the same celestials.

84. That son of Arishta, known as Hansa, the king of the Gandharvas, was born to increase the Kuru race.

85. He was known on earth as Dhritarastra, the son of Krishna Dawipayana; he had long arms, he was greatly powerful, and he was a king with prophetic eyes.

86. He became blind for the fault of his mother and anger of the Rishi. His younger brother was greatly wrathful and strong. He was known as Pandu, and was devoted to truth, virtue and purity.

87. Know, that he who was known as Vidura, he who was the best of all virtuous men, he who was the god of justice himself, was the excellent and greatly fortunate son of Atri.

88. The evil and wicked-minded king Duryodhana, the destroyer of the fame of the Kuru dynasty, was born of the portion of the Kali.

89. O king, It was he who was the cause of the slaughter of all creatures and of the world, he ruined the earth.

90. It was he who fanned the fire of hostility, the great fire of destruction. The sons of Pulustya became on earth the brothers of Duryodhana.

91. They were one hundred,—Dushyashana Durmuka, Dushaha and others, all wicked to the extreme. I do not mention their names.

92. All of them supported Duryodhana in his wicked acts. O best of the Bharata race, they were all sons of Pulastya (Rakshas). Over and above these one hundred sons, Dhritarastra had another son, begot on a Vaisya woman.

Janamejaya said :—

93. O Lord, tell me the names of all the sons of Dhritarastra beginning from the eldest, according to the order of their births.

Vaishampayana said :—

94—106. (They are) Durjodhana, Yuyutsa, Dushashana, Dussaha, Dushala, Durmukha, Vivingsati, Vikarna, Jalasandha, Sulachana, Vinda, Anuvinda, Durdharsha, Suvahu, Dushdadharshaha, Durmarshena, Durmukha, Dushkarma, Karna, Chitra, Upachitra, Chitraksha, Charu, Chitrangada, Durmada, Dushpraharsha, Vivitsu, Vikata, Sama, Urnanava, Padmanava, Nanda, Upanandaka, Senapati, Shusena, Kundodara, Mahdara, Chitravahu, Chitravarmana, Suvarmana, Durvilashana, Ayavahu, Mahavahu, Chitrachapa, Sukundala, Vhimavega, Bhimavala, Valaki, Valavarhdana, Ugrayudha, Bhimashara, Kanakaya, Dredhyudha, Dhridavarmana, Dredha, Khatra, Somakriti, Anadara, Jarasandha, Dridhasandha, Satyasandha, Sahasravaka, Ugrasrava, Ugrasena, Kshemamurti, Aparajita, Panditaka, Vishalaksha, Durudhara, Dridhahasta, Subasta, Vataviga, Suvarchasta, Adityaketu, Vahvasen, Nagadatta, Aunyaina, Nishangi, Kavachi, Dandi, Dandadhara, Dhaungraha, Ugra, Bhimaratha, Vira, Virabahu, Alolupa, Abhoya, Rudra, Karma, Dhridaratha, Anadhershya, Kundavida, Viravi, Dhirglochana, Dirguvahu, Mahavahu, Vyndhoru, Kanakardoya, Kendoja and Chitraka. He (Dhritarastra) had also a daughter, named Dussala, above and over these one hundred sons. Dhritarastra had another son, named Yuyutsa, born of a Vyasa woman, who was also above and over these one hundreds.

107. O king, thus have I told you the names of the one hundred sons (of Dhritarastra), and also of the name of his daughter. You have now known their names according to the orders of their births.

108. They were all heroes, great car-warriors and learned in the use of arms. They were also well-versed in the Vedas, and experts in statesmanship,

109. O king, all of them were mighty in attack and defence, and all of them were learned. They married wives suitable to them in beauty and accomplishments.

110. At the marriageable age, the king of the Kurus at the advice of Sakuni bestowed his daughter Dussala on Jayadrhata, the king of the Sindhus.

111. Know, O king, king Yudhisthira was a portion of Dharma; Bhima was that of Maruta; Aryuna was that of the king of the celestials (Indra),

112. The most handsome men amongst all men and the matchless beauties on earth, Nakula and Sahadeva were the portions of the Ashwinas.

113. He, who was known as Varcha, the son of Soma, became Abhimanyu of wonderful deeds, the son of Aryuna.

114. O king, before his (Varcha) incarnation on earth, Soma thus spoke to the celestials, "I cannot part with my son; he is dearer to me than life.

115. Let this agreement be made, and let not that agreement be violated. The destruction of the Asuras is the work of the celestials, therefore it is our work also.

116. Let this Varch go, but let him not stay long on earth. Nara will born as Indra's son, and he will have Narayana as his friend.

117. He will be known on earth as powerful Aryuna, the son of Pandu. My boy will be his son, and even in his boyhood will be a great car-warrior.

118. O best of immortals, let him remain on earth only for sixteen years. On his sixteenth year, will take place that great fight,

119. In which your incarnations will kill innumerable heroes. And in the fight in which Nara and Narayana (Aryuna and Krishna) will not be present,

120. And in which, O celestials, the (Kuru) heroes will fight with constructing a Chakrabuha, (in that fight) my son will defeat all foes and compel them to retreat.

121. The boy will enter into that impenetrable Buha and will walk about the place. He will defeat and kill many heroes and great car-warriors.

122. The mighty-armed hero, within the course of half a day, will send the one-fourth part of the foes, to the land of the dead.

123. Then towards the close of the day, many heroes and great car-warriors will return to the charge and attack my son. Thereupon, my mighty-armed son will come back to me.

124. He will beget one heroic son who will keep alive the almost extinct Bharata dynasty."

125. Having heard these words of Soma, the celestials said, "Be it so." They then all worshipped and praised the lord of the stars (Soma).

126. O king, thus have I told you the accounts of the births of your father and his father (and so on). Know, O king, the great car-warrior Dristadyumna was born of a portion of Agni.

127. Know that Shikhandi, who was previously a woman, was born of a portion of a Rakshasa. O best of the Bharata race, those that became the five sons of Draupadi,

128. Know, O best of the Bharata race, were the celestials, called Vasus. (They were) Pritivindhya, Sutasoma, Sru-takirti.

129. Satanika, the son of Nakula, and the powerful Srutasena. The best of the Yudus, Sura, became the father of Vasu-deva.

130—132. His daughter was named Pritha, who was matchless on earth in beauty. Her father (Sura) promised before Fire that he would give his first-born child to the son of his paternal aunt, king Kuntibhoja, who was childless. He gave his daughter (Pritha) to that king, expecting to get his favour. And king Kuntibhoja, adopted her as his daughter. She was engaged in her (foster) father's house in attending upon Brahmanas and guests.

133—134. One day she attended upon the terrible and wrathful ascetic, vow-obser-ving Durvasa, who was learned in the mys-teries of religion and well-acquainted with truth. She, with all possible care, gratified that self-controlled ascetic.

135. The illustrious man said, "O for-tunate girl, I am much pleased with you. To those of the celestials whom you will call by this Mantra (that I teach you),

136. (They will instantly come), and by their grace you will give birth to off-spring." Thus addressed, that girl, being much curious (to see the effect of the Mantra),

137. Called Surya when she was a maid. The illustrious god of light (Surya) made her conceive ;

138. And she begot a son, who became the best of all wielders of arms. He was born with a coat of arms and a pair of ear-rings, and he looked as handsome as a celestial child.

139. And as effulgent as the sun, and every part of his body was well embellished. From the fear of her friends and relatives, privately

140. Did she throw that illustrious son into water (river). But the child, thus thrown into the water, was taken up by the illustri-ous husband of Radha.

141—142. Adhiratha (the husband of Radha) made the child his son. And the couple then gave him the name of Vasusena, by which name he soon became known all over the country. As he grew up, he became very strong and excelled in the use of all weapons.

143. He became the best victor, and learned in all the Vedangas. When that wise and truth-loving man studied the Vedas,

144. Then there was nothing to that high-souled man which he could not give to the Brahmanas. To do good to his son (Aryuna), illustrious Indra, one day—assum-ing the form of a Brahmana,

145. Begged from him his ear-rings and his natural coat of arms. Removing the earrings and coat of arms from his ear and breast,

146. He gave it to Indra, who being much surprised (for his liberality), presented him with a dart and spoke to him thus, "The Devas, Asuras, Gandharvas, Rakshasas, Uragas or men,

147. At whomever, O hero, you will hurl this weapon, he will certainly be killed." He (the son of Pritha) was previously known by the name of Vasusena,

148. But for his mighty deeds, he was subsequently called Karna. Because the greatly illustrious hero removed his natural coat of Arms (from his breast)

149. He, the eldest son of Pritha, was called Karna. O best of kings, he thus began to grow up in the Suta caste.

150. Karna, the best of kings, expert in the use of all arms, the destroyer of his foes, became the friend and counsellor of Duryodhana,

151. Know, O king, he was born of a portion of the sun. Of that god of gods, that everlasting Being, whose name is Narayana,

152. The powerful Vasudeva (Krishna), was a portion in the world of men. Balu-deva was a portion of the Naga, Shesha.

153. O king, know that the greatly ener-getic Pradyumna was a portion of Saan-takumara. In this way many dwellers of heaven became great men on earth,

154. In the race of Vasudeva, thus increasing its glory. O king, the Apsaras, of whom I have already spoken

155. Was also born on earth in portions as ordered by Indra. O king, sixteen thousand portions of these celestial ladies,

156. Became in the world of men the wives of Vasudeva. A portion of Sree (Lakshmi) herself became incarnate on earth out of love (for Narayana).

157—158. She was born in the race of Vishwaka, and that illustrious lady was named Rukmini. Draupadi was born from a portion of Sachi, (the wife of Indra) in the race of Drupada and from the altar of the sacrifice. She was neither tall nor short, she had the fragrance of blue lotus,

159. Her eyes were like the lotus leaves, her thighs were fair and round, and her dense masses of hair were black and curly. She was endued with all auspicious marks and her complexion was like the emerald.

160. She was the charmer of the hearts of the five kings of men (the Pandavas.) The goddesses Sidhi and Dhriti became the mothers of the five (Pandavas).

161—162. They were named Kunti and Madri. And the goddess, who was Mati, became the daughter of Suvala (Gandhari, the wife of Dhritarastra). Thus, O king, have I described to you the births and incarnations of the portions of the Devas, Asuras, Gandharvas, Apsaras and Rakshasas, those that appeared on earth as invincible kings.

163. Those illustrious ones that were born in the extensive race of the Yadus, those that were born as Brahmanas, Kshatryas, and Vaisyas, have all been described.

164. This Vansabhatarana (accounts of incarnations,) which is capable of bestowing wealth, fame, long-life, offspring, and victory, should be heard with proper frame of mind.

165. Hearing the incarnations of the Devas, the Asuras and the Gandharvas, the learned men, thus knowing the mystery of creation, preservation and destruction, do not feel depressed, even in the greatest sorrow.

Thus ends the sixty seventh chapter, Sambhaba, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

(SAMBHABA).—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. O Brahmana, I have heard in detail the account of the births of the Devas, the Danavas, the Rakshasas, the Gandharvas and the Apsaras.

2. I now desire to hear the accounts of the births of the kings of the Kuru race from the beginning. Therefore, O Brahmana, narrate them before all these Brahmana Rishis.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. O best of the Bharata race, the founder of the Paurava dynasty was a greatly powerful king, named Dusmanta. He was the protector of the earth bounded by the four seas.

4. That king of men enjoyed the fourth part of all the products of the land. He was (also) the lord of various countries in the midst of the sea.

5. That chastiser of foes had sway even over the countries of the Mlechas, which was full of men of the four orders, and which was surrounded by the sea, the mine of gems.

6. During his reign, there were no mixed castes, no tillers of the land, no toilers of the mines, and no sinful men.

7. O best of men, during his reign, all men were virtuous, and they did every thing with an eye on virtue.

8. O child, during his reign, there was no fear from the thieves and no fear from famines; and there was no fear of diseases.

9. Men of all the four castes took pleasure in doing their respective duties, and they performed all acts without the desire of gaining fruits. O protector of the world, depending upon him, his subjects felt no fear.

10. Prajanya (Indra) poured showers of rains at the proper time, and the crops were all juicy. The earth was full of all kinds of wealth and animals;

11. The Brahmanas were always engaged in their duties, and they were very truthful. He (Dusmanta) was a young prince of wonderful prowess and of a body like the thunder-bolt.

12. He could support the Mandara (mountain) with its woods and forests, raising it up on his arms. He was an expert in the four kinds of club-fight, and also in using every kind of weapons.

13. He was greatly expert in riding elephants and horses. In strength, he was like Vishnu and in splendour he was like the sun.

14. In gravity he was like the ocean, and in patience he was like the earth. The king (Dusmanta) was loved by all his subjects, and he too ruled very virtuously those contented men.

Thus ends the sixty-eighth chapter, Sambhava, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXIX.

(SAMBHAVA).—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. I desire to hear in detail the account of the birth and career of the high-souled Bharata and the origin of Sakuntala.

2. O holy man, tell me in full how that hero, that lion among men, obtained Sakuntala. I desire to hear it, therefore O knower of truth, you should narrate it to me.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. Once on a time that king (Dusmanta) of mighty arms, accompanied with a very large force with hundreds of horses and elephants, went into a dense forest.

4. The force were of four kinds (infantry cavalry, elephant-men and car-warriors) and the men were armed with swords, darts, maces and big clubs.

5. Surrounded by hundreds of warriors with lances and spears in their hands, the king marched out. The lion-like roars of the warriors, the sounds of conches and drums,

6. The rattle of the wheels of the cars, the shrieks of the huge elephants, and the clash of weapons of various soldiers dressed in various dresses,

7. And the neighing of horses, all these indistinct sounds, mixing together, raised a deafening (Kil Kil) sound when the king was on the march.

8. Beautiful ladies from the terraces of the magnificent mansions beheld the heroic, illustrious and kingly monarch (to pass).

9. They knew that king to be the destroyer of foes like Indra; they thought him to be the wielder of thunder-bolt himself.

10. They said, "This is that best of heroic men who is as powerful in the battle as the Vasu. All enemies are destroyed by his great prowess."

11. Having said this, the ladies, out of love towards him, showered flowers on the head of the king to his great gratification.

12. Having been blessed by the best of Brahmanas everewhere on the way, the king entered the forest with the eager desire of killing deer.

13. The king, seated on the back of a mad elephant, looked like the king of the celestials, and he was followed by Brahmanas, Kshatryas, Vaisyas and Sudras. They uttered blessings and cried victory from all sides.

14. The citizens and other people also followed the king for some distance.

15—16. They stopped from going further only at the command of the king. Thereupon, the king of the world got upon his car with the color of gold and filled the whole world, even the heavens, with the rattle of his car-wheels. Thus proceeding he saw a forest like the Nandana wood of heaven.

17. It abounded in Vilwa, Arka, Khadira Kopithwa, and Dhava trees; its soil was uneven and covered with blocks of stone, loosened from the hills.

18. There were no water and human habitations; it extended to many Yoyanas. It was full of deer, lions and other fearful animals of the forest.

19. That best of kings, Dusmanta, with the help of his soldiers and servants, beat the forest, thus killing many deer.

20. Dusmanta pierced with his arrows many tigers that were within shooting range and killed them (by hundreds).

21. The king wounded many by arrows (that were out of the shooting range and not to be killed by swords); he killed by his sword those that were near at hand.

22. That best of the wielders of darts, killed many by hurling his darts at them. The greatly expert player of clubs, the king of matchless prowess (Dusmanta), thus fearlessly roamed over the forest.

23. The king, as he roamed about, killed many beasts of the forest with his swords, and some by his swift flying darts, and some by his heavy clubs.

24. When the forest was thus agitated by the wonderfully powerful king and his soldiers, ever delighting in warlike sports, the lions left in thousands that forest.

25. Having thus lost their kings, the other beasts uttered loud cries in fear and anxiety, and fled in all directions.

26—27. They fell down on all sides, being hungry, thirsty, and tired of running, and without being able to quench their thirst in the river-beds which were dry. Some of them were eaten up by those best of warriors;

28. Some were quartered and roasted in fires lit up by them, and then they were eaten by the warriors in the proper way.

29. Many strong elephants, maddened with the pains of their wounds, fled in fear with their trunks upraised on high.

30. Those wild elephants, ejecting urine and dung in fear, and copiously vomiting blood, trampled to death many soldiers (of the king).

31. The forest, which had been full of animals, was soon made by the king and his innumerable followers, bereft of lions and tigers and other beasts.

Thus ends the sixty ninth chapter, Sambhava, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The king with his soldiers, having killed thousands of animals, entered another forest to hunt in it.

2. Fatigued with hunger and thirst, and accompanied by only one follower, he came to a large desert at the end of the forest.

3. Having passed over this herbless desert, the king came to a forest full of holy hermitages. It was beautiful to the eyes and delightful to the heart.

4.—5. It was cool, and it breathed delightful breeze. It was full of trees covered with flowers. It extended far and wide in green soft grass. It echoed with the sweet songs of the birds. It resounded with the sweet notes of the male kokila and the shrill cries of cicalas.

6. It contained magnificent trees without-stretched branches, which had formed pleasant shady canopies. The bees hovered over the flowery creepers, and beautiful groves were every where.

7. There was no tree without fruits; there was no shrubs with prickles on them; there was no plant that had not bees swarming around it.

8. The whole forest resounded with the sweet songs of the birds; and it was decked with all the beautiful flowers of all the seasons. It was full of pleasant shades of blossoming trees.

9. Such was the charming and excellent forest that the great bow-man (Dusmanta) entered. The trees, decked with flowers and waved with the soft breeze,

10. Showered sweet flowers, again and again, on the head of the king.

11.—12. Clad with the flowery attire of many colours,—the sweet singing birds sitting on their branches hanging with the weight of flowers,—the busy bees tempted by honey buzzing in sweet chorus around their blossoms, stood many trees (in that forest). There were innumerable bowers of creepers covered with thick clusters of flowers. The greatly energetic king was much pleased and charmed with the scenery.

14. The trees, with its flowery branches, entwining with one another, looked exceedingly beautiful and appeared like so many rain-bows.

15. It was the abode of the Srishyas, the Charanas, the various sorts of Gandharvas, the Apsaras, the monkeys and the Kinnaras,—all drunk with joy.

16. Pleasant, cool and fragrant breezes, mixed with the effluvia of sweet flowers, blew every where, and appeared as if they had come there to play with the trees.

17. The king saw that forest endued with such beauties. It was situated in the delta of a river, and looked like a pole erected in Indra's honour.

18. The king saw in that forest,—the abode of ever cheerful birds,—a charming and delightful hermitage of ascetics.

19. It was surrounded by many trees, and the holy fire was burning within it. He (the king) worshipped that matchless hermitage.

20. He saw innumerable Yotees, Valkhilyas and other Munis sitting there (in that hermitage). It was adorned with rooms containing the sacrificial fire. The flowers, dropping from the trees, had made a beautiful carpet on the ground.

21. The place looked very beautiful with the tall trees with their large trunks. O king, the transparent and sacred river Malini flowed by it.

22. The river was charming to the ascetics and abounded with every species of water-fowls. He (the king) was much delighted to see the innocent deer-cubs playing (playfully) on her banks.

23. Thereupon, the king, whose chariot no foe could obstruct, entered that charming hermitage, exceedingly beautiful all over, and which was like the region of heaven.

24. He saw that the hermitage was situated on the banks of the river,—a most sacred one, and she flowed as the mother of all the creatures living there.

25. Milk-white waves played on her breast. Chakravakas sported on her banks. It was the abode of the Kinnaras, and it was frequented by the monkeys and the bears,

26. The holy ascetics, engaged in study and meditation, lived there on the beautiful banks of that river. It was frequented by the intoxicated elephants, tigers and great snakes,

27. On the banks of that river, stood the excellent and charming hermitage of the illustrious Rishi, (the descendant of) Kashyapa, frequented by many great ascetic Rishis.

28. He saw the river and the hermitage, and desired to enter into that sacred place.

29. The river was studded with many islands with beautiful and charming shores. It looked like the abode of Nara and Narayana, laved by the waters of the Ganges.

30. The best of men then entered that hermitage, which was resounding with the notes of the intoxicated pea-cocks, and which appeared like the gardens of Chitraratha (Gandharva).

31. He desired to see the great ascetic Rishi, the illustrious Kanwa, the son of Kashyapa, the possessor of all virtues, and who was too effulgent to be stared at.

32. Halting his army of flag-holders, cavalry, infantry and elephants at the outskirts of the forest, the king spoke to the soldiers thus,

33. "I shall go to see the mighty ascetic, the son of Kashyapa, who is beyond the Raja guna. Stay here till I return."

34. The king forgot his hunger and thirst and derived infinite pleasure as soon as he entered that forest, like Nandana, (the garden of Indra.)

35. The king, having laid aside all signs of royalty, entered that excellent hermitage with his Minister and Priest only.

36. He desired to see that Rishi who was an indestructible mass of ascetic merit. He saw that the hermitage was like the region of Brahma.

37. Bees were sweetly buzzing and birds were pouring forth their melodies. That best of men heard in one place the chanting of the Rig Vedas with the proper intonation by the best of Brahmanas.

38. In another place, (he saw) Brahmanas, learned in the Vedangas, reciting the hymns of Yuyur Veda. In another place, the Rishis of regid vows were reciting Saman hymns in harmonious strains.

39—41. In another place, he saw Brahmanas, learned in the Atharva Veda, reciting the Sanhitas according to the proper rules of voice. At other places, Brahmanas, learned in the science of orthodoxy, were reciting Mantras of other kinds. That holy hermitage, resounding with these holy sounds, did really look like the region of Brahma.

42. There were many Brahmanas who were experts in the art of making sacrificial platforms and in the rules of Krama in sacrifice. There were many other learned in Naya, (Logic) and mental sciences; and many having complete knowledge of the Vedas.

43. There were those that were learned in the meanings of every kind of expressions, those that were experts in performing special rites, those that knew the Mokhshadharma,

44. Those that were well-versed in establishing propositions, rejecting superfluous causes and drawing right conclusions, those that were learned in the science of words, of prosody, and of Nirukta, those that were learned in the science of Time (Astrology),

45. In the properties of matter, in the fruits of sacrificial rites, those that possessed a knowledge of causes and effects, those that understood the languages of monkeys and birds, and those that were well-read in all large treatises.

46. And various Shastras. The king, as he proceeded, heard their incantations and chantings, which were capable of charming all human hearts.

47. The destroyer of the enemy's army, (Dushmanta), saw around him innumerable learned Brahmanas of regid vows who were all engaged in jopa and homa.

48. The king was much astonished to see the beautiful carpets which these Brahmanas offered him (for his seat.)

49. That best of kings, seeing the rites with which the Brahmanas worshipped the deities, thought himself in the land of Brahma.

50—51. The more the king saw that auspicious and sacred hermitage of the son of Kashyapa (Kanwa), protected by that Rishi's ascetic virtues and endued with all the requisites of a holy retreat, more he desired to see it. He was not satisfied with this cursory view (of the beautiful hermitage). The destroyer of foes, accompanied by his Minister and his Priest, then entered that charming and sacred hermitage of the son of Kashyapa, inhabited by the great ascetic Rishis of regid vows.

Thus ends the seventieth chapter, Sambhava, in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXI.

(SAMBHABA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaisampayana said :—

1. Having proceeded further, leaving behind him all his attendants that mighty, armed king entered the hermitage, alone but he did not find there the Rishi of rigid vows, (Kanwa.)

2. Having seen that the Rishi's hermitage was empty, he hailed aloud, "Ho, who is here?" And his voice was echoed in the forest.

3. Hearing his voice, a maiden, in the garb of ascetics, as beautiful as Sree (Lakshmi), came out of the hermitage.

4. No sooner that black-eyed damsel saw the king Dushmanta, than she instantly bade him welcome, and worshipped him in due form.

5. She respected him with offering a seat, she gave him water to wash his feet, and she then offered him the argha. Having done all this, O king, she then enquired after his health and peace.

6. Having thus honoured him in due form and enquired about his health and peace, the maiden most respectfully asked the king, "What should be done?"

7. Having been thus honoured in due form, the king replied to that sweet-speeched and faultless featured damsel thus,

8. "I have come to worship the greatly blessed Rishi Kanwa. O amiable and beautiful lady, tell me where has the illustrious man gone?"

Sakuntala said :—

9. My noble father has gone away from the hermitage to collect fruits. Kindly wait for a moment, and you will see him when he will come.

Vaisampayana said :—

10. The king, having not seen the Rishi and having been thus addressed by the maiden, saw that she was exceedingly beautiful, she was an exquisite beauty of sweet-smiles, and a lady of perfect symmetry of shape.

11. She was in the bloom of her youth and beauty; she was adorned with the beauty of faultless features, hard asceticism, and sweet humility. The king addressed her thus,—

12. "Who are you? O beautiful lady, whose daughter are you? Why have you come into this forest? O beautiful lady, accomplished and beautiful as you are, whence have you come here?"

13. O charming lady, you have stolen my heart at the very first glance. I desire to learn all about you. O beautiful lady, tell me all."

14. Having been thus addressed by the king in that hermitage, the maiden smilingly replied to him in sweet words,

15. "O (king) Dushmanta, I am the daughter of the illustrious, virtuous, wise, and high-souled ascetic Kanwa.

Dushmanta said :—

16. The illustrious and highly blessed Rishi is worshiped by all the world. He has completely controlled his sexual passions. Even Dharma may fall from the right path, but an ascetic of rigid vows can never fall from it.

17. O beautiful and charming lady, how can you be his daughter? You should dispel from my mind this great doubt of mine.

Sakuntala said :—

18. O king, hear what I have learnt (from the Rishi), regarding all that happened to me, and how I became the daughter of the Rishi (Kanwa).

19. Once on a time, a Rishi came here and asked about my birth. O king, hear what the illustrious Rishi (Kanwa) told him about me.

Kanwa said :—

20. Vishwamitra of old were engaged in austere asceticism, and he thus alarmed Indra, the king of the celestials.

21. He (Indra) thought that the Rishi by his great ascetic penances would hurl him from his high seat in heaven. Being thus alarmed, he called Menaka and told her,

22. "O Menaka, you are the best of all celestial Apsaras. O amiable girl, do me this service, Listen to what I say.

23. The great ascetic Vishwamitra, as effulgent as the sun, is now engaged in great asceticism, and therefore my heart is trembling.

24. O Menaka, O slender-waisted girl, it is your business. You must see Vishwamitra, whose soul is rapt in contemplation and who is deeply engaged in the austere penances.

25. He may displace me from my (high) seat (in heaven). Go and tempt him. Frustrating his asceticism, do my good.

26. O beautiful girl, win him from his asceticism, by tempting him with your beauty, youth, agreeableness, arts, smiles and speech,

Menaka said :—

27. That illustrious Rishi, is a great ascetic and is greatly effulgent ; your illustrious self knows also that he is very wrathful.

28. The energy, the asceticism and the wrath of that illustrious man have made even you anxious. Why should I not be afraid of him ?

29. He made even the illustrious Vasista to suffer the grief of the premature death of his sons. He was originally a Kshatrya, but has become a Brahmana by his own strength (of asceticism)

30. He created a deep river of strong currents for the purposes of ablutions. That holy river is still known in the world by the name of Kousika.

31. Here (on the banks of this river) the wife (of this illustrious man) was maintained during a famine by the royal sage Matangi, who was living there as a hunter (under a curse)

32. O Lord, this illustrious man, after the famine was over, came back to his hermitage and gave the river the name of Para.

33. Being very much pleased with Matangi, this illustrious man became his priest for the purposes of sacrifice. O king of the celestials, out of fear you yourself went to that sacrifice to drink the Soma.

34. This illustrious man created in anger another world with stars ; he created numerous other stars, beginning from Sravana. This illustrious man gave protection to Trisanka, cursed by his preceptor.

35. I am afraid to go to a man whose deeds are such. O Lord, ordain that which may prevent him from burning me in anger.

36. He can burn the worlds with his effulgence ; he can make the earth quake by a kick ; he can uproot the great Meru (mountain) and hurl it to a great distance, and go round the ten points of the earth in a moment.

37. How can a woman (like my humble self) touch such a man who is full of ascetic virtues, who is as blazing as the blazing fire, and who has completely controlled his passions.

38. His mouth is as blazing as the fire, the pupils of his eyes are like the sun and the moon, and his tongue is like Yama himself. O best of the celestials, how can women like ourselves touch him ?

39. Yama, Soma, great Rishis, the Sadhyas, the Vishwas, the Valikhilyas, all are alarmed at the thought of his prowess.

Why should not a woman (like myself) be afraid of him ?

40. O king of the celestials, commanded by you somehow or other I must go to that Rishi. But, O king of the celestials, devise some means by which, under your protection, I can safely move about him.

41. O celestial, when I shall be near the Rishi, Maruta (wind) should be there, and rob me of my cloth. Manmatha (the god of love) should at your command help me in my this work.

42. Let the wind carry sweet fragrance from the wood to tempt the Rishi. Having said this, and having seen that all that she wanted had been duly provided, she went to the hermitage of the great Kaushika, (Veswamitra).

Thus ends the history of Sakuntala in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Kanwa said :—

1. Having been thus addressed, Indra commanded the wind to be present with Menaka when she would be present before the Rishi.

2. The timid and the beautiful girl then entered the hermitage and saw Vishwamitra, who had destroyed all his sins by penances, and who was still engaged in austere penances.

3. Having saluted the Rishi, she then began to sport near him. At this very time Maruta robbed her of her cloth, which was as white as the moon (light.)

4. And that beautiful girl in great bashfulness began to run after the cloth to catch it, and she appeared to express her great annoyance at the conduct of Maruta (wind).

5. She did all this before that great Rishi Vishwamitra, as effulgent as the fire, and he saw her in that state. He marked that she was of faultless features.

6. In her nude state, the best of the Rishis saw that Menaka was exceedingly beautiful, with no marks of age on her person.

7. Seeing her great beauty and accomplishments, that best of Rishis was filled with desire and wished for her company.

8—9. He invited her to come to him, and that faultless-featured beauty too accepted his invitation. They then passed many days in each others' company. Sporting with each other, they passed many years and thought that it was but only a day. That Rishi begot Sakuntala on her.

10. Menaka went to the banks of the river Malini which passed playfully through the beautiful valley of the Himalaya mountains, and there she gave birth to a daughter. She then left the child there (on the banks of the river), and went away.

11—12. Thus having been successful in her mission, she soon returned to Indra. Some vultures, seeing that the child lay in the deep forest abounding in lions and tigers, sat round it to protect it from harm. So that no carnivorous animals might take her life,

13. The vultures protected the life of Menakas' child. I had gone there to perform my ablutions. I saw the child lying

14. In the deep solitude of the forest, surrounded by the vultures. Bringing her here, I have made her my daughter.

15. According to the scriptures, the maker of the body, the protector of life and the giver of food, these three, are in their order considered to be fathers.

16. Because she was found in the solitude of the forest, protected by the Sakuntas (birds), she has been named Sakuntala (protected by birds.)

17. O Brahmana, know that it is thus that Sakuntala has become my daughter. And faultless Sakuntala also regards me as her father.

Sakuntala said :—

18. Thus the great Rishi (Kanwa), when asked, told (the Brahmana) the account of my birth. O king of men, you must know that I have thus become the daughter of Kanwa.

19. Not knowing who is my real father, I regard Kanwa as my father. Thus have I told you, O king, all that I heard about my birth.

Thus ends the seventy second chapter, the history of Sakuntala, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Dushmanta said :—

1. O princess, O blessed lady, all that you have said is well-spoken. O beautiful lady, be my wife. Tell me what I shall do (for you).

23. I shall present you, this very day, gold and golden-garlands, robes, ear-rings, white and beautiful pearls and gems, golden coins and finest carpets, collected from various countries. Let the whole of my kingdom be yours. O beautiful lady, be my wife.

4. O handsome lady, O timid maiden, O beauty of tapering thighs, marry me according to the Gandharva form, for this form of marriage is said to be the best.

Sakuntala said :—

5. O king, my father has gone from the hermitage to collect fruits. Kindly wait for a moment. He will bestow me upon you.

Dushmanta said :—

6. O beautiful lady, O faultless beauty, I desire that you yourself should accept me. Know that I exist for you. Know also, my heart is completely in you.

7. One is certainly one's own friend ; one can certainly depend upon one's own self. Therefore, according to the ordinance, you yourself should bestow your own self on others.

8. According to the ordinance, there are eight kinds of marriages, namely, Brahma, Daiva, Arsha, Prajapatya, Asura.

9. Gandharva, Rakhasha, and Paishacha. The son of the self-created (Brahma), Manu, has spoken which of these forms (of marriages) is appropriate to each of the four castes.

10. O faultless beauty, know that the first four forms are appropriate to the Brahmanas, and the first six for Kshatryas.

11. To the kings, even the Rakhasha form is permissible. The Asura form is permissible to the Vaisyas and Sudras. Of the first five (forms), three are proper and two improper.

12. The Paishacha and Asura forms should never be adopted (by any man). These are the ordinances of the scriptures, and man should act according to them.

13. The Gandharva and the Rakhasha forms are proper to the Kshatryas, therefore, you need not entertain the least fear. There is not the least doubt that either according to one single form or according to the mixed form of these two, marriage is proper to us, (and we may be married).

14. O beautiful lady, I am full of desire, so are you. You should, therefore, become my wife according to the Gandharva form.

Sakuntala said :—

14. O best of the Puru race, if this are the dictates of the scriptures, and if I am really my own disposer, know then my terms,

15. Promise to give me what I ask, in this lonely place, alone, between ourselves. The son that will be hereafter born of me

16. Must become the hier-apparent (to your throne). O Dushmanta, I tell you the truth. If this be the case, we may be united.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. The king, without taking time to consider the demand, told her at once, "O beauty of sweet smiles, let it be so. I shall even take you to my capital.

19—20. O handsome maiden, I tell you the truth. You deserve all this. I promise to do what you ask." So saying, the royal sage, (Dushmanta) married the beautiful Sakuntala of graceful walking, according to the due rites; and she accepted him as her husband. He returned to his capital after assuring her of his promise. He repeatedly told her,

21. "I shall send for you my troops of the four sorts. O beauty of sweet smiles, it is thus (with all honour), I shall take you to my capital."

22. O Janamejaya, having thus promised to her, the king went away. The king, as he went (towards his capital), began to think of Kanwa.

23. (He thought), "What would the illustrious ascetic do when he would hear all." Thus thinking on his way, he entered his capital.

24. The moment the king had gone away, Kanwa came to the hermitage. But Sakuntala did not go out to receive her father for shame.

25. The great ascetic Kanwa, possessed of spiritual knowledge (sight), knew all. Having thus seen every thing with his spiritual sight, the illustrious man was pleased and said,

26. "O amiable child, the act that you have committed today in secret without having waited (to receive my permission), has not been destructive of your virtue.

27. The marriage according to the Gandharva form, without Mantras, and between a willing woman and a willing man, is said to be the best to a Kshatrya.

28. The best of men, Dushmanta, is virtuous-minded and high-souled. O Sakuntala, you have accepted (this Dushmanta) for your husband.

29. The son, whom you will give birth to, will be mighty and illustrious in this world. He will extend his sway over the whole of his earth bounded by the sea.

30. When that illustrious king of kings (your son) will march out against his foes, his army will be irresistible to all opposition."

31. Sakuntala then came to her fatigued father and washed his feet. She took down the heavy load that was on his shoulder and placed the fruits in proper order. Then she said :—

32. "(O father), you should give your grace to my husband, king Dushmanta, the best of men.

Kanwa said :—

33. O beautiful child, I am prepared to bless him for your sake. But O blessed girl, receive from me the boon you desire to have. ॐ

Vaishampayana said :—

34. Thereupon, Sakuntala, moved with the desire to do good to Dushmanta, asked the boon that Paurava kings should be ever virtuous, and never to be deprived of their thrones.

Thus ends the seventy third chapter, the history of Sakuntala, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

(SAMBHABA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayanasaid :—

1. When Dushmanta went away from the hermitage, making the (above) promises to Sakuntala, she gave birth to a boy of immeasurable energy.

2. When the child grew only three years old, he became in splendour as blazing as the blazing fire. O Janamejaya, he was endued with great beauty, magnanimity and all accomplishments.

3. The best of pious men, Kanwa, performed all the rites ordained by the scriptures on that intelligent boy who began to grow up day by day.

4. The boy was gifted with sharp, strong and pearly teeth; he was strong enough to kill lions,—he had all auspicious signs on his palms,—he had a broad forehead,—he was beautiful and strong. Like a celestial child, he began daily to grow up.

5. When he grew six years old, he was so strong that he siezed and bound tigers, boars, buffaloes and elephants to the trees that stood near the hermitage.

6. He rode on some of these wild beasts; he siezed some of them, and sometimes he pursued some of them in playful mood. The dwellers of the hermitage of Kanwa, (finding all this), gave him a name. (They said,) "As he subjugated all beasts, let him be called Sarvadamana."

7. Thus the prince came to be called Sarvadamana,—endued as he was with great strength, energy and powers.

8. Seeing the extraordinary acts of the boy, the Rishi (Kanwa) told Sakuntala that the time had come when he should be installed as the heir-apparent.

9. Seeing the great strength of the boy, Kanwa spoke to his disciples thus, "Take Sakuntala with her son from this hermitage to the house of her husband, blessed with all auspicious signs.

10. It is not fit for women to live forever in the house of their paternal or maternal relations. Such residence destroys their good name, good conduct and virtue. Therefore, take her to her husband's house without delay."

11. The greatly effulgent disciples (of Kanwa), having promised to do it, started with Sakuntala and her son towards the city of Hastinapur.

12. That beauty of fair eye-brows, taking her lotus-eyed son of celestial beauty with her, left the forest where she had first met Dushmanta.

13. Having sent words, she entered the royal court with her son, as effulgent as the morning sun. And she was then introduced to him.

14. The disciples of the Rishi, having told the King every thing, returned to the hermitage. And Sakuntala, after duly worshipping the King, said,

Sakuntala said :—

15. O King, this is your son. Let him be installed as your heir-apparent. O King, this god-like boy was begotten by you on me. O best of men, fulfil now the promise you made to me.

16. O illustrious man, call to your mind the agreement you made with me on the occasion of our marriage at the hermitage of Kanwa.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Having heard her words, the King remembered everything, but he said, "I remember nothing. O wicked ascetic woman, to whom do you belong ?

18. I do not remember to have any connection with you with regard to (either) Dharma, Artha or Kama. Go, or stay or do whatever you please."

19. Thus being addressed, the beautiful ascetic lady was filled with shame. She lost her consciousness from grief, and she stood like a woden post.

20. Soon became her eyes red like copper; her lips began to quiver; she cast upon the King her (angry) glances which seemed to burn him.

21. Her rising anger and blazing fire of her asceticism she kept down with a great effort.

22. Collecting her thought in a moment, she thus addressed her husband looking straight at him in grief and in anger.

23. "O great king, knowing every thing, how can you, like a mean and inferior man, say that you know nothing ?

24. Your heart is the witness to the truth or to the falsehood of my words. Therefore, speak the truth, and do not degrade yourself.

25. He, who has one thing in his mind, but represents another thing to others, is a thief and a robber of his own self. What sin is he not capable of committing ?

26. You think that you alone know what you did. But do you not know that the great Omniscient One dwells in your heart. He knows all your sins, and you sin in his presence.

27. Man, when sinning, thinks that no one sees him. But he is seen by the celestials and by the Diety who dwells in every heart.

28. The sun, the moon, the air, the fire, the earth, the sky, the water, the heart, Yama, the day, the night, the twilight and Dharma see every act of man.

29. Yama, the son of Vivaswata, takes no account of the sins of that man with whom the Diety, the witness of all acts, remains pleased.

30. But that sinner, with whom the great Diety is not pleased, is punished by Yama for his wicked deeds.

31. He, who falsely represents his self and thus degrades himself, is never blessed by the celestials. Even his own soul does not bless him.

32. I have come of my own accord, but I am a devoted wife to my husband. Do not disrespect me. I am your wife, and deserve to be treated respectfully.

33. Why do you treat me before all these men like an ordinary woman? I am certainly not crying in the wilderness. Do you not hear me ?

34. O Dushmanta, if you refuse what I ask you to do, your head will to day be divided into a thousand pieces.

35. The learned men of old say that the husband himself, entering into the womb of his wife, comes out as the son. Therefore, the wife is called Jaya.

36. The son, that is born to a wise man, rescues the spirits of his deceased ancestors.

37. Because the son rescues his ancestors from the hell, called Put, therefore he has been called by the self-created (Brahma) himself as Putra.

38. A man conquers the world by the birth of a son ; he enjoys eternity by that of a grandson ; the great grandfathers enjoy eternal happiness by the birth of a grandson's son.

39. She is a true wife who is a good house-wife ; she is a true wife whose heart is devoted to her husband ; she is a true wife who is faithful to her husband.

40. A man's half is his wife, the wife is her husbands' best of friends ; the wife is the source of Dharma, Artha and Kama ; the wife is the source of salvation.

41. Those that have wives can perform religious acts ; those that have wives lead domestic lives. Those that have wives can be happy, and those that have wives can achieve good fortune.

42. The sweet-speeched wives are their husband's friends on the occasion of joy ; they are as fathers on occasions of religious acts ; they are as mothers in the hours of illness and woe.

43. Even in the deep forest, the wife is the refreshment and solace to her roaming husband. He who has a wife, is trusted by all. The wife, therefore, is man's great means of salvation.

44. When the husband goes to the land of Yama, leaving this world, it is the devoted wife only that accompanies him there.

45. The wife, gone before (dying before her husband), waits for the spirit of her husband, and if the husband goes before, the chaste wife soon follows him.

46. O king, for all these reasons, marriage exists (in this world). The husband enjoys the company of his wife, both here in this world and hereafter.

47. The learned men have said that a man himself is born as his son ; therefore, a man whose wife has given birth to a son, should look upon her as his mother.

48. Looking at the face of the son, begotten on his wife, a man sees his own face as he does in a mirror ; and feels himself as happy as a virtuous man attaining to heaven.

49. Men, burnt by mental grief or afflicted by disease, feel as much relieved as a perspiring man does in a cool bath.

50. No man, even in anger, should even do any thing that is disagreeable to his wife ; for happiness, joy, virtue and everything depend on the wife.

51. Wife is the sacred soil in which the husband is born again. Even Rishis cannot create men without women.

52. What is a greater happiness to a father than what the father feels when his son, running to him, clasps him with his (tiny little) arms, though his body is full of dust and dirt ?

53. Why are you treating with indifference this your son who has himself come to you, and who is wistfully casting his glances towards you ?

54. Even ants support their off-spring and do not destroy their eggs. Why then should you not, being learned in the rules of piety, support your own child ?

55. The touch of the sandal-paste, that of women and water, is not so pleasing as that of one's own infant son, locked in his embrace.

56. As the Brahmana is the best among bipeds (men), as cow is the best among quadrupeds, as preceptor is the best among all superiors, so is the son among all objects pleasing to the touch.

57. Let this handsome son touch you in your embrace. There is nothing in the world more pleasing to the touch than that of a son.

58. O chastiser of foes, O great king, I gave birth to this boy, the dispeller of your grief, after the completion of three years.

59. O descendant of the Puru race, when I was in the lying-in room, the following words were uttered in the sky,—He shall perform one hundred horse-sacrifices.

60. Men, going to places remote from their homes, take up other men's sons on their laps, and smelling their heads, feel great happiness.

61. You know that the Brahmanas utter the following Vedic Mantras at the birth-day, ceremony of the child.

62. "You are born of my body ; you have sprung from my heart. You are myself in the form of my son. Live for one hundred years."

63. "My life depends on you. The continuation of my race also depends on you. Therefore, live in happiness for one hundred years."

64. He (this boy) has sprung from your body, he is a second being begotten from you. Behold your own self in your own son, as you see your image in the clear waters of the lake.

65. As the sacrificial fire is kindled from the domestic fire, so has this one (your son), sprung from you. Though you are one, you have divided yourself in two.

66. O king, in your hunting expedition, I was approached by you when I was a virgin in my father's hermitage.

67. Urvasi, Provachetta, Sahagani, Menaka, Vishwachi, and Ghritachi, these are the six foremost Apsaras.

68. Amongst them again, Menaka, born of a Brahmana, is the first. Descending from heaven on earth, she gave me birth from her association with Vishwamitra.

69. The Apsara Menaka gave me birth in a valley of the Himalayas. Devoid of affections, she went away, leaving me there, as if I was a child of some others.

70. What great sin did I commit of old in some other life that I was cast away by my parents in my infancy, and now I am cast away by you?

71. Cast off from you, I am ready to go back to the hermitage. But you should not cast off this child who is your own son.

Dushmanta said:—

72. O Sakuntala, I do not know that I begot this child on you. Women generally speak falsehood. Who will believe your words?

73. Your mother is lewd Menaka, destitute of affection; she cast you off in the valley of the Himalayas as one casts off the flowers after offering them to the gods.

74. Your father also is lustful Vishwamitra of the Kshatrya race, destitute of all affection,—the man who was tempted to become a Brahmana.

75. But (if you say), Menaka is the foremost of Apsaras, and Vishwamitra is the foremost of Rishis, why then do you, being their daughter, speak like a lewd woman?

76. Your these words deserve no credence. Are you not ashamed to utter them,—specially before me? Go away, O wicked ascetic woman.

77. Where is now that best of great Rishis (Vishwamitra), and that best of Apsaras Menaka? And where are you, (though) in the humble garb of ascetics.

78. Your this son is very big, and appears to be very strong. How has he, within so short time, grown up like a Sala sprout?

79. You are born very low, you speak also like a lewd woman. You were lustfully conceived by Menaka.

80. O ascetic woman, all that you say is quite unknown to me. I do not know you. Go away wherever you please.

81. O king, you (can) see the faults of others, though they may be as small as the mustard seed. But you can not see your own faults, though they are as big as the Vilwa fruit.

82. Menaka is a celestial, (nay) Menaka is considered to be the best of celestials. O Dushmanta, my birth is nobler than your own.

83. O great king, you walk on earth, but I roam in the sky. Know that the difference between you and me is like that of a mustard seed and the Meru (mountain.)

84. O king, behold,—I can go to the abodes of Indra, Kuvera, Yama and Varuna.

85. O sinless man, there is a proverb which I am going to mention to you; (but I am not doing it) from any evil motive, but only as an example. Therefore, kindly pardon me for referring to it.

86. The ugly man, until he sees his face in a mirror, considers himself more handsome than others.

87. But when he sees his own face in the mirror, it is then that he perceives the difference between himself and others.

88. He, who is really very handsome, never taunts others. He, who too much vilifies others, is only considered to be a reviler.

89. As the swine seeks for the dirt and filth even when it is in a flower-garden, so does a wicked man chose only evil out of the evil and the good that others speak.

90. But as the geese always extract milk, though mixed with water, so does a wise man accept only what is good from the speech that is intermixed with both good and evil.

91. Honest men always feel pain to speak ill of others, but wicked men always derive pleasure in doing it.

92. Honest men always feel pleasure in showing respect towards the old (good men), but the fools always feel pleasure in abusing them)

93. Honest men are happy in not seeking others' fault, but the fools are happy in doing it. The wicked always speak ill of honest men, but honest men never injure the wicked, even if injured by them.

94. What could be more ridiculous in the world than this, that those that are wicked should represent really honest men as wicked.

95. Even athiests are afraid of those who have fallen from truth and virtue, as all men are afraid of the snakes of virulent poison. (When such is the case with an athiest), what shall I speak of me who is a thiest?

96. The man, who having begotten a son who is his own image, does not look after him, never gains the higher worlds. The celestials destroy his good fortune and wealth.

97. The Pitris (ancestors) have said that the son continues the race and supports the relations; therefore, to give birth to a son is the best of all pious acts: Therefore, your this son should not be abandoned.

98. Manu has said that there are five kinds of sons, namely those begotten by one on his wife, those obtained from others, those purchased for a price, those reared out of affection, and those begotten on other women.

99. Sons support the religion and achievements of men; they increase their happiness; they rescue the dead ancestors from hell.

100. Therefore, O best of kings, it is not proper for you to abandon your son. O king of the earth, cherish your own self, truth and virtue, (by cherishing your this son).

101. O best of kings, it is not proper for you to play hypocri's in this matter. The dedication of a tank is more meritorious than that of one hundred wells. A sacrifice is more meritorious than the dedication of a tank. But (to beget a son) is more meritorious than the celebration of sacrifices. Truth (however) is more meritorious than the birth of one hundred sons.

102. If one hundred horse-sacrifices and truth were weighed, truth would be found heavier than one hundred horse-sacrifices.

103. O king, I tell you, truth is equal to the study of the entire Vedas and ablutions in all the sacred pilgrimages.

104. There is no virtue equal to truth, there is nothing (in this world) superior to truth. And there is nothing (again) more sinful than falsehood.

105. O king, truth is the great Brahma, truth is the great vow; therefore, O king, do not violate your pledge. Let truth and yourself be ever united.

106. If, however, you are united with falsehood, if you do not place any credence on my word, I shall go away from this place of my own accord. Your companionship should not be sought after.

107. But, O Dushmanta, (know this for a certainty), that when you are dead, my this son shall rule the whole earth, surrounded by the four seas and adorned by the king of mountains.

Vaishampayana said:—

108. Having said all this to the king, Sakuntala turned her back. Thereupon a voice from the sky, coming from one who had no visible shape, addressed Dushmanta who was sitting, surrounded by his ministers, priests and Ritwikas.

109. (It said), "O Dushmanta, the mother is but a sheath of flesh (within which the son dwells). The son, sprung from the father, is the father himself. Therefore, cherish your son and do not insult Sakuntala.

110. O best of men, the son begotten by one's own self, rescues him from the abode of Yama. You are the father of this son. Sakuntala has spoken the truth.

111. The husband divides his body in two parts and is born in the womb of his wife as the son. O king, O Dushmanta, therefore, cherish your this son, born of Sakuutala.

112. To forsake one's own son and to live thereafter is a great misfortune. Therefore, O descendant of the Puru race, cherish your this high-souled son, born of Sakuntala.

113. As you will cherish this child at our word, therefore, your this son will be known by the name of Bharata.

114. Having heard these words of the dwellers of heaven, the king of the Puru race was much pleased, and addressing his priests and ministers, he said:—

115. "Hear all of you the words of the messenger of heaven. I myself know that this boy is my son.

116. If I had accepted him as my son at Sakuntala's words, my people would have been suspicious, and my son also would not have been considered to be pure (of pure birth)."

Vaishampayana said:—

117. O descendant of the Varata race, the king was exceedingly pleased, because the purity of the birth of his son was established by the messenger of heaven.

118. He then performed with joy all those rites which a father should perform for his son.

119. He smelt his son's head; he embraced him with affection. The Brahmanas uttered blessings on him, and the bards began to applaud him.

120. The king then enjoyed the great pleasure that one feels at the touch of one's own son. Dushmanta also received his wife (Sakuntala) with all honour and affection. Affectionately pacifying her, he spoke to her thus;—

121—22. "O lady, my union with you took place in private. None knew of it, and therefore, it is natural that people should have thought that our union was only out of lust, and that we were not husband and wife. This son, installed as my heir-apparent, would have been considered as a man of impure birth. Therefore, I was thinking how best to establish your purity.

123. O dearest, O lady of beautiful eyes, I have forgiven you for all the hard words you have uttered in anger. You are my darling."

124. O descendant of the Bharata race, having spoken thus to his dear queen (Sakuntala), the royal sage Dushmanta, received her with the presents of perfume, food and drink.

125. The king Dushmanta, thereupon, installed the son of Sakuntala as his heir-apparent, bestowing upon him the name of Bharata.

126. From that day the invincible car of Bharata, like the car of the celestials, with its famous and bright wheels, traversed the whole earth, filling it with its rattle.

127. The son of Dushmanta (Bharata) brought under his sway all the kings of the world. He ruled his subjects virtuously and gained great fame.

128. That king (Bharata) was known by the name of Chakravarti and Sarva-vauma. He performed many sacrifices like Indra, the lord of the Marutas.

129. Kanwa was the chief priest in those sacrifices, and great offerings were made to the Brahmanas. The fortunate king performed both the cow and the horse-sacrifices.

130. Bharata gave one thousand gold coins to Kanwa as his sacrificial fee. From this Bharata has followed this, "achievement of Bharata;" from him has sprung this great race (of Bharata.)

131—32. All kings that were born after him are called after his name. And in this Bharata race were many god-like and greatly powerful best of monarchs. They were like Brahma himself. Their names are countless.

133. O descendant of the Bharata race, I shall name only the chief ones, who were all blessed with great fortune and devoted to truth and honesty. They were all like the celestials.

Thus ends the seventy fourth chapter, the end of the history of Sakuntala, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampanya said:—

1. O sinless one, Prajapati Daksha, Vaivatsata Manu, Bharata, Kuru, Pura, Ajamira,

2—3. Jadava and all the other kings of the Bharata race,—O sinless king, I shall now recite the holy, illustrious, and long life-bestowing histories of these great men. They were as effulgent as the sun and the great Rishis.

4. Prachata had ten sons, who were all devoted to asceticism, and they all possessed every virtue. They burnt with the fire of their mouth many medicinal plants.

5. O best of king, from them was born Prachatas Daksha, and from Daksha sprang all creatures. Therefore, he was called the Grandsire.

6. The Rishi Daksha, born of Prachatas, begot one thousand sons, uniting with Virini; they were all of rigid vows like himself.

7. Narada taught these one thousand sons of Daksha the excellent philosophy of Sankhya, the means of salvation.

8. O Janamejaya, the lord of creation Prajapati Daksha, from the desire of creating more creatures, begot fifty daughters. He made them all his Putrees.

9. He bestowed ten of his daughters on Dakshha, thirteen on Kashyapa, and twenty-seven on Chandra who were all engaged in indicating time.

10. Kashyapa, the son of Marichi, begot on his wife, the daughter of Dakshha, who was the eldest among his thirteen wives, Aditya,

11. The greatly effulgent celestials, Indra, being at their head, and Vivaswata also. Vivaswata's son was born Yama, the great lord.

12. Martanda (Vivaswata) begot another son who was gifted with great intelligence and he was called Manu. Yama was his younger brother.

13. Manu was greatly wise and virtuous; he became the progenitor of a race. The offspring of Manu were called Manavas, (human beings.)

14. It was from Manu that all men, including Brahmanas, Kshatryas, and others have been born. O great king, the Brahmanas and Kshatryas were subsequently united.

15. Those sons of Manu, who were Brahmanas, became devoted to the study of the Vedas. Vena, Dhrishnu, Norishyana, Navaga, Ikshaku,

16. Kurusha, and Sarjati, the eighth a daughter, named Ila, the ninth Prishadhru, who was gifted with all the virtues of Kshatryas.

17. Nabhagarishata was the tenth son of Daksha. Besides these, Manu had fifty other sons on earth,

18. We have heard, they all perished quarrelling with one another. The learned Pururava was born of Ila.

18. We have heard that Ila was both the father and the mother of Pururava. He had sway over thirteen islands of the sea. Though he was a human being, yet he remained always surrounded by superhuman companions.

20. Pururava, intoxicated with the pride of power which he possessed, quarrelled with the Brahmanas, caring little for their anger. He robbed them of their wealth.

21. Seeing this, Sanatkumar came from the region of Brahma, and gave him good counsel, which he did not accept.

22. Thereupon, the wrath of the great Rishis was excited, and the king, who was intoxicated with the pride of power and who lost his reason, was immediately killed by their curse.

23. This king (Pururava) brought from the region of the Gandharvas, three kinds of fire for sacrificial purposes with the Apsara Urvashi.

24. He begot six sons on Urvasi, namely Ayus, Dhimata, Amavasu, Dhridhayus, and Satayus.

25. It is said that Ayus begot on the daughter of Swarvavaru four sons, namely Nahusha, Vrihadhasarmana, Rajingaya, and Anenas.

26. O king, of all the sons of Ayus, Nahusha was exceedingly intelligent and powerful. He ruled his kingdom with great virtue.

27. King Nahusha equally supported the Pitris, the Devas, the Rishis, the Gandharvas, the Nagas, the Rakshasas, the Brahmanas, the Kshatryas and the Vaisyas.

28. He suppressed all the robbers with a mighty hand; he made them pay tribute to the Rishis and carry them on their back as beasts of burdens.

29. Beating the very dwellers of heaven with his beauty, his asceticism, his prowess and energy, he ruled the earth, as if he was Indra himself.

30. Nahusha begot six sweet-speached sons, namely, Yati, Yayati, Sanyati, Ajati, Ayati and Dhrava.

31. Yati adopted asceticism, and became a great Rishi like Brahma himself. Yayati became greatly virtuous.

32. He ruled over the whole earth; he performed many sacrifices; he worshipped the Pitris with great reverence, and showed a great respect towards the celestials.

33. He showed great kindness and favour to all his subjects, and he was never defeated by any foe. His sons were all great bow-men, and were gifted with all accomplishments.

34. O great king, they were born of Devjani and Sarmishta, his two wives. From Devjani were born Yadus and Tarvasu.

35. From Sarmishta were born Drahyu, Anu, and Puru. O king, after ruling his subjects with virtue for a long time,

36. The son of Nahusha (Yayati) was attacked by the terrible old age which destroyed his personal beauty. Having been thus attacked by old age, the king thus addressed his sons,

37—38. Namely Yadu, Puru, Tarvasu, Drahyu and Anu, "O Dear sons, I wish to be young, and desire to pass my time with young women. Help me in this." His eldest son, born of Devjani said,

39. "What do you require? Do you want to have our youth?" Yayati replied, "Accept my old age.

40. I would then enjoy myself with your youth. During a long sacrifice, I was cursed by the Rishi Usanas, and therefore, thus have I lost all my powers of enjoying sensual pleasures. O sons, I shall enjoy myself with your youth.

41. (Therefore), take any of you my decrepitude, and rule the kingdom with my body. I would then enjoy myself with a renovated youthful body.

42. Yadu and other sons did not agree to take upon them his old age.

Thereupon, his youngest son, the virtuous and powerful Puru said,

43. "O king, enjoy again with a renovated body and returned youth. I shall take upon me your old age, and I shall rule the kingdom at your command."

44. Thus being addressed, the royal sage (Yayati) transferred his old age on his high-souled son (Puru) with his power of asceticism.

45. The king again became a young man with the youth of Puru; and Puru with the old age of his father upon him ruled the kingdom.

46. Even when one thousand years had thus passed away, Yayati, the best of kings, the invincible hero, remained as strong and powerful as a tiger.

47. He enjoyed for a long time the sweet company of his two wives. He enjoyed with (Apsara) Vishwachi in the gardens of Chitraratha (Gandharva king.)

48. That illustrious man had not his desires satiated even after this. Thereupon, the king remembered the following words of the Purana.

49. "One's desires are never satiated with enjoyments. On the other hand, with indulgence they flame up like the sacrificial fire with Ghee poured into it.

50. Even if one enjoys the whole earth, with its wealth, its diamonds, gold, animals and women, still his desires will not be satiated.

51. It is only when a man does not commit a sin in thought, deed or word in respect of any living creatures, it is then that he attains to the purity of Brahma.

52. When a man fears nothing, and when he is feared by none, when he desires for nothing, and when he injures none, it is then that he attains to the purity of Brahma."

53. The greatly wise king, seeing this, and having been satisfied that one's desires are never satiated, received back his old age from his son.

54. Though his desires were not satiated, he gave back his youth to his son Puru, and installed him on the throne, saying,

55. "From you my race would continue. You are my true son and heir. My race will be known in the world after your name."

Vaishampayana said:—

56. That best of kings, (Yayati), having installed Puru on the throne went to the mount Vrigu to become a great ascetic.

57. After many years he succumbed to the inevitable influence of Time. Observing the vow of fasting, he ascended heaven with his wives.

Thus ends the seventy fifth chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Janamejaya said:—

1. How did our ancestor (Yayati) who was the tenth from Prajapati, obtain the unobtainable daughter of Sukra?

2. O great ascetic, I desire to hear this in detail. Tell me also separately the account of those kings who were the founders of dynasties.

Vaishampayana said:—

3—4. O Janamejaya, the king Yayati was as effulgent as Indra himself. I shall tell you in reply to your question how Sukra and Vrishaparva bestowed (on the king) their daughters in due rites, and I shall specially narrate how the union of the king Yayati, the son of Nahusha, took place with Devjani.

5. In the days of yore, great battles were often fought between the Devas and the Asuras for the sovereignty over the three worlds.

6. From the desire of securing victory, the celestials appointed the Rishi who was the son of Angirasha (Vrihaspati) as their priest to conduct their sacrifices; and their opponents appointed Usanas (Sukra) as their priest for the same purpose.

7. There was much boastful rivalry between these two Brahmanas. All those Danavas that were killed in battle by the Devas

8. Were revived by that sage (Sukra) with the power of his knowledge; and they, thus being made alive, fought again with the celestials.

9. The Asuras also killed many Devas, but the greatly learned Vrihaspati could not revive them.

10. He did not know the science of Sanjibani (giving life to the dead) which the greatly powerful Rishi (Sukra) knew very well. The celestials were, therefore, very sorry.

11. Thereupon, the celestials, in great anxiety and in fear of the learned Usanas, went to Kacha, the eldest son of Vrihaspati; and they spoke to him thus,

12. "We ask for your protection, we worship you. Help us in a work which consider as very important. The knowledge of that science which is known to that Brahmana of immeasurable prowess,

13. Sukra, must be obtained by you as soon as possible. You will then be a sharer with us in all sacrificial offerings. You shall find that Brahmana (Sukra) in the court of (king) Vrishaparva.

14. He always protects the Danavas, but never the celestials, their opponents. You are younger than he, and you are, therefore, able to revere him.

15. You can also adore Devjani, the favourite daughter of that illustrious man. You are capable of conciliating them both. There is none else who can do it.

16. You are sure to obtain that knowledge (of Sanjibani from the Rishi) by gratifying Devjani with your conduct, liberality, sweetness, and general behaviour."

17. Having been thus addressed and worshipped by the celestials, he said, "Be it so." He then went to the court of king Vrishaparva.

18. O king, having been thus sent by the celestials, Kacha soon came to the city of the king of the Asuras; and seeing Sukra there, he thus addressed him,

19. "Reverend Sir, accept me as your disciple. I am the grandson of Rishi Angirasha and the son of Vrihaspati. I am known as Kacha by name.

20. Accepting you as my great preceptor, I shall practise Brahmacharya for one thousand years. Therefore, command me.

Sukra said :—

21. O Kacha, you are welcome. I accept your words. I shall treat you with regard, for by my doing it, Vrihaspati will be regarded.

Vaishampayana said :—

22. Commanded by the son of Kavi, Usanas, also called Sukra, Kacha said, "Be it so." And he took the vow he spoke of.

23. O descendant of the Bharata race, (Kacha) took the vow he had spoken of at the proper time and began to worship his preceptor (Sukra) and Devjani.

24. That youth (Kacha) daily gratified Devjani who was also in her youth with singing, dancing and playing on various kinds of instruments.

25. O descendant of the Bharata race, he gratified that maiden, Devjani, who was in her youth, with the presentations of flowers and fruits, and serving her as an obedient servant.

26. And Devjani also, when they were alone, gratified that vow-observing youth (Kacha) with her songs and sweetness of manners.

27. When five hundred years had thus passed away of his vow, the Danavas came to know his intention.

28. One day the Danavas saw Kacha when he was tending (his preceptor's) kine. They then killed him out of the hatred they bore against Vrihaspati and from the desire of saving the knowledge of Sanjibani.

29. They hacked him to pieces and gave his body to be devoured by jackals and wolves. The kine returned to the fold without the cow-herd (Kacha).

30. O descendant of the Bharata race, when Devjani saw that the kine had returned without Kacha, she spoke to her father thus,

Devjani said :—

31. O sire, the Agnihotra (evening fire) is kindled, the sun has also set. The kine have come back without their cow-herd. But Kacha is not to be seen.

32. O father, it is evident, Kacha is either dead or killed. I tell you truly that I shall not live without him.

Sukra said :—

33. I will revive him by saying, "Come here." Then with the help of the knowledge of Sanjibani, he summoned Kacha (to come to him.)

34. Having been thus summoned, Kacha appeared in joy, tearing the bodies of the wolves (that had devoured him.)

35. Having been asked by the daughter of Vargava, (Sukra) the reason of his delay, he said, "O sweet lady, burdened with sacrificial wood and kusa grass,

36. I was coming towards the hermitage, and feeling tired, I sat under a banian tree. All the kine also were staying under the shade of that tree.

37. The Asuras, having seen me there, asked me, "Who are you?" They heard my this reply, "I am Kacha, the son of Vrihaspati."

38. As soon as I said this, those Danavas killed me, and having hacked my body to pieces, they gave it to jackals and wolves. They then went to their homes in joy.

39. O amiable lady, summoned by the illustrious Vargava (your father), I have somehow or other come before you having been made alive."

40. On another occasion, the Brahmana Kacha at the request of Devjani, went into the forest to collect flowers and when he was freely roaming there, he was again seen by the Danavas. They again killed him, (pounded him to powders) and mixed him with the waters of the ocean.

41. Finding him again late in coming home, that maiden again told her father what had happened. Having been again summoned by that Brahmana (Sukra) to come home, Kacha appeared before the daughter of his preceptor. He again repeated to her all that had happened to him.

42. They killed him for the third time. And having reduced him to ashes by burning, they mixed those ashes with the wine which they offered to the Brahmana (Sukra).

43. Devjani again spoke to her father thus, "O father, Kacha was sent to gather flowers, but he is not to be seen.

44. It is evident, Kacha is either dead or killed. I tell you truly, I shall not live without him."

Sukra said :—

45. O daughter, the son of Vrihaspati, Kacha has gone to the land of the Dead. Though again and again revived by my knowledge, he is often killed. What shall I do ?

46—47. O Devjani, do not grieve, do not weep. One like you should not grieve for one who is mortal. You are worshipped by Brahma, by Brahmanas, the celestials with (their king) Indra, the Vasus, the Ashwinis, the Asuras and by the whole universe. It is impossible to keep him alive. For every time I revive him he is killed (by the Danavas.)

Devjani said :—

48. Why should I not grieve and weep for Kacha, whose grandfather is old Angirasha himself and whose father is the great ascetic Vrihaspati, who is the grandson of a Rishi and the son of a Rishi.

49. He himself is a Brahmachari and an ascetic; he is always wakeful in every work. O father, I shall starve and follow the way on which Kacha has gone. The handsome Kacha is dear to me.

Vaishampayana said :—

50. The great Rishi (Sukra), the son of Kavi, being much afflicted by Devjani's words, cried in anger, "The Asuras certainly want to injure me, for they killed my disciple living with me.

51. These followers of Rudra (Asuras) want to make me a non-Brahmana by making me participate in their crimes of killing Brahmanas. The crime of killing a Brahmana even burns Indra. This crime has a terrible end." Having said this, he summoned

Kacha, but being afraid of his preceptor's safety, he feebly replied from within the stomach of Sukra.

52. Sukra then asked him, "O Brahmana, how have you entered my stomach !"

Kacha said :—

By your grace my memory has not left me. I recollect every thing that had happened to me. My ascetic virtues also have not been destroyed. Therefore, I am capable of bearing this insufferable pain.

53. O son of Kavi, I was killed by the Asuras; my body was burnt and reduced to ashes, and I was then given to you with your wine. O Brahmana, when you are present, how is it possible for the Asura Maya (the power of the Asuras) to overcome the Brahma Maya (the power of the Brahmanas.)

Sukra said :—

54. O Devjani, what good can I do to you? Kacha's life can be revived only with my death. Kacha is within me. There is no other way of his coming out, except by ripping open my stomach.

Devjani said :—

55. Both the shocks will burn me like fire. The death of Kacha and that of yours are both same to me. The death of Kacha will kill me. If you die, I shall not be able to bear life.

Sukra said :—

56. O son of Vrihaspati, you are crowned with success, when Devjani adores you so much. If you are not Indra in the guise of Kacha, to-day, accept,—I give you the science of reviving life.

57. None can come out alive from my stomach. A Brahmana, however, must not be killed. Therefore, accept the knowledge I teach you.

58. Come to life again as my son. Possessed of the knowledge I teach you, and being again revived by me, O child, take care that you act with gratitude when you come out of my stomach.

Vaishampayana said :—

59. Receiving the knowledge (of reviving life) from his preceptor, the handsome Kacha ripped open the stomach (of Sukra), and came out like the moon on the evening of the full-moon night.

60. Seeing the remains of his preceptor lying like a heap of ascetic virtues and learning, Kacha revived him with the knowledge he had received. He then spoke to the preceptor thus,

61. "I regard him, who pours the Ambrosia of knowledge into one's ears, as you have done to me who was devoid of knowledge, both as my father and as my mother. He who has gratitude can never injure his preceptor."

62. Those that, having acquired knowledge, injure their preceptor who is an object of adoration, who is the giver of knowledge, and who is the most precious of all precious objects on earth, become hated on earth, and finally go to the regions of the sinful.

Vaishampayana said :—

63-64. Having been deceived while under the influence of wine, and remembering the terrible consequences of drink and the total loss of consciousness, the result of it, and seeing before him the handsome Kacha whom he had drunk with the wine while intoxicated, (the learned Sukra), with the wish of effecting a reform in the manners of the Brahmanas, rose from the ground in anger, and spoke thus,

65. "That wretched Brahmana, who being unable to resist the temptation, will drink liquor from this day, shall be considered as to have committed the sin of slaying a Brahmana, and he shall be hated both in this and in the other world."

66. I set this limit to the conduct of the Brahmanas everywhere. Let this (my solemn words) be heard by the honest men, by the Brahmanas, by the celestials, and by those who regard their superiors."

67. Having said this, the illustrious Rishi, the ascetic of ascetics, summoned the Danavas who had been deprived of their good sense by Fate. He then told them,

68. "O foolish Danavas, know that Kacha had obtained his wish. He will henceforth dwell with me. Having obtained the knowledge of Sanjibani, that illustrious Brahmana has become as powerful as Brahma himself."

69. Having said this much, Bhargava (Sukra) stopped. The Danavas, being astonished, went away to their homes.

70. Kacha, after having lived with his preceptor for full one thousand years, prepared to go to the land of the celestials with the permission of his preceptor.

Thus ends the seventy sixth chapter the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When the period of his vow expired, and when he was prepared to go to the land of the celestials, after having received the permission of his preceptor, Devjani addressed him thus,

2. "O the grandson of Rishi Angirasha, you shine most brightly in conduct, in birth, in learning, in asceticism and in humility."

3. As the Rishi Angirasha is honoured by my illustrious father, so is (your father) Vrihaspati honoured and respected by me.

4. O great ascetic, knowing this, hear what I say. You are aware of my behaviour towards you during the period of your vow.

5. Your vow is now over; you should now fix your affection on me who love you. Accept my hand with ordained rites and Mantras.

Kacha said :—

6. You are an object of my respect and worship, as is your illustrious father. O lady of faultless features, you are an object of greater reverence to me (than your father).

7. You are dearer than life to the high-souled Bhargava. O amiable lady, you are ever worthy of my worship, as you are the daughter of my preceptor.

8. As your father Sukra, my preceptor, is ever honoured by me, so are you. O Devjani, therefore, you should not speak to me thus.

Devjani said :—

9. O best of the twice born, you are the son of my preceptor's son, you are not the son of my father. Therefore, you are an object of my respect and worship.

10. O Kacha, when the Asuras killed you again and again, you should recollect today the love I showed towards you.

11. O virtuous man, remembering my love and affection for you, and also my devoted regard for you, you should not abandon me without any faults.

Kacha said :—

12. O lady of virtuous vows, do not urge me into such a sinful course. O lady of fair eye-brows, be graceful to me. O amiable lady, you are an object of greater regard than my preceptor.

13. O large-eyed lady, O lady of handsome face, O amiable maiden, the place the body of the son of Kavi, (Sukra) where you live, is also my abode.

14. You are truly my sister. O slender-waisted lady, O amiable maiden, do not say so. We have most happily passed the days we have lived together. There is perfect good feeling now existing between us.

15. I ask your leave to go away. Bless me so that good may come to my journey. Remember me in your conversations as one who has not transgressed virtue. Serve my preceptor with readiness and singleness of heart.

Devjani said :—

16. If you refuse to make me your wife, solicited by me as I do, O Kacha, (indeed I say) your knowledge will bear no fruits.

Kacha said :—

17. I refused to comply with your request, because you are my preceptor's daughter. (I did not refuse you) for any fault of yours. My preceptor also had not issued any command regarding this matter. Curse me if it pleases you.

18. O Devjani, I have told you what should be the conduct of Rishis. I, therefore, do not deserve your curse. But notwithstanding all this you have cursed me out of desire and not from a sense of duty.

19. Therefore, your desire shall not be fulfilled, no Rishi's son will ever accept your hand.

20. You have said that my knowledge would not bear fruits. Let it be so. But it shall bear fruits in him whom I shall teach it.

Vaishampayana said :—

21. Having said this to Devjani, that best of Brahmanas, that foremost of the twice-born, Kacha hurriedly went away to the land of the celestials.

22. Seeing him arrived, the celestials with Indra at their head looked with delight towards Vrihaspati, and spoke to him thus.

The Devas said :—

23. You have performed an act of great good for us ; your achievements are wonderful, your fame will never die. you will be the sharer with us in the sacrificial offerings.

Thus ends the seventy seventh chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

(SAMBHABA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O best of the Bharata race, the dwellers of heaven were exceedingly glad to get back Kacha who had learnt the knowledge (of Sanjibani). The celestials then learnt the Sanjibani from Kacha, and considered their object achieved.

2. They all assembled together and thus spoke to Indra, "O Indra, the time has come to show your prowess. Kill your enemies."

3. Having been thus addressed, Indra said "Be it so." He then, accompanied by the celestials set out. He saw many damsels in the forest.

4. The maidens were sporting in a lake in the wood which was like that of Chitraratha. Changing himself into wind, he (Indra) mixed up their clothes.

5. The maidens, after rising from the water all together, put on the clothes which each got near her from the mixed up heap.

6. The cloth of Devjani was thus taken up and worn by Sarmishta, the daughter of king Vrishaparva, not knowing that it belonged to others.

7. O great king, a dispute, thereupon, arose between Devjani and Sarmishta.

Devjani said :—

8. O daughter of the Asura, how do you dare take my cloth, being my pupil. Destitute of good conduct, nothing good can come to you.

Sarmishta said :—

9. Whether my father is sitting or lying your father, occupying a lower seat, and casting his eyes downwards, adores him like a Bandi (a chanter of praises.)

10. You are the daughter of a man who begs, and I am the daughter of one who bestows alms. Your father chants praises of others, and my father's praises are chanted. Your father lives on alms, my father bestows them.

11. O begger's girl, you are free to strike your breast, to use harsh words, to vow enmity to me, and to give way to your wrath. O beggerly woman, you weep in vain. You cannot harm me, though I can harm you. You desire to quarrel with me, but I do not at all consider you as my equal.

Vaishampayana said :—

12. Having heard this, Devjani became very angry, and she began to tear her cloth. But Sarmishta, throwing her into a well, went away to her home.

13. The wicked Sarmishta thought her to be dead, and went home in a wrathful mood.

14. When she went away, the son of Nahusha, Yayati came to that place; he was after deer. The pair of horses in his car were fatigued, and he himself was thirsty.

15. That son of Nahusha (Yayati) saw a well in which there was no water. There (in that well) the king saw a maiden as effulgent as fire.

16. Seeing her within the well, the illustrious king addressed that girl who was as beautiful as a celestial maiden. That best of kings, pacifying her with sweet words said,

17. O fair lady, O lady with bright nails, as burnished copper, and with ear-rings of celestial gems, who are you? Why are you in such anxiety? Why are you weeping in distress?

18. How have you fallen into this well covered with long grass and creepers? O beauty of slender-waist, tell me truly, whose daughter are you?

Devjani said :—

19. I am the daughter of Sukra who revives the Asuras, killed by the celestials. He knows not what has befallen me.

20. O king, this is my right hand with nails as bright as the burnished copper. You are nobly born,—I ask you, take my hand and raise me up.

21. I know, you are very gentle, very powerful and greatly famous. You should raise me up from this well.

Vaishampayana said :—

22. The son of Nahusha, king (Yayati), having learnt that she was the daughter of a Brahmana, took hold of her right hand, and raised her up from that well.

23. The king, after speedily raising her from the well, and speaking sweet and courteous words to that beauty of tapering thighs, went away to his own capital.

24. After the departure of the son of Nahusha (Yayati), the faultless featured Devjani spoke in sorrow to Ghurnika who came there.

Devjani said :—

25. O Ghurnika, go speedily to my father and tell him as soon as possible all that had happened. I shall not enter the city of Vrishaparva.

Vaishampayana said :—

26. Ghurnika speedily went to the palace of the Asura (chief). Finding the son of Kavi (Sukra), she spoke to him thus, her perception having been dimmed by anger.

27. "O great Brahmana, O illustrious man, I tell you, Devjani has been illused by Sarmishta, the daughter of Vrishaparva.

28. Having heard that his daughter had been illused by Sarmishta, he soon went to search for her with a heavy heart.

29. And when he found her in the forest, the son of Kavi embraced her with affection, and spoke to her with his voice choked with grief.

Sukra said :—

30. "The weal and woe that befall on people is always due to their own faults. You had some fault, I am sure, which has been thus expiated.

Devjani said :—

31. Be it punishment of my fault or not, (O father), hear all that the daughter of Vrishaparva, Sarmishta, had said to me.

32. She has said, (I say) truly, that you are a Bandi (hired chanter) of the Asura king. Even thus did Sarmishta, the daughter of Vrishaparva, speak

33. These cruel and piercing words, with her eyes red (with anger). (She said),—"You are the daughter of one who always chants the praise of others for hire, and who always asks for charity,

34. And who accepts alms, whereas I am the daughter of one who is the adored of all, who gives alms and never receives any gift from any body." Thus again and again spoke to me Sarmishta, the daughter of Vrishaparva, full of pride, her eyes red in anger.

35. O father, if I am really the daughter of a hired chaunter of others' praises, and of one who accepts alms, I must adore her in the hope of getting her favour. I have already told this to her.

Sukra said :—

36. O Devjani, you are not the daughter of a hired chaunter of praises, nor that of one who asks for alms and receives them. You are the daughter of one who is adored by all and who adores none.

37. Vrishavarpa and Indra and king Yayati, (all) know my strength to be inconceivable like Brahma and unapproachable God.

38. The Self created (Brahma) himself, being pleased with me said that I was the lord of that which was in all things on earth or in heaven.

39. I tell you truly, that it is I who pour rain for the good of all, and nourish the annual plants that sustain all living creatures.

Vaishampayana said :—

40. It was thus with such sweet and sensible words, the father tried to pacify his angry and sorrowful daughter.

Thus ends the eighty seventh chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Sukra said :—

1. O Devjani, know that the man who does not regard the evil words of others, conquers every thing.

2. The wise men call him a true charioteer who holds tightly the reins of his horses. He is a true man who subdues his rising anger.

3. O Devjani, know that he who subdues the rising anger by his feeling of non-anger, conquers everything on earth.

4. He who subdues his rising anger by forgiveness like the casting off the slough of a snake is called a true man.

5. He who subdues his anger, he who does not regard the bad words of others, he who is not angry even when there is a cause, certainly acquires the four objects for which we live (namely Dharma, Artha, Kama and Moksha.)

6. Between the two men, one performing sacrifices continually every month for one hundred years and one who does not feel any anger, the man who does not feel any anger is the greater man.

7. Boys and girls, who are incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong, quarrel among one another. The wise never imitate them.

Devjani said :—

8. O father, I know, though I am a girl, what are duties and virtues. I also know the difference between anger and forgiveness, and the power of each.

9. But when a pupil behaves disrespectfully towards his tutor, he should never be forgiven by the preceptor, if he wants to benefit him. Therefore, I do not desire to live in a country where the people are so bad.

10. The wise man who desires the good of all, should not live among men who are sinfully inclined, and who always speak ill of men of high birth and good behaviour.

11. It is said to be the best place to live where high birth and good conduct are known and respected, and where men know our birth and behaviour.

12. The cruel words of the daughter of Vrishaparva burn my heart, as men, desirous of kindling a fire, burn the dry woods.

13. I think nothing is more painful in the three worlds than to adore one's enemies, who are blessed with good fortune, whereas he possesses none. The learned men have said that death would be preferable to such a man.

Thus ends the seventy ninth chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. The best of the Vrigu race, the son of Kavi (Sukra) himself became angry. Coming to the place where Vrishaparva was seated, he fearlessly addressed him thus:—

2. "O king, the sinful acts like the earth immediately do not bear fruit. But they do gradually and secretly cut away the roots of their doer.

3. Such fruits are seen, either in one's ownself, or in one's son, or in one's grandson. Sin must bear fruits, like rich food they cannot be digested.

4. As you killed the grandson of Rishi Angirasha, the Brahmana Kacha, who was virtuous, learned in religious precepts, and attentive to duties, when he lived with me.

5. As you have mal-treated my daughter who did not deserve it, O Vrishaparva, know, I shall leave you and all your race.

6. O king, for this reason I can no longer stay here with you. Do not think, O Danava, that I am raving or I am a liar. You think very little of your faults and do not try to correct them.

Vrishaparva said :—

7. O son of Vrigu, never have I attributed to you falsehood or impiety. Virtue and truth ever dwell in you. Be gracious to me.

8. O son of Vrigu, if you really leave me and go away (from this place), we shall have then to go into the deep bottom of the ocean. There is no other alternative for us.

Sukra said :—

9. O Asura, I care very little whether you go into the bottom of the sea, or away to all directions. I am incapable of bearing my daughter's grief.

10. My life depends on her. Seek, O Asuras, to please her. As Vrihaspati always seeks the good of Indra, so I seek your good with my ascetic powers.

Vrishaparva said :—

11. O son of Vriḡu, you are the absolute master of everything that belongs to the Asura chief in this world—these elephants, kine, and horses,—nay even myself.

Sukra said :—

12. O great Asura, if it is (really) true that I am the lord over all the wealth of the Asuras, then go and try to please Devjani.

Vaishampayana said :—

13. When the great son of Kavi (Sukra) was thus addressed by Vrishaparva, he went to Devjani, and the son of Vriḡu told her all.

Devjani said :—

14. O son of Vriḡu, O father, if you are really the lord over the Asura king and all his wealth, then let the king come personally to me and speak it in my presence.

Vrishaparva said :—

15. O Devjani, O lady of sweet smiles, whatever you desire to possess,—however difficult it may be to get,—I am willing to give you.

Devjani said :—

16. I desire to have Sarmishta as my maid-servant with one thousand other damsels. She must also follow me to the house of him on whom my father will bestow me.

Vrishaparva said :—

17. O nurse, go and bring quickly Sarmishta here. Let her also act according to the desire of Devjani.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. The nurse then went to Sarmishta and told her, "O amiable Sarmishta, rise and follow me.

19. Accomplish the good of your race. Urged by Devjani, the Brahmana (Sukra) is about to leave his disciples (the Asuras). O sinless lady, you must do as Devjani desires."

Sarmishta said :—

20. I shall cheerfully do as Devjani desires. Both Sukra and Devjani, must not leave the Asuras through any fault of mine.

Vaishampayana said :—

21. Having been commanded by her father, Sarmishta with one thousand maidens came out of her father's excellent palace.

Sarmishta said :—

22. I am your maid-servant, with my one thousand maids. I shall follow you where your father will bestow you.

Devjani said :—

23. I am the daughter of one who is a hired chanter of praises, who asks for alms and accepts them, whereas you are the daughter of one who is adored. Why should you become my maid-servant?

Sarmishta said :—

24. One must try to do good to one's afflicted relatives. Therefore, I shall follow you where your father will bestow you.

Vaishampayana said :—

25. O best of kings, when Sarmishta thus promised to be the maid-servant of Devjani, she then thus spoke to her father.

Devjani said :—

26. O best of Brahmanas, O father, I am satisfied. I shall now enter the Asura capital. I know your science and power of knowledge is not futile.

Vaishampayana said :—

27. Having been thus addressed by his daughter, that best of Brahmanas, that illustrious man entered the capital with all happiness, and he was worshipped by all the Danavas.

Thus ends the eightieth chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O best of kings, after a long time the beautiful Devjani went to the same wood to sport.

2. She reached the same spot with Sarmishta and her one thousand maids. She wandered about at pleasure.

3. She felt herself very happy, being waited upon by these companions. They all sported there, they drank the honey of the flowers.

4. They ate various fruits,—(they threw away many) after biting. The king (Yayati), the son of Nahusha, in the course of his wanderings for hunting again,

5. Came there, tired and thirsty. He saw Devjani and Sarmishta and all those maidens.

6. They were all decked with beautiful ornaments, and they were full of voluptuous langour on account of the honey they drank. Devjani, of sweet smiles, was reclining at her ease.

7. She was matchless in beauty, and the most handsome of all the damsels. She was waited upon by Sarmishta who was gently pressing her feet.

Yayati said :—

8. O amiable ladies, it seems that these one thousands maids wait on you two. I would ask you (to tell me) both your names and parentage.

Devjani said :—

9. O king, hear my words. Know that I am the daughter of Sukra, the preceptor of the Asuras.

10. This my companion is my maid,—she will go wherever I shall go. She is Sarmishta, the daughter of the Asura king, Vrishaparva.

Yayati said :—

11. I am curious to know why this lady of fair eye-brows, this most beautiful damsel, this daughter of the Asura king, this your companion, is your maid-servant?

Devjani said :—

12. O best of kings, everything comes to pass according to Fate. Do not be astonished at this. Know it to be also the result of Fate.

13. Your features and attire are both like a king. Your speech is also like the words of the Vedas. Tell me your name. Whence have you come? Whose son are you?

Yayati said :—

14. In my Brahmacharya, the whole of the Vedas entered my ears. I am a king, and a son of a king; I am known as Yayati.

Devjani said :—

15. O king, why have you come here? Is it to gather lotuses, or to angle, or to hunt.

Yayati said :—

16. O amiable lady, I was thirsty in the pursuit of deer. I have come here in search of water. I wait but for your commands to leave this place.

Devjani said :—

17. Prosperity to you? Be my friend and husband. I wait for your commands with my two thousand damsels and Sarmishta, my maid-servant.

Yayati said :—

18. O beautiful lady, I do not deserve you. You are the daughter of Sukra, (therefore) you are far superior to me. O Devjani, your father cannot bestow you on even great king.

Devjani said :—

19. Brahmanas have already been mixed with Kshatryas, and Kshatryas with Brahmanas. You are a son of a Rishi and yourself a Rishi. Therefore, O son of Nahusha, marry me.

Yayati said :—

20. O beautiful lady, the four orders have no doubt sprung from one body. But they have different duties and virtues, which are not the same (for every order.) The Brahmanas are superior to all.

Devjani said :—

21—22. This hand of mine was never touched by any man except you. Therefore, I accept you as my husband. How will any other man touch my hand which is touched by you who are a Rishi?

Yayati said :—

23. The wise men know that a Brahmana is more to be avoided than an angry and virulently poisonous snake, or a blazing and flaming fire.

Devjani said :—

24. O best of men, why do you say that a Brahmana is to be avoided like an angry and virulently poisonous snake, or a blazing and flaming fire?

Yayati said :—

25. The snake kills only one. The sharpest weapon kills but a single person. But the Brahmana, if angry, destroys many cities and kingdoms.

26. Therefore, O beautiful lady, I think that Brahmanas should be avoided more than the two, (the snake and the fire) O amiable lady, I cannot marry you, unless your father bestows you on me.

Devjani said :—

27. You are chosen by me. O king, it is then settled that you will accept me if my father bestows you on me. You need not fear to accept my humble self, if bestowed on you. You have not asked for me.

Vaishampayana said :—

28. Devjani quickly sent a maid-servant to her father. The maid told Sukra all that had happened.

29. Having heard this, the son of Vriḡu went to see the king. The king of the world Yayati, seeing that Sukra was coming, bowed to him. He worshipped and adored that Brahmana, and stood before him with joined hands to receive his commands.

Devjani said :—

30. O father, this is the son of Nahusha. He took hold of my hand when I was in difficulty (thrown into the well). Bestow me on him. I shall not marry any other man in the world.

Sukra said :—

31. O splendidly courageous king, you have been accepted by my dear daughter as her husband. I bestow her on you. Therefore, O son of Nahusha, accept her as your wife.

Yayati said :—

32. O Brahmana, I solicit the boon by which the sin of my begetting a mixed caste may not touch me.

Sukra said :—

33. I shall absolve you from the sin (of begetting a mixed caste). Fear not to marry her. I grant you absolution.

34. Maintain virtuously your wife, Devjani of beautiful slender waist. Let great happiness be yours in her company.

35. O king, this maiden, Sarmishta, the daughter of Vrishaparva, should always be respected by you. But you must not call her to your bed.

Vaishampayana said :—

36. Having been thus addressed by Sukra, the king walked round the Brahmana. The king then performed the auspicious ceremony of marriage according to the rites of the ordinance.

37. Having received from Sukra a rich treasure in Devjani with Sarmishta and two thousand maidens.

38. That best of kings, being duly honoured by Sukra and the Asuras, returned to his capital, after receiving the commands of the illustrious son of Vriḡu.

Thus ends the eighty-first chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXX XII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Yayati, then coming to his capital which was like that of Indra, entered the inner-apartment and installed Devjani there.

2. At the request of Devjani, he established the daughter of Vrishaparva in a house which he caused to be erected in the Asoka groves of his gardens.

3. The king honored the daughter of Vrishaparva, Sarmishta, surrounded by her one thousand maids, by making every arrangement for her food and garments.

4. The king, the son of Nahusha, happily passed many years in the company of Devjani.

5. The beautiful lady, Devjani conceived when her season came. She gave birth to her eldest child which was a boy.

6. When one thousand years had passed away, Sarmishta, the daughter of Vrishaparva, attained her puberty, and her season came. She (therefore) began to ponder.

7. (She said to herself),—"My season has come. But I have not yet chosen a husband. What would happen? What should I do? How am I to accomplish my wishes?"

8. Devjani has given birth to a son. My youth is in vain. I shall choose him as my husband whom Devjani has chosen.

9. The king should give me a son. This is a firm resolve. Will not that virtuous-minded king grant me a private interview?

10. (One day) the king listlessly came to the Asoka grove, and seeing Sarmishta he stood before her.

11. Sarmishta, of sweet smiles, finding the king alone before her, thus addressed the king with joined hands.

Sarmishta said :—

12. O son of Nahusha, none can see the ladies that dwell in the inner-apartments of Soma, Indra, Vishnu, Yama, Varuna and your own.

13. O king, you know that I am handsome and well-born. O great king, I solicit you. My season has come. See that it goes not in vain.

Yayati said :—

14. I know very well the great birth of yours, born as you are in the race of the Danavas. You are also exceedingly beautiful. I do not find the least defect in your beauty.

15. Usanas, the son of Kavi, however, commanded me when I was married to Devjani that Vrishaparva's daughter shall not be called to my bed.

Sarmishta said :—

16. It is not sinful to speak falsehood in the following five cases, namely in joke, in respect of women to be associated with, in marriage, in prospect of immediate death, and at the time of the loss of one's whole fortune.

17. O king, it is not true that he is fallen who does not speak out the truth when asked (for there are occasions when to speak falsehood is an act of piety.) The falsehood is sinful when one (harmful) object is to be accomplished.

Yayati said :—

18. A king should be a model prince in the eyes of his people. That king who speaks falsehood is sure to meet with his destruction. I do not dare to speak a lie, though the greatest losses threaten me.

Sarmishta said :—

19. O king, you have been chosen by my friend as her husband. One's friend's marriage is the same as one's own. You are, therefore, as much my husband (as Devjani's).

Yayati said :—

20. It is one of my strict vows no doubt that I should grant what is asked of me. You ask me (to grant you a favour) Therefore, tell me what should I do?

Sarmishta said :—

21. O king, save me from sin. Protect my virtue. Becoming a mother by you, let me perform the greatest pious act in the world.

22. O king, it is ordained that three persons can never earn wealth for themselves. They are the wife, the slave and the son. That which they earn belong to him who owns them.

23. O king, I am the slave of Devjani, the lady of the Vrigu race. You are Devjani's master and lord. Therefore, you are my master and lord as well. I solicit you. Fulfill my wishes.

Vaishampayana said :—

24. Thus having been addressed by Sarmishta, the king was persuaded to believe that what she said was true. He fulfilled Sarmishta's wishes and thus protected her virtue.

25. They passed some time together. They took affectionate farewell of each other and separated. Each went whence they came.

26. Sarmishta of sweet smiles and fair eye-brows conceived in consequence of that connection with that best of kings.

27. O king, in due time the lotus-eyed lady (Sarmishta) gave birth to a son, as effulgent as a celestial child and with eyes like lotus leaves.

Thus ends the eighty second chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O descendant of the Bharata race, when Devjani heard of the birth of this boy, she became very sorry, and Sarmishta became an object of her sad reflections. Going to Sarmishta, Devjani thus spoke to her.

Devjani said :—

2. O girl of fair-eye-brows, what sin is this you have committed out of lust!

Sarmishta said :—

3. A Rishi of virtuous mind, learned in the Vedas, came to me. He was capable of granting boons, and he was solicited by me to grant my wishes based on virtue.

4. O lady of sweet smiles, I would never seek the fulfillment of my desires by sinful means. I tell you truly, this my child was begotten by a Rishi.

Devjani said :—

5. O timid maiden, it is all right if that is the case. If you know the lineage, the name and the family of that Brahmana, tell me I wish to hear them.

Sarmishta said :—

6. O lady of sweet smiles, that Rishi was as effulgent in asceticism and energy as the sun. Seeing him, I had no power of making these enquiries.

Devjani said :—

7. O Sarmishta, If this be true, if you have received this your son from such a great Brahmana, I have then no cause for anger.

Vaishampayana said :—

8. They talked and laughed with each other, and then they separated, (Devjani) the daughter of the Vrigu race going to her mansion and believing what Sarmishta told her.

9. O king, Yayati begot on Devjani two more sons (namely) Yadu and Turvasu, who were like Indra and Vishnu.

10. The daughter of Vrishaparva, Sarmishta, by that royal sage gave birth to three sons in all, namely Drahyu, Anu and Puru.

11. O king, one day Devjani of sweet smiles went, with Yayati into a solitary part of the royal park.

12. There she saw three children of celestial beauty, playing with perfect ease. She was surprised, and thus spoke to the king.

Devjani' said :—

13. O king, whose children are these, so handsome, so like the children of the celestials? They are exactly like you in splendour and beauty.

14. Having asked the king, she asked the children.

Devjani said :—

15. O children, what is your lineage! Who is your father? Answer me truly. I desire to know all.

Vaishampayana said :—

16. The children then pointed to the king with their fingers and said that Sarmishta was their mother.

17. Having said this, they came to the king to clasp his knees. But the king dared not carress them before Devjani.

18. The boys wept in grief, and they left the place, going towards their mother. The king became very much abashed of this conduct of the boys.

19. Seeing the affection of the boys towards the king, (Devjani) understood all. And she addressed Sarmishta thus ;—

Devjani said :—

20. How have you dared to do me an injury, dependant as you are on me? Do you not fear to have recourse once more to your Asura conduct?

Sarmishta said :—

21. O lady of sweet smiles, all that I told you about the Rishi is quite true. My acts were according to the precepts of virtue and right.

22. Therefore, I am not afraid of you. When you chose the king as your husband, I too did the same. O beautiful lady, a friend's husband is one's own husband according to the precepts of religion.

23. You are a daughter of a Brahmana, and therefore you deserve my greatest worship and regard. Do you not know that this royal sage (Yayati) is the object of greater esteem to me?

Vaishampayana said :—

24. Having heard these words, Devjani said, "O king, you have wronged me, I will not live here any longer."

25. Having said this, she with tearful eyes quickly rose to go away to her father. And the king was grieved to see her thus angry.

26. He became very much alarmed; and he followed her, trying to appease her wrath. But she did not return. Her eyes were red in anger,

27. She did not speak a word to the king, but she, with her eyes full of tears, soon reached her father, Usanas, the son of Kavi.

28. Seeing her father, she made to him due salutation and stood before him. Yayati also came immediately after her, and he saluted and worshipped the son of Vrigu.

Devjani said :—

29. O father, virtue has been defeated by vice. The low have risen and the high have fallen. I have been insulted by the daughter of Vrishaparva.

30. Three sons have been begotten on her by this king Yayati. O father, unfortunate am I! I have got only two sons.

31. O son of Vrigu, this king is renowned for his knowledge in religion and virtue. But, O son of Kavi, I tell you, he has fallen from the path of virtue.

Sutra said :—

32. O king, as you have made vice your favourite pursuit, though well-acquainted with the precepts of virtue, terrible decrepitude will overtake you.

Yayati said :—

33. Adorable Rishi, I was solicited by the daughter of the Danava king to make her season fruitful. I did grant her prayer from a sense of virtue.

34. O Rishi, men learned in the Vedas say that he, who does not grant the prayer of a woman in season, commits the sin of killing an embryo.

35. He, who, being solicited in secret by a woman full of desire and in season, does not grant her wishes, loses virtue. The learned say that he becomes a killer of embryo.

36. O son of Vrigu, for these reasons, and being afraid of committing a sin, I went to Sarmishta.

Sukra said :—

37. O king, you are dependent on me. You should have waited to receive my command. O son of Nahusha, having acted falsely in the matter of your duty, you have committed the sin of theft.

Vaishampayana said :—

38. Thus being cursed by the angry Usanas, Yayati, the son of Nahusha, was then deprived of his youth, and terrible decrepitude soon overcame him.

Yayati said :—

39. O son of Vrigu, I have not been as yet satiated with youth or Devjani. Therefore, O Brahmana, be graceful to me. Let not decrepitude overcome me.

Sukra said :—

40. I never speak an untruth. O king, (see), you have been immediately attacked by old age. But if you like, you can transfer this decrepitude to some other man.

Yayati said :—

41. O Brahmana, let this be ordered by you that, the son of mine who will accept my this old age will enjoy my kingdom and gain both virtue and fame.

Sukra said :—

42. O son of Nahusha, remembering me you will be able to transfer your this decrepitude to whomever you like.

43. Your that son who will give you his youth will become your successor on the throne. He will have long life, wide-spread fame and a large progeny.

Thus ends the eighty third chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having been thus attacked by old age, Yayati returned to his capital. He summoned his eldest and accomplished son Yadu and thus spoke to him.

Yayati said :—

2. O child; old age, wrinkles and white hair have come over to me by the curse the son of Kavi who is called Usanas. But I am not yet satiated with youth.

3. O Yadu, take you upon yourself my this decrepitude and consequent old age. I shall then enjoy with your youth.

4. When one thousand years will be completed, I shall return to you your youth and take back my decrepitude and its consequent weakness.

Yadu said :—

5. There are many inconveniences in old age about eating and drinking. Therefore, O king, I shall not take your decrepitude upon me. This is my determination.

6. White hair, cheerlessness, relaxation of nerves, wrinkles all over the body, deformities, weakness, leanness, inability of work, these are the consequences of decrepitude. Even friends and dependants forsake an old decrepit man.

7. O king, you have many sons, some of them are dearer to you (than I.) O virtuous man, ask some other son of yours to take upon him your decrepitude.

Yayati said :—

8. O son, you have sprung from my heart, but you do not give me your youth. Therefore, your children will never be ruling kings.

9. O Turvasu, take upon yourself my decrepitude and consequent weakness. I wish to enjoy the pleasures of life with your youth.

10. After the expiration of one thousand years, I shall return, to you, your youth, and take back my decrepitude and its consequent weakness.

Turvasu said :—

11. O father, I do not like old age. It destroys all pleasures and enjoyments, strength and beauty, the intellect and the memory,—nay even life.

Yayati said :—

12. You are born from my heart, but you do not give me your youth. Therefore, O Turvasu, your line will be extinct.

13—15. You shall be the foolish king of those whose practices and precepts will be impure, whose women of superior birth will give birth to children by men of inferior birth, who will live on meat, who will be mean, who will not hesitate to appropriate the wives of their superiors, who will be like birds and beasts in their practices, and who will be sinful and Mlechas.

Vaishampayana said :—

16. Having thus cursed his son Turvasu, Yayati spoke to Sarmishta's son Drahyu thus :—

Yayati said :—

17. O Drahyu, take upon yourself for one thousand years my decrepitude, destructive of beauty and complexion. Give me your youth.

18. After the expiration of one thousand years, I shall return to you your youth and take back my own decrepitude.

Drahyu said :—

19. O king, one, if he is decrepit, cannot enjoy elephants, cars, horses or women. His voice also becomes indistinct. Therefore, I do not desire (to take upon myself) your old age.

Yayati said :—

20. O son, you are sprung from my heart, but you refuse to give me your youth. Therefore, your cherished wishes will never be fulfilled.

21—22. You shall be a king only in name. You shall rule over a region where there will be no roads, no passages for horses, cars, elephants, asses, goats, bullocks, planquins and other good vehicles, where the only means of locomotion will be rafts and floats. In such a place you will live with all your friends.

23. O Anu, take my decrepitude and its consequent weakness. I shall enjoy the pleasures of life for one thousand years with your youth.

Anu said :—

24. Those that are decrepit eat like children, and they are always impure. They cannot pour libations on sacrificial fire at the proper time. Therefore, I do not like to take upon myself your old age.

Yayati said :—

25. O son, you have sprung from my heart, but you do not give me your youth. As you find so many faults with decrepitude, decrepitude will overcome you.

26. Your sons will die as soon as they will attain to their youth. You shall not be able to perform any sacrifice before fire.

27. O Puru, you are my youngest and dearest son, you will become the foremost of them. Old age, wrinkles and white hair, O child, have come over me,

28. On account of the curse of the son of Kavi, who is called Usanas. But I am not yet satiated with youth. O Puru, take my decrepitude upon you, and consequent weakness. I shall enjoy the pleasures of life for one thousand years with your youth.

29. After the expiration of one thousand years, I shall return to you your youth and take back my own decrepitude.

Vaishampayana said :—

30. Having been thus addressed by the king, Puru replied to him with all humility. (He said : ) " O great king, I shall do as you command me to do.

31. O king, I shall take upon myself your old age and its consequent weakness. Take my youth and enjoy as you like the pleasures of life.

32. Attacked by your old age, deprived of youth and beauty, I shall at your command live and give you my youth."

Yayati said :—

33. O Puru, my child, I am much pleased with you. I grant you the following boon with great pleasure. The people of your kingdom will have all their desires fulfilled.

Vaishampayana said :—

34. Having said this, Yayati remembered the great ascetic, the son of Kavi (Sukra), and transferred his decrepitude to the body of the high-souled Puru.

Thus ends the eighty fourth chapter, the history of Yayati in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having thus received the youth of Puru, Yayati the son of Nahusha, that best of kings, was exceedingly delighted. He again indulged in the pleasures of life.

2. He enjoyed himself to the full extent of his desires and to the full limit of his powers, as much as he desired and as the seasons called forth. But, O king, he did nothing against the precepts of religion.

3. He pleased the celestials by performing sacrifices, the Pitris by Sradhas, the poor by charities and the good Brahmanas by fulfilling their desires.

4. The guests by food and drink, the Vaisyas by protection, the Sudras by kindness and the robbers by proper punishments.

5. Yayati pleased all classes of his subjects by ruling over them virtuously like Indra.

6. That king was as powerful as the lion. He was young, and enjoyed all the pleasures of life. He enjoyed unlimited happiness without violating the precepts of religion.

7. The king (Yayati) became exceedingly happy in thus being able to enjoy all the best objects of enjoyments. That king of men was only sorry (in remembering) that one thousand years would soon come to an end.

8. That royal sage, learned in the mystery of time and possessed of great prowess, having obtained youth for one thousand years and watching proper Kalas and Kushtas

9. Sported with Vishwachi (Apsara), some time in the garden (of Indra) Nandana, sometimes in Aloka, and sometimes on the summit of the Meru Mountain.

10. That virtuous king then found that the fixed time (one thousand) years had come to an end. He then called Puru and addressed him thus.

Yayati said :—

11. O son, O chastiser of foes, I have enjoyed with your youth to the full extent of my desires and to the full limit of my powers and all according to their seasons.

12. But desires never die. They are never satiated by indulgence. By indulgence they flame up like the sacrificial fire with Ghee poured into it.

13. If one becomes the sole lord of all the earth with its paddy, oats, gems, beasts and women, still it will not be considered by him enough. Therefore, the thirst for enjoyment, should be abandoned.

14. The thirst (of enjoyments), which is difficult to be cast off by the wicked, which does not fail even with failing life, is truly a fatal disease in man. To get rid of this thirst is real happiness.

15. My mind was attached to the pleasures of life for full one thousand years. My thirst for them, however, without being abated, is daily being increased.

16. Therefore, I shall get rid of it. I shall fix my mind on Brahma, and becoming peaceful and having no attachment, I shall pass the rest of my days in the forest with the innocent deer.

17. O Puru, I am exceedingly pleased with you. Take (back) your own youth. Prosperity be to you. Receive my kingdom. You are my son who has done my favourite work.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. Yayati, the son of Nahusha, then received back his own old age, and his son Puru also received back his youth.

19. Yayati became desirous of installing his youngest son Puru on the throne. But the four orders of his subject with Brahmanas at their head thus addressed him,

20. "O lord, how can you install Puru on the throne, passing over your eldest son

Yadu, born of Devjani and grandson of Sukra ?

21. Yadu is your eldest son, after him was born Turvasu. Then Sarmishta's son Drahyu, Anu, and last Puru.

22. How it would be proper to pass over all the elders and install the youngest ? We represent this to you,—act according to the precepts of religion.

Yayati said :—

23. Hear all of you of the four orders of the caste with the Brahmanas at their head, why my kingdom should not be given to my eldest son.

24. My commands were disobeyed by my eldest son. The opinion of the wise men is that the son who disobeys his father is no son at all.

25. The son who obeys the commands of his father and mother, who is humble and a well-wisher of his parents and who loves them, is the best of sons.

26. I have been slighted by Yadu, and Turvasu; much have I been slighted by Drahyu and Anu.

27. Only Puru obeyed my commands, and much have I been honoured and respected by him. He accepted my old age, and therefore, though he is the youngest, yet he should be made king.

28. Puru is a great friend of mine and he did what was agreeable to me. And the son of Kavi, Usanas, Sukra himself, granted me this boon.

29. The son who would obey me would become the king and the lord of the earth. Therefore, I entreat you, let Puru be installed on the throne.

The people said :—

30. O king, it is true that, the son who is accomplished and who seeks the good of his parents, deserves all prosperity, though he is the youngest.

31. Therefore, Puru, who has done good to you, deserve, to have the kingdom. As Sukra has granted this boon, we have no power to say any thing.

Vaishampayana said :—

32. Having been thus addressed by the contented people the son of Nahusha (Yayati) installed his son Puru on the throne.

33. Bestowing the kingdom on Puru, he resolved to live in the forest, and he left his capital with Brahmanas and ascetics.

34. The sons of Yadu are known as the Yadavas, those of Turvasu as the Yavanas, those of Drahyu as the Bhojas, and those of Anu as the Mlechas,

35. Those of Puru as the Pauravas, in which dynasty, O king, you are born to rule the country for one thousand years.

Thus ends the eighty fifth chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

(SHAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having thus installed his dear son Puru on the throne, the son of Nahusha king Yayati, became very happy and accepted the Vanaprastha mode of life.

2. He lived in the forest with the Brahmanas, becoming self-controlled, and living on fruits and roots. Thus patiently bearing privations of all sorts, he at last ascended to heaven.

3. Having thus ascended heaven, the king lived there in bliss. But some time after, he was hurled down (from heaven) by Indra.

4. I have heard that having thus fallen from heaven, he stayed in the sky and did not fall on the earth.

5. I have heard that some time after, he again ascended heaven in company with greatly powerful Vasumana, Ashtaka, Prastardhana and Shibi.

Janamejaya said :—

6. I desire to hear in detail why that king, after entering heaven, was hurled down from it, and why he again gained admittance.

7. O Brahmana, let this be narrated by you before all these Brahmana Rishis. The lord of the earth Yayati was like the king of the celestials (Indra) ;

8. He was the progenitor of the exhaustive Kuru race ; he was as effulgent as the sun. He was illustrious, world-wide famous and a man of wonderful achievements. I desire to hear in full the story of his life both here in this world and in heaven.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. I shall narrate to you the excellent history of Yayati's exploits both here on earth and in heaven. The story is sacred, and it destroys all the sins of those that hear it.

10. The son of Nahusha, king Yayati, having installed his youngest son Puru on the throne, went to the forest to lead the life of a recluse.

11. He passed over the claims of his other sons with Yadu at their head, and he lived in the forest on fruits and roots.

12. He brought his mind and his passions under complete control. He pleased the Pitris and celestials by performing sacrifices. He poured libations according to the prescribed rites of men leading the Vanaprastha.

13. The illustrious king entertained the guests and strangers with fruits of the forest and Ghee. He supported himself by eating only the scattered corn seeds.

14—16. The king thus passed full one thousand years. He observed the vow of silence with his mind under complete control. He passed full one year in fasting, living on air alone and having no sleep. He passed another one year in the midst of four fires and the burning sun overhead. He stood for six months continually on one leg, (Having thus passed his life in austere penances), the king, (Yayati) the doer of sacred deeds, ascended heaven.

Thus ends the eighty six chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

(SHAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When that great king was living in heaven, he was adored by the celestials, the Sadhys, the Marutas, and the Vasus.

2. That doer of pious acts (Yayati) often went from the region of the celestials to the region of Brahma. It is heard that he lived in heaven for a long time.

3. One day the best of kings, Yayati, went to Indra, and in the course of conversation the lord of earth was asked by Indra.

Indra said :—

4. O king, what did you say when Puru took your old age on earth and when you gave him his kingdom ?

Yayati said :—

5. I told him the whole country between the rivers Ganges and the Yamuna which is in fact the central region of the earth, is thine. Your brothers will have the outlying regions.

6. I told him, the men having no anger are superior to men with anger ; men having forgiveness are superior to men having no forgiveness. Man is superior to animals and the learned to the ignorant.

7. If wronged, you should not wrong in return. One's anger, if not subdued, burns one's own self. If subdued, it procures the virtues of the doers of good acts.

8. You should never give pain to others by cruel words. Never defeat your enemies by despicable means. Never utter such sinful and burning words as may give pain to others.

9. He who pricks another by the thorns of cruel words holds in his mouth a persecuting Rakshasa. Lakshmi (prosperity) leaves the man who casts his eyes on even such a man.

10. You should always keep the virtuous man before you as your model. You should always compare your acts with those of the virtuous. You should always disregard the cruel words of the wicked.

11. He who keeps the arrows of cruel words in his lips weeps day and night. The cruel words strike at the inmost part of the body. The wise men never fling such arrows (of cruel words) at others.

12. There is nothing in the three worlds with which you can worship the deities as kindness, friendship, charity and sweet words.

13. Therefore, you should always utter sweet words that give pleasure and not pain. You should always give and never beg. You should show respects to those that deserve your respect.

Thus ends the eighty seventh chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Indra said :—

1. O king, O son of Nahusha, O Yayati, after accomplishing all your duties, you went to the forest, leaving your home. I ask you,—tell me like whom you are in ascetic merits.

Yayati said :—

2. O Vasava (Indra), I do not find among men, the celestials, the Gandharvas and great Rishis, any one equal to me in ascetic merits.

Indra said :—

3. O king, as you disregard those that are your superiors, those that are your equals, and those that are your inferiors, your virtues, therefore, suffer a diminution, and thus you must fall from heaven.

Yayati said :—

4. O king of the celestials, if my virtues have really been diminished (by my pride), let me fall at least among men who are virtuous and honest.

Indra said :—

5. O king, you shall fall among those that are virtuous and honest. You shall also gain great renown: O Yayati, after your this experience, never again disregard any one,—your superiors, your equals or even your inferiors.

Vaishampayana said :—

6. Thereupon Yayati fell from the region of the holy. And he was seen when thus falling by that royal sage, Astaka, the protector of religion. Seeing him he asked,

Astaka said :—

7. Who are you, young as you are, as handsome as Indra, as prominent by your own splendour as that of fire? Who are you falling like the foremost ranger of the sky, the sun, driving away the dark masses of clouds?

8. Seeing you fall from the region of the sun, as effulgent as the fire or the sun, all men are asking themselves, "What is this that falls?" They are deprived of their consciousness.

9. Seeing you in the path of the celestials, as effulgent as Surja, Indra, or Vishnu, we have all come to you to ascertain the truth.

10. O enviably handsome one, we would not have been guilty of incivility by first asking you who you are, if you would have asked us first who we are. We ask you, (tell us) who you are, and why you come here.

11. O Indra-like great one, let your fears be dispelled, let your woes and afflictions cease. You are now in the presence of the virtuous and the wise. Even Indra, the slayer of Vala, cannot do you any harm.

12. O Indra-like great one, the honest and the virtuous are the support of their brethren. Here are assembled the protectors of the movables and the immovables of the world.—the honest and the virtuous. You are now with such ones.

13. As Agni is the lord that gives heat, as earth is the lord that holds the seed (and produces corn), as sun is the lord that dispels darkness, so is a guest the lord of the honest and the virtuous.

Thus ends the eighty eighth chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Yayati said:—

1. I am Yayati, the son of Nahusha and the father of Puru. I am falling down from the region of the celestials, the Siddhas and the Rishis, for the diminution of my virtues. (I am falling), because I disregarded every creature on earth.

2. As I am older than you in age, I did not salute you first. He who is older in age or superior in learning or asceticism is revered by Brahmanas.

Astaka said:—

3. O king, you say that he, who is older in years, deserves the respect and reverence of others. But it is said that he is truly worthy of respect who is superior in learning and asceticism.

Yayati said:—

4. It is said that sin destroys the merit of all virtuous acts. Vanity contains the element of that which leads to hell. The virtuous never follow the path of the sinful.

5. They act in a way as to increase their virtue. I myself had great religious merits, but all is now gone. I shall never be able to regain them with my best efforts. He, who will take lesson from my this fate, will be wise and virtuous.

6. He who, having acquired great wealth, performs sacrifices, who, having acquired all kinds of learning, remains humble, who, having studied the entire Vedas, devotes himself to asceticism, goes to heaven.

7. No one should be proud of his great wealth; no one should feel exalted, because he has studied the entire Vedas. Men are of different dispositions in the world, but Destiny is supreme. Power and exertion are both futile and useless. Knowing Destiny to be supreme (over all), the wise should neither feel pride nor grief.

8. Remembering that Destiny is supreme (over all), creatures should know that happiness and misery depend on Destiny, and not on their own exertion and power.

9. The wise should always live contented, without grieving for misery or exalting for happiness. When Destiny is supreme, both grief and exaltation are useless.

10. O Astaka, I never feel terrified with fear, nor do I ever feel grief, for I know that I shall be on earth exactly what the great Ordainer has made me.

11. The Insects, the worms, all the oviparous creatures, vegetables, crawling animals, vermins, fishes, stones, grass, wood,—in fact all created things,—are united with the Prakiti when they are freed from their acts.

12. Happiness and misery are transitory. O Astaka, knowing this, why should I grieve? We never know how we are to act to avoid misery. Therefore, grief must be cast off.

Vaishampayana said:—

13. King Yayati, possessed of every accomplishment, who was the maternal grand father of Astaka, was again asked by him to tell him the account of his living in heaven.

Astaka said:—

14. O king of the world, tell me in detail the account of all those regions which you have visited and in which you passed your time in bliss. (Tell me also) the period for which you thus lived.

Yayati said:—

15. I was a great king on earth, ruling over the whole world as my kingdom. I acquired many high regions by my religious merits. I lived full one thousand years on earth, and then I ascended to a very high region.

16. It is the abode of Indra. It is very beautiful; it has one thousand gates, and it extends one hundred Yoyanas all around. Here lived I for another one thousand years. And then I ascended to a higher region.

17. This is the region of supreme beatitude,—the abode of the Prajapati, the lord of the earth,—a region very difficult to attain. Here lived I for another one thousand years. And I then ascended to a higher region.

18. It is the abode of the god of gods, (Vishnu), where I lived for many years in supreme bliss. I have lived in various regions, and I was adored by the celestials, and I possessed splendour and prowess like the celestials.

19. I was capable of assuming any form at will; I sported for many millions of years with the Apsaras in the gardens of Nandana, under innumerable beautiful trees clad in flowery garb and spreading delicious perfume.

20. I lived there in celestial happiness for many many years, when a celestial messenger of grim visage thrice shouted to me in a loud and deep voice, "Ruined, Ruined, Ruined."

21. O best of kings, this much I remember that I fell from Nandana, and all my religious merits were gone. O king of men, I heard the voices of the celestials in the sky exclaiming in grief,

22. "What misfortune! The virtuous and meritorious Yayati is falling! His all religious merits are destroyed!" And when I was falling, I asked them, "Where are those wise ones amongst whom am I to fall?"

23. They pointed out to me this sacred sacrificial region belonging to you. I am hastily coming to this your sacrificial ground, seeing the curls of smoke that rise from the sacrificial fire and blacken the sky. I smelt the perfume of the sacrificial Ghee.

Thus ends the eighty ninth chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XC.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Astaka said :—

1. O foremost man of the Krita Yuga, you, having been able to assume any form at will, passed millions of years in the garden of Nandana. For what reason have you been compelled to leave that happy region and come here to-day?

Yayati said :—

2. As relatives and kinsmen forsake in this world a man who has lost his wealth, so in the other world Indra and the celestials forsake one who loses his righteousness.

Astaka said :—

3. O king, I am very curious to learn how men can lose their righteousness in the other world. Tell me also what regions are attained by what means. I know you are acquainted with all the doings and the sayings.

Yayati said :—

4. O god-like man, they that speak of their own merits are doomed to the painful hell called Bhouma (earth). Though really lean, they appear to grow (fat on earth) to become the food for vultures, dogs and jackals.

5. Therefore, O king, this censurable and wicked vice should be cast off. O king. I have now told you all. Tell me what more I shall speak.

Astaka said :—

6. When life is destroyed by age, vultures, Sitikanta, insects and worms eat up the human body,—where does man then live? How does he come to life again? I have never heard of any hell called Bhouma,

Yayati said :—

7. When the body is destroyed (by death), man, according to the effects of his acts, is born again in the womb of his mother. He stays there in an indistinct form, and he then gradually assumes distinct and visible form. He then reappears and walks on the earth. Thus he falls into the hell Bhouma (earth) and does not see the end of his existence.

8. Some thus falling live for sixty thousand years in the firmament; some again for eighty thousand years. They then fall (on this earth), and they are attacked by fearful Bhouma Rakshasas of sharp teeth.

Astaka said :—

9. Why are men, when thus falling from heaven, attacked by these fearful and sharp-teethed Rakshasas? Why are they not annihilated? How do they again enter the womb?

Yayati said :—

10—11. All beings, thus fallen from heaven, become subtle substance, living in water. This water subsequently becomes the semen from which life is created. It then enters the womb of a woman in her season and develops into the embryo. It then becomes visible like the fruit from the flower. Entering into trees, plants, vegetables, water, air earth and space, the watery seed of life becomes quadrupeds or bipeds. This is the case with all creatures.

Astaka said :—

12—13. Does a being who has got a human form enter the womb in its own shape or in some other? How does it acquire its distinct and visible shape, its eyes, ears and consciousness? Tell me all this, I ask you, because I have my doubts?

Yayati said :—

14. The being that remains in a subtle form in the seed, when dropped into the womb, is attracted by atmospheric force for purposes of rebirth, according to the merits of one's acts.

15—16. He then develops in course of time into the embryo. He is then furnished with the visible organisation. Coming out of the womb in course of time, he becomes conscious of his existence. He then becomes sensible of sound by his ears, of colour and form by his eyes, of scent by his nose, of taste by his tongue, of touch by his whole body, and of ideas by his mind. O Astaka, it is thus that the gross and visible body develops from the subtle essence.

Astaka said :—

17. The body is burnt, buried or otherwise destroyed after death. Reduced to nothing on one's death, by what principle is one again revived ?

Yayati said :—

18. O best of kings, the man who dies, assumes a subtle form, but he retains the consciousness of all his acts as if in a dream. He then assumes some other form with a quicker speed than that of air.

19. The virtuous attain to a superior and the vicious to an inferior form of existence. The vicious becomes worms and insects. O illustrious one, I have nothing more to say.

20. I have told you, how beings are born by the development of their embryonic form as quadrupeds, bipeds, and six-footed creatures. What more will you ask me ?

Astaka said :—

21. O sire, how does a man attain to those higher regions whence there is no return to earthly life again ? Is it by asceticism or knowledge ? How does a man attain to the region of the highest bliss ? As I ask you, tell me all.

Yayati said :—

22. The wise say that there are seven gates through which admission might be gained to heaven. These are asceticism, gift, tranquility of mind, self-command, modesty, simplicity and kindness. A person loses all this in consequence of vanity.

23. The man who, having acquired knowledge, regards himself as learned and destroys the reputation of others by his learning, never goes to the region of the highest bliss. It does not also give him the power of attaining to Brahma.

24. Study, taciturnity, worship before fire, and sacrifices, these are the four means through which fear is removed. But when these four are mixed with vanity, they cause fear instead of removing it.

25. The wise should never feel pride in receiving honours, nor should they be sorry if insulted. For it is the wise alone that honour the wise ; the wicked and vicious can never act like the virtuous. "I have given so much, I have performed so many sacrifices, I have studied so much, I have observed so many vows,"—such vanity and pride are the roots of all fear. Therefore, it must be abandoned by all means.

26. Those learned men who accept as their only support the unchangeable and inconceivable Brahma,—Brahma that showers blessings on persons virtuous as you are,

—enjoy perfect peace here in this world and hereafter in heaven.

Thus ends the ninetieth chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XCI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Astaka said :—

1. Those that are learned in the Vedas differ in opinions as regards the respective methods which should be practised by the Grihastas, Brahmacharis, Bhikhus and Vanaprasthas, so that they may acquire religious merits.

Yayati said :—

2. A Brahmachari must do the following. When he will live in the house of his preceptor, he must receive lessons only when his preceptor will call him to do it. He must serve his preceptor without waiting for his command. He must rise before his preceptor from his bed and go to bed after him. He must be humble, self-controlled, patient, vigilant, and devoted to study.

3. It is said in the oldest Upanishada that he must perform sacrifices after acquiring wealth by honest means. He should spend it in charity ; he should be hospitable to all that would come to his house ; he should never use anything without giving a portion to others.

4. A Muni (Brahmachari) should live in the forest, depending on his own vigour and without searching for food. He should abstain from all vicious acts ; he should give away in charity ; he should never inflict pain upon any creatures. It is then only that he can gain success.

5. He is a true Bhikshu, who does not support himself by any manual labour, who possesses many accomplishments, who has his passions under complete control, who is thoroughly unconnected with all worldly concerns, who does not sleep under the shelter of a householder's roof, who is without wife, and who travels over many countries, going some distance every day.

6—7. A learned man should adopt the Vanaprastha mode of life, after the performance of the necessary rites. He should adopt it when he has been able to control his thirst for enjoyments and desire of acquiring wealth. When a man dies in the forest, leading the Vanaprastha mode of life, he mixes his ancestors and grand-children, numbering ten generations including himself, with the divine essence,

Askata said :—

8. How many kinds of Munis are there, and how many kinds of Mounis (observers of vows)? We desire to hear all this.

Yayati said :—

9. O King, he is a true Muni, who possesses all things pertaining to a village though living in the forest, and also possesses all things pertaining to the forest though living in a village.

Askata said :—

10. How is it possible to possess all things pertaining to a village when living in the forest, and all things pertaining to a forest when living in a village?

Yayati said :—

11. A Muni lives in the forest after withdrawing himself from all worldly objects. But though he never seeks to possess things pertaining to a village, he may yet get them by his ascetic powers.

12—13. A true Muni, withdrawn from all earthly objects, might live in a village, leading the life of a hermit. Clad in Kaupina (scantiest of robes,) he considers himself attired in the richest robe. He is content with food just sufficient to support life.

14. He who abandons all desires, who has all his passions under complete control, and who has given up all actions, is the man who attains success.

15. Why should you not revere the man who lives on pure food, who refrains from injuring others, whose heart is ever holy, who is effulgent in his ascetic merits, who is free from the leaden weight of desire and who abstains from injury even when it is sanctioned by the scriptures?

16. Emaciated by hard asceticism, and reduced in marrow, blood and flesh, such a Muni not only conquers this world, but the highest world.

17. The Muni who sits in Yoga meditation, and who becomes indifferent to happiness and misery, honour, and insult, conquers this world, and conquering it, he conquers the highest world.

18. The Muni who eats like the kine and other animals, without providing for it beforehand and without any relish, becomes identified with the whole universe.

Thus ends the ninety first chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XCII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Astaka said :—

1. O king, who does amongst the two,—namely the ascetic and the man of knowledge,—first attain to the communion with Brahma, although both exerting like the sun and the moon!

Yayati said :—

2. He who is a man of knowledge, and who is self controlled, though living among the householders with various sorts of desires, attains to salvation first.

3. Those that devote themselves to Yoga meditation take time to acquire that knowledge, for by practice alone they divest themselves from the idea of duality.

4-5. Then again, if a man devoted to Yoga does not find sufficient time to attain to success in one's one life, he is benefited in his next life by the progress already made. But the man of knowledge ever sees the indistructible Unity, therefore he, though emerged in worldly enjoyments, is never affected in the heart.

Astaka said :—

6. O king, you are young, you are handsome, you are decorated with celestial garlands, your splendour is great. From what place have you come, and where do you go? Whose messenger are you? Are you going to earth?

Yayati said :—

7. As I have lost my religious virtues, I am falling into the Bhouma (earth) hell. I shall go there after finishing my talk with you. The Lokapalas are commanding me even now to hasten thither.

8. O king, I have obtained the following boon from Indra. Though I shall fall on earth, yet I shall fall among wise and virtuous men.

Astaka said :—

9. O king, I believe, you know every thing. I ask you,—is there any region for myself either in heaven or in the firmament? If there be any,—you shall not fall.

Yayati said :—

10. O best of kings, there are many regions for you to enjoy in heaven, as many as the kine and horses of earth, as the animals in the wilderness and the hills.

Astaka said :—

11. O king, I give to you all those regions in heaven or in the firmament that are for me to enjoy. Therefore, though falling, you must not fall. Take them soon, wherever they may be, in heaven or in the firmament. Let your sorrow cease.

Yayati said :—

12. O best of kings, a Brahma-knowing Brahmana alone can accept gifts, and not men like ourselves. O king, I myself have given away (many gifts) to Brahmanas, as I should do.

13. Let no man, who is not a Brahma, and no woman who is the wife of a hero, earn infamy by accepting gifts. I have always desired to perform virtuous acts on earth. What I have never done before, how shall I do it now and accept a gift?

Pratardhana said :—

14. O handsome one, I am Pratardhana by name. I ask you,—is there any region for me in heaven or in the firmament to enjoy as fruits of my virtues? You know everything.

Yayati said :—

15. O king, innumerable regions, as effulgent as the solar disc, and full of great felicity, await you. If you live only for seven days in each, they will never be exhausted.

Pratardhana said :—

16. I give to you all of them. Therefore, though falling, you must not fall. Let all the regions for me to enjoy be yours, whether they may be in heaven or in the firmament. Take them soon, and let your sorrow cease.

Yayati said :—

17—18. O king, no king of equal energy should ever desire to accept in gift the religious merits of another king acquired by Yoga. No king, if wise, should act in a censurable way, though afflicted with calamity. A king should keep his eyes fixed on virtue and walk in the path of piety, and thus increase his fame. A virtuous man like me, who knows what are his duties, should not act so meanly as you ask me to do.

19. When others, desirous of acquiring religious merit, do not accept gifts, how can I do it what they do not?

Vaishampayana said :—

When the best of kings, Yayati, said this, he was thus addressed by Vasumana.

Thus ends the ninety second chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XCIII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vasumana said :—

1. I am Vasumana, the son of Oshadswa. I ask you, O king,—is there any region for me to enjoy either in heaven or in the firmament, as fruits of my virtuous acts? O high-souled one, you know all holy regions.

Yayati said :—

2. The extensive regions, as extensive as those in the firmament, on earth and ten points of heaven that are illuminated by the sun, are all waiting for you.

Vasumana said :—

3. I give them all to you. Let those regions that are mine be all yours. O king, if it is improper for you to accept them in gift, then purchase them with a straw.

Yayati said :—

4. I do not remember to have ever bought or sold any thing in an unfair way. This has also never been done by other kings. How shall I do it then?

Vasumana said :—

5. O king, if to purchase them be considered by you improper, take them from me as gifts. I for myself speak, that I shall never go to those regions that are for me. Let them, therefore, be yours.

Sivi said :—

6. I am Sivi, the son of Ushinara. I ask you, O king, O sire,—is there any region in heaven or in the firmament for me to enjoy? You know every region that one may enjoy as the fruit of his religious merit.

Yayati said :—

7. You have never disregarded either in mind or by speech the honest and the virtuous men that ever applied to you. There are infinite worlds for you to enjoy in heaven, all blazing like lightning.

Sivi said :—

8. If you consider their purchase as improper, I give them to you as gifts. O king, take them all. I shall never go to the region where the wise never feel the least grief.

Yayati said :—

9. O Sivi, you have indeed obtained for yourself infinite worlds, possessed as you are of the prowess of Indra. But I do not wish to enjoy regions given to me by others. Therefore, I cannot accept your gifts.

Astaka said :—

10. O king, each of us has expressed our desire to give you the regions that each of us has acquired by his religious merits. You refuse to accept them. We leave them for you, and we shall now descend into the earth-hell.

Yayati said :—

11. You are all truth-loving and wise. Give me that which I desire to have. I shall not be able to do what I have not done before.

Astaka said :—

12. To whom does these fine cars belong that we see before us? Do men ride on them who go to the regions of everlasting bliss?

Yayati said :—

13. These fine golden cars, as blazing as fire, and displaying great glory, will carry you to regions of bliss.

Astaka said :—

14. O king, get on these cars and go to heaven. We can wait. We shall follow you in time.

Yayati said :—

15. We can now all go together. All of us have conquered heaven. Behold, the glorious path to heaven becomes visible.

Vaishampayana said :—

16. Illuminating the whole firmament by the glory of their virtues, those excellent kings got on those cars and set out in order to get admittance into heaven.

Astaka said :—

17. I always thought that Indra was my special friend and that I shall, of all others, first obtain admittance into heaven. But how is it that Sivi, the son of Ushinara, has already left us behind?

Yayati said :—

18—19. This son of Ushinara had given all he possessed to attain to the region of Brahma. Therefore, he is the foremost among all of you. Sivi's liberality, asceticism, truth, virtue, modesty, good fortune, forgiveness, amiability, and desire of performing good acts, have been so great that none can measure them.

Vaishampayana said :—

20. Astaka, impelled by curiosity, again asked his maternal grandfather, who was like Indra himself, "O king, I ask you, tell me truly, whence have you come? Who are you? and whose son are you?"

Yayati said :—

21. I tell you truly. I am Yayati, the son of Nahusha and the father of Puru. I was a Sarvavouma on earth. You are my kinsmen. I am your maternal grandfather.

22. Having conquered the whole earth, I gave clothes to the Brahmanas. I gave them also one hundred horses fit for sacrificial offerings. For such pious acts the celestials become propitious to those that perform them.

23. I gave also to Brahmanas this whole earth with her horses, elephants, kine, gold and all kinds of wealth. I gave away also one hundred Arbudas of excellent milch cows.

24. The firmament and earth still exist owing to my truth and virtue. Fire still burns owing to my truth and virtue. Never a word has been uttered by me which is not true. The wise, therefore, adore truth.

25. O Astaka, all that I have told you, Prataardhana, and Vasumana, is the truth itself. I know that all the worlds, all the Rishis and all the celestials are adorable only because Truth characterises them all.

26. He who will duly read to the good Brahmanas the account of our ascension to heaven without malice shall himself attain to the same worlds with us.

Vaishampayana said :—

27. Thus ascended to heaven that illustrious man (Yayati) of great achievements. Rescued by his kinsmen, he left the earth and filled the three worlds with the fame of his deeds.

Thus ends the ninety third chapter, the history of Yayati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XCIV.

(SAMBHABA PARVA.)—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. Adorable Sir, I desire to hear the history of those kings who were descended from Puru. Tell me what powers and what achievements each possessed.

2. I have heard that in the dynasty of Puru there was not a single king who was deficient in good behaviour or in prowess. There was none who has no sons.

3. O great ascetic, I desire to hear in detail the account of these kings who were endued with great learning and who possessed all accomplishments.

Vaishampayana said :—

4. As you ask me I shall tell you all about the heroic kings of Puru's royal dynasty, who were all equal to Indra in power. They possessed great affluence and commanded the respect of all, on account of their many accomplishments.

5. Puru begot on his wife Paushti three great car-warriors, namely Pravira, Iswara and Raudraswa. Amongst these three, Pravira kept up the line.

6. Pravira begot on his wife Suraseni, a son named Manashyu. This lotus-eyed king had his sovereignty over the whole earth bounded by the four seas.

7. Manashyu begot on his wife Sauviri threesons, namely Sakta, Sanghanana and Vagmi; they were all great heroes and car-warriors.

8. The wise and virtuous Raudrashwa begot on Apsara Misrakoshi ten sons who were all great bow-men.

9. They were great heroes, and performed many sacrifices in honour of the celestials; they were learned in all the Sastras, and were virtuous. All of them begot sons.

10—11. They were Richeyu, Kaksheyu, powerful Krikaneyu, Sthandileyu, Vaneyu, greatly famous Jaleyu, intelligent and strong Tejeyu, Indra-like powerful Satyeyu, Dharmeyu and celestial-like powerful Sannateyu.

12. Amongst them all, Richeyu became the sole lord of the whole earth and was known by the name of Anadhirsti. He was in prowess like Indra.

13. Anadhirsti had a son, named Matinara who became a very virtuous king and greatly famous. He performed both Rajshuya and Ashwamedha sacrifices.

14. Matinara had four greatly powerful sons, namely Tansu, Mahana, Atiratha, and immeasurably glorious Drahyu.

15. Amongst them, greatly powerful Tansu became the perpetuator of Puru's line. He subjugated the whole earth and gained great fame and splendour.

16. Tansu begot a greatly powerful son, named Iina. He became the foremost of all conquerors and subjugated the whole world.

17. Iina begot on his wife, Rothantari, five sons, Dushmanta being the eldest. They were all as great in power as the five elements.

18. (They were) Dushmanta, Sura, Bhima, Pravashu and Vasu. O Janamejaya, amongst them the eldest Dushmanta became king.

19. Dushmanta begot on his wife, Sakuntala, a learned son, named Bharata who became king. From him was the Bharata dynasty and from him spread its great fame.

20. Bharata begot on his three wives nine sons, but none of them was like his father, and Bharata was not satisfied with any of them.

21. Thereupon their mothers, becoming angry, killed them all. Therefore, the procreation of that great king was in vain.

22. The king then performed a great sacrifice and obtained a son, named Bhumanyu through the grace of Bharadwaja.

23. O best of the Bharata race, the descendant of Puru, regarding himself as really possessing a son, installed him as his heir-apparent.

24—25. Bhumanyu begot on his wife Pushkarini six sons, namely Suhatra, Suhota, Suhavi, Sayayu, Richika and Diviratha. The eldest of them Suhotra obtained the throne of the world.

26. He performed many Rajshuya and Horse-sacrifices. He subjugated the whole earth bounded by the four seas, 27—28. And full of elephants, kine, horses and great wealth of gems and gold. The earth was, as it were, sinking with the weight of numberless human beings, elephants, horses and cars. Suhotra virtuously ruled over all his subjects.

29. During his reign, the surface of the whole earth was dotted all over with hundreds and thousands of sacrificial stakes. The earth became full of corns and human beings.

30. O descendant of the Bharata race, the lord of the earth Suhotra begot on his wife, Aikshaki three sons, namely Ajamida, Sumida and Puramida.

31. The eldest of them Ajamida became the perpetuator of the royal line. O descendant of the Bharata race, he begot six sons upon his three wives.

32. Riksha was born in the womb of Dhumini, Dushmanta and Parameshti in that of Nili, and Jahnyu, Jala and Rupina in that of Keshini.

33. All the Panchalas were descended from Dushmanta and Parameshti. The Kushikas were the descendants of the greatly effulgent Jahnyu.

34. Riksha was elder than Jala and Rupina; he begot Samvarana, who was the perpetuator of the line.

35—36. O king, it has been heard by us that when Samvarana, the son of Riksha, was ruling the earth, there occurred a great loss of people on account of famine, plague, draught and disease.

37—38. The Bharata princes were defeated by the armies of their enemies; and the Panchalas, set out with their four kinds of troops to conquer the earth. They soon brought the whole earth under their sway, and with their ten Akshauhinis of soldiers the king of the Panchalas defeated the princes of Bharata.

39. Samvarana then fled in fear with his wife and ministers, sons and relatives.

40. He took shelter in the forest on the banks of the river Sindhu which extended up to the foot of the mountain.

41. There lived the Bharatas within their fort for many years; and thus full one thousand years passed away.

42. (And when they were living there), the illustrious Rishi Vasishta one day came to those exiled Bharatas. On his approach, they went out and duly worshipped him.

43. All the Bharatas offered him Arghya, and entertaining him with reverence, they told every thing to the great Rishi.

44. When he was seated on his seat, the king himself addressed him thus, "O illustrious man, be our priest. We shall try to regain our kingdom."

45—46. Vasishta replied to the Bharatas by saying Om. We have heard that Vasishta installed the best of the Pauravas (Samvarana) as the lord over all the Kshatrya races. The king retook the capital that was lost.

47—48. He then began to make all the other kings of the world to pay tribute to him. That powerful monarch, thus getting possession of the whole earth, performed many sacrifices in which great presents were made to the Brahmanas. Samvarana begot on his wife Tapati, the daughter of Surya, a son named Kuru.

49. As Kuru was greatly virtuous, he was installed as the king by all the people. It is after his name that Kuru Jangala has become so famous in the world.

50—51. That great ascetic made Kuru-kshetra famous by his asceticism there. We have heard that Avikshit, Abhishyata, Chaitraratha, Muni and famous Janamejaya were the five sons begot by him on his highly intelligent wife Vahini.

52. Avikshit begot Parikshit, powerful Savalaswa, Adiraja, Viraja, greatly strong Salmali, Uchaisrava, Bhangakara, and the eighth Jitari.

53. In the race of these (eight heroes) were born, as the fruits of their many virtuous acts, seven greatly powerful car-warriors, Janamejaya being at the head,

54—55. Parikshit had sons who were all learned in Dharma and Artha. They were Kakshasena, Ugrasena, and greatly effulgent Chitrasena, Indrasena, Susona, and Bhimasena. All the sons of Janamejaya were famous in the world as being greatly powerful (princes.)

56—57. They were Dhritarashtra, the eldest, Pandu, Valhika, greatly effulgent Nishada, the mighty Jamvunada, Kundadara, Padati, and the eighth Vasati. They were all learned in Dharma and Artha and engaged in doing good to all creatures.

58—59. Amongst them Dhritarastra became king, and he had eight sons, namely Kundika, Hasti, Vitarka, Kratha, Kundina, Havisrava, Indrabha, and the invincible Bhumanyu. Amongst the sons of Dhritarastra only three were famous.

60. O descendant of Bharata, (they were) Pratipa, Dharmanetra and Sunetra. Amongst the three Pratipa became unrivalled of all.

61. O best of the Bharata race, Pratipa begot three sons, namely Devapi, Santanu, and mighty car-warrior Valhika.

62. Devapi adopted asceticism, impelled by the desire to do good to his brothers. Consequently the kingdom was obtained by Santanu and the mighty car-warrior Valhika.

63. O king, besides these (I have mentioned), there were born in the Bharata race many other good monarchs all greatly effulgent and all like the celestial Rishis in virtue and ascetic power.

64. In this way were born in the race of Manu, many mighty car-warriors like the celestials themselves, and who by their number greatly increased the Aila dynasty.

Thus ends the ninety fourth chapter, the narration of the Puru dynasty, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XCV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. O Brahmana, I have heard from you the great history of my ancestors. I have also heard from you about the great kings that were born in my dynasty.

2. But I am not still satiated with this charming account,—for it is so short. Therefore, narrate to me in detail

3. This delightful history, commencing from Prajapati Manu. Who will not feel delight in hearing such an account, sacred as it is.

4. The fame of these monarchs covered the three worlds on account of their wisdom, virtue, accomplishments and high characters.

5. Having heard of their liberality, prowess, physical strength, mental vigour, energy and perseverance,—this history, sweet as ambrosia,—I have not been satiated.

Vaishampayana said :—

6. O king, hear the auspicious history, of your own race as I recite it to you in detail, and just as I heard it before from Dwaipayana.

7. Daksha begot Aditi. Aditi begot Vivaswata. Vivaswata begot Manu. Manu begot Ila. Ila begot Pururava, Pururava begot Ayusha, Ayusha begot Nahusha, Nahusha begot Yayati. Yayati had two wives,

8. Namely Devajani, the daughter of Ushanas (Sukra) and Sarmishta, the daughter of Vrisaparva. This is a sloka about this line.

9. Devjani gave birth to Yadu and Turvasu; and Sarmishta, the daughter of Vrishaparva, gave birth to Drahyu, Anu and Puru. From Yadu, the Yadavas were descended, and from Puru the Pauravas.

10. Puru had a wife, named Kaushalya, and he begot on her a son named Janamejaya. He performed three great Horse-sacrifices and a sacrifice called Vishwajita. He then retired into a forest.

11. Janamejaya married Ananta, the daughter of Madhava. He begot on her a son, named Prachinata. He was so called because he conquered all the countries in the east even where the sun rises.

12. Prachinata married Asamaki, the daughter of the Yadavas, and she gave birth to a son, named Sanjati.

13. Sanjati married Varangi, the daughter of Drishatwata and she gave birth to a son called Ahanjati.

14. Ahanjati married Bhanumati, the daughter of Kirtavija and he begot on her a son, named Sarvavauma.

15. Sarvavauma married Sunanda, the daughter of Kakeya who was taken by force, and she gave birth to a son, named Jayatsena.

16. Jayatsena married Susrava, the daughter of the Vidharva king, and she gave birth to a son, named Avachina.

17. Avachina married another princess of the Vidharva kings, called Maryada, and she gave birth to a son, named Arihana.

18. Arihana married Agni, and she gave birth to a son, named Mahavauma.

19. Mahavauma married Suyaja, the daughter of Prasenjit, and she gave birth to a son, named Ayutanayi. He was so called, because he performed a sacrifice in which the fat of one Ayuta male beings was required.

20. Ayutanayi married Kama, the daughter of Prithusrava, and she gave birth to a son, called Akrodhona.

21. Akrodhona married Karamva, the daughter of the king of Kalinga, and she gave birth to a son, called Devatithi.

22. Devatithi married Maryada, the princess of Videha, and she gave birth to a son, named Arihana.

23. Arihana married Sudeva, the princess of Anga and she gave birth to a son, Riksha.

24. Riksha married Jwala, the daughter of Takshaka, and she gave birth to a son, named Matinara.

25. Matinara performed the most efficacious twelve years' sacrifice on the banks of the Saraswati. At the conclusion of the sacrifice, the Saraswati herself appeared before him and chose him as her husband. He begot on her a son, named Tangsu.

26. Here is a sloka describing Tangsu's descendants. Tangsu begot on his wife, the princess of Kalinga, a son, named Ilna.

27. Ilna begot on his wife, Rathantari, five sons, Dushmanta being the eldest of them.

28. Dushmanta married Sakuntala, the daughter of Vishwamitra, and she gave birth to a son, named Bharata.

29. Here are two slokas, describing the descendants of Bharata. "O Dushmanta, the mother is but a sheath of flesh (within which the son dwells). The son sprung from the father is the father himself. Therefore, cherish your son. Do not insult Sakuntala.

30. O best of men, the son, begotten by one's own self, rescues him from the abode of Yama. You are the father of this son. Sakuntala has spoken the truth."

31. It is for this reason he was called Bharata. Bharata married Sunanda, the daughter of Sarvasena, the king of Kashi, and she gave birth to a son, called Bhumanyu.

32. Bhumanyu married Vijaya, the daughter of Dasarha, and she gave birth to a son, named Suhotra.

33. Suhotra married Suvarna, the daughter of Ikshaku, and she gave birth to a son, named Hasti, who founded this city, called, after his name Hastinapur.

34. Hasti married Yosodhara, the princess of Trigarta, and she gave birth to a son, named Vikunthana.

35. Vikunthana married Sudeva, the princess of Dasarha, and she gave birth to a son, named Ajamida.

36. Ajamida had four wives, namely Kaikeyi, Gandhari, Visala and Riksha, and he begot on them two thousands and one hundred sons. And Amongst them all, Samvarana became the perpetuator of the dynasty.

37. Samvarana married Tapati, the daughter of Vivaswata, and she gave birth to a son, named Kuru.

38. Kuru married Subhangi, the princess of Dasarha, and she gave birth to a son, named Viduratha.

39. Viduratha married Sungprya, the daughter of Madhava, and she gave birth to a son, named Anaswa.

40. Anaswa married Amrita, the daughter of the Mahavas, and she gave birth to a son, named Parikshit.

41. Parikshit married Sujasa, the daughter of Vahuda, and she gave birth to a son, named Bhimasena.

42. Bhimasena married Kumari, the princess of Kekaya, and she gave birth to a son, named Pratisrava.

43. Pratisrava begot Pratipa; Pratipa married Sunanda, the daughter of Sivi, and she gave birth to three sons, namely Devapi, Santanu and Valhika.

44. Devapi retired into a forest as a hermit when he was still a boy. Therefore, Santanu became king.

45. Here occurs a sloka, describing Santanu. "Those that were touched by this king with his hands, felt indescribable pleasure. They became restored to youth. Therefore, this king was called Santanu."

46. Santanu married Ganga, and she gave birth to a son, named Devavrata, who was afterwards called Bhishma.

47. Bhishma, being desirous of doing good to his father, got him married to Satyawati, who was also called Gandakali.

48. In her maidenhood she gave birth to a son by Parasara, named Dwaipayana. Santanu begot two more sons on her,

49. Namely Vichitravirja and Chitrangada. But before they attained to their youth, Chitrangada was killed by the Gandharvas. Therefore, Vichitravirja became king.

50. Vichitravirja married the two daughters of the king of Kashi born of Kaushalya, named Amvika and Amvalika.

51. Vichitravirja died childless. Thereupon, Satyawati began to think how the dynasty of Dushmanta might be perpetuated.

52. She then thought of Rishi Dwaipayana in her mind. He stood before her and said, "What are your commands?"

53. She told him, "Your brother Vichitravirja has gone to heaven childless. Beget virtuous children for him."

54. Dwaipayana consented to do it, and he begot three sons, namely Dhritarashtra, Pandu and Vidura.

55. The king Dhritarashtra begot one hundred sons on his wife Gandhari on account of the boon granted by Dwaipayana.

56. Amongst those one hundred sons, four became famous; (they were) Duryodhana, Dushyasana, Vikarna, and Chitrasena.

57. Pandu had two best jewels of wives, namely Kunti, also called Pritha, and Madri.

58. Pandu one day went to hunt and saw a deer with its mate. It was a Rishi in the form of a deer. He killed it with his arrow in that state, when his desire was not satiated.

59. Wounded with the arrow of the king, the deer quickly changed its form and became a Rishi. He said to Pandu, "You are virtuous, and you know the pleasure derived from the gratification of one's desire. My desire is not yet satisfied, but you have killed me. Therefore, you will also die when you will be so engaged and when your desire will not be gratified." Pandu became pale to hear this curse. And from that time he did not go to his wives.

60. He told them, "I have been cursed by my fault. But I have heard that there are no regions hereafter for those who are childless." Therefore, he asked Kunti to raise offspring for him. Kunti said, "Let it be so." By Dharma she had Yudhisthira; by Maruta Bhima and by Indra Aryuna.

61. Pandu was much pleased with her and said, "This your sister (my co-wife) is also childless. Therefore, cause her to give birth to children."

62. Kunti said, "Let it be so;" and she imparted unto Madri the Mantra of invocation. And Madri gave birth by the Ashwinis, the twins Nakula and Sahadeva.

63. One day Pandu saw Madri decked in ornaments, and his desire was kindled. As soon as he touched her, he died.

64. Thereupon, Madri ascended his funeral pyre. She said to Kunti, "Let my twin sons be affectionately brought up by you."

65. Some time after, the Pandu princes, with their mother Kunti, were taken by the ascetics to Hastinapur, and they were introduced to Bhisma and Vidura.

66. After introducing them to all the orders, the ascetics disappeared in the very sight of all.

66. After the conclusion of the speech of these ascetics, flowers were showered down upon the place, and celestial drums were beaten in the sky.

67. The Pandavas were, thereupon, accepted (by all). They then represented the death of their father, and duly performed his obsequies. As they were brought up there in their boyhood, Duryodhana became very jealous of them.

68. The sinful (Duryodhana), acting like a Rakshasa, attempted by various means to drive them away, but what is to be can never be prevented.

69. Dhritarastra then by an act of deception sent them to Varanavata. They also went gladly there.

70. An attempt was there made to burn them to death, but they were saved through the warning counsel of Vidura.

71. After this Hirimba was killed, and they then went to a place, called Ekachakra.

72. They killed at Ekachakra a Rakshasa, named Vaka. They then went to Panchala city.

73. There they obtained Draupadi as their wife, and they returned to their own kingdom.

74. They lived in peace there (in Hastinapura) and begot sons. Yudhisthira begot Prativendya, Bhima (begot) Sutasoma, Arjuna (begot) Sutakirita, Nakula (begot) Satanika, and Sahadeva (begot) Srutakarmana.

75. Yudhisthira obtained in Syamvara for his wife Devika, the daughter of Govashana of the Saivya race, and he begot on her a son, named Yaudheya.

76. Bhima also obtained for his wife Valandhara, the daughter of the king of Kashi, by offering as his dower his own great prowess. He begot on her a son, named Sarvaga.

77. Arjuna went to Dwarika, and there he married by force the sweet-speeched Suvadra, the sister of Vasudeva (Krishna). He begot on her a son, named Abhimanyu, who was endued with all accomplishments, and who was dear to Vasudeva himself.

78. Nakula obtained for his wife Karenumati, the princess of Chedi, and he begot on her a son, named Niramitra.

79. Sahadeva obtained in Syamvara Vijaya, the daughter of Dyutimata, the king of Madra. He begot a son on her, named Suhotra.

80. Bhima begot some time before on Hirimba a son, named Ghatatkacha.

81. These were the eleven sons, begot by the Pandavas. Amongst them Abhimanyu was the perpetuator of the dynasty.

82. He married Uttara, the daughter of the king of Birata. She gave birth to a dead child, whom Pritha (Kunti) took up on her lap at the command of Krishna, who said, "I will revive this child of six months."

83. Though born before time, having been burnt by the fire of the weapon (hurled by Ashwathama), though deprived of life, strength and energy, he was revived by Vasudeva and was given strength, energy and prowess. After thus making him alive, Vasudeva said, "As this child is born in an extinct race, let him be called Parikshit."

84. Parikshit married Madravati, your mother, and she gave birth to you, Janamejaya.

85. You have begotten two sons on your wife Vapustama, named Satanika and Sankakarna. And Satanika has also begotten a son on the princess of Vidcha, named Ashwamedhadatta.

86. Thus have I narrated to you the history of the Kuru and Pandu dynasty. It is excellent, virtue-increasing and greatly sacred. It should always be heard by the vow-observing Brahmanas, and Kshatryas devoted to the duties of their order and expert in protecting their subjects. (It should be heard) also by Vaisyas with attention, and with reverence by Sudras, whose chief duties are to wait upon the three other orders.

87. Those Brahmanas, learned in the Vedas, and all those men who will recite or listen to this holy history with attention and reverence, will conquer the heaven and attain to the abode of the blessed. They will be always respected and adored by the celestials, Brahmanas and all other men.

88. This holy history, Bharata, has been told by the illustrious Vyasā. The Brahmanas, learned in the Vedas, and all those men who hear it recited with reverence and without malice, conquer the heavens and earn great virtues. Though sinning, he is not disrespected by any.

89. Here occurs a sloka. "This Bharata is equal to the Vedas. It is holy and good. It gives wealth, fame and life. Therefore, it should be heard by men with great attention."

Thus ends the ninety fifth chapter, the history of Puru dynasty, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XCVI.

(SAMBHABA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. There was born a king in the race of Ikshaku, and he was known by the name of Mahavisha. He, a man, a lord of the world, was truthful and was truly powerful.

2. By performing one thousand Ashwamedha and one hundred Rajshuya sacrifices, he pleased the lord of the celestials. Then he ascended to heaven.

3. Once upon a time, the celestials were one day worshipping Brahma. Many royal sages and king Mahavisha were also present there.

4. The queen of the rivers, Ganga also came there to pay her adorations to the Grandsire. Her garments, as white as the moon, were blown away by the winds.

5. As her person thus became exposed, the celestials bent down their heads, but the royal sage Mahavisha rudely continued to stare at her.

6. For this (rude act), Mahavisha was cursed by Brahma. He said, "You will be born on earth and, you shall then again attain to these regions."

7. The king (Mahavisha) then remembered all the monarchs and ascetics on earth and wished to be born as the son of the greatly powerful Pratipa.

8. The best of the rivers, (Ganga) seeing the king Mahavisha lose his firmness, went away thinking him in her mind.

9. She saw on her way those dwellers of heaven, the Vasus, who were dejected, and who had lost heaven.

10. The best of rivers, seeing them in that state asked them, "O dwellers of heaven, why do you look dejected? Is every thing all right with you?"

11. The celestial Vasus replied to her, "O great river, we have been cursed for our little fault by the illustrious Vasistha in anger.

12. Vasistha was engaged in his Sandhya (twilight worship); that best of Rishis was not seen by us. We in our ignorance crossed him. Therefore, he cursed us in anger, saying, 'Be born as men.'

13. We are not able to frustrate what has been said by that Brahma-knowing Rishi. Kindly make us, the Vasus, your sons by becoming a woman on earth.

14. O amiable one, we are unwilling to enter the womb of any human female." Having been thus addressed she said :—

Ganga said :—

15. Who is that best of men who will be your father?

The Vasus said :—

16. There will be born on earth a son to Pratipa who will be a greatly famous king. He will be our father on earth.

Ganga said :—

17. O celestials, this is also my wish which you sinless ones have expressed. I shall do the favourite works of that king. It is also your wish as just expressed.

The Vasus said :—

18. O lady of three courses (celestial, terrestrial and subteranean), you should throw your children into water just after their birth, so that we may not have to live for long on earth.

Ganga said :—

19. I shall do as you desire. But so that my companionship with him may not be entirely fruitless,—do this that one son may live.

The Vasus said :—

20. We shall each give one eighth part of our respective energies, and from it a son will be born to you who will live according to your and his wishes.

21. But this son will not beget any children on earth. Therefore, your that powerful son will be childless.

Vaishampayana said :—

22. The Vasus making this arrangement with Ganga, went away in delight to the place where they lived.

Thus ends the ninety sixth chapter, the history of Mahavisha, in the Sambhava, of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XCVII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. There was a king, named Pratipa, engaged in doing good to all creatures. He spent many years in ascetic penances, going to the source of (the river) Ganga.

2. The accomplished and beautiful Ganga, in the form of a tempting woman, rose from the water and came to the king.

3. That beautiful-featured lady, that intelligent celestial maiden, endued with ravishing beauty, sat upon the right thigh of the king which was like a Sal tree.

4. Thereupon, the king Pratipa asked that famous one, "O fortunate lady, what good can I do to you and which you desire?"

The Maiden said :—

5. O king. I desire to have you. I offer myself,—accept me. To reject a woman who is full of desire is never considered good by the wise.

Pratipa said :—

6. O beautiful lady, I never go to another man's wife out of lust. O fortunate maiden, this is my solemn vow.

The Maiden said :—

7. I am neither inauspicious, nor ugly, nor a detestable maiden. I am a celestial damsel of great beauty, O king, I offer myself,—accept me.

Pratipa said :—

8. I have abstained from the course to which you would incite me. If I break my vow, its sin will destroy me.

9. O beautiful lady, you have sat upon my right thigh. O timid girl, it is the seat for daughters and daughters-in-law.

10. The left thigh is the seat for the wife, but you have rejected it. Therefore, O best lady, I cannot accept you.

11. O beautiful girl, be my daughter-in-law. I accept you for my son. The left thigh is for the wife which you have not accepted.

The Maiden said :—

12. O virtuous man, let it be as you say. Let me be united with your son. Out of respect for you, I shall be a wife of the famous Bharata race.

13. You are the refuge of all the monarchs of the earth. I am incapable of reciting your qualifications even in one hundred years.

14. O virtuous man, the greatness and goodness of many celebrated monarchs of (your) this race is unlimited. But, O lord, this must be the term (of my becoming your daughter-in-law) that your son shall not be able to judge of the propriety for my acts.

15. Living thus with your son, I shall make him happy and do him good. He shall finally ascend heaven in consequence of his virtues and good conduct and of the sons I shall bear him.

Vaishampayana said :—

16. O King, having said this, the celestial maiden then and there disappeared. The king also waited for the birth of his son, so that he could fulfil his promise.

17. Some time after, the best of Kshatriyas, that light of the Kuru race, Pratipa, was engaged with his wife in ascetic penances with the desire of a son.

18. When they grew old, a son was born to them and this son was Mahavisha. He was called Santanu, because he was born when his father had controlled his passions by asceticism.

19. The best of Kurus, Santanu, knowing that the regions of indestructible happiness could be gained only by virtuous deeds, devoted himself to virtue.

20. When Santanu grew up to be a youth, Pratipa told him, "O Santanu, some time before, a celestial damsel came to me for good.

21. If you meet that beautiful celestial damsel in secret, and if she solicits you to beget offspring on her, accept her as your wife.

22. O sinless one, judge not the propriety or impropriety of anything she does. Ask not who she is, whom she belongs to, and whence she comes. But accept her as your wife at my command."

23. Having thus commanded his son Santanu and installed him on his throne, that king, Pratipa, retired into a forest.

24. That greatly intelligent king Santanu, as effulgent as the king of the celestials, became a lover of hunting and passed much of his time in the woods.

25. That best of kings killed many deer and buffaloes. Wandering along the banks of the Ganges, he came upon a place frequented by Siddhyas and Charanas.

26. There did the great king meet with one day a lovely damsel of blazing beauty like Sree herself.

27. She was a faultless beauty and her teeth were like pearls. She was decked with celestial ornaments. She wore garments as fine and beautiful as the filaments of lotus.

28. The king was surprised to see that damsel of great beauty; and his hair all over his body stood up in rapture. His steadfast gaze drank her charms, but it failed to satiate him.

29. The maiden also, seeing that king of great effulgence move about in great agitation, was moved and felt for him an affection and friendship. She gazed at him and longed to gaze at him more.

30—31. The king then addressed her in sweet words, "O beautiful one, O beauty of slender waist, be you a lady of the Deva or Danava race, be you a maiden of the race of the Ghandharvas or the Apsaras, be you a damsel of the Yakshas or the Nagas,—or be you a human female, I solicit you to be my wife.

Thus ends ninety seventh chapter, the history of Santanu, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XCVIII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having heard these soft and sweet words of the smiling king, that faultless maiden remembered the promise she had made to the Vasus.

2. She spoke to the king, sending a thrill of pleasure; (she said), "O protector of the world, I shall become your wife and obey your commands.

3. But O king, you must not interfere in any of my acts, whether they be agreeable or disagreeable to you. You must not also speak to me in harsh words.

4. O king, so long you will act in the way I ask you to do, I shall live with you. But I shall certainly leave you as soon as you interfere with me, or use harsh words towards me."

5. The best of the Bharata race, the king said, "Be it so." Thereupon, the maiden was exceedingly glad to get that excellent king for her husband.

6. King Santanu also was exceedingly pleased to get her for his wife. He fully enjoyed her sweet company. Adhering to his promise, he refrained from asking her anything.

7. The lord of the world, king Santanu, became very much pleased with her beauty, conduct, magnanimity and attention to comforts.

8. That celestial lady, Ganga of the three courses, assuming a human form of exceeding beauty and excellent feature,

9. Lived happily as the wife of Santanu, having as the fruit of her virtues, obtained that best of kings, as effulgent as the king of the celestials.

10. She pleased the king with her attractiveness and love, with her affection and wits, her music and dance, and king was exceedingly pleased with her.

11. The king was so much sunk in the beauty of his wife, that months, seasons and years rolled away without his being conscious of them

12. When the king was thus enjoying himself with his wife, eight sons were born to him. They were all like the celestials.

13. O descendant of the Bharata race, as soon as they were born, they were one after the other thrown into the river by Ganga, who said, when she threw them into the stream. "This is done for your good"

14. The king Santanu could not be pleased with such conduct, but he did not speak a word to her for the fear of losing her.

15. When the eighth son was born, and when Ganga was smiling (before she threw it into the river), the king, desiring to protect his son, said in sorrow,

16. "Do not kill it. Who are you? To whom do you belong? Why do you kill your own sons? Murderess of your sons, you are earning great sins by your improper acts."

Ganga said:—

17. As you desire for a son, I shall not kill this child. You have become the foremost of fathers. But there must be an end of my stay with you according to our agreement.

18. I am Ganga, the daughter of Janhu, worshipped by all great Rishis. I have so long lived with you for accomplishing the purposes of the celestials."

19. These sons were the eight celestials, the illustrious and greatly effulgent Vasus. They had to assume human form in consequence of the curse of Vasishta.

20. There is none on earth who desires to be their progenitor. There is none among human females like me who may be their mother.

21. Therefore I assumed the human form, to become their mother. You have acquire-great regions of celestial bliss by becoming the progenitor of the eight Vasus.

22. My agreement with the celestial Vasus was that I should free them from their human birth as soon as each would be born.

23. Thus have I freed them from the curse of the illustrious Rishi Apava (Vasishta.) Be blessed, I leave you now. Rear this child of rigid vows.

24. I promised to the Vasus to live with you so long (as I have lived). Let this child of mine be known by the name of Gangadatta.

Thus ends the ninety eighth chapter, the birth of Bhishma, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER XCIX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Santanu said :—

1. Who was Apava and what fault was committed by the Vasus that they had to be born among men in consequence of his curse?

2. What also had this child done that he should have to live among men?

3. Why also the lord of the three worlds, the Vasus, were condemned to be born among men? O daughter of Janhu, tell me all.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having been thus addressed, the celestial lady, the daughter of Janhu, Ganga, replied to her husband, the best of men, Santanu.

Ganga said :—

5. O best of the Bharata race, the son that was formerly born of Varuna, was the Rishi named Vasishta. He was subsequently known by the name of Apava.

6. His hermitage stood by the side of the best of mountains, the Meru. The place was holy and abounded in deer and birds. It was covered with all the best flowers.

7. O best of the Bharata race, that foremost of all virtuous men, the son of Varuna, practised his penances in that forest, abounding in sweet roots, fruits and water.

8. Daksha had a daughter who was known as Suravi. O best of the Bharata race, that lady gave birth to a cow by Kashyapa.

9. The virtuous-minded son of Varuna, obtained that best of kine, capable of granting every desire, for the purpose of his Homa rites and for benefitting the world.

10. That cow dwelt in that forest adored of all the Rishis. She roamed fearlessly in those sacred and delightful woods.

11. O best of the Bharata race, once on a time came to that forest adored by the celestial Rishis, all the celestial Vasus, Prithu being at their head.

12. They roamed with their wives into that forest and enjoyed themselves in those delightful woods and mountains.

13. O Indra like powerful man, one of the slender-waisted of the Vasus saw that cow roaming in the forest.

14—15. O king, her name was Nandini and she could grant every desire; she possessed the wealth of all accomplishments, and large eyes, full udders, fine tail, handsome hoop and every auspicious signs. She gave much milk. Seeing her such, the wife of the Vasu showed her in astonishment to her husband named Dyan.

16. O descendant of Puru, O king, this cow of many qualifications was formerly shown by the daughter of the Vasus to the Vasu.

17. O elephant-like powerful man, when that cow was shown to Dyan, O king, he began to admire her qualities and thus spoke to the lady (his wife).

18. "O black-eyed lady of beautiful thighs, this excellent cow belongs to the Rishi, the son of Varuna, to whom belongs this excellent wood.

19. O slender-waisted lady, he who drinks the milk of this cow lives young for ten-thousand years."

20. O best of kings, having heard this, that lady of slender-waist thus addressed her husband of burning effulgence.

21. I have a friend among men on earth, named Jitavati, the daughter of a king, who possesses great beauty and youth.

22. She is the daughter of the royal sage, truthful and intelligent Ushinara. Her wealth of beauty is famous all over the world.

23. O illustrious one, for her, I desire to possess this cow with her calf. O best of the celestials, O virtue increasing one, bring her soon.

24. So that my that human friend, drinking her milk, becomes the only person on earth free from disease and decrepitude.

25. O illustrious god, O blameless god, you should grant me my this desire. There is nothing which would be more agreeable to me.

26. Having heard her these words, Dyau, in order to please that celestial lady, stole the cow with the help of Prithu and his other brothers.

27. O king, commanded by his lotus-eyed wife, Dyau did her bidding, forgetting the great ascetic merits of the Rishi who owned her (the cow). He did not know then that he would have to fall for the sin of stealing the cow.

28. When in the evening the son of Varuna returned to his hermitage with the fruits he had collected, he did not find the cow and its calf. Then he began to search for her in that excellent wood.

29. The noble-minded and greatly intelligent ascetic searched for the cow everywhere in the woods; but though he searched long, yet he could not find her.

30. The man of ascetic vision then found that she had been stolen by the Vasus. His anger was at once roused, and he cursed the Vasus,

31. Saying, "As the Vasus have stolen my cow of sweet milk and handsome tail, they shall certainly be born as men on earth."

32. O best of the Bharata race, the illustrious Apava, the best of Rishis, thus cursed the Vasus out of anger.

33. Having thus cursed them, the illustrious man again engaged himself in asceticism. O king, when the celestial Vasus were thus cursed in anger by that Bramharshi and ascetic of great power,

34. They soon came to the hermitage of the illustrious man; as soon as they came to know of it,

35. O best of kings, the Vasus tried to pacify that Rishi, but they failed to obtain grace from that best of Rishis,

36. Apava, learned in the rules of every virtue. O best of men,

37. The virtuous Rishi said, "You have been cursed by me along with Dyau and others. But you shall be freed from my curse within a year of your birth among men.

38. But he for whose act you have all been cursed by me, that Dyau, will have to remain on earth for long for his own (sinful) act.

39. I shall not make my words futile though uttered in anger. But Dyau shall not beget offspring when dwelling on earth.

40. He will be virtuous-minded and learned in all Sastras. He will be very obedient to his father and abstain from the pleasure of women."

41. Thus addressing all the Vasus, the great Rishi, went away. And the Vasus all came to me.

42. O king, they prayed to me for a boon, saying, "O Ganga, as soon as each of us will, be born, you yourself should throw us into the water."

43. O best of kings, I did act accordingly, (I threw them into the waters) in order to free them from their earthly life, the effect of that curse.

44. O descendant of the Bharata race, O excellent king, the only one, namely Dyau himself, is to live on earth on account of the Rishi's curse.

Vaishampayana said :—

45. Having said this, the goddess disappeared then and there. Taking her son with her, she went away to the place she wished to go.

46. That son of Santanu was named both Gangeya and Devavrata, and he excelled his father in all accomplishments.

47. Santanu then went to his own capital with a sorrowful heart. I shall now narrate to you the many accomplishments of Santanu,

48. And the great fortune of the illustrious king of the Bharata race, the history of whom is called this effulgent Mahabharata.

Thus ends the ninety ninth chapter, the history of Apava, in the Sambava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER C.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. The king Santanu, adored of the celestials and the royal sages, was famous in all the worlds as being virtuous-minded and truthful.

2. Self-control, liberality, forgiveness, intelligence, modesty, patience and superior energy ever dwelt in that best of men, Santanu.

3. That king was endued with such accomplishments. He was learned in both Dharma and Artha. He was both the protector of the Bharata race and all the people.

4. His neck was like the conch shell, his shoulder was broad, he was as powerful as a mad elephant. All the auspicious signs of royalty dwelt in his person, and they considered that to be their best abode.

5. The people, seeing the (virtuous) acts of that king of great achievements, came to know that virtue was ever superior to pleasure and profit.

6. These accomplishments were all in that best of men, Santanu, and no other king was able to equal him in virtue.

7. All the kings of the earth, seeing him devoted to all kinds of virtues, installed him as the king of kings.

8. All the kings were free from misery, fear and anxiety of all kinds during the reign of that lord-protector of the Bharata race. They all slept in peace and rose in peace after happy dreams.

9. All the kings became virtuous and devoted to liberality, and religious acts and sacrifices from the great example set by that great king of wonderful achievements (Santanu) who was like Indra himself.

10. When the earth was ruled by Santanu and other kings like him, the religious merits of every order greatly increased.

11. The Brahmanas were served by the Kshatryas; the Kshatryas were served by the Vaisyas; the Sudras, adoring both the Brahmanas and the Kshatryas, served the Vaisyas.

12. Santanu lived in Hastinapur, the beautiful capital of the Kurus; he ruled over the whole earth bounded by the sea.

13. He was truthful and virtuous like the king of the celestials; and from his liberality, virtues, and asceticism he acquired great fortune.

14. He was free from anger and malice, he was as handsome as Soma himself. He was as effulgent as the sun and as courageous as the Vayu. He was like Yama in anger and like Earth in patience.

15. O king, when Santanu ruled the earth, no deer, bears, birds or other animals were needlessly killed.

16. The virtue of kindness reigned in the kingdom of Santanu, who himself was full of mercy and free from anger. He equally protected all creatures.

17. The sacrifices in honor of the celestials, Rishis and Pitris were performed but no creature was sinfully deprived of its life.

18. That king became a father of those that were miserable, of those that had no protectors,—nay even of birds and beasts and all creatures.

19. During the reign of that best of the Kuru kings, the king of all kings, (Santanu) the speech was mixed with truth, and mind was devoted to liberality and virtue.

20. Having enjoyed the companionship of women for thirty six years, he retired into a forest.

21. Santanu's son, the Vasu, born of Ganga, named Devavrata, resembled his father in beauty, in conduct, in habits and in learning.

22. He was expert in all sorts of weapons belonging to heaven and earth. He was greatly strong and vastly energetic; he was a great car-warrior; and he was a great beauty.

23. Once on a time, he (Santanu) wounded a deer and pursued it along the banks of the Ganges. The king Santanu saw that the Vagirathi (Ganga) had become shallow.

24. Having seen this, the best of men, Santanu began to reflect, "Why does not the best of rivers run as before?"

25. In searching for its cause, the illustrious king saw a beautiful, strong built and amiable youth,

26. Like Indra himself, who had checked the flow of the river Ganga by his sharp celestial weapons.

27. The king, seeing this wonderful feat (of the youth), namely the checking of Ganga in her course by arrows, was very much surprised.

28. Santanu had seen him only once, a few minutes after his birth; therefore, he had not sufficient recollection to identify that youth with his son.

29. But the youth, as soon as he saw his father, clouded the king's perception by Maya (delusion) and instantly disappeared before his very sight.

30. The king Santanu, being much surprised with what he saw and believing the youth to be his own son, said to Ganga, "Show me the child."

31. Ganga, assuming a beautiful form, showed him the youth decked in ornaments, holding him by his right hand.

32. Santanu could not recognise that beautiful lady, bedecked with ornaments and attired in fine robes, though he had seen her before.

Ganga said :—

33. O king, O best of men, the eighth son whom you formerly begot on me, is this. Know that this excellent child is expert in all the weapons.

34. O great king, take him now. He has been carefully reared by me. O best of men, taking him with you, go home.

35. This greatly energetic boy has studied with Vasishtha all the Vedas with their Angas.

He is skillful in all the weapons, he is a great bow-man, he is like Indra himself in battle.

36. O descendant of the Bharata race, both the celestials and the Asuras look on him with favour. Whatever the Vedas and Sastras are known to Ushanas (Sukra) are all known to this boy.

37. All the Vedas and Sastras that are known by the son of Angirasa (Vrihaspati), adored of the celestials and Asuras, he is master of them all.

38—39. All the weapons that were known to the powerful and invincible son of Jamadagni (Parushurama) are fully and completely known to your this illustrious and mighty-armed son. O king, this boy is a great bow-man, and learned in the treatises on the duties of kings. O hero, take home your this heroic son given by me.

Vaishampayana said:—

40. Having been thus commanded by her (Ganga), Santanu took his son, as effulgent as the sun, and started for his own capital.

41. Having reached the city which was like the City of Indra, the descendant of Puru (Santanu) considered himself very fortunate, and successful in his wishes.

42. He then installed his accomplished and illustrious son as his heir-apparent for the protection of the kingdom of the Kurus.

43. O best of the Bharatas, the illustrious son soon pleased his father, and all the members of his family. He pleased all the subjects of his kingdom by his conduct.

44. The greatly powerful king lived happily with his son for four years.

45. Once on a time, he went to a forest on the banks of the river, named Jamuna. When the king was roaming there, he perceived a sweet scent coming from an unknown direction.

46. Being desirous of finding out its cause, he wandered about hither and thither; and (at last) he saw a maiden of celestial beauty, belonging to the fishermen class.

47. Having seen her, he asked that black-eyed maiden, "O timid maiden, who are you? What are you doing here?"

48. She said, "Blessing be upon you! I am the daughter of the chief of the fishermen. By the command of my father I am engaged to row this boat to take people across this river for religious merits."

49. Having seen her endued with celestial beauty, amiableness and fragrance, the king Santanu desired to possess her.

50. He went to her father and asked him to bestow her upon him. He desired to know whether he was willing to give her in marriage.

51. The chief of the fishermen replied to the king saying, "As soon as that best of beautiful girls was born, it was understood by me that she should be bestowed (on some one). But, O king, hear the desire that I have in my heart.

52. O sinless one, if you desire to make her your lawful wife,—you are truthful,—then truly give me a pledge.

53. O king, if you give me the pledge, I shall then bestow my daughter on you, for I can never obtain a husband for her like you."

Santanu said:—

54. O fisherman, after hearing what you ask, I can then say whether I will be able to grant it or not. If it is capable of being granted, I shall certainly grant it.

The fisherman said:—

55. O king, the son that will be born of this girl shall be installed on your throne, and none else shall you make your successor.

Vaishampayana said:—

56. O descendant of Bharata race, Santanu became un-willing to grant the wish of the fisherman, though his body was being burnt by the fire of desire.

57. That lord of the earth returned to Hastinapur, thinking of the daughter of the fisherman, and his heart afflicted by desire.

58. One day when he was thus meditating over (the girl) in sorrow, his son Devavrata came to him and said,

59. "All is prosperity with you; all chiefs and potentates obey you, why then you grieve thus in sorrow?"

60. O king, deep in your own thoughts, you do not speak a word to me in reply. You do not now go out on horse back. You are pale and emaciated and discoloured.

61. I wish to know the disease from which you suffer, so that I may try to get a remedy." Having been thus addressed by his son, Santanu replied,—

62. "Truly I am melancholy. Hear why I am so. O descendant of Bharata race, you are the only scion in this our great dynasty.

63. You are always engaged in the sports of arms and achievements of power. O son, I am, however, always thinking of the instability of life.

64. O son of Ganga, if any thing happens to you, we shall be sonless, and we shall have no descendants. Truly you alone are equal to one hundred best sons.

65. I do not, therefore, desire to marry again. I only desire that prosperity may always attend on you, so that our dynasty may be perpetuated.

66—67. The religious men say that he who has one son has no son at all. The Agnihotra (fire worship) and three classes of study do not yield the one sixteenth part of the religious merits as are derived by the birth of a son. There is hardly any difference in this respect between men and other animals.

68. I have no doubt that he who has got a son gains heaven. The three Vedas, which are the roots of the Puranas, and which are authoritative even to the celestials, contain many proofs of this.

69. O descendant of the Bharata race, you are a hero of excitable temper; and you are always engaged in the exercises of arms. There is every likelihood of your being killed on the field of battle.

70. If it so happens, what would be the state of our race! For this reason I am melancholy. I have now told you the cause of my sorrow!"

Vaishampayana said :—

71. Having heard the cause (of his grief) from the king, the greatly intelligent and wise Devavrata thought for a while.

72. He then went to the old minister, devoted to his father's welfare. He asked him the cause of his father's sorrow.

73. O best of the Bharata race, that foremost of the Kurus asked him all about it, and he then heard from him about the pledge regarding the maiden.

74. Thereupon, Devavrata, accompanied with many venerable Kshatrya chiefs, went to the chief of the fishermen and begged his daughter for his father.

75. The fisherman received him with all due adorations. O descendant of the Bharata race, when the prince was seated, he addressed him thus.—

76. "O best of the Bharata race, you are the lord of great prowess, you are the best of wielders of arms, you are the only son of Santanu. But I have something to tell you.

77. If the bride's father be Indra himself, still he is to repent for rejecting such an exceedingly honourable and desirable proposal of marriage.

78. The great man from whose seed was born this most beautiful maiden Satyavati is equal to you in virtue.

79. He has many times recounted to me the great achievements of your father. He has told me that, that virtuous king is worthy of marrying Satyavati.

80. Allow me to tell you that I have formerly rejected the offer of that best of Bramharshis, the celestial sage Ashita, who had often asked Satyavati in marriage.

81. O king, I have only one word to say on behalf of this maiden as her father. The only strong objection in this matter is the fact of a rival in a co-wife's son.

82. O chastiser of foes, he is not safe, even he be an Asura or a Gandharva, who has a rival in you. He will never live long if you grow angry.

83. O king, this is the only objection in the marriage. There is no other. O chastiser of foes, know, this is all I have to say in the matter of bestowal (of Satyavati)"

Vaishampayana said :—

84. O descendant of the Bharata race, having been thus addressed, the son of Ganga (Devavrata) replied to him in the hearing of all the chiefs and potentates for the sake of his father.

Bhisma said :—

85. O foremost of truthful men, listen to the vow I take to-day. There is none born or will be born who will have the courage to take such a vow.

86. I shall do what you demand. The son that will be born of this maiden will be our king.

Vaishampayana said :—

87. O best of the Bharata race, having been thus addressed (by Bishma), the chief of the fishermen, desirous of achieving the difficult matter of making his daughter's son king, thus spoke to him.

The Fisherman said :—

88. "O virtuous-minded man, you have come here as the full manager of your greatly glorious father. Be also the sole manager on my behalf in the matter of the bestowal of this girl.

89. O gentle Sir, there is something else to be said, and something else to be done. O chastiser of foes, those that have daughter must say what I say.

90. O devotee of the religion of truth, the pledge that you have taken in the midst of these chiefs for the sake of Satyavati is worthy of you.

91. I have not the least doubt that it will never be violated by you. But I have great doubt in respect of your sons.

Vaishampayana said :—

92. O king, the devotee of religion of truth, (Devavrata), knowing the scruple of the fisherman, and being moved by the desire of doing good to his father then said.

Devavrata said :—

93. O chief of the fishermen, O best of chiefs, hear what I say for the sake of my father before all these chiefs and potentates.

94. O chiefs and potentates, I relinquished my right to the throne a few moments before. I shall now settle the doubt that has arisen in respect to my sons.

95. O fisherman, from this day I adopt the vow of Bramhacharya. If I die sonless, still I shall ascend to the regions of the everlasting bliss.

Vaishampayana said :—

96. Having heard those words, the hair of the fisherman stood erect in delight, and he said, "I bestow my daughter."

97. Thereupon the Apsaras, the celestials and the various classes of Rishis, began to pour down flowers from the firmament (upon the head of Devavrata), and they all exclaimed. "This man is Bhisma (the terrible.)"

98. He (Bhisma), then for the sake of his father, addressed the illustrious (lady) thus, "O mother, ascend this chariot, and let us go to our home."

Vaishampayana said :—

99. Having said this, Bhisma made the beautiful maiden ascend his car. Then coming to Hastinapur, he told Santanu all that had happened.

100. All the assembled chiefs and potentates applauded him jointly and individually for his great act. They exclaimed "He is (really) Bhisma."

101. Having heard the great deed performed by his son Bhisma, Santanu gave that illustrious man the boon of dying at will.

Thus ends the hundredth chapter, the acquirement of Satyavati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O king, after the conclusion of the marriage, the king Santanu installed that beautiful lady in his household.

2. Thereupon, the wise Santanu begot on his wife Satyavati a very powerful hero, named Chitrangada, the best of men.

3. The powerful king begot on Satyavati another son, named Vichitravirja, who became a mighty bow-man ; and he became king after his father.

4. Before that best of men, Vichitravirja, had attained the majority, his father succumbed to the inevitable influence of Time.

5. When Santanu went to heaven; Bhisma, who was always obedient to Satyavati, installed that chastiser of foes, Chitrangada on the throne.

6. Chitrangada also defeated all the kings of the world by his prowess. He could not find any equal of him among men.

7. Seeing him defeat men, Asuras, and even the celestials, the powerful king of the Gandharvas, who bore the same name with him, came to him for a fight.

8. Between that foremost of the Kurus and the powerful Gandharva chief, a fearful combat took place on the field of Kurukshetra. The combat lasted for three long years on the banks of the Saraswati.

9. In that fierce encounter, which was covered with showers of weapons, the best of the Kurus was killed, by the Gandharva through his greater prowess or power of Maya (illusion).

10. Having killed that best of men, the chastiser of foes, Chitrangada, the Gandharva went to heaven.

11. When that best of men, the greatly powerful prince, was killed, the son of Santanu performed all his obsequies.

12. Thereupon, he installed the mighty armed boy Vichitravirya, still in his minority, on the throne of the Kuru kingdom.

13. Vichitravirja, ever obedient to Bhisma, ruled the kingdom of his father and grand-sires.

14. He adopted the son of Santanu, Bhisma, learned in the Sastras of religion and law. He too protected him very virtuously.

Thus ends the hundred and first chapter, the history of the Chitrangada in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CVII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O descendant of the Kuru race, Chitrangada, having been killed and his brother being minor, Bhisma, ever obedient to Satyavati, ruled over the kingdom.

2. When that best of all intelligent men, Bhisma, saw that his brother Vichitravirji had attained majority (youth), he thought of marrying him.

3. O king, he heard that three daughters of the king of Kashi, all equal to the Apsaras in beauty, would be married at a Sayamvara.

4. Thereupon, that best of car-warriors, that chastiser of foes, that Lord (Bhisma), riding on a single car, went at the command of his mother to the city of Varanashi (Kashi).

5. There the son of Santanu, Bhisma, saw that many kings and potentates had come from all directions. He also saw those three maidens.

6. When the kings were being mentioned by name, Bhisma, the lord, chose himself those maidens (for his brother.)

7. O king, taking those maidens on his chariot, the best of warriors, Bhisma, spoke to the (assembled) kings in a voice like the roars of the clouds.

Bhisma said :—

8. The wise have said that after inviting an accomplished man, a maiden may be bestowed on him decked with ornaments and accompanied with valuable presents as much as lie in the power of the bestower to give.

9. Others may bestow their daughters by accepting a couple of kine. Some again may bestow their daughters by taking a fixed sum, and some again take away maidens by force.

10. Some marry with the consent of the maidens and some by dragging them into consent. Some by obtaining their parents' consent, some again obtain wives as presents.

11—12. The learned men praise the eighth form of marriage, but the Sayamvara is highly spoken of by the kings. But the sages have said that the wife taken by force amidst an assemblage of kings after defeating them is to be highly prized. Therefore, O kings, I carry away these maidens by force. Try with all your strength to defeat me, or be defeated.

13. O kings, I stand here, resolved to fight."

Vaishampayana said :—

Having said this to the kings and the king of Kashi, the greatly powerful

14. Kuru prince took up those maidens on his car. Having thus taken them on his car and having challenged them (the chiefs) to fight, he sped his chariot away.

15. Thereupon all the kings stood up in anger; they slapped their arms and bit their nether lips.

16. Their great hurry in casting off their ornaments and putting on their armours produced a loud uproar.

17. O Janamejaya, their ornaments and armours resembled like the meteoric flashes in the sky.

18. With their brows contracted and eyes red in anger, they moved in impatience, their ornaments and armours dangling with their agitated steps.

19. The charioteers soon brought handsome cars, yoked with fine horses. Those heroes, armed with all kinds of weapons then got on those cars.

20. They pursued the retreating chief of the Kurus. O descendant of the Bharata race, then occurred that wonderful fight, 21—22. That hair-stirring battle in which innumerable kings were on one side and only one was on the other. The kings hurled at their foe ten thousands arrows at the same time. Bhisma, however, stopped their memberless arrows before they could fall upon him by a counter shower of his own arrows as numerous as the down of the body.

23. Thereupon, the kings surrounded him on all sides and rained upon him a shower of arrows like masses of clouds showering on the mountains.

24. He (Bhisma), stopping that shower of arrows by his own, wounded each of the kings with three arrows.

25. O king, the kings wounded Bhisma each with five arrows, but he stopped the attacking kings each with two arrows.

26. The battle became so fierce with the dense shower of arrows that it looked like the battle between the Devas and the Danavas. And even brave men were struck with fear to look at it.

27. (Bhisma) cut off by his arrows flag staffs, armours and human heads by hundreds and thousands on the field of battle.

28. Such was his prowess and extraordinary lightness of hand, such was the skill with which he protected himself, that the fighting car-warriors, though his enemies, loudly applauded him.

29. That foremost of all experts in arms (Bhisma), having defeated all the kings in battle and having taken the maidens with him, went towards the capital of the Bharatas.

30. O king, then the great car-warrior king Salya, challenged from behind the son of Santanu, Bhisma, to a combat.

31—32. Desirous of securing the maidens, he came upon Bhisma like a powerful leader of elephants, rushing upon another of its kinds and tearing with its tusk its opponent's thigh at the sight of a female. That mighty armed king Salya cried in wrath to Bhisma, "Stay, Stay."

33. Then the best of men, Bhisma that destroyer of hostile army, provoked by his words, flamed up in anger like a blazing fire.

34. Bow in hand, his brow furrowed into wrinkles, he stopped his car in obedience to the Kshatrya usage and stayed there in expectation of the enemy.

35. The great car-warrior stopped his car for Salya and all the kings also stood there to see him stop. They wished to see the coming combat between Bhisma and Salya.

36. The two (heroes) then began to show their prowess on each other like two roaring bulls of great strength fighting at the sight of a cow.

37. The best of men, king Salya, covered the son of Santanu, Bhisma, with hundreds and thousands of swift-winged arrows.

38. The kings, seeing that Salya was covering Bhisma at the very outset of the combat with innumerable arrows, were much astonished, and they all cried "Blessed, Blessed."

39. Seeing him very light-handed in battle, all the kings applauded in delight the king of men, Salya.

40. Hearing these shouts of the Kshatryas, the subjugator of hostile towns, the son of Santanu, Bhisma, exclaimed, "Stay, Stay."

41. He (Bhisma) commanded his charioteer in anger, saying, "Lead the car where the king (Salya) is. I shall instantly kill him as Garuda kills a serpent."

42. O King, the Kuru prince then attached the Varuna weapon to his bow-string, and he wounded with it the four steeds of king Salya.

43. O best of Kings, the Kuru prince, warding off with his weapons those of his foe, killed king Salya's charioteer.

44. The best of men, the son of Santanu, Bhisma, for the sake of the maidens, killed the excellent steed (of his adversary) by the Aindra weapon.

45. He then defeated that best of kings, (Salya), but allowed him to escape with his life. O best of the Bharata race, thereupon, Salya went away to his own kingdom.

46. Having returned to his capital, he virtuously ruled over his people; and O subjugator of hostile towns, the kings also who came to the Sayambara returned to their own capitals.

47. After defeating the kings, the best of all wielders of arms, Bhisma, went with the maidens to Hastinapur, where was that king of the Kurus,

48. Vichitravirja, who ruled the world virtuously like his father the Kuru prince and the best of all monarchs Santanu.

49. O king, within a very short time, he (Bhisma) passed many forests, rivers, hills and woods with various trees.

50. The son, of the ocean-going river (Ganga) of immeasurable prowess in battle, killing numberless men, but having no scar on his own body, brought the daughters of the king of Kashi

51. As tenderly, as if they were his own daughters-in-law, sisters or daughters. Bringing them as his daughters, he presented them to the Kurus.

52. That mighty armed hero wishing his brother's welfare brought those greatly accomplished maidens and then offered them to his brother.

53—55. Bhisma gave to Vichitravirja the maidens who were brought by his prowess. The virtuous man (Bhisma), having achieved this extraordinary deed according to kingly custom, began to make preparations for his brother's marriage. Having consulted with Satyavati everything about the wedding was settled by Bhisma; but the eldest daughter of the king of Kashi, softly smiling, spoke thus,

56. "I have chosen in my heart the king of Saubha as my husband. He too has in his heart accepted me as his wife. This is also agreeable to my father.

57. I would have also chosen Salya in the Sayambara as my husband. You are learned in the precepts of virtue. Knowing all this do, what you think proper."

58. Thus addressed by that maiden before the Brahmanas, the heroic Bhisma began to reflect what should be done.

59. The greatly virtuous man, after consulting with the Brahmanas learned in the Vedas, allowed the eldest daughter of the king of Kashi, Amba, to do what she liked.

60. Bhisma then bestowed (the two princesses) Amvika and Amvalika on his younger brother Vichitravirja according to the ordained rites.

61. After having married them, Vichitravirja, though he was virtuous-minded, became lustful from his prime of youth.

62. They were both of tall stature; their heads were covered with black curly hair, their finger nails were red and high; they had beautiful rising breasts and hips.

63. The beautiful and amiable damsels, endued with every auspicious mark, considered their husband Vichitravirja in every war worthy of them; and they loved and respected him.

64. He (Vichitravirja) too, endued as he was with the beauty of the Aswinis and the prowess of the celestials, could steal the hearts of all women.

65. That king of the world, Vichitravirja, enjoyed with his wives uninterruptedly for seven years, and he was then attacked by consumption, though he was still in the prime of youth.

66. His friends and relatives tried to effect a cure in consultation with the physicians, but (in spite of all their efforts), the Kuru prince went to the abode of Yama like a setting son.

67—68. The virtuous-minded son of Ganga (Bhisma) became plunged in anxiety and grief. Bhisma with all the other chief Kurus, in consultation with Satyavati, then caused the obsequies of (the deceased) Vichitravirja to be performed by learned priests.

Thus ends the hundred and second chapter, the death of Vichitravirja, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CIII.

(SHAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. The unfortunate and miserable Satyavati, plunged in grief for her son, performed with her daughters-in-law the obsequial rites of her son.

2. The amiable lady then consoled her two daughters-in-law and the foremost of all wielders of arms Bhisma; Then turning her mind on virtue and on the paternal and maternal lines, the illustrious lady thus addressed the son of Ganga,

3. "The funeral cake, the achievements and the perpetuation of the Kuru dynasty and of the line of the illustrious and virtuous Santanu all depend upon you.

4. As the attainment of heaven is certain from good deeds, as long life is certain from truth, so virtue is certainly inseparable from you.

5. O virtuous man, you are well acquainted with the precepts of virtue, both in abstract and in detail. You are learned in the various Srutis and in all the branches of the Vedas.

6. I know you are like Indra and Angiras in firmness, in virtues, in preserving family-customs and in the presence of mind.

7. Therefore, O best of virtuous men, greatly relying on you, I shall appoint you to do a certain act. Hearing it, you should do it.

8. O descendant of Bharata race, the wives of your brother, the beautiful daughters of the king of Kashi, both possessing beauty and youth, are desirous of offspring.

9. O best of men, my son and your brother, endued with great prowess and dear to you, has gone to heaven when he was a boy.

10. O mighty-armed hero, therefore, beget at my command, offspring on them for the perpetuation of our dynasty. You should perform this virtuous act.

11. Install yourself on the throne of the kingdom and rule the domain of the Bharatas. Marry wife according to the rites. Do not sink your ancestors in hell."

Vaishampayana said :—

12. Thus addressed by his mother, relatives and friends, the chastiser of foes, the virtuous-minded (Bhisma) said the following conformable to the dictates of virtues.

13. "O mother, what you say is certainly sanctioned by religion. But you know my vow as regards begetting children.

14. O mother Satyavati, you know also what took place in connection with thy bestowal. I now repeat the pledge I once gave.

15. I can renounce the three worlds, I can renounce the kingdom of heaven or anything that may be greater than the both; but I can never renounce truth.

16. Earth may renounce her scent, water may renounce its moisture, light may renounce its attribute of exhibiting forms, the wind may renounce its attribute of being perceivable by the touch.

17. The sun may renounce its glory, comet its heat, the sky its sound, moon its cool rays,

18. The slayer of Vitra (Indra) may renounce his prowess and the king of justice his impartiality, but I cannot renounce truth."

19. Having been thus addressed by her son, endued with great effulgence, mother Satyavati then replied to Bhisma,

20. "O hero whose strength is truth, I know you are devoted to truth. If you like, you can create another three worlds out of your great energy.

21. I know what was your vow on my account. But taking into your consideration the emergency, bear the burden of duty you owe towards your ancestors.

22. O chastiser of foes, act in a way so that virtue is not destroyed, and so that the thread of our race is not broken, and our friends and relatives may not grieve."

23. Having been thus again and again urged by his miserable and son-bereaved mother (Satyavati), with words inconsistent with virtue, Bhisma said,

24. "O queen, turn your eyes on virtue. Do not destroy us all. The violation of truth in Kshatryas is never praised in the scriptures.

25. O queen, I shall tell you the everlasting usage of the Kshatryas, to which recourse may be had in order to prevent the line of Santanu from being extinct.

26. Hearing it, consider what should be done, in consultation with the priests and those wise men who know what practices are allowable in the time of emergency and distress. Forget not the ordinary course of social conduct."

Thus ends the hundred and third chapter, the colloquy between Bhisma and Satyavati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CIV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhisma said :—

1. The king Haihayas was killed by (Parusha) Rama, the son of Jamadagni, with his battle axe from his anger at the death of his father.

2. Cutting off one thousand arms of Aryuna (Haihayas), he achieved a most difficult feat in the world.

3. He set out on his car to conquer the world ; and taking up his bow, he hurled his mighty weapons to exterminate the Kshatryas.

4. In olden time the illustrious descendant of the Vrigu race, exterminated the Kshatrya race for twenty one times with his swift arrows.

5. When the earth was thus in olden time made Kshatrya-less by that great Rishi, the Kshatrya women raised children by the Brahmanas, learned in the Vedas.

6. They went to the Brahmanas not lustfully, but from virtuous motives. It is said in the Vedas that the son so raised belongs to him that had married the mother.

7. Thus it was that the Kshatrya race was again brought into existence all over the world. There is an old history in connection with this matter, and I shall narrate it to you.

8. There was, in the time of yore, a wise Rishi, named Utathya. He had a wife, name Manata whom he dearly loved.

9. One day Utathya's younger brother, the priest of the celestials, the greatly effulgent Vrihaspati, proposed to Manata.

10. Manata said to her Devara (husband's younger brother), that best of eloquent men, "I am pregnant by your elder brother ; therefore you should not seek me now.

11. O illustrious Vrihaspati, the child, who is now in my womb, has studied there the Vedas with their six Angas.

12. Your seed is also infallible. How is it possible for two children to live there at the same time ? Therefore, you should not desire me to-day."

13. Having been thus addressed by her, Vrihaspati, though greatly intelligent, could not suppress his desire.

(Slokas 14 to 20 are not translated for obvious reasons.)

21. From the curse of the Rishi Vrihaspati, Utathya's son, as illustrious and as effulgent as Vrihaspati, was born blind ; and he was named Dirghatamas (enveloped in perpetual darkness.)

22. The born-blind, Veda-knowing and greatly wise Rishi obtained for his wife by his learning a young and handsome Brahmana maiden, named Pradweshi.

23. He begot on her Gautama and other sons in order to keep up the illustrious line of Utathya's race. But Gautama and others were all covetous and fools.

24. The virtuous-minded, high-souled and learned in the Vedas and Vedangas, (Dirghatamas) learnt from Suravi's son the practices of the cow race, and he began publicly to commit the vice.

25. The excellent Rishis, the dwellers of the same hermitage, became indignant to see him transgress all propriety.

26. They said, "This man transgresses all propriety. He deserves not to live in the hermitage. We shall all renounce this sinful wretch."

27. They said many things else regarding the Rishi Dirghatamas. His wife also, having (already) obtained sons, was not pleased with him. The husband then addressing his wife Pradweshi said, "Why are you dissatisfied with me?"

Pradweshi said :—

28. The husband is called Bhatri, because he supports his wife; he is called Pati, because he protects her, but you are neither to me. O great ascetic, as you are blind from your birth, it is I who have supported you and your children. But I shall do it no longer.

Bhisma said :—

29. Having heard her words, the Rishi became angry, and he said to his wife Pradweshi and her sons "Take me to the Kshatryas (kings) and you will then be rich."

Pradweshi said :—

30. O Brahmana, I do not desire to possess the wealth, earned by you, which would always be the cause of misery. O best of Brahmanas, do what you like; I shall not support you as I did before.

Dirghatamas said :—

31. From this day I make this rule among men that every woman shall stick to one husband only all through her life.

32. Whether the husband is dead, or whether he is alive, she must not have connection with another man. She, who will have it, will be considered as fallen. A woman without a husband will always be liable to be sinful. Even if she is wealthy, she will not be able to enjoy it truly.

33. Calumny and evil report will always follow her.

Bhisma said :—

Having heard these words, the Brahmana lady became exceedingly angry and said, "O sons, throw him into the Ganges."

34—35. Her avaricious and foolish sons, Gautama and his brothers, exclaimed,

"Why should we support this blind old man?" Thus thinking, those wicked men tied him on a raft and threw him into the Ganges. They then returned home.

36. The Brahmana, drifting along the stream on that raft, passed through the territories of many kings.

37. One day a king, named Vali, learned in all the precepts of religion, saw him (the blind Rishi) drifting along the stream and approaching near him.

38. O best of the Bharata race, the virtuous-minded Vali, whose strength was truth, knowing who he was, took him up (from the stream) for the purpose of raising up offspring. He said.

39. "O illustrious man, I have to raise up a few sons on my wife. Therefore, beget on her some virtuous and wise sons."

40. Thus addressed, the greatly effulgent Rishi said to him, "Be it so." Thereupon, that king sent his wife Sudeshna to him.

41. That lady, knowing him to be blind and old, did not go to him. She sent to him her old nurse.

42. The virtuous-minded Rishi begot on that Sudra woman eleven sons.

43. O descendant of the Bharata race, seeing all those sons, Kakshivata being their eldest, who studied all the Vedas, the king one day asked the Rishi, "Are these sons mine?"

44. The great Rishi said to him, "No, they are mine. I have begotten Kakshivata and others on a Sudra woman.

45. Your queen, Sudeshna, finding me old and blind, the foolish woman, insulted me (by not coming herself) and sent her nurse to me.

46. He (the king) then gratified the excellent Rishi and sent his wife, Sudeshna, again to him.

47. Dhirghatama touched that lady's body and told her, "You will give birth to sons, as effulgent as the sun,

48. Namely, Anga, Vanga, Kalinga Pundra and Sunga. Five countries will be named on earth after their names.

49. From Anga a country will be called Anga, from Banga one Banga, from Kalinga one Kalinga,

50. From Pundra one Pundra, and from Sunga one Sunga. It was thus the line of Vali was perpetuated by the Rishi.

51. It was thus that many virtuous, greatly energetic and exceedingly strong bow-men, Kshatryas, were born from the

Bramhanas. Hearing this, O mother, do as you like in this matter.

Thus ends the hundred and fourth chapter, the colloquy between Bhisma and Satyavati, in the Sambhava, of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Bhisma said :—

1. O mother, listen to me, I shall point out the means by which the Bharata dynasty may be perpetuated.

2. Let an accomplished Bramhana be invited with the offer of wealth; let him beget offspring on the wives of Vichitravirja.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. Then Satyavati thus spoke to Bhisma, smiling softly and speaking in bashful voice.

Satyavati said :—

4. O descendant of the Bharata race, what you say is true. From my confidence in you, I shall now point out the means of perpetuating our dynasty.

5. You shall not be able to reject it,—learned as you are in the practices permitted in the time of distress. You are Virtue, you are Truth,

6. Therefore, hearing what I say, do what is proper. My father was a virtuous man, and for virtue's sake he had kept a boat (for crossing people.)

7. In the prime of my youth, I went one day to ply that boat. It so happened that the great and wise Rishi Parasara, the foremost of all virtuous men, came on my boat for crossing the Jamuna.

8. As I was taking him across the river, that best of Rishis became full of desire and began to address me in soft words.

9. O descendant of Bharata, I was afraid of my father, but I was also greatly afraid of the Rishi's curse. Therefore, having got from him a great boon, I could not refuse his request.

10. O descendant of the Bharata race, he overpowered me,—a mere girl,—by his great effulgence, and he also enveloped the region with a thick fog.

11. There was in my body a revolting odour of fish before, but the Rishi dispelled it and gave me my this fragrance.

12. The Rishi told me, "After bringing forth this child on the island of this river, you will still remain a virgin.

13. The son of Parasara, thus born of me in my maiden-hood, has become a great ascetic, named Dwaipayana.

14. That illustrious Rishi, having divided by his ascetic power the Vedas into four parts, has become known on earth as Vyasa, and for his black colour as Krishna.

15. He is truthful, free from passions, and a great ascetic who has destroyed all his sins; he went away with his great father as soon as he was born.

16. Asked by me and also by you, that Rishi of incomparable effulgence will surely beget excellent offspring on the wives of your brother.

17. He told me, "Mother, think of me (mentally call me) when you will be in difficulty. O mighty-armed Bhisma, if you wish, I can now think of him."

18. O Bhisma if you are willing and if you appoint him, I am sure that great ascetic will beget children on the wives of Vichitravirja.

Vaishampayana said :—

19—20. When the great Rishi was thus mentioned, Bhisma with joined hands said. "That man is truly intelligent who fixes his eyes judiciously on Dharma, Artha, and Kama, and who, after reflecting with patience, acts in such a way as virtue (Dharma) may lead to future virtue, profit (Artha) to future profit and pleasure (Kama) to future pleasure.

21. Therefore, that which has been said by you, and that which, besides being beneficial to us is consistent with virtue, is certainly the best advice, and it has my full approval."

Vaishampayana said :—

22. O descendant of the Kuru race, when Bhisma said this, Kali (Satyavati) thought of the Rishi Krishna Dwaipayana.

23. Dwaipayana, who was then interpreting the Vedas, came at once to his mother without any body knowing it, as soon as he found that he had been thought of.

24. She (Satyavati), having welcomed her son in all due form, embraced him with her arms and bathed him with her tears.

25. The daughter of the fisherman (Satyavati) shed much tears to see her son after a long time. Having seen her weep, the great Rishi, Vyasa, her eldest son, washed her (face) with cool water; and bowing to his mother, he said,

26. "O mother, I have come to fulfill your wishes. Therefore, O virtuous lady, command me without delay. I shall accomplish what you desire."

27. The priest (of the Bharatas) then worshipped the great Rishi in the proper form, and the Rishi accepted the offerings of the worship with uttering the usual Mantras,

28—29. Being pleased with the due worship with the proper Mantras, he took his seat. His mother, Satyavati, seeing him conformably seated, asked his welfare and made the usual enquiries. She then said, "O Kavi, (learned man), the sons derive their birth from both the father and the mother.

30. There is no doubt that their proprietors are both the father and the mother. You are my eldest son according to the ordinances.

31-32. O Bramharshi, Vichitravirja was my youngest son. As he was the brother of Bhisma by father's side, so you are by the mother's side. This is my opinion, I do not know what is your opinion. This Bhisma, the son of Santanu, who is devoted to truth, does not, for the sake of truth, wish to beget children or to rule the kingdom.

33. Therefore, O sinless one, for the sake of the affection you bear for your brother (Vichitravirja), for the sake of perpetuating the dynasty of Santanu, for the sake of Bhisma and my request,

34. For the sake of the kindness you bear for all creatures, for the sake of the protection of people, and for the sake of the liberality of your heart you should do what I say. Your younger brother has left two young wives, like the daughters of the celestials.

35. They possess beauty and youth, and they wish to have sons from the desire of getting virtue. O son, therefore, beget on them sons worthy of our dynasty and for the continuance of our line."

Vyasa said :—

36. O (mother) Satyavati, you know what is virtue, both as regards this world and the next. O lady of great wisdom, your mind is also fixed on virtue.

37. Therefore, making virtue my motive, I shall, at your command, do what you desire, knowing (as I do) that this practice is conformable to the true and eternal religion.

38—39. I shall produce for my brother sons that will be like Yama and Varuna. Therefore, let the ladies observe the vow I indicate for one full year. They will be then purified. No woman must come to me without having observed a rigid vow.

Satyavati said :—

40. Take such steps as the ladies may conceive to-day. The people perish in a kingdom where there is anarchy. Sacrifices and other holy acts are destroyed, the rains and the celestials disappear from that place.

41. O Lord, how can a kingdom be protected without a king? Therefore, see that the ladies conceive. Bhisma will watch over the children in their womb.

Vyasa said :—

42. If I am to produce sons for my brother so unseasonably then let the ladies tolerate my ugliness. That will be to them a great penance.

43. If the princess of Koshala can bear my strong odour, my ugly and grim visage, my attire and body, she will then conceive an excellent son.

Vaishampayana said :—

44—45. Having thus spoken to Satyavati, the greatly effulgent Vyasa said to her, "Let the princess of Koshala adorned with ornaments wait for me in her bed room in clear attire. (So saying) he (immediately) disappeared. Satyavati then went to her daughter-in-law, and in private,

46. Spoke to her these words of beneficial and virtuous import, "O princess of Koshala, hear what I say. It is consistent with virtue.

47. On account of my bad fate, the Bharata dynasty has become extinct. Seeing me agrieved and the extinction of his paternal line,

48. The wise Bhisma, with the desire of perpetuating our race has made to me a suggestion. But, O daughter, its accomplishment depends on you. Accomplish it, and restore the lost line of the Bharatas.

49. O beautiful girl, bring forth a son as effulgent as the king of the celestials. He will bear the heavy burden of our this hereditary kingdom.

50. She (Satyavati,) having succeeded somehow in getting the consent of that virtuous lady to her proposal which was consistent to religion, fed Brahmanas, Devarshis and guests.

Thus ends the hundred and the fifth chapter, the advice of Satyavati, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva,

CHAPTER CVI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When her daughter-in-law performed her purifying bath after her season, Satyavati led her to a luxurious bed-room and spoke to her thus,

2. "O princess of Koshala, your husband has an elder brother who will to-day come to you. Wait for him without falling asleep."

3. Having heard these words of her mother-in-law, the amiable lady, as she lay on her bed in her bed-room, began to think of Bhishma and other great Kuru chiefs.

4. Then the truthful Rishi, who had given his promise as regards Ambika first, came to her bed-room while the lamp was burning.

5. Seeing his dark visage, his matted locks of copper colour, his blazing eyes, and his grim beard, the lady closed her eyes in fear.

6. But he (the Rishi), in order to accomplish his mother's desire, united with her. The daughter of the king of Kashi was not able to open her eyes from fear.

7. When he came out, the mother asked the son, "Will the princess have an accomplished son?"

8-9. Hearing his mother's words, the son of Satyavati, the self-controlled and greatly wise Vyasa said, "The son that will be brought forth by the princess, will be equal to ten thousand elephants in strength. He will be learned and a great royal sage. He will be greatly fortunate, greatly powerful and vastly intelligent.

10. The noble prince will have one thousand sons, but for the fault of his mother, he will be blind."

11. Having heard these words of his son, the mother said, "O great ascetic, how can one who is blind be a king, worthy of the Kurus?"

12. How can one who is blind can protect his relatives and friends and increase the glory of his fathers and continue the dynasty? Therefore, you should give another king to the Kuru race."

13. Having promised this, the illustrious (Vyasa) went away. In due time the princess of Koshala gave birth to a blind son,

14. O chastiser of foes, after securing the consent of her daughter-in-law, Satyavati soon after again summoned Vyasa as she did before.

15-16. Vyasa came according to his promise and went to the second wife (Amvalika) of his brother in proper form. But she became pale and discoloured with fear on seeing the Rishi. O descendant of the Bharata race, seeing her pale and discoloured with fear, and afflicted with grief,

17. The son of Satyavati, Vyasa, spoke to her thus, "As you have become pale by seeing me ugly,

18. So your son will be also pale in complexion. O beautiful featured lady, the name of your son will be accordingly Pandu, (pale.)"

19. Having said this, the excellent and illustrious Rishi came out and met her mother who asked him about the child.

20. He told her that the child will be pale, and his mother (Satyavati hearing this) begged again for another son.

21. The Rishi replied to his mother by saying, "Be it so." The lady (Amvalika) gave birth to a son in due time.

22. He was of pale complexion, very effulgent and endued with all auspicious marks. This son afterwards begot those mighty bow-men, the five Pandavas.

23-24. (Sometime after), when her eldest daughter-in-law was again in her season, she was asked by (Satyavati) to go to Vyasa. But she, endued with the beauty of a daughter of the celestials, remembering the grim visage and strong odour of the great Rishi, did not act according to the request of the lady (Satyavati) out of fear. Having decked a maid-servant like an Apsara with her ornaments

25. The daughter of the king of Kashi sent her to Krishna (Vyasa). She rose up and saluted him as the Rishi came.

26. After having waited upon him respectfully, she took her seat near him when asked. O king, the Rishi of rigid vows was greatly pleased with her.

27. When he rose (to go away) he said, "O amiable girl, you shall no longer remain a maid-servant. Your son will be greatly fortunate, virtuous and the foremost of all intelligent men on earth."

28. The son of Krishna Dwaipayana thus born was known by the name of Vidura. He was thus the brother of the illustrious Dhritarastra and Pandu.

29. The God of Justice was thus born as Vidura in consequence of the curse of the Rishi Mandavya. He was free from desire and anger. When Krishna Dwaipayana was met by his mother as before, he told her,

30. How he had been deceived by the eldest of the princesses and how he had begotten a son on a Sudra woman. Having said this, he disappeared in her sight.

31. Thus were begotten on the field (wives) of Vichitravirja by Dwaipayana these sons, as effulgent as the celestial children, the expanders of the Kuru race.

Thus ends the hundred and sixth chapter, the bringing forth of Vichitravirja's sons, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CVII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—*Continued.Janamejaya said :—

1. What did Dharma (the god of justice) for which he was cursed? Who was the Bramhana Rishi, for whose curse the god had to be born in the womb of a Sudra woman?

Vaishampayana said :—

2. There was a certain Bramhana, who was known as Mandavya. He was learned in all the precepts of virtue; he was devoted to truth and asceticism.

3. The great ascetic sat at the entrance of his hermitage, as a great Yogee with his arms upraised in the observance of the vow of silence.

4. As he passed years together (in that state), one day (some) robbers came to his hermitage with stolen properties.

5-6. O best of the Bharata race, they were pursued by many guards-men. O best of the Kuru race, the thieves, entering that hermitage, hid their booty there. Before the force (guards-men) came up, they too hid themselves in fear. But as soon as they had concealed themselves, the guards in pursuit came to the spot.

7. O king, the pursuers of the thieves saw the ascetic sitting in that state; and they asked him,

8. "O excellent Bramhana, which way the thieves have gone? O Bramhana, point them to us, so that we may follow them without loss of time."

9. O king, having been thus addressed by the guards, the ascetic did not say a word in reply,—good or bad.

10. Thereupon, the officers of the king, in searching that hermitage, found the thieves with the stolen properties concealed there.

11. The suspicion of the guards fell upon the Rishi; they seized him with the thieves and brought him before the king.

12. The king sentenced him along with the thieves. The guards, acting in ignorance, put that great Rishi also on the Sula (an instrument of death).

13. Having put them (the thieves) and the Rishi on the Sula, they returned to the king with the stolen property they had recovered.

14. Though the virtuous-minded Bramhana Rishi remained for many years on the Sula without food, yet he did not die.

15. The illustrious man, who was in deep Tapa at the point of the Sula, kept up his life and brought other Rishis there by his ascetic power.

16. O descendant of the Bharata race, they came in the night in the forms of birds; and seeing him engaged in Tapa (ascetic meditation), though fixed on the Sula, they were extremely agrieved.

17. Having shown themselves in their own forms, they asked that excellent Bramhana, "O Bramhana, we desire to hear what is your sin for which you suffer this torture of being placed at the point of the Sula."

Thus ends the hundred and seventh chapter, the history of Animandavya, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CVIII.

(SAMBHABA PARVA).—*Continued.Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon, that best of Rishis thus replied to the ascetics, "Whom shall I blame? None is to blame.

2. O king, the guards, having seen him after many days in that state, told the king all that had happened.

3. Having heard their words, the king after consulting with his ministers, gratified that excellent Rishi fixed on the Sula.

The king said :—

4. O best of Rishis, I have offended you out of ignorance. I beseech you, pardon me. You should not be angry with me.

Vaishampayana said :—

5-6. Having been thus addressed by the king, the Rishi was gratified. Having thus gratified him, the king took down the Sula and tried to draw it out from him but he was unable to do it.

7. The Rishi in that state with Sula practised the austerest penances, and he thus conquered by his asceticism many regions difficult to be obtained.

8. Therefore, he was called on earth Animandavya. That great truth-knowing Brahmana (one day) went to Dharma (the god of justice).

9. Seeing the god seated on his seat, the lord (Rishi) asked him reproachingly, "What is the sinful act which has been committed unconsciously by me

10. For which I am suffering from this punishment? Tell me without delay, and then see my ascetic power."

Dharma said :—

11. O ascetic, a little insect was once pierced by you with a blade of grass ; you now receive the fruit of your action.

Animandavya said :—

12. You have inflicted upon me a great punishment for a little fault. Therefore O Dharma, you will be born as a man in the womb of a Sudra woman.

13. I establish this rule to-day on earth in respect of the consequences of one's act that no sin will be committed in any act done by a man below the age of fourteen years. When committed only above that age, it will be sin."

Vaishampayana said :—

14. Being cursed by that illustrious man for this fault, Dharma was born as Vidura in the womb of a Sudra woman.

15. He (Vidura) was learned in Dharma and Artha ; he was free from avarice and anger ; he was fore-seeing, tranquil in mind, and ever engaged in doing good to the Kurus.

Thus ends the hundred and eighth chapter, the history of Animandavya, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CIX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. On the birth of these three sons (Dhritarastra, Pandu and Vidura), Kurujangala, Kurukshetra and the Kurus grew in prosperity.

2. The land gave abundant harvests and the crops were juicy. The clouds showered rains at proper time, and the trees became full of fruits and flowers.

3. The beasts of burdens were happy, and the deer and the birds were exceedingly glad. The flowers became fragrant and the fruits became sweet.

4. The cities were filled with merchants and artizans ; the people became brave, learned, honest and happy.

5. There were no thieves, there was none who was sinful. It seemed that Satya Yuga had come over all parts of the kingdom.

6. The people were devoted to virtuous acts, sacrifices, and the vow of the truth. Bearing love and affection for one another, they grew in prosperity.

7. They were free from pride, anger and covetousness ; they took delight in sports which were perfectly innocent.

8—9. The holy city (Hastinapur) like the wide ocean, full of hundreds of palaces and mansions, possessing gates and arches and looking like dark clouds, appeared like the celestial capital of Indra. The people sported in great delight in the rivers, lakes, tanks, beautiful groves and woods.

10. The Southern Kurus, in virtuous rivalry with the Northern Kurus, walked with the Devarshis and Charanas.

11. None was there miserly, and there was no woman who was a widow in that delightful country whose prosperity was thus increased by the Kurus.

12. The wells were full of water, the groves abounded with trees, the houses of Brahmanas were full of wealth, and the whole kingdom was full of prosperity.

13. O king, thus virtuously ruled by Bhisma, the kingdom was adorned with hundreds of sacrificial stakes.

14. The wheel of virtue being thus set in motion by Bhisma, the country was full of increased population, people coming from other countries.

15. The citizens and the people were all filled with hope on seeing the achievements and behaviour of the youthful princes.

16. O king, in the house of the chief Kurus and in those of the people, "Give" "Eat" were the words that were constantly heard.

17. Dhritarastra, Pandu and Vidura were brought up from their birth by Bhisma, as if they were his own sons.

18. They passed through the usual rites of their order ; they engaged themselves in study and vows ; they grew up into youths, expert in athletic sports and labour.

19. They became expert in archery, learned in the Vedas, skillful in club-fight and in using sword and shield. They were experts in horse-manship and in the management of elephants ; they were learned in the science of morality.

20. They were acquainted with history, Puranas and with many other branches of learning. They were well-acquainted with the mystery of the Vedas and the Vedangas. The knowledge they acquired was versatile and deep.

21. The greatly powerful Pandu excelled all men in the science of archery. The king Dhritarastra excelled all men in personal strength.

CHAPTER CVII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—*Continued.Janamejaya said :—

1. What did Dharma (the god of justice) for which he was cursed? Who was the Bramhana Rishi, for whose curse the god had to be born in the womb of a Sudra woman?

Vaishampayana said :—

2. There was a certain Bramhana, who was known as Mandavya. He was learned in all the precepts of virtue; he was devoted to truth and asceticism.

3. The great ascetic sat at the entrance of his hermitage, as a great Yogee with his arms upraised in the observance of the vow of silence.

4. As he passed years together (in that state), one day (some) robbers came to his hermitage with stolen properties.

5-6. O best of the Bharata race, they were pursued by many guards-men. O best of the Kuru race, the thieves, entering that hermitage, hid their booty there. Before the force (guards-men) came up, they too hid themselves in fear. But as soon as they had concealed themselves, the guards in pursuit came to the spot.

7. O king, the pursuers of the thieves saw the ascetic sitting in that state; and they asked him,

8. "O excellent Bramhana, which way the thieves have gone? O Bramhana, point them to us, so that we may follow them without loss of time."

9. O king, having been thus addressed by the guards, the ascetic did not say a word in reply,—good or bad.

10. Thereupon, the officers of the king, in searching that hermitage, found the thieves with the stolen properties concealed there.

11. The suspicion of the guards fell upon the Rishi; they seized him with the thieves and brought him before the king.

12. The king sentenced him along with the thieves. The guards, acting in ignorance, put that great Rishi also on the Sula (an instrument of death).

13. Having put them (the thieves) and the Rishi on the Sula, they returned to the king with the stolen property they had recovered.

14. Though the virtuous-minded Bramhana Rishi remained for many years on the Sula without food, yet he did not die.

15. The illustrious man, who was in deep Tapa at the point of the Sula, kept up his life and brought other Rishis there by his ascetic power.

16. O descendant of the Bharata race, they came in the night in the forms of birds; and seeing him engaged in Tapa (ascetic meditation), though fixed on the Sula, they were extremely agrieved.

17. Having shown themselves in their own forms, they asked that excellent Bramhana, "O Bramhana, we desire to hear what is your sin for which you suffer this torture of being placed at the point of the Sula."

Thus ends the hundred and seventh chapter, the history of Animandavya, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CVIII.

(SAMBHABA PARVA).—*Continued.Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon, that best of Rishis thus replied to the ascetics, "Whom shall I blame? None is to blame.

2. O king, the guards, having seen him after many days in that state, told the king all that had happened.

3. Having heard their words, the king after consulting with his ministers, gratified that excellent Rishi fixed on the Sula.

The king said :—

4. O best of Rishis, I have offended you out of ignorance. I beseech you, pardon me. You should not be angry with me.

Vaishampayana said :—

5—6. Having been thus addressed by the king, the Rishi was gratified. Having thus gratified him, the king took down the Sula and tried to draw it out from him but he was unable to do it.

7. The Rishi in that state with Sula practised the austere penances, and he thus conquered by his asceticism many regions difficult to be obtained.

8. Therefore, he was called on earth Animandavya. That great truth-knowing Brahmana (one day) went to Dharma (the god of justice).

9. Seeing the god seated on his seat, the lord (Rishi) asked him reproachingly, "What is the sinful act which has been committed unconsciously by me

21. The greatly powerful Pandu excelled all men in the science of archery. The king Dhritarastra excelled all men in personal strength.

22. O king, there was none in the three worlds, who excelled Vidura in his devotion towards religion and virtue, and in his knowledge of the science of morality.

23. On seeing the restoration of the extinct dynasty of Santanu, the following saying became current over all countries.

24. "Amongst the mothers of heroes, the daughter of the king of Kashi; among all countries, Kurujangalas; among all virtuous men, Bhishma; and among all cities, Hastinapur, are the foremost.

25. Dhritarastra did not get the kingdom, because he was blind; and Vidura also did not get it, because he was born of a Sudra woman, therefore Pandu became king.

26. One day the foremost of all statesmen, the learned in all the moral precepts, the son of Ganga (Bhishma), spoke to Vidura thus.

Thus ends the hundred and ninth chapter, the installation of Pandu, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. This our famous dynasty, endued with every virtue and accomplishment, has all along ruled over all other kings on earth.

2.—3. It was perpetuated by many virtuous-minded and virtuously inclined kings. Satyawati, the illustrious Krishna (Dwipayana), and myself, have raised you up in order that this our great dynasty may not be extinct.

4. It is certainly your duty and mine to take such steps as our this dynasty may expand as the sea.

5. I have heard that the princess of the Yadavas, the daughter of Suvala and the princess of Madra, are worthy of being allied to our dynasty.

6. O sons, all these maidens are the best of Kshatriyas; they are beautiful and of pure birth; they are eminently fit for alliance with our family.

7. O foremost of intelligent men, Vidura, I think we should chose them for the perpetuation of our race. Tell me what you think.

Vidura said :—

8. You are our father, you are our mother, you are our great preceptor. You yourself do what you think proper for the welfare of this dynasty.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. He (Bhishma) heard from the Brahmanas that the daughter of Suvala, Gandhari, had received a boon by worshipping the destroyer of eyes of Vaga, the boon-giving diety Hara (Siva).

10. The amiable Gandhari would get one hundred sons. Having heard this, the grandsire of the Kurus, Bhishma

11. Sent messengers to the king of Gandhara. O descendant of the Bharata race, (king) Suvala hesitated on account of the blindness (of the bridegroom.)

12. But taking into consideration the noble blood, the fame and the conduct of the Kurus, he bestowed the virtuous Gandhari on Dhritarastra.

13. O descendant of the Bharata race, having heard of the blindness of Dhritarastra, and that her parents had consented to bestow her (Gandhari) upon him,

14—15. O king, ever-devoted to her husband, (Gandhari) bandaged her own eyes with cloth, gathered into many folds, out of her desire that she would not be wanting in respect and love for her husband. Thereupon, the son of the king of Gandhari, Sakuni,

16. Bringing his beautiful and young and well-behaved sister to the Kurus, formally gave her to Dhritarastra.

17. The nuptials were solemnised with the permission of Bhishma. The hero (Sakuni), giving away his sister with (many valuable) robes, returned to his own capital, after being duly worshipped by Bhishma.

18. O descendant of the Bharata race, the beautiful Gandhari pleased all the Kurus by her behaviour and respectful attentions.

19. She, ever-devoted to her husband, pleased her superiors by her good conduct, and vow-observing as she was, she never referred to other men even in words.

Thus ends the hundred and tenth chapter, the marriage of Dhritarastra in the Sambhava of the Adiparva.

CHAPTER CXI.

(SHAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. There was a chief among the Yadus, named Sura, who was the father of Vasudeva. His daughter was named Pritha; she was matchless in beauty on earth.

2—3. O descendant of the Bharata race, that truthful man (Sura) gave his first born child to the son of his paternal aunt,—his childless cousin and favour-seeking friend,—the high-souled Kuntibhoja, according to a promise given before.

4—5. She (Pritha) was appointed in her (adoptive) father's house to look after the hospitality to the Brahmanas and guests. One day by careful attentions she gratified the terrible Brahmana of rigid vows, known by the name of Durvasha, learned in the mystery of religion.

6. Anticipating the future difficulty of her getting sons, he (Durvasha) taught her a Mantra for invoking any of the celestials (she liked for growing her children). The Rishi then said to her,

7. "Through the effulgence of those celestials whom you will invoke by this Mantra, offspring will be certainly begotten on you."

8. Having been thus told by the Brahmana, (Durvasha) the illustrious Kunti (Pritha), being curious, invoked in her maidenhood the god Arka (Sun).

9. She immediately saw (before her) that effulgent deity (Sun), that beholder of everything in the world. Seeing the wonderful sight, that maiden of faultless feature was very much surprised.

10. The deity Vivaswata (Sun), coming to her said, "O black-eyed lady,—here I am. Tell me what I can do for you."

Kunti said :—

11. O slayer of foes, a certain Brahmana gave me this science (Mantra). O Lord, I have invoked you, only to see the efficacy of the Mantra.

12. For my this fault, I bow down my head to you to ask for your grace. A woman, however guilty, deserves protection."

The Sun said :—

13. I know Durvasha has given you this boon. Cast off your fears and allow me your embrace.

14. O amiable girl, my approach is infallible ; it must be fruitful. O timid maiden, if my coming be for nothing, it will be certainly a transgression of yours."

Vaishampayana said :—

15. Vivaswata thus spoke to her many things to allay her fears. O descendant of the Bharata race, the illustrious and beautiful girl, as she was a maid,

16. Did not consent to grant his request from modesty and from the fear of her relatives. O best of the Bharata race, Arka again addressed her thus,

17. "O princess, there will be no sin in gratifying me." Having said this to the daughter of Kuntihhoja, that illustrious deity,

18—19. That illuminator of the universe, Tapanā (Sun) received her embraces. Thereupon was born a hero, known all over the world by the name of Karna, the foremost of all wielders of arms, encased in a natural armour, blessed with good fortune and endued with celestial beauty and all auspicious marks, and with a face brightened by ear-rings.

20. The greatly effulgent Tapanā, then giving Pritha her maiden-hood, again went to heaven.

21. The princess of the Vrisni race (Pritha) became afflicted with sorrow to see the birth of the child. She intently reflected on the course she should adopt.

22. She resolved to conceal her frailty from the fear of her friends and relatives. Kunti threw her that powerful son into water.

23. The illustrious husband of Radha took up that child thrown into the water. That son of Suta, (the husband of Radha), with his wife brought him up as their son.

24. They gave that son the name of Vasusena, because he was born with wealth, (a natural armour and ear-rings).

25. He grew up very strong and became expert in all weapons. Possessed of great energy, he worshipped the Sun until his back was scorched by its rays.

26. When he was thus engaged in his worship, there was nothing on earth that the heroic and intelligent Vasusena would not give to Brahmanas.

27. Indra, assuming the form of a Brahmana, came to him for alms. Ever engaged to do good to Aryuna, he asked for the armour.

28. Taking off the natural armour from his body, Karna with joined hands gave it to Indra in the form of a Brahmana.

29. The king of the celestials received the gift, and he was exceedingly pleased with his liberality. The lord of the celestials gave him a weapon, saying,

30. "Among the celestials, the Asuras, the Gandharvas, the Nagas and the Rikshasas; whoever you will desire to conquer, he will certainly be killed by this weapon.

31. The son of Surya was known by the name of Vasusena, but after his cutting off his natural armour, he was called Karna (cutter).

Thus ends the hundred and eleventh chapter, the acquirement of Indra's weapon, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. The daughter of Kuntibhoja, Pritha, had large eyes; she was endued with beauty and every accomplishment; she was of rigid vows, devoted to virtue; and she possessed every good quality.

2. But though the maiden was effulgent and possessed beauty and all womanly qualifications and youth, yet no king sought for her hand.

3. O best of kings, threupon, the king Kuntibhoja invited all the monarchs, and offered her in a Sayamvara.

4. The intelligent Kunti saw that best of kings, the foremost of the Bharata race, Pandu, in the assembly of the kings.

5. Proud as the lion, broad-chested, bull-eyed, greatly strong, like sun outshining all the kings in splendour,

6. He (Pandu) looked among the kings as the second Indra. In the assembly that best of men, Pandu, having seen the maiden of faultless feature, the amiable daughter of Kuntibhoja, became very much agitated in mind.

7. Kunti advanced in modesty, quivering with emotion and placed the nuptial garland round the neck of the king (Pandu).

8. Finding that Kunti had chosen Pandu, the other kings returned to their kingdoms on elephants, on horses and cars on which they had come.

9. O king, her father then performed the nuptial rites in due form. The descendant of Kuru (Pandu) and the daughter of Kuntibhoja (Kunti),

10. Blessed with great and good fortune, formed a couple like Indra and Sachi. O king, Kuntibhoja, after the marriage of Kunti,

11. Presented the bridegroom with much wealth. O best of the Kuru race, the king (Kuntibhoja) then sent him (Pandu) to his own capital,

12. Accompanied by a large force, bearing various kinds of banners and penons, and eulogised and blessed by many Brahmanas and great Rishis,

13. The descendant of Kuru, king Pandu, reached his own capital, and that lord (Pandu) established his wife Kunti there.

Thus ends the hundred and twelfth chapter, the marriage of Kunti, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXIII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Some time after, the son of Santanu, the intelligent Bhisma, thought of marrying Pandu to a second wife.

2. Accompanied by the aged ministers, Brahmanas and great Rishis, and with a force of the four kinds he went to the capital of the king of Madra.

3. That best of Valhikas (the king of Madra), having heard of his coming, went out to receive him with all honour; and that king (Bhisma) also entered his capital.

4. The king of Madra, having given him a white seat, water for washing his feet and Arghya, asked the reason of his coming.

5. The supporter of the Kurus' honour, Bhisma replied to the king of Madra, "O chastiser of foes, know that I have come for a maiden.

6. We have heard that you have an illustrious and chaste sister, named Madri. I chose that illustrious maiden for Pandu.

7. O king, you are in every way worthy of alliance with us. We also are worthy of you. O king of Madra, considering all this, accept us in the proper form."

8. Having been thus addressed by Bhisma, the king of Madra replied, "To my mind there is no other better bridegroom than one of your family.

9. But there is a custom in our family ever observed by all the best of our kings. Be it good or bad, I can not transgress it.

10. It (this custom) is well known, and there is no doubt that it is also known to you. O excellent man, therefore, it is not proper for you to say "Bestow your sister."

11. O hero, it is our family custom to receive tribute. Therefore, I cannot give you any assurance in the matter of your request."

12. The king Bhisma thus replied to the king of Madra, "O king, this is a great virtue ; the self-created (Bramha) has himself said it.

13. Your ancestors have observed this custom. There is no fault to be found with it. O Salya, it is well known that this custom has the approbation of the wise."

14—15. Having said this, that greatly effulgent son of Ganga (Bhisma) gave Salya much gold, both coined and uncoined, precious stones of various colors, elephants, horses and cars, much cloth and many ornaments, many gems, pearls and corals.

16. Salya received all these wealths in delightful heart, and gave away his sister, decked with ornaments, to that lion of the Kuru race.

17. The son of ocean-going Ganga, intelligent Bhisma, taking Madri with him, returned to the capital, named after the elephant (Hastinapur).

18. The king Pandu, on an auspicious day and at the time indicated by the wise accepted the hands of Madri in due form.

19. After the completion of the marriage, that king, the descendant of the Kuru race, established his beautiful wife in handsome mansions.

20. O king of kings, that best of kings (Pandu) then give himself up to enjoyments with his two wives, Kunti and Madri, at will and at pleasure.

21. O king, when thirty days had passed away that Kuru king, the lord Pandu, started from his capital to conquer the world.

22—24. After saluting and bowing to Bhisma and other elders and bidding adieu to Dhritarastra and other best of the Kurus, receiving their permission and performing all auspicious rites, the king (Pandu) set out on his great campaign blessed by all around and accompanied by a great army of elephants, horses and cars. That celestial-like king was desirous of conquering the whole earth.

25. Pandu marched against the enemies with such strong forces (as narrated above). Going to the east, that best of men, that spreader of Kuru fame, Pandu, defeated the Dasarnas.

26. Pandu then with his army of innumerable elephants, cavalry, infantry, and charioteers, and various coloured banners

27. Marched against Dhirga, the king of Maghada, who being proud of his strength, had offended many kings. Attacking him in his capital, Rajgriha, he killed him.

28. Taking possession of his treasury and many beasts of burden Pandu, went to Mithila and conquered the Videha in battle.

29. O best of men, he then conquered Kashi, Sumbha and Pandra ; and by the strength of his arms and prowess he spread the fame of the Kurus.

30. The kings were burnt by the far-reaching flames,—represented by his arrows and the splendour of his weapons,—of the great fire represented by that chastiser of foes, Pandu.

31. Pandu defeated with his army the kings with their forces ; he kept them engaged in the works of the Kurus.

32. Having been thus defeated by him, all the kings of the world recognised him as the only hero on earth as Indra is among the celestials.

33. All the kings of the world bowed to him with joined hands and they waited upon him with presents of various kinds of gems and wealth,

34. Precious stones, pearls, corals, much gold and silver, the jewels of cows and horses, elephants and cars,

35. Asses, camels, buffaloes, goats and sheep, blankets and beautiful birds, and carpets made of the skin of Ranku. Having taken them all, the king of Hastinapur,

36. Pandu, returned to his own capital Hastinapur to the great delight of all his subjects and citizens.

37. 'O the lion of kings, the fame of Santanu and that of Bharata, was about to be extinct, but it was now revived by Pandu.

38. They, who robbed the Kurus before of both territory and wealth, were now forced by Pandu, the lion of Hastinapur, to pay tributes."

39. Thus said in joyful heart the kings with their ministers and with the citizens and people.

40—42. All the Kurus with Bhisma at their head went out to receive him when he neared Hastinapur. They saw in delight the attendants of the king (Pandu), laden with much wealth ; the train of various conveyances, of elephants, horses, cars, kine, camels, and other animals laden with all kinds of wealth was so long that they could not find its end.

43. Then the sweller of Kausalya's joy, (Pandu), worshipped the feet of his father (uncle) Bhisma and then saluted the citizens and others as each deserved.

44. Bhisma also shed tears of joy and embraced his son who had returned victorious after subjugating many kingdoms of others.

45. And he (Pandu), instilling joy into the hearts of his people, entered Hastinapur in a flourish of hundreds of trumpets and bugles.

Thus ends the hundred and the thirteenth chapter, the conquest of Pandu, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXIV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. He (Pandu), at the command of Dhritarastra, offered the wealth acquired by the prowess of his arms to Bhishma, to Satyawati and to their mother (Kausalya).

2. Pandu sent a portion of the wealth to Vidura. The virtuous-minded man (Pandu) gratified his friends and relatives with (the presents of) wealth.

3. The descendant of Bharata, (Pandu) gratified Satyawati, Bhishma and the illustrious and amiable princesses of Kosala with the wealth, acquired by his prowess of arms.

4. Kausalya, in embracing her son of matchless prowess became as glad as Sachi on embracing Jayanta (her son.)

5. Dhritarastra performed with the wealth acquired by that hero five great sacrifices, in which offerings were made to the Brahmanas by hundreds and thousands, and in which so much wealth was spent as would have been sufficient for one hundred Horse-sacrifices.

6. O best of the Bharata race, some time after, Pandu, who had mastered over his senses, retired into a forest with (his wives) Kunti and Madri.

7. He left his excellent palace and its luxurious bed. He lived always in the forest, being ever engaged in hunting.

8. He lived in a delightful and hilly region overgrown with huge Sala trees on the southern slope of the Himalayas where he roamed freely.

9. The handsome Pandu roamed in the forest with Kunti and Madri like Airavata with two female elephants.

10—11. The dwellers of (that) forest regarded the heroic Bharata prince with his two wives,—(Pandu), armed with swords, arrows and bows and encased in beautiful armour, as a god wandering amongst them. The people were busy in supplying every object of pleasure and enjoyment to him in his retirement at the command of Dhritarastra.

12. The son of the river (Bhishma) heard that king Devaka had a daughter, young and beautiful, born in a Sudra wife.

13. The best of the Barata race (Bhishma) brought her from her father's abode and he married her to the high-minded Vidura.

14. The descendant of Kuru, Vidura, begot on her children as genteel and accomplished as he himself was.

Thus ends the hundred and the fourteenth chapter, the marriage of Vidura, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA.)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O Janamejaya, one hundred sons of Dhritarastra were born in the womb of Gandhari. Besides these one hundred sons, one more was born by a Vaisya wife.

2. Pandu had by (his wives) Kunti and Madri five sons,—all great car-warriors,—who were all begotten by celestials for the perpetuation of the (Kuru) dynasty.

Janamejaya said :—

3. O best of the twice-born, why did Gandhari give birth to one hundred sons? In how many years (they were born)? What was their period of life?

4. How did Dhritarastra beget a son on a Vaisya wife? How did Dhritarastra behave towards his loving, obedient and virtuous wife, Gandhari?

5. How were born the five sons of Pandu, those great car-warriors, though cursed by the high-souled man (the Rishi in the form of deer)?

6. O ascetic, tell me all this in detail. I am not satiated with hearing the accounts of my friends and relatives.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. One day Gandhari gratified Dwai-payana who came hungry and fatigued. Vyasā granted her a boon,

8. (Namely) that she should have one hundred sons like her husband. Some time after she conceived by Dhritarastra.

9. She bore the burden in her womb for two years without being delivered; she was, therefore, much afflicted with grief.

10—11. She heard that a son was born to Kunti, as effulgent as the morning sun. Being sorry that in her case the time of bearing the child in the womb was too long, and being deprived of reason by grief, she struck her womb with violence without the knowledge of Dhritarastra.

12. Thereupon was brought forth a hard mass of flesh like an iron ball which she bore in her womb for two years.

13. Dwaipayana, learning it, soon came to her, and that best of ascetics (Vyasa) saw that mass of flesh.

14. He said to the daughter of Suvala, "What have you done?" And she (Gandhari) told her real feeling to the great Rishi.

Gandhari said :—

15. Having heard that Kunti had first given birth to a son, as effulgent as the sun, I struck at my womb in grief.

16. You granted me the boon that I should get one hundred sons. But a ball of flesh has come out in the place of one hundred sons.

Vyasa said :—

17. O daughter of Suvala, it is even so. My words can never be futile. I have not spoken an untruth even in jest, why then will my words be futile!

18. Let one hundred jars, filled with Ghee, be brought in the proper way; let them be placed at a concealed place, and let cool water be sprinkled on this ball of flesh.

Vaishampayana said :—

19. The ball of flesh, being thus sprinkled with water, became divided into many parts. They separately became different parts, each about the size of the thumb.

20. O king, that ball of flesh in time became gradually one hundred and one separate parts.

21. These were then placed into the jars filled with Ghee, and they were placed at a concealed spot and were carefully watched.

22. The illustrious (Vyasa) then said to the daughter of Suvala that she should open the covers of the jars after full two years.

23. Having said this, and having made these arrangements, the illustrious and wise Vyasa went to the Himalayas mountains to perform his penances.

24. King Duryodhana was then in time born from them (the parts of the fleshy ball). According to the order of birth, Yudhishthira was the eldest.

25. The news of Duryodhana's birth was carried to Bhishma and the wise Vidura. On the day when haughty Duryodhana was born, on that very day was born mighty-armed and greatly powerful Bhima.

26. O king, as soon as that son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana) was born, he roared and brayed like an ass,

27. Hearing that sound, the various vultures, jackals and crows spontaneously cried; strong wind began to blow, and fires raged in every direction.

28—29. Thereupon, O king, the frightened king Dhritarastra, summoning many Brahmanas, Bhishma, Vidura and other friends, relatives and Kurus, said, "The eldest of the princes, Yudhishthira is the perpetrator of your race. He has acquired the kingdom by virtue of his birth. We have nothing to say to this.

30. But will my son be able to become king after him? Tell me what is right and lawful.

31. O descendant of the Bharata race, jackals and other carnivorous animals began to howl ominously from all sides.

32. O king, seeing these frightful ominous signs, the assembled Brahmanas and the high-minded Vidura said,

33. "O king, O best of men, when these fearful ominous signs are seen at the birth of your eldest son,

34. It is evident he will be exterminator of your race. The prosperity of the race depends upon his abandonment. There must be great calamity in keeping him.

35. O king, if you abandon him, there still remain ninety-nine sons of yours. O descendant of the Bharata race, if you desire the good of your dynasty, abandon him. Do good to the world and to your own race by abandoning him.

36. It is said that an individual should be abandoned for the sake of the family; a family should be abandoned for the sake of a village; a village should be abandoned for the sake of a city, and the world should be abandoned for the sake of the soul."

37. Having been thus addressed by Vidura and the Brahmanas, the king, out of affection (for the son) did not act accordingly.

38. O king, there were born within a month one hundred sons of Dhritarastra, and also a daughter above and over that one hundred.

39. When Gandhari was afflicted with her advanced pregnancy, a Vaisya maid-servant was engaged to attend upon Dhritarastra.

40. O king, during that year, was begotten on her by Dhritarastra an illustrious and greatly intelligent son, who was afterwards named Yuyutsu, also called Karana.

41. Thus were begotten by the wise Dhritarastra one hundred sons, who were all heroes, and (thus also was born) greatly powerful Yuyutsu born of a Vaisya woman.

Thus ends the hundred and fifteenth chapter, the birth of Gandhari's sons, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXVI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. You have told me from the beginning all about the birth of Dhritarastra's one hundred sons, the result of the boon granted by the Rishi, but you have not told me (the particulars of the birth) of the daughter.

2. O sinless one, you have said that over and above one hundred sons, there was another son, named Yuyutsu, born of a Vaisya woman, and also a daughter by Gandhari. "The daughter of the king of Gandhar would get one hundred sons."

3. O illustrious man, so said the great Rishi Vyasa of immeasurable effulgence. How do you then tell me that a daughter was born (over and above the hundred) ?

4. The ball of flesh was divided by the great Rishi into only one hundred parts, and the daughter of Suvala (Gandhari) did not conceive at any other time,

5. How then was born Dussala ? O Brahmana Rishi, tell me this ; my curiosity is very great.

Vaishampayana said :—

6—7. O descendant of Pandu, your question is just. I shall tell you how it happened. The great ascetic, the illustrious Rishi himself, sprinkled that ball of flesh with cool water and began to divide it into parts. O king, as it was being divided into parts, the nurse began to take them up and put them one by one into the jars filled with Ghee.

8. In the meanwhile the beautiful and chaste Gandhari of rigid vows, feeling the affection for a daughter,

9. Reflected in her mind, "There is no doubt that I shall have one hundred sons. The Rishi had said this, and it cannot be otherwise.

10. If a daughter is born to me over and above my one hundred sons, I shall be exceedingly happy.

11. My husband may then go to those worlds that the possession of a daughter's sons confers on a man. Every woman feels a very great affection for her son-in-law.

12. If, therefore, I get a daughter over and above my one hundred sons, then surrounded by sons and daughter's sons, I shall feel myself supremely happy.

13. If I have truly performed penances, if I have ever given in charity, if I have ever performed Homa, if ever I have respected my superiors, let a daughter be born to me."

14. All this time that best of Rishis, the illustrious Krishna Dwaipayana himself, was dividing that ball of flesh. Counting full one hundred parts, he said to the daughter of Suvala (Gandhari),

15. "Here are your one hundred sons. I did not speak to you anything that was not true. Here is a part over and above one hundred which will give you a daughter's son.

16. From this will be born an amiable and fortunate daughter, as you have desired." Then that great ascetic, bringing another jar filled with Ghee, placed the part into it.

17. For the purpose of a daughter, O descendant of the Bharata race, thus have I narrated to you all about the birth of Dussala. O sinless one, tell me what more am I to narrate.

Thus ends the hundred and sixteenth chapter, the birth of Dussala, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXVII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Janamejaya Said :—

1. O Lord, tell me the names of all the sons of Dhritarastra, beginning from the eldest, according to the order of their births.

Vaishampayana said :—

2—15. (They are) Duryodhana, Yuyutsa, Dushashana, Dussaha, Dushala, Durmukha, Vivingsati, Vikarna, Jalasandha, Sulochana, Vinda, Anuvinda, Durdharsha, Suvahu, Dhuspradharshana, Durmashena, Durmukha, Dushkarma, Karna, Chitra, Upachitra, Chitraksha, Charu, Chitrangoda, Durmada, Dushpraharsha, Vivitsu, Vikata, Sama, Umanava, Padmanava, Nanda, Upanandaka, Senapati, Shusena, Kundodara, Mandara, Chitravahu, Chitravarmana, Suvarmana, Durvilashana, Ayavahu, Mahavahu, Chitrachapa, Sukundala, Vaimavega) Bhimavala, Valaki, Valavarhdana Ugrayudha, Bhimashara, Kanakaya, Dredhyudha, Dhridavarmana, Dredha, Khatra, Somakriti, Anadara, Jarasandha, Dridhasandha, Satyasandha, Sahasravaka, Ugrasrava, Ugrasena, Kshemamurti, Aparajita, Panditaka, Vishalaksha, Durudhara, Dridhahasta, Subasta, Vatagiva, Suvarchasta, Adityoketu, Vahvasen, Nagadatta, Aunyaina, Nishangi, Kavachi, Dandi, Dandadhar, Dhaungraha, Ugra, Bhimaratha, Vira, Virabahu, Alolupa, Abhoya, Rudra, Karma, Dhridaratha, Anadhershya, Kundavida, Viravi, Dhirgolochana, Dirguvahu, Mahavahu, Vyndhoru, Kanakardoya, Kendoja, and Chitrakha. He (Dhritarastra, had also a daughter, named Dussala, above and over these one hundred sons.)

16. They were all heroes and Atirathas, they were all learned in the science of war. They were all well acquainted with the Vedas and experts in using all kinds of weapons.

17. O king worthy wives were selected for them at the proper time and after due examinations by king Dhritarastra.

18. O best of the Bharata race, king Dhritarastra bestowed Dussala at the proper time and with due rites on Jayadrata.

Thus ends the hundred and seventeenth chapter, the narrating of the names of Dhritarastra's sons, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXVIII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. O utterer of Bramha, you have recited the excellent account of the extraordinary births of the sons of Dhritarastra on earth, the result of the Rishi's grace.

2. O Brahmana, you have also told me their names according to their order of birth. I have heard all this from you. (Now) tell me all about the Pandavas.

3. While reciting the incarnations of the celestials, the Asuras and beings of other classes on earth, you said that the illustrious men, the Pandavas, as powerful as the king of the celestials, were all incarnate portions of the celestials themselves.

4. I desire to hear all about those beings of extraordinary achievements, beginning from the moments of their births. O Vaishampayana, narrate to me all their achievements.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. O king, one day Pandu, while roaming in that great forest abounding in deer and other fierce animals, saw a large deer, the leader of its herd, coupling with its mate.

6. Seeing them, Pandu pierced both with five of his sharp and swift arrows, winged with golden feathers.

7. O king, it was a greatly effulgent ascetic, the son of a Rishi (in the form of that deer); this effulgent man was with his wife who was a deer.

8. Wounded by Pandu while with the mate, he fell down on the ground in a moment and uttered cries that were human. He began to weep bitterly.

The deer said :—

9. Even men, who are slaves of lust and anger, who are devoid of reason and who are ever sinful, never commit such a cruel act.

10. Man's individual judgment does not prevail against the ordinance; the ordinance (always) prevails against individual judgment. The wise men never sanction anything discountenanced by the ordinance.

11. O descendant of the Bharata race, you are born in a dynasty that has ever been virtuous. How is it that you have lost your reason, over-powered by passions?

Pandu said :—

12. O deer, kings behave in the matter of killing the animals of your species (deer) as they do in the matter of killing their foes. Therefore, you should not, reprove me out of ignorance.

13. Animals of your species are killed by open or covert means. This is the practice of kings. Then why do you reprove me?

14-15. The Rishi Agasta, while engaged in a (great) sacrifice, hunted the deer in the great forest and offered every one of them to the celestials. Agasta performed the Homa with the fat of the deer. You have been killed according to such precedents. Why then do you reprove me?

The deer said :—

16. Men do not throw their arrows even at their enemies when they are unprepared. There is a time for doing it; to kill at such a time is not censurable.

Pandu said :—

17. It is well-known that men kill deer by various means, without (the least) regard whether they are prepared or unprepared; O deer, you should not, therefore, reprove me.

The deer said :—

18. O king, I do not blame you, because you have killed a deer, or because you have done me an injury. Instead of doing such a cruel act, you should have waited till the completion of my intercourse.

19. The intercourse is agreeable to all creatures; it is productive of good to all. What man of learning is there who kills a deer engaged in intercourse in the forest?

20. O king, I was joyfully engaged in intercourse with this mate to beget offspring. You have made my that effort futile.

21. O great king, being born in the Puru dynasty, ever famous for its pure acts, and being a descendant of the Kuru race, you should not have committed such an act.

22. O descendant of the Bharata race, this act of yours is extremely cruel, it deserves universal execration, it is infamous and sinful and will certainly lead (you) to hell.

23. You are well-acquainted with the pleasure of intercourse; you are also learned in the Sastras and the precepts of religion. You are like a celestial, you should not have committed such an act, unworthy of heaven.

24. O best of kings, your duty is to chastise those who act cruelly, who are engaged in sinful practices and who are devoid of the precepts of religion (Dharma, Artha and Kama.)

25. O best of men, O king, what have I done that you have killed me?—I, am a Rishi who lives on fruits and roots though in the form of a deer!

26. I live in the forest always being disposed to peace. As you have killed me, I shall certainly curse you.

27. Cruel as you have been to a couple, death shall certainly overtake you as soon as you will feel the influence of desire.

28. I am an ascetic Rishi, named Kindama. I was engaged in intercourse with this deer out of shame of men.

29. Assuming the form of a deer I roam in the deep forest in company with other female deer. The sin of killing a Brahmana, (however), will not be yours, for you have done it not knowing me (to be a Brahmana)

30. As you have killed me in the form of a deer when I was full of desire, so you, O foolish man, will certainly meet with the fate that has befallen me.

31. When you will go to your dear one, full of desire as was the case with me, you will, at that time, certainly go to the land of the dead.

32. Your wife, with whom you will join at your last moments will also go with you with reverence and affection to the ever unavoidable land of the dead.

33. As I have been plunged into grief when I was happy, so you will also be afflicted with grief when in happiness.

Vaishampayana said :—

34. Having said this, the deer, afflicted with grief, gave up his life; and Pandu also was plunged in grief in a moment.

Thus ends the hundred and eighteenth chapter, the curse of the deer on Pandu, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXIX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. After the death of the deer, the king (Pandu) like a friend (of his) wept bitterly with his wives, being much afflicted with grief.

Pandu said :—

2. The wicked men, though born in-virtuous families, being illuded with passions, become overwhelmed with misery as the fruit of their own acts.

3. I have heard that my father, though begotten by a virtuous man, died when he was still a youth, only because he became a slave of lust.

4. In the field of that lustful king, I was begotten by Krishna Dwaipayana of truthfull speech who was like Brahma himself.

5. (Being the son of such a man) with my heart devoted to sin I lead wandering life in pursuit of deer. The gods have all forsaken me.

6. I shall now seek for salvation; my heart is a great slave of passion. The great impediments to salvation is the desire to beget children. I shall now adopt Bramhacharja, following the example of my father.

7. I shall certainly bring my passions under complete control by severe asceticism. Forsaking my wives and other relatives, and shaving my head, I shall alone wander over the earth, begging my food from the lords of the forests (trees).

8. Forsaking every object of affection and aversion, and covering my body with dust, I shall make the shelter of trees and deserted houses my home.

9. I shall never yield to the influence of sorrow or joy; I shall regard praise and blame in the same light; I shall not seek benedictions or bows. I shall be in peace with all; I shall not accept gifts.

10. I shall not mock any one; I shall not contract my brow at any body; I shall be ever cheerful; and I shall be devoted to the good of all creatures.

11. I shall not harm any of the four orders of creation, either mobile or immobile. I shall treat them all equally, as if they are my own children.

12. I shall daily beg my food from only five or ten families. If it is impossible to get food thus, I shall remain fasting. I shall rather go with little food than to ask a man twice.

13. If I do not obtain food after completing my round of seven or ten houses, I shall not enlarge my round out of covetousness. Whether I obtain or fail to obtain alms, I shall remain a great ascetic equally unmoved.

14. The cutting off my one arm with an axe and the smearing of the other with sandal,—both will be equally regarded by me as the same. I shall not desire good from one or evil from the other.

15. I shall not be pleased with life or displeased with death. I shall neither wish to live or fear to die.

16—18. Washing my heart of all sins, I shall certainly transcend those sacred rites productive of happiness that men perform at inauspicious moments. I shall also abstain from all acts of Dharma, and Artha, and from all those acts those that lead to the gratification of senses. Being freed from all sins and snares of the world, I shall be as free as the wind.

19. Acting always in this way and treading in the path of fearlessness, I shall at last lay down my life.

20. I am destitute of the power of begetting children. I shall not certainly deviate from the line of duty, in order to tread in the vile path of the world which is full of misery.

21. Whether respected or disrespected by the world, that man, who, being desireless, becomes full of desire, behaves like a dog.

Vaishampayana said:—

22. The king, having said this in sorrow, sighed; and looking at (his wives) Kunti and Madri said,

Pandu said:—

23—24. After gratifying all, tell the princesses of Koshala, Vidura, the king with all his friends, mother Satyawati, Bhishma, the royal priests, the high-souled, Soma drinking Brahmans of rigid vows and those old men who live under our protection that Pandu has retired into a forest.

Vaishampayana said:—

25. Having heard these words of their husband who had fixed his mind to retire into a forest, both Kunti and Madri addressed him in these proper words,

26. "O best of the Bharata race, there are many other Asramas (modes of life) in which you can perform with us, your lawfully wedded wives, great asceticism.

27. In which you can obtain the salvation of your body, you may obtain heaven as your reward. As the great fruit (of your action) you can certainly become the lord of heaven.

28. We shall also perform great asceticism with our husband, controlling our passions and abandoning all desires and pleasures.

29. O greatly learned man, if you abandon us, we shall then certainly give up our lives to-day.

Pandu said:—

30. If your this determination be conformable to virtue, then I shall with you both follow the imperishable path of my father.

31. Abandoning the luxuries of village and towns, robed in barks of trees and living on fruits and roots and practising the severest asceticism, I shall roam in the great forest.

32. Bathing in the morning and in the evening, I shall perform the Homa. I shall reduce my body by eating sparingly; I shall wear rags and skins; I shall carry matted hair on my head.

33. Exposing myself to heat and cold, and disregarding hunger and thirst, I shall reduce my body by performing most difficult asceticism.

34. I shall live on fruits, ripe or unripe; I shall be in contemplation; I shall worship the Pitris and the celestials with speech and with the fruits of the forest.

35. I shall not see the dwellers of cities or the dwellers of forest. I shall not even harm them (the dwellers of forest), not to speak of the dwellers of villages.

36. I shall thus perform the severest practices of Vanaprastha, performing the severer ones gradually, till I lay down my body.

Vaishampayana said :—

37—38. Having said this to his wives, the descendant of Kuru, the king (Pandu), gave his jewel of the diadem, his necklace of precious gold, his bracelets, his ear-rings, his valuable robes and the ornaments of the ladies to the Brahmanas. He then said,

39—40. "Going to Hastinapur, inform all that Pandu, the descendant of Kuru has retired into the forest with his wives, abandoning wealth, desires, happiness and sexual appetite." The assembled followers and attendants,

41. Hearing these and other sorrowful words of that lion of the Bharata race, bewailed in grief and cried, "Alas! O!"

42. They shed hot tears to leave the king. They left that forest and went to Hastinapur, taking all the wealth with them.

43. Going to the city, they told the illustrious king all that had happened, and they gave him all the wealth.

44. Having heard all that had happened in the great forest, the best of men, king Dhritarastra, wept for Pandu.

45. He derived no pleasure in the comforts of his beds, seats and luxuries. Afflicted with the loss of his brother, he continually brooded over it.

46. The descendant of Kuru, the royal prince (Pandu), living on fruits and roots, went with his two wives to the Nagasata mountains.

47. He then went to Chaitraratha, and then to Kalakuta. Crossing the Himalayas, he went to Gandhamadana.

48. Protected by Mahabhutas, Siddhas and great Rishis, that great king lived sometimes on the plains and sometimes on the hills.

49. He then went to the lake Indradumna; and then crossing the Hansakuta, the great king performed his penances on the mountain with hundred peaks.

Thus ends the hundred and nineteenth chapter, the history of Pandu, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. That greatly powerful man (Pandu; was there engaged in the best of asceticism) and he soon became the favourite of all the Siddhas and Charnas.

2. O descendant of the Bharata race, he was devoted to the service of his preceptors; he was free from vanity; he was self-controlled and master over his passions. The powerful man went to heaven by his own prowess.

3. He became the brother of some, and the friend of others, the others again treated him as their own son.

4. O best of the Bharata race, after a long time Pandu acquired those great and sinless ascetic merits, by which he became like a Bramharsi.

5. On a new moon day the Rishis of rigid vows assembled together, and were about to start with the desire of seeing Brahma.

6. Seeing the Rishis about to start, Pandu said, "O best of eloquent men, tell me where you are going."

The Rishi said :—

7. There will be a great assemblage of high-souled celestials, Rishis and Pitris in the abode of Brahma. We shall go there; we are desirous of seeing the self-created (Bramha).

Vaishampayana Said :—

8. Pandu suddenly rose with the desire of going with the Rishis and reaching the heaven. When he was about to start with his two wives in a northerly direction from the mountains with the hundred peaks, the ascetics addressed him thus,

9. "In our northward march, ascending the king of mountains, higher and higher we have seen many delightful and inaccessible regions, on the breast of the hill.

10. (We have seen) the retreats of the celestials, Gandharvas and Apsaras, with hundreds of palaces resounding with the sweet note of celestial music.

11. (We have seen) the gardens of Kuvera, laid out on even and uneven grounds and the banks of great rivers and mountain caverns.

12. There are regions (on that mountain) everlastingly covered with snow and devoid of birds and beasts and trees. There are some places, where rain is so heavy that they are perfectly inaccessible and unfit for habitation.

13. Not to speak of other creatures, even birds can not cross them. The only thing that can go there is air, and only beings, Siddhas and great Rishis.

14. O best of the Bharata race, these princesses are unaccustomed to hardship; how will they ascend those heights of the king of mountains? Therefore, do not come with us.

Pandu said :—

15. O greatly fortunate ones, it is said that there is no heaven for a sonless. I am sonless. I speak to you in sorrow.

16. O great ascetics, I am sorry, because I have not been able to free myself from the debt I owe to my forefathers. In the dissolution of my body, my ancestors are sure to perish.

17. Men are born in this world with four debts,—namely the debts due to the ancestors, the celestials, the Rishis and other men. They must be discharged with virtue.

18. It has been established by the learned men that no regions of bliss exist for those who neglect to pay in due time these debts.

19. The celestials are paid (gratified) by sacrifices, the Rishis by study and meditation, the Pitris by begetting children and performing Sradha, and the other men by humanity and kindness.

20. I have virtuously discharged my debts to the celestials, Rishis and other men. But there are those (Pitris) who are sure to perish at the dissolution of my body.

21. O ascetics, I am not as yet free from the debt I owe to my ancestors. The best of men were born to beget children to discharge that debt.

22. As I was begotten by the great Rishi on the field of my father, so should children be begotten on my soil (wives).

The Rishis said :—

23. O virtuous-minded man, O king, there is progeny for you that will be sinless, greatly fortunate and like the celestials themselves. We see this with our prophetic eyes.

24. O best of kings, therefore, accomplish the purposes of the celestials by your acts. The intelligent man who acts with deliberation always obtains good fruits.

25. Therefore, O king, you should exert yourself. The fruits you will obtain is visible. You will surely obtain accomplished and agreeable sons.

Vaishampayana said :—

26. Having heard these words of the ascetics, and remembering the loss of his procreative power owing to the curse of the deer, Pandu began to reflect,

27. He told his lawfully wedded wife, illustrious Kunti, in private, "Try to raise offspring at this emergency.

28. O Kunti, the wise expounders of the eternal religion say that son is the source of virtuous fame in the three worlds.

29. Sacrifices, gifts in charity, ascetic penances, and carefully observed vows, do not free a sonless man from his sins.

30. O lady of sweet smiles, knowing all this, I am certain that sonless as I am, I shall not obtain the regions of felicity.

31. O timid lady, as I was formerly addicted to cruel acts and led a vicious life, I have lost my power of procreation by the curse of the deer.

32. O Pritha, the religious books mention of six kinds of sons who are both heirs and kinsmen, and six kinds more who are not heirs, but kinsmen. I shall speak of them; listen to me.

33—34. (They are); 1. Aurasha (the son begotten by one's own self on his own wife), 2. Pranita (the son begotten on one's own wife by an accomplished person), 3. Parikrita (the son begotten on one's wife by a man for a pecuniary consideration), 4. Paunarvava (the son begotten on a wife after her husband's death), 5. Kanin (the son born in the maidenhood), 6. Kunda (the son born of a woman who had intercourse with four persons), 7. Dattya (the son given by another), 8. Krita (the son bought from another), 9. Upakrita (the son coming to one out of gratitude), 10. Sayang upagata the son coming himself to give him away, 11. Shada (the son born of a pregnant bride), 12. Hina Jonidhrta (the son born of a wife of a lower caste.)

35. On the failure of getting offspring of the first class, the mother should try to get the offspring of the next class and so on. At the time of emergency (failure of offspring), men raise up sons by their accomplished younger brothers.

36. O Pritha, the self-created Manu has said that men, failing to obtain son of their own, might raise up excellent virtue-giving sons by others.

37. As I am destitute of the power of procreation, I command you to raise illustrious offspring by some men equal or superior to me.

38. O Kunti, hear the history of that wife of a hero, the daughter of Saradayana, who raised offspring at the command of her lord.

39. O Kunti, after the bath when her season came, she went in the night to a place where four roads met. Worshipping a Brahmana, who was crowned with ascetic success, she poured libations in the fire of Pungsavana.

40. After performing this, she lived with him ; and thus were begotten on her three sons, Durjaya being the eldest.

41. O greatly fortunate lady, like her you too at my command raise offspring by some Brahmana who is superior to me in ascetic merits.

Thus ends the hundred and twentieth chapter, the colloquy between Pandu and Pritha, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O great king, having been thus addressed, Kunti replied to her heroic lord, king Pandu, the best of the Kurus.

Kunti said :—

2. O virtuous one, you should not say so to me. O lotus-eyed one, I am your lawfully wedded wife, ever devoted to you.

3. O mighty-armed descendant of the Bharata race, you should in righteousness beget on me greatly powerful children.

4. O best of men, I shall go to heaven with you. O descendant of Kuru, embrace me to beget offspring.

5. I shall not certainly, even in imagination, accept any other man except you in my embrace. Who is there in this world who could be superior to you ?

6. O virtuous-minded man, O large-eyed one, hear the (following) Pauranic narrative which was heard by me and which I shall now narrate to you.

7. "In ancient times there was a king known by the name of Vyushitashwa, the expander of the Puru dynasty, who was exceedingly virtuous.

8. In the sacrifice which that virtuous and mighty-armed man performed, the celestials with Indra and Devarshis came.

9. In the sacrifice of the illustrious royal sage Vyushitashwa, Indra was so intoxicated with Soma drink and the Brahmanas with Dhakshina (offerings) that the celestials and the Brahmana Rishis performed everything of it themselves.

10. O king, thereupon Vyushitashwa began to shine over all creatures like the sun after the season of frost.

11. O best of kings, he conquered all the monarchs of the east, west, north and south, and he exacted tribute from them all.

12. O king, he was endued with the strength of ten elephants. Vyusitashwa did all this in his great Horse-sacrifice.

13. O best of the Kurus, the men, learned in the Puranas, sing this verse in order to increase the fame of that king of men, Vyusitashwa.

14. Vyusitashwa has conquered the whole earth as far as the sea. He protects all classes of his subjects as a father protects his own sons.

15. He performed many sacrifices and gave away much wealth to the Brahmanas. Collecting jewels and precious stones, he performed afterwards great sacrifices.

16. Extracting a large quantity of Soma juice, he performed (the great sacrifice) Soma Sangstha. O king, his beloved wife was the daughter of Kakshivana, named Vadra, unrivalled on earth for her beauty.

17—18. We have heard, they deeply loved each other. He was seldom separated from his wife. Intercourse with her brought in Consumption, and he soon died sinking like the sun in its glory. She became afflicted with great grief at her husband's death.

19. O best of men, O king, hear how Vadra, being childless and afflicted with grief, bewailed for her husband. I shall recount it.

Vadra said :—

20. O greatly learned man in religious precepts, women serve no purpose when their husband is dead. She who lives without her husband lives a miserable life.

21. O best of Kshatriyas, death is preferable to one who has lost her husband. I wish to follow the way you have gone. Be kind towards me and take me with you.

22. I am unable in your absence to bear life for a moment. O king, be kind to me and take me soon away.

23. O best of men, I shall follow you over even and uneven ground. Going with you, I shall never return again.

24. O king, I shall follow you as a shadow. I shall be always obedient to you. O best of kings, I shall ever remain engaged in doing your favourite works.

25. O king, O lotus-eyed, from this day the heart-sucking affliction will always overwhelm me for your death.

26. Unfortunate am I ! Some loving couple had no doubt been separated by me in my former life. From this I am separated from you.

27. O king, she, who lives even for a moment after being separated from her husband, that sinful woman, lives in great misery and in hell.

28. Some loving couple must have been separated by me in my former birth ; from that sin, acquired in my former body,

29. O king, I now suffer this great pain in consequence of your separation from me. O king, from this day I shall lie on Kusha grass.

30. I shall abstain from every luxury, being ever desirous of seeing you. O best of men, show yourself to me. O king of men, O lord, command your wretched and bitterly weeping wife, plunged in great misery.

Kunti said :—

31. It was thus she bewailed again and again embracing the corpse (of her husband). She was then addressed by an invisible voice.

The voice said :—

32. O Vadra, rise up and leave this place. I grant you this boon. O lady of sweet smiles, I shall beget offspring on you.

33. O beautiful featured lady, lie down with me on your bed on the eighth or the fourteenth day of the moon after the bath of your season.

Kunti said :—

34. Having been thus addressed by the invisible voice, the chaste lady (Vadra), desirous of offspring, did as she was directed.

35. O best of the Bharatas, O excellent descendant of the Bharata race, that lady gave birth to three Salyas and four Madras by that corpse."

36. O best of the Bharatas, you too like him beget offspring by your ascetic power.

Thus ends the hundred and twenty first chapter, the history of Vyusitashwa, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having been thus addressed, the king (Pandu), learned in the precepts of religious spoke these words of virtuous import to that lady (his wife).

Pandu said :—

2. O Kunti, what you have said is true. Vyusitashwa of old did exactly as you said ; he was like a celestial.

3. But I shall tell you the religious precepts which the illustrious Rishis, learned in the precepts of virtue, said in the Puranas.

4. O beautiful featured lady, O lady of sweet smiles, women were not formerly kept within the house. They used to go about freely and enjoyed as they liked.

5. O fortunate lady, O beautiful one, they had promiscuous intercourse from their maidenhood, and they were not faithful to their husbands. But they were not regarded sinful, for it was the custom of the age.

6. That very usage of the olden time is up to date followed by birds and beasts, and they are free from anger and passions (for this promiscuous intercourse).

7. O lady of tapering thighs, the practice, being sanctioned by precedents, is praised by great Rishis ; it is still regarded with respect by the Northern Kurus.

8. O lady of sweet smiles, this eternal usage, very favourable to the women, had the sanction of antiquity ; the present practice has been established only very lately. Hear, I shall narrate to you in detail who established it, and why.

9. We have heard that there was a great Rishi, named Uddalaka. He had a son, known by the name of Swetaketu, who was also a Rishi.

10. O lotus-eyed one, the present virtuous practice was established by that Swetaketu in anger. I shall tell you why he did it.

11. One day, in the time of yore, in the very presence of Swetaketu's father, a Brahmana came, and taking his (Swetaketu's) mother by the hand said, " Let us go."

12. Having seen his mother taken away as if by force, the son of the Rishi grew angry and became very much afflicted with sorrow.

13. Seeing him angry, his father told Swetaketu, " O child, do not be angry. This is an eternal usage.

14. The women of all the orders on earth are free. O son, men, in this matter as regards their respective orders, act as kine."

15. The son of the Rishi, Swetaketu, disapproved of this usage, and he established the following practice on earth as regards men and women.

16. O greatly illustrious lady, we have heard that the present practice among men and women, dates from that day but not among other animals.

Swetaketu said:—

17. The wife, not adhering to her husband, will be sinful from this date ; she will commit as great and painful sin as the killing of an embryo.

18. The men, who will go to other women neglecting a chaste and loving wife who has from her maidenhood observed a vow of purity, will commit the same sin.

19. The woman, who being commanded by her husband to raise offspring, will refuse to do it, will commit also the same sin.

Pandu said:—

20. O timid lady, it was thus established by force in olden time the present virtuous usage by Uddalaka's son Swetaketu.

21. O lady of the tapering thighs, we have heard that Madayanti, being appointed by (her husband) Saudasa, went to Rishi Vasishtha to raise up offspring.

22. That lady obtained from him a son, named Asmaka. She did this, moved by the desire of doing good to her husband.

23. O lotus-eyed one, O timid girl, you know our birth, begotten by Krishna Dwai-payana, in order to expand the Kuru race.

24. O faultless one, seeing all these precedents, you should do my bidding which is not inconsistent with virtue.

25—26. O princess, O devoted wife, the men learned in the precepts of virtue, said that a wife in her season must seek her husband, though she may be free at other times. The wise have said that this was the ancient practice.

27. But, O princess, men, learned in the Vedas, have declared that whether the act be sinful or sinless, it is the duty of the wife to do what her husband commands

28. O lady of faultless features, especially I who am deprived of the power of procreation, having yet become desirous of seeing son, should more to be obeyed by you.

29. O amiable girl, joining my palms furnished with rosy fingers like lotus-leaves, I place my hand on your head to propitiate you.

30. O lady of beautiful hair, you should raise accomplished sons at my command by the help of some Brahmanas possessed of great ascetic merits. O lady of beautiful hips, by your doing this, I shall go to the way reserved for those that are blessed with sons.

Vaishampayana said:—

31. Having been thus addressed by that subjugator of hostile cities, Pandu, the beautiful Kunti, ever engaged in doing good to her husband, thus replied,

Kunti said:—

32. O lord, I was engaged in my girlhood at my father's house in attending upon all guests: I attentively served the Brahmanas of rigid vows.

33. I gratified with all attentions that Brahmana, known as Durvasha, who had all his passions under control, and who was acquainted with all the mysteries of religion.

34. Pleased with the attention with which I waited upon him, that illustrious (Brahmana) gave me a boon in the form of a Mantra. He told me,

35. "Any of the celestials, whom you will call by this (Mantra), will be obedient to you, whether he likes it or not.

36. O princess, by each of their favour, you, shall have offspring." O descendant of the Bharata race, this was told to me by him at my father's house.

37. O king, the words, uttered by the Brahmana, can never be false; the time has come when they may yield fruits. Commanded by you, I can call the celestials

38. By that Mantra to raise up good offspring. O royal sage, O foremost of truthful men, tell me which of the celestials I shall call. Know, I wait your commands in this matter.

Pandu said:—

39. O beautiful lady, O amiable one! try to do it to-day in the proper form. Call, Dharma (the god of justice), for he is the most virtuous in the world.

40. O beautiful lady, Dharma will never be able to pollute us with sin, and people will also consider that what we do is never sinful.

41. There is no doubt the son thus begotten will be virtuous among the Kurus. Begotten by Dharma, his mind will never be in sin.

42. Therefore, O lady of sweet smiles, keeping virtue before your eyes and observing all vows, call Dharma by the help of your solicitations and incantations.

Vaishampayana said:—

43. That best of women, (Kunti), having been thus addressed, said "Be it so." She then went round him (for seven times) and resolved to do his bidding.

Thus ends the hundred and twenty second chapter, the account of the raising up of Kunti's children, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. O Janamejaya, when Gandhari was pregnant for a year, it was then that Kunti called the eternal Dharma for offspring.
2. That lady (Kunti) offered adorations to Dharma and repeated in the proper form the Mantra, formerly given to her by Durvasa.
3. The deity Dharma, being overpowered by the Mantra, came on his car resplendent as the sun to the place where Kunti was seated.
4. Smiling he said to her, "O Kunti, what am I to give you?" Kunti also smilingly said, "You must give me offspring."
5. She was united with Dharma in his Yoga (spiritual) form, and that beautiful lady obtained a son devoted to the good of all creatures.
- 6—7. She gave birth to an excellent son, who became afterwards greatly famous, at the eighth Muhurta called Abhijit of the hour of noon of that very auspicious day of the eighth month, the fifth of the white fortnight, when the star Jeshta in conjunction with moon was in ascendant. As soon as the child was born, an invisible voice said,
8. "This (child) will be the best of men and the foremost of all the virtuous. He will be truthful and (also) greatly powerful; he will be the ruler of the earth.
9. This eldest son of Pandu will be known as Yudhis'hira; he will be a famous king, known all over the three worlds.
10. He will be endued with splendour, fame and vows. Having obtained this virtuous son, Pandu again told her,
11. "The wise say that Kshatryas are the foremost in strength; therefore, ask for a son of great strength". Having been thus addressed, she invoked Vayu.
12. Thereupon the greatly strong Vayu came to her riding on a deer, (and he asked), "O Kunti, what am I to give you? Tell me what is in your mind."
13. Smiling in bashfulness, she said, "O best of celestials, give me a son, who is strong, who is huge and who is capable of humbling the pride of everybody."
14. By him was born Bhima, endued with great strength; and on the birth of this greatly strong man, an invisible voice said.
15. "This child will be foremost of all endued with strength." O descendant of the Bharata race, the following extraordinary incident happened as soon as Bhima was born.

- 16—18. Falling from his mother's lap on the mountain, he broke into fragments the stone on which he fell. Kunti suddenly rose up from the fear of a tiger, forgetting that the child lay asleep on her lap. As she rose, the child, whose body was as hard as the thunder-bolt fell on the stone and broke it into a hundred pieces. Seeing the breaking of the stone, Pandu became very much astonished.
  19. O best of the Bharatas, the day on which Bhima was born, on that very day, the king of the world, Duryodhana, was also born.
  20. On the birth of Bhima, Pandu again began to reflect, "How can I obtain a very superior son who will be the best of men?"
  21. This world depends on Daiiva (Destiny) and Purushakara (exertion). But Destiny is gained in time by the grace of Providence.
  22. We have heard that Indra is the foremost (among the celestials) and the king of the Devas. He is endued with immeasurable might, energy, prowess and glory.
  23. Gratifying him by my asceticism, I shall obtain a greatly powerful son. The son that he will give me will be superior to all.
  24. He will be capable of defeating the inhabitants of earth and those who are not of this earth. I shall, therefore practise severest asceticism with heart, deed and speech."
  25. Thereupon the descendant of Kuru, the great king Pandu, after consulting with the great Rishis, commanded Kunti to observe an auspicious vow for one full year.
  26. That mighty-armed man (Pandus), himself stood upon his one leg and began to perform the severest asceticism and penances.
  27. He practised severe austerities from morning to evening with his mind deep in meditation in order to gratify the lord of the celestials. It was after a long time that Indra appeared.
- Indra said:—
28. I shall give you a son who will be famous all over the three worlds and who will promote the welfare of the Brahmanas, kine and all honest men.
  29. The-son that I shall give you will be the chastiser of the wicked and the delight of his friends and relations. He will be the foremost of all and the slayer of all foes.

Vaishampayana said :—

30. Having been thus addressed by the illustrious Indra, the virtuous Kuru king (Pandu), remembering the words of the king of the celestials said to Kunti,

Pandu said :—

31. O fortunate one, your vow has been successful. The king of the celestials is gratified. He is willing to give you a son such as you desire to have.

32—33. O lady of beautiful thighs, O lady of sweet smiles, raise up a son, (who will be) of superior human achievements and great fame, (who will be) a chastiser of enemies and a greatly wise man, (who will possess) a great soul, (who will be) invincible in battle, (who will be) as effulgent as the sun (who will be) very handsome, and endued with all the Kshatrya splendour. Call the lord of the celestials, I have gratified him.

Vaishampayana said :—

34. Having been thus addressed, the illustrious Kunti invoked Indra. The lord of the celestials came and begot Aryuna.

35. As soon as the prince was born, an invisible voice filled the whole sky with a loud and deep roar.

36. Addressing Kunti, it said in a distinct voice in the hearing of every creature dwelling in that hermitage,

37. "O Kunti, (this child) will be equal to Kartavirja and Siva in prowess; he will be invincible like Indra himself. He will spread your fame everywhere.

38. As Vishnu enhanced Aditi's joy, so Aryuna (this child) like Vishnu will enhance your joy.

39. He will maintain the Lakshmi (goddess of prosperity) of the Kuru dynasty by subjugating Madra, the Somakhas with the Kurus, Chedi, Kashi and Kurusha.

40. Agni will be greatly gratified with the fat of all creatures which will be burnt in the Khandava (forest) through the strength of arms of this (hero).

41. This greatly powerful hero with his brothers will conquer all the weak kings, and perform three great horse-sacrifices.

42. O Kunti, he will be equal to the son of Jamadagni (Parashurama) and Visihnu in prowess. He will be the foremost of all men endued with great strength; he will be greatly famous.

43. He will gratify in battle the great god Sankara (Siva), and he will receive from him a weapon, named Pashupata, which will be given to him with pleasure.

44. By command of Indra, your this mighty-armed son will kill those Daityas, called Nibatkabachas, who are enemies of the celestials.

45. He will also acquire all kinds of celestial weapons; and this best of men will retrieve the lost fortunes of his race."

Vaishampayana said :—

46—47. Kunti heard these extraordinary words in her lying-in-room. Having heard these words, so loudly uttered, the ascetics, dwelling on that mountain with hundred peaks and the celestials with Indra sitting on their cars, became exceedingly happy.

48. The sounds of drums rose in the sky and made a great noise; and the whole place was covered with the showers of flowers.

49. The various tribes of the celestials assembled to adore Partha (Aryuna). The sons of Kadru, the son of Binata, the Gandharvas,

50. The lords of the creatures, the seven great Rishis, namely, Bharadwaja, Kashyapa, Gautama, Vishwamitra, Jamadagni, Vashista and the illustrious Atri, who illuminated the world when the sun was lost came there.

51. Marichi, Angira, Pulastya, Pulaha Kratu, the Prajapati Daksha, the Gandharvas, and the Apsaras, all came there.

52. The Apsara ladies, decked with celestial garlands and every ornament and attired in fine robes, began to dance chanting the praises of Vibhatsa (Aryuna).

53. The great Rishis began to utter the propitiatory Mantras every where; and handsome Tumvara began to sing.

54—58. Bhimasena, Ugrasena, Urnayus Anagha, Gopati, Dhritarastra, Surja, Varcha, Yugapa, Trinapa, Krashni, Nandi, Chitraratha, Salisira, Parjanya, Kali, Narada, Soddha, Vrihaddha, Brihaka, Karala, Bramhachari, Vahuguna, Suvarna, Vishwasu, Bhumanya, Suchandra, Saru. the celebrated tribes of Haha and Huhu, gifted with sweet melody of voice,—O king, all these celestials and Gandharvas came there.

59. Many famous Apsaras of large eyes, decked in every ornament, came there in joy to dance and sing.

60—63. Anuchana, Anavadya, Gunamukha, Gunavara, Adrika, Soma, Misra-keshi, Alumvusha, Marichi, Suchika, Vidyutparna, Tilatama, Amvica, Lakshmana, Kshema, Devi, Rambha, Monoroma, Ashita, Suvahu, Suprya, Suvapu, Pundarika, Sugandha, Surasha, Pramathini

Ramya; and Saradwati, all danced there together. Menaka, Sahajanya, Karnika, Panjikasthala,

64—65. Ritusthala, Ghritachi, Viswachi, Purvacheti, Umlocha, Pramlocha, and Urvasi, these large eyed dancing girls of heaven all came there and sang in chorus. Dhatri, Arjamana, Mitra, Varuna, Angsa, Vaga,

66—67. Indra, Vivashwata, Pushana, Tastri, Savita, Parjanya alias Vishnu,—these twelve Adityas glorified the son of Pandu remaining in the sky. Mrigabhya-dha, Sarpa, illustrious Niriti,

68. Ajaikapada, Ahivardhana, Pinakin, Dahana, Iswara, Kapalin, Sthanu and the illustrious Bhaga,—these eleven Rudras also came there.

69. The Aswinis, the eight Vasus, the mighty Maruts, the Vishwadevas and the Saddhyas also came there.

70—71. Karkotoka, Vasuki, Kachapa, Kunda and the great Naga Takshaka, those mighty and wrathful Nagas possessed of ascetic merits, and other Nagas also came there.

72. Tarkha, Arishtanemi, Garuda, Ashidhaja, Aruna and Aruni of the race of Vinata also came there.

73. Only the great Rishis, who were crowned with ascetic success, saw those celestials and others seated on their cars or standing on the mountain peaks. The others could not see them.

74. Those excellent Rishis were astonished to see that wonderful sight, and their love and affection for Pandu's sons were enhanced,

75. The illustrious Pandu, desirous of getting more sons, wished to speak again to his lawful wife, but Kunti addressed him thus,

76. "The learned men do not sanction a fourth delivery (conception) even in an emergency. The woman who holds intercourse with four different men is called Sairini; with five she becomes a harlot.

77. O learned man, well-acquainted as you are with the scriptures, why being tempted by the desire of offspring, do you ask me again, forgetting the ordinance."

Thus ends the hundred and twenty third chapter, the birth of the Pandavas, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIV, (SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. After the birth of the sons of Kunti and that of the sons of Dhritarastra, the daughter of the king of Madra privately spoke to Pandu thus.

Madri said :—

2. O chastiser of foes, I can have no complaint, if you do not favourably look at me. O sinless one, I have no complaint that though I am by birth superior (to Kunti), yet I am inferior to her in station.

3. O descendant of Kuru, O king, I do not grieve, hearing that Gandhari has obtained one hundred sons.

4. This is my great grief (however) that though we are both equal, you should have sons by Kunti alone.

5. If the princess Kunti so provide that I should have offspring, she would do me a great favour, and she will also do you good.

6. Kunti is my rival, and therefore, I feel a delicacy in soliciting any favour from her. If you are favourably inclined towards me, ask her to grant me my desire.

Pandu Said :—

7. O Madri, I have often-reflected over this matter in my own mind. But I hesitated to tell you, not knowing whether you would like it or not.

8. Now that I know your mind, I shall certainly try to do it. I think, being asked by me, she (Kunti) will not refuse.

Vaishampayana said :—

9—10. Thereupon Pandu again spoke to Kunti in private; (he said), "O blessed lady, grant me some more offspring for the good of my race and of the whole world. Provide that I myself, my ancestors and you also, may always have the funeral cake.

11. In order to gain fame, do this difficult work for me. Indra, though he has obtained the sovereignty of the celestials, performs sacrifices for fame alone.

12. O handsome lady, Brahmanas, learned in Mantras, after having acquired ascetic merits most difficult to be achieved, still go to their preceptors for fame.

13. All the royal sages and Brahmanas, possessed of ascetic wealth, have achieved the most difficult of feats for fame alone.

14. O blameless one, rescue Madri with a raft of offspring; and achieve imperishable fame by making her a mother of children."

15. Having been thus addressed, Kunti said to Madri, "Think of some celestial, from whom you will certainly get offspring."

16. Thereupon, Madri, reflecting some time, thought of the twin Aswinis. They came to her without delay and begot offspring on her,

17. Namely Nakula and Sahadeva, matchless in beauty on earth. On the birth of that twin, the invisible voice said:—

18. "These virtuous and accomplished sons will transcend in energy and beauty even the twin Aswinis themselves. Possessed of great energy and beauty, they illuminated the whole region.

19. The inhabitants (Rishi) of the mountain with the hundred peaks, uttering blessings on them and performing the first rites of birth, named them.

20. The eldest of the Kunti's sons was called Yudhishthira, the second was named Bhimasena, and the third was named Arjuna.

21. The first born of the twins among Madri's sons was named Nakula and the next one Sahadeva. The Brahmanas with much pleasure named them thus.

22. Those best of Kurus, the sons of Pandu, looked like five years old boys when they were only one year of age.

23. Seeing his sons endued with celestial beauty and extraordinary strength, with super-abundant energy, prowess and largeness of mind, Pandu,

24. The king, became exceedingly glad obtaining such sons. To all the Rishis, inhabitants of the mountain with the hundred peaks,

25. And to their wives, they became great favourites. Sometime after, Pandu again requested Kunti for Madri,

26. In private, when the faithful Pritha replied to him thus, "Having given her the Mantra only for once, she has got two sons. I have been deceived by her.

27. I fear she will surpass me in the number of her children. This is the way of all wicked women. Fool I was, I did not know that by invoking the twin gods, I might get two sons all at once.

28—29. Do not command me again, I ask from you this boon". Thus were born to Pandu five sons, begotten by the celestials and endued with great strength. They achieved great fame and expanded the Kuru race. They were all as handsome as Soma and bore all the auspicious marks on their person.

30. They were proud as lions; they were great bowmen; their necks were like those of lions, and they were capable of going to the place frequented by lions. These kings of men endued with the prowess of the celestials daily grew up.

31. Seeing them and their virtuous growth with years, the great Rishis, dwelling on the Himalaya mountains, were filled with astonishment and wonder.

32. These five (Pandavas) and the hundred (sons of Dhritarastra), the expanders of the Kuru race, grew up rapidly like an assembly of lotuses in a lake.

Thus ends the hundred and twenty fourth chapter, the birth of the Pandavas, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Seeing his five handsome sons before him in the great forest on the charming mountain slope, Pandu felt that the old strength of his arms had come back.

2. One day in the season of spring which maddens all creatures, the king (Pandu) with his wife (Madri) roamed in the woods where every tree was blossomed.

3. He saw Palashas, Tilakas, Mangoes, Champakas, Paripardakas, and Karnikaras Kesharas, Atimuktas.

4—5. And Kuruwakas, with maddened humming Vramaras (black bees) swarming round them. He saw the blossoming Parijata trees with the Kakila, pouring forth his melodies from within the foliage and being echoed with the sweet hum of the bees. There were also many other trees bent down with the weight of their flowers and fruits.

6. There were many lakes overgrown with lotuses. Seeing all this, Pandu felt the influence of (the god of) love in his mind.

7. In a delightful heart he roamed there like a celestial, followed by (his wife) Madri, who was robed in a semi-transparent cloth.

8. Seeing the youthful Madri thus attired, the king's desire flamed up like a forest-fire.

9. The king could not suppress his desire on seeing his lotus-eyed wife, and he was completely overcome by it in that solitude of the wood.

10. The king then seized her by force, but Madri, trembling in fear, resisted him to the best of her power.

11. He (the king) was then overcome by desire ; he did not remember the curse (of the Rishi) ; he embraced Madri by force.

12—13. O descendant of Kuru, unrestrained by the fear of curse, and impelled by fate, the king, being overpowered by passion, forcibly sought the embraces of his wife, as if to put an end to his life. His reason, being clouded by the Destroyer himself, after intoxicating his senses was itself lost with his life.

14. The descendant of Kuru, virtuous-minded Pandu succumbed to the inevitable influence of Time while united with his wife.

15. Then Madri, embracing the senseless (dead) king, began repeatedly to utter words of lament.

16. Kunti, with her sons and the sons of Madri, the Pandavas, came there where the king lay in that state.

17. O king, Madri then crying petiously said to Kunti, "Come here alone and let the children stay there."

18. Having heard her these words, Kunti bade the children to remain there, came running and crying, "Woe to me!"

19. Seeing both Pandu and Madri lying prostrate on the ground, she bewailed in grief and affliction, saying,

20. "This self-controlled hero was always watched by me with care. How did he embrace you, knowing the curse of the Rishi.

21. O Madri, this king ought to have been protected by you ; but why did you tempt the king in solitude ?

22. He was always melancholy, thinking the curse of the Rishi. How did he become merry with you in solitude ?

23. O princess of Valhika, greater fortunate you are than I. You have seen the face of the king in gladness and joy."

Madri said :—

24. Sister, with tears in my eyes, I resisted the king, but he could not control himself, as if he was bent upon making the Rishi's curse true.

Kunti said :—

25. I am the eldest of his wedded wives ; the chief religious merit is mine. O Madri, therefore, prevent me not from what must come to pass.

26. I must follow our lord to the region of the dead. Rise up,—give me the body, and you rear the children.

Madri said :—

27. I am still clasping our lord and have not allowed him to go away. Therefore,

I shall follow him. I am not as yet satiated, you are my eldest sister, give me permission (to go.)

28. This best of the Bharata race came to me with the desire of having intercourse. His desire was not satiated,—should I not go to the region of the Yama to gratify him ?

29. O revered sister, if I survive you, it is certain I shall not be able to rear up your and my own children (with equality) and thus sin will touch me.

30. O Kunti, you will be able to bring up my sons as if they are yours. The king, in seeking me with desire, has gone to the region of the dead,

31. Therefore, my body should be burned with that of the king. O revered sister, do not refuse me your permission to what is agreeable to me.

32. You will certainly bring up the children carefully. It would be doing the greatest good to me. I do not find any thing more to tell you.

Vaishampayana said :—

33. Having said this, the daughter of the king of Madra, the lawfully wedded wife of that best of men Pandu, ascended the funeral pyre of her lord.

Thus ends the hundred and the twenty fifth chapter, the death of Pandu, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXVI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. The Rishis, who were all celestial-like and wise in council, seeing the death of Pandu, consulted with one another.

The Rishis said :—

2. The high-souled and the illustrious (Pandus), abandoning his sovereignty and kingdom, came here to practise asceticism and received the protection of the ascetics.

4. The king Pandu has gone to heaven, leaving his wife and infant sons as a trust in our hands.

4. It is now our duty to go to his kingdom with these his sons, his body (unburnt portion) and his wife.

Vaishampayana said :—

5—6. Thus consulting with one another those god-like Rishis of magnanimous hearts and of ascetic success resolved to go to the city of Hastinapur with the sons of Pandu in their front and to place them in the hands of Dhritarastra and Bhisma.

7. The ascetics started at that very moment, taking with them the boys, the two bodies and Kunti.

8. The affectionate mother, Kunti, though she had all along led a most comfortable life, now regarded the long journey as being very short.

9. Arriving at Kurujangala within a very short time, the illustrious Kunti presented herself at the principal gate.

10. The ascetics told the gate keepers "Go, inform the king." They went in a moment to the royal court and informed the king.

11. The citizens of Hastinapur were filled with wonder on hearing that thousands of Charanas and Rishis had arrived at their city.

12. It was soon after sunrise that the citizens all came with their wives and children, placing them in front, to see these ascetics.

13. Seated on thousands of cars and conveyances, thousands of Kshatryas and Brahmanas came out with their wives.

14. The crowd of Vaisyas and Sudras was also very large. The vast crowd was very peaceful, because every one of them was then inclined to piety.

15. The son of Santanu, Bhisma, Somadatta or Valhika, the royal sage (Dhritarastra) with the prophetic eyes, and Vidura himself,

16. The venerable Satyavati, the illustrious princess of Kosala and Gandhari surrounded by their maids,—all came out to the royal gate.

17. The hundred sons of Dhritarastra, with Duryodhana at their head, all decked with various ornaments, also came out.

18. Seeing the great Rishis, the Kauravas with their priests bowed down their heads in salutations, and they all took their seats before them (Rishis).

19. All the citizens also, bowing down their heads touching the ground in salutations, took their seats.

20—21. O lord, Bhisma, seeing that vast crowd perfectly still, duly worshipped those ascetics by offering them water to wash their feet and the customary Arghya. He then spoke to them about the sovereignty and kingdom. Thereupon, the eldest of the ascetics with matted locks and skin-cloth stood up,

22. And with the concurrence of other great Rishis, he spoke thus, "The descendant of Kuru, the king, named Pandu, after abandoning pleasure and luxury, went to the mountain with the thousand peaks.

23. He observed there the vow of Brahmacharya, but for some inscrutable purpose of the celestials, this his eldest son, Yudhishthira, was born, begotten by Dharma himself.

24. Then that high-souled monarch was given another greatly powerful son by Vayu. This is that foremost of mighty men, who is called Bhima.

25. This other son, begotten on Kunti by Indra, is Dhananjaya (Aryuna), whose achievements will humble all bow-men in the world.

26. Look at these (two) best of men, the great bowmen, the twin boys, who were begotten by Aswinis on Madri.

27. The almost extinct race of his forefathers was thus revived by the illustrious Pandu, leading in piety the life of a recluse.

28. The birth, growth and the Vedic studies of these sons of Pandu will no doubt give you much pleasure.

29. Steadily adhering to the path of the virtuous and the wise, and leaving behind him these children, Pandu has gone to the land of the Pitris.

30. Seeing him placed on the funeral pyre and about to be burnt down, his wife Madri entered the fire, thus sacrificing her life.

31. She has thus gone with him to the land of Pati (reserved for chaste wives). Perform now those rites that should be performed for them.

32. These are their bodies (unburnt portions); here also are their sons, the chastisers of foes, with their mother; let them be received in due honour.

33. After the completion of the first funeral rites, let the virtuous Pandu, the supporter of the dignity of the Kuru race, gain the Pitrimedha (the blissful region of the Pitris).

Vaishampayana said:—

34. Having said this to the Kurus, the ascetics with the Rishi Guhakas instantly disappeared in the very sight of the Kurus.

35. Seeing the Rishis disappear in their sight like the cities of the Gandharva (vapoury figures appearing and disappearing in the sky) the citizens was filled with wonder and astonishment and returned to their homes.

Thus ends the hundred and twenty sixth chapter, the speech of the Rishis, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXVII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. O Vidura, perform the funeral ceremonies of that lion of kings, Pandu, and also, of Madri in all proper form.

2. For the good of their souls, distribute cattle, cloths, gems and all kinds of wealth, and give every one as much as he asks.

3. Make arrangements also for Kunti's performance of the last rites of Madri in such a way as will please her. Let Madri's body be so carefully covered that neither the sun nor the wind may see it.

4. Do not lament for the sinless Pandu ; he was a worthy king, and he has left behind him five sons like the celestial children.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. O descendant of the Bharata race, Vidura said, "Be it so" and he with Bhishma performed the funeral ceremony of Pandu on a sacred spot.

6. O king, without loss of time the priests went out of the city carrying with them, the last fire for Pandu the fragrant and blazing sacred-fire, fed with Ghee.

7—9. Friends, relatives and adherents, wrapping it up with cloth, decked the body of the king with the flowers of the season and sprinkled over it various perfumes. They decked the hearse also with garlands and rich hangings. Then placing the bodies of the king and the queen on the excellent bier, decked out so brightly, they caused it to be carried on the shoulders of men.

10. With the white umbrella held over the hearse, with waving yak-tails, with sounds of various musical instruments, the whole scene looked bright and grand.

11. Many hundreds of men began to distribute gems among the crowd at the time of the funeral ceremony of Pandu.

12. White umbrellas, large yak-tails and beautiful robes were then brought for the dead Kaurava.

13. The priests, clad in white, walked in the van of the procession, pouring libations of ghee on the sacred-fire, blazing in an ornamental vessel,

14. Thousands of Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras followed the king, weeping in grief.

The citizens said :—

15. O king, where do you go, leaving us behind and making us miserable and wretched for ever ?

Vaishampayana said :—

16. Bhishma, Vidura and the sons of Pandu all wept aloud. They at last came to a charming and holy wood on the banks of the Ganges.

17. There they laid down the hearse on which the truthful, the lion-hearted and the pious king and his wife lay.

18—19. They then besmeared the bodies with all kinds of perfumes; they brought water in many golden vessels and washed his body. They then again smeared it with white sandal.

20. They then dressed it in a white dress made of national fabrics and smeared it with Kalaguru mixed with Tungarasha (sort of perfume.)

21. With the new dress on, the king appeared like a living man, as if he was only sleeping on a costly bed.

22—23. When the other funeral ceremonies were over, the Kauravas, with the direction of their priests, set fire to the bodies of the king and that of Madri which had been besmeared with ghee and decked with ornaments ; and they burnt them with the fragrant Sandal woods which was besmeared with Tungapadma and other perfumes.

24. Seeing the bodies in flame, Kausalya cried out, " O my son, O my son ;" and she fell senseless on the ground.

25. Seeing her prostrate on the ground the citizens and the people wept in grief for the affection they bore for the king.

26. The beasts and birds bewailed with men at the lamentations of Kunti.

27. Then the son of Santanu, Bhishma, the high-souled Vidura, and all the other Kurus became disconsolate in grief and sorrow.

28. Then Bhishma, Vidura, the king (Dhritarastra), with the Pandavas and all the Kuru ladies, performed his (Pandus) water-ceremony.

29. When the water-ceremony was over, the people, themselves filled with grief, began to console the bereaved sons of Pandu.

30. The Pandavas slept on the ground with their friends and relatives. O King, seeing this the Brahmanas and other citizens also gave up their bed.

31. Young and old, all men grieved with the sons of Pandu and passed twelve days in mourning.

Thus ends the hundred and twenty seventh chapter; the cremation of Pandu, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXVIII.

SAMBHAVA PARVA—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Then Bhishma, the king (Dhritarastra) and Kunti with their friends, celebrated the Sradha of Pandu and offered the ambrosial Pinda.

2. They feasted the Kurus and also many thousands of Brahmanas, whom they gave many gems, and much wealth with many villages.

3. Thus being cleansed from the impurity, they all returned to Hastinapur with those best of the Bharata race, the sons of Pandu.

4. All the citizens and the people bewailed for that best of the Bharata race (Pandus), as if they had lost their own relative.

5. After the completion of the Sradha, Vyasa, seeing all the people plunged in grief, spoke to his bereaved and greatly afflicted mother (Satyavati) thus,

6. "The days of happiness are gone; the days of misery have come. Sin begins to increase day by day; the world has lost its youth.

7. The fearful Time, endued with many Mayas, full of various faults, and loss of all virtuous acts, will now come.

8. By the evil doings of the Kurus the world will be destroyed; (therefore) go into the forest of asceticism, devoting yourself to Yoga meditation.

9. Do not be an witness of the terrible annihilation of your own race." Saying "Be it so," she entered the inner-appartments and addressed her daughters-in-law thus,

10. "O Amvika, I have heard that in consequence of the evil deeds of your grandsons, this Bharata dynasty with its subjects will perish.

11. If you give me permission, I shall go to the forest with Kausalya, so grieved at the loss of her son."

12. O descendant of the Bharata race, having said this to Amvika, and taking the permission of Bhishma, Satyavati of excellent vows went to the forest with her daughter-in-law.

13. O best of the Bharata race, she performed severe asceticism. O great king, she then gave up her body and obtained heaven.

14. Then the sons of king Pandu, after performing all the purifying rites mentioned in the Vedas, began to grow up in a royal style in the house of their father.

15. They played in great joy with the sons of Dhritarastra; and they excelled them all in the boyish sports with their superior strength.

16. In speed, in striking the object aimed at, in eating, in scattering dust, Bhimasena beat all the sons of Dhritarastra.

17. O King, that son of Pandu (Bhima), when they were all engaged in sports, pulled them by the hair and made them fight with one another, laughing all the while.

18. Vrikodara (Bhima) easily defeated those one hundred and one (Dhritarastra's) sons of great energy, as if they were but one instead of one hundred and one.

19. He siezed them by the hair, and throwing them down, he dragged them along the ground; some breaking their knees, some their heads and some their shoulders.

20. When playing in the water, he sometimes siezed ten of them by his arms and drowned them in the water. He left them off only when they were almost dead.

21. When they got upon a tree to gather fruits, Bhima shook the tree by striking it with his feet.

22. Being shaken and whirled by that shock, down came with all speed the princes with the fruits.

23. In speed, in pugilestic encounters, or in speed, the princes could not excel Bhima in any way.

24. Bhima thus prided himself by tormenting the sons of Dhritarastra out of boyish pranks. In fact he had no ill-will towards them.

25. Seeing these extraordinary exhibitions of strength by Bhima, the mighty armed eldest son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana) conceived hostility towards him.

26. The wicked and unrighteous (Duryodhana), through ignorance and ambition (of possessing wealth), inclined to commit acts of sin.

27. (He thought), the son of Kunti, this Vrikodara (Bhima), this second Pandava, is the foremost in strength. I must destroy him by artifice.

28. The greatly strong and powerful Bhima challenges one hundred of us in pride.

29—30. Therefore, when he will be asleep in the gardens of the palace, we shall throw him into the Ganges. Afterwards confining his eldest brother Yudhisthira and his younger brother (Aryuna), I shall reign sole king over the earth." Duryodhana, having determined to do this wicked act, watched for an opportunity to injure Bhima.

31. O descendant of Bharata, he built for the purpose of water-sport an extraordinary and beautiful palace

32. With many rooms filled with all sorts of luxuries, decorated with hangings of broad cloth and with banners flying from its top.

33. O descendant of Bharata, its name was "Water-sport house," and it was situated in the country named Pramanakota.

34. The cooks, expert in wicked acts, kept there ready various kinds of viands (drinkable, lickable, chewable and suckable).

35. When all was ready, they gave information to the son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana.) Thereupon the wicked-minded Duryodhana said to the Pandavas,

36. "Let us all brothers go to the banks of the Ganges, adorned with gardens and woods, there to sport in the water.

37—38. Yudhisthira replied by saying, "Let it be so." The Kurus with the Pandavas, mounted on cars resembling cities and on excellent native elephants, left the town. Arriving at that garden and wood, they dismissed their attendants.

39. They surveyed the beauty of the garden and the wood; and then those heroes, all the brothers,—entered the palace as lions enter the mountain caves.

40. On entering the palace they saw that its windows looked very graceful; and its artificial water-fountains were splendid.

41. The architects had handsomely plastered the walls and the ceilings and the painters had painted them beautifully. There were tanks of pure water in which blossomed thousands of lotuses.

42. Their banks were decked with various flowers whose fragrance filled the atmosphere and the grounds were all over covered with the season flowers.

43. On entering the palace, all the Kurus and the Pandavas sat down and began to enjoy the luxurious things provided for them.

44. They then began to play and exchange morsels of food with one another.

45. The wicked Duryodhana had mixed some virulent poison with the food of Bhimsena with the desire of making away with him.

46. That wicked youth, whose heart was a razor, but whose tongue was ambrosia, rose like a (loving) brother and friend.

47. The wicked man himself fed (Bhima) with a large quantity of it. Bhima too ate it, knowing that there was nothing wrong.

48. Thereupon Duryodhana felt himself very happy in his mind; that worst of men thought that he had compassed his end.

49. They then, all the Pandavas and the Kurus, were joyfully engaged in sporting in the water.

50—52. At the end of the sport, they dressed themselves with white garments and decked themselves with various ornaments. In the evening the heroes, the supporters of the Kuru honour, felt themselves fatigued from the sport in the water and they resolved to rest in the pleasure house. Having made others exercise in the water; the powerful Bhima felt himself very much tired, and occupying a large space he lay down on the ground.

53. He was fatigued and he was under the influence of the poison. The cool air spread the poison all over his body and the son of Pandu (Bhima) became senseless.

54. Duryodhana then himself bound Bhima with the cords of creepers, and he then pushed from the land that dead-like hero into the water.

55. The senseless Pandava (Bhima) sunk into the water and fell on the Naga boys in the abode of the Nagas.

56. Thereupon, thousands of Nagas, endued with virulently poisonous fangs, began to bit Bhima.

57. Having been thus bitten, the virulent vegetable poison in his body was neutralised by the snake-poison.

58. The serpents had bitten all over his body except his chest, the skin of which was so tough that their fangs could not penetrate it.

59—60. The son of Kunti (Bhima), having regained his consciousness, burst open the cords, and he then pressed them (snakes) all under the ground. Some fled in fear and the rest, that escaped death from Bhima's hands, went and spoke to Vasuki, the king of the snakes, equal to Indra.

61. "O king of the snakes, a certain man, bound with the cords of creepers, sank into water. Perhaps he drank poison, for he was insensible,

62. Finding him insensible, we began to bite him, but he soon regained his senses and burst open the cords.

63. He then began to press us to the ground. You should inquire who is this greatly powerful man." Thereupon, Vasuki, asked by the inferior Nagas, went there,

64—65. And saw mighty-armed Bhima of fearful deeds. There was a chief of the snakes, named Arka; he was the grandfather of the father of Pritha (Kunti); he saw the grandson of his grandson and embraced him. The greatly illustrious Vasuki was much pleased.

66. The king of the snakes said, "What should we do to please him? Let him be given gems and wealth in profusion."

67. Having been thus addressed, the Naga (Arka) thus replied to Vasuki, "O king of the snakes, when you are pleased with him, he requires no amassing of wealth.

68. When you are pleased, let this greatly powerful prince drink (of the vessel of) Rasha (ambrosia), in which vessel there is the strength of one thousand elephants,

69. Let this prince drink of it as much as he can." Vasuki replied to the Naga (Arka) "Be it so."

70. Thereupon, purifying himself carefully, the Pandava Bhima sat facing the east and began to drink the Rasha. The Nagas performed auspicious rites.

71. At one breath that powerful man (Bhima) quaffed off a whole vessel; thus (one after the other) that son of Pandu quaffed off eight successive jars.

72. Thereupon, that chastiser of foes, that mighty-armed Bhimasena lay down in happiness on a celestial bed given by the Nagas.

Thus ends the hundred and twenty eighth chapter, Bhima's drinking of Ambrosia, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Here the Pandavas and the Kurus, after finishing their sports and pleasure, returned to Hastinapur without Bhima,

2. Some on horses, some on elephants and some preferring cars and other conveyances. They said, "Bhima must have gone before us."

3. The wicked Duryodhana was glad not to see Bhima; and we entered the city with his brothers (in joy).

4. The virtuous-minded Yudhishthira, himself being unacquainted with vice and wickedness considered others to be as honest as he himself was.

5. The son of Pritha, (Yudhishthira), full of filial love, went to his mother, Kunti, and, making obeisance to her he said,—“Has Bhima come here?”

6. O good mother, I do not see him here. Where has he gone? We sought for him long in the gardens and the woods.

7. But we did not find Vrikodara any where. We thought in our mind that he had preceded us.

8. O illustrious lady, we have come here, our hearts being in great anxiety. Coming here, where has he gone? Have you sent him any where?

9. O illustrious lady, O great one, tell me, I am full of doubts respecting the mighty hero, Bhima.

10. He was asleep, and he has not come, I believe Bhima is killed." Having been thus addressed by the intelligent son of Dharma (Yudhishthira), Kunti

11. Cried out "Alas! alas!" She then said to Yudhishthira in alarm, "O son, I have not seen Bhima; he has not come to me.

12. Go soon with your brothers and make a careful search for him." Having said this in sorrowful heart to her eldest son,

13. Kunti summoned Khatwa (Vidura) and spoke to him thus, "O illustrious Khatwa, I do not see Bhimasena. Where is he gone!

14. The others with all their brothers have returned from the gardens; only my mighty-armed Bhima has not come.

15. He is always in the evil look of Duryodhana. The Kurus are all wicked, narrow-minded, covetuous for sovereignty and impudent.

16. They might have killed him in anger. Therefore, my mind is afflicted with anxiety, and my heart burns.

Vidura said :—

17. O blessed lady, do not say so. Protect the others (your sons) from the Kurus. If abused, the wicked-minded (Duryodhana) may kill the rest (of your sons),

18. The great Rishi said that your sons would be long-lived. (Therefore) that son (Bhima) will surely return and gladden your heart.

Vaishampayana said :—

19. Having said this, the learned Vidura went (back) to his house. Kunti with her sons lived in her house in (great) anxiety.

20. The Pandava (Bhima) awoke from his sleep on the eighth day, and he felt himself strong beyond measure by digesting that Rasha (ambrosia).

21. Seeing the Pandava (Bhima) awake, the snakes consoled and cheered him, and they spoke to him thus,

22. "O mighty-armed hero, the strength-giving Rasha (liquor) which you have drunk will give you the strength of ten thousand elephants, and you will be invincible in battle.

23. O best of the Kuru race, bathe in this sacred and auspicious water and return home. Your brothers are disconsolate for your absence.

24—26. Thereupon the mighty-armed (hero) became purified by a bath and decked himself with white garments and with white flowery garlands. He ate the Paramanya offered to him by the powerful Nagas. Then being adored and blessed by the Naga-hero, the Pandava (Bhima), decked with various celestial ornaments, rose from the nether regions.

27—28. That chastiser of foes (Bhima) rose from the abode of the Nagas in delightful heart. The lotus-eyed (hero), being upraised by the Nagas from the water, was placed in the self same gardens, where he had been sporting. They then vanished in his own sight.

29. The powerful Bhima, the son of Kunti, being thus arisen, ran to his mother with all speed.

30. Saluting her and his eldest brother, that chastiser of foes smelt the heads of his younger brothers.

31. He was embraced by his mother and by every one of those best of men. In filial love for one another they then exclaimed, "What joy ! What great joy !"

32. Every thing about the villany of Duryodhana was told to his brothers by the greatly powerful Bhima.

33. The Pandava (Bhima) told them in detail all about the lucky and unlucky incidents that befell him in the region of the Nagas.

34. Thereupon, king Yudhisthira spoke to Bhima these words of great import, "Keep your silence. Do not speak it out to any one in any way.

35. O sons of Kunti, you should protect one another with great care from this day." Having said this, the mighty-armed Dharma-raja Yudhisthira,

36. With all his brothers, became very vigilant from that day. And the virtuous-minded Vidura gave the sons of Pritha (the Pandavas) good counsels.

37. Some time after, Duryodhana again mixed (with Bhima's food) poison which was fresh, virulent, fearful, hair-stirring and deadly.

38. The son of the Vaisya woman (their cousin Yuyutsu), being desirous of doing good to the sons of Pritha, informed them of it; but Vrikodara (Bhima) ate it and digested it.

39. Though that poison was greatly virulent, though it was intended for killing Bhima, it produced no effects on Bhima; he digested it.

40. Thereupon, Duryodhana, Karna, and the son of Suvala (Sakuni) adopted numerous other means to kill that Pandava (Bhima).

41. The Pandavas, though they were aware of all this, did express no indignation as advised by Vidura.

Thus ends the hundred and twenty-ninth chapter, the return of Bhima, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. O Brahmana, you should relate to me the account of the birth of Kripa. How did he spring from a clump of heath? Whence did he obtain his weapons?

Vaishampayana said :—

2. O great king, the great Rishi Gotama had a son, named Saradwata. This son of Gotama was born with arrows.

3. O chastiser of foes, he had not as much aptitude for the study of the Vedas, as he had for the study of the science of weapons.

4. As Bramhacharis acquire knowledge by austerities, so he acquired all his weapons by austerities.

5. That son of Gotama frightened the king of the celestials by his aptitude for the science of weapons and austerities:

6. O descendant of Kuru, the king of the celestials summoned a celestial maid named Janapadi and told her, " Destroy the penances (of Saradwata).

7. She went to the charming hermitage of Saradwata ; and that damsel began there to tempt the son of Gotama (sitting) with bows and arrows.

8. Seeing that Apsara of matchless beauty on earth clad in a single cloth (roaming) alone in that wood, Gotama's eyes danced in delight.

9. Seeing her, his body shook all over with emotion, and his bow and arrows slipped from his hands and fell on the ground.

10. But he was possessed of ascetic fortitude and strength of soul. The Rishi mastered patience to withstand the temptation.

11. But O king, his sudden mental agitation caused an unconscious emission of his vital fluid.

12. Leaving his bow and deer skin, the Rishi escaped from the Apsara and left the hermitage. His vital fluid fell upon a clump of heath,

13. And having fallen on it, it was divided into two parts, whence sprang two children that were twins.

14. A soldier in attendance upon the king Santanu, wandering in the forest in hunting, saw them.

15. Seeing the bow, arrows and the deer skin, he thought they might be the sons of a Brahmana proficient in the science of arms.

16. He took up those children along with the bow and arrows and showed the king what he had found. The king was filled with pity to see the twins.

17—18. He took them home saying, " Let them be my children." The best of men, bringing that twins Goutamas home, performed the usual rites, and they (too) began to grow up, and Gotama also, leaving (his old hermitage), studied the science of weapons.

19. That king gave them the name of Kripa and Kripa, because they were reared up by him out of kindness.

20. Gotama came to know through his spiritual sight where they (his son and daughter) were. He came there and represented every thing about his lineage.

21. He taught him (Kripa) the four branches of the science of arms, various other branches of science, including all their mysteries and details.

22—23. He (Kripa) soon became a great professor (of the science of arms), and the great car-warriors, the sons of Dhritarastra, the Pandavas, the Yadavas and the Vrisni, and many other princes came to him and received from him lessons in the science of arms.

Thus ends the hundred and thirtieth chapter, the birth of Kripa, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Being desirous of giving his grandsons a superior education, Bhisma was in search of a preceptor, who was endued with energy and who was well-skilled in the science of arms.

2—4. O best of the Bharata race, deciding that none who was not possessed of great intelligence, who was not illustrious, who was not a perfect master of the science of arms, who was not as powerful as the celestials, shall be the preceptor of the Kurus, the son of Ganga (Bhisma), placed the Pandavas and the Kurus under the tuition of the son of Bharadwaja, the wise Drona, learned in all the Vedas. Having been honoured according to the proper form by the illustrious Bhisma,

5. That foremost of all men skilled in arms, that illustrious man (Drona) was pleased with the reception given to him by great Bhisma and accepted them as his pupils.

6. Drona taught them the science of arms in all its branches. O king, the immeasurably powerful Pandavas and the Kurus became within a very short time experts in the use of all kinds of weapons.

Janamejaya said :—

7. O Brahmana, how was Drona born? How and whence did he acquire his arms? How and why he came to the Kurus? Whose son was that powerful man?

8. How was born his son Aswathama, the foremost of all skilled in arms? I wish to hear all this. Narrate them in detail.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. There lived at the source of the Ganges a great and high-souled Rishi who was known as Bharadwaja, and he was always observing rigid vows.

10. In the time of yore, Rishi Bharadwaja one day, intending to perform Agnihotra, went with many other great Rishis to the Ganges to perform ablutions.

11. The Rishi saw Ghritāchi herself,—the Apsara, young and beautiful, proud and voluptuous,—rising from the water.

12. As she rose, her cloth became loose and disordered. Seeing her cloth disordered, the Rishi became full of desire.

13. The mind of the wise Bharadwaja was attracted to her and his vital fluid was dropped. But he held it in a drona (a vessel).

14. Thereupon, the wise Drona was born in that vessel. He studied all the Vedas and Vedangas.

15. The foremost of all wielders of arms, the greatly powerful Bharadwaja bestowed on the illustrious Agnivisha the weapon, called Agneya.

16. O best of the Bharata race, the Rishi, born of fire, gave that great fire, weapon to the son of Bharadwaja (Drona),

17. Bharadwaja had a friend, named Prishata who was a king. He had a son, born to him, named Drupada.

18. That best of Kshatryas, that prince (Drupada) went every day to his (Bharadwaja's) hermitage and played and studied with Drona.

19. O king, when Prishata died, this mighty-armed Drupada became the king of the Northern Panchalas.

20. The illustrious Bharadwaja also (at this time) ascended heaven; thereupon, Drona continued to dwell (in the hermitage) engaged in ascetic austerities.

21—22. Being well-versed in the Vedas and Vedangas, and having burnt all his sins by asceticism, the greatly illustrious Drona, obedient to the injunctions of his father and moved by the desire of offspring, married Kripi, the daughter of Saradwata, ever engaged in Agnihotra, in piety and in penances.

23. The daughter of Gotama obtained a son, named Ashwathama; as soon as he was born, he neighed like the horse Uchaisrava.

24. Hearing this, an invisible being in the skies said, "As the voice of this child was like that of a horse and as it has been heard over a great distance,

25. He will be known by the name of Ashwathama, (the horse voiced). The son of Bharadwaja was exceedingly glad by obtaining the son.

26—27. He continued to live there devoting himself to the study of the science of arms. He heard of that slayer of foes, that high-souled son of Jamadagni, that Brahmana, who was the foremost of all wielders of arms, and who was versed in all kinds of knowledge. O king, he (Jamadagni) had expressed his desire of giving away all his wealth to the Brahmanas.

28. Having heard of Parusharama's knowledge of arms and of his celestial weapons, and of his morality, he (Drona) set his heart upon them.

29. Thereupon, the mighty-armed and greatly ascetic (Drona,) accompanied by his disciples who were all devoted to vows and asceticism, started for the Mohendra mountain.

30. On arriving at the Mohendra (mountain) the son of Bharadwaja, the great ascetic, saw the son of Bhrigu, who was self-controlled, who was of great patience and who was the exterminator of his foes.

31. Then approaching with his disciples to the descendant of Vrigu, Drona told him his name and that he was born in the race of Angirasha.

32—33. Touching the ground with his head, he worshipped his (Parusharama's) feet. Seeing that the illustrious son of Jamadagni determined upon retiring into the forest after giving away all his wealth, the son of Bharadwaja (Drona) said, "I am born of Bharadwaja, but I am not born in any woman's womb.

34. Know me to be an excellent Brahmana by name Drona, I have come to you with the desire of obtaining your wealth." The destroyer of all the Kshatryas, that high-souled (Parusharama) thus replied to him.

35—36. "O best of the twice born, you are welcome. Tell me what you desire." Having been thus addressed by (Parashu) Rama, the son of Bharadwaja (Drona) said to that foremost of all smiters, Rama, who was desirous of giving away all his wealth, "O (Rishi) of multifarious vows, I ask your eternal wealth."

Rama said :—

37. O ascetic, whatever gold and other wealth I had, I have already given them away to the Brahmanas.

38. This lady Earth, bounded by the sea and adorned with the garlands of towns and cities, I have given away to Kashyapa.

39. I have now left only my body and my valuable and various weapons and arms.

40. I am prepared to give you either my body or my weapons; O Drona, tell me without delay what you like to have, I shall give it to you.

Drona said :—

41. O descendant of Vrigu, you should give me all your arms and weapons, together with the mysterious knowledge of hurling and recalling them.

Vaishampayana said :—

42. Saying "Be it so," the descendant of Vrigu gave away all his weapons to him (Drona) with the whole science of arms with its rules and regulations.

43. That excellent Brahmana (Drona), after receiving all of them and considering himself amply rewarded, went to (the country of) his friend Drupada in a delightful heart.

Thus ends the hundred and thirty first chapter, the colloquy of Drona and Vargava, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O king, thereupon the mighty son of Bharadwaja (Drona), coming before Drupada, told that monarch, "Consider me as friend."

2. Having been thus joyfully addressed by his friend, the son of Bharadwaja (Drona), the king of Panchala could not bear those words.

3. The king, intoxicated with the pride of wealth, contracted his brows in anger, and with eyes red (in wrath) he spoke to Drona thus ;—

4. "O Brahmana, your intelligence is hardly of high order. You address me all on a sudden as your friend.

5. O dull-minded man, great kings can never be friends with such luckless and indigent fellow as you.

6. We had friendship between us when we were both equally circumstanced ; but Time, that wears out every thing, wears out friendship also.

7. Friendship never remains in any one's heart in this world without being worn out. Time wears it out and anger also destroys it.

8. Do not therefore stick to our worn-out friendship. Do not think of it any longer. O best of Brahmanas, the friendship I entertained for you was for a particular purpose.

9—10. The poor cannot be the friend of the rich, the unlearned can not be the friend of the learned ; the coward can not be the friend of the brave (heroes).

How then do you desire the continuance of our old friendship ! Friendship or enmity, exists between two persons equally situated as to wealth or prowess. The poor and the rich can neither be friends nor enemies of each other.

11. One of pure birth can never be a friend of one, who is lowly born ; a car-warrior cannot be a friend of one, who is not a car-warrior. One who is not a king cannot have a king for his friend. How then do you desire the continuance of our old friendship ?"

12. Thus addressed by Drupada, the powerful son of Bharadwaja, was filled with anger, and reflecting for a moment,

13. That wise man made up his mind as to his course of action with regard to the king of Panchala. He then went to the city of the foremost of the Kurus, named Hastinapur.

Thus ends the hundred and thirty second chapter, the colloquy between Drona and Drupada in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXIII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Arrived at Hastinapur, the excellent Brahmana, the son of Bharadwaja, (Drona) lived in privacy in the house of the son of Gotama (Kripa).

2. His lordly son, at the intervals of Kripa's teachings, gave instructions to the sons of Pritha (Pandavas) on the use of arms. But none knew as yet Ashwathama's (real) prowess.

3. Thus he (Drona) lived there in privacy for sometime, when one day the (Kuru) princes all in a company came out of the city of Hastinapur.

4. The princes began to play with a ball, and when they were thus there playing, the ball fell into a well.

5. Thereupon, they tried their utmost to recover the ball (from the well). But with all their efforts they could not get up the ball.

6. Then they stared at one-another, their faces flushed with blushes of shame. They were filled with great anxiety finding no means of recovering it.

7. They then saw near them a Brahmana of darkish colour,—decrepit and lean,—one who had performed his Sandha and purified himself with Agnihotra.

8. Seeing that illustrious (Brahmana), the princes, who were despaired of the ball, immediately surrounded him.

9. The powerful Drona, seeing the princes unsuccessful in their attempts, smiled a little, and being conscious of his own skill, he said,

10. "Shame on your Kshatrya prowess and shame also on your skill in arms! Being born in the race of Bharata, how is it that you can not recover the ball!

11. If you give me a dinner, I shall with these blades of grass bring up not only the ball you have lost, but also this ring which I now throw down."

12. Having said this, that chastiser of foes, Drona, took off his ring and threw it into that dry well. Thereupon, the son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, spoke to Drona thus;

Yudhisthira said :—

13. O Brahmana, ask from us with the permission of Kripa that which would last you for life.

Vaishampayana said :—

Having been thus addressed, (Drona) smilingly replied to the princes,

Drona said :—

14. I shall by my Mantras invest this handful of Ishikas (long grass) with the virtues of weapons. Behold their virtues that no other weapons possess.

15. I shall pierce the ball with one of these blades, and then pierce that blade with another and that another with a third, and thus making a chain, I shall bring it up.

Vaishampayana said :—

16. Then Drona did exactly what he had said. The princes were all amazed and their eyes expanded with delight. Regarding what they saw as very extraordinary, they said,

17. "O best of the twice born, raise up the ring without delay.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. Then the greatly illustrious Drona, taking a bow with an arrow pierced the ring with it and brought it up.

19. Raising up from the well that ring, pierced with the arrow, he gave it to the astonished princes. Then princes too, seeing the ring thus recovered, said,

The princes said :—

20. O Brahmana, we bow to you. No one else possesses such skill. We eagerly desire to know who you are, and what we can do for you."

21. Having been thus addressed, Drona spoke thus to the princes.

Drona said :—

22. Go to Bhisma and describe to him my likeness and skill. That greatly powerful man will be able to recognise me.

Vaishampayana said :—

23. Saying "Be it so," the princes went to Bhisma and told him all that the Brahmana had said and done.

24. Hearing from the princes everything, Bhisma (at once) recognised Drona and thought that he would be the best preceptor (for the princes.)

25. That foremost of all wielders of weapons, Bhisma, went to him in person, and welcoming him respectfully, brought him over to the palace, and asked him the reason of his arrival. Thereupon Drona told him all.

Drona said :—

26. Being desirous of learning the science of arms, I formerly went to the great Rishi Agnivisha for obtaining weapons from him.

27. I was engaged there in serving my preceptor and lived (with him) for a long time as an humble-minded Brahmachari with matted locks on my head.

28. The prince of Panchala, the greatly powerful Jagmasena also lived there with the same motive (as that of mine).

29. There he became my friend, and he always sought my welfare. He was beloved to me. O lord, he lived with me for many years.

30. O descendant of Kuru, we had studied together from our earliest days; he was my friend from boyhood; he always spoke and did what was agreeable to me.

31. O Bhisma, he used to tell me these gratifying words, "O Drona, I am the favourite son of my illustrious father.

32. When my father (the king) would install me as the ruler of the Panchalas, it (the kingdom) shall be then enjoyed by you. O friend, this is my solemn promise.

33. My kingdom, my wealth, my happiness all will be at your disposal." When his study of the science of arms was finished, he went away after being duly worshipped by me.

34—36. I kept his words always in my mind. Some time after, in obedience to the injunction of my father and in the temptation of begetting offspring, I married the illustrious daughter of Gotama (Kripa) who had short hair, who possessed great intelligence and observed many rigid vows, and who was ever engaged in the Agnihotra, sacrifices and austerities. She gave birth to a son, named Ashwathama, who was greatly powerful and as effulgent as the sun.

37—39. As Bharadwaja was pleased on obtaining me, so I was pleased on getting that son. One day Ashwathama began to cry on seeing some richmen's sons drink milk. I was so beside myself at this that I lost all knowledge of the points of heaven. "Instead of asking him who had only a few kine, just sufficient for sacrificial purposes, I shall ask him who had many,"—thinking thus in my mind, O son of Ganga, I roamed over many countries ;

40. Though I roved all over the country, yet I could not obtain a milch-cow, and I returned unsuccessful. Thereupon some boys tempted him with Pistaudaka (water mixed with powdered rice.)

41. The child, drinking the Pistaudaka cried out, "O I have drunk milk." O descendant of Kuru, he began to dance in joy, being [thus deluded by his childish ignorance.

42. Seeing him dance with joy amidst his playmates who were smiling at his simplicity, I was exceedingly touched.

43. "Fie to the poor Drona, who does not try to earn wealth ! His son in the thirst for milk drinks Pistaudaka ;

44. In ignorance he dances, crying "I have drunk milk." Hearing these derisive words, I was quite beside myself !

45—47. Then reproaching myself by myself, I began to reflect thus in my mind, "Cast off and censured by Brahmanas, I would not yet, from the desire of wealth, be any body's servant, which is ever sinful." O Bhishma, thus resolved, and remembering my former friendship for him, (Drupada) I regarded myself very much blessed. I went joyfully to the Shoumaka, taking my beloved son and wife with me.

48. I joyfully heard that my beloved friend had been installed on the throne, and, remembered his words and companionship.

49. O lord, I went to Drupada remembering my old friendship, and said to him "O best of men, know me as your friend."

50. I went to Drupada confidently as a friend should do. But Drupada, laughing in derision, cast me off as if I were a vulgar fellow ; and he said,

51. "O Brahmana, your intelligence is hardly of high order. As coming to me on a sudden you say you are my friend.

52. O dull-minded man, great kings can never be friends with such luckless and indigent fellow like you.

53. We had friendship between us when we were both equally circumstanced, but Time that wears out every thing, wears out friendship also.

54. Friendship never remains in the world in any one's heart without being worn out. Time wears it out and anger also destroys it.

55. Do not, therefore, stick to that worn-out friendship. Do not think of it any longer. O best of Brahmanas, the friendship I entertained for you was for a particular purpose.

56. The poor cannot be the friend of the rich ; the unlearned can not be the friend of the learned ; the coward cannot be the friend of the brave (heroes). How then do you desire the continuance of our old friendship ?

57. There may be either friendship or enmity between two persons equally situated as to wealth or prowess. The poor and the rich can neither be friends nor enemies of one another.

58. One of pure birth can never be a friend of one who is lowly born ; a car-warrior can not be a friend of one who is not a car-warrior ; one who is not a king can not have a king for his friend.

59. I do not know you, I do not remember that I ever promised you my kingdom. O Brahmana, I can give you food and shelter for one night."

60. Having been thus addressed, I left his presence with my wife, vowing to do that which I shall certainly do without much delay.

61. O Bhishma, thus insulted by Drupada I was filled with wrath. I have come to the Kurus wishing to obtain accomplished pupils.

62. To act according to your wishes, I now come to Hastinapur. Tell me what I am to do.

Vaishampayana said :—

63. Having been thus addressed, Bhishma thus spoke to the son of Bharadwaja.

Bhishma said :—

64. Unstring your bow, and teach (these princes) the science of arms. Enjoy joyfully as much as you like every luxury in the Kuru abode.

65. Whatever wealth, kingdom and sovereignty the Kurus possess, you are the lord of all. All the Kurus are at your command.

66. O Brahmana, consider that to be already accomplished which is in your heart. O best of the twice-born, as the fruit of our good luck we have obtained you.

Thus ends the hundred and thirty-third chapter, the cology of Bhishma and Drona, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXIV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon that best of men, that greatly effulgent Drona, worshipped by Bhishma, took up his quarters in the house of the Kurus and was adored by them all.

2. When he had taken rest for a while, Bhishma, taking his grandsons, the Kurus, gave them to him as his pupils, making him their preceptor with the presents of various wealth.

3. That lord (Bhishma) gave the son of Bharadwaja (Drona) a neat and tidy house, well-filled with paddy and every kind of wealth.

4. That great bowman, Drona, in delightful heart, accepted the Kurus, the sons of Dhritarastra and Pandu, as his pupils.

5. Having accepted them all as (his pupils), Drona called them apart and spoke, to them confidently thus,

6. "O sinless ones, I have a particular desire in my heart; promise me truly that you will accomplish it when you will become skilled in arms,

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Hearing these words, the Kuru princes remained silent. O chastiser of foes, Aryuna, (however), vowed to accomplish it.

8. Drona then cheerfully clasped Aryuna to his bosom and repeatedly took the scent of his head and shed tears of joy.

9. The greatly powerful Drona taught the sons of Pandu (the use of) various weapons,—both celestial and human.

10. O best of the Bharata race, many other princes also flocked to that best of Brahmanas, Drona, to learn (the science of) arms.

11. The Vrisnis, the Andhakas, and the princes from various countries, and the son of Suta and Radha (Karna) made Drona their preceptor.

12. The son of Suta (Karna), being jealous of Partha (Aryuna), always defied him, and being supported by Duryodhana disregarded the Pandavas.

13—15. That Pandava (Aryuna) from his eager desire to learn the science of arms always remained at the side of Drona, and he excelled all in skill, in strength of arms, and in perseverance, on account of his love for the science of arms. Though he (Drona) gave equal instructions to all, yet Aryuna became the foremost of all in lightness and skill. Drona was convinced that none of his pupils would be able to equal that son of Indra.

16. Thus he gave instructions to all the princes in the (science of) arms. To keep them away for long, he gave them Kamundala (a vessel of narrow mouth) for fetching water.

17—19. But he gave his son a Kumbha (wide mouthed vessel to fetch water), so that it may not take him, long (to fill it). When they were thus kept away, Drona instructed his son some superior methods of using arms. Aryuna came to know it. Thereupon he filled his Kumundala with the Varuna weapon and came to his preceptor at the same time with his preceptor's son, and thus the intelligent son of Pritha, that foremost of all the learned in arms, became in no way inferior, to his preceptor's son.

20. Aryuna took great deal of care in worshipping the preceptor; he had great devotion to his study of the science of arms, therefore, he became a great favourite of Drona.

21. Drona, seeing Falguni's (Aryuna) great devotion to arms, summoned the cook and told him in private,

22. "Never give rice (food) to Aryuna in the dark, and never told him also that I have asked you to do it."

23. On a certain day when Aryuna was taking his food, a wind arose and the burning lamp went out.

24. The effulgent son of Kunti, (Aryuna) continued eating in the dark, his hand from habit going to his mouth.

25. Thinking this to be the result of the force of habit, the mighty-armed son of Pandu practised with his bow in the night.

26. O descendant of the Bharata race, bearing the twang of his bow-string, in the night, Drona came to him, and embracing him spoke to him thus,

Drona said :—

27. I speak to you truly that I shall do to you that by which there will be no bowman in the world who will be equal to you.

Vaishampayana said :—

28. Thereupon Drona taught Aryuna the art of fighting on horse back and on the back of the elephants, on car and on the ground.

29. Drona taught that Kaurava (Aryuna) how to fight with clubs, the sword, the lance, the spear and the dart. He taught him the use of many other weapons, and how to fight with many men.

30. Hearing of his skill, thousands of kings and princes, desirous of learning the science of arms, flocked (to him).

31. O great king, thereupon, Ekalavya, the son of Hiranyadhanus, king of the Nishadas, came to Drona.

32. That learned man in all the precepts of religion (Drona) did not accept him (the Nishada prince) as his pupil in archery, thinking that he was a Nishada and considering the interest of the princes.

33. O chastiser of foes, touching Drona's feet with his head, he went into a forest and made a clay statue of Drona.

34. He began to worship it (the clay figure) as if it were his real preceptor, and before that figure he practised the use of arms with the most rigid regularity.

35. In consequence of his exceptional reverence for his preceptor and of his devotion to his purpose, all the three processes of fixing arrows on the bow-string, aiming and letting off became very easy to him.

36. O chastiser of foes, one day the Kuru and the Pandu princes with the permission of Drona all set out on their cars to a hunting excursion.

37. O king, a servant followed the Pandavas at his ease with the necessary things (for the hunt) and took a dog with him.

38. They wandered about the forest, intent on the purpose they had in view; the dog also wandered about alone and came to the Nishada (prince).

39. The dog, seeing the Nishada of dark colour and of body besmeared with filth, with an attire of black skin, and with matted hair on his head, began to bark aloud.

40. Thereupon he (the Nishada,) exhibiting lightness of hand, at once struck seven arrows into the mouth of the barking dog.

41. The dog, thus pierced in the mouth with the arrows, came back to the Pandavas, and the Pandava heroes on seeing this were very much astonished.

42. Ashamed of their own skill, they praised the lightness of hand and precision of aim by auricular perception (of the Nishada Prince)

43. O king, they, thereupon, began to search in the forest for that unknown dweller of the wood. The Pandavas soon found him discharging ceaseless arrows from his bow.

44. Seeing that man of grim visage,—a total stranger to them,—they asked, "Who are you and whose son are you?"

The Nishada said :—

45. O heroes, I am the son of the Nishada king, Hiranyadhanus. Know me to be a pupil of Drona, labouring to acquire the science of arms.

46. The Pandavas, having made themselves acquainted with everything connected with him, and returning (to Hastinapura) told Drona all about the wonderful feat of archery they had seen in the forest.

47. O king, the son of Kunti, Aryuna, thinking of Ekalavya all the while, saw Drona in private, and relying upon his preceptor's love for him he said,

48. "You have joyfully told me, embracing me to your bosom, no pupil of yours should be equal to me.

49. Why then there is a pupil of yours in the world (equal to me),—the mighty son of the Nishada king?"

50. Thereupon Drona reflected for a moment and resolved upon the course he should adopt. He then took Sabyashachi (Aryuna) with him and went to the Nishada (prince).

51. He saw Ekalavya with body besmeared with filth, with matted locks (on his head) with rags on, and with a bow in his hand with which he was ceaselessly shooting arrows.

52. Seeing Drona coming towards him, Ekalavya also went a few steps forward and touched his feet and prostrated himself on the ground.

53. The son of Nishada worshipped Drona in the due form and represented himself as his pupil. He then stood before him with joined hands.

54. O king, thereupon Drona spoke thus to Ekalavya, "O hero, if you are really my pupil, give me my remuneration." Ekalavya was much pleased in hearing this, and he said;

55. O illustrious one, what shall I give you, command me. O excellent Brahma-knowing man, there is nothing that is not to be given to my preceptor."

56—58. He (Drona) said, "Give me as Dakshina your thumb." Ekalavya, ever devoted to truth and desirous of keeping his promise, hearing the fearful words of Drona, at once cut off his thumb with a cheerful face and unruffled heart, and gave it to Drona. Thereupon, O king, when the Nishada again began to shoot with the help of his other fingers, he found he had lost his former lightness of hand.

59. Aryuna became pleased and his fever (of jealousy) was gone. "None will equal Aryuna," these words of Drona now became true.

60. Two of Drona's pupils became greatly expert in club fight, namely Duryodhana and Bhima, who were jealous of each other.

61. Ashwathama excelled all in the mysteries (of the science of arms). The twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) excelled every body in handling the sword.

62—63. Yudhisthira became the best of car-warriors, and Aryuna excelled every one in every respect. He surpassed all in intelligence, in the skill of using all weapons, and in devotion to his arms and his preceptor. He thus became the foremost of all car-warriors.

64. Though the instructions (of Drona) were equal, (to all), yet the mighty Aryuna excelled all (the princes,) and became an Athiratha, a warrior capable of fighting with sixty thousands foes all at once.

65. The wicked-minded sons of Dhritarastra became jealous of Bhima, for he was exceedingly strong, and of Aryuna, because he was accomplished.

66. O best of men, Drona became desirous of examining his pupils' knowledge in arms and he collected them all together, all (the princes) skilled in all the weapons.

67. He caused an artificial bird made by an artizan to be placed on the top of a tree without the knowledge of the princes for the purpose of using it as the target.

Drona said :—

68. Take up quickly, all of you, your bows and fix your arrows on the bow-string. Stand here aiming at that bird on the tree.

69. As soon as I give the order, cut off the bird's head. O sons, I shall give each of you a turn one after another.

Vaishampayana said :—

70. The best of the descendants of Angirasha (Drona) first spoke to Yudhisthira thus, "O invincible one, aim with your arrow and shoot (the bird) as soon as I order."

71. The chastiser of foes, Yudhisthira, first took up the bow as ordered by his preceptor, and stood aiming at the bird.

72. O best of the Bharata race, very next moment Drona spoke thus to the descendant of Kuru (Yudhisthira), standing with bow in his hand,

73. "O prince, behold that bird on the top of the tree." Yudhisthira replied to the preceptor, "O Sir, I see it." Very next moment Drona again said,

Drona said :—

74. Do you see the tree, myself, your brothers and the bird ?

Vaishampayana said :—

75. That son of Kunti (Yudhisthira) said, "I see the lord of the forest (tree), yourself, my brothers and the bird." He said this again and again being asked (by Drona) again and again.

76. Drona, being displeased, reproachingly told him, "Stand back. It is not for you to strike at this aim."

77—78. Thereupon, the greatly illustrious (Drona) placed in the same position Duryodhana and other sons of Dhritarastra, and also Bhima and his other brothers, and also all the princes that had come from other countries. He asked them one after another the same question, but they all replied as did Yudhisthira.

Thus ends the hundred and thirty fourth chapter, Drona's examination of his pupils, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXV.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Drona smilingly called Dhananjaya and said to him, "It is to be shot by you. Turn your eyes to it.

2. You must shoot the aim as soon as I shall give order. O son, stand here for a moment with your bow and arrow."

3. Having been thus addressed Sabyasachi (Aryuna), drawing the bow to a semi-circle, aimed at the bird and stood there as ordered by the preceptor.

4. Very next moment Drona asked him, "O Aryuna, do you see the bird, the tree and myself?"

5. O descendant of the Bharata race, Partha (Aryuna) replied to Drona, "I see only the bird. I do not see the tree or yourself."

6. The invincible Drona, being much pleased, spoke again a moment after to that great car-warrior, the son of Pandu, (Aryuna.)

7. "If you see the bird, describe it to me." He (Aryuna) again replied, "I see the head of the bird, but I do not see its body."

8. Having been thus told by Aryuna, Drona was filled with delight and his hair stood on their end. He told Partha, "Shoot," and he instantly let fly (the arrow.)

9. The Pandava (Aryuna) speedily struck off the head of the vulture with his sharp arrow and brought it to the ground.

10. As soon as this feat was performed, he (Drona) embraced the son of Pandu (Aryuna) and thought that Drupada with his friends were already vanquished in the battle.

11. O best of the Bharata race, some time after, the best of Angirashas (Drona) with his pupils went to the Ganges to bathe.

12. When Drona was bathing, a strong aligator, as if sent by Death himself, seized him at the thigh.

13. Though quite capable of freeing himself (from the mouth of the aligator), he (Drona) spoke to all his pupils in a hurry, "Kill this aligator and rescue me."

14. As soon as he uttered these words, Vivatsa (Aryuna) struck the aligator under the water with five sharp and irresistible arrows.

15—16. The others (his pupils) stood confounded each at his place. Seeing this readiness of Aryuna, Drona considered that son of Pandu to be the foremost of all his pupils, and he was exceedingly pleased. The aligator, being cut into pieces by the arrows of Partha,

17. Released the thigh of the high-souled (Drona) and gave up his life. Thereupon the son of Bharadwaja (Drona) thus addressed the illustrious car-warrior (Aryuna),

18. "O mighty-armed, accept this superior and irresistible weapon, named Brahmasira, with its method of hurling and recalling it.

19. You must not use it against any human foe. If hurled at a foe of inferior power, it might burn the whole universe.

20. O son, it is said that this weapon hath not a superior in the three worlds. Keep it therefore with great care, and listen to what I say.

21. O hero, if ever any foe, if he is not human, comes to fight with you, you may then use it against him to accomplish his death."

22. Vivatsa (Aryuna) with joined hands promised to do as he was bidden, and he received the great weapon. The preceptor then spoke to him again thus,

23. "None will ever become a superior bowman to you. You will be invincible and greatly illustrious.

Thus ends the hundred and thirty fifth chapter, the rescue of Drona from the aligator, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXVI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O descendant of the Bharata, seeing the sons of Dhritarastra and Pandu expert in arms, O king, Drona thus spoke to the king Dhritarastra,

2. In the presence of Kripa, Somadatta, Valhika, the wise son of Ganga (Bhisma), Vyasa and Vidura.

3. "O king, O best of the Kurus, your sons have completed their education. Let them with your permission show their proficiency." Thereupon the great king replied with a delightful heart.

Dhritarastra said :—

4. O best of Brahmanas, you have accomplished a great deed. O son of Bharadwaja, command me yourself as to the place and time, where and when, and the manner in which, the trial may be held.

5. Grief for my blindness makes me envy those men who are blessed with sight and who will see my children's prowess in arms.

6. O Khattwa (Vidura), do all that the respected preceptor says. O lover of virtue, I think nothing can be more agreeable to me than this.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Thereupon Vidura, giving the necessary assurance to the king, went out to do what he was bidden. The greatly learned son of Bharadwaja (Drona) measured a piece of (ground),

- 8—9. Which was void of trees and thickets and which was furnished with wells and springs. On this piece of land, that first of eloquent men, that hero (Drona), gave offerings to the gods according to the precepts of the Sastras, when all the people were assembled by proclamation on an auspicious day with an auspicious star in ascendance.
10. O best of men, the artizans built a great auditorium by the order of the king ; (they built) another for the (royal) ladies also according to the proper form.
11. The citizens built many platforms and the wealthy men many spacious and high Sibikas.
12. When the (fixed) day came, the king accompanied by his ministers, with Bhishma and Kripa,—the excellent preceptor, walking at the head (of the procession),
13. Came to the auditorium of celestial beauty, made of pure gold and decked with strings of pearls and stones of Vaidurya gems.
- 14—16. The greatly fortunate Gandhari and Kunti and the other ladies of the royal household, dressed in gorgeous attire and accompanied by their maids-in-waiting, joyfully ascended the platforms as celestial ladies ascend the Sumeru mountain. Brahmanas, Kshatryas, and the others of the four orders of caste hurriedly left the city and came running there with the desire of seeing the princes' skill in arms, and they were so eager that they assembled all there in a moment.
17. That vast crowd with the noise of blowing trumpets and beating drums and the sounds of many voices became like an agitated ocean.
- 18—19. Then the preceptor, clad in white attire, with white sacred thread, white locks, white beard, white garlands, and white sandal-paste besmeared over his body, entered the arena with his son. It appeared as if the moon accompanied by (the planet) Mars appeared in an unclouded sky.
20. The best of strong men, the hero (Drona), entering at the proper time, caused Brahmanas versed in Mantras to celebrate the auspicious rites.
21. After auspicious and sweet-sounding musical instruments had struck up as a propitiary ceremony, men equipped with various weapons entered the arena.
22. Then the best of the Bharata race, (the princes), those mighty car-warriors, having girt up their loins, entered (the arena) equipped with bows, quivers and finger protectors.
23. With Yudhishthira at their head, the greatly heroic princes, in the order of their age, began to show wonderful skill in their arms.
24. Some (spectators) lowered their heads out of fear of the falling arrows, while others not being afraid, looked on with wonder and astonishment.
25. Riding swift horses and managing them dexterously, the princess hit marks with arrows engraved with their respective names.
26. On seeing the prowess of the princes in using their bows and arrows, the spectators thought they were seeing the city of Gandharva. They were all filled with amazement.
27. O descendant of Bharata, some hundreds and thousands of men, their eyes expanded with wonder, all at once cried out "Well done ! Well done !"
28. After repeatedly displaying their skill and dexterity in the use of bow and arrows, in the management of cars, in the fight on horseback and on the back of elephants,
29. They took up their swords and buckles and began to attack one another and to walk around the arena displaying various modes of sword's play.
30. They all saw their (great) agility, the beauty of the symmetry of their bodies, their grace, their calmness, the firmness of their grasp and the skill in the use of their swords and buckles.
31. Then Vrikodara (Bhima) and Sujoydhana (Duryodhana) entered the (arena) with secret mental delight like two single peaked mountains.
32. Those mighty-armed heroes girt their loins and summoned all their strength; they roared like two infuriated elephants contending (for a female elephant).
33. Those two greatly strong (heroes) circled round the arena with faultless clubs and careered right and left in all the proper form.
34. Vidura described to Dhritarastra and the mother of the Pandavas (Kunti) to Gandhari all the feats of the princes.

Thus ends the hundred and thirty sixth chapter, the tournament, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXVII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. On the appearance of the Kuru prince (Duryodhana) and the foremost of all strong men Bhima, the spectators were divided into two parties by their partiality swayed by the love (towards each of the contending heroes).

2. Some cried, "Behold the heroic Kuru prince;" some cried, "Behold heroic Bhima." Thus from these cries of the people rose a great uproar (in the arena).

3. On seeing the place become like a troubled ocean, the intelligent son of Bharadwaja (Drona) spoke to his dear son Ashwathama,

Drona said :—

4. "Stop these two mighty heroes, so expert in arms. Let not the anger of the assembled people be excited by this encounter between Bhima and Duryodhana.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. Thereupon the two combatants, with uplifted clubs, resembling two swollen oceans agitated by the winds that blow at the time of the world's dissolution, were stopped by the son of the preceptor.

6. Then Drona entered the arena, and stopping the musicians spoke thus in a voice deep as the roars of the clouds.

7. "Behold all of you now that Partha who is dearer to me than my own son, who is the master of all arms, who is the son of Indra himself and who is like the younger brother of Indra."

8—9. At the command of the preceptor, the youthful Falguni (Aryuna), equipped with finger protector, his quiver full of arrows, with his bow in hand, and with a golden armour on, after having performed the propitiatory rites, appeared in the arena like an evening cloud reflecting the rays of the setting sun and illumined by the hues of the rainbow and the flashes of lightning.

10. On this a great cry of joy rose from all parts of the arena, and musical instruments were played and conches were blown.

11. All cried, "This is the handsome son of Kunti, the middle (third) son of Pandu. This is the son of Indra. This is the protector of the Kuru race.

12. This is the best of all men learned in arms. This is the best of all cherishers of virtue. This is the foremost of all well-conducted persons. This is the great repository of the knowledge of all (good) manners."

13. Hearing these loud cries of the spectators, the tears of Kunti, mixing with the milk of her breast, drenched her bosom.

14. Having his ears filled with the uproar, the best of men, Dhritarastra, asked Vidura with delight,

15. "O Khattwa, what is this great uproar, like that of the troubled sea, that rises in the arena all of sudden echoing the very heavens?"

Vidura said :—

16. O great King, the son of Pritha and Pandu, Falguni (Aryuna), clad in armour; has entered, the arena; and therefore is this uproar.

Dhritarastra said :—

17. O high-souled man, I have indeed been blessed, favoured and protected by the three fire (sons) of Pritha (Kunti) who is like the sacred fuel.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. When the spectators some-what regained their equanimity, Vivatsa (Aryuna) displayed before his preceptor his lightness in the use of arms.

19. He created fire by the Agneya weapon, by the Varuna weapon he created water. He created winds by the Vayavya weapon and by the Parjanya weapon, he created the clouds.

20. He created land by the Bhouma weapon and by the Parvatya weapon he created the mountains. He made all this to disappear by the Antardhana weapon.

21. In a moment he appeared tall and in a moment short. He was now yoked in his car; he was in the next moment on the car itself; he was then again on the ground.

22. The favourite (pupil) of the preceptor (Aryuna) shot by his arrows various marks, some tender, some fine, and some of thick composition.

23. He let fly at one time five arrows from his bow stung into the mouth of a moving iron boar as if they were but one arrow.

24. That greatly effulgent hero sent twenty one arrows into the hollow of a cow's horn hang upon a rope which was swinging to and fro.

25. O sinless one, in this manner he (Aryuna), walking round the arena, displayed his profound skill in the use of the sword, bow and club.

26. O descendant of the Bharata race, when the tournament was almost ended, when the excitement of the spectators cooled down and the sound of music stopped,

27. There was heard at the gate the slapping of arms, betokening power and strength, like the roars of thunder.

28. "Are the mountains splitting? Is the earth going to be rent assunder? Is the sky resounding with the roars of gathering clouds?"

29. O king, all the spectators in the arena thought thus, and turned their eyes towards the gate.

30. Drona was surrounded by the five brothers, the sons of Pritha, and looked like the moon surrounded by the five constellations.

31. That chartiser of foes, Duryodhana, with his one hundred haughty brothers and with Ashwathama, stood up in haste.

32. That prince (Duryodhana) with his club in his hand, surrounded by his one hundred brothers with uplifted weapons, looked like Indra in the days of yore when he stood surrounded by the celestials at the time of the battle with the Davavas.

Thus ends the hundred and thirty seventh chapter, the trial of arms, in the Sambhava, of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXVIII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When the spectators, with eyes expanded with wonder, made way for that subjugator of hostile cities, Karna, he entered the spacious arena.

2. He was armed in his natural coat of armour, his face was brightened with his ear-rings, his bow was in his hand, and his sword in his loins. He entered like a walking cliff.

3. The illustrious destroyer of enemies, the large eyed Karna was born of Pritha (Kunti) in her maidenhood. He was a portion of the hot beamed sun.

4. His power and energy were like those of lions, the bulls or the best of elephants. He was like the sun in splendour, moon in loveliness and fire in effulgence.

5. Being born of the sun, he was tall like a golden palm; he was a youth who could slay lions. He was handsome and possessed countless accomplishments.

6. The mighty armed (hero) looked all around the arena and bowed rather with indifference to Drona and Kripa.

7. The entire assembly of people remained motionless and stared in steadfast gaze. They were filled with great curiosity and asked one another, "Who is he?"

8. That foremost of eloquent men, the son of the Sun, (Karna) in a voice deep as the roars of clouds, addressed his unknown brother thus,

9. "O Partha, I shall perform feats before this assembly excelling all that you have done. Behold them, and you will be amazed."

10. O best of all eloquent men, when he had hardly finished his words, the spectators stood up all at once as if uplifted by some instrument.

11. O best of men, Duryodhana was delighted, while Vivatsa (Aryuna) was filled with abashment and anger.

12. The greatly powerful Karna, ever fond of battle, displayed with the permission of Drona all that Partha had displayed before.

13. O descendant of Bharata, Duryodhana with his brothers thereupon embraced Karna with delight and spoke to him thus,

Duryodhana said :—

14. "O mighty-armed hero, welcome to you! O man deserving of politeness, I have got you by good fortune. Command me and the Kuru kingdom at your pleasure.

Karna said :—

15. When you have said this, I consider it as already accomplished. I only desire your friendship. O lord, I long for a single combat with Aryuna.

Duryodhana said :—

16. Enjoy with me the good things of life. Be the benefactor of your friends. O oppressor of enemies, place your feet on the heads of all foes.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Thereupon Partha considered himself disgraced and spoke to Karna who stood amidst the (Kuru) brothers like a hill.

Aryuna said :—

18. O Karna, the path which the unwelcome intruder and the uninvited talker comes to shall be yours.

Karna said :—

19. This arena is meant for all; it is not for you alone. O Falguni, they are kings who are superior in power; Kshatrya Dharma depends on prowess alone.

20. O descendant of Bharata, what need is there of altercation which is the habit of the weak! Speak in arrows, until I cut off your head to-day in the presence of the preceptor.

Vaishampayana said :—

21. The subduer of hostile cities, Partha, was embraced by his brothers, and with the permission of Drona he advanced for the combat.

22. Thereupon, Karna was embraced by Duryodhana with his brothers. Taking up his bow and arrows he stood ready for fight.

23. The sky was covered in clouds emitting flashes of lightning, and the coloured bow of Indra appeared shedding its effulgent rays. The clouds seemed to be laughing on account of the presence of white cranes that were then flying.

24. Seeing that Indra was thus showing his affection (towards Aryuna), the sun dispersed the clouds over his son.

25. Falguni (Aryuna) was invisible under cover of the clouds, but Karna was visible on account of the clouds being dispersed from him by the sun.

26. The sons of Dhritarastra stood by Karna, and the son of Bharadwaja (Drona) Kripa and Bhishma stood by Partha.

27. The assembly was also divided into two parties, so were the ladies also. And on learning the affair the daughter of Bhoja, Kunti fainted away.

28. The learned in all the precepts of virtue, Vidura, revived the insensible Kunti by sprinkling over (her face) water mixed with sandal-paste.

29. On being revived she was seized with fear on seeing her two sons clad in armour, but she could do nothing.

30. When the two (heroes) were ready with their great bows raised up, the son of Saradwatta, Kripa, well versed in all the precepts of virtue and expert in the rules of duels, said,

Kripa said :—

31. "This son of Pandu is the youngest child of Kunti. He is a Kuru and he will fight a duel with you.

32. O mighty armed hero, you should also tell us the lineage of your father and mother, and the royal line in which you are an ornament.

33. Knowing this, Partha will fight with you, or he will not fight (as he will think proper.) The sons of kings never fight a duel with men of inferior lineage.

Vaishampayana said :—

34. Thus addressed, Karna's face was flushed with the blushes of shame, and it looked like the pale lotus torn and disfigured by the showers of rains.

Duryodhana said :—

35. O preceptor, it is said in the Sastras that three classes of men can claim royalty, namely persons of noble birth, heroes, and those that lead soldiers.

36. But if Falguni is unwilling to fight with one who is not a king, I install him (Karna) as the king of Anga.

Vaishampayana said :—

37—38. When the cheers cease at that very moment the greatly powerful car-warrior Karna, seated on a golden seat, the (royal) umbrella over his head, and yak tails waved by his side, was installed king of Anga by the Brahmanas, learned in the Mantras, in the proper form, with paddy, flowers, Ghata (water-pots) and much gold,

39. O King, (Karna) said to the Kaurava (Duryodhana), "What shall I give you compared with your gift of a kingdom!"

40. O king, O best of men, I shall do all you will command." Sujodhana (Duryodhana) replied, "I long for your friendship."

41. Having been thus addressed, Karna replied. "Be it so." They thereupon embraced each other in joy and felt great happiness.

Thus ends the hundred and thirty eighth chapter, the tournament, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXIX.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon Adhiratha (Karna's father), with his sheet loosely hanging down, trembling and perspiring, supporting himself on a staff, entered the arena.

2. Seeing him, Karna left his bow, and impelled by filial regard bowed his head, wet with the water of his coronation.

3. The charioteer (Adiratha) hurriedly covered his feet with the end of his sheet and addressed the successful Karna as his son.

4. He (Adhiratha) embraced him (Karna) and wetted his head with tears,—his head which was still wet with the water sprinkled over it at his coronation as the king of Anga.

5. Seeing him (Adhiratha) the Pandavas considered him to be a son of a charioteer, and Bhima jeeringly said,

6. "O charioteer's son, you deserve not to be killed by Partha in the battle. You should better take up the whip (instead of the sword) which befits your race.

7. O worst of men, you are not worthy of enjoying the kingdom of Anga, as a dog deserves not the Ghee placed before the sacrificial fire."

8. Thus addressed Karna looked at the sun in the sky, and with slightly quivering lips he heaved a deep sigh.

9. Like a mad elephant the greatly strong Duryodhana rose in anger from among his brothers,—who were like an assemblage of lotuses.

10. He said to that doer of fearful deeds, Bhimasena there present, "Vrikodara, you should not speak such words.

11. The strength is the cardinal virtue of the Kshatryas; even a man of inferior birth deserves to be fought with. The sources of heroes and rivers are the same, both are always unknown.

12. The fire that covers the whole world rises from water. The Danava-destroying thunder was made of Dadhichi's bone.

13. It is heard that the birth of the illustrious god Guha (Kartikeya) is full of all mysteries. Some say he is the son of Agni, (some say) he is the son of Kirtika, (some again say) he is the son of Rudra, and (others say) he is the son of Ganga.

14. It is also heard that those that were born Kshatryas became Brahmanas. Vishwamitra and others attained to eternal Brahma.

15. The foremost of all wielders of arms, the preceptor (Drona), was born in a water vessel, and the son of Gotama (Kripa) sprang from a clump of heath.

16. I know also about your own birth. Can a deer give birth to this tiger, as effulgent as the sun, born with a natural armour and ear-rings, and possessing all auspicious marks?

17. This lord of men deserves the sovereignty of not only Anga but of the whole world, by the prowess of his arms and by my obedience to him.

18. If there is any one to whom all that I have done to him (Karna) has become intolerable, let him ascend his car and bend his bow with the help of his feet."

19. Thereupon there arose a loud cheer among all the spectators, approving of Duryodhana's speech. At this time the sun went down.

20. Then king Duryodhana took Karna's hand and led him out of the arena lighted with countless lamps.

21. The Pandavas also with Drona, Kripa and Bhishma returned to their own homes. All the people also went to their respective houses.

22. O descendant of the Bharata race, some of them named Aryuna, some Karna and some Duryodhana (as the victor of the day) as they went away.

23. Kunti also was much pleased out of her motherly love towards her son Karna, for he had various auspicious marks on his person and for he was installed as the king of Anga.

24. O king, Duryodhana, having obtained Karna, banished his fears arising out of Aryuna's proficiency in arms.

25. And that hero, (Karna), accomplished in arms also began to gratify Dhryodhana with sweet speeches; and Yudhis-thira was impressed with the belief that there was no warrior like Karna on earth.

Thus ends the hundred and the thirty ninth chapter the tournament, in the, Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXL.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Seeing the sons of Pandu and Dhritarasta accomplished in arms, Drona thought that the time had come when he could demand the preceptor's Dakshina (remuneration.)

2. O king, one day assembling his pupils together, the preceptor Drona asked his Dakshina from them all, saying,

3. "Seize the king of Panchala, Drupada, in battle and bring him to me. That will be the most acceptable Dakshina to me."

4. Saying "Be it so," they all ascended their chariots with their arms and marched out with Drona in order to pay the remuneration to their preceptor.

5. Those best of men destroyed the Panchalas and went to the capital of the greatly powerful Drupada and attacked it.

6. Duryodhana, Karna, greatly strong Yuyutsu, Dushashana, Bikarna, Jalasandha, Sulachana,

7. These and many other princes of great prowess, all foremost of Kshatriyas, vied with one another to become foremost in the attack.

8. The princes, riding on first class chariots and followed by cavalry, entered the hostile capital and proceeded along its streets.

9. At this time the king of the Panchalas, seeing the great army and hearing its roar, soon came out of his palace with all his brothers.

10. The king Jagmasena (Drupada) was well-armed, but he was assailed by them (Kurus) with a shower of arrows, all uttering their war cry.

11. The invincible warrior Jagmasena, riding on his white chariot, attacked the Kurus and began to rain his fearful arrows.

12. Seeing the pride of the princes, Partha (Aryuna) spoke thus to the preceptor, that excellent Brahmana Drona,

13. "We shall display our power when they would finish their's. They are not capable of killing the king of the Panchalas in the battle."

14. Having said this, that sinless son of Kunti (Aryuna) with his brothers waited outside the city at a distance of a mile.

15. Seeing the Kauravas, Drupada rushed forward and afflicted the Kuru army with a shower of arrows.

16. Such was his lightness of motion on the field of battle that though he was fighting alone on a single chariot, the Kurus thought in fear that there was more than one Drupada.

17—18. The fearful arrows of Drupada fell on all sides, and thousands of conches, trumpets and drums began to be sounded by the Panchalas in their houses. O great king, a terrible roar, like that of the lion, rose from the mighty Panchalas.

19. The great sound of the twang of their bow-strings seemed to rend the very sky. (Thereupon) Duryodhana, Vikarna, Subahu, Dirghalochana,

20. And Dushashana, becoming furious, began to shower arrows upon the enemy. The mighty bow-man, the son of Prishata

(Drupada), invincible in battle, though pierced with arrows,

21—22. Instantly began to afflict the hostile army. O descendant of the Bharata race, careering over the field of battle like a fiery wheel, he smote with his arrows Duryodhana, Vikarna, even greatly powerful Karna and many other heroic princes and various other soldiers, and slaked their thirst for battle.

23. Then the citizens showered upon the Kurus clubs, maces and other missiles, like cloud's showering rains.

24. O descendant of the Bharata race, young and old, all the citizens, hearing of the battle, rushed out and assailed the Kurus.

25. They (Kurus) broke and fled, wailing towards the Pandavas; and the Pandavas, hearing their terrible wail,

26—27. Ascended their cars after duly worshipping Drona. Then Aryuna, hastily asking Yudhishthira not to engage in the fight by saying "Don't fight," and appointing the sons of Madri (Nakula and Sahadeva) as the protectors of his chariot wheels, rushed out. And Bhima, ever in the front, ran ahead with his club in his hand.

28. The sinless son of Kunti (Aryuna), thus accompanied by his brother, hearing the shouts of the enemy, advanced towards them, filling the whole region with the rattle of the wheels of his chariot.

29—30. As a Makara enters the sea, so the mighty-armed Yama-like Bhima with his club in his hand entered the Panchala ranks and roared as fiercely as the ocean in a tempest.

31. Ever-skillful in battle, Bhima, the son of Pritha, upraising his club, attacked the soldiers riding on elephants with the powers of his arms like the great destroyer himself.

32. Those huge animals like mountains, struck with Bhima's club, had their heads broken into pieces, and they fell covered with blood, like cliffs loosened by thunder.

33. The Pandava, the elder of Aryuna, (Bhima) felled to the ground elephants and horses and cars by thousands, and killed many foot-soldiers and car-warriors.

34. As a herdsman drives the cattle with his staff in the wood, so did Vrikodara drive before him the chariots and elephants (of the hostile force).

35. Falguni (Aryuna), eager to do the favourite work of the son of Bharadwaja, (Drona), felled the son of Prishata (Drupada) from his elephant, covering him with arrows.

36. O king, like the fire at the end of a Yuga, he felled in the battle thousands of horses, cars and elephants.

37. Thereupon all the Panchalas and the Srinayas, being thus attacked (by Aryuna), assailed Partha with a shower of weapons of various kinds.

38. They uttered from their mouths great shouts like the roars of lions, and they desperately attacked the Pandava (Aryuna). The battle became fearful and furious to behold. Hearing their great leonine shouts, he (Aryuna) became filled with wrath.

39. Kiriti (Aryuna) immediately assailed the Panchalas in the battle, and covering them with a shower of arrows, he greatly confused them.

40. They, that saw the son of Kunti (at that time), could not mark any interval between his fixing the arrows on the bow-string and letting them off.

41. The whole place was filled with leonine shouts mixed with cheers of approval. Thereupon the king of the Panchalas, accompanied with Satyajit (his commander-in-chief)

42. Rushed towards him with speed, as Indra did towards (the Danava) Samvara. Partha covered the Panchala king with a thick shower of arrows.

43. Thereupon arose a great uproar among the Panchala-host like the roar of a great lion when springing on the leader of a herd of elephants.

44. Seeing Aryuna rush towards the Panchala-king for slaying him, greatly powerful Satyajit attacked him.

45. The two heroes (Aryuna and the Panchala-king) rushed upon each other like Indra upon Virochana; and they broke each other's ranks.

46. Thereupon Partha pierced Satyajit with ten keen arrows: at which feat the spectators were all amazed.

47—48. Thereupon the Panchala (Satyajit) covered Partha with one hundred arrows. That great car-warrior Aryuna rubbed his bow-string in order to increase the force and velocity of his arrows. Then covering the enemy with a shower of arrows, he cut off the bow of Satyajit and rushed upon the king (Drupada).

49. But Satyajit immediately took up another bow, and he soon pierced with arrows Partha, with his chariot, charioteer and horses.

50—51. Thus being assailed, the hero Partha did not forgive the Panchala (Satyajit). In order to kill him soon, he (Aryuna) pierced with a number of arrows

(his enemy's) horses, flags, bow, clenched fist, charioteer and the attendant at his back. Seeing his bow repeatedly cut down,

52. And his horses slain as often, he (Satyajit) desisted from the fight. Seeing Satyajit thus desisted from the fight,

53. The king (Drupada) attacked the Pandava (Aryuna) with great speed. Then that foremost of victorious heroes, Aryuna, fought a wonderful battle.

54. Cutting off his bow and felling his flag-staff on the ground, he pierced his enemy's horses and charioteer with five arrows.

55. Thereupon that son of Kunti (Aryuna), throwing aside his bow and taking off his quiver, took up a scimitar and sent forth a leonine shout.

56. He suddenly leaped from his chariot and fell on that of the Panchala-king. Dhananjaya (Aryuna) stood fearlessly on the chariot of the Panchala-king,

57. He seized him (Drupada) as Garuda seizes a huge snake after agitating the waters of the deep sea. Thereupon all the Panchalas ran away in all directions.

58. Showing the prowess of arms to all the hosts, Dhananjaya (Aryuna), sending forth a leonine shout, came out (of the Panchala ranks).

59. Seeing him return (with his captive), the princes laid waste the capital of the illustrious Drupada.

Aryuna said :—

60. This best of kings Drupada is a relative of the Kuru heroes. Therefore, O Bhima, do not kill his soldiers. Let us only give our preceptor's remuneration.

Vaishampayana said :—

61. O king thus prevented by Aryuna, the greatly strong Bhima, though unsatiated with the battle, refrained from the act of slaughter.

62. O best of the Bharata race, thus seizing Jagmasena Drupada in the battle with his ministers, they offered him to Drona.

63. (Seeing the king) humiliated and deprived of wealth and brought under his complete control, Drona remembered his former hostility towards him, and he thus spoke to him,

64. "Your kingdom and your capital have been laid waste by me. Receiving your life at my hand, do you desire to revive our old friendship?"

65. Having said this, he smiled a little and again said, "O hero, do not fear for your life. We are Brahmanas that are ever-forgiving."

66. O best of Kshatryas, from that day when in your boyhood you played with me in the hermitage, my love and affection for you have grown up.

67. O king, I ask for your friendship again. O king, I grant you as a boon half of your kingdom.

68. O Jagmasena, how can one be a friend of a king who is not a king? And therefore I retain half of your kingdom.

69. You become the king of the territory lying on the southern side of the Bhagirathi, and I become that of the northern side. O Panchala, if it pleases you, know me henceforth as your friend."

Drupada said :—

70. O Brahmana, this is not (at all) wonderful to the men of noble soul and great prowess. I am pleased with you, and I desire to give you everlasting pleasure.

Vaishampayana said :—

71. O descendant of Bharata, having been thus addressed, Drona released him (Drupada); and cheerfully performing the usual offices of regard, he bestowed upon him the half of the kingdom.

72. (Receiving the territory named) Makandi with many towns and cities, situated on the banks of the Ganges, Drupada lived in the best of cities, called Kamilya.

73. After his defeat by Drona, he (Drupada) also ruled over the southern Panchala up to the banks of the Sarmanawati river.

74. He was well convinced that he could not defeat Drona by Kshatrya might alone, —he being very much inferior to him in Brahma (spiritual) power.

75. He therefore wandered over the world to find the means of obtaining a son (who could defeat Drona). (Meanwhile) Drona lived at Ahichatra,

76. Which was full of towns and cities, and which was bestowed upon him by Partha after defeating the hero (Drupada).

Thus ends the hundred and fortieth chapter, the chastisement of Drupada, in the Sambhava of the Adi Purva.

CHAPTER CXLI.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O king, after the expiration of a year (from this), the son of Pandu, Yudhishthira, was installed as the heir-apparent,

2. For he was noted for his firmness, fortitude, patience, benevolence, frankness and unswerving honesty of heart.

3. Thereupon, within a very short time, the son of Kunti, Yudhishthira, overshadowed the deeds of his father by his good behaviour, manners, and close application to business.

4. The Pandava Vrikodara began to receive lessons from Sankarsana (Balarama) in sword-fight, club-fight and car-fight.

5. At the end of his education (in arms), he became in strength equal to Dumutsena. He remained in harmony with his brothers, becoming great in prowess.

6—7. Aryuna became famous for the firmness of his grasp (of weapons), for his lightness of motion, his precision of aim and his proficiency in Kshura, Naracha, Valla, Vipatha and other straight, crooked and heavy weapons. And Drona said that there was none in the world who was equal to Vivatsa (Aryuna) in lightness of hand and in general proficiency.

8. Thereupon (one day) Drona thus spoke to Gudakesha (Aryuna) before the assembly of Kauravas. In the time of yore Agasta had a disciple in the science of arms,

9—10. Who was known as Agnivisha. He was my preceptor and I was his disciple. O descendant of Bharata, I obtained from him by asceticism a weapon, known by the name of Brahmāsira, which can never be futile and which is like thunder itself and capable of consuming the whole earth. That weapon from what I have done may now descend from disciple to disciple.

11. Giving it to me, my preceptor said, "O son of Varadwaja, do not hurl this weapon against any human being and against one who possesses but little energy."

12. O hero, (Aryuna), you have obtained that celestial weapon (from me); none else deserves it. But O Vishampata, obey the command of that best of Rishis (Agnivisha).

13. Now give your preceptor's Dakshina before all your relatives and cousins. Falguni (Aryuna) promised to the preceptor "To give (the Dakshina)."

14. Drona said, "O sinless one, you must fight with me when I fight with you."

That best of Kurus promised this also to Drona.

15. Touching his feet, he went away northwards. There arose a great shout covering the whole earth, bounded by the belt of sea.

16—21. (It was) "There was no bowman in the whole world equal to Aryuna." Pandava Dhananjaya became proficient in club-fight, sword-fight, car-fight and bow-fight; Sahadeva, obtaining the whole science of morality and duties from the lord of all science Drona, remained obedient to his brothers. Nakula, the favourite of his brothers, taught by Drona, became known as a skilful warrior and a car-warrior. Aryuna and the other Pandava princes became so powerful that they killed in battle the great Sauvira who had performed a sacrifice extending for three years, (remaining) undaunted by the attacks of the Gandharvas. The Yavana king, whom the powerful Pandu could not bring under subjection, was (also) brought by Aryuna under control. The greatly powerful and ever showing disregard for the Kurus,

22—23. The king, named Vipala of the Sauvaras was slain by the intelligent Partha. Aryuna also subjugated by means of his arrows king Sumitra of Sauvira, also known as Dattamitra, who always sought for an encounter with him. The third of the Pandava princes, assisted by Bhima, on only one single car, subjugated all the kings of the East backed by ten thousand cars.

24. In the same way Dhananjaya conquered on a single car the whole of the South ;

25. And he sent immense booty to the kingdom of the Kurus. Thus did the foremost of men, the illustrious Pandavas,

26. Conquering the kingdoms of others, extended their own kingdom in the time of yore. Seeing the great prowess and strength of these mighty bow-men,

27. King Dhritarastra's mind became suddenly poisoned against the Pandavas. From that day that king became filled with so much anxiety that he could not sleep.

Thus ends the hundred and forty-first chapter, the pensiveness of Dhritarastra, in the Sambava of the Adi Parva

CHAPTER CXLII.

(SAMBHAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Hearing that the heroic sons of Pandu were endued with great energy and prowess, the king Dhritarastra became very miserable with anxiety.

2. Thereupon summoning that best of ministers, Kanika, learned in politics and expert in counsels, Dhritarastra said :—

Dhritarastra said :—

3. O best of Brahmanas, the Pandavas are daily over-shadowing the earth. I am very jealous of them. Should I have peace or war with them? O Kanika, advise me truly; I shall do your bidding.

Vaishampayana said :—

4. That best of Brahmanas freely answered him in these pointed words, well-agreeing with the import of politics.

Kanika said :—

5. O sinless king, listen to me as I answer. O best of the Kurus, you should not be angry with me on hearing what I say.

6. Kings should ever be ready with upraised sceptor (to rule), and they should ever extend their prowess. Carefully avoiding all faults of theirs, they should ceaselessly watch for the faults of others.

7. If the king is ever ready with his uplifted sceptor, every one fears him. Therefore he should ever have recourse to his sceptor (chastisement) in all he does.

8. He should so act as others (his enemies) may not find any fault in him. But he should see the faults (defects) of others. He should keep his resources concealed as does a tortoise his members of body.

9. Having begun a particular act, he should ever completely accomplish it. A thorn, if not wholly extracted, produces a fostering sore.

10-11. The killing of a harmful foe is always praiseworthy. If he be powerful, if he be escaping, if he be a great warrior, one should watch for the hour of his disaster, and then kill him without any scruple. O son, if the enemy be weak, still he should not be scorned. A spark of fire can consume a forest if it can spread from object to object.

12. They (kings) should sometimes feign deafness and blindness; for if they are incapable of chastising, they should pretend not to notice the faults. They should then consider their bows as made of straw, but they should be as watchful as a herd of deer sleeping (in the woods).

13. When your enemy will be in your hands, destroy him by any means, open or secret. Do not show him any mercy, though he seeks your protection.

14. An old enemy should be killed even by winning him over by wealth. Thus you must be free of anxiety, for there is no fear from a dead man.

15. Destroy all the three, five and seven resources of the enemy; you must destroy them (enemies) by completely uprooting them.

16. Then you should destroy their allies and partizans. If the root (principal) is destroyed, they (allies) can never exist.

17. If the root of the lord of the forest (tree) is uprooted, its branches and twigs can never exist as before. Carefully concealing your own weakness and watching those of your enemies,

18. O king, you should rule over your kingdom, ever being very watchful. By maintaining the perpetual fire, by sacrifices, by brown clothes, by matted locks and skin cloth, 19—20. You should first gain the confidence of men (your enemies); and then you should spring upon them like a wolf. It is said that in earning wealth, hypocrisy is a cheap means. As a hooked staff is used to bend down a bough of a tree to pluck the ripe fruits, so this method should be adopted in destroying one's own enemies.

21. Carry your enemy on your shoulder till the time comes when you can throw him down and break him into pieces as a earthen vessel is broken being thrown on stones.

22. An enemy should never be allowed to escape, even if he piteously addresses you. You ought not to show him any mercy; he must be slain at once.

23. Enemies should be destroyed by the arts of conciliation, or the expenditure of money, or by producing disunion amongst his allies, or by the employment of every means in your power.

Dhritarastra said :—

24. Tell me in detail how can a foe be destroyed by the arts of conciliation, or the expenditure of money or by producing disunion or by the employment of force.

Kanika said :—

25. O king, hear what happened in the days of yore. O great king, there dwelt in the forest a jackal well-acquainted with the science of politics.

26. The jackal was wise and mindful of his own interest. He lived in the company of four friends, namely a tiger, a wolf, a mouse and a mongoose.

27. They saw in the woods a strong deer, the leader of a herd, whom however they could not seize for his fleetness and strength. Thereupon they held a consultation.

The Jackal said :—

28. O tiger, you have made many attempts to seize this deer, but your efforts were in vain, for this deer is young, fleet and intelligent.

29. Let the mouse go and eat into its feet when it is asleep. When his feet will be thus eaten, let the tiger go and seize it.

30. Then we shall all eat it with a delightful heart.

Kanika said :—

Hearing these words of the jackal, they carefully did what he said.

31. The feet of the deer being eaten up by the mouse, he was killed by the tiger. The jackal said, "Blessed be you! Go and perform your ablutions. I shall look after it (the deer)"

32. Hearing what the jackal said, they all went to a river. The jackal waited there, deeply meditating what he should do (next).

33. The greatly strong tiger came first after his bath, and saw the jackal sitting in a pensive mind.

The tiger said :—

34. O greatly wise one, what are you pondering over? You are the foremost of all intelligent persons. Let us enjoy ourselves (now) by feasting on this carcass.

The jackal said :—

35. O mighty-armed one, hear what the mouse has said. (He said) "Fie on the strength of the king of beasts (tiger). The deer has been killed by me;

36. He will gratify his hunger to-day by the might of my arms." When he has thus boasted, I, for my part, do not wish to touch this food.

The Tiger said :—

37. If the mouse has really said this, my sense is awakened. I shall from this day kill with the might of my own arms the beasts of the forest and feast on their flesh.

Kanika said :—

Having said this he went away into the forest.

38. At this time the mouse came there. Seeing him come, the jackal thus spoke to him.

The Jackal said:—

39. Blessed be you, O mouse. Listen to what the mongoose has said. (He said) "The flesh of this deer is poisoned (by the touch of the tiger). I shall not eat it.

40. If you give me permission I shall eat the mouse."

Kanika said:—

Having heard this, the mouse became alarmed, and he quickly entered his hole.

41. O king, then after his bath came there the wolf. On his coming, the jackal spoke to him thus.

The Jackal said:—

42. The king of the beasts (tiger) has become angry with you. No good will come to you. He will be soon here with his wife. Do now as you please.

Kanika said:—

43. The wolf, ever fond of animal food, fled contracting his body into the smallest dimensions; and thus was he got rid of by the jackal.

44. At this time the mongoose came. O great king, the jackal thus spoke to the mongoose in the forest.

The Jackal said:—

45. I have defeated others with the might of my arms, and they have already fled away. Fight with me first, and then eat this flesh as you please.

The Mongoose said:—

46. When the king of the beasts (tiger) the wolf, and the intelligent mouse have all been defeated by you,—heroes as they are, you seem to be a greater hero than they. I do not desire (therefore) to fight with you.

Kanika said:—

Saying this he went away.

47. When thus they all went away, the jackal was much pleased in his heart for the success of his policy, and he alone ate the flesh (of that deer).

48—49. If kings act in this way, they can always be happy. Thus should the timid, by exciting their fears, the courageous by the arts of conciliation, the covetous by gift of wealth and the inferiors and the equals by the exhibition of prowess, be brought into subjugation. O king, besides what I have said, listen to something else that I say.

50. If your son, friend, brother and father, or even your preceptor, become your enemy, if you desire prosperity, you should

51. Destroy him by curses, by incantations, by gift of wealth, by poison or by deception. He should never be neglected out of scorn.

52—53. If both the parties be equal and success uncertain, then he who acts with diligence grows in prosperity. If the preceptor himself be vain, ignorant of what should be done and what should be left undone and vicious in his ways, even he should be chastised. If you are angry, show yourself as if you are not so, speaking then with even smiles.

54. O descendant of Bharata, never reprove any one with indications of anger. Speak soft words before you hit (your enemy), (speak soft words) even when you are hitting (your enemy).

55. After hitting (your enemy), pity the victim, and grieve for him, and even shed tears. Securing confidence (of the enemy) by conciliation, by gift of wealth and by long kind behaviour,

56. You must destroy him if he does not walk aright. The gratly sinful men live as if they are very virtuous.

57. He conceals his sins, as black clouds cover the mountains. You should burn the house of those that should be killed by you.

58—59. You should never permit beggars, atheists and thieves to live in your kingdom. By a sudden sally or pitched battle, by poison, by gift of wealth, or by any means, you must destroy your enemy. You can act with the greatest cruelty. You should make your teeth sharp (enough) to bite with fatal effect. You must destroy him so effectually that he may not again raise up his head. You should always fear even those from whom you have no fear.

60. If you do not fear a man, by him your root may be destroyed (your ruin may come). You should never trust the faithless, nor should you trust too much those that are faithful.

61. If fear (enmity) is engendered in a man whom you trust, your root may be destroyed (your total ruin may come). The spies should be first carefully tested of their fidelity, and then they should be appointed in your own (kingdom) or in (the kingdom of others).

62. The spies in the kingdoms of others should be scoundrels, and persons in the garbs of ascetics. They should be (placed) in gardens, in places of amusements, in temples,

63. In drinking-halls, in streets and with all the Thirthas (state officials), in places of sacrifice, near wells, on mountains, in forests,

64. In all places where people congregate, and on rivers. They should move about in these places; they should be humble in speech, but their hearts must be as sharp as the razors.

65—67. When you are engaged in doing a very cruel and terrible act, you should talk with smiles on your lips. If you desire for prosperity, you must (adopt these acts, namely) fold your hands, be humble, take oath, use conciliation, worship the feet of others by lowering your head, and inspire hope. A man of policy should be like a tree decked with flowers but bearing no fruits. If there be any fruit, it must be inaccessible and at a great height. If ripe, they must look raw. Such a man never fades Tribarga, (Dharma, Artha and Kama) has three evils knit together (with three good),

68. Extracting the good from it, the evil should be avoided. He who practices virtue has also two diseases, (evils to cope with).

69—70. (Namely,) the want of wealth and the neglect of pleasure. Those in pursuit of pleasure are made unhappy for the neglect of the two others. And those who pursue pleasure suffer for the want of virtue and wealth. Therefore you should pursue virtue, wealth and pleasure in such a way that you may not have to suffer in any way. With humiliation and attention, without jealousy and solicitations, you should in all sincerity consult with Brahmanas in accomplishing your purpose. When you are fallen, you should raise yourself by any means, either gentle or violent.

71. When you have raised yourself, you should practise virtue. The man who has never met with any calamity can never have prosperity.

72. This is seen in the life of one who has passed through calamities. He who is afflicted with sorrow should be consoled by the recitation of old history.

73. The ignorant (should be consoled) by the hope of future prosperity and the learned by pleasing offices. He who quietly reposes after concluding a treaty with an enemy, considering himself crowned with success,

74. Is like a person who awakes after having fallen down from the top of a tree where he slept. Counsel should be kept concealed without the fear of calumny.

75—77. And while seeing every thing with the eyes of his spies, he should conceal his own thoughts before the spies of others. Like a fisherman who becomes rich by catching and killing fish, a king grows prosperous by tearing the vitals of his enemy and by doing some violent acts. The strength of your enemy as represented by his force should always be completely destroyed, by ploughing it up, by mowing it down or by afflicting it with disease, starvation and want of drink. A person in want never goes to a person in affluence. When your purpose has been fulfilled, you need not go to the man whom you have hitherto looked to for its accomplishment.

78—79. Therefore, when you do a thing, do it completely, leaving nothing to be done. He who desires prosperity, should diligently exert to seek for allies and means in order to conduct his war. He should act in such a way that both friends and foes may not know his intention before the commencement of the act.

80. Let them know it when the act has been commenced or ended. As long as danger does not come, so long only should you look as if you are afraid.

81—82. Seeing the danger already come, you should grapple it courageously. The man, who trusts his enemy who is already under his control, invites his own death as a mule by her conception. You should consider the future acts as already arrived,

83. Else on account of the loss of reason, you may overlook an important point (in accomplishing the act). He who desires prosperity, should always exert himself with energy and prudence,

84. Adopting his measures (suited) to time and place, destiny and Dharma, Artha and Kama. It is well known that time and place produce the greatest good.

85. If an enemy is despised and overlooked, he may soon grow like a palm tree extending its roots, or like a spark of fire in the deep forest that may soon flame up to a great conflagration.

86. As a small fire, if fed with fagots, soon becomes capable of consuming all, so a man, who increases his power by making alliances, soon becomes capable of vanquishing even the strongest foe.

87. The hope, that you give to your enemy, should be long deferred to be fulfilled. When the time comes for fulfilling it, invent some pretext to defer it still. Let the pretext appear as founded on some reason, and let that reason (also) appear as founded on some other reason.

88. Unpitied and sharp, concealed in their leathern cases, striking when opportunity comes, sweeping of all hair, kings should resemble razors in the matter of destroying their enemy.

89. O supporter of the Kuru dignity, act with the Pandavas and others as policy dictates, and (act) in such a way that you may not have to repent in future.

90. I have not the least doubt that you are endued with every blessing and good fortune, O king, therefore, protect yourself from the sons of Pandu.

91. O king, the sons of Pandu are stronger than their cousins (your sons). O chastiser of foes, I tell you plainly what you ought to do.

92. O king, hear it with your sons, and hearing it exert yourself. O king, act in such a way that you may not have any fear from the sons of Pandu. Adopt such measures in accordance with statesmanship, that you may not have to repent in future.

Vaishampayana said :—

93. Having said this Kanika went away to his house and the descendant of Kuru Dhritarastra became pensive and sad.

Thus ends the hundred and forty-second chapter, the counsel of Kanika, in the Sambhava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXLIII.

(JATUGRIHA PARVA.)

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon after consulting with one another the son of Suvala (Sakuni) king Duryodhana, Dushashana and Karna formed an evil conspiracy.

2. They resolved with the sanction of the descendant of Kuru the king Dhritarasta to burn to death Kunti with her sons.

3. The wise and learned Vidura, capable of reading the heart (of men) by external signs, came to know from their demeanours the intention of those wicked-minded men.

4. Thereupon, the sinless Vidura, whose soul was enlightened with true knowledge and who was ever devoted to the good of the Pandavas, resolved that Kunti should escape with her sons.

5. Thereupon he procured a boat with machinery and flags, and which was strong enough to withstand wind and waves. He then spoke to Kunti thus,

Vidura said :—

6. This Dhritarastra is born to destroy the fame and offspring of our (Kuru) race. Being wicked-minded, he is going to cast off eternal virtue.

7. O amiable lady, I have kept ready in the river a boat, capable of withstanding both wind and waves. By it escape with your sons from the net of death.

Vaishampayana said :—

8. O best of the Bharata race, having heard this, Kunti became deeply grieved. She then with her sons got into the boat and went over the Ganges.

9. Then leaving the boat according to the advice of Vidura, the Pandavas entered a forest taking the wealth that was given to them.

10. For some reasons a Nishada woman came to the house of lac and though (she was) innocent, she was burnt to death with her five sons.

11. The worst of Mlechas, the sinful Purochana, was also burnt to death. Thus were deceived the sons of Dhritarastra with their counsellors.

12. Thus also were the illustrious sons of Kunti with their mother saved by the advice of Vidura ; but the people did not know that they were alive.

13. Thereupon the citizens of Varanavata, seeing the house of lac burnt down, became exceedingly grieved.

14. They sent messenger to the king to tell him all that had happened, and they said, "Your great end has been achieved, you have burnt to death the Pandavas.

15. O descendant of Kuru, your desire is (now) fulfilled ; enjoy the kingdom with your sons." Having heard this, Dhritarastra with his sons expressed their sorrow.

16. He performed the last rites of the Pandavas with his friends and relatives, with Khattwa (Vidura) and that foremost of the Kurus, Bhishma.

Janamejaya said :—

17. O best of the twice-born, I desire to hear in detail the account of the burning of the house of lac and the escape of the Pandavas.

18. That was a cruel act of theirs, acting under the counsel of the wicked. Recite the history to me,—all as it happened. I am full of great curiosity.

Vaishampayana said :—

19. O chastiser of foes, O king, listen to me. I shall describe to you the burning of the lac-house and the escape of the Pandavas.

20. Seeing Bhimasena exceedingly strong and Dhananjaya (Aryuna) highly accomplished, Duryodhana became pensive and sad.

21. Thereupon the son of the sun, Karna, and the son of Suvala, Sakuni, tried by various means to cause the death of the Pandavas.

22. The Pandavas, however, counteracted them one after the other as they were made, and in obedience to the counsel of Vidura, they never talked it afterwards.

23. O descendant of Bharata, seeing the sons of Pandu, endued with all accomplishments, the citizens began to speak of their accomplishments in every place of resort.

24. Assembling in court-yards and in other places of meeting, they talked of the eldest son of Pandu as the person fit for governing the kingdom.

25. (They said), "The King Dhritarastra, though possessed of the eye of knowledge, did not obtain the kingdom, because he was blind. How can he be king (now)?"

26. And the son of Santanu, Bhishma, is of rigid vows and devoted to truth; having relinquished the kingdom before, he will never accept it now.

27. We shall therefore with all proper ceremonies, install the eldest Pandava (Yudhisthira) endued with youth, accomplished in battle, versed in the Vedas, and is truthful and kind.

28. Worshipping the son of Santanu, Bhishma, and virtuous Dhritarastra, he (Yudhisthira) will certainly maintain Bhishma and Dhritarastra with all his sons."

29. The wicked-minded Duryodhana, hearing these words of the men attached towards Yudhisthira, was exceedingly grieved.

30. The wicked-minded man was much afflicted, and he could not bear their words. Being inflamed with jealousy, he went to Dhritarastra.

31. Finding him alone, he duly saluted him with reverence, and having been distressed by the partiality of the citizens (towards Yudhisthira), he spoke thus :—

Duryodhana said :—

32. O father, I have heard (the citizens) uttering words of ill-omen. Passing you and Bhishma by, they desire the son of Pandu to be their king.

33. Bhishma will give his consent to this, for he will not desire to rule the kingdom.

It seems the citizens are desiring to inflict a great injury on us.

34. Pandu formerly obtained the ancestral kingdom by virtue of his own accomplishments. Because you were blind, you did not get the kingdom, though you have every accomplishment to obtain it.

35. If the son of Pandu now obtains the kingdom as his inheritance from Pandu, then his son will obtain it after him; that son's son also and so on,—it will thus for ever descend on Pandu's line.

36. We shall then with all our sons be excluded from the royal line. O lord of the world, we shall be disregarded and hated by all the people.

37. Becoming dependants on others for our food, we shall suffer perpetual distress, O king, therefore, adopt such counsel that is consonant with statesmanship.

38. O king, however the people might be unfavourable towards us if you had obtained the kingdom before, we would have certainly succeeded to it.

Thus ends the hundred and forty-third chapter, the jealousy of Duryodhana, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXLIV.

(JATUGRIHA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having heard these words of his son and also all that Kanika had said, the king possessed of the eye of knowledge,

2. Dhritarastra became afflicted with sorrow and his mind was full of misgivings. Then Duryodhana, Karna, the son of Suvala Sakuni,

3. Dushashana, these four held a consultation together. Then Duryodhana spoke thus to the king Dhritarastra,

4. "Send the Pandavas by some contrivance to the city of Baranavata. Then we will have no fear of them."

5. Dhritarastra having heard these words of his son, reflected for a moment and then spoke to Duryodhana thus,

6. "Pandua was ever devoted to virtue; he always behaved dutifully towards all his relatives but particularly towards me.

7. He cared not for food or dress or the enjoyments of the world, he was devoted to me and gave me every thing even the kingdom.

8. His son (Yudhisthira) is as much devoted to virtue as he was; he is possessed of every accomplishment; he is illustrious; he is the favourite of the people.

9. How can we exile him by force from the kingdom of his fore-fathers,—specially as he possesses allies?

10. The counsellors and the soldiers, and their sons and grandsons, all were specially cherished and maintained by Pandu.

11. They being thus formerly benefitted by Pandu, O son, why should not the people of the city kill us all with our relatives and friends for the sake of Yudhisthira?

Duryodhana said:—

12—13. O father, what you say is perfectly true. (But) on account of the evil that is likely in store for us in the future, we think we must conciliate the people by bestowing wealth and honours. Thus they would surely side with us for this proof of our power. O king, the ministers and the treasury are now under our control,

14. Therefore, you should banish the Pandavas to the city of Varanavata by some gentle means.

15. O king, when I shall be installed as king, then, O descendant of Bharata, Kunti with her son may again come back.

Dhritarastra said:—

16. O Duryodhana, this is the very thought that exists in my mind, but from its sinfulness, I could not give it out.

17. Neither Bhishma, nor Drona, nor Kattwa (Vidura), nor Goutama, (Kripa) will ever sanction the banishment of the sons of Kunti.

18. O son, in their eyes we (Kurus) and the Pandavas are equal. Those wise and virtuous men will make no difference between us.

19. O son, (if we do this), why should we not deserve death at the hands of the Kurus and of those illustrious men (Bhishma and others),—nay of the whole world?

Duryodhana said:—

20. Bhishma is always neutral; the son of Drona (Ashwathama) is in my side. There is no doubt Drona will also be in that side in which his son will be.

21. The son of Saradwatta, Kripa, will surely be on the side in which these two will be. He will never abandon Drona and his nephew (sister's son, Ashwathama).

22. Kattwa (Vidura) is dependant on us for his livelihood, although he is covertly on the side of the enemy (the Pandavas).

He alone can do us no harm, (even) if he sides the Pandavas.

23. (Therefore) without any fear, exile the sons of Pandu with their mother to Varanavata. Take such steps as they may go there this very day.

24. Extinguish by this act the grief that consumes me like a fire, that robs me of my sleep and that pierces my heart like a terrible dart.

Thus ends the hundred and forty-fourth chapter, the consultation of Duryodhana, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXLV.

(JATUGRIHA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Thereupon King Duryodhana with his brothers began slowly to win over the people to his side by bestowing on them wealth and honours.

2. One day in the (royal) Court, some clever ministers, as instructed by Dhritarastra, described the city of Varanavata as a (most) charming place.

3. (They said), "The festival of Pashupati (Siva) has begun in the city of Varanavata, and the concourse of people there is now great.

4. The procession is the most grand in the world; and all gems and jewels (now) there delight the heart." Thus did they (counsellors) under instruction from Dhritarastra, speak (of the city).

5. O king, while they were speaking of the charming city of Varanavata, the Pandavas desired in their mind to go there.

6. When the king Dhritarastra knew that their (Pandavas') curiosity had been awakened, then the son of Ambika, (Dhritarastra) spoke thus to the Pandavas.

Dhritarastra said:—

7. My men tell me daily again and again that the city of Varanavata is the most charming in the world.

8. O sons, if you desire to see the festival of Varanavata, go (there) with your friends and followers, and enjoy yourselves like the celestials.

9. Bestow gems and jewels on all the Brahmanas and the musicians (there). Sport there as the effulgent celestials.

10. Enjoy there for sometime as much happiness as you like at pleasure, and then return to Hastinapur.

Vaishampayana said :—

11. Yudhishthira, understanding the motives of Dhritarastra and knowing himself weak and friendless, said, "Be it so."

12—14. Then addressing the son of Santanu, Bhisma, the wise Vidura, Drona, Valhika, the Kaurava Somadatta, Kripa, Ashwathama, Bhurisrava, and other respected counsellors, Brahmanas, ascetics, priests, citizens, and the illustrious Gandhari, Yudhishthira slowly and humbly spoke thus.

Yudhishthira said :—

15. We go with our friends and followers to the charming and populous city of Varanavata at the command of Dhritarastra.

16. Give us cheerfully your benedictions, so that, acquiring prosperity with it, we may not be touched by sin.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Having been thus addressed by the son of Pandu, all the Kauravas cheerfully pronounced blessings on them, saying,

18. "O sons of Pandu, let all the elements bless you on your way and let not the slightest evil befall you."

19. Having performed propitiatory rites for obtaining the kingdom and making all other preparations, the princes (the Pandavas) started for Varanavata.

Thus ends the hundred and forty-fifth chapter, the departure for Varanavata, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXLVI.

(JATUGRIHA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O descendant of Bharata, when the king thus addressed the sons of Pandu, the wicked-minded Duryodhana became exceedingly happy.

2. O best of the Bharata race, he summoned in private, Purochana and taking up his right hand, he thus spoke to that counsellor.

Duryodhana said :—

3. O Purochana, this world, full of wealth, is mine. It is equally yours with me. (Therefore), you should protect it.

4. I have no other more trustworthy supporter and counsellor than you with whom I can consult.

5. O sire, keep my counsel (a secret), and destroy my enemy by some clever device. Accomplish, what I ask you to do.

6. The Pandavas have been sent by Dhritarastra to Varanavata. They will sport there in the festival at the command of Dhritarastra.

7. Do that by which you can reach Varanavata this very day on a car drawn by swift asses.

8. Going there, erect a quadrangle palace at the outskirts of the city, (which should be) rich in materials and furniture. Guard it (also) well.

9. Use in it (in erecting that house,) hemp, resin, and all other inflammable materials that are procurable.

10. Mixing a little earth with Ghee, oil, fat and a large quantity of lac, plaster the wall with it.

11. Place carefully all over that house hemp, oil, Ghee lac and wood

12. In such a way that the Pandavas and other men may not even with scrutiny see them, or conclude that it is made of inflammable materials.

13. Erecting such a house and worshipping the Pandavas with great reverence, make them live in it with Kunti and all their friends.

14. Place there for the Pandavas seats, conveyances and beds of best workmanship, as ordered by my father.

15. Manage all this in a way so that none in the city of Varanavata may know it, till the end we have in view is accomplished.

16. Knowing that they are sleeping in that house in confidence and without fear, set fire to it, beginning from the gate.

17. The people will think that they have been burnt to death in that burning house; and therefore none will be able to blame us for the death of the Pandavas.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. Purochana promised to that Kaurava (Duryodhana) to carry out all by saying, "Be it so;" and he then went (away) on a swift car drawn by asses.

19. O king, ever obedient to Duryodhana, he went without loss of time. Purochana did all that the prince said, (asked him to do.)

Thus ends the hundred and forty-sixth chapter, the instructions to Purochana, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXLVII.

(JATUGRIHA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. The Pandavas got on their cars yoked with fine horses having the speed like that of the wind. When ascending (the car), they touched in grief the feet of Bhishma, of the king Dhritarastra, of the high souled Drona, Kripa and Vidura and of all the other old men.

3. Thus duly saluting all the elders of the Kurus race, embracing the equals, being saluted by even the boys,

4. Taking leave of all the mothers (elderly ladies), walking round them respectfully, and bidding farewell to all the citizens, they (the Pandavas) started for Varanavata.

5. The greatly intelligent Vidura and other best of the Kurus, and also the citizens followed these best of men (for some distance) in sorrow.

6. Seeing the sons of Pandu afflicted with sorrow and in grief, some of the men of the city spoke thus,

7. "The king (Dhritarastra) sees not things with an equal eye. He is always wicked-minded. The Kuru Dhritarastra does not cast his eye on virtue.

8. The Pandava (Yudhisthira), the best of all strong men Bhima, or Dhananjaya (Aryuna) will never commit the sin of rebellion.

9. What these illustrious (princes) would do, the two sons of Madri will also do. They have inherited the kingdom from their father, but Dhritarastra can not bear them.

10. How could Bhishma sanction such an act of great sin? How could he sanction their exile to that wretched city?

11. The son of Santanu, Vichitravirja, and the descendant of Kuru, the royal sage Pandu, were to us like our fathers.

12. Now that best of men (Pandus), having gone to heaven, Dhritarastra can not bear these princes, his sons.

13. We can not sanction this. Therefore leaving this excellent city and our houses, we shall go to the place where Yudhisthira is going."

14. The king of virtue, Yudhisthira, reflected for some time, and then addressed in sorrow the citizens who were talking thus in grief,

15. "The king of the world (Dhritarastra) is our father, (he is) worthy of our regard, (he is) our preceptor and our superior. It is our duty to accomplish with auspicious mind whatever he commands.

16. You are our friends; walking round us and making us happy with your blessings, return to your homes.

17. When the time comes for anything to be done for us by you, then accomplish all that is agreeable and beneficial to us."

18. Having been thus addressed, the citizens walked round the Pandavas and offered them their blessings. They then returned to the city.

19. When the citizens had left (the Pandavas), Vidura, learned in all the precepts of virtue, thus spoke to the eldest Pandava in order to warn him (of his danger.)

20. The learned man (Vidura) conversant with the (Mlecha) Jargon, spoke thus to the learned man (Yudhisthira), also conversant with the (Mlecha) jargon (in that Mlecha jargon),—"He who knows the schemes of others (enemies) according to the dictates of political science, knowing it, should act in such a way as to avoid all dangers.

21. He, who knows that there are sharp weapons capable of cutting the body though not made of iron, and understands also the means of warding them off, can never be injured by the enemy.

22. He lives who protects himself by the knowledge that neither the consumer of straw and wood nor the drier of dew burns the inmates of a hole in the deep forest.

23. The blind man sees not his way, (for) the blind man has no knowledge of direction. He who has no firmness never acquires prosperity. Knowing this, keep yourself always alert.

24. The man, who takes a weapon (which is) not made of iron (and which is) given him by his enemy, can escape from fire by making his house like the hole of a jackal.

25. By travelling a man may know the ways, and by the star he can ascertain the direction. He that keeps his five (senses) under control can never be oppressed by his enemy."

26. Having been thus addressed, the king of virtue, the son of Pandu, Yudhisthira, thus replied to that foremost of learned men, the illustrious Vidura,

27. "I have understood you." Vidura, thus having instructed the Pandavas, walked round them, and bidding them farewell, returned to his house.

28. Vidura, Bhishma and citizens having gone back, Kunti came to Ajatsatru (Yudhisthira) and spoke thus,

29. "What Khattwa (Vidura) said to you in the midst of many people, so indistinctly as if he said nothing, and what you said similarly (in reply) is not understood by us.

30. If it is not improper for us to know it, I desire to hear all that passed between you and him."

Yudhisthira said :—

31. The virtuous Vidura said to me that I must know that the house (at Varanavata) is made of inflammable materials. (He further said) the way of escape will also be known to you."

32. He told me, "The man who is self-controlled wins (the sovereignty) of the whole world." I replied to Vidura, "I have understood you."

Vaishampayana said :—

33. The Pandavas started for Varanavata on the eighth day of the month of Falguna when the star Rohini was ascendant; and arriving there they saw the town and its people.

Thus ends the hundred and forty seventh chapter, the arrival at Varanavata, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXLVIII.

(JATUGRIHA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. Hearing that the sons of Pandu were coming, all the citizens came speedily by thousands, out of the town of Varanavata with joy, on various conveyances, taking with them all the auspicious things as directed by the Sastras in order to receive those best of men.

3. Coming to the sons of Kunti, the citizens of Varanavata surrounded them and blessed them by uttering the word Joya (victory).

4. Being thus surrounded by them, that best of men, the king of virtue, Yudhisthira, looked as effulgent as the thunderer (Indra) in the midst of the celestials.

5. Being welcomed by the citizens, and welcoming them in return, those sinless ones (the Pandavas) entered the populous and ornamented Varanavata.

6. Entering the town, O king, those heroes first went to the houses of the Brahmanas engaged in their proper duties.

7. Then those best of men went to the houses of the officials in charge of the town; then they went to the houses of the cariwarriors, then to those of the Vaisyas, and then even to those of the Sudras.

8. O best of the Bharata race, thus adored by the citizens, the Pandavas went to their house with Purochana walking at the head (of the procession.)

9. Purochana gave them first class food and drink, beds and carpets and seats.

10. Being served by Purochana and adored by the citizens, they (the Pandavas,) attired in costly robes, lived there.

11. When they had lived there for ten nights, Purochana spoke to them about the house, called "Blessed," though really (it was) unblest.

12. Thereupon those best of men, attired in (costly) garments, entered that house at the request of Purochana, as Guhyakas enter (those) in the Kailasha (mountain).

13. Inspecting that house, that foremost of all virtuous men, Yudhisthira, said to Bhimasena that the house was made of inflammable materials.

Yudhisthira said :—

14. O chasister of foes, from the smell of fat, and Ghee mixed with lac, it is evident, this house is made of inflammable materials.

15—16. By the help of trusted and well-skilled artizans, the enemies have nicely built this house with hemp, heath, straw, and bamboo, all soaked in Ghee. The sinful Purochana desires to burn me after inspiring me with confidence.

17. The wicked man, therefore, lives here, obedient to (the instruction of) Duryodhana. The greatly intelligent Vidura knew this danger. Therefore, O son of Pritha, he told me of it beforehand. Knowing this, that well-wisher of ours,

18. The younger brother of our father, out of affection for us, has told us about this house, so full of danger and constructed by the wretches under Duryodhana (who is) acting secretly (from behind.)

Bhima said :—

19. If this house is known to you as inflammable, then let us go to the place where we lived first.

Yudhisthira said :—

20. I think we should rather live here, seeming unsuspecting, but we must remain very cautious and keep our senses wide awake, and at the same time we must seek for some means of escape.

21. If Purochana finds from our demeanour that we have learnt his design, he may suddenly burn us to death by taking immediate steps.

22. Purochana cares very little for obloquy and sin. The wretch lives here in obedience to (the instructions) of Duryodhana.

23. If we are burnt, will grandfather Bhishma be angry? Why would he make the Kurus angry with him by showing his anger.

24. It may be that if we are burnt, our grandfather Bhishma and other best men of the Kuru race may be indignant for the sake of virtue.

25. If we fly from this place from the fear of being burnt, Duryodhana, covetous for kingdom, will surely bring about our death by means of spies.

26—27. The wicked Duryodhana has rank, power, friends, allies and wealth, but we have none. He can certainly destroy us by adopting many means. Deceiving this wretch and that wretch also, let us live in disguise for some time.

28. Let us lead a life of hunting, wandering over the earth. We shall then be aware of all the paths that exist for escape.

29. We shall dig in all secrecy, this very day a subterranean passage in our room. If we can keep it secret from others, fire will not be able to consume us.

30. Therefore we shall live here (and act in such a way) as Purochana and the citizens of Varanavata may not know what we are doing.

Thus ends the hundred and forty eighth chapter, the colloquy of Bhishma and Yudhishthira, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXLIX.

(JATUGRIHA) Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. O king, a friend of Vidura, a person well-skilled in mining, came and spoke thus to the Pandavas in private.

2. "I have been sent by Vidura; I am well-skilled in mining. Tell me what favourite works of the Pandavas I shall perform.

3. He trusts me and has said to me in private, "Go to the Pandavas and accomplish their good. What can I do for you?"

4. Purochana will set fire to the door of your house on the night of the fourteenth day of the black fortnight.

5. The desire of the wicked-minded Dhritarastra's son (Duryodhana) is to burn the best of men, the Pandavas, with their mother.

6. O Pandava, something was told to you by Vidura in the Mlecha language, and you too replied in that language. I tell you this as a credential." Yudhishthira, the truthful son of Kunti, thus spoke to him.

Yudhishthira said:—

7—8. O amiable one, I now know you as a dear and trusted friend of Vidura, true and ever devoted to him. There is no necessity (of ours) which that learned man (Vidura) does not know.

9. As you are his, so you are ours. Do not make any difference between him and us. We are as much yours as his. Protect us as that learned man (Vidura) protects us.

10. I know this inflammable house was built for me by Purochana at the command of the son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana).

11. That sinful, vicious and wicked-minded man, commanding wealth and allies, pursues us always (with his persecutions).

12. Save us with exertion from the impending conflagration. If we are burnt to death, the desire of Duryodhana will be fulfilled.

13. Here is that wicked man's well-stocked arsenal. This large house has been built abutting the high walls of the arsenal, without having any out-let.

14. This most cursed device which was made (for our destruction) was known to Vidura, and I was told of it by him.

15. The danger that Khattwa (Vidura) saw beforehand is now at our door. Save us from this without the knowledge of Purochana.

Vaishampayana said:—

16. The miner promised to do it by saying "Be it so"; and he began with care the work of excavation, and he (soon) made a subterranean passage.

17. He made that subterranean passage in the centre of the house. O descendant of Bharata, it was in a level with the floor and closed up by doors (planks).

18. For the fear of Purochana, its mouth was thus covered. He (Purochana) kept a constant watch at the gate of the house.

19. O king, they the (Pandavas) lived in the night in it with arms ready for use; and in the day they hunted from forests to forests.

20. Thus lived they very guardedly, deceiving Purochana with a show of trustfulness and contentment while in reality they were trustless and discontented.

21. The people of the city also did not know anything of these plans (of the Pandavas). Except the friend of Vidura, that good miner, none else knew any thing.

Thus ends the hundred and forty-ninth chapter, living in the lac-house, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CL.

(JATUGRIHA) Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having seen them living cheerfully and without suspicion for a full year, Purochana became exceedingly glad.

2. Seeing Purochana in that state of mind, the virtuous son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, thus spoke to Bhima, Aryuna and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva).

Yudhisthira said :—

3. The cruel-hearted and sinful Purochana thinks us very trustful, and he has thus been well-deceived. I think (therefore) that the time for our escape has come.

4. Setting fire to the arsenal, burning Purochana to death and leaving six bodies here, let us escape from this place, unobserved by any.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. On the occasion of an alms-giving, Kunti fed on a certain night a large number of Brahmanas. There came also a number of ladies.

6. O descendant of Bharata, they ate and drank and enjoyed themselves as much as they pleased. And they all returned home with the permission of Madhavi (Kunti.)

7. Impelled by fate, a Nishada woman with her five sons came there with the desire of obtaining food, and she enjoyed herself there at pleasure.

8—9. She drank wine and became drunk and incapable with her sons. O king, she with her sons slept in that house more dead than alive. O king, when all the people fell asleep, a violent storm began to blow on that night.

10. Bhima then set fire to the house where Purochana was asleep; then the Pandava set fire to the door of that lac-house.

11. Then he set fire to that house in several places. When the sons of Pandu were satisfied that the house had caught fire in all parts,

12. Those chastisers of foes, then speedily entered the subterranean passage with their mother. Thereupon the intense heat and the great roar of the fire

13. Awakened the people of the city; and seeing the house ablaze, they said in sorrowful face.

The citizens said :—

14. The wicked-minded (Purochana) built this house to destroy the relatives of his employer under the instructions of the Duryodhana, and he has (now) set fire to it.

15. Fie on Dhritarastra, whose understanding is so partial! He has burnt to death the heirs of Pandu, as if they were his enemies?

16. The wicked-minded, and sinful (Purochana), who has burnt those best of men (the Pandavas) innocent and unsuspecting, has himself been (also) burnt to death as fate would have it.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Thus bewailed the citizens of Varnavata. Surrounding the house, they remained for the whole night there.

18. The Pandavas however with their sorrowful mother came out of the subterranean passage and fled unobserved in haste.

19. Those chastisers of foes, the Pandavas, on account of sleeplessness and fear, could not proceed with speed with their mother.

20. O king of kings, Bhimasena, endowed with great speed and power, took upon his body his mother and all his brothers.

21—22. The greatly strong and energetic Vrikodara took his mother on his shoulder, the twins on his sides, and the two sons of Pritha, his brothers (Aryuna and Yudhisthira) on both his arms. He broke the trees by his breast and pressed the earth with his feet. He thus marched on.

Thus ends the hundred and fifty chapter, the burning of the lac-house, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLI.

(JATUGRIHA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. In the meanwhile, the learned Vidura sent to that forest a man of pure character whom he much trusted.

2. He went to the place where he was directed to go; and he saw the descendants of Kuru, the sons of Pandu, with their mother, measuring the depth of the water of a river in the forest.

3. The design of the wicked-minded (Duryodhana) was made known by this spy to the high-souled and greatly learned Vidura.

4. Therefore that learned man was sent by Vidura, and that person showed to the sons of Pritha a boat, as swift as mind or wind,

5. With mechanism and flags, made by trusted artificers and capable of withstanding wind and waves. It was on the banks of the holy Bhagirathi.

6. He said these word to show that he was really sent (by Vidura). (He said), "O Yudhisthira, listen to what the learned (Vidura) said to you.

7. 'Neither the consumer of straw and wood, nor the drier of the dews burns the inmates of a hole in the forest. He escapes from death who protects himself.'

8. By these credentials know me to have been sent by Vidura and also to be his trusted agent. Khattwa (Vidura,) learned in the precepts of all religions, told me also,

9. O son of Kunti, that you shall surely defeat in battle Karna, Duryodhana with his brothers and Sakuni.

10. This boat is ready on the waters. It will glide pleasantly on. It will surely carry you away from these regions."

11. Seeing those best of men with their mother pensive and sad, he made them get on the boat that was on the Ganges. Going with them himself, he again said :—

12. "Vidura, having smelled your heads and embracing you, has said it again and again that in commencing your auspicious journey, and going alone, you should never be careless."

13. O king, having said this, the man sent by Vidura took those heroes, those best of men, to the other side of the Ganges on his boat.

14. Having taken them over the waters and seen them all safe on the opposite bank, he uttered the word Jaya (Victory), and blessing them he went back to the place whence he came.

15. The illustrious Pandavas also, sending some message to the learned (Vidura,), and having crossed the Ganges, proceeded in haste and in great secrecy, being unobserved by all.

Thus ends the hundred and fifty first chapter, the crossing the Ganges, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLII.

(JATUGRIHA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When the night had passed away a large number of the people of the city came there to see the sons of Pandu.

2. Those men extinguished the fire and saw that the house was made of lac, and that the counsellor Purochana had been burnt to death.

The citizens said :—

3. Indeed this sinful act was contrived by the wicked Duryodhana to destroy the sons of Pandu.

4. There is no doubt that the son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana) has burnt to death the heirs of Pandu, with the full knowledge of Dhritarastra, else he would have been prevented (by his father).

5. Indeed, the son of Santanu (Bhisma,) Drona, Vidura, Kripa and other Kurus have not followed the dictates of duty.

6. Let us (now) send words to the wicked-minded Dhritarastra,—(saying), "Your great desire is fulfilled; you have burnt to death the Pandavas."

Vaishampayana said :—

7. They then began to extinguish the fire to find out the Pandavas. They saw the Nishada woman burnt to death with her five sons.

8. The miner, while removing the ashes, covered with it the hole he had dug in such a way that it remained unnoticed by all who had gone there.

9. The citizens then sent words to Dhritarastra to inform that the Pandavas along with counsellor Purochana had been burnt to death.

10. Hearing the great evil news of the death of the sons of Pandu, the king Dhritarastra bewailed in great sorrow.

Dhritarastra said :—

11. King Pandu, my illustrious brother, has (indeed) died to-day, when those heroes (the Pandavas) with their mother have been burnt to death.

12. O man, go quickly to the city of Varanavata and perform the funeral rites of those heroes and of the daughter of the king of Kunti (Bhojā).

13. Let also the bones of the deceased be sanctified by the usual rites, and let all the beneficial and great acts be performed. Let the friends and relatives of those that have been burnt to death also go there.

14. Let also all other beneficial acts that ought to be performed by us for the Pandavas and Kunti be accomplished by spending wealth.

Vaishampayana said :—

15. Having said this, the son of Ambika, Dhritarastra, surrounded by his relatives, offered oblations of water to the manes of the sons of Pandu,

16. Being greatly afflicted with sorrow, he wept with all others! (saying,) "O Yudhishthira!" "O descendant of Kuru!" others cried, "O Bhima!"

17. Others again, "O Falguni!" some again, "O the twins!" "O mother Kunti!" They thus bewailed and gave oblations of water.

18. The other citizens also bewailed for the Pandavas. But Vidura did not bewail much, for he knew the truth.

19. Leaving the city of Varanavata, the greatly strong Pandavas, altogether six in number with their mother, reached the river Ganges.

20. Aided by the strength of arms of the boatmen and by the rapidity of the current and favourable wind, they then speedily reached the opposite bank.

21. They then left the boat and proceeded towards the south, finding their way in the dark by the light of the stars.

22. O king, after much suffering, they at last reached a dense forest. The sons of Pandu became tired, thirsty and sleepy.

23. Yudhishthira thus spoke to the greatly energetic Bhimasena, "What could be more painful than our being in a dense forest! We do not know the directions; we are incapable of proceeding further.

24. We do not know whether the sinful Purochana has or has not been burnt to death. How shall we escape from these dangers unobserved by others!

25. O descendant of Bharata, take us on you again and proceed as before. You alone amongst us are strong, and (you are) as swift as wind."

26. Having been thus addressed by the king of virtue (Yudhishthira), the greatly strong Bhimasena took his brothers and Kunti (on his body) and walked on.

Thus ends the hundred and fifty second chapter, the escape of the Pandavas, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLIII.

(JATUGRIHA)—Continued.

Vaishampayna said :—

1. By the force of that mighty (hero's) breast, the forest with its trees and their branches appeared to tremble.

2. The motion of his thighs raised a wind like that of the month of Jaista and Ashara. The greatly strong (Bhima) made a road for himself by treading down the trees and creepers.

3. He proceeded on, breaking the kings of the forest (big trees) and the plants with their flowers and fruits that stood on his way.

4. Thus breaking large trees angrily goes through the forest the leader of a herd of elephants of sixty years of age, the liquid juice (at the season of rut) trickling down the three parts of his body.

5. So great was the force with which Bhima, endued with the speed of Garuda or Maruta, proceeded that the Pandavas seemed to be fainted.

6. By the strength of his arms, he swam across many streams difficult to be crossed; and they (the Pandavas) disguised themselves from the fear of the sons of Dhritarastra.

7. He carried his delicate and illustrious mother on his back over even and uneven grounds on the banks of rivers.

8. O best of the Bharata race, in the evening he reached a fearful forest where fruits and roots and water were scarce, and (which was) full of terrible roars of birds and beasts.

9. The twilight became fearfully dark and (the roars of) birds and beasts (grew) fiercer. All sides became invisible, (being covered with darkness). A strong wind began to blow.

10. It broke and laid low many large and small trees and many creepers with fruits and dry leaves.

11. Those descendants of Kuru (the Pandavas), afflicted with fatigue and thirst and heavy with sleep, were unable to proceed further.

12. They then sat down in that great forest without food or water, and Kunti, afflicted with thirst, then spoke thus to her sons,

13. "I am the mother of the five Pandavas though I am now in their midst, yet I am burning in thirst!" She repeatedly said this to her sons.

14. Having heard this, Bhimasena's heart was warmed with compassion from the affection (he bore) for his mother, and he began to proceed again.

15. Then Bhima, entering a large fearful and terrible forest, saw a beautiful banyan tree with wide-spreading branches.

16. Placing them all there (under the tree), that best of the Bharata race, (Bhima) said, "O lord, rest here; I shall go to bring water.

17. I hear the sweet notes of the water fowl Sarashas. I think there must be a big lake (somewhere here.")

18. O descendant of Bharata, commanded by his eldest brother who said, "Go," he went there where the aquatic Sarashas were.

19—20. O best of the Bharata race, ever affectionate to his brothers he went for the sake of his brothers. He drank water and bathed there in that lake; he brought water for them by soaking his upper garment. O descendant of Bharata, retracing his way with all speed, over four miles he came to his mother and began to sigh like a snake in sorrow and grief.

21. Seeing his mother and brothers asleep on the ground, Vrikodara was greatly afflicted with grief and lamented thus,

22. "Alas! what more painful sight can I see than what I see now, my brothers sleeping on the ground! O unfortunate am I!

23. They who could not formerly sleep at Varanavata on the softest and costliest bed are now asleep on the bare ground!

24. The sister of that chastiser of foes, Vasudeva, the daughter of the king of Kunti (Bhoja), Kunti, endued with all auspicious marks,

25. The daughter-in-law of Vichitravirja and the wife of the illustrious Pandu and the mother of us (the Pandavas), resplendent as the filament of lotus,

26. Delicate and tender, fit to sleep on the costliest beds, is now asleep as she could never do on the bare ground!

27. She, who has given birth to these sons by Dharma, Indra, Maruta; and who has ever slept in palaces, is now asleep on the ground from fatigue!

28. What more painful sight shall I ever see than what I see (now), the best of men (the Pandavas) sleeping on the (bare) ground!

29. The ever virtuous (Yudhishthira) who deserves to be the king of the three worlds, now sleeps on the ground, fatigued and tired like an ordinary being.

30. Ayrana of the colour of the blue ocean who is matchless among men sleeps on the ground like ordinary mortals. What could be more painful than this!

31. The twins, who are handsome as the Ashwinis among the celestials, are asleep on the ground like ordinary men!

32. He who has no jealous and wicked-minded relatives lives like a single tree in a village.

33. Where there is only one tree full of leaves and fruits in a village, it becomes sacred and is worshipped and venerated by all.

34. They, who have many relatives, who are heroic and virtuous, live happily in this world without any sorrow of any kind.

35. Being powerful, growing in prosperity and making their friends and relatives happy, they live depending on one another like the trees of the forest.

36. We are banished by the wicked-minded Dhritarastra and his sons, and we escaped for our good fortune from a fiery death.

37. Having escaped from that fire, we are now resting under this tree. Having suffered great afflictions, where are we now to go?

38—40. O foresightless sons of Dhritarastra, O wicked men, enjoy your success. The gods are certainly favourable to you. Because Yudhishthira does not order me, (to kill you) therefore, O wretched men, live till then. Else angry as I am, I would have even this very day sent you (Duryodhana) with your sons and ministers and with Karna and the son of Suvala (Sakuni) to the land of the dead. What can I do, so long the king (Yudhishthira) is not angry.

41. O vicious men, the eldest of the Pandavas, Yudhishthira, is a virtuous-minded man." Having said this, the mighty-armed (Bhima), his mind inflamed with wrath,

42. Squeezed his palms and sighed with a sorrowful mind. Like an extinguished fire blazed up, again in sorrowful mind,

43. Vrikodara saw his brothers sleeping like ordinary men in trustfulness on the ground. Then Bhima thought,

44. "I think there are some towns not far off from this forest. We ought to remain awake here. But they are all asleep; therefore I myself will sit awake.

45. When they will rise after having been refreshed by sleep, then they will quench their thirst." Having resolved this, Bhima sat awake.

Thus ends the hundred and fifty third chapter, the fetching of water by Bhima, in the Jatugriha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLIV.

(HIDIMBA-BADHA PARVA.)

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Not far from the place where they (the Pandavas) slept, there was a Rakshasha, named Hidimba, living on a Sala tree.

2—4. (He was) greatly energetic and powerful, black as the clouds of the rainy season, hungry and eager for human flesh, of cruel and terrible visage, of long shanks and large belly, of locks and beard, red in colour, of shoulder broad as the neck of a large tree, of ears like arrows, and of features frightful and hideous. When casting his glance at pleasure all around (the place), he saw the great car-warriors, the sons of Pandu.

5. Ugly-featured, red-eyed, fearful and terrible, looking, hungry and thirsty he looked around at pleasure, and he saw them in that state.

6—7. Yawning wearily, shaking his dry and grizzly locks pointed upwards, and scratching them with his fingers, the large mouthed cannibal repeatedly looked at the sleeping sons of Pandu. Of huge body and great strength, of complexion like a mass of clouds, of teeth long and sharp-pointed, of face emitting a sort of lustre, he was ever pleased with the human food.

8. Smelling the scent of man, he spoke thus to his sister, "It is after a long time that my most favourite food has come to me.

9. My tongue is moist with saliva in anticipating the relish of such food. My eight teeth are sharp-pointed and incapable of being resisted by anything.

10. I shall dip them into the most delicious meat. Attacking the human throat and (human) arteries also,

11. I shall drink a plentiful quantity of hot, fresh and frothy blood. Go and ascertain who these (men) are, lying asleep in this forest.

12. The strong scent of man pleases my nostrils. Killing all these men, bring them to me.

13. They are asleep in my dominion. There is no fear for you. Tearing a plentiful flesh from these men,

14. We shall then both eat (the meat). Do my bidding soon. Eating to our fill the flesh of these men,

15. We shall dance together to various tunes." Having been thus addressed by Hidimba in the forest, Hidimba,

16. The female Rakshasha, went at the command of her brother, O best of the Bharata race, to the place where the Pandavas were.

17. Going there she saw the Pandavas with Pritha asleep and the invincible Bhimasena sitting awake.

18. Seeing Bhimasena who resembled a Sala tree and who was matchless in beauty, the Rakshashi was filled with desire.

19. She thought,—“His colour is like the heated gold; he is mighty-armed, he is leonine shouldered, he is greatly effulgent, he is conch-necked, and he is lotus-eyed, he is fit to be my husband.

20. I shall not obey the cruel commands of my brother. A woman's love for her husband is greater than that of her brother.

21. If I kill him, my brother's and my pleasure will be momentary, but if I do not kill him, I shall for ever enjoy with him.”

22. She was capable of assuming any form at will. She assumed an excellent human form and came slowly to the mighty-armed Bhimasena.

23. Being decked with celestial ornaments, she came to Bhimasena in bashful demeanour and with smiles on her lips. She said,

24. “O best of men, whence have you come here and who are you? Who are these celestial-like men that are asleep here?

25. O sinless one, who is this delicate lady of transcendent beauty sleeping so trustfully here in this forest, as if she is in her own house?

26. Do you not know that this dense forest is the abode of Rakshasha. Here dwells the wicked-minded Rakshasha, named Hidimba.

27. O celestial-like man, I have been sent here by my brother, that Rakshasha, with the cruel intention of eating your flesh.

28. I tell you truly that seeing you as effulgent as a celestial, I do not desire any body else to be my husband except you.

29. O learned man in all the precepts of virtue, do to me what is proper. My heart and body are both pierced by Kama (god of love). I am desirous of making you mine; make me yours.

30. O mighty-armed hero, I shall rescue you from the Rakshasha who eats human flesh. O sinless one, become my husband. We shall live on the breasts of mountains.

31. I can travel in the sky, and I do so at pleasure. You may enjoy with me incomparable pleasure in those places."

Bhima said :—

32. O Rakshashi, like a self-controlled Rishi, who can leave his mother, elder and younger brothers, sleeping happily (here ?)

33. What man like me would leave his sleeping mother and brothers as food for a Rakshasha in order to gratify his lust?

The Rakshashi said :—

34. Awake them all. I shall do what is agreeable to you. I shall rescue you all from my cannibal brother.

Bhima said :—

35. O Rakshashi, for the fear of your wicked-minded brother, I shall not awaken my mother and brothers, sleeping comfortably in the forest.

36. O timid girl, the Rakshashas are never able to withstand my prowess. O beautiful-eyed one, no man, no Gandharva and no Yaksha (can also withstand it.)

37. O amiable girl, go or stay or do what you like, or O delicate shaped lady, send your cannibal brother (to me.)

Thus ends the hundred and fifty fourth chapter, the cology of Hidimba and Bhima, in the Hidimba-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLV.

(HIDIMBA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Seeing her delay (in returning), the king of the Rakshashas, Hidimba, got down from the tree and came where the Pandavas were.

2. (He was) of red eyes and strong arms, of standing hair and large mouth, of colour like clouds, of sharp teeth and fearful appearance.

3. Seeing this frightful creature alight from the tree, Hidimba became alarmed and thus spoke to Bhimasena,

4. "The wicked-minded cannibal is coming in anger. Do with your brothers what I ask you.

5. O hero, endued as I am with the prowess of Rakshashas, I am capable of going any where at will. Get upon my hips; I shall carry you through the sky.

6. O chastiser of foes, awake your mother and others, sleeping in comfort. Taking them all, I shall go through the sky."

Bhima said :—

7. O lady of fair hips, fear nothing. I am certain that so long I am here, there is no Rakshasha who can harm any of these (men). O lady of slender waist, I shall kill this (cannibal) before your very sight.

8. O timid girl, this worst of Rakshashas is not a worthy antagonist of mine,—nay all the Rakshashas can never withstand my great prowess in battle.

9. Behold my arms each like a trunk of an elephant. (Behold) my thighs like two iron clubs. (Behold) my chest, broad and adamantine.

10. O beautiful girl, you shall see to-day my Indra-like prowess. O lady of fair hips, do not consider me weak, thinking that I am a human being.

Hidimba said :—

11. O best of men, you are like a celestial. I do not consider you weak. But I have seen the prowess that Rakshashas exert on men.

Vaishampayana said :—

12. O descendant of Bharata, the angry cannibal the Rakshasha heard these words of Bhima thus talking there.

13. He saw Hidimba in human form, her head decked with garlands of flowers and her face like the full moon;

14. Her eyebrows, nose, eyes and ringlets were all of the handsomest description, and her nails and complexion were of the most delicate colour. She was decked with all kinds of ornaments and attired in fine transparent robes.

15. Seeing her in that charming human form the cannibal thought that she was lustful, and became (very) angry.

16. O best of the Kurus, becoming angry with his sister, the Rakshasha expanded his large eyes and thus spoke to her,

17. "What foolish creature throws obstacle on my way when I am hungry; O Hidimba, have you become so senseless as not to fear my anger ?

18. O unchaste woman, fie on you! You do me an injury out of lust! You are ready to sacrifice the honours of all the chief Rakshashas, your ancestors!

19. I shall kill you with all those for whose sake you are trying to do me a great injury."

20. Having addressed Hidimba thus, Hidimba with red eyes, his teeth pressing against teeth, ran at her with the intention of killing her.

21. The best of all wielders of weapons Bhima, seeing him rush at her, reproached him by saying "stop, stop."

22. Seeing the Rakshasha angry with his sister, Bhimasena smiled (in scorn), and spoke thus,

23. "O Hidimba, why do you awaken these (men) sleeping in comfort? O wicked-minded (Rakshasha), come to me first without loss of time.

24. Smite me first; you should not kill a woman, specially when she has been sinned against instead of sinning.

25. This girl is not in her own control in becoming lustful towards me. She has been moved by the god of love who pervades every living form.

26—27. O wicked creature, O you the most infamous of your class, your sister came here at your command. Seeing my person, she desires me. The timid girl has done you no harm. It is the fault of the god of love, and therefore you should not injure her.

28. O wicked wretch, you should not kill a woman when I am here. O cannibal, come with me (to a distance) and fight singly with me.

29. I shall singly (fight with you) and send you to-day to the land of the dead. O Rakshasha, your head will be pounded to pieces, being pressed by my strength,

30—31. As if pressed by the tread of a mighty elephant. When you will be killed by me in battle your body will be to-day torn by hawks, herons and jackals, in glee. I shall in a moment make this forest free of all Rakshashas, so long polluted by you by eating men.

32. O Rakshasha, your sister will see to-day that I shall drag you, huge though you are like a mountain, as a lion drags an elephant.

33. O worst of Rakshashas, when you will be killed by me, men frequenting this forest will live safely and without fear.

Hidimba said:—

34. O man, what is the need of your this vaunting and boasting? Accomplish all this first, and then you may vaunt. Therefore do not make any delay.

35. You know yourself to be strong and endowed with prowess. In your encounter with me to-day, you shall now rightly know what is your (real) strength.

36. I shall not kill these (your brothers) till then. Let them sleep at their pleasure. O foolish man, I shall first kill you who speaks such evil words.

37. After drinking your blood, I shall then kill these (your brothers), and then kill this (my sister) who has done me an injury.

Vaishampayana said:—

38. Having said this, the cannibal, outstretching his arms, ran in great wrath towards that chastiser of foes, Bhimasena.

39. The greatly powerful Bhima soon seized the extended arms (of the rushing Rakshasha) with great force, as if in sport.

40. Then seizing the struggling Rakshasha with violence, Bhima dragged him away from that place full thirty two cubits, as a lion drags a small deer.

41. Thereupon the Rakshasha, becoming angry, clasped the Pandava Bhima with great force, and he sent forth a terrible yell.

42. The greatly strong Bhima then dragged him again (further away) with (great) force, so that his comfortably sleeping brothers might not awake by his yell.

43. Claspings and dragging each other with great force, both Bhimasena and Hidimba displayed their great prowess.

44. Fighting like two large elephants mad with rage, they broke down the trees and tore off the creepers that grew around.

45. By the great noise (of the fight) those best of men (the Pandavas) woke up with their mother, and they saw Hidimba sitting before them.

Thus ends the hundred and fifty fifth chapter, the fight between Hidimba and Bhima, in the Hidimba-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLVI.

(HIDIMBA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Rising from sleep, those best of men (the Pandavas) with their mother were filled with astonishment on seeing the extraordinary beauty of Hidimba.

2. Thereupon being astonished with her beauty, Kunti slowly addressed in sweet orders and gave her all assurance.

3. "O celestial-like beautiful maid, O beautiful one, who and whose are you? For what business have you come here and from what place have you come?"

4. Are you the deity of this forest or (are you) an Apsara? Tell me all why you are sitting here."

Hidimba said :—

5. The blue cloud like great forest that you see is the abode of mine and that of my brother, Rakshasha Hidimba.

6. O amiable lady, know me as being the sister of the Rakshasha chief. O respected madam, I was sent by my brother to kill you with your sons.

7. Coming here at the command of that cruel-minded (Rakshasha), I saw your greatly powerful son of the colour of pure gold.

8. O blessed lady, I was brought under the control of your son by the god of love who pervades the nature of every thing.

9. I then chose your greatly powerful son as my husband. Though I tried to suppress this passion, I could not.

10. Finding my delay, the cannibal, came in person here to kill all these your sons.

11. But he has been dragged away by your illustrious and intelligent son and my (chosen) husband.

12. Behold the man and the Rakshasha, both endued with great strength and prowess, (now) engaged in combat, pressing each other with great force and filling the whole region with their roars.

Vaishampayana said :—

13. Hearing her these words, Yudhishthira, Aryuna, Nakula and the powerful Sahadeva hastily rose up.

14. They saw those two (Bhima and Hidimba) already engaged in fight; they were dragging each other, (both) eager to overcome each other like two greatly strong lions.

15. They clasped and pressed each other again and again. The dust of the earth rose like the smoke of the forest-fire.

16. Covered with the dust of the earth, they, who were like mountains looked like two cliffs enveloped in mists.

17. Seeing Bhima oppressed by the Rakshasha, Partha, Aryuna, slowly said with smiles on his lips,

18. "O Bhima, O mighty-armed (hero), fear nothing. We did not know that in the fight with the terrible Rakshasha you are tired.

19. O son of Pritha, I stand here to help you. I shall kill the Rakshasha. Nukula and Sahadeva will protect our mother.

Bhima said :—

20. Look on this combat with unconcern. You need not take part in it. When he has come to my clutches, he will not escape with life.

Aryuna said :—

21. O Bhima, what need is there to keep this wicked Rakshasha alive any longer? O chastiser of foes, we are to go from this place as soon as possible; and therefore we can stay here no longer.

22. The east is reddening; the morning twilight is about to set in. At Raudra Muharta (just at the break of day), the Rakshashas become most powerful.

23. O Bhima, be quick. Do not play (with him); kill the fierce Rakshasha. He can display Maya delusions, hereafter. Therefore, show the strength of your arms.

Vaishampanya said :—

24. Having been thus addressed by Aryuna, Bhima blazed up in anger. He summoned the strength that Vahu puts forth at the time of the universal dissolution.

25. He quickly raised up the cloud-like Rakshasha in anger and he then whirled him one hundred times.

Bhima said :—

26. (O Rakshasha), your body has in vain grown and thriven on unsanctified meat. Your intelligence is in vain, your sense is in vain. You deserve, therefore, an unholy death. I shall reduce you to-day to nothing.

28. I shall make this forest blessed to-day, O Rakshasha, completely shorn of prickly plant (which you were in it); so that you shall no longer kill men in order to eat them.

Aryuna said :—

28. If you think it a heavy task to kill the Rakshasha in battle, let me assist you. Kill him without (any further) loss of time.

29. O Vrikodara, let me kill him alone. You are tired and you have almost finished the work, and you well deserve rest (now).

Vaishampanya said :—

30. Having heard these words (of Aryuna) Bhimasena was inflamed with rage; and dashing him on the ground with all his might, he killed him like a beast.

31. When he was thus killed by Bhima, he sent forth a terrible roar like the sound of a wet drum which filled the whole forest.

32. Then the strong son of Pandu (Bhima), holding the body with his hands, broke it in the middle, and the mighty-armed hero greatly pleased the Pandavas (by his this great deed).

33. Seeing Hidimba slain, they were filled with joy and lost no time to congratulate that best of men, that chastiser of foes, Bhimasena.

34. Thus congratulating the illustrious and greatly powerful Bhima, Aryuna thus again addressed Vrikodora,

35. "O lord, I believe there is a town not far off from this forest. O blessed one, let us soon go from this place, so that Duryodhana may not trace us.

36. Those best of men (the Pandavas), those great car-warriors, saying, "Be it so," proceeded with their mother. And Rakshashi Hidimba also (followed them.)

Thus ends the hundred and fifty-sixth chapter, the killing of Hidimba, in the Hidimba-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLVII.

(HIDIMBA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Bhima said :—

1. The Rakshashas revenge themselves on their enemy by alluring deceptions. Therefore, O Hidimba, go to the way that your brother has gone.

Yudhisthira said :—

2. O best of men, O Bhima, do not kill a woman even in anger. O Pandava, the attainment of virtue is a higher duty than the protection of body.

3. You have killed the greatly powerful (Rakshasha) who came with the purpose of killing us. She is (but) his sister,—what can she do to us, even if she is angry?

4. Thereupon, Hidimba respectfully saluting Kunti and Yudhisthira with joined hands, spoke to Kunti thus,

5. "O respected lady, you know the pangs that women suffer from the god of love. O blessed lady, I have received those (pangs) by Bhima.

6. I have suffered these great pangs and I wait for the time (when it will be assuaged). That time has now come, when I expect that my happiness would come.

7. O blessed lady, leaving my friends, relatives and religion, I have chosen this best of men, this son of yours, as my husband.

8. O illustrious lady, if forsaken by this hero and yourself, I shall not live any longer, I tell you this truly.

9. O greatly beautiful lady, you should show compassion towards me, considering me foolish or very obedient to you.

10. O greatly fortunate lady, unite me with my husband, your son. Let me go away at pleasure (wherever I like), taking this celestial-like (hero). Trust me, O blessed lady, I shall bring him back to you all.

11. Whenever you will think of me, I will immediately come to you and carry you wherever you will command. I shall rescue you from danger over even and uneven grounds.

12. I shall carry you on my back whenever you will desire to proceed with speed. Be gracious to me and make Bhimasena accept me.

13. It is consonant with the precepts of religion that one should protect his life by any means. He, who seeks to do it, should not scruple about the means.

14. He who keeps his virtue (even) in distress is the foremost of all virtuous men. Distress is the greatest danger to virtue and virtuous men.

15. It is virtue that protects life, and therefore virtue is called the giver of life. The means by which virtue is secured can never be censurable."

Yudhisthira said :—

16. O Hidimba, there is no doubt of that what you say is true. O lady of slender waist, you must act as you have said (you want to do.)

17. O blessed lady, when Bhimasena will finish his ablutions, twilight prayer and the usual propitiatory rites you will then be adored by him till the sun sets.

18. O lady of mind-like speed, sport with him at pleasure during the day. You must always bring Bhimasena back every night.

Vaishampayana said :—

19. Having promised to do it by saying, "Be it so", Bhima said (to Hidimba), "O Rakshashi, listen to the agreement that I make with you.

20. O blessed lady, O lady of slender waist, I shall go (and stay) with you, so long you do not obtain a son."

21. Having promised this by saying, "Be it so," the Rakshashi Hidimba took Bhima upon her body and went up to the sky.

22—23. Assuming the handsomest form, decked with all ornaments and pouring forth at times sweet music, she sported with the Pandava (Bhima) on the mountain peaks of picturesque scenery and in regions sacred to the celestials, abounding with beasts and birds,

24. Also in forests, and mountain fastnesses, overgrown with blossoming trees, in beautiful lakes resplendent with lotuses and lilies,

25. On islands of rivers, on the pebbled banks of streamlets, in sylvan streamlets with beautiful banks, and also in mountain streams,

26. In beautiful woods with blossoming trees, in the Himalayan bowers, and in various mountain caves,

27. In the crystal water of the lakes, smiling with lotuses, on the shores of the sea shining with gold and pearls,

28. In beautiful towns and fine gardens, in woods sacred to the gods, and on the breasts of hills,

29. In the land of the Guhakas and the hermitages of the ascetics, on the banks of the Manasha lake, abounding with fruits and flowers of every season.

30. Assuming the handsomest form, she sported with the Pandava (Bhima). The lady with the mind-like speed sported with Bhima in these places.

31. She then gave birth by Bhima a greatly strong son, of terrible eyes and large mouth, of ears like arrows and of appearance fearful,

32. Of roaring voice, of lips brown as copper, of teeth sharp and keen. He was mighty-armed, greatly energetic, exceedingly powerful and a great car-warrior.

33—34. Having long-nose, broad chest, frightfully swelling calves, celerity of motion and excessive strength, he had nothing human in him, though born of a man. He excelled all the Pichashas and other such creatures and also the Rakshasas.

35. He grew up to be a youth when he was a boy, and that mighty hero soon acquired high proficiency in all arms and weapons known amongst mankind.

36. The Rakshasha women give birth on the very day they conceive; they are capable of assuming any form at will, and they change their forms (at will).

37. That bad featured child, that mighty bowman, soon after his birth, bowed down to his mother and also to his father and touched their feet. They then named him.

38. His mother said, "This child's head is like a Ghata (water-pot)." They then gave him the name of Gatatkacha.

39. Gatatkacha was (very much) attached to the Pandavas. He became a great favourite with them,—almost one of them.

40. Knowing that the period of her stay with the (Pandava) had come to an end, Hidimba making another agreement with them went away wherever she liked.

41. That best of Rakshashas, Gatatkacha, promising to come when required for business, went away towards the north.

42. That great car-warrior (Gatatkacha) was created by the illustrious Indra as a proper antagonist of Karna of matchless power in consequence of the weapon (he gave him).

Thus ends the hundred and fifty-seventh chapter, the birth of Gatatkacha, in Hidimba-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLVIII.

(HIDIMBA-BADHA PARVA)—contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. O king, those mighty car-warriors the heroes (the Pandavas), went from forest to forest, killing many beasts. In course of their travel and they crossed many forests (came to)

2. The countries of the Matsyas, Trigartas, and Panchalas, then to that of the Kichakas, where they saw many beautiful woods and lakes.

3. They all made matted locks and wore the barks of trees. Those illustrious (heroes) assumed the form of ascetics with their mother.

4. Those car-warriors some times proceeded in haste, carrying their mother, (on their back) sometimes they proceeded slowly; they then went in great haste.

5. They studied the Brahma (Rik) and the Vedas and the Vedangas and all other sciences of morals. (When they were thus engaged), they saw their grandfather (Vyasa).

6. Having respectfully saluted the illustrious Krishna Dwaipayana those chastisers of foes with their mother stood before him with joined hands.

Vyasa said:—

7. O best of the Bharata race, I knew beforehand of your this affliction,—your this unjust banishment by the sons of Dhritarastra.

8. Knowing this, I have come to do you some great good. You ought not to grieve. Know all this is for your (future) happiness.

9. There is no doubt that you and they all are equal in my eyes; but men love more those that are in misfortune or in tender years.

10. Therefore my love for you is now greater (than before), and in consequence of that love, I wish to do you some good. Listen to me.

11. Not far from this place there is a beautiful town which is a safe place for you. There live you all in disguise, waiting for my return.

Vaishampayana said :—

12. Having thus comforted them, the son of a Satyawati, Vyasa, led them to (the town of) Ekachakra. The lord (Vyasa) comforted Kunti also.

Vyasa said :—

13. O daughter, live. Your this son, the illustrious and the best of men, Yudhis-thira, ever devoted to virtue, conquering the world by his virtue will virtuously rule over all the kings of the world.

14. Conquering the whole earth bounded by the belt of the sea by the prowess of Bhima and Aryuna, there is no doubt (he will rule the whole world.)

15. Your sons and those of Madri, all great car-warriors, will sport in their own kingdom at pleasure.

16. Conquering the whole world, these best of men will perform Rajshuya and Ashwamedha and other sacrifices in which Dakshina (presents to the Brahmanas) will be very large.

17. Maintaining their friends and relatives in luxury and affluence, these your sons will rule over the kingdom of their forefathers.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. Having said this, he took them to the house of a Brahmana, and then Rishi Dwaipayana spoke thus to the eldest Pandava,

19. "Wait here for me. I shall come back to you. You will be able to obtain great happiness by adopting yourself to the place and time (in which you are now.)"

20. O king, they all said with joined hands, "Be it so." (Thereupon) the illustrious lord, the Rishi Vyasa, went away from whence he came.

Thus ends the hundred and fifty-eighth chapter, the meeting with Vyasa, in the Hidimba-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLIX.

(VAKA-BADHA PARVA.)

Janamejaya said :—

1. O best of the twice-born, what did the Pandavas, those great car-warriors, the sons of Kunti, do when they went to Ekachakra?

Vaishampayana said :—

2. These great car-warriors, the sons of Pandu, going to Ekachakra, lived for a short time in a Brahmana's house.

3—4. O king, they saw many beautiful woods and countries, rivers and lakes, as they roamed about begging their bread. On account of their many accomplishments they became (great) favourites of all men.

5. They offered to Kunti every night all the food (that they got during the day), and it (the food) was divided (by Kunti) and they each ate separately the share of each.

6. Those heroes, those chastisers of foes, with their mother, ate half (of the food collected, the greatly strong Bhima alone ate the other half.

7. O best of the Bharata race, the illustrious men thus passed some days in that country.

8. One day, when those best of men went out for food, Bhima (alone) was (at home) with Pritha (his mother).

9. O descendant of Bharata, Kunti heard loud and heart-rending lamentations in the house of the Brahmana.

10. O king, seeing them weeping and piteously lamenting, she could not bear it from her compassion and from her goodness of heart.

11. Being sorry in mind, the amiable Pritha spoke to Bhima these words full of compassion.

12. "O son, our grief being gone we were happily living in this Brahmana's house, unknown to Dhritarashtra's son, and much respected by him.

13. O son, I always think what might be good for the Brahmana, and what good I can do to him, as men who live in others, house (ought to) try to do."

14. O child, he is truly a man who pays back the benefit received. Such an act is never destroyed. One should do more (good) than others do him.

15. This Brahmana has certainly fallen into a great distress. If we can be of any help to him (in his present distress), we should by (some-what) repay his services.

Bhima said :—

16. Learn what distress and from what cause that distress has befallen him. Having learnt it, I shall try to remove it (his distress), however difficult its achievement may be.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. O king when those two (Kunti and Bhima) were thus talking, they heard a cry of sorrow proceeding from the Brahmana and his wife.

18. As the Kamadhenu (the all-boon-giving cow) runs at her tethered calf, so Kunti ran in all hurry to the inner apartment of the high-souled Brahmana.

19. She saw there the Brahmana, his wife, his son and his daughter, all sitting with cast-down faces.

The Brahmana said :—

20. Fle on the life in this world which is hollow as the reed. It is full of misery ; it is a slave to others ; it is based on great sorrow.

21. To live is to suffer great misery ; to live is to suffer great diseases. Life is certainly a record of sorrows.

22. The soul is one, but it has to serve Dharma, Artha and Kama. By simultaneous pursuit of these three, great misery is occasioned.

23. Some say salvation is our highest object of attainment, but it can never be attained. The acquisition of wealth is hell ; it is attended with misery.

24. Great misery is for those that desire wealth, greater for him who has (already) acquired it. Great affection is engendered on the acquired wealth ; and when it goes away, the misery is great.

25. I do not see by what means I can escape from this danger and how can I fly away (from this place) with my son and wife ?

26. O Brahmani, (wife), remember, I tried to go to some other place where we could be happy, but you did not listen to my words.

27. When I repeatedly asked you to go, you, O foolish woman, said, " I am born here ; I have grown old here ; this is my ancestral homestead."

28. Your father is dead, your old mother died long ago. Your friends and relatives are also dead,—why do you (then) desire to live here ?

29. From your affection towards your relatives and friends, you did not then listen to my words. The great misery for the loss of a relative and friend has now come to us.

30. Oh, how can I bear it ? The time has come for my own death. I shall not be able to live like a cruel wretch by abandoning my own relatives and friends.

31. You are always my help-mate in all virtuous acts, you are like a mother to me. The gods have given you to me as my friend ; you are my chief stay.

32—34. You were made by my parents as a partner of my domestic life ; you are nobly-born, and of good disposition ; you are a mother of children ; you are ever devoted to me ; you are innocent, ever constant to your vows ; you have chosen and wed me in due rites,—how can I abandon you for the sake of saving my own life ? How shall I be able to abandon my own son ?

35—36. (He is) a child of tender years, having no beard (yet on his chin). How shall I sacrifice my daughter whom I have begotten myself, who has been given to me by the illustrious creator for bestowing her on a husband, and through whom I am to enjoy, along with my ancestors, those regions attainable by those only who possess daughter's sons.

37. Some men think that father's affection for his son is greater ; others (think that father's affection) for his daughter (is greater) ; but mine is equal.

38. How can I abandon the innocent girl upon whom rests the region of eternal bliss and my own lineage and perpetual happiness ?

39. If I sacrifice myself and go to the other world, I shall still be repentent, for being abandoned by me, they would not be able to live.

40. To abandon any of these (my wife son or daughter) will be a cruel and most wicked act. If I sacrifice myself, they will (also) die without me.

41. The distress into which I have fallen is great ; I do not know the means of escape (from it). Alas ! What means shall I adopt with my friends and relatives ! It is better that I should die with them ; I am unable to live (any longer).

Thus ends the hundred and forty-ninth chapter, the lamentations of the Brahmana, in the Vaka-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLX.

(VAKA-BADHA PARVA)—contd.

The Brahmani said:—

1. You should not grieve like ordinary men. This is not the time for lamentation. You are learned.

2. All men must die. None should grieve for that which is inevitable.

3. Man desires son, daughter and wife for himself. Therefore abandon grief, for you are greatly intelligent ; I shall myself go there.

4. It is the highest and eternal duty of women,—namely to sacrifice their lives and to seek the good of their husbands.

5. Such an act done by me will give you pleasure ; it will (also) bring me fame in this world and eternal bliss hereafter.

6. What I speak to you is the highest virtue. You can acquire by it (by my sacrificing myself) both virtue and profit.

7. The object for which one desires a wife has already been achieved by you from me. I have borne you a daughter and a son, by which I have been freed from the debt I owe you.

8. You are able to support and protect your children. I can not support and protect the children as you can (do it).

9. You are my life, wealth and lord ; having been abandoned by you, how these children of tender years, and how myself, can live ?

10. Being a helpless widow with two children of tender years depending on me how shall I be able to live leading my life in the path of virtue.

11. How shall I be able to protect the girl, if your this daughter is solicited by dishonourable and vain persons, unworthy of contracting an alliance with you ?

12. As birds eagerly seek with avidity for (the piece of) meat thrown on the ground, so men solicit women who have lost their husbands.

13. O best of the twice-born, being solicited by wicked men, I might waver, and I might not be able to keep myself on the path of virtue.

14. How shall I be able to place this only daughter of your house,—this innocent girl,—in the (virtuous) way in which her ancestors have always walked ?

15. How shall I be able to teach this child (your son) every desirable accomplishment to make him as virtuous as yourself in that time of want when I shall be helpless (without you) ?

16. When I shall be in such helpless state, the unworthy persons will demand this orphan girl, like Sudras desiring to hear the Vedas.

17. If I do not bestow this girl, endued with all qualities and possessing your blood, they may take her away by force as cows take the sacrificial Ghee.

18. Seeing your son (thoroughly) unlike yourself, and your daughter under the control of unworthy person,

19. I shall be despised in the world. I do not know what will happen to me. O Brahmana, there is no doubt I shall certainly die.

20. There is no doubt these children of tender years, being bereft of me and you, will die as fish (in a tank) when the water is dried up.

21. There is no doubt the three (myself, our son and daughter) will all die without you. Therefore you ought to abandon me.

22. O Brahmana, persons learned in the precepts of virtue have said that to predecease their husbands is an act of the highest merit for women who have borne children.

23. I am ready to abandon this son and this daughter, these my relations, my this life itself.

24. To be ever engaged in serving her husband is a higher duty to a woman than sacrifices, asceticism, vows and various charities.

25. Therefore the act I desire to perform is consonant with the highest virtue. It is for your good and for the good of your race.

26. The virtuous (men) say, that children, relatives, wives and all things dear (in this world) are cherished for rescuing oneself from distress.

27. Man cherishes wealth for (rescuing himself) from distress and danger. By wealth he cherishes his wife. He must always cherish himself both by his wealth and wife.

28. The wise men have said that wife, son, wealth or house is acquired to provide for foreseen or unforeseen accidents.

29. The wise men have said that one's all relations, weighed against one's own self, would not be equal to one's own self.

30. Therefore, O respected Sir, accomplish your object by me. Protect your self by abandoning me. Give me your permission. Cherish our children.

31. In fixing moralities the men, learned in the precepts of virtue, have said that women should never be killed; and (they have also said) that the Rakshashas are learned in the rules of morality. Therefore, he (the Rakshasha) may not kill me.

32. It is certain that he will kill a man, but it is doubtful whether he will kill a woman. O virtuously learned man, you ought to send me.

33. I have enjoyed much happiness; I have obtained many things agreeable; I have earned much of religious merits; I have obtained from you beloved sons; I do not grieve to die.

34. I have borne children and I have grown old; I am ever desirous of doing good to you. Having considered all this, I have come to this resolution.

35. O respected Sir, you can take another wife by abandoning me. You may be then again placed on the path of virtue.

36. To marry more than one wife is not sin among men. It is very sinful for a woman to take a second husband after the first.

37. Having considered all this, and knowing that your self-sacrifice is censurable, save to-day yourself, your race and your these two children without loss of time.

Thus ends the hundred and sixtieth chapter, the words of Brahmani, in the Vaka-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXI.

(VAKA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having heard these words of her afflicted parents, the daughter was filled with grief, and she thus spoke (to them.)

The daughter said:—

2. Why are you so sorrowful? Why are you weeping, as if you have none. Listen to my words, and hearing them, do what is proper.

3. There is no doubt that you will one time abandon me by the dictates of virtue. Abandon me who am to be abandoned, and thus save all by (sacrificing) me alone.

4. Men desire for children hoping, they will save them. Cross this stream of your difficulty by me.

5. A child saves his parents in this world and in the next. Therefore, a child is called by the learned Putra.

6. My forefathers always desire to have daughter's son by me, (to save them from hell). I shall myself save them by saving the life of my father.

7. My brother is but of tender years; there is no doubt he will die soon after your death.

8. If you, my father, ascend to heaven, if my brother dies, the Pinda (funeral cake) for the Pitris (ancestors) will be stopped, and it will be most unfavourite act of theirs.

9. Having been abandoned by my father, brother and also my mother, I shall fall from misery to greater misery, and I shall finally perish in great distress.

10. There is no doubt that if you can save yourself, my mother and my child-brother, also the Pinda will be perpetuated.

11. The son is one's own self; the wife is one's friend; the daughter is (however) a source of trouble. Save yourself by sacrificing that cause of trouble; and set me on the path of virtue.

12. O father, I am but a girl. Being abandoned by you, I shall be helpless and miserable, and I shall have to go anywhere and everywhere.

13. I shall, therefore, save my race, and I shall acquire the merit that such difficult work brings in.

14. O best of the twice-born, leaving me behind, if you go there (to the Rakshasha) I shall be very much pained; therefore be kind to me.

15. O excellent man, abandoning me who am to be (one day) abandoned, save yourself for our sake, for the sake of virtue, and your race.

16. There should not be any delay in doing that which is inevitable. What could be more painful to us than your ascending heaven.

17. (Then) we shall have to beg our food from others like dogs. If you are saved with your friends (dear ones), I shall pass my time in heaven and in bliss.

18. We have heard that if after bestowing your daughter, you offer oblations to the celestials and forefathers, they will be propitious to you.

Vaishampayana said:—

19. Having heard her these piteous lamentations, the father, the brother and the daughter began to weep (together).

20. Thereupon seeing them all weep, their son of tender years, spoke thus in childish words, his eyes expanded with joy.

21. He said, "O father, O you mother, O sister also, do not weep." Thus saying and smiling, he came to each of them.

22. Then taking up a blade of grass, he said again in joy, "I shall kill the cannibal Rakshasha by it."

23. Though they were all in grief, yet hearing the lisping words of the child, they felt exceeding delight.

24. Thinking that to be the (proper) time (to appear before them), Kunti came to them and reviving them as nectar revives a dead man, she thus spoke (to them).

Thus ends the hundred and sixty first chapter, the words of the Brahmana's son in the Vaka-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXLII.

(VAKA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Kunti said:—

1. I desire to learn from you what is the cause of this grief. Learning it, I shall remove it, if it is capable of being removed.

The Brahmana said:—

2. O ascetic lady, what you say is no doubt worthy of virtuous men. But this grief can not be removed by any human being.

3. A Rakshasha, named Vaka, lives not far off from this town. That greatly powerful (cannibal) is the lord of this town and of this country.

4. That wicked-minded and powerful cannibal, that chief of the Asuras, being fattened by (eating) human flesh, rules over this country.

5. This country and town are protected by the strength of that Rakshasha; thus being protected, we have no fear of any enemy,—nay of any living soul.

6. His remuneration however is fixed to supply his food, which consists of one cart load of rice, two buffaloes and the man who takes them to him.

7. One after another all (men of this town) send him his food. Though it is very difficult to be kept, yet the turn comes to a particular family at intervals of many years.

8. If people try to avoid it, the Rakshasha then eats them up with their wives and children.

9. There is a king in a place called Vetra-keyagriha, but that foolish man does not know how to govern (his kingdom) and he does not take any step by which this country may be rendered safe.

10. We certainly deserve it all, for we live in everlasting anxiety in the kingdom of a wretched and weak king.

11. The Brahmanas can never be made to live (permanently) in the house of any one, (for) they are free men. They depend upon their own accomplishments and roam (over the world) like a bird,—free to fly at pleasure.

12. It is said that a (good) king should be saved first, then a wife and then wealth, by the acquisition of the three, one can rescue his relatives and sons.

13. In the matter of the acquisition of these three, my course has been (quite) the reverse. Therefore falling into this danger, I am suffering great afflictions.

14. The race-destroying turn of (supplying food to the Rakshasha) has come round to me. I shall have to give the food and a man as the remuneration of the (Rakshasha).

15. I have no wealth to buy a man. I shall not be able to give one who is dear to me.

16. I do not see any means to save myself from the Rakshasha; therefore, I am plunged into a great ocean of grief, from which there is no escape.

17. I shall to-day with all my family, go to that Rakshasha so that, that wretch may devour us all at once.

Thus ends the hundred and sixty second chapter, the question of Kunti, in the Vaka-badka of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXIII.

(VAKA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Kunti said:—

1. Do not grieve for this fear, I see a means by which you may be saved from the Rakshasha.

2. You have only one son who is of tender years; you have only one daughter, who is engaged in vows. I do not like that any of these or yourself or your wife should go.

3. I have five sons; one of them will go carrying on your behalf your tribute to that sinful Rakshasha.

The Brahmana said :—

4. I can never do this in order to live. I can not cause the death of a Brahmana and a guest for saving my own life.

5. Even those that are lowly born and sinful refuse to do this; one should sacrifice himself and children for the sake of a Brahmana.

6. I consider this precept best for me, and I like to follow it. Between the death of a Brahmana and of my own, I would prefer the latter.

7. To kill a Brahmana is a great sin, of which there is no expiation. It is best for me to sacrifice myself reluctantly instead of sacrificing a Brahmana reluctantly.

8. O blessed lady, in sacrificing myself, I do not commit the sin of self-destruction. I shall commit no sin by being killed by another.

9. But if I deliberately kill a Brahmana, I shall commit a cruel and sinful act, from which I shall never escape.

10. The learned men have said that the abandonment of one who has come to your house, or who has sought your protection, and the killing of one who seeks death at your hands are both cruel and sinful.

11. The high-souled men, learned in the precepts that should be adopted in distress and danger, formerly said that one should never perform a cruel and censurable act.

12. It is best for me that I should myself perish to-day with my wife. I shall never cause the death of a Brahmana.

Kunti said :—

13. O Brahmana, my firm opinion is that Brahmanas must be protected always. If I have one hundred sons, none of them would be less dear to me.

14. But this Rakshasha will not be able to kill my son. My son is powerful, energetic and learned in Mantras.

15. He will reach the food to the Rakshasha, but he will be able to save himself; this is my firm belief.

16. I had seen before that many powerful and huge Rakshashas came to my son and were killed at his hands.

17. O Brahmana, do not by any means disclose this to any body; for then people, being curious and desirous of learning (their power), will trouble my sons.

18. The opinion of the learned men is that if my son gives this knowledge (to others) without the assent of his preceptor, he will no longer be able to profit by it.

Vaishampayana said :—

19. Having been thus addressed by Pritha (Kunti), the Brahmana and his wife became exceedingly glad and assented to those nectar-like words (of Kunti).

20. Thereupon Kunti and the Brahmana went to the son of Anila (Bhima) and told him "Do this"; and he replied by saying, "Be it so."

Thus ends the hundred and sixty-third chapter, the promise of Bhima to kill Vaka, in the Vaka-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXIV.

(VAKA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O descendant of Bharata, when Bhima promised by saying, "I shall do it," the Pandavas all came there after collecting food.

2. The son of Pandu Yudhisthira learnt the affair by the appearance of Bhima, and sitting by his mother, he spoke thus to her in private.

Yudhisthira said :—

3. What is the work that the greatly powerful Bhima wants to perform? Does he wish to do it by your command or of his own will?

Kunti said :—

4. By my request the chastiser of foes (Bhima) will do this great deed for the sake of the Brahmana and in order to save the town (from the Rakshasha).

Yudhisthira said :—

5. What rash act has been done by you! It is a very difficult work. The learned men never praise one's abandonment of his own son.

6. Why do you wish to abandon your son for the sake of another's son? You have done this act of abandonment of your son which is not approved by both men and by the Vedas.

7. By the strength of whose arms we all sleep in comfort and hope to recover the kingdom of which we have been deprived by the wretches (Duryodhana and others),

8. Remembering whose great prowess, Duryodhana with Sakuni and all others do not sleep (for a moment) in the night in anxiety;

9. By whose heroic prowess we were rescued from the burning house of lac and other dangers ; by whom Purochana was killed ;

10. Relying on whose prowess we believe ourselves that we have already acquired this earth full of wealth and have killed the sons of Dhritarastra.

11. On what consideration have you resolved upon abandoning him ? Have you been deprived of your reason ? Have you lost your senses on account of the calamities ?

Kunti said :—

12. O Yudhisthira, you need not be anxious for Vrikodara. I have not resolved (to do it) out of any weakness of my understanding.

13. O son, our grief being assuaged, we live happily in the house of this Brahmana, unknown to the sons of Dhritarastra and much respected by him.

14. O Partha, I have resolved upon doing this in order to requite him, for he is a (true) man upon whom good service is never lost.

15. It is (always) proper that the requital should be greater than the service received. Seeing the great prowess of Bhima in the house of lac,

16. And in killing Hidimba, my confidence on Vrikodara is great. The strength of Bhima's arms is as great as that of ten thousand elephants.

17. It was therefore that he was able to carry you,—all as heavy as elephants,—from Varanavata. There is none so strong as Vrikodara ; he may even vanquish in battle the thunderer (indra) himself.

18. As soon as he was born, he fell from my lap on the stone. The mass of stone on which he fell was broken into pieces by the weight of his body.

19. O Pandava, from that day I have come to know the (great) strength of Bhima. Therefore, I am desirous of requiting (the services) of the Brahmana.

20. I have not done this from foolishness, from ignorance, or from any motive of gain. I have deliberately resolved to do this virtuous act.

21. O Yudhisthira, two objects will be gained by this act,—one is the requital of the Brahmana's services (to us) and the other is the acquisition of great religious merit.

22. It is my opinion that the Kshatrya who helps a Brahmana obtains the regions of bliss in after life.

23. A Kshatrya, who saves the life of a Kshatrya, acquires great fame in this and in the next world.

24. A Kshatrya, who helps a Vaisya on earth, certainly becomes popular among men.

25. The king should even protect a Sudra who seeks protection. If he does so, he is born in his next birth in a royal family, possessing property and being adored by other kings.

26. O descendant of Kuru, the illustrious and wise Vyasa formerly told me this. Therefore I am resolved upon doing it.

Thus ends the hundred and sixty fourth chapter, the cology of Kunti and Yudhisthira, in the Vaka-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXV.

(VAKA-BADHA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. O mother, what you have deliberately done, moved by the compassion for the afflicted Brahmana, is indeed excellent.

2. Because you are compassionate for the Brahmana, Bhima will certainly come back after killing the cannibal.

3. But tell the Brahmana that he must not do any thing by which the people of this town may know all about it. You must carefully make him promise it.

Vaishampayana said :—

4. When the night passed away, the Pandava, Bhimasena, taking with him the food (for the Rakshasha) set out for the place where the cannibal dwelt.

5. Reaching the forest in which the Rakshasha lived, the greatly-strong Pandava (Bhima) began to eat himself the food and called loudly the Rakshasha by name.

6. Thereupon the Rakshasha was inflamed with anger by Bhima's words. He came in wrath to the place where Bhima was.

7. Of huge body, of great strength, of fierce appearance, with red eyes, red beard, red hair, he pressed the earth (as he walked).

8. The opening of his mouth was from ear to ear, his ears were like arrows, his visage was grim, and his forehead, furrowed into three lines.

9. Seeing Bhima engaged in eating his food the Rakshasha, thus spoke in anger and with eyes expanded and lips bitten.

The Rakshasha said :—

10. Who is the fool that desires to go to the land of the dead by eating in my very sight the food intended for me !

Vaishampayana said :—

11. O descendant of Bharata, hearing this, Bhimasena smiled (in derision), and disregarding the Rakshasha and turning his head continued to eat.

12. Uttering a fearful yell, the cannibal rushed on Bhima with two arms raised high and with the intention of killing Bhimasena.

13. That slayer of hostile heroes, the son of Pandu (Bhima), even then disregarding him and casting on him only a single glance, continued to eat the food of the Rakshasha.

14. Being filled with great displeasure, he (the Rakshasha) struck a heavy blow with both his hands on the back of the son of Kunti, Vrikodara.

15. Though Bhima was struck in great force with the arms (of the Rakshasha), yet he did not even look at him, but he continued to eat.

16. Thereupon he (the Rakshasha) became very angry, tore up a tree and ran at the strong Bhima to strike him again.

17. That best of men, the greatly strong Bhima, leisurely ate up all the food, and then washing himself he stood up cheerfully to fight.

18. O descendant of Bharata, the greatly powerful Bhima smilingly caught in his left hand the tree hurled in anger (by the Rakshasha.)

19. Then that mighty Rakshasha, tearing up various trees, hurled them at Bhima, and that Pandava also (hurled) many on the Rakshasha.

20. O great king, the fight between the man and the Rakshasha with trees became so fearful that the place soon became devoid of all trees.

21. Saying that 'He is no other than Vaka,' he sprang upon the Pandava and clasped the greatly powerful Bhima by both his arms.

22. Bhimasena also clasped the Rakshasha by his strong arms. The mighty hero began to drag him violently.

23. Being dragged by Bhima and dragging Bhima also, the cannibal was gradually overcome with great fatigue.

24. The earth trembled in consequence of their great strength, and large trees that stood there were all broken to pieces.

25. Seeing that the cannibal was overcome with fatigue, Vrikodara pressed him down on the earth with his knees, and he then began to strike him with great force.

26—27. Then placing one knee on the middle of his back, Bhima seized his neck with his right hand and his waist-cloth with his left; he then broke him into two with great force. He (the cannibal) then uttered a fearful yell.

28. O Vishampata, then the Rakshasha, when he was thus fearfully broken by Bhima, vomitted blood.

Thus ends the hundred and sixty-fifth chapter, the fight between Vaka and Bhima, in the Vaka-badha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXVI.

(VAKA-BADHA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Vaka, huge as a mountain, being thus broken by Bhima, died uttering fearful yells.

2. O king, terrified by that noise, the relatives of that Rakshasha with their attendants came out of their houses.

3. Seeing them terrified and deprived of reason, that best of all wielders of arms, the strong Bhima, comforted them and made them promise (to give up cannibalism.)

Bhima said :—

4. Do not again kill men. If you do it, you will be killed like this (Vaka).

Vaishampayana said :—

5. O descendant of Bharata, hearing his these words, those Rakshashas gave the desired promise by saying "Be it so."

6. O descendant of Bharata, from that day the people inhabiting that town saw the Rakshashas very peaceful towards mankind.

7. Then Bhima took the dead cannibal and placed him at one of the gates (of the city) unobserved by any. He then went away.

8. Seeing Vaka killed by Bhima and his extraordinary strength, the kinsmen (of the Rakshasha) became frightened and fled in different directions.

9. Then Bhima, thus killing him (Vaka), returned to the house of the Brahmana and described to the prince (Yudhisthira) in detail all that had happened.

10. The next morning the inhabitants of the town, in coming out, saw the Rakshasha lying dead on the ground, his body covered with blood.

11. The citizens' hair stood on end when they saw the fearful cannibal, as huge as a mountain cliff.

12. Going to Ekachakra, they soon gave the intelligence; thereupon, O king, thousands of the citizens,

13. Accompanied by their wives both young and old,—(all) went there to see Vaka. They were all astonished at seeing the superhuman feat. O king they began to worship the gods.

14. They then began to calculate whose turn was to supply food (to the Rakshasha) on the previous day. Ascertaining this, they all came to that Brahmana and asked him (if he knew any thing about the matter.)

15. Having been thus repeatedly asked by them that best of Brahmanas thus spoke to all the citizens in order to conceal the Pandavas.

16. "Seeing me weeping with my friends when I was ordered to supply the food (for the Rakshasha), a high-minded Brahmana, learned in Mantras, saw me.

17. Asking me the cause and knowing the calamity that hangs over the town, that best of Brahmanas gave me every assurance and spoke to me with smiles,

18. "I shall to-day carry the food to that wicked-minded wretch. "Do not fear for me." He said this

19. And taking the food, set out for the forest where Vaka lived. This deed, so beneficial to us, must have been done by him.

20. Thereupon all the Brahmanas and Kshatriyas became exceedingly astonished, and the Vaisyas and Sudras became exceedingly glad.

21. Thereupon all the citizens returned to the city after seeing that extraordinary feat. The Pandavas also lived there.

Thus ends the hundred and sixty sixth chapter, the killing of Vaka, in the Vakabadha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXVII.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA).

Janamejaya said:—

1. O Brahmana, what did those best of men, the Pandavas, do after they had killed the Rakshasha Vaka.

2. O king, after killing the Rakshasha Vaka, they lived in the house of that Brahmana engaged in the study of the Vedas.

3. A few days after, a Brahmana of rigid vows came to the house of the Brahmana in order to live there.

4. That best of Brahmanas, ever hospitable to hosts, after duly worshipping him, in his house, gave him quarters to live.

5. Then all those, O best of men, the Pandavas, with Kunti requested the Brahmanas to narrate his interesting experiences.

6. He spoke to them of various countries, pilgrimages, rivers, kingdoms, many wonderful provinces and cities.

7. O Janamejaya, when the narrations were over, that Brahmana spoke to them of the wonderful Sayamvara of the daughter of Jagmasena, the princess of Panchala,

8. And the births of Dhristadyumna and Shikhandi and that of Krishna, born of no woman, in the sacrifice of Drupada.

9. When he concluded, those best of men (the Pandavas) hearing of these extraordinary affairs asked him to narrate it in detail.

The Pandavas said:—

10—11. O Brahmana, how did the birth of Dhristadyumna, the son of Drupada, take place from the (sacrificial) fire? How did the wonderful birth of Krishna take place from the (sacrificial) altar? How did (the sons of Drupada) learn all weapons from the great bowman Drona? How and for whom and for what reason was the friendship between Drona and Drupada broken?

Vaishampayana said:—

12. O king, having been thus asked by those best of men, the Brahmana narrated in detail the account of the birth of Draupadi.

Thus ends the hundred and seventy seventh chapter, the narration by the Brahmana, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXVIII.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

The Brahmana said:—

1. There lived at the source of the Ganges a great Rishi of rigid vows and great wisdom and of severest austerities; his name was Bharadwaja.

2. One day when the Rishi came to the Ganges to perform his ablutions, he saw the Apsara Gritachi who came before him and who now stood there after her ablutions.

3. A wind rose on the banks of the river and made the cloth (of the Apsara) fall from her body. Seeing her nude, the Rishi was filled with desire.

4. He was a Brahmachari from his boyhood, and (therefore) as soon as his mind felt the influence of desire, his vital fluid dropped down. The Rishi held it in a Drona (water-pot).

5. From that pot was born a son, the learned Drona, and he studied all the Vedas and the Vedangas.

6. Bharadwaja had a friend, who was a king by the name of Prishata. He had a son, called Drupada.

7. That son of Prishata, that best of the Kshatriyas, went daily to the hermitage and played and studied with Drona.

8. After Prishata's death, Drupada succeeded him as king. (About this time) Drona heard that (Parusha) Rama was going to distribute away all his wealth.

9. Going from the forest, the son of Bharadwaja (Drona) thus spoke to Rama, O excellent Brahmana, know me to be Drona. I have come for obtaining wealth.

Rama said:—

10. O Brahmana, after giving away all I have now left only my body. Ask from me either my body or weapons.

Drona said:—

11. You should give me all your weapons together with the knowledge of hurling and recalling them.

The Brahmana said:—

12. Saying "Be it so," the descendant of Vrigu gave him (the weapons), and having received them, Drona considered himself crowned with success.

13. Obtaining from Rama that great weapon called Brahmasira, Drona became exceedingly glad and acquired superiority over all men.

14. Thereupon that powerful son of Bharadwaja went to that best of men Drupada and said, "Know me to be your friend."

Drupada said:—

15. One of low birth can never be the friend of one whose lineage is pure. He who is not a car-warrior can never be the friend of one who is; he who is not a king can never be a friend one who is. Therefore why do you desire (to revive) our old friendship?

The Brahmana said:—

16. Being determined to humiliate the Panchala king, that intelligent man (Drona) went to the city of Hastinapur, the capital of the Kurus.

17. Thereupon Bhisma, taking with him his grandsons with much wealth, offered them to the intelligent Drona as his pupils.

18. With the intention of humiliating Drupada, Drona called together all his pupils, and he spoke thus to them and to the sons of Kunti.

19. O sinless ones, when you will be all experts in arms, you must give me as the preceptorial fee that which I cherish in my heart." Aryuna and others said to the preceptor, "Be it so."

20. When all the Pandavas became experts in arms and sure in aim, then Drona thus spoke demanding his preceptorial fee.

Drona said:—

21. The son of Prishata, Drupada is the king of Chatravati. Take from him that kingdom and bestow it soon on me.

The Brahmana said:—

22. Then the five sons of Pandu defeated Drupada in battle, and taking him prisoner along with his ministers, they offered him to Drona.

Drona said:—

23. O king, I again solicit your friendship. He who is not a king should not be a friend of a king.

24. Therefore, O Jagmasena, I shall divide this kingdom amongst ourselves. You will be the king of the country lying on the south banks of the Bhagirathi, and I shall be that on the north banks.

The Brahmana said:—

25. Being thus addressed by the intelligent son of Bharadwaja, the Panchala king spoke thus to that excellent Brahmana, that best of all wielders of arms Drona,

26. "O high-souled son of Bharadwaja, be blessed. Let it be. Let there be everlasting friendship between us as you desire."

27. Thus addressing each other and establishing excellent friendship between themselves, Drona and the Panchala king—those two chastisers of foes,—went away to the place whence they came.

28. The thought of that humiliation did not (however) leave the king's mind for a single moment. Being miserable in mind, the king wasted away.

Thus ends the hundred and sixty-eighth chapter, the birth of Draupadi, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXIX.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

The Brahmana said :—

1. Sorrowful in mind and afflicted with grief, the king Drupada wandered among the hermitages of many Brahmanas,—all experts in sacrificial rites.

2. Afflicted with grief and eagerly desirous of offspring, he daily thought, "Alas! I have no excellent son."

3. He always said in despondency, "Fie on those children and relatives that I have!" He always sighed thinking of revenging himself on Drona.

4—6. O descendant of Bharata, even after much deliberation, that best of kings, (Drupada) did not find any means to overcome the prowess, the discipline, the training and the accomplishments of Drona by his Kshatrya might. Wandering about, the king came (at last) to the hermitage of a Brahmana situate on the banks of the holy Ganges. There was no Brahmana who was not a Snataka and none who was not of rigid vows.

7. There saw that illustrious king two (Brahmanas) named Jaja and Upajaja, both were of rigid vows, both were self-controlled, and both belonged to the highest order.

8. They belonged to the race of Kashyapa, and they were engaged in studying the Institutes. Those two Brahmana Rishis were quite capable of helping the king.

9. Having brought his senses under control, he with all earnestness worshipped and served them. Knowing the superiority of the younger of the two,

10. He worshipped in private Upajaja of rigid vows, by offering him every desired object, by serving at his feet and by becoming sweet-speeched.

11. Worshipping him in due form, he (Drupada) said to Upajaja, "O Brahmana, if you perform that sacrifice which may give me a son who can kill Drona,

12. O Upajaja, on your doing this,—I shall give you ten thousand kine.

13. O best of Brahmanas, I am ready to bestow on you whatever else be in your mind and whatever which is agreeable to you. There is no doubt about it."

14. Having been thus addressed, the Rishi replied to him, "I can not." Thereupon Drupada again began to worship and serve him.

15. O king, after the expiration of a year, that best of the twice-born, Upajaja, spoke thus to Drupada in sweet words,

16. "My eldest brother while roving in a dense forest took up a fruit that had fallen on the ground, not knowing that it was unclean.

17. I was following him, and I saw this unworthy act of my brother. He never scruples to take impure things.

18. In taking that fruit he did not see any impropriety of a sinful nature. One who does not observe purity (in one thing) is expected not to observe it in other things.

19. When he lived in the preceptor's house reading the Institutes, he used often to eat without any scruples in his mind the remnants of other people's food.

20. He again and again speaks highly of food; and he has no hatred for any thing. Arguing from this I see that he desires for earthly acquisitions.

21—22. O king, go to him, he will perform sacrifices for you." Having heard those words of Upajaja, the king, though he entertained a low opinion of Jaja, went to his house. Worshipping him who was worthy of worship, he thus spoke to him. "O lord, I shall give you eighty thousand kine; perform my spiritual actions. I am burnt by my feelings of enmity towards Drona. You should cool my heart.

23. That foremost of men, learned in the Vedas, (Drona) is skilled in the Brahma weapon. Therefore, Drona has defeated me in a contest arising out of a quarrel on friendship.

24. The greatly intelligent son of Bharadwaja (Drona) is now the chief preceptor of the Kurus. There is no Kshatrya in the world who is superior to him.

25. His arrows are capable of killing every living being, his bow is full six cubits long and it looks exceedingly great.

26. That high-souled great Bowman, that son of Bharadwaja (Drona,) attired in the Brahmanic garb, is destroying the Kshatrya might.

27. Like the son of Jamadagni, Parashurama, he is engaged in annihilating the Kshatryas. There is no man on earth who can overcome the terrible force of his arms.

28. Like blazing fire fed with Ghee, Drona, possessing both the Brahma might, and the Kshatrya might consumes every antagonist in battle.

29. Your Brahma might is superior to his Brahma might, though his is united with his Kshatrya might. As I am inferior to Drona) in consequence of my having only Kshatrya might, therefore, give me your Brahma might.

30—31. As I have got you who is superior to Drona in Brahma might, O Jaja, perform that sacrifice by which I can obtain a son, who is invincible and who can kill Drona in battle. I am ready to give you ten Kotis kine." Saying, "Be it so," Jaja recollected the various particulars of the sacrifice in question.

32. Knowing the gravity of the matter, he asked the assistance of Upajaja who coveted nothing. Then Jaja promised to perform the sacrifice for the destruction of Drona.

33. Thereupon the great ascetic Upajaja spoke to the king (Drupada) all that is required for the sacrifice from which the king was to obtain offspring.

Upajaja said :—

34. O king, a son will be born to you who will possess, as you desire, great prowess, great energy and great strength.

The Brahmana said :—

35. Then king Drupada, being desirous of obtaining a son who was to slay the son of Bharadwaja (Drona) began to make the necessary preparations for the success of his wish.

36. Jaja then poured libations of Ghee on the sacrificial fire and ordered the queen thus, "O queen, O daughter-in-law of Prishata, come here a son and a daughter have come for you.

The Queen said :—

37. O Brahmana, my mouth is filled with saffron and other perfumes ; my body bears many sweet scents ; I am not now fit for accepting the sacrificial Ghee which would give me offspring. O Jaja, wait for me a little, for that happy consummation.

Jaja said :—

38. Whether you come or wait, why should not the object of this sacrifice be accomplished when the oblation has already been prepared by me and sanctified by Upajaja's invocations !

The Brahmana said :—

39. Having said this, the sacrificial priest (Jaja) poured the sanctified libation on the fire, whereupon arose from those flames a celestial-like boy.

40. He was as effulgent as the fire ; he was terrible to look at ; he had a crown on his head ; and his body was encased in an excellent armour ; he had a sword in his hand, carried a bow and arrows, and he frequently sent forth loud roars.

41. As soon as he was born, he got on an excellent car and went about. Thereupon the Panchalas shouted in great joy "Blessed, blessed."

42—43. The very earth appeared to be unable to bear the weight of the madly joyous Panchalas. "The prince has been born for the destruction of Drona. He will dispell all the fears of the Panchalas and spread their fame. He will also remove the grief of the king." Thus said the greatly wonderful voice of the sky-ranging beings.

44. There rose from the (sacrificial altar) a daughter, called Panchali, who was blessed with good fortune ; she was beautiful,—her eyes were smiling and large,

45. Her complexion was dark, her eyes were like lotus-leaves, her hair was blue and curly, her nails were beautifully carved and they were like bright copper,—her eyebrows were fair, her breasts were rising and her thighs tapering.

46. She was a veritable celestial maiden born among men. The sweet fragrance of the blue lotus emitted from her body, and it was perceptible from a distance of full two miles.

47. Her beauty was such that she had no equal on earth. The Devas, the Danavas and the Yakshas could desire that celestial-like beauty.

48. When this beauty of fair hips was born, an invisible voice said, "This beauty of dark complexion will be the best of all women, and she will be the cause of the destruction of the Kshatryas.

49. This lady of slender waist will in time accomplish the works of gods. From her will arise many fears (dangers) to the Kurus.

50. Hearing this, all the Panchalas uttered a loud leonine roar. The earth was unable to bear the weight of the madly joyous Panchalas.

51. The daughter-in-law of Prashita, seeing the two (the boy and the daughter) and being desirous of getting them, came to Jaja and said, "Let not these two know any one else except myself as their mother."

52. Desiring to do good to the king (Drupada) Jaja said, "Be it so." Thereupon the Brahmanas whose wishes were completely gratified (by presents) gave these two (children) names.

53. (They said,) "Because this son of Drupada possesses excessive audacity and because he has been born like Dyumna with a natural armour of weapons, let him be called Dhristadyumna.

54. Because this daughter is dark in complexion, let her be called Krishna." Thus were born the son and daughter of Drupada in the great sacrifice.

55—56. Then Drona brought the Panchala prince Dhristadyumna to his own house and taught him all weapons as a requital of taking the half of the kingdom of Drupada. Regarding Destiny to be inevitable, the illustrious son of Bharadwaja did what would perpetuate his own deeds.

Thus ends the hundred and sixty-ninth chapter, the birth of Dhristadyumna and Draupadi, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXX.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having heard this, the sons of Kunti appeared as if they were pierced with darts. Those mighty men lost their peace of mind.

2. Thereupon that truthful lady Kunti, seeing all his sons' minds are in great anxiety, thus spoke to Yudhishthira.

Kunti said :—

3. We have now lived for many nights in the abode of this Brahmana ; we have very pleasantly passed in this beautiful city, living on the alms of many high-souled men.

4. O chastiser of foes, we have seen again and again all the beautiful woods and forests in this part of the country.

5. To see them again would give us no pleasure. O heroic descendant of Kuru, alms are not so easily obtainable now as before.

6. O blessed one, if you wish to go to Panchala, let us go there. O hero, we have not seen it before—it must be beautiful.

7. O destroyer of foes, we have heard that alms are easily obtainable in Panchala, and the king Jagmasena is devoted to the Brahmanas.

8. It is not my opinion that one should live long in one place. Therefore, O son, if you like it is well for us to go there.

Yudhishthira said :—

9. That which is your opinion and command is (always) to our great good. (But) I do not know whether my younger brothers are willing to go.

Vaishampayana said :—

10. Thereupon Kunti spoke to Bhimasena, Aryuna and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) about the (proposed) journey, and they said, " Be it so."

11. O king, then Kunti saluting the Brahmana started for the beautiful city of the illustrious Drupada.

Thus ends the hundred and seventieth chapter, the departure for the Panchala country, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXI.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When the illustrious Pandavas were living in disguise, the son of Satyavati, Vyasa, once came to see them.

2. Seeing him coming, those chastisers of foes advanced and bowed down their heads and worshipped him. Then they stood (before him) with joined hands.

3. Then they all took their seats at the command (of the Rishi), and the Rishi, being thus gratified by the sons of Pritha living in disguise, cheerfully spoke to them thus,

Vyasa said :—

4. " O chastisers of foes, are you following the path of virtue and scriptures? Do you worship the Brahmanas? You are not deficient in giving homage to those that deserve homage."

Vaishampayana said :—

5. That illustrious Rishi thus spoke many words of virtuous import. Speaking on various subjects, he again spoke thus.

Vyasa said :—

6. There lived in a wood a certain illustrious Rishi who had a daughter of slender waist, fair hips, fine eye-brows, and of all accomplishments.

7. As a result of her own actions (in her previous birth) she became very unfortunate. That beautiful chaste girl did not get a husband.

8. Thereupon, she began with sorrowful heart to perform austere penances with the object of getting a husband. And she gratified Sankara (Siva) by her severe asceticism.

9. The high-souled (deity,) being thus gratified, spoke thus to the illustrious girl,

"Ask the boon you desire to have. Be blessed ; I am Sankara who is willing to give you a boon."

10. Being desirous of benefitting herself, she again and again said to the supreme deity, "Give me an accomplished husband."

11. Then that foremost of all great speakers, Ishana (Siva,) replied to her saying, "O blessed lady, you will have five husbands from among the Bharata princes."

12. Having been thus addressed the maiden thus spoke to the deity who gave her the boon, "O deity, O lord, I desire to have only one husband through your grace."

13. The deity addressed her again and said these excellent words, "You have said five times, "Give me a husband"

14. Therefore, you will have in another life, what I have said now." That celestial like girl was born in the race of Drupada. That faultless Krishna, the descendant of Prishata, is destined to be the wife of all of you (the five Pandavas.)

15. O greatly powerful heroes, go to the city of the Panchalas, and live there. There is no doubt you will all be very happy on obtaining her as your wife.

Vaishampayana said :—

16. Having said this to the Pandavas, that greatly blessed grandfather, that great ascetic, after having been saluted by the sons of Pritha (the Pandavas) and Kunti, went to the place whence he came.

Thus ends the hundred and seventy first chapter, the advice of Vyasa, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXII .

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When the illustrious Vyasa went away, those best of men, the Pandavas, proceeded with joyous heart, (towards Panchala) placing their mother at the head (of the procession.)

2. Those chastisers of foes proceeded in a northerly direction in order to reach their destination. They walked day and night and reached (the several) Shomasrama.

3. Those best of men, the sons of Pandu, came to (the banks of) the Ganges. The great car-warrior Dhananjaya (Aryuna) walked before, carrying torch in his hand for showing them the way and for protecting them.

4. There in the delightful waters of the Ganges was sporting in solitude the proud king of the Gandharvas (Chitraratha) with his wives.

5. He heard the noise (of the footsteps of the Pandavas) approaching the river. The greatly strong (Gandharva) was inflamed with wrath by (hearing) the noise.

6. Seeing there those chastisers of foes, the Pandavas, with their mother, and drawing his fearful bow, he spoke thus,

7--8. "It is known that excepting the first forty labas of the dark twilight that proceeds night, (the other portion of the night) is set apart for the Yakshas, the Ghandharvas and the Rakshashas who are capable of going every where at will. The rest of the time is set apart for men.

9. Therefore, if any man out of greed wander during those moments and come near us, both we, (the Gandharvas) and the Rakshashas kill those fools.

10. The men learned in the Vedas disapprove (the actions of) those men,—nay even of the kings at the head of their armies,—who come to any lake or river at such a time.

11. Stay at a distance. Do not come near me. Know you not that I am (now) bathing in the waters of the Bhagirathi.

12. Know me to be the Gandharva, named Angarparna who depends only on his own strength of arms. I am proud and haughty ; I am the friend of Kuvera.

13. This my forest on the banks of the Ganges is known by the name of Angarparna in which I sport to gratify myself.

14. The Kapalikas, the Sringis or the Devas, dare not come here—it appears you are human beings. How dare you (then) to approach me who is the brightest jewel in Kuvera's crown?"

Aryuna said :—

15. O wretch, to whom can the ocean, the sides of the Himalayas, or this river Ganges be barred, whether at night or day or at twilight ?

16. O sky-ranger, whether the stomach be empty or full, there is no special time to come to this foremost of all rivers, the Ganges, whether it is night or day.

17. We are endued with prowess,—we care not when we disturb you. O wicked being, those men that are incapable (of fighting) worship you.

18. This Ganges, issuing out of the golden peaks of the Himalayas, falls into the ocean by seven streams.

19. (They are) Ganga, Yamuna, Saraswati, Vitastha, Saraju, Gomati and Gandaki.

20. Those that drink the waters of these seven rivers are cleansed of their sins. O Gandharva, this sacred Ganga, flowing through the celestial regions, is called there Alakananda, 21—22. And in the regions of Pitris, it is called Vaitarani, which is not crossable by the sinners. Krishna Dwaipayana has said that this auspicious and celestial river is accessible at all times by all. Why do you wish to bar us from it? It is not consonant with the eternal virtue.

23. Why should we not, disregarding your words, touch at pleasure the sacred waters of the Bhagirathi which is ever accessible to all.

Vaishampayana said :—

24. Hearing this, Angarparna became very angry, and drawing his bow he shot at them his arrows which were like the poisonous snakes.

25. The Pandava Dhananjaya, who had an excellent shield, warded off all those arrows with it and with the torch in his hand.

Aryuna said :—

26. O Gandharva, seek not to terrify those who are skilled in weapons, for weapons hurled at them vanish like froth.

27. O Gandharva, I know Gandharvas are superior to men (in prowess). I shall, therefore, fight with you by using the celestial weapons. I shall not use delusions.

28. The fire-weapon that I hurl against you was formerly given by the preceptor of Indra, Vrihaspati, to Bharadwaja.

29. From Bharadwaja it was obtained by Agnivisha, and from Agnivisha by my preceptor; and that excellent Brahmana Drona gave it to me.

Vaishampayana said :—

30. Having said this, the Pandava (Aryuna) angrily hurled at the Gandharva that blazing fire-weapon which immediately burnt his chariot.

31. Having fainted away by the force of the weapon, the greatly powerful Gandharva was falling headlong downwards from his chariot,

32. (But) Dhananjaya seized him by the hair of his head which was adorned with garlands of flowers. He dragged towards his brother that (Gandharva),—insensible in consequence of (being wounded by) the weapon.

33. (Seeing this), his wife, named Khumbhinashi, being desirous of rescuing her husband, came to Yudhisthira and asked his protection.

The Gandharvi said :—

34. O exalted one, extend your protection to me. Set my husband free. O Lord, I am a Gandharvi, named Kumbhinashi,—I ask your protection.

Yudhisthira said :—

35. O chastiser of foes, who would kill an enemy who has been vanquished in the battle, who has been deprived of his fame, who is protected by a woman, and who is incapable (of defending himself), O child, set him free.

Aryuna said :—

36. O Gandharva, take your life. Go hence, and do not grieve. The king of the Kurus, Yudhisthira orders me to-day to show you mercy.

The Gandharva said :—

37. I have been defeated by you, therefore I shall give up my former name of Angarparna. In name only I shall not be boastful when really I am not strong in prowess like men.

38. It is a great fortune to me that I have obtained a man who wields celestial weapons. I am desirous to impart to Aryuna the power of illusions of the Gandharvas.

39. My excellent and beautiful chariot has been burnt by your fire-weapon. I was (formerly) called Chitraratha having a beautiful chariot, I shall now be called Dagdharatha (having the chariot) burnt.

40. The science (of illusion) of which I spoke to you and which I formerly obtained by asceticism will be to-day given by me to that illustrious man who has given me my life.

41. What good fortune does he not deserve to obtain who after defeating an enemy gives him his life when he asks it from him?

42. This science is called Chakshushi. It was taught by Manu to Soma. Soma taught it to Vishwaparbha, Vishwaparbha taught it to me.

43. Having been given by the preceptor to one who is a Kapurusha (without energy) it went to die out. I have spoken to you about its coming (origin and transmission); listen now to its prowess.

44. Whatever you will desire to see by your eyes in this world and whatever its nature it will be seen by you (by the help of this science).

45. One can acquire this (science) by standing on one leg for six months. I shall impart to you this science without your observing any vows.

46. O king, (only) on account of this science, we have a superiority over men. Because we are capable of seeing everything (by our spiritual eyes), we are equal to the celestials.

47. O excellent man, I desire to give you and your brothers, each separately, one hundred horses born in the regions of the Gandharvas.

48. They are employed in carrying the Devas and the Gandharvas; they are of the celestial colour, and they possess speed as that of the mind. They may be lean and thin in body, but they never feel tired, and their speed never suffers for this reason.

49. The thunder was created by Indra in the days of yore in order to kill Vitra, (but) it broke into a thousand pieces when hurled on Vitra's head.

50. Thereupon the celestials worshipped those fragments of the thunder thus broken into pieces. That which is known in the world as the wealth of fame is a portion of the thunder.

51. The hands of Brahmanas are (the portions of) the thunder; the chariots of the Kshatryas are (also the portions of) the thunder. The charity of the Vaisyas are (also the portions of) the thunder, and the services of the Sudras are (also the portion of) the thunder.

52. The horses of the Kshatryas being the portions of the thunder, it is said they are never to be killed. The portions of the chariots (the horses) are the offspring of Vadaba. Those amongst them that are Suras

53. Are capable of assuming any colour at pleasure, of going any where at will, and of running at its owner's will. These horses of mine born in the Gandharva region will always fulfil your desire.

Aryuna said :—

54. O Gandharva, if you give me out of your satisfaction for obtaining life in a crisis, these horses and the wealth of science I shall not accept it.

The Gandharva said :—

55. A meeting with an illustrious person is always a matter of gratification. Besides you have given me my life. Thus being pleased with you, I give you the science.

56. O best of the Bharata race, O Vivatsa, so that the obligation may be not only on one side, I shall take from you your excellent and eternal fire-weapon.

Aryuna said :—

57. O Gandharva, I shall take your horses in exchange of my weapon. Let our friendship be ever-lasting. O friend, tell me that from which the danger of ours (human beings) arises from the Gandharvas.

58. O Gandharva, we are all chastisers of foes; we are all learned in the Vedas, and (we are all) virtuous. Tell us why we were censured by you when travelling at night.

The Gandharva said :—

59. O sons of Pandu, you do not keep fire; you have no wives; you have no Brahmanas walking before you; therefore you were censured by me.

60. The Yakshas, the Rakshashas, the Gandharvas, the Pishachas, the Uragas, and the Danavas are wise and intelligent. They speak much of the Kuru race.

61. O hero, I have heard from Narada and other Rishis the accomplishments of your intelligent ancestors.

62. While roaming over the earth attired in her ocean-cloth, I myself have seen the great prowess of your race.

63. O Aryuna, I personally know your preceptor, the illustrious son of Bharadwaja (Drona), who is celebrated in the three worlds for his learning in the Vedas and the science of archery.

64. O best of the Kuru race, O Partha, I know also Dharma, Vayu, Indra, Ashwinis, and Pandu,—these six spreaders of the Kuru race. These (six) excellent celestials and man are your fathers.

65—66. Knowing too that you are high-souled, you are illustrious, you are the foremost of all wielders of arms, you, all brothers, are great heroes, you are virtuous and observant of vows, your understandings and hearts are excellent, and your behaviour faultless, I still censured you.

67. O descendant of Kuru, no man, possessing strength of arms, ought to bear with patience any ill usage before his wife.

68. O son of Kunti, our strength specially increases at the time of night. As I was accompanied by my wife, I was filled with wrath.

69. O best of all vow-observing men, I was vanquished by you in battle; hear from me the reasons for which I was discomfited.

70. Bramhacharja is a great virtue, you are in it (leading that mode of life). O Partha, it is for this that I was defeated by you in battle.

71. O chastiser of foes, if any Kshatrya, engaged in the exercise of his desire, fight with us at night, he can never escape from us with his life.

72. O Partha, a Kshatrya, engaged in the exercise of his desire, may defeat all the wanderers of night (as we are), if he is sanctified by Brahma, and if he assigns the cares of his state to his priest.

73—74. O descendant of Tapati, men should, therefore, always employ learned and self-controlled priests for the acquisition of every good fortune that he desires (to get). That man is fit to be the priest of kings who is engaged in the study of the Vedas and their six branches, who is pure and truthful, and who is virtuous-minded and self-controlled.

75. That king becomes ever victorious (in this world) and obtains heaven in the next, who has a priest, who is learned in the precepts of morals, who is a master of words and who is pure and well-behaved.

76. The king should always select an accomplished priest who can protect what he has and acquires what he has not.

77. He, who desires his own prosperity, should ever be guided by his priest; he may then acquire the whole earth attired in her ocean-cloth.

78. O descendant of Tapati, a king, who is without a Brahmana, can never acquire any land by his bravery or nobility of birth only.

79. O spreader of the Kuru race, therefore, know that the kingdoms with Brahmanas at their heads can be retained for long.

Thus ends the hundred and seventy second chapter, the words of the Gandharva, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXIII.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

Aryuna said :—

1. You have addressed me as the descendant of Tapati. I wish to know what the precise signification of this word is.

2. O blessed being, we are the sons of Kunti, therefore, we are Kaunteyas, but who is Tapati that we should be called Tapatyas. I desire to hear about it.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. Having been thus addressed by the son of Kunti, Dhananjaya, that Gandharva narrated the story who is celebrated in the three worlds.

The Gandharva said :—

4. O Partha, O foremost of all intelligent men, I shall duly narrate to you in detail this interesting story.

5. Hear with attention what I say about the reason for which I addressed you as Tapatya.

6. He, who pervades the whole firmament by his light, had a daughter, named Tapati,—equal to himself (in effulgence).

7. That daughter of the Vivashwata (Tapati) was the younger sister of Savitri. She was celebrated in the three worlds and devoted to asceticism.

8. There was none equal to her in beauty amongst the Deva, the Asura, the Yaksha the Raksha, the Apsara, and the Gandharva ladies.

9. She was perfectly semetrical in body and faultless in features; she had black and large eyes; she was attired in beautiful robes; she was chaste and exceedingly well-conducted.

10. O descendant of Bharata, seeing her, Vivashwata thought, there was none who had beauty, accomplishments, good behaviour and learning to be fit for her husband.

11. Seeing that his daughter had attained the age of puberty and that she was worthy of being bestowed on a husband, he had no peace of mind, for he always thought on whom he should bestow her.

12. O son of Kunti, that best of the Kurus, the son of Riksha, the mighty king Samvarana, worshipped Surya

13. With due offers of Aryha, garlands and scents, with being always pure and holy, and with vows, fasts and asceticism of various kinds.

14. The descendant of Puru (Samvarana) worshipped the deity, effulgent in all his glory, with devotion, humitily and piety.

15. Thereupon Surya, seeing Samvarana, learned in the precepts of religion and matchless in the world for his beauty, considered him to be the fittest husband for (his daughter) Tapati.

16. O descendant of Kuru, Surya then desired to bestow his daughter on that excellent king Samvarana of the Kuru race, who was celebrated all over the world.

17. As Surya in the heavens fills the firmament with his splendour, so did king Samvarana fill every region on the earth with the splendour of his good achievements.

18. O Partha, as men learned in the Vedas worship the sun manifests in all his glory, so did all men except the Brahmanas worship Samvarana.

19. Blessed with good fortune, the king (Samvarana) excelled Soma (moon) in soothing the hearts of friends and Surya (sun) in scorching the hearts of the enemies.

20. O descendant of Kuru, Tapana himself resolved upon bestowing Tapati on the king (Samvarana) endued with such virtue and accomplishments.

21. O Partha, once upon a time that king, blessed with good fortune and endued with great prowess, went out to hunt in the woods on the mountains.

22. When thus hunting, the horse of that king of the Kuru race was overcome with hunger and thirst, and he (horse) died on the mountains.

23. O Partha, abandoning the dead horse, the king walked on the mountain and saw a maiden of large eyes and matchless beauty.

24. That chastiser of foes, that best of kings, himself being alone and the maiden being also alone, stood motionless, and he steadfastly gazed at her.

25. The king regarded her for her beauty as the goddess Lakshmi. He regarded her beauty to be the embodiment of the rays emanating from the sun.

26. In splendour of body, she resembled a flame of fire, and in benignity and loveliness she resembled the spotless disc of the moon.

27. The black-eyed maiden, standing on the mountain breast, looked like a bright statue of gold.

28. In consequence of the beauty and splendour of that maiden the mountain itself with its creepers and plants appeared as if it has been converted into gold.

29. The sight of that maiden inspired the king with a contempt for all the women of the world that he had seen before. Seeing her, the king considered his eyes blessed.

30. Nothing that the king has seen from the day of his birth could equal, he argued, the beauty of that girl.

31. (He thought) "The creator has created the beauty of this beautiful-eyed maiden after churning the whole world of the Devas and the Asuras and the human beings." The king's heart and eyes were captivated by that maiden, as if they became bound in ropes; he remained rooted to the spot deprived of his senses.

32. Thus arguing, the king Samvarana considered that maiden as matchless in the wealth of her beauty in the three worlds.

33. The king of the noble birth, seeing that blessed beauty, was pierced by the arrows of the god of love.

34. Having been burnt in the very scorching fire of Kama (desire), he (the king) thus spoke to that charming maiden, still innocent though in her full youth.

The Samvarana said:—

35. O lady of tapering thighs,—who and whose are you? Why are you staying here? O lady of sweet smiles, why do you wander alone in these solitary woods?

36. You are perfectly faultless in your every feature; decked in every ornament, you seem to be the coveted ornament of those ornaments themselves.

37. You seem to be not a Devi or an Asuri, or a Yakshmi, or a Rakshashi; you are not a Nagini or a Gandharvi or a Manushi.

38. O excellent lady, the best of women that I have seen or heard of can not equal you in beauty.

39. O lady of beautiful feature, seeing your face which is lovelier than the moon, and your eyes like the lotus leaves, I am oppressed by the god of love.

The Gandharva said:—

40. The king, oppressed by desire, thus addressed her in the solitary woods, but she did not speak a word in reply.

41. When the king repeatedly asked her thus, the large-eyed maiden quickly disappeared in the very sight of the king like a flash of lightning.

42. The king then, like one who has lost his reason, wandered through the whole forest in search of that lotus-eyed maiden.

43. Having failed to find her, that best of kings gave vent to much lamentations, and he remained motionless in grief for some time.

Thus ends the hundred and seventy third chapter, the history of Tapati, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXIV.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—*contd.The Gandharva said:—

1. On the disappearance of the maiden, that chastiser of foes the king, being deprived of his senses by desire, fell on the ground.

2. On his falling down on the ground, that maiden of sweet smiles and of swelling and round hips, appeared again before the king.

3. The blessed beauty (Tapati) then spoke to that king, the perpetuator of the Kuru race, these sweet words.

4—5. Sweetly smiling, Tapati spoke thus in sweet words, "Rise, rise, O chastiser of foes, be blessed. O best of kings, you are celebrated in the world, it does not befit you to lose your senses." Having been thus addressed by her in these sweet words,

6. The king (opening his eyes) saw before him that maiden of swelling hips. The king then addressed that black-eyed maiden thus,

7—9. In accents weak with emotion, and his heart burning with the fire of desire, "O black-eyed beauty, O excellent lady, be blessed. I am burning with desire; and I, therefore, solicit you. Accept me, my life is ebbing away. O lady of large eyes, O lotus-eyed beauty, it is all for (not having obtained) you. The god of love pierces me day and night with his arrows. O blessed lady, I have been bitten by Kama (the god of love) who is like a large snake.

10. O lady of faultless features, O lady of tapering thighs, O lady of sweet voice as that of the Kinnaris, have mercy on me; my life depends on you.

11. O lady of beautiful and faultless features, O lady with the face like the lotus or the moon, O timid lady, I shall certainly be unable to live without you.

12. O lotus-eyed lady, O lady of large eyes, the god of love is incessantly piercing me, be merciful towards me.

13. O black-eyed lady, you should not abandon me. O handsome lady, you should relieve me from such affliction by giving me your love.

14. O blessed beauty, at the very first sight, my heart has been captivated by you. My mind wanders. Seeing you, I do not like to cast my eyes on any other woman.

15. O beautiful maiden, be merciful,—I am your obedient (slave), (I am) your adorer; accept me. O beautiful lady, O large-eyed maiden, as soon as I saw you, be god of love,

16. Entered my heart, and he is piercing me with his arrows. O large-eyed lady, O lotus-eyed beauty, the great fire of desire is burning within me.

17—18. Extinguish that fire by throwing on it the water of your love. O beautiful lady, pacify, by becoming mine, the irrepresible god of love that has appeared here (in my heart) armed with bow and arrows; he pierces me incessantly with his sharp arrows.

19. O beautiful-featured maiden, O lady of tapering hips, marry me according to the Gandharva form, for of all kinds of marriage the Gandharva form has been said to be the best."

Tapati said:—

20. O king, I am not the mistress of my ownself. Know me to be a maiden living under the control of my father. If you really love me, ask me of my father.

21. O king, you say that your heart has been robbed by me; but you too have robbed my heart at the first sight.

22. O best of kings, I am not the mistress of my body; therefore I do not go near you. Women are never independent.

23. Is there any girl in the three worlds who would not desire for her husband such a king as you,—kind to all your dependents and born of a noble race.

24. Therefore, when the opportunity comes, ask me of my father Aditya with due salutation, ascetic penances and vows.

25. O king, O chastiser of foes, if my father bestows me on you when asked, I shall ever be your obedient (wife).

26. My name is Tapati, I am the younger sister of Savitri. O best of Kshatryas, I am the daughter of Surya, the illuminator of the Universe.

Thus ends the hundred and the seventy-fourth chapter, the history of Tapati, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXV.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—*Contd.The Gandharva said:—

1. Having said this, that faultless (maiden) soon ascended the skies; on this the king again fell down on the ground.

2. In searching that best of kings, that monarch's ministers and attendants saw him there in that state in the great forest.

3-4. Seeing that excellent king, that great bowman, lying forsaken on the ground like a rain-bow dropped from the sky, his chief minister became like one burnt by a flame of fire. Coming hastily to him with affection and respect,

5. As a father raises up the son fallen (on the ground) he raised up the king, lying senseless on the ground having been deprived of his senses by desire.

6. Old in wisdom as in age, and in achievements as in policy, the minister became easy of mind when he raised him up.

7. He spoke to him these words, both sweet and beneficial, "O best of men, do not fear. O sinless one, be blessed."

8. The minister thought the king, that destroyer of hostile forces, had been lying on the ground being overcome with hunger, thirst and fatigue.

9. He sprinkled on the crownless head of the king cold water fragrant with the perfume of lotus.

10. Thereupon, the mighty king regained his consciousness; he then sent away all his attendants except that one minister.

11. When that large number of attendants had gone away at the command of the king, the king again sat down on the mountain breast.

12. Then the king becoming pure and folding his hands, worshipped Surya with his face turned upwards on that best of mountains.

13. That chastiser of foes, the king Samvarana, also mentally thought of his priest, that excellent Rishi, Vashistha.

14. The king remained there for days and nights without intermission; and on the twelfth day the Brahmana Rishi (Vashistha) came to him.

15. That great self-controlled Rishi knew by his ascetic power that the king's heart was stolen by Tapati.

16. As soon as that virtuous-minded and the best of Rishis knew this, he became desirous of benefiting the king and gave him his assurances.

17. In the very sight of the king, the illustrious Rishi ascended the sky in order to see Surya,—he himself being as effulgent as that luminary.

18. Thereupon, the Brahmana (Vashistha) came with joined hands to the deity of one thousand rays, and he then introduced himself by saying, "I am Vashistha."

19. Then the greatly effulgent Vivaswata thus spoke to that excellent Brahmana,

"O great Rishi, welcome to you. Tell me what is your desire.

20. O greatly fortunate man, O foremost of all eloquent men, whatever you desire to have, I shall give you however difficult it may be to give."

21. Having been thus addressed after duly bowing down his head to him the Rishi Vashistha of great ascetic merit, thus replied to Vivaswata.

Vashistha said:—

22. O Vivaswata, I ask of you for Samvarana your daughter, named Tapati, the younger sister of Savitri.

23. He (Samvarana) is a mighty king with great achievements; he is learned in the mysteries of religion, and he is high-minded. O ranger of sky, Samvarana is the fittest husband for your daughter.

The Gandharva said:—

24. Having been thus addressed, Vivaswata (Surya) resolved upon bestowing (his daughter on Samvarana), and saluting the Rishi thus replied,

25. "O Rishi, Samvarana is the best of kings; you are (also) the best of all Rishis; Tapati is (surely) the best of all women; what else could be done but to bestow her (on Samvarana)!"

26. Then Tapanas himself gave to the illustrious Vashistha (his daughter) Tapati of perfectly faultless features, so that she might be bestowed on Samvarana.

27. The great Rishi Vashistha accepted that maiden Tapati, and taking leave of Surya he came back to the place,

28. Where that best of the Kurus, the King of celebrated achievements, was. That king who had been possessed of desire and whose heart was completely fixed on her (Tapati)

29. Became exceedingly glad on seeing that celestial maiden Tapati of sweet smiles led towards him by Vashistha.

30. That maiden of fair eye-brows came down from the sky as lightning comes down from the clouds illuminating the ten points of heaven.

31. The illustrious Rishi of pure soul Vashistha came to that king when his vow of the twelfth night was over.

32. Thus Samvarana obtained (Tapati) as his wife by worshipping the propitious lord (Surya) by ascetic penances and by the help of the great effulgence of Vashistha.

33. That best of kings accepted the hands of Tapati in due form on the breast of that mountain frequented by the celestials and the Gandharvas,

34. The royal sage (Samvarana) with the permission of Vashistha desired to sport with his wife on that mountain.

35. He ordered the minister to rule over his capital, his kingdom, his woods and forests.

36. Then bidding farewell to the king, Vashistha left him and went away. Thereupon, the king sported on that mountain like a celestial.

37. The king sported with his wife in the woods and forests on that mountain for twelve (long) years.

38. O descendant of Bharata, for those twelve years the god of one thousand eyes (Indra) did not pour any rains on the capital and the kingdom of that king.

39. O chastiser of foes, when that season of draught commenced, all the people, together with plants, corns and animals began to die.

40. During that terrible season (of draught,) not even a drop of dew fell on the earth, and (consequently) no corn was grown.

41. Thereupon the people, afflicted with the fear of hunger, left their houses in despair and fled in all directions.

42. The famished people of the city and the country abandoned their wives and children and grew reckless of one another.

43. The people, being afflicted with hunger and starvation, became like dead skeletons; and the city looked like the land of the king of the dead full of ghostly beings.

44. Thereupon, seeing the kingdom in such a state, the illustrious Rishi, the best of ascetics, the virtuous-minded Vashistha, thought of remedying the evil.

45. O king, he brought back that best of kings (Samvarana) with his wife (Tapati) to that city, after he had passed many years with her.

46—47. When that best of kings again entered his capital, the state of things became as before, the god of one thousand eyes, the slayer of Asuras, poured rain in abundance; and he caused corn to grow. Thus being revived by that virtuous-minded and that best of kings (Samvarana), the capital and the country became exceedingly glad.

48. Thereupon the king with his wife Tapati performed sacrifices for twelve years, as Indra did with (his wife) Shachi.

49. O Partha, this is the history of the really blessed Tapati of old, the daughter of Vivaswata. It is for her you are Tapatya.

50. O Aryuna, the king Samvarana begat on Tapati a son, named Kuru. Born in the race of Tapati, you are called Tapatya.

Thus ends the hundred and seventy fifth chapter, the history of Tapati, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXVI.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Hearing these words of the Gandharva, that best of the Bharata race, Aryuna, was filled with devotion (towards him), and he stood as manifest as the full moon.

2. His curiosity being excited by what he heard of Vashistha's ascetic power, that best of the Kurus, that great bowman, thus spoke to the Gandharva,

3. "I desire to hear the history of the Rishi whom you have mentioned by the name of Vashistha. Tell me all about him in detail.

4. O chief of the Gandharvas, tell me who this illustrious Rishi was,—he who was the priest of our forefathers."

The Gandharva said:—

5—6. Vashistha was the Brahma's son born of his mind; and he was the husband of Arundhati. Ever difficult of being conquered even by the celestials, Desire and Anger, having been conquered by his ascetic penances, shampooed his feet. He was so high-souled that he did not exterminate the Kaushikas.

7. Though the excellent Rishi's anger was excited by Vishwamitra, though he was afflicted at the loss of his sons, though he was powerful, yet he appeared to be powerless.

8—9. He did not perform any dreadful deed for destroying Vishwamitra. Like the great ocean which does not cross its shore, he did not transgress the law of Yama by bringing back his sons from the land of the dead. It is by obtaining this self-controlled and illustrious (Rishi), the kings,

10. (Namely) Ikshaku and others, became the lords over the whole earth. Getting the excellent Rishi Vashistha as their priest,

11. O descendant of Kuru, O best of the Pandavas, these kings performed many great sacrifices. That Brahmarshi performed the priestly duty of all these excellent kings, as Vrihashpati did that of the celestials.

12. Therefore, seek to appoint as your priest an accomplished Brahmana in whose heart virtue predominates and who is learned in the Vedas.

13. O Partha, a Kshatrya of noble birth should first appoint a priest, if he is (at all) desirous of extending his dominions by conquering the earth. He, who is desirous of conquering the earth, should have a Brahmana before him.

14. Therefore let an accomplished and learned Brahmana, who has conquered his senses and who is learned in Dharma, Artha and Kama, be your priest.

Thus ends the hundred and seventy sixth chapter, whom to appoint a priest, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXVII.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

Aryuna said :—

1. How arose the hostility between Vishwamitra and Vashistha, both of whom lived in celestial hermitages? Tell us all this in detail.

The Gandharva said :—

2. O Partha, this history of Vashistha is considered as a Purana in all the worlds. Listen to me as I recite it in detail.

3. O best of the Bharata race, there was a great king in Kanyakubja; known in the world by the name of Gadhi,— he was the son of Kushika.

4. His son was known by the name of Vishwamitra. That chastiser of foes, Vishwamitra, was virtuous-minded; and he had a large army of troops and beasts of burdens.

5. He wandered with his ministers in the deep forest for the purpose of hunting. Killing deer and boars, he roamed through the charming marshes.

6. Being (one day) fatigued and thirsty by the exercise of the hunt that best of men, came to the hermitage of Vashistha.

7. Seeing him coming, the illustrious and blessed Rishi, Vashistha, advanced to salute that best of men, Vishwamitra.

8. O descendant of Bharata, he (Vashistha) worshipped him (Vishwamitra) by asking his welfare, by offering Arghya and water to wash his face and feet, and by collected forest fruits and Ghee.

9. The illustrious Rishi had a Kamadhenu, (a cow yielding every thing as desired.) When she was addressed by saying "Give" she always gave what was desired.

10—12. O Aryuna, the Rishi received from her various wild fruits, and grown corn of gardens and fields, milk, many excellent nutritious viands filled with six different kinds of juice which was like ambrosia itself, various other kinds of enjoyable things of ambrosial taste, things for drinking and eating, for lapping and sucking, and many precious gems and various costly robes. With these desirable objects in profusion, the king (Vishwamitra) was worshipped. And he with his ministers and troops was become exceedingly glad.

13—14. He (Vishwamitra) became very much astonished to see that cow which had six elevated limbs, beautiful flanks and hips, fine broad limbs, frog-like prominent eyes, beautiful size, high udders, faultless make, straight and up-lifted ears, handsome horns and well-developed head and neck.

15. O prince, that king, the son of Gadhi, was exceedingly gratified with all that he saw, and very much praising (the cow) Nandini he thus spoke to the Rishi (Vashistha),

16. "O Brahmana, O great Rishi, give me (your) Nandini (cow) in exchange of ten thousand kine, or of my kingdom. (Give her to me) and enjoy my kingdom.

Vashistha said :—

17. O sinless one, this milk-giving cow is kept by me for the purposes of the celestials, the Pitris and the guests, and for my sacrifices. Nandini cannot be given (to you) in exchange of even your kingdom.

Vishwamitra said :—

18. I am a Kshatrya, and your respected self is a Brahmana devoted to study and asceticism. Is there prowess in Brahmanas who are peaceful and have their souls under control?

19. When you do not give me what I desire to have in exchange of ten thousand kine, I shall not abandon the duty of my race (that of the Kshatrya). I will take your cow by force.

Vashistha said :—

20. You are a powerful king, you are a Kshatrya possessing great strength of arms; do what you desire without delay and without stopping to consider over it.

The Gandharva said :—

21. O Partha, having been thus addressed, Vishwamitra then siezed the cow Nandini as white as the swan or the moon.

22. He dragged her hither and thither and afflicted her by striking her with a stick. The blessed Nandini cried piteously and came near Vashistha.

23. O Partha, she stood near him with up-lifted face staring at the illustrious Rishi. Though very much ill-treated, she did not quit the Rishi's hermitage.

Vashistha said:—

24. O amiable Nandini, you are crying again and again, and I hear your cries. But Vishwamitra is taking you away by force; what can I do? I am a forgiving Brahmana.

The Gandharva said:—

25. O best of the Bharata race, being alarmed at the sight of Vishwamitra's troops and being terrified by Vishwamitra himself, Nandini came closer to Vashistha.

Nandini said:—

26. O illustrious Sir, I am afflicted by the stripes of the fearful troops of Vishwamitra. I am crying piteously like one who has none; why are you so indifferent to me?

The Gandharva said:—

27. The great Rishi did not lose his patience, nor did he depart from his vow of forgiveness on hearing the words of the crying and persecuted Nandini.

Vashistha said:—

28. The might of the Kshatryas lies in their physical strength,—that of the Brahmanas lies in their forgiveness. I cannot give up forgiveness. If you like, you can go.

Nandini said:—

29. O illustrious Sir, have you abandoned me that you say so? O Brahmana, if you do not abandon me, I cannot be taken away by force.

Vashistha said:—

30. O blessed one, I do not abandon you. Stay if you can. Your calf, tied with a strong rope, is (even now) being carried away by force.

The Gandharva said:—

31. Having heard the word 'Stay,' that cow of Vashistha (Nandini) raised up her head and neck and became fearful to look at.

32. With eyes red in anger and with repeated roars, she then attacked Vishwamitra's troops on all sides.

33. Afflicted with their stripes and being dragged hither and thither, her anger (doubly) increased, and her eyes became red in wrath.

34. Blazing in anger, she soon became fearful to look at as the sun at mid-day.

She began incessantly to shower burning coals from her tail.

35. A few moments after she brought forth from her tail an army of Palhavas, from her udders an army of Dravidas and Sakas, from her womb an army of Yavanas, from her dung an army of Savaras.

36—37. From her urine an army of Kanchis and from her sides an army of Saravanas; and from the froth of her mouth that cow created hosts of Kiratas, Yavanas, Singhalas, Barbaras, Chivakas, Pulindas, Chinas, Hunas and Keralas and many other Mlechas.

38—39. Those large armies of Mlechas, clad in various uniforms and armed with various weapons,—as soon as they sprang into life,—spreading all around attacked before his very sight the troops of Vishwamitra,—five or seven attacking one.

40. Assailed with a great shower of weapons, Vishwamitra's troops before his very sight broke and fled panick-stricken in all directions.

41. O best of the Bharata race, though greatly excited with anger, the troops of Vashistha did not take the life of any of Vishwamitra's troops.

42. That cow (Nandini) simply drove the troops (of Vishwamitra) to a distance, Being thus driven full seventy-seven miles, the troops of Vishwamitra,

43. Becoming panick-stricken, cried aloud and did see none who could protect them. Seeing this great and wonderful feat of the Brahma might,

44. Vishwamitra became disgusted with the Kshatrya might and spoke thus,—“Fie on the Kshatrya prowess? The Brahma might is the true might.

45. In judging of strength and weakness, I see asceticism is true strength.” Thereupon that best of kings abandoning his kingdom and regal splendour,

46. And turning his back on all pleasures, set his mind on asceticism. (At last) crowned with ascetic success, he filled the world with his effulgence.

47. Afflicted all with his effulgence, he became a Brahmana. The son of Kushika, (Vishwamitra) at last drank the Soma (ambrosia) with Indra himself.

Thus ends the hundred and seventy seventh chapter, the defeat of Vishwamitra, by Vashistha, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXVIII.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

The Gandharva said :—

1. O Partha, there was a king named Kalmashapada in this world. He belonged to the race of Ikshaku, and he was matchless in prowess.

2. One day the king came out of his capital for the purpose of hunting. That chastiser of foes pierced (with his arrows) many deer and boars.

3. He also killed in that greatly fearful forest many rhinoceroses. Thus killing (animals) for a long period, the king became tired and refrained from it.

4—6. (One day) when the king, whom the greatly powerful Vishwamitra desired to make his spiritual disciple, was proceeding through the forest afflicted with hunger and thirst he met with that best of Rishis, the high-souled son of Vashistha, the illustrious perpetuator of Vashistha's race, the eldest of the one hundred sons of the illustrious Rishi Vashistha, known by the name of Saktri, coming along the same path from an opposite direction.

7. The king said, "Stand out of our way." Thereupon the Rishi spoke thus in a conciliatory manner and in sweet words,

8. "O great king, this is my way. This is eternal religion. The king should yield the way to the Brahmanas according to all the precepts of religion."

9. Thus they addressed each other respecting their right of way. "Stand aside," "Stand aside," were the words they said to each other.

10. The Rishi, being in the right, did not yield; the king also did not yield out of anger and pride.

11. Being enraged on seeing the Rishi decline to yield the way to him, that best of kings, acted like a Rakshasha, and he struck him violently with his whips.

12. That best of Rishis, the son of Vashistha, being thus struck by the whip, was deprived of his (good) senses, and out of anger, cursed that best of kings.

The Rishi said :—

13. O worst of kings, as you injure an ascetic like a Rakshasha, you shall from this day be a cannibal.

14. O worst of kings, go hence. You shall wander over the world eating human flesh.

The Gandharva said :—

Thus said (the Rishi) Saktri, possessing great (ascetic) prowess.

15. At this time Vishwamitra, with whom Vashistha had a great quarrel on the matter of becoming the priest (of the king Kalmashapada), came to the place (where Vashistha's son and the king were.)

16. O Partha, the Rishi of severe ascetic penances, the powerful Vishwamitra, came there where they were both quarrelling.

17. Thereupon after the curse on the excellent king (had been uttered) he came to know that the Rishi was the son of Vashistha as powerful as Vashistha himself.

18. O descendant of Bharata, being desirous of benefitting himself, Vishwamitra remained there concealed from the sight of both by making himself invisible.

19. Then that best of kings, (Kalmashapada), having been thus cursed by Saktri, asked the protection of Saktri by humbly beseeching him.

20. O best of the Kuru race, knowing the disposition of the king, Vishwamitra ordered a Rakshasha to enter the king's body.

21. Obedient to Saktri's curse and Vishwamitra's order, a Rakshasha, named Kinkara, then entered the king's body.

22. O chastiser of foes, knowing that the Rakshasha had entered the body of the king, that best of Rishis, Vishwamitra, left the place and went away.

23. O Partha, then the king, being thus possessed by the Rakshasha and terribly afflicted by him, lost all his senses.

24. A certain Brahmana saw the king roaming in the forest. Being hungry, he begged of the king some food with meat.

25. The royal sage (Kalmashapada) with his friends said to the Brahmana, "O Brahmana, Stay here for a moment, 26. On my return I shall give you whatever food you desire to have." Having said this, the king went away, but that excellent Brahmana remained there.

27. O Partha, that high-minded king, after roaming at pleasure and at will (for sometime), returned (to his palace) and entered the inner-apartment.

28. Waking at midnight and remembering his promise to the Brahmana, the king soon summoned his cook and spoke to him thus.

The King said :—

29. Go at once to the forest where a Brahmana is waiting for me in the hope of getting food. Go and entertain him with food and meat.

The Gandharva said :—

30. Having been thus addressed, the cook (went away in search of meat), but having failed to procure any meat, he sorrowfully informed the king (of his failure).

31. The king, possessed as he was by the Rakshasha, again and again said to the cook without any scruple, "Feed him with human flesh."

32. Saying "Be it so," the cook went to the place where the executioners were and he soon took from them human flesh.

33. He washed it and then properly cooked it, and then covering it with boiled rice, he gave it to the hungry ascetic Brahmana.

34. That excellent Brahmana, seeing by his ascetic eye that the food was unworthy of being eaten, thus spoke with his eyes red in anger.

The Brahmana said :—

35. Because that worst of kings offers me unworthy food, therefore that fool himself will be fond of such food.

36. Becoming fond of human flesh as cursed by Saktri before, he shall wander over the earth, persecuting all creatures.

The Gandharva said :—

37. The curse on the king, thus repeated for the second time, became very strong. And the king being possessed of the Rakshasha disposition, soon lost all his senses.

38. Thereupon, O descendant of Bharata, that best of kings, having been deprived of all his senses by the Rakshasha within him, and having seen before him Saktri who had cursed him, said,

39. "Because you have inflicted upon me this extraordinary curse, therefore, I shall commence my life of cannibalism by eating you.

40. Having said this, the king immediately killed Saktri and ate him up as a tiger eats up the animal it is fond of.

41. Having seen Saktri thus killed, Vishwamitra again urged that Rakshasha (within the king) to kill the other sons of Vashistha.

42. He (the Rakshasha) devoured in anger all the sons of the illustrious Vashistha,—the younger brothers of Saktri,—as a lion devours small animals.

43. Having learnt that his sons had been caused to be killed by Vishwamitra, Vashistha patiently bore his grief, as the great mountain bears the earth.

44. That best of Rishis, that foremost of all intelligent men (Vashistha), resolved rather to sacrifice his own life than to exterminate the race of the Kushikas.

45. The illustrious Rishi threw himself down from the summit of the Meru mountain, but he descended on the stony ground as if it was a heap of cotton.

46. O son of Pandu, when the illustrious (Rishi) found that he was not killed by that fall, he made a huge fire in that great forest and entered it.

47. The fire, though blazing fearfully, did not consume him. O chastiser of foes, that blazing fire seemed to him cool.

48. Then seeing the sea (before him), the great Rishi, afflicted with grief, tied a heavy stone to his neck and threw himself into its waters.

49. The great Rishi was with great force brought by the waves to the shore. He then returned to his hermitage with a sorrowful heart.

Thus ends the hundred and seventy eighth chapter, the grief of Vashistha, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXIX.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

The Gandharva said :—

1. Seeing his hermitage bereft of his children, the Rishi, afflicted with grief, again came out of it.

2. O Partha, (in course of his wandering), he saw a river swollen with the waters of the rainy season, it was sweeping away many trees and plants that grew on its banks.

3. O descendant of Kuru, seeing this, the sorrowful Rishi began to ponder and thought that he would certainly be killed if he fell into its waters.

4. Thereupon the great Rishi tied himself with very strong cords and fell in grief into the waters of that great river.

5. O chastiser of hostile ranks, the river, having torn those cords and making him free of them, cast him on the land.

6. Having been freed from the cords, the great Rishi rose (from the shore) and he gave that river the name of Bipasha.

7. Being oppressed with grief, that Rishi could not from that time stay at one place. He went to the mountains, rivers, and lakes.

8. Seeing once more the river Himavati of terrible appearance and full of fierce animals, the Rishi threw himself into its waters.

9. That best of rivers, thinking the Brahmana to be fire, immediately fled away in a hundred different streams, and thence was she called the Sadastu.

10. Thereupon, seeing himself again in dry land (he said), "(Alas) ! I am not able to die by my own hands." Saying this, (the Rishi) again went to (his own) hermitage.

11. When he was thus returning, crossing various mountains and countries, his daughter-in-law Adhrisanti was following him.

12. He heard from behind, as she neared him, the sound of the well-explained recitations of the Vedas with its six ornaments (of elocution).

13. He said, "Who is it that follows me?" His daughter-in-law replied, "I am Adhrisanti, the wife of Saktri. I am an ascetic woman, engaged in asceticism."

Vashistha said:—

14. O daughter, whose is this sound of the recitations of the Vedas with their Angas, that is heard by me and (which is exactly) like the recitations of the Vedas and the Angas by Saktri?

Adhrisanti said:—

15. In my womb is a child begotten by your son Saktri. He has been here (studying the Vedas) for twelve years. You have heard the recitations (of the Vedas) by that Rishi.

The Gandharva said:—

16. Having been thus addressed by her, that best of Rishis, Vashistha, became exceedingly glad. O Partha, saying, "There is a child (of my race)", he refrained from self-destruction.

17. The sinless (Rishi), accompanied by his daughter-in-law, returned (to his hermitage). He saw (one day) Kalmashapada sitting in a solitary forest.

18. O descendant of Bharata, on seeing him the king at once rose in anger and as he was possessed with the Rakshasha, he desired to devour the Rishi.

19. Seeing that king of cruel deeds, Adhrisanti spoke thus to Vashistha in anxiety and fear,

20. "O illustrious Sir, the fearful Rakshasha (looking) like Death himself armed with his staff is coming towards us with a wooden club in his hand.

21. O illustrious Sir, O best of all learned men in the Vedas, there is none else except you in the world who can restrain him to-day.

22. O illustrious Sir, save me from this cruel wretch of fearful appearance. The Rakshasha is certainly coming towards us to devour us.

Vashistha said:—

23. O daughter, do not fear; there is nothing to be afraid of from any Rakshasha. There is no fear from this Rakshasha whom you see coming.

24. He is the king Kalmashapada, celebrated in the world as being a very powerful (monarch). That fearful man lives in this forest.

The Gandharva said:—

25. O descendant of Bharata, the illustrious and the effulgent Rishi Vashistha, seeing him advancing, stopped him by uttering a loud roar.

26. Sprinkling over him water sanctified by Mantras (incantations), he freed the king from the terrible curse.

27. He (the king) had been overwhelmed by the effulgence of Vashistha's son, as the sun by the planet (Rahu) at the time of an eclipse.

28. Having been thus freed from the Rakshasha by that Brahmana (Vashistha) the king illuminated the great forest by his splendour, as the sun illuminates the evening clouds.

29. Regaining his consciousness, the king saluted the Rishi with joined hands, and he thus spoke to that best of Rishis Vashistha.

30. "O illustrious Sir, I am the son of Sudasa; O excellent Rishi, I am your disciple. Tell me what is your desire now, and what I am to do."

Vashistha said:—

31. O king of men, my desire has been fulfilled at the proper time. Return to your kingdom and rule your subjects. Never (again) disregard the Brahmanas.

The King said:—

32. O illustrious Sir, I shall never again disregard the best Brahmanas. In obedience to your command, I shall properly worship the Brahmanas.

33. O best of the twice-born, O best of all men learned in the Vedas, I desire to obtain from you that by which I may be freed from the debt I owe to the race of Ikshaku.

34. O excellent man, you should grant me a son, I desire to have, who will possess beauty, accomplishments and good behaviour.

The Gandharva said:—

35. The best of the twice born, ever devoted to truth, Vashistha, replied to that great Bowman, the king saying, "I will give."

36. O king of men, after sometime, Vashistha, accompanied by him (the king), went to his capital, known all over the world by the name of Ayodhya.

37. The people came out in joy to receive the sinless and the illustrious one, as the celestials do their chief (Indra).

38. The king accompanied by the great Rishi Vashistha entered without delay his auspicious capital.

39. The citizens of Ayodhya saw the king accompanied by his priest (Vashistha), as if he were the rising sun.

40. The king, most handsome of all handsome men, filled Ayodhya with his splendour, as the autumnal moon fills the whole sky with his splendour.

41. His (king's) mind was filled with joy on seeing that excellent city with its well-watered and well-swept streets, and with banners and pendants flying all around.

42. O descendant of Kuru, that city, full of well-fed and happy men, looked as gay as Amaravati with the presence of Indra.

43. After the royal sage (the king Kalmashapada) had entered that excellent city, the queen at his command, came to Vashistha.

44. The best of Rishis, Vashistha, made an agreement with her, and he united himself with her according to the highest ordinance.

45. Thereupon, when the queen conceived by him, that best of Rishis (Vashistha), receiving the salutation of the king, went away to his hermitage.

46. When she had borne the conception for a long time, the illustrious lady tore open her womb with a piece of stone.

47. Thus was born after a conception of twelve years that best of men, that royal sage, Asmaka, who founded Pandavya (a city).

Thus ends the hundred and seventy ninth chapter, the birth of the son of Saudashya in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXX.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

The Gandharva said:—

1. O king, residing in the hermitage, Adhrisanti gave birth to a son who was the perpetuator of Saktri's race and who was like a second Saktri.

2. O best of the Bharata race, that best of Rishis, that illustrious man (Vashistha), himself performed the usual birth ceremonies of his grandson.

3. Because the Rishi Vashistha had determined to kill himself, but had refrained from doing it as soon as he heard of the conception, the child (when born) was known in the world by the name of Parasara.

4. That virtuous-minded man (Parasara) knew from the day of his birth Vashistha as his father and behaved towards him as such.

5. O son of Kunti, O chastizer of foes, the child called the Brahmana Rishi Vashistha as "father" before his mother Adhrisanti.

6. Hearing the well-explained word "father" uttered sweetly by her son, Adhrisanti with tearful eyes thus spoke to him,

7. "O child, do not address your father's father as your father. O son, your father was devoured by a Rakshasha in another forest.

8. O sinless one, he is not your father whom you consider to be (your father). The reverend man is the father of your illustrious father."

9. Having been thus addressed, that truthful and excellent Rishi became grieved, and that high-souled man resolved to destroy the whole creation.

10. Seeing him resolved in doing this, that high-souled and greatly ascetic Rishi, that best of all men learned in the Vedas, that son of Mitraravarna, that Rishi acquainted with the positive truth, Vashistha, prevented him (from accomplishing his desire by arguments). Hear them (now).

Vashistha said:—

11. There was a great king, known by the name of Kritavirja. That best of kings was in the world the disciple of the Veda-knowing Vrigus.

12. O child, after performing the Soma sacrifice, the king gratified the receivers of the first portions of Yagma (Brahmanas) with large presents of rice and wealth.

13. When that best of kings went to heaven, his descendants were in want of wealth.

14. Knowing that the Vrigus were rich, those kings all went in the garb of beggars to those best of Vrigus.

15. Some of the Vrigus to save their wealth buried it under the earth, and some from the fear of Kshatryas gave away their wealth to the Brahmanas.

16. O son, some of the Vrigus, finding no other alternative, gave their wealth to the Kshatryas as much as they desired.

17. (It happened, however) that some Kshatryas, in digging at pleasure a certain house of a Vrigu, came upon a large treasure.

18—19. All those best of Kshatryas assembled there saw that treasure. Enraged at the supposed deceitful conduct of the Vrigus, those great men killed them all with their arrows, though they asked for protection. Roaming over the world, they killed even the embryos (that were in the wombs of the Vrigu-women.)

20. When they were thus killed, many Vrigu women fled in fear and took shelter in the inaccessible mountains of the Himalayas.

21. One amongst them, a lady of tapering thighs, desiring to perpetuate her husband's race, kept a greatly energetic embryo hidden in one of her thighs.

22. A Brahmana woman came to know this fact, and she went to the Kshatryas and out of fear reported it to them.

23. Thereupon the Kshatryas went with the intention of destroying that embryo and saw the Brahmana lady blazing in her own splendour.

24. On this the child in her thigh came out tearing open the thigh, and dazzling the eyes of the Kshatryas like a mid-day sun.

25. Thereupon they (the Kshatryas), having been deprived of their sight, began to wander over those inaccessible hills. Being very much distressed for the loss of sight, the kings went to ask the protection of the faultless Brahmana lady in order to get back their sight.

26. Afflicted with sorrow and looking like fire blown out on account of the loss of sight, those Kshatryas addressed that illustrious lady with anxious heart.

27. "When we shall be restored to sight by your grace, we shall go away together with our sinful acts.

28. O handsome lady, you with your son should show mercy on us. You should favour these kings by granting them their sight."

Thus ends the hundred and eightieth chapter, the history of Aurva, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXI.

The Brahmani said:—

1. O children, I have not taken your eye-sight, nor am I angry with you. This child of the Vrigu race is certainly angry with you.

2. O children, there is no doubt your eye-sight has been destroyed by this high-souled (Vargava) whose wrath has been kindled on remembering the massacre of his race.

3. O children, when you were destroying even the embryos of the Vrigu race, this child was held by me in my thigh for one hundred years.

4. So that he may do good to the Vrigu race, the entire Vedas with their six Angas came to him when he was in the womb.

5. Being enraged at the slaughter of his fathers; he desires to kill you, it is by his celestial effulgence that your eye-sight has been destroyed.

6. O children, therefore, pray to my this excellent son, born of my thigh. Propitiated by your homage, and by your bowing down your head to him, he may restore your eye-sight.

7. Having been thus addressed, all the kings addressed that thigh-born child, saying, "Be propitious"; and the child became propitious to them.

8. As he was born after tearing open his mother's thigh, that excellent Brahmana came to be known throughout the world by the name of Aurva.

9. Regaining their eye-sight, the kings returned (to their homes), and that descendant of Vrigu resolved in his mind to overcome the world.

Vashistha said:—

10—11. O child, the high-souled man set his heart on the destruction of all creatures. In order to pay homage to his massacred ancestors, that descendant of the Vrigu race engaged himself in the severest penances with the object of destroying the whole creation.

12. He afflicted the worlds with the celestials, the Asuras and the men by his greatly severe penances ; and he thus gratified his ancestors.

13. On learning what their son was doing in order to gratify their race, the Pitris all came to him from their region and said.

The Pitris said :—

14. O Aurva, O son, fierce you have become by your asceticism. Your power has been seen by us. Be propitious to the worlds ; control your anger.

15. O child, it was not from incapacity that the self-controlled Vrigus were all indifferant to their own destruction caused by the murderous Kshatryas.

16. O child, when we grew tired with our long life, then it was that we desired our own death at the hands of the Kshatryas.

17. The wealth that the Vrigus have kept hidden under the earth had been placed there with the object of enraging the Kshatryas and creating a quarrel with them.

18. O best of the twice born, of what use could wealth be to us who were desirous of obtaining heaven ? Our treasurer (in heaven) has kept large treasures for us.

19. When we found that death could by no means overtake us all, then, O child, we considered this to be the best means (of destroying us.)

20. O child, those that commit suicide never attain to the blessed regions. Considering this, we abstained from self-destruction.

21. O child, that which you desire to do is not pleasing to us. Therefore, control your mind and abstain from overcoming the whole world.

22. O child, O son, do not destroy the Kshatryas, nor the seven worlds. Destroy your this anger which stains your ascetic effulgence.

Thus ends the hundred and eighty-first chapter, stopping Aurva, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXII.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—contd.

Aurva said :—

1. O Pitris, the vow I uttered in anger for the destruction of all the worlds must not be in vain.

2. I cannot consent to be one whose anger and vows are fruitless. This my anger will certainly consume me (if I do not accomplish my vow), as fire consumes the dry wood.

3. The man, who suppresses his anger excited by a just cause, becomes incapable of duly compassing the Threebarga (Dharma, Artha and Kama.)

4. The wrath, that the kings, desirous of subjugating the whole world, display, has its use. It serves to restrain the wicked and protect the honest.

5. When I was lying unborn within my mother's thigh, I heard the petious cries of my mother and other women of the Vrigu race as they were being massacred by the Kshatryas.

6. O Pitris, when those wretches, the Kshatryas, were exterminating the Vrigus together with the unborn children of their race, anger filled my soul.

7. My mother and the other women of our race, each in a state of advanced pregnancy,—and my father also,—though exceedingly afflicted, did not get a protector in all the world.

8. When the Vrigu women did not find a single protector, my blessed mother held me (hidden) in one of her thighs.

9. If there be a punisher of crimes in the world, no one in all the worlds could dare commit a crime.

10. If sin does not find any punisher, then many men live in sinful acts.

11. The man who having power to punish sin, does not do so, knowing that a sin has been committed, is himself defiled by that sin.

12. The kings and others, who were capable of protecting my fathers, did not protect them, neglecting to perform their duty by giving themselves up to the pleasures of life. Therefore, I have just cause to be enraged. I am the lord of creation,—I am incapable of obeying your command.

14. Capable as I am of punishing this crime, if I abstain from doing it, men will once more have to undergo a similar persecution.

15. The fire of my wrath, which is ready to consume the worlds, if suppressed, will certainly consume me by its own energy.

16. O masters, I know you always seek the good of the worlds. Therefore, instruct me as to what may be good to myself or to the worlds.

The Pitris said :—

17. Throw this fire of your wrath which desires to consume the worlds into the waters. That will do you good. The worlds rest on water.

18. Every juicy substance is full of water ; indeed the whole universe is full of water. Therefore, O best of the twice born, throw this your anger into the waters.

19. O Brahmana, if you desire it, let this fire of your wrath remain in the great ocean, consuming its water, for we have heard the worlds are made of water.

20. O sinless one, in this way your word will be made true, and the worlds with the celestials will not be destroyed.

Vashistha said :—

21. Thereupon Aurva threw the fire of his wrath into the abode of Varuna (sea) and that fire consumes the waters of the great ocean.

22. Assuming a greatly fearful head (that of a horse) and emitting fire from its mouth, it consumes the waters of the great ocean. The men learned in the Vedas call it Vadabamukha.

23. O Parasara, O foremost of all wise men, you are acquainted with the higher regions,—you should not destroy the world.

Thus ends the hundred and eighty second chapter, the history of Aurva, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXIII.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

The Gandharva said :—

1. Having been thus addressed by the illustrious Vashistha, the Brahmana Rishi (Parasara) controlled his world-destroying wrath.

2. But the greatly effulgent Parasara, the son of Saktri,—the foremost of all persons learned in the Vedas,—performed a great Rakshasha-sacrifice.

3. Remembering the slaughter of Saktri, the great Rishi began to consume the Rakshashas, young and old, in the sacrifice that he performed.

4. Vashistha from his desire of not obstructing this second vow (of his grandson) did not prevent him from destroying the Rakshashas.

5. The great Rishi (Parasara) sat in that sacrifice before three blazing fires, himself looking a fourth fire.

6. Like the sun emerged from the clouds, the firmament was illuminated by that stainless sacrifice in which large were the libations of Ghee poured.

7. Then Vashistha and the other Rishis regarded that Rishi, blazing with his own energy, as if he were a second sun.

8. Then the great and the liberal-minded Rishi Atri came to that place with the desire of ending that sacrifice, a highly difficult act for any others.

9. O chastiser of foes, there also came Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu and Mahakratu with the desire of saving the Rakshashas.

10. O best of the Bharata race, O Partha, seeing that many Rakshashas had been already killed, Pulastya spoke thus to that chastiser of foes, Parasara,

11. " O child, I hope there is no obstruction to your this sacrifice. Do you take, pleasure, O child, in destroying the Rakshashas who know nothing of your father's death.

12. You should not thus destroy all creatures. O son, it is not a (proper) act for the Brahmanas devoted to asceticism.

13. O Parasara, peace is the highest virtue ; therefore practise peace. O Parasara, being such a superior man, you (should not) consider sinful acts to be for your good.

14. You should not transgress against Saktri who was learned in all the precepts of religion. You should not exterminate my creatures.

15. O son of Vashistha, what befell your father all came upon him on account of his own curse. It was for his own fault that Saktri was taken to heaven.

16. O Rishi, no Rakshasha was capable of devouring him ; he himself provided for his death.

17. O Parasara, Vishwamitra was mere an instrument in that matter. The king Kalmashapada, also ascending heaven, enjoy great happiness.

18. Saktri and other sons of the great Rishi Vashistha are all even now in great happiness enjoying themselves with the celestials.

19—20. O great Rishi, all this was known to Vashistha. O child, O grandson of Vashistha, you have been in this sacrifice only an instrument in the destruction of those innocent Rakshashas. Be blessed. Give up this sacrifice. Let it come to an end.

The Gandharva said :—

21. Having been thus addressed by Pulastya and the intelligent Vashistha, the great Rishi, the son of Saktri (Parasara), brought that sacrifice to an end.

22. He (Parasara) threw away the fire that was kindled for the Rakshasha-sacrifice into the great forest on the north of the Himalayas.

23. There that fire may be seen to this day, always devouring in all seasons the Rakshashas, trees and stones,

Thus ends the hundred and eighty third chapter, the history of Aurva, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXIV.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—Contd.

Aryuna said :—

1. Why did the king Kalmashapada command his queen to go to his preceptor, that foremost of all men learned in the Vedas ?

2. Why did that great and illustrious Rishi Vashistha,—knowing as he knew all the great precepts of religion,—went to a woman to whom he should not go ?

3. O friend, was this an act of sin on the part of Vashistha ? I ask, you should remove my these doubts.

The Gandharva said :—

4. O Dhananjaya, O irrepressible hero, listen to me as I answer the question you have asked me in respect of Vashistha and that chastiser of foes the king (Kalmashapada).

5. O best of the Bharata race, I have told you how the king Kalmashapada was cursed by Saktri, the illustrious son of Vashistha.

6. Thus coming under the influence of that curse, that chastiser of foes, the king with his eyes whirling in anger came out of the city with his wife.

7—8. Going to a solitary forest, he roamed with his wife. He roamed under the influence of the curse in the terribly resounding forest, abounding in various beasts and other animals, overgrown with numerous plants and creepers, and full of many large trees.

9. One day becoming very much oppressed with exceeding hunger, he searched for some food. He saw in a certain solitary wood

10. A Brahmana and a Brahmani engaged in sexual intercourse. Seeing him, they fled away in fear, their desire being unfulfilled.

11. Pursuing them the king seized the Brahmana by force. Seeing her husband thus seized, the Brahmani said,

12. "O king of excellent vows, listen to what I say ; it is known all over the world that you are born in the solar dynasty.

13. You are always steadily engaged in performing virtuous acts,—you are ever engaged in serving your superiors ; O irresistible hero, though you are deprived of your senses by the curse, you should not commit sin.

14. On my season's coming, I was united with my husband in order to get offspring ; but I have not been successful.

15—16. O best of kings, be propitious to me, liberate my husband." While she was thus crying, the king like a cruel wretch devoured her husband as a lion devours a deer. The tears that fell from her eyes on the ground on account of her anger

17. Blazed up like a fire and consumed every thing in that place. Then afflicted with the death of her husband,

18—20. The Brahmani cursed the royal sage Kalmashapada in anger. "O wretch, because you have to-day cruelly devoured in my very sight my illustrious and beloved husband when I was not gratified, therefore you shall by my curse meet with an instant death when you will unite yourself with your wife in season. That Rishi Vashistha, whose son you have devoured,

21. Will unite himself with your wife to beget a son. O worst of kings, that son will be the perpetuator of your race."

22. Having thus cursed him, that blessed lady of the Angirasha race entered the blazing fire in his very presence.

23. O chastiser of foes, the illustrious Vashistha immediately knew all this by his great asceticism and spiritual sight.

24. After a long time the royal sage (Kalmashapada) became freed from the curse. And (then one day) he went to his wife Madayanti in her season, but she prevented him.

25. Maddened by desire, the king had no recollection of the curse. Hearing the words of the lady (his wife), that best of kings became very much alarmed.

26. O best of kings, recollecting the curse, he was very sorry for what he had done. It was for this reason and on account of the Brahmani's curse the king appointed Vashistha to beget a son on his wife.

Thus ends the hundred and eighty-fourth chapter, the history of Vashistha ; in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXV.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—*contd.Aryuna said :—

1. O Gandharva, you are acquainted with every thing. Tell us therefore what Veda-knowing Brahmana is fit to be appointed as our priest ?

The Gandharva said :—

2. There is a shrine in this forest, it is called Utkachaka. The younger brother of Devala, Dhaumya, is engaged there in ascetic penances. If you desire, you can appoint him as your priest.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. Then Aryuna, being highly pleased, gave the Gandharva his fire-weapon with due ceremonials ; and he thus spoke to him,

4. "O best of the Gandharvas, let the horses you give us remain with you for sometime. When the time will come, we shall take them from you. Then he said to him, "Be blessed" "Be blessed."

5. Then the Gandharva and the Pandavas, respectfully saluting one another, left the charming banks of the Bhagirathi and went away wherever they liked.

6. Thereupon, O descendant of Bharata, the Pandavas went to the shrine of Utkachaka and to the hermitage of Dhaumya. They then installed Dhaumya as their priest.

7. Dhaumya, the foremost of all men learned in the Vedas, received them with the offerings of wild fruits and roots and consented to be their priest.

8—9. Having obtained that Brahmana as their priest, the Pandavas with their mother, constituting the sixth of the party, thought their wealth and kingdom had been already regained and the daughter of the Panchala king already obtained in the Saimvara. Those best of the Bharata race, having obtained the preceptor Dhaumya as their priest, considered themselves as placed under a protector.

10. The preceptor (Dhaumya) was acquainted with the mystery of the Vedas ; he was liberal-minded,—he made the virtue and all-knowing sons of Pritha his spiritual disciples.

11. That Brahmana, seeing those heroes endued with intelligence, strength, and perseverance like the celestials, considered that they were already restored to their wealth and sovereignty by virtue of their own accomplishments.

12. Benedictions having been uttered on them by that Brahmana, those kings of men resolved to go with him to the Saimvara in the country of the Panchalas.

Thus ends the hundred and eighty fifth chapter, the appointment of Dhaumya as priest, in the Chaitraratha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXVI.

(CHAITRARATHA PARVA)—*Contd.Vaishampayana said :—

1. Then those best men, the five Pandava brothers, set out to see Draupadi, the (Panchala) country and the festivities (of Saimvara.)

2. Those best of men, those chastisers of foes, saw with their mother many Brahmanas on their way going together (towards Panchala).

3. O king, those Brahmacharis, those Brahmanas, asked the Pandavas, "Where are you going ? Whence have you come ?"

Yudhisthira said :—

4. O best of the twice-born, know, Sirs, that we are five brothers travelling with our mother. We are now coming from Eka-chakra.

The Brahmanas said :—

5. Go even this very day to the house of the Panchala Drupada. There will be held a great Saimvara, in which a large sum of money will be spent.

6. We are going there ; let us go together. Extraordinary festivities will take place there.

7. The daughter of the illustrious Jagmasena Drupada was born from the sacrificial altar, with eyes like lotus leaves,

8. With features faultless, and with beauty, youth and intelligence ; she is the sister of the powerful Dhristadyumna, the (would be) slayer of Drona,

9. Who rose as a mighty-armed hero with natural armour, sword, bow and arrows from the blazing fire,—himself looking like a second fire.

10. His sister is the slender waisted and faultless featured Draupadi, whose body emits the perfume of lotus over full two miles around.

11. That daughter of Jagmasena will select a husband in a Saimvara. We are going there to see her and witness the great celestial-like festivities.

12. The kings and princes who are performers of sacrifices in which Dhakshina is large, who are devoted to study, who are pure, who are high-souled and vow-observing,

13. Who are young and handsome, who are great car warriors and accomplished in arms, will all be present there from various countries.

14. Being desirous of victory (to be successful in obtaining Draupadi) those kings, will all give away much wealth, kine, food and other articles of enjoyments.

15. Taking all that they will give, seeing the Saimvara and enjoying the festivities, we shall then go wherever we like.

16. There will come (in that Saimvara) from many countries, the actors, the singers of king's penegeries, the dancers, the reciters of Puranas, the heralds and the powerful athelets.

17. O high-souled men, seeing all these wonderful sights and taking what will be given away, you will also return with us.

18. You are handsome, you look all like the celestials; it may be that seeing you, Krishna may chose some one amongst you, superior to the rest, (as her husband),

19. Your this brother is handsome and is endued with beauty; he is also mighty-armed; engaged in (athletic) encounters,) he may by chance earn great wealth.

Yudhisthira said:—

20. We shall all go with you to see that great festivity, that Saimvara of (the Panchala) maiden.

Thus ends the hundred and the eighty sixth chapter, the departure of the Pandava, in the Saimvara of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXVII.

(SAIMVARA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. O Janamejaya, having been thus addressed, the Pandavas proceeded towards the Southern Panchala country, ruled over by the king Drupada.

2. On their way the heroic Pandavas saw the illustrious, the pure-souled and the perfectly sinless Rishi Dwaipayana.

3. Duly worshipping the Rishi and being saluted by him,—when their conversation came to a close, they proceeded by his command to the palace of Drupada.

4. Those great car-warriors slowly walked on, stopping on forests and on (the banks of) lakes which they found to be charming.

5. The sons of Pandu, devoted in study, amiable, sweet-speeched and pure in acts, at last arrived in the country of the Panchalas.

6. After seeing the city and also the barracks, the Pandavas, took up there quarters in a potter's house.

7. Adopting the life of the Brahmanas, they begged their food there (in that city). No man recognised those heroes when they stopped there.

8. Jagmasena always cherished the wish of bestowing (his daughter) Krishna on Kiriti (Aryuna), the son of Pandu, but he never spoke it to any body.

9. O Janamejaya, O descendant of Bharata, thinking of the son of Kunti (Aryuna), the Panchala king caused a very stiff bow to be made incapable of being bent by any man except Aryuna.

10. Causing a machinery to be erected in the sky, the king set up a mark to be shot through that machinery.

Drupada said:—

11. He, who will string this bow, and he who will be able to shoot the mark above the machinery with these ornamented arrows, will obtain my daughter.

Vaishampayana said:—

12. With these words, the king Drupada proclaimed the Saimvara. O descendant of Bharata, having heard this, all the kings came there.

13. There came also many illustrious Rishis desirous of seeing the Saimvara. O king, Duryodhana and the Kurus, accompanied by Karna, also came there.

14. There came also many illustrious Brahmanas from many countries. The kings and princes were duly worshipped by the illustrious Drupada.

15. All the citizens,—making a deep noise as that of the ocean,—took their seats on the platforms with the desire of seeing the Saimvara.

16. The kings and princes entered the palace (of Saimvara) through the north east gate. The arena was built on a plane and on an auspicious ground on the north east of the city. The Samajbata (arena) was surrounded by palaces, and it was enclosed on all sides by a wall and a moat,—it was ornamented with gates and arches, and covered all over with a beautiful canopy.

18. It resounded with the notes of thousands of trumpets,—it was scented with Aguru (black aloe), ornamented with garlands and sprinkled with the sandal water paste.

19. It was surrounded on all sides by high and white mansions looking like the cloud-kissing peaks of the Kailasha (mountain).

20. Their windows were covered with net-works of gold and their walls set with diamonds and precious stones. Their stair-cases were easy of ascent, and the floors were covered with rich carpets and robes.

21. They were scented with Aguru, and adorned with wreaths and garlands of flowers; they were all white and spotless like the necks of the swans. Their fragrance could be perceived from a Yoyona.

22. Each of them contained one hundred doors wide enough to admit a crowd all at once; they were adorned with costly beds ornamented with various metals; they looked like the peaks of the Himalayas.

23. In them lived all the kings, adorned with various kinds of ornaments, and each boasting to get possession of the maiden.

24—26. When those best of kings, who were adorned with the fragrant paste of Aguru, who were greatly powerful, noble-minded, liberal, devoted to Brahmanas, beloved of the whole world for their good deeds and the protectors of their kingdoms, took their respective seats, the people of the city and the country who had come to see Krishna and who had already taken their seats on the excellent platforms all around saw them.

27. The Pandavas sat there in the arena with the Brahmanas and saw the great affluence of the Panchala king.

28. O king, that assemblage daily increased (in bulk,) and it looked gay with (the performances of) actors and dancers. Large presents of wealth were also made.

29—30. When this grand assembly continued (for 15 days,) then on the sixteenth day, O best of the Bharata race, Draupadi, having bathed, attired in the best robes and adorned with all ornaments, entered the arena carrying in her hand a golden dish on which there were a garland of flowers and other offerings of the Arghya.

31. The priest of the lunar race,—that holy Brahmana learned in the Mantras,—kindling the sacrificial fire in all due forms poured libations of Ghee.

32. Gratifying Agni and making the Brahmanas utter the formula of benediction, he stopped all the musical instruments (that were then being played) all around.

33—34. O king, when the arena became perfectly still, Dhristadyumna, possessing a voice like that of kettle-drums or clouds, taking hold of his sister's arm, stood in the midst of the assembly and spoke these sweet words of excellent import with a voice as that of the clouds.

Dhristadyumna said:—

35. Hear, O ye assembled kings,—this is the bow, that is the mark, and these are the arrows. Shoot the mark through the orifice of the machine with these fine sharp arrows.

36. Truly do I say,—he who possessing noble birth, beauty and strength will achieve this great feat, shall obtain to-day for his wife this my sister Krishna.

Vaishampayana said:—

37. Having thus addressed the assembled kings, Drupada's son (Dhristadyumna) then spoke thus to his sister, reciting to her the names and the lineage and the achievements of those assembled potentates.

Thus ends the hundred and eighty seventh chapter, the words of Dhristadyumna, in the Saimvara of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXVIII.

(SAIMVARA PARVA)—Contd.

Dhristadyumna said:—

1. Duryodhana, Durvishaha, Durmukha, Dushpradharsana, Vivensati, Vikarna, Saha, Dushashena,

2. Yuyutsu, Vayuviga, Bhima, Vigarava, Ugrayudha, Valaki, Kanakayu, Viruchona,

3. Sukundala, Chitrasena, Suvarcha, Kanakadhwaja, Nandaka, Vahusali, Tuhanda, Vikakala,—

4. These and others are the greatly powerful sons of Dhritarastra. These heroes have all come with Karna for your hands.

5. Numerous other illustrious kings,—the best of Kshatriyas, (have also come for you). Sakuni, Sauvala, Vrishaka, Vrihadvala,

6. These sons of the king of Gandhara have also come. The foremost of all wielders of arms, Ashwathama and Bhoja

7. Have come here adorned with every ornament. The kings, Vrihanta, Manimana, Dandadhara,

8. Sahadeva, Jayatsena, Meghasandhi, Virata with his two sons, Sankhya and Uttara,

9. Vardhakshemi, Susarma, Senaviadu, Suketu with his two sons, Surama and Suvarcha,

10. Suchitra, Sukumara, Vrika, Satyadhriti, Suyadhiraja, Rochamana, Nila, Chitrayudha,

11. Angsumana, Chekitana, the mighty Srinimana, Chandrasena, the son of the mighty Suvadrasena both the father and the son,

12. Jalasandha, Vadanda, Danda, Pandraka, Vasudeva, the mighty Bhagadatta,

13. Kalinga, Tamralipta, the king of Pattana, the king of Madra, the great car-warrior Salya with his son,

14. The heroic Rukmangada, Rukmaratha, Somodatta of the Kuru race with his three sons,

15. All great heroes and car-warriors, all these have assembled here. Bhuri, Bhurisarava, Sala, Sudakshina, Kambhoja, the Paurava Dridawnhauwa,

16. Brihatvala, Sushena, Sivi, the son of Ushinara, Patacharnihanta, the king of Karusah,

17. Sankersana, (Valadeva) Vasudeva (Krishna), the mighty son of Rukmini, Samva, Charudeshna, the son of Pradyumna, Gada,

18. Akrura, Satyaki, the high-souled Uddhava, Kritavarma, the son of Hrideka, Pritha, Vipritha,

19. Viduratha, Kanka, Sanka, Gava-shna, Ashavaha, Aniruddha, Samika, Saranyaya,

20. Heroic Vatapati, Jellaha, Pundaraka, the powerful Ushinara,—all these are known as Vrishnis,

21. Bhagiratha, Vrihatkshatra, the son of Sindhu, Jayadhrata, Vrihatratha, Valhika, the great car-warrior Srutaya,

22. Uluka, Kaitava, Chitrangada, Suvangada, the intelligent Vatsaruga, the king of Kosala,

23. Sishupala,—the powerful Jarasandha,—these and many other kings, of many countries,

24. And all the Kshatryas celebrated in the world, O amiable sister, have come for your hand. O blessed girl, these powerful men will (try to) shoot the mark. Among these (heroes) you shall choose him as your husband who will (be able to) shoot the mark,

Thus ends the hundred and eighty eighth chapter, the recitations of the kings' lineage, in the Saimvara of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXIX.

(SAIMVARA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. These youthful princes, adorned with ear-rings, boasted at one another; and each regarding himself as the most accomplished in arms and endued with prowess, they stood up brandishing their weapons.

2—3. Intoxicated with the pride of beauty, prowess, lineage, knowledge, wealth and youth, they were like the Himalayan elephants mad in the season of rut. Staring at one another with jealousy, and being influenced by the god of desire, they suddenly rose up from their royal seats, each exclaiming, "Krishna will be mine."

4. Those Kshatryas, assembled in that arena, each eagerly desiring to win the daughter of Drupada, appeared like the celestials standing round Uma, the daughter of the Mountain king.

5. Their bodies being afflicted with the arrows of the god of love, and their hearts completely lost in Krishna (Draupadi), the kings descended into the arena; and they felt jealousy against even their own friends for the sake of the daughter of Drupada.

6. There came also (in the sky) the celestials on their cars, with the Rudras, the Adityas, the Vasus, the twin Ashwinis, the Sadhyas, all the Marutas and the lord of wealth (Kuvera) with Yama at their head.

7. There came also the Daityas, the Suparnas, the great Nagas, the celestial Rishis, the Guhakas, the Charanas, Vishwavashu, Narada, Parvatiya, and the chief Gandharvas with the Apsaras.

8. Halayuda, (Valarama) Janardana (Krishna), the chiefs of the Vrishni, Andhaka and Yadava tribes, all ever obedient to Krishna,—were also there viewing the scene.

9. Seeing these five (Pandavas) like mad elephants,—the best of their species,—which come attracted towards a lake overgrown with lotuses, like fire covered with ashes and, the foremost of the Yadus, Krishna, began to reflect.

10. He said to Rama (Balarama), "That is Yudhisthira, that is Bhima with Jishnu (Aryuna), and these are the two heroic twins (Nakula and Sahadeva). "Observing them slowly (one after the other) (Vala) Rama cast a pleased glance on Janardana (Krishna).

11. Biting their nether lips in wrath, the other heroes, those sons and grandsons of kings, with their eyes, hearts and thoughts set on Krishna alone, looked at Drupada only with their expanded eyes and did not notice the Pandavas.

12. On seeing Draupadi the mighty armed sons of Pritha and also the heroic and the illustrious twins were all struck with the arrows of the god of love.

13—14. Crowded with celestials, Rishis Gandharvas, Suparnas, Nagas, Asuras, and Sidhyas, filled with the celestial perfumes, scattered over with celestial flowers, resounding with the kettle-drums and the deep hum of infinite voices and echoing with the softer music of the flute, the Bina and the tabor, the cars of the celestials could scarcely find a way through the firmament.

15—16. Then those kings,—Karna, Duryodhana, Salwa, Salya, Ashwathama, Kratha, Sumitha, Vakra, the ruler of Kalinga and Banga, Paudya, Paundra, the ruler of Videha, the chief of the Yavanas, and many other sons and grandsons of kings,—the rulers of countries with eyes like lotus leaves,—one after the other exhibited their own prowess for (winning) that maiden of matchless beauty.

17. Adorned with crowns, garlands, bracelets and other ornaments, possessing mighty arms, prowess, and vigour, and full of strength and energy,

18—19. Those kings could not even in their imagination string that bow of extraordinary stiffness. And those kings, in exerting with swelling lips to string that bow—each according to his strength, education, skill and energy,—were all tossed on the ground and lay motionless for some time. Their strength gone, and their crowns and garlands loosened from their persons, they panted for breath. Their ambition for winning that maiden was soon cooled down. Tossed by that stiff bow, their garlands and bracelets and other ornaments, were disordered and they uttered exclamations of woe. Having their hope of obtaining Krishna gone that assemblage of kings looked sad and woeful.

21. Seeing the plight of all those kings, that foremost of all wielders of bow, Karna, went to the place where the bow was. He quickly raised it up, stringed it and placed the arrows on the string.

22. Seeing the son of Surya,—Karna of the Suta tribe,—who was like a fire or moon or the sun,—resolved to shoot the mark, those foremost of bowmen, the Pandavas, considered that the mark had already been shot and brought down to the ground.

23. Seeing him Draupadi said in a loud voice, "I shall not choose a Suta for my husband." Laughing in vexation and casting a glance towards the sun, Karna threw aside the bow already drawn to a circle.

24. When all those assembled Kshatryas gave up the task, the heroic king of the Chedis as powerful as Yama,

25. The high-souled and determined son of Damoghsha, Shishupala, attempted to string the bow, but he himself fell on his knees on the ground.

26. Thereupon the greatly strong and powerful king Jarasandha came to the bow and stood there for some time, fixed and motionless like a mountain.

27. Tossed by the bow he too fell upon his knees on the ground. Rising up, he (at once) left for his own kingdom.

28. Then in attempting to string the bow the great hero Salya, the greatly powerful king of Madra, also fell upon his knees on the ground.

29. At last when that assemblage of kings of noble births became the subjects of derisive talk, that foremost of heroes Jishnu (Aryuna), the son of Kunti, desired to string the bow and place the arrows on the string.

Thus ends the hundred and eighty ninth chapter, the discomfiture of the kings, in the Saimvara of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXC.

(SAIMVARA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. When all the kings desisted from the attempt to string the bow, the high-souled Jishnu (Aryuna) rose from among the Brahmanas.

2. Seeing him (Aryuna) possess the complexion of Indra's banner and observing that he was advancing towards the bow, the chief Brahmanas made a loud uproar by shaking their deer-skins.

3. While some of them were pleased, others were displeased and some among them possessing intelligence and foresight talked to one another thus,

4—5. "How can a stripling of a Brahmana unpractised in arms and weak in strength, string that bow which such celebrated Kshatryas like Salya and others endued with great might and accomplished in the science and practice of arms could not string?"

6. If he fails to achieve success in the act which he has undertaken by his boyish restlessness the Brahmanas will be ridiculous in the eyes of all the kings.

7. Therefore stop this Brahmana and prevent him from attempting to string the bow, which he (surely) desires to do out of vanity, childish daring, and mere restlessness.

The Brahmana said :—

8. We shall not be ridiculous, nor shall we incur the disrespect of any body, or the displeasure of the sovereigns.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. The others said,—This handsome youth, who is like a trunk of a mighty elephant, whose shoulders, arms and thighs are so well-built, who in patience looks like the Himalayas,

10. Whose gait is like that of the lion, whose prowess is like that of a mad elephant, and who is so resolute, will probably accomplish the feat.

11—12. He has (surely great) strength and great energy, else he would not have gone of his own accord. There is nothing in the three worlds that Brahmanas among all mortal men cannot accomplish. Abstaining from food, living on air, eating fruits, observing severe vows,

13. And becoming emaciated and weak, the Brahmanas are ever strong in their own energy. A Brahmana should never be disregarded whether his acts be right or wrong,

14. None should consider him incapable of achieving any task that is great or little, blissful or woeful. All the Kshatriyas were defeated in battle by Rama, the son of Jamadagni.

15—16. Agasta drank up the unfathomable ocean by his Brahma might. Therefore say,—“Let this youth bend the bow and string it with ease.” The best of the Brahmanas said, “Be it so”. The Brahmanas continued to talk thus to one another and on various matters.

17. Aryuna came to the bow and stood there like a mountain. Walking round that bow in due form,

18. Bowing his head to the giver of boons,—lord Ishana,—and remembering Krishna in his mind, he took up the bow.

19. The bow which Rukma, Sunita, Vakra, Radha's son (Karna), Duryodhana, Salya, and many other kings, accomplished in the science and practice of arms, could not string, even with great exertion, was stringed within the twinkling of an eye,

20. By Aryuna, the son of Indra, that foremost of all powerful men, that hero as powerful as the younger brother of Indra. He took up the five arrows,

21. Shot the mark, and caused it to come down on the ground through the orifice in the machinery above over which it had been placed.

22. Thereupon rose a great uproar in the sky and also a great clamour in the arena.

23. The celestials showered celestial-flowers on the head of that slayer of foes Aryuna. Thousands of Brahmanas waved their upper garments in joy.

24. The assembled kings uttered exclamations of grief and despair. Flowers were rained from the sky all over the arena.

25. The musicians struck up in concert hundreds of drums and trumpets. The bard and the heralds began to chaunt the praise of the hero in sweet strain.

26. Seeing him (Aryuna), that chastiser of foes, Drupada, became exceedingly glad, and he desired to assist Partha with his army if occasion arose.

27. When the uproar was at its highest, that foremost of all virtuous men, Yudhishthira accompanied by those foremost of men, the twins, soon left the arena to return to his lodging.

28. Seeing the mark shot and seeing also Partha who had shot the mark like Indra himself, Krishna (Draupadi) was filled with joy; and she came to the son of Kunti with a white robe and a garland of flowers.

29. That accomplisher, of inconceivable feats, having won her in the arena, was saluted with reverence by all the Brahmanas. He soon after left the arena and was followed by her who thus became his wife.

Thus ends the hundred and nintieth chapter the hitting the mark, in the Saimvara of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXCI.

(SAIMVARA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When the king expressed his desire to bestow his daughter on that Brahmana, all the assembled kings looked at one another and were filled with wrath.

The Kings said :—

2. Passing us by and regarding the assembled potentates as straw, this Drupada desires to bestow his daughter, the best of women, on a Brahmana.

3. Having planted the tree, he cuts it down when it is about to bear fruits. The wretch does not respect us,—therefore let us kill him.

4. He does not deserve our respect or the veneration due to his age. On account of such conduct, we shall kill this wretch who insults kings with their sons.

5. After inviting all the kings and entertaining them with excellent food, he at last insults them all.

6. In this assemblage of monarchs which is like a conclave of the celestials, does he not find a single king who is equal to himself?

7. The Sruti says that the Saimvara is for the Kshatryas; the Brahmanas have no claim in a selection of husband (by a Kshatrya lady).

8. O kings, if this maiden does not desire to select one of us as her husband, let us throw her into fire and return to our kingdoms.

9. Though this Brahmana has done this injury to the kings out of his officiousness or avarice, he should not be still killed.

10. For our kingdoms, lives, wealth, sons and grandsons and whatever other wealth we have (in this world) all exist for the Brahmanas.

11. Something must be done (however) so that from the fear of disgrace and from the desire of maintaining that which properly belongs to the respective orders, (the impertinent interference of Brahmanas) may not cause other Saimvaras to end thus.

12. Having said this, those best of kings, having arms like the spiked iron maces, took up their weapons and rushed upon Drupada to kill him.

13. Seeing those kings all rushing upon him in anger with bows and arrows, Drupada sought the protection of the Brahmanas from fear.

14. But those great bowmen, those two sons of Pandu (Bhima and Aryuna), those chastisers of foes, (at once) advanced to oppose those kings rushing towards Drupada like mad elephants.

15. Thereupon all those kings and princes with their figures cased in leather and their weapons upraised, rushed in anger towards the Karu princes, Bhima and Aryuna.

16. Then the powerful Bhima of extraordinary deeds, possessing the strength of thunder, tore up a large tree like an elephant and then devisted it of its all leaves.

17. Taking that tree, the mighty-armed Bhima, the son of Pritha, the chastiser of all foes, stood, like Yama with his fearful staff, near that best of men Partha (Aryuna.)

18. Seeing that feat of his brother, the greatly intelligent Jishnu (Aryuna), himself being of inconceivable feats, became very much astonished. Being equal to Indra in achievements, he cast off all his fears; and he stood ready with his bow to receive those assailants.

19. Seeing the feats of both Jishnu (Aryuna) and his brother, Damodara (Krishna) of super-human intelligence and inconceivable feats, spoke thus to his brother Halayuda (Valarama) of fearful energy.

20. O Sankarsana, that hero who has the gait like that of a great lion, who draws the large bow in his hand, which is full four cubits in length, is undoubtedly Aryuna. If I am the son of Vasudeva there is no doubt about it.

21. That hero, who has suddenly torn up the tree and who has within a moment become ready to drive away the monarchs, is undoubtedly Vrikodara (Bhima). None else in the world could have performed to-day such a feat in the field of battle.

22. O Achyuta, the other youth, having eyes like lotus leaves, who is full four cubits tall, who has the gait of a mighty lion, who is humble, fair-complexioned, with prominent and shining nose, who a moment before has left the arena, is undoubtedly the son of Dharma (Yudhisthira).

23. The two other youths, each as handsome as Kartikeya, are, I am sure, the son of the twin Aswinis. I heard that the sons of Pandu and Pritha had escaped from the fire of the lac house.

24. Then Halayuda of the complexion of clouds charged with rains spoke thus to his younger brother in joy, "I am glad to hear that our father's sister Pritha, with the foremost of the Kuru princes (the Pandavas) has escaped (from the lac-house).

Thus ends the hundred and ninty first chapter, the words of Krishna, in the Saimvara of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXCI.

(SAIMVARA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Those best of Brahmanas (present there), shaking their deer-skins and coconut shell-water-pots, exclaimed, "Fear not; we shall fight with the foes."

2. Aryuna smilingly told those Brahmanas who spoke to him "Stand aside as spectators.

3. I shall check all these kings, like snakes by Mantras, showering on them arrows furnished with sharp points."

4. Having said this, the mighty Aryuna took up the bow he had obtained as the dower, and accompanied by his brother Bhima, stood immovable as a mountain.

5. Seeing the Kshatryas, ever furious in battle, with Karna at their head, the two heroic brothers rushed at them like two elephants rushing against a herd of hostile elephants.

6. Then those kings, eager for battle, fiercely exclaimed, "Killing a Brahmana desirous of fighting in battle is permitted."

7. Saying this, the monarchs at once rushed upon the Brahmanas, and the greatly powerful Karna rushed against Jishnu (Aryuna) to fight.

8. The mighty king of the Madras, Salya rushed against Bhima like one elephant rushing against another for a female one.

9. Duryodhana and others all fought with the Brahmanas,—but they skirmished with them lightly and carelessly.

10. Then the illustrious Aryuna, seeing the son of Vikartana, Karna, coming towards him, drew his tough bow and pierced him with his sharp arrows.

11. The son of Radha (Karna), being much pestered by his swift, powerful and effulgent arrows, attacked Aryuna with more care (than before)

12. Then Karna and Aryuna, both foremost of all warriors, fought madly on,—each eager to vanquish the other. Such was the lightness of hand they displayed that they both became invisible (on account of the incessant showers of arrows)."

13. "Behold the strength of my arms, "Mark how I have counteracted your feats," they addressed each other in such words,—intelligible only to the heroes.

14. Enraged on seeing the strength and energy of Aryuna's arms as matchless in the earth, the son of Surya, Karna, fought with greater vigour.

15. Parrying all the swift and strong arrows shot at him by Aryuna, Karna sent up a loud shout. And his great feat was applauded by all the warriors.

Karna said:—

16. O foremost of the Brahmanas, I am pleased to see the strength of your arms, that know no relaxation in battle. Your weapons are worthy of achieving victory.

17. Is the science of arms personified in you, or are you that best of Brahmanas (Parashu) Rama or Indra himself or Vishnu, or Achyuta himself?

18. In order to conceal your personality have you assumed the form of a Brahmana, and mastering all the strength of arms are you now fighting with me?

19. None except Sachi's husband (Indra) or Kiriti (Aryuna), the son of Pandu is capable of fighting with me when I am angry on the field of battle.

Vaishampayana said:—

20. Hearing his these words, Falguni (Aryuna) replied, "O Karna, I am not the science of arms; I am not also the powerful Rama.

21. I am only a Brahmana who is the foremost of all wielders of arms. By the grace of my preceptor, I have become expert in the Brahma and Paurandra weapons. I am here to-day to vanquish you in battle. O hero, wait a little."

22. Having been thus addressed, the son of Radha, Karna, refrained from the fight, for the great car-warrior thought that the Brahma might is ever invincible.

23. On another part of the field the mighty heroes Salya and Vrikodara (Bhima) endued with great strength, well skilled in battle and learning,

24. Challenged one another and fought like two mad elephants, striking each other with their clenched fists and knees.

25. Sometimes pushing each other to a distance, sometimes dragging each other near; sometimes throwing each other down with their faces down-wards and sometimes on their sides, they fought on, striking each other at times with the clenched fists.

26. As they fought each other with blows hard as the clash of two pieces of stones, the arena rang with the sound of their combat.

27—28. Fighting thus in the battle for a few minutes, Bhima, the best of the Kurus, then taking up Salya on his arms, hurled him to a distance, and the best of men Bhimasena surprised all (by his feat), for though he threw the powerful Salya on the ground, he did not hurt him much.

29. When Salya was thus thrown down by Bhima, and Karna was struck with fear, all the other kings were filled with awe, and they surrounded Vrikodara (Bhima from all sides);

30. They said, "Surely these best of Brahmanas are excellent (warriors). Ascertain in what tribe they have been born, and where they live.

31. Who is capable of fighting with the son of Radha, Karna, in battle except Rama, Drona or Kiriti, the son of Pandu (Aryuna)?

32. Who is capable of fighting in battle with Duryodhana except the son of Devaki, Krishna, and the son of Saradwan, Kripa?

33—34. Who is capable of overthrowing in battle the king of Madra, Salya, the foremost of great warriors, except Valadeva, the heroic Vrikodara, the son of Pandu, and the heroic Duryodhana? Therefore, let us desist from this fight with the Brahmanas.

35. Brahmanas, if they be offending, should still ever be protected. First let us ascertain who these (heroes) are. After we have learnt it, we may cheerfully fight with them.

Vaishampayana said:—

36. Seeing that feat of Bhima, Krishna believed them both to be the sons of Kunti. Gently addressing the assembled monarchs by saying, "This maiden has been greatly won (by the Brahmanas)" he induced them to desist from the fight.

37. Having thus desisted from the battle, those best of monarchs, those (heroes) well-skilled in battle, returned to their respective kingdoms,—all becoming exceedingly surprised.

38. Those that assembled there went away saying that the Brahmanas had become victorious to-day; the princess of Panchala had become the bride of a Brahmana.

39. Surrounded by Brahmanas attired in skins of deer and other wild animals, Bhima and Dhananjaya passed through the crowd with good deal of difficulty.

40—41. Those heroes among men, mangled by the enemies and followed by Krishna, at last came out of the crowd, and they looked like the full moon or the sun emerged from the clouds. And their mother (Kunti in her lodging) began to think of various evils having overtaken her sons.

42. Seeing that her sons were late in returning from their begging tour, she was filled with anxiety. At one time she thought that the sons of Dhritarastra had recognised and killed them.

43. Next she feared that some cruel and strong Rakshashas, endued with the prowess of deception, had killed them. And she asked herself, "Could the illustrious Vyasa himself have been guided by perverse intelligence?"

44—45. Thus pondered Pritha out of her affection for her children. Then in the stillness of the late afternoon, Jishnu (Aryuna), accompanied with many Brahmanas, entered the potter's house like the cloud-covered sun emerged from the clouds in a cloudy day.

Thus ends the hundred and ninety second chapter, the return of the Pandavas, in the Saimvara of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXCI.

(SAIMVARA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then those two illustrious sons of Pritha, returning to the potter's house, came to their mother. And those best of men represented Jagmaseni to their mother as the "Alms" they had obtained that day.

2. Kunti who was within the room did not see her sons. She, therefore, replied saying, "Enjoy all of you (what you have got.)" A moment after she saw Krishna (Draupadi) and said, "Alas! what have I said?"

3. Being anxious with the fear of sin and reflecting how every one could be extricated from the situation, she took the cheerful Jagmaseni by the hand, and coming to Judhithira, she said.

Kunti said:—

4. This daughter of the king Jagmasena, upon being represented to me by your younger brothers as the "Alms" they had obtained, O king, from ignorance I said what was proper, namely, "Enjoy all of you what you have got."

5. O best of the Kurus, tell me how my speech may not become futile, how sin may not touch the daughter of the Panchala king, and how she may not become unhappy.

Vaishampayana said:—

6. Having been thus addressed by his mother, that foremost of the Kuru race, that hero, the intelligent king (Yudhithira,) consoling Kunti, thus addressed Dhananjaya,

7. "O Falguni, Jagmaseni has been won by you. It is proper therefore that you should marry this princess. O withstander of all foes, therefore kindle the sacred fire and marry her with all due rites."

Aryuna said:—

8. O king, do not hurl me into sin. Your command is not in consonance with the precepts of virtue. That is the path followed by the sinful. You should marry her first, then the mighty armed Bhima of inconceivable feats.

9. Then myself, then Nakula, and then last of all the greatly energetic Sahadeva. O king, Vrikodara, myself, the twins and the maiden all await your command.

10. When such is the state of things, after due reflection do that which is proper, consonant with virtue, productive of fame, and beneficial to the Panchala king. We are all obedient to you; command us as you like.

Vaishampayana said :—

11. Hearing these words of Jishnu (Aryuna), so full of respect and affection, the sons of Pandu all glanced at the Panchala princess.

12. She too looked at them all. Glancing at the illustrious Krishna (Draupadi), they looked at one another, and taking their seats, they thought of her alone.

13. When those immeasurably effulgent heroes looked at Draupadi, the god of love invaded their hearts and continued to grind all their senses.

14. The charming beauty of the Panchala princess was modelled by the Creator himself. It was superior to all and charming to all creatures.

15. Seeing their demeanour and knowing what was passing through their minds, that best of men, the son of Kunti, Yudhisthira recollected the words of Dwaipayana.

16. Fearing that there might arise disunion amongst the brothers, the king (Yudhisthira) thus spoke, "This blessed Draupadi will be the wife of all of us."

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Hearing these words of their eldest brother, the sons of Pandu began to ponder over them in their mind in great joy.

18. The chief of the Vrishnis (Krishna), with the son of Rohini (Valarama) suspecting them to be the chief of the Kurus, came to the potter's house where those best of men (the Pandavas) were living.

19. Krishna with the son of Rohini (Valarama) saw there seated Ajatsatru of well developed and long arms, and sitting round him were his younger brothers, surpassing the splendour of fire.

20. Going to that foremost of all virtuous men, the son of Kunti, and touching the feet of that prince of the Ajamira race Yudhisthira, Vasudeva, (Krishna) then said, "I am Krishna".

21. And the son of Rohini (Valadeva) also coming to Yudhisthira did the same. Seeing Krishna and Valadeva, the Pandavas expressed their great delight.

22. O foremost of the Bharata race, those chiefs of the Yadu race (Krishna and Valarama) then touched the feet of (Kunti), the sister of their father.

23. Seeing Krishna, Ajatsatru, that foremost of the kuru race, asked him his well-fare, and said "O Vasudeva, how have you been able to trace us, living as we are in disguise?"

24. Vasudeva smilingly replied, "O king, fire even if it is covered can easily be known. Who else among men except the Pandavas can perform such feats?"

25. O Pandavas, O withstanders of foes, you have by sheer good fortune escaped from that fearful fire (of the lac-house), and also by sheer good fortune the sinful son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana) with his ministers have not succeeded in their (evil) wishes.

26. Be blessed. Grow in prosperity as a fire in a cave gradually grows and spreads itself all around. Lest any of the kings recognise you, give us permission to return to our camp." Then obtaining the permission of the Pandavas, Krishna of undying prosperity, accompanied with Valadeva, soon went away.

Thus ends the hundred and ninety third chapter, the arrival of Ram and Krishna, in the Saimvara of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXCIV.

(SAIMVARA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When the two Kuru princes (Bhima and Aryuna) went towards the potter's house, the Panchala prince Dristyadumna followed them.

2. Having sent away all his attendants, he concealed himself unknown to the Pandavas in a place somewhere near the house of the potter.

3. That grinder of foes, Bhima, and Jishnu (Aryuna) and the high-souled twins returned in the evening from their begging tour; and they cheerfully offered everything to Yudhisthira.

4. Thereupon the kind Kunti thus spoke to the daughter of the Panchala king, "O amiable girl, first take a portion of this (food) and offer it to the gods and give it away to the Brahmanas.

5—6. Feed (also) those that are hungry, and give it to those that are our guests. Divide the rest into two portions. O amiable girl, give the half to Bhima,—for this strong youth with fair complexion, a man like a king of elephants,—this hero always eats much. Divide the other half into six equal parts,—four for these youths (Yudhisthira, Aryuna, Nakula and Sahadeva) one for myself, and the other for you.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Hearing these excellent words of her mother-in-law, the chaste princess, then cheerfully did all that she was directed to do. And they then all partook of the food.

8. Then the son of Madri, the ascetic Sahadeva, spread on the ground a bed of Kusha grass; thereupon those heroes all spread on it their deer-skins, and then they laid themselves down to sleep.

9. The foremost of Kuru princes laid themselves down with their heads towards the south. Kunti laid herself down along the line of their heads, and Krishna (Draupadi) along that of their feet.

10. Though she lay on Kusha grass and on the ground, like the nether pillow of the sons of Pandu, yet she felt no grief in her heart or any disrespect for those best of the Kurus.

11. Then those heroes began to talk to one another on celestial weapons, cars, elephants, swords, arrows and battle-axes. Their conversations were varied and were exceedingly interesting.

12. The son of the Panchala-king (Dhristadyumna) heard all that they said in their conversations; and all the men saw Krishna (Draupadi) in that state.

13. (As soon as morning came), the prince Dhristadyumna set out in great haste towards the palace in order to report to the king Drupada in detail what he had heard in the night as talked by those heroes among one another.

14. The Panchala-king was sad, because he did not know that those that had taken away his daughter were the Pandavas. The illustrious (king) asked Dhristadyumna in his return, "Where has Krishna gone? By whom has she been taken away?"

15. Has any Sudra, or any man of low birth, or any tribute-paying Vaisya placed his dirty feet on my head (by taking her away)? Has the garland of flowers been thrown away on a burning place for dead bodies?

16. O son, has any Kshatrya of high birth, or any one of the superior order (Brahmana) obtained my daughter? Has a man of low birth placed his left foot on my head by winning Krishna?

17. I shall not be sorry, but shall be very much pleased if my daughter has been united with that best of men, Partha. O illustrious one, tell me truly who has to-day taken away my daughter?

18. Are the sons of that foremost of the Kurus, Vichitrivirja's son (Pandus), alive? Was he Partha who took up the bow and shot the mark?"

Thus ends the hundred and ninety fourth chapter, the return of Dhristadyumna, in the Saimvara of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXC V. (VAIVAHIKA PARVA).

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having been thus addressed, that foremost of the lunar race, the prince Dhristadyumna, cheerfully said to his father all that had happened and by whom Krishna (Draupadi) had been won.

Dhristadyumna said :—

2—3. The Youth with large and red eyes, who was attired in black deer-skin and looked like a celestial in beauty, who stringed the foremost of bows and brought down on earth the mark set on high, was soon surrounded by all the foremost of Brahmanas, who offered him their homage for the feat he had achieved. Incapable of bearing the sight of the foes and endued with great activity, he (the youth) displayed his prowess. Surrounded by the Brahmanas he resembled like the thunder-wielding Indra in the midst of the celestials and the Rishis.

4. As a female elephant follows the leader of a herd, so Krishna cheerfully followed him, catching hold of his deer-skin. Being unable of bearing that sight the assembled kings rose up in anger and advanced to fight.

5. O king, then there rose in the arena another hero, who tore up a large tree and rushed against the kings (felling them right and left), as angry Yama smites down all living creatures.

6. O king, the assembled kings stood motionless looking at these two best of heroes among men. While they, resembling like the sun and the moon, took Krishna with them and went away to a potter's house (situated) outside the city.

7. There (in the potter's house) sat a lady, as effulgent as a flame of fire, who

I believe, is their mother. Around her also sat three foremost of men, each of whom was like a fire.

8. Coming to her, the two heroes paid homage to her feet and asked Krishna "To do homage to her." Keeping Krishna there, those foremost of men all went out in their begging tour.

9. (When they returned), Krishna took from them the food (that they had obtained in alms) and offered a portion to the gods and gave away another portion to the Brahmanas. She gave a portion to that venerable lady and distributed the rest to those foremost of men; she herself ate last of all.

10. O king, they then all laid themselves down for sleep, Krishna lying like their nether pillow. The bed on which they lay was made of Kusha grass, on which they spread their deer-skins.

11. They talked on various subjects in voices deep as those of black clouds. And the conversations of those heroes were such that neither Vaisyas, nor Sudras, nor Brahmanas could talk in that way.

12. O king, there is no doubt that they are foremost of Kshatryas, their conversations being on all military subjects. Our hope has been fulfilled. We have heard that the sons of Pritha escaped from the conflagration.

13. From the way in which the mark was shot down by the youth, the strength with which the bow was stringed by him and the manner in which they talked to one another, it is certain they are the sons of Pritha wandering in disguise.

Vaishampayana said :—

14. Thereupon the king Drupada became exceedingly pleased, and he sent to them his priest, directing him to ascertain who they were and whether they were (really) the sons of the illustrious Pandu.

15. As directed by the king, the priest went to them; and applauding them all, he told them duly in detail all that he was commanded by the monarch to say.

The Priest said :—

16. O men that deserve first worship, the boon-giving king of the earth, the lord of Panchala, (Drupada) is desirous to know who you are. Seeing this (hero) who has shot down the mark, his joy knows no bound.

17. Giving us all particulars of your family and tribe, place your feet on the heads of your enemies and gladden the hearts of the Panchala king and his men, and of mine also.

18. King Pandu was a dear friend of king Drupada who regarded him as his counter-self. He had all along cherished the desire of bestowing his this daughter on that Kuru prince (Pandus) as his daughter-in-law.

19. O heroes of faultless features, it was the wish in the heart of the king Drupada that the long and strong armed Aryuna should marry in due religious form his this daughter.

20. If that has become possible, nothing could be better, nothing more beneficial, and nothing more conducive to fame and virtue than that incident.

Vaishampayana said :—

Having said this, the priest became silent. The king (Yudhisthira) seeing him thus sitting with humility said,

21. "Let water to wash his feet and the Arghya be offered to this Brahmana. He is king Drupada's priest, and therefore he is worthy of our respect. We should worship him with more than ordinary reverence."

22. O king, Bhima then did as directed. Accepting the worship thus offered to him, he (the priest) became exceedingly glad; and then Yudhisthira thus addressed that priest sitting in comfort.

Yudhisthira said :—

23—24. By fixing a special kind of dower the Panchala king, has given away his daughter according to the practice of his order. He has not done it freely. Therefore, he has nothing to say in regard to the race, tribe, family and character of him who has performed the feat. This hero has won the princess by satisfying the demand of the king Drupada. All his queries have been answered by the stringing of the bow and the shooting down the mark.

25. It is by doing that which he had directed this illustrious hero has won Krishna in the assembly of kings. Under these circumstances, the king of the lunar race should not indulge in any regret which can only make him unhappy.

26. The desire that the king Drupada has all along entertained will (surely) be fulfilled, for O Brahmana, I believe this princess is endued with all auspicious marks.

27. None that is weak in strength could string that bow, and none of low birth or unaccomplished in arms could have shot down the mark.

28. It is, therefore, not proper for the Panchala king to grieve to-day for his daughter. There is no man in the world who can (now) undo that act of shooting down the mark.

Vaishampayana said.

29. While Yudhishthira was saying all this, another messenger came in haste and said "The feast is ready."

Thus ends the hundred and ninety fifth chapter, the arrival of the priest, in the Vaivahika of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXCVI.

(VAIVAHIKA PARVA)—Continued.

The Messenger said :—

1. A good feast for the bridegroom's party has been prepared by the king Drupada in view of his daughter's nuptials. Come there after finishing your daily rites. The marriage of Krishna will take place there. Do not make any delay.

2. These cars, adorned with golden lotuses and drawn by excellent horses, are worthy of being ridden by kings. Riding on them, come to the palace of the Panchala king.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. Having sent away the priest and having placed Kunti and Krishna on one of these cars, those best of the Kurus ascended those excellent cars and proceeded towards the palace.

4—5. O descendant of Bharata, O king, having heard from the priest the words of the Dharmaraja (Yudhishthira), he (Drupada), kept ready a large collection of things, such as fruits, sanctified garlands, armours, shields, carpets, kine, ropes, seeds, and various other articles and implements of agriculture so that he might ascertain to which order these heroes belonged.

6. The king also collected every article appertaining to other arts and various implements and apparatus of every kind of sports.

7—8. (He kept there also) shining armours, shields, excellent swords and scimitars, beautiful chariots and horses, first class bows and well-adorned arrows, various other kinds of weapons ornamented with gold, darts and rockets, battle-axes and other implements of war, beds and carpets, various other fine things and cloths of various kinds.

9. Taking with her the virtuous Krishna, Kunti entered the inner apartment of Drupada's palace. The ladies (of the king Drupada's household) worshipped the wife of the Kuru king with joyous hearts.

10—11. O king, seeing those foremost of men, each possessing the sportive gait of the lion, each with deer-skin for his upper garment, with eyes like mighty bulls, with broad shoulders and long hanging arms which looked like the bodies of mighty snakes, the king, the king's ministers, the king's sons, the king's relatives and attendants, all became exceedingly glad.

12. Those heroes without any hesitation and awkwardness sat with perfect fearlessness on costly seats furnished with footstools; and they sat one after the other according to the order of their age.

13. After those heroes were seated, well-dressed male and female servants and skilful cooks brought excellent and costly viands, on plates made of gold and silver,—food worthy of kings alone.

14. Then those foremost of men dined on those dishes and became well-pleased. After the dinner was over, those heroes among men, passing over all other things, began to examine with interest the various implements of war (displayed there).

15. Seeing this, Drupada's sons and the king (Drupada) himself with all the chief councillors knew the sons of Kunti to be all of royal blood, and they therefore became exceedingly happy.

Thus ends the hundred and ninety sixth chapter, the display of various things, in the Vaivahika of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXCVII.

(VAIVAHIKA PARVA)—continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. Then the greatly effulgent Panchala king addressed prince Yudhishthira in the form applicable to Brahmanas; he cheerfully enquired of that illustrious son of Kunti, (saying). "Are we to know you as Kshatryas or Brahmanas,

3—4. Or accomplished Vaisyas or men born of Sudras? Or are we to know you as celestials who have assumed the disguise of Brahmanas by their power of Maya (delusion) and who are roaming over the earth and who have come here for the hand of Krishna? O Sir, tell us the truth, we are in great doubt.

5. Shall we not be happy when our doubts will be removed? O chastiser of foes, have the Fates been propitious to us?

6. Tell us the truth willingly. Truth becomes monarchs better than sacrifices and dedications of tanks. Therefore, do not speak the untruth.

7. O celestial-like hero, O chastiser of foes, hearing your reply, I shall then make arrangements for the marriage according to the order to which you belong.

Yudhisthira said :—

8. O Panchala king, be not cheerless. Be cheerful. There is no doubt, your desire has been fulfilled.

9. O king, we are Kshatryas, and we are the sons of the illustrious Pandu. Know me to be the eldest of the sons of Kunti and these two to be Bhima and Aryuna.

10. O king, your daughter was won by these two (heroes) in the assembly of kings. The twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) and Kunti are there where Krishna is.

11. O best of men, let grief be dispelled from your heart, we are Kshatryas. Your daughter like a lotus has been transplanted from one lake to the other.

12. O great king, you are our revered superior and chief refuge. I have told all that is necessary to be told.

Vaishampayana said :—

13. Thereupon the king Drupada had his eyes rolling in ecstasy and he was filled with delight; he could not for some time answer Yudhisthira.

14. Suppressing his joy with great effort, that chastiser of foes (Drupada) replied to Yudhisthira in proper words.

15. The virtuous-minded (king) asked how they (the Pandavas) had escaped from the city (of Varnavata). The Pandava (Yudhisthira) narrated it all in detail.

16. Hearing the narration of the son of Kunti, king Drupada censured that ruler of men, Dhritarastra.

17. The foremost of all eloquent men, Drupada, gave every assurance to the son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, and vowed to restore him to his kingdom.

18. At the request of the king, Kunti Krishna, Bhima, Aryuna and the twins took up their quarters in a palace.

19. O king, they continued to reside there, treated by Yagmasena (Drupada) with every respect. The king (Drupada) with his sons, assured by all that had happened, thus spoke (to Yudhisthira).

Drupada said :—

20. O mighty-armed hero, let the Kuru prince Aryuna take to-day the hand of my daughter with all due rites. To-day is an auspicious day.

Vaishampayana said :—

21. Thereupon the virtuous-minded king Yudhisthira replied, "O great king, I shall also have to marry.

Drupada said :—

22. O hero, take the hand of my daughter you yourself in all due rites. Or give Krishna in marriage to him whom you please.

Yudhisthira said :—

23. O king, Draupadi shall be the queen of all of us. O great king, it has been thus ordered by our mother.

24. I am still unmarried,—so is the Pandava Bhimasena. Your jewel of a daughter has been won by Partha.

25. O king, this is our rule that we must equally enjoy a jewel that we obtain. O excellent king, we are not willing now to break that rule.

26. Krishna shall be the wedded queen of all of us. Let her take our hands before the fire one after the other according to our age.

Drupada said :—

27. O descendant of Kuru, it is ordained that a husband can have many wives, but we have never heard that a wife can have many husbands.

28. O son of Kunti, pure as you are and acquainted with the rules of morality, you should not commit an act that is sinful and opposed both to the Vedas and usage. Why has your understanding come to be so?

Yudhisthira said :—

29. O great king, morality is subtle, we do not know its course. Let us therefore follow the path trod by the illustrious men of former ages.

30. My tongue never utters an untruth; my mind never turns to that which is sinful. It has been commanded by our mother and my mind also approves of it.

31. O king, it is certainly conformable to virtue. Therefore, act accordingly without any scruple. O king, do not entertain any fear in this matter.

Drupada said :—

32. O son of Kunti, my son Dhristadyumna, Kunti, and you yourself, these three settle amongst yourselves as to what should be done. I shall do what is proper to-morrow.

Vaishampayana said :—

33. O descendant of Bharata, O king, thereupon those three (Kunti, Yudhisthira and Dhristadyumna) discoursed on this matter; and at that very time Dwaipayana came there (wandering over the world) at pleasure.

Thus ends the hundred and ninety seventh chapter, the arrival of Dwaipayana, in the Vaivahika of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXCVIII.

(VAIVAHIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon all the Pandavas, and the illustrious Panchala king, and all others stood up; and they saluted the illustrious Krishna (Dwaipayana).

2. The high-souled (Rishi) saluted them in return and enquired after their welfare; he then sat down on a holy carpet made of gold.

3. Commanded by the immeasurably energetic Krishna (Dwaipayana), those foremost of men all sat down on costly seats.

4. Thereupon a moment after the son of Prishata in sweet words asked that illustrious man about the marriage of Draupadi.

Drupada said :—

5. O illustrious one, how can one woman become the wife of many men without being defiled by sin. Tell me truly all this in detail.

Vyasa said :—

6. O king, this, being opposed to both usage and the Vedas, has become obsolete. I desire to hear what is the opinion of each of you in this matter.

Drupada said :—

7. In my opinion this practice is sinful, because it is opposed to both the usage and the Vedas. O best of the twice born, there is nowhere a wife with many husbands.

8. The illustrious men of former ages had never such an usage amongst them. The wise should never commit a sin.

9. I can therefore never make up my mind to act in this way. The practice appears to me to be of doubtful morality.

10. O best of the twice born, O ascetic Rishi, O Brahmana, how can the elder brother, if he is at all of good character, can approach the wife of his younger brother?

11. The ways of morality are always subtle. Therefore, we do not know them. We cannot, therefore, say what is conformable to virtue and what is not.

12. We cannot therefore perform such an act with a safe mind. O Brahmana, I can never say, "Let Krishna be the wife of five (husbands)."

Yudhisthira said :—

13. My tongue never utters an untruth, and my heart never turns to sin. When my heart approves it, it can never be sinful.

14. I have heard in the Puranas that a lady of the Gotama race named Jatila, the foremost of all virtuous women, married seven Rishis (all together.)

15. So also the daughter of an ascetic married ten brothers, all of them bearing the same name of Prachetas, and all of their souls were exalted by asceticism.

16. O foremost of all men learned in the precepts of virtue, it is said that obedience to superiors is a cardinal virtue. Of all superiors the mother is the foremost.

17. She has commanded us, saying, "Enjoy all of you that which you have obtained." O best of the twice born, it is therefore I consider this act to be virtuous.

Kunti said :—

18. It is so as the virtuous Yudhisthira has said. I am in great fear lest my words become untrue. How shall I be saved from untruth?

Vyasa said :—

19. O amiable one, you shall be saved from untruth. This is eternal virtue. O Panchala king, I will not talk on this matter before you all. You alone will hear it.

20. (I shall tell you) how this practice has been established, and why it is to be regarded as old and eternal. There is no doubt that what the son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, has said is quite conformable to virtue.

Vaishampayana said :—

21. Thereupon rose the illustrious Vyasa, the lord Dwaipayana; and taking hold of Drupada's hand he went into the palace.

22. The Pandavas, Kunti, and the descendant of Prishata Dhristadyumna, waited in that place for those two (Vyasa and Drupada).

23. Thereupon Dwaipayana explained to that illustrious king how the marriage of one wife with many husbands is conformable to virtue.

Thus ends the hundred and ninety eighth chapter, the words of Vyasa, in the Vaivahika of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CXCIX.

(VAIVAHIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vyasa said :—

1. In days of yore, the celestials performed a great sacrifice in the Naimisha forest. O king, the son of Vivaswata (Yama) became the slayer of animals.

2. O king, thus employed in that sacrifice, Yama did not kill any human being. Thereupon the death being suspended among men, the number of human beings greatly increased.

3. Soma, Sakra, Varuna, Kuvera, the Sadhyas, the Rudrus, the Vasus, the twin Ashwinis,—these and other celestials went to Prajapati, the creator of the world.

4. Alarmed at the increase of human beings, they all thus addressed the master of creation. "We are afflicted with the fear (of the increase of human beings), and therefore wishing to be relieved, we ask your protection.

The Grandsire said :—

5. You have no fear from human beings; you are all immortal. You should not be frightened by the mortals.

The Celestials said :—

6. The mortals have all become the immortals. There is now no difference between them and us. Being vexed at this, we have come to you so that we may have some distinction (from men).

The Deity said :—

7. The son of Vivaswata (Yama) is now engaged in the great sacrifice. It is for this reason that human beings are not dying. When his sacrificial works will be finished, the death will be again among men.

8. When that time will come, the son of Vivaswata will be strengthened by your respective energies. He will then sweep away thousands of human beings who will have no energy left in them.

Vyasa said :—

9. Having heard these words of the first-born deity, the greatly strong (celestials) went (to the place of sacrifice), and when they all assembled there, they saw a (golden) lotus in the Bhagirathi.

10. Seeing that (golden) lotus, they were very much surprised. The foremost of heroes among them, Indra, went (to find out where it grew). Going to the place wherefrom the Ganges always issues forth, he saw a lady as effulgent as the fire.

11. The lady who had come there to fetch water was bathing in the Ganges, but she was weeping all the while. The drops of tear that fell from her eyes were transformed into golden lotuses.

12. Seeing this wonderful sight, the wielder of the thunder (Indra) came to the lady and said, "O amiable lady, who are you? Why are you weeping? I desire to know the truth. Tell me everything."

The Lady said :—

13. O Sakra, unfortunate as I am, you may know who I am, and why I am I weeping. O king, if you come with me as I lead the way, you can then see why I weep.

Vyasa said :—

14. He (Indra) followed her and soon saw a handsome youth with a young lady. They were seated on a throne on the peaks of the king of mountains, and they were playing with dice.

15. The king of the celestials thus spoke to him, "O intelligent youth, know this universe to be under my sway." Seeing that the person take no notice of what he had said, he (Indra) again said, "I am the lord of the universe."

16. Seeing Indra angry, the youth who was none else than Mahadeva cast a glance at him and smiled. At that glance the king of the celestials was at once paralysed, and stood on that spot like a statue.

17. When the game of dice came to an end, he (Siva) spoke thus to the weeping woman, "Bring him (Indra) here. I shall so deal with him that pride may not again enter his heart."

18. As soon as Indra was touched by that woman, the chief of the celestials with limbs paralysed by that touch fell down on the ground. The illustrious deity of fierce energy (Siva) then said to him, "O Indra, never act thus again.

19. Remove this huge stone, for your strength and energy are immeasurable. Enter the hole and wait with others who are all like you and the sun in splendour."

20. He (Indra) removed that stone and saw a cave on the great mountain in which were four others resembling himself. Seeing them, he became very much grieved and exclaimed, "Shall I too meet with such fate?"

21. Then looking at the wielder of thunder (Indra) with expanded eyes, the deity Girisha (Siva,) said in anger, "O Satakratu, (Indra) enter this cave without delay, for out of folly you have insulted me before my very eyes."

22. Thus addressed by the lord (Siva,) the chief of the celestials was deeply grieved in consequence of that imprecation; and with limbs weakened by fear he trembled like the wind-shaken leaf of the fig tree on the breast of the king of mountains.

23. Thus unexpectedly cursed by the deity that rides the bull (Siva,) Indra trembled from head to foot; and with joined hands he thus addressed the fearful god of many manifestations, "O Bhava, you are the on-looker of the infinite universe."

24. To him thus replied the deity of fiery energy with smiles, "Those that have your disposition never obtain my grace. These others (four in the cave) were like you at one time. Therefore, enter the cave and lie there for some time.

25—26. The fate of you all should certainly be the same. All of you shall have to take births in the world of men, where having achieved many difficult feats and killing large number of men, you shall again regain the valued region of Indra by the merits of your respective deeds. You shall accomplish all I have said and much more.

The old Indras said :—

27. We shall go from our celestial region to the region of men where salvation is difficult to gain. But let the celestials, Dharma, Vayu, Magavata (present Indra) and the twin Ashwinis beget us on our would-be mother. After fighting with men with both human and celestial weapons, we shall again come back to the region of Indra.

Vyasa said :—

28. Having heard this, the wielder of thunder (Indra) again addressed that foremost of gods (Siva) saying, "Instead of going myself, I shall create from myself with a portion of my energy a person able to accomplish the task; and he will be the fifth among these (old Indras)."

29. Bishwavuka, Bhutadhamana, greatly effulgent Sivi, Sauti and Tejaswin,—these are the five Indras of old.

30. The illustrious deity of the formidable bow kindly granted to the five Indras the desire they cherished in their hearts, and he appointed that exceedingly beautiful lady, who was none else than the celestial Lakshmi herself to be their common wife in the world of men.

31. Thereupon accompanied by all these Indras, he (Siva) went to Narayana, who is immeasurably effulgent, infinite, immaterial, the self-born, the old, the eternal and the spirit of the infinite universe.

32. He (Narayana) approved of everything, and then they (Indras) all took births in the world of men. Hari (Narayana) took up two hairs from his body; one of them was white and the other black.

33. Those two hairs entered the wombs of the two ladies of the Yadu race,—named Devaki and Rohini. The hair of the deity that was white became Valadeva, and the hair that was black became Keshava's self,—Krishna.

34. Those Indra-like ones who were kept confined in the cave of the mountain are none else than the five sons of Pandu, possessing great prowess. And the Pandava Savyashachi (Aryuna) is a portion of (the present) Indra.

35. O king, thus were born as the sons of Pandu those that were at one time Indras, and the celestial Lakshmi herself who had appointed to be their wife is the exceedingly beautiful Draupadi.

36. How could she whose effulgence is like that of the sun or the moon, whose fragrance spreads over two miles around, take birth in any other but an extraordinary way? She rose from within the earth by virtue of your sacrifice.

37. O king, I cheerfully grant to you this boon,—I give you spiritual sight. Behold the sons of Kunti now possessing their sacred and celestial forms of old.

Vaishampayana said :—

38. Thereupon, that holy Brahmana, Vyasa of greatly generous deeds, gave celestial sight to that king (Drupada) by his ascetic power. Then the king saw them (the Pandavas) all possessing their former forms.

39. He saw them with celestial bodies, with golden crowns and celestial garlands, each of them resembling like a Indra himself, with complexion as effulgent as the fire or the sun, each adorned with every ornament, each handsome and youthful, each with broad chest and stature with a height of five cubits.

40. Possessing every accomplishment, attired in celestial robes of great beauty, and adorned with fragrant garlands of excellent make, the king saw them as so many three-eyed gods (Siva) or Vasus, Rudras or Adityas.

41. Seeing the (four others) Pandavas in the forms of the old Indras, and Aryuna in the form of the (present) Indra sprang from Indra himself, the king Drupada was exceedingly pleased. He was greatly surprised on seeing the celestial manifestation of Maya.

42. Looking at his daughter, that foremost of women possessing great beauty as that of a celestial maiden and splendour as that of the fire or the moon, the king considered, that for her beauty, splendour and fame, she is really worthy to be the wife of those celestial beings.

43. Seeing that wonderful sight, he touched the feet of the son of Satyavati, (Vyasa) and said, "O great Rishi, there is nothing wonderful in you."

Vyasa said:—

44. There was in a certain wood a daughter of an illustrious Rishi, who though handsome and chaste, did not get a husband,

45. She gratified by her asceticism the deity Sankara (Siva). The deity being pleased with her, himself thus spoke to her "Tell me what you want."

46. Having been thus addressed, she repeatedly said to the boon-giving supreme lord, "I desire to have a husband endued with all accomplishments."

47. That deity Sankara gave her the boon in joyful heart (saying,) "O amiable girl, you shall have five husbands."

48. She who had been able to please the deity said again, "O Sankara, I desire to have from you only one husband endued with all accomplishments."

49. The god of gods, being well-pleased with her, spoke again to her thus, "You have addressed me five times saying, "Give me a husband"

50. O amiable girl, therefore it shall be as you have asked. Be blessed. All this will happen in one of your future births."

51. This your daughter of celestial beauty is that maiden. The faultless Krishna of the Prishata race had been pre-ordained to be the wife of five (men).

52. The celestial Lakshmi has risen in the great sacrifice to be the wife of the Pandavas. After severe penances she is born as your daughter.

53. O king, that handsome goddess, who is waited upon by all the celestials, becomes the wife of five husbands. She has been created by the self-created (Brahma) for this purpose. Hearing all this, do what you desire.

Thus ends the hundred and ninety ninth chapter, the history of five Indras, in the Vaivahika of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CC.

(VAIVAHIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Drupada said—

1. O great Rishi, it is only when I have not heard from you all this that I intended to act in the way I have already told you. I am now incapable of acting against what has been ordained by the celestials. I therefore desire to act as you have said.

2. The knot of destiny cannot be untied. There is nothing which is the result of our own actions. That which was made to secure one husband (for my daughter) becomes now the source of this (new) ordinance.

3. As Krishna (Draupadi) had repeatedly asked (in her former life) for five times saying, "Give me a husband," the great deity had granted her the boon accordingly. The deity himself knows the right or the wrong of this.

4. When Sankara has fixed this ordinance,—sinful or virtuous, I can have no fault. Therefore, let these (heroes) take as ordained the hand of Krishna according to all due rites.

Vaishampayana said:—

5. The illustrious Rishi then spoke thus to Dharmaraja (Yudhishthira,) "O son of Pandu to-day is an auspicious day. To-day the Moon has entered the constellation Pushya. You first take the hand of Krishna to-day."

6. Thereupon the king Jagmasena with his son made preparations for the marriage. Keeping ready many costly marriage presents, he brought out his daughter Krishna adorned after a bath, with many jewels and pearls.

7. All the freinds and the relatives of the king with the state ministers and many Brahmanas and citizens according to their precedence of ranks, came there in joy to witness the marriage ceremony.

8. Adorned with that concourse of chief men, with its court-yards decked with lotuses and lilies and beautified with the lines of troops, and fastened round with diamonds and precious stones, his (Drupada's) palace looked like the sky studded with the brilliant stars.

9. Then those Kuru Princes, those young (heroes) bathed; adorned with ear-rings, attired in costly robes, and perfumed by sandal paste, they performed the Aviseka (preparatory ceremony) and all other usual auspicious rites.

10. O lord, like mighty bulls entering their pen, they then accompanied by their priest Dhaumya, as effulgent as fire, entered in joy and in due order (the wedding place) one after the other.

11. Then that Veda-knowing priest (Dhaumya) kindled the sacred fire and poured the libations of Ghee in that blazing fire with proper Mantras. That Mantra-knowing Brahmana then called Yudhishthira and united him with Krishna (Draupadi).

12. Walking round the fire (for seven times), the bride and the bridegroom took each other's hands. Thus they were married by the Veda-knowing (Dhaumya). Then taking leave of that ornament of battle (Yudhishthira), he (Dhaumya) went out of the palace.

13. Then those mighty car-warriors, the perpetuators of the Kuru race, those princes, attired in costly robes, took the hand of that best of women (Draupadi) day by day in succession.

14. The celestial Rishi told me of a very wonderful incident, namely that the high-souled lady of slender waist (Draupadi) regained her virginity day after day (i.e. every day after her previous marriage).

15. After the wedding was over, Drupada gave to those great car-warriors various kinds of excellent wealth. (He gave them) one hundred chariots with golden standards, each drawn by four horses with golden bridles;

16. One hundred elephants all possessing auspicious marks on their temples and faces, and all looking like so many mountains with golden peaks; and one hundred young maid-servants attired in costly robes and adorned with ornaments and floral wreaths.

17. Making fire his witness, the high-souled king of the lunar race, (Drupada), gave separately each of those celestial-like heroes much wealth, various brilliant ornaments and many costly robes.

18. When the wedding was over, and after they had obtained that maiden, like Lakshmi herself, along with great wealth, those greatly powerful sons of Pandu like so many Indras passed their days in joy, in the capital of the Panchala king.

Thus ends the two hundredth chapter, the marriage of Draupadi, in the Vaivahika of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCI.

(VAIVAHIKA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. After his alliance with the Pandavas, Drupada had all his fears dispelled; and he did not fear even the celestials.

2. The ladies of the illustrious Drupada's (household) all came to Kunti; and mentioning their respective names, they saluted her with their heads touching the ground.

3. Krishna, attired in red silk and with her wrists still encircled with auspicious thread, saluted her mother-in-law with reverence; and she then stood before her contentedly with joined hands.

4. Out of affection Pritha (Kunti) pronounced a blessing on Draupadi, endued with beauty and auspicious marks, and with sweet disposition and good character.

Kunti said:—

5. As Sachi is to Indra, as Saha to Vivavasu, as Rohini to Soma, as Damayanti to Nala,

6. As Vadra to Vaisrava, as Arundhanti to Vashistha and as Lakshmi to Narayana, so be you to your husbands.

7. O amiable girl, be the mother of long-lived and heroic children, and possess every thing that can make you happy. Be lucky and prosperous, be faithful to your husbands and a performer of great sacrifices.

8. Let your time be ever passed in duly entertaining your guests, the strangers that come to your house, the pious men, the old men, the children and the superiors.

9. Be installed with the virtue-loving king (Yudhishthira) as the queen of the kingdom and the capital of Kurujangala.

10. Let the whole earth, conquered by your greatly powerful husbands, be given to the Brahmanas in a great Ashwamedha sacrifice.

11. O accomplished girl, what gems of great qualities are in the world, let them all belong to you. O blessed girl, be happy for (full) one hundred years.

12. O daughter-in-law, as I rejoice to-day on seeing you in red silk, so I shall rejoice when you will give birth to an accomplished son.

Vaishampayana said:—

13. After the Pandavas had been married, Hari (Krishna) sent to them various golden ornaments set with pearls and Vaidurya gems.

14. Madhava (Krishna) also sent (to them) costly robes of various countries, many beautiful and soft blankets and skins,

15. Various costly beds, carpets and conveyances, and hundreds of vessels set with diamonds and Vaidurya gems.

16. Krishna gave them thousands of maid-servants, all young, beautiful, and accomplished, and adorned with all ornaments and brought from various countries.

17. He also gave them many well-trained elephants of the country of the Madras, many excellent horses adorned with ornaments, and many chariots drawn by horses of excellent colors and large teeth.

18. Madhusudana (Krishna) of immeasurable soul sent to them also in separate heaps millions of coins of pure gold.

19. Wishing to please Govinda (Krishna), Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, being himself filled with great joy, accepted all those presents.

Thus ends the two hundred and first chapter, the presents of Sreekrishna, in the Vaivahika of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCII.

(VIDURAGAMANA PARVA).

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon the kings knew from their trusted spies that the beautiful Draupadi had got the Pandavas as her husbands ;

2. The illustrious man who had bent the bow and shot the mark was Aryuna, that foremost of all victorious warriors and the great wielder of bow and arrows ;

3. The greatly strong man who had hurled away the Madra king Salya, he who had in anger frightened all men in the battle by the tree,

4. He who had stood in perfect fearlessness, whose touch was death to all, that illustrious hero, was no other than Bhima, that grinder of hostile ranks.

5. The monarchs were very much astonished to learn that the sons of Kunti, the Pandavas, had assumed the guise of the peaceful Brahmanas.

6. They heard that Kunti with her sons had been formerly burnt to death in the lac-house ; therefore those kings regarded the Pandavas as men who had come back from the dead.

7. Remembering the greatly cruel deeds of Purochana, they said, "Fie on Bhishma ! Fie on Dhritarastra of the Kuru race !"

8. When the Saimvara was over, all the kings, learning that Draupadi had been wedded to the Pandavas, went away to their respective kingdoms.

9—10. Having heard that Draupadi had been married to the rider of the white horse (Aryuna), Duryodhana became greatly depressed ; and accompanied by his brothers, Ashwathama, his maternal uncle (Sakuni), Karna and Kripa, he started for his capital. Then Dushashana, being full of shame, thus slowly spoke to him.

11. "O king, if Aryuna had not disguised himself as a Brahmana, he could have never succeeded in obtaining Draupadi. On that account, none could recognise as Dhananjaya.

12. I believe that Destiny is supreme and human exertion is useless. O brother, fie on our exertions, when the Pandavas are still alive !"

13. Thus talking to one another and blaming Purochana, they entered Hastinapur in misery and sorrow.

14—15. Seeing the greatly powerful sons of Pritha escaped from the house of lac and allied with Drupada, and thinking of Dhristadyumna, Shikhandin and also other sons of Drupada who were all learned in every art of war, he (Duryodhana) became depressed and alarmed.

16—17. Having learnt that Draupadi had been won by the Pandavas and that the sons of Dhritarastra,—their pride being broken,—had returned in shame, Vidura became exceedingly glad ; and coming to Dhritarastra, O king, Khatwa (Vidura) said to him, "The Kurus are prospering from good luck."

18. O descendant of Bharata, the son of Vichitravirya, the king Dhritarastra, becoming astonished, said in great joy, "What good luck ! What good luck !"

19. That king, possessing the eye of knowledge, thought from ignorance that his eldest son Duryodhana had been chosen by the daughter of Drupada.

20. He ordered various ornaments to be made for Draupadi, and he ordered that both Krishna and his son Duryodhana should be (brought in great pomp.)

21. It was then that Vidura said that Draupadi had chosen the Pandavas for her husbands, and they were all in good health and peace, and those heroes had been duly received by Drupada ;

22. And that the Pandavas had been allied with the many relatives and friends of Drupada, each possessing large armies, and also with many others that had come to the Saimvara,

Dhritarastra said :—

23. Those children are dearer to me than they were to Pandu. Know that my affection for them is now greater than before.

24. Those heroes, the sons of Pandu, are in good health and peace and they have now friends. Their friends and others (with whom they have allied) are all greatly powerful.

25. O Khattwa, who among kings does not desire to have Drupada with his relatives as his friend in weal or in woe?

Vaishampayana said :—

26. When he said this, Vidura replied, "O king, let your understanding remain so for one hundred years."

27. O king, then there came to Dhritarastra Duryodhana and the son of Radha (Karna), and they thus spoke to him,

28. "We are incapable of speaking wicked designs before Vidura. We have now found you alone; we shall, therefore, speak to you all that we desire to say.

29. O father, are you considering the prosperity of the enemy as your own? O best of men, you were applauding the Pandavas before Khattwa.

30. O sinless one, you are not acting as you should. You ought to act every day in a way as to weaken their (the Pandavas') strength.

31. The time has come when we should consult together, so that they (the Pandavas) may not swallow us all with our sons, forces, friends and relatives.

Thus ends the two hundred and second chapter, the words of Duryodhana, in the Viduragamana in the Adi Parva,

CHAPTER CCIII.*(VIDURAGAMANA PARVA)—Contd.*Dhritarastra said :—

1. I desire to act exactly as you desire, but I do not wish to show my mental thoughts to Vidura even by my demeanour,

2. Therefore, I was highly applauding them (the Pandavas), so that Vidura may not know my real desire even by a sign.

3. O Duryodhana, as this is the (proper) time, tell me, therefore, what is in your mind and also in the mind of the son of Radha (Karna.)

Duryodhana said :—

4. Let us by the help of trusted and skilful Brahmanas privately create dissensions amongst the Pandavas,—a quarrel between the sons of Kunti and those of Madri.

5—7. Or let the king Drupada with his sons and all his ministers of state be tempted by the presents of large wealth, so that they may abandon the cause of the son of Kunti, Yudhishthira. Or let them (our spies) speak to each of them separately the inconveniences of this place (Hastinapur) and induce them to live there (in Panchala.) Thus separated from the Kurus, they may live permanently there.

8. O let some clever men, full of resources, sow the seed of disunion among the sons of Pritha and make them jealous of one another.

9. Or let them incite Krishna (Draupadi) against her husbands; as she has many husbands, it will not at all be difficult. Let some make the Pandavas dissatisfied with her, so that she may be displeased with them.

10. O king, let some clever spies, full of resources, go there and secretly bring about the death of Bhimasena,—he is the strongest of them all.

11. Relying on him the son of Kunti formerly disregarded us. He is fierce, brave and the main-stay of the Pandavas.

12. O king, on his death all the others (the Pandavas) will be deprived of strength and energy. Deprived of him, who is their main-stay, they will not attempt to regain their kingdom.

13. If Aryuna is supported from behind by Vrikodara (Bhima), he is invincible in battle. But if Bhima is not there, he (Aryuna) is not a match for even the fourth part of the son of Radha (Karna).

14. In consequence of the death of Bhimasena, they (the Pandavas) would know themselves weak and ourselves strong; and they will not attempt to recover the kingdom.

15. O king, if coming here, they prove themselves docile and obedient to us, we would then try to repress them according to the Shastras (Political science).

16. We may tempt them with handsome girls; and on seeing which Krishna (Draupadi) will surely be annoyed with the sons of Kunti.

17. Or, O son of Radha, send messengers to bring them here, so that getting them here, we might kill them by some means or other.

18. O father, employ any of these means which appear to you faultless. Time passes away, we should not make any further delay.

19. So long their confidence in that best of kings Drupada is not established, we may succeed,—but not after, (when it has been established.)

20. O father, these are my views for their suppression. Judge whether they are good or bad. What, O son of Radha (Karna), do you think?

Thus ends the two hundred and third chapter, the words of Duryodhana, in the Viduragamana in the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCIV.

(VIDURAGAMANA PARVA)—Contd.

Karna said:—

1. O Duryodhana, in my opinion your reasonings are not well-founded. O perpetrator of the Kuru race,—no machinations will succeed against the Pandavas.

2. O hero, you have formerly tried to accomplish your wishes by various subtle means, but you have not been successful in killing them.

3. O king, they were then living near you, they were then mere children, they were then without allies and friends, still you could not injure them.

4. They are now living at a distance, they are now grown up, and they are now stronger by securing allies. It is my firm belief that you will not be able to injure them now with any subtle machinations.

5. They are aided by Fate. When they are desirous of regaining the place of their fathers and grandfathers, we can never succeed to injure them by any means of ours.

6. It is impossible to create disunion amongst them. They can never be disunited who have taken a common wife.

7. We can never succeed in estranging Krishna (Draupadi) from them by any spies. She chose them as her husband when they were in adversity,—they are now in prosperity.

8. Women generally desire to have many husbands, Krishna has got it; she can never be estranged from them.

9. The Panchala king is honest and virtuous, he is not covetous for wealth. Even if we offer him our whole kingdom, he will certainly not abandon the sons of Kunti.

10. His son is also well-accomplished and has become attached to the Pandavas; therefore, I think by no subtle machinations that are in your power, you will be able to injure them.

11. O best of men, this is what is good and advisable for us to-day,—namely, O king, to attack and smite them till the Pandavas are exterminated. O sire, consent to this.

12. As long as our party is strong and that of the Panchalas weak, so long let us strike them without scruple.

13. O son of Gandhari, O king, as long as their innumerable conveyances, their friends and relatives, do not gather together, so long continue to display your prowess.

14. O king, as long as the Panchala king with his greatly powerful son does not resolve to fight with us, so long display your prowess.

15. As long as Vasudeva, Krishna, does not march with the Yadava hosts into the city of the Panchala king in order to restore the Pandavas to their kingdom, so long display your prowess.

16. Wealth, articles of enjoyments, kingdom,—nay there is nothing which Krishna may not sacrifice for the Pandavas.

17. The whole earth was acquired by the illustrious Bharata by his prowess. Indra has obtained the sovereignty of three worlds by prowess alone.

18. O king, prowess is always admired in a Kshatrya. O best of kings, prowess is the cardinal virtue of the heroes.

19. O king, therefore, without any further delay let us with our large army of four kinds of troops vanquish Drupada and bring here the Pandavas.

20. The Pandavas cannot be defeated by any policy of conciliation, of gift, of wealth, of bribery or of disunion. Therefore, vanquish them by your prowess.

21. O king, after defeating them by your prowess, rule over the wide world. I do not see any other means of becoming successful in our object.

Vaishampayana said:—

22. Hearing what the son of Radha (Karna) said, the powerful Dhritarastra gave him high praise, and he then spoke to him thus,

23. "O son of Suta, you are gifted with great wisdom and you are highly accomplished in arms. Such words breathing the spirit of heroism are surely worthy of you.

24. But let Bhisma, Drona, and Vidura and also you two, consult together, and then adopt that means which may lead to our good."

25. Thereupon, the greatly illustrious king Dhritarastra summoned to him all those councillors and consulted with them.

Thus ends the two hundred and fourth chapter, the consultation of Dhritarastra, in the Viduragamana of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCV.

(VIDURAGAMANA PARVA)—Contd.

Bhisma said :—

1. O Dhritarastra, I can never consent to a quarrel with the sons of Pandu. There is no doubt Pandu was to me as you are to me.

2. The sons of Gandhari are (as dear) to me as the sons of Kunti. O Dhritarastra, they are to be protected as much by me as you.

3. O king, they are as much dear to me as prince Duryodhana and other Kurus.

4. Therefore, I can never like a quarrel with them. Conclude a treaty with those heroes and give them the half of the kingdom. There is no doubt that this is the ancestral kingdom of those best of the Kurus (the Pandavas).

5. O Duryodhana, as you consider this kingdom as your paternal property, so do the Pandavas consider this their paternal property.

6. If the illustrious sons of Pandu do not get the kingdom,—how can it be yours or of any descendant of the Bharata race?

7. O best of the Bharata race, if you think you have rightfully come into the possession of the kingdom, I think, they can consider also that they have rightfully come to the possession of the kingdom before you.

8. Give them in peace the half of the kingdom. O best of men, this is for the good of all.

9. If you act otherwise, no good will come to any of us. There is no doubt we all will be covered with dishonour.

10. Try to maintain your good name. A good name is the source of one's strength. It is said that a man, whose reputation is gone, lives in vain.

11. O descendant of Kuru, O son of Gandhari, a man does not die so long his reputation exists. One lives as long as his fame lasts; he dies when his reputation is gone.

12. Therefore, follow the practice that is worthy of the Kuru race. O mighty-armed hero, act as your forefathers did before you.

13. It is fortunate for us that the sons of Pirtha are alive; it is fortunate that Pritha is still alive. It is fortunate that the sinful Purochana, without being successful (in his evil design), himself perished.

14. O son of Gandhari, from that time when I heard that the sons of Kunti Bhoja's daughter had been burnt to death, I could not meet with any living creatures.

15. O best of men, hearing the way in which Kunti was killed, men do not consider Purochana so much guilty as they consider you.

16. O king, therefore the escape of the sons of Pandu from that conflagration and their present reappearance remove your bad repute.

17. O descendant of Kuru, know that as long as those heroes (the Pandavas) live, the wielder of thunder (Indra) himself cannot deprive them of their paternal property.

18. They are virtuous and united; they are unjustly kept out of their equal share in the kingdom.

19. If you want to act justly, if you want to act what is pleasing to me, if you want to seek the welfare of all,—then give them the half of the kingdom.

Thus ends the two hundred and fifth chapter, the words of Bhisma, in the Viduragamana of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCVI.

(VIDURAGAMANA PARVA)—Contd.

Drona said :—

1. O king Dhritarastra, it has been heard that friends summoned for consultation should always speak what is right, true and conducive of fame.

2. O Sire, my opinion is as that of the illustrious Bhisma. Let the sons of Kunti have a share in the kingdom. It is eternal virtue.

3. O descendant of Bharata, send a sweet-speeched man to Drupada; let him carry for them (the Pandavas) a large treasure with him.

4. Let him take costly presents with him for both the bridegroom and the bride, and let him speak to him (Drupada) the increase of your power and dignity that has been secured by this alliance.

5. O king, let him say to Drupada and Dhristadyumna that both you and Duryodhana have become exceedingly glad by all that has happened.

6. Let him say that the alliance has been exceedingly proper, and it has become very pleasing to you, and that you are quite worthy of it. Let him repeatedly propitiate the sons of Kunti and the two sons of Madri.

7. O king, let many brilliant golden ornaments at your command be given to Draupadi.

8. O best of the Bharata race, let proper presents be given to all the sons of Drupada, and all the Pandavas with (their mother) Kunti.

9. Thus propitiating Drupada with the Pandavas, he should then propose their return (to Hastinapur.)

10. When those heroes will get the permission (of Drupada) to come here, let Dushyasana and Vikarna go with a magnificent army to receive the Pandavas.

11. Let those best of the Kurus, the sons of Pandu, always be treated by you with affection, and let them be installed in their paternal kingdom as desired by the people.

12. O descendant of Bharata, in my opinion and that of Bhisma, this should be your conduct towards the Pandavas, who stand to you in the relation of your own sons.

Karna said:—

13. These two (Bhisma and Drona) are supported by your wealth and favours. They are supposed to be your best friends. What can be more surprising than they should give you advice that is not for your good!

14. How can the wise accept the advice which is pronounced good by the man who speaks with wicked intention, taking care to conceal the wickedness of his heart?

15. Friends can neither do good nor harm in distress. Man's happiness or misery depends on Destiny alone.

16. He who is wise, or he who is a fool, he who is old or he who is a child, he who has friends or he who has no friends, becomes happy or unhappy everywhere.

17. We have heard that there was a king of old, named Ambuvachi, who was the king at Rajgriha over the Maghadas.

18. He was a king who never looked to his affairs. All he did was to inhale and exhale the air. All his affairs were in the hands of his ministers.

19. He had a minister, named Mahasarni, who became the supreme lord of his kingdom. Regarding that all authority had been gained, he even disregarded the king.

20. The fool himself appropriated everything belonging to the king, including his articles of luxury, his women, his jewels and his sovereignty.

21. Having secured them all, that avaricious man's avarice only increased; and having appropriated all, he coveted his kingdom.

22. We have heard that with all his endeavours he did not succeed to get the kingdom, although the king did not look to his affairs and only breathed the air.

23. O king, what else human exertion can be said to have been in him than that the kingdom was dependent on his Destiny. If this kingdom be fixed in you by destiny,

24. It will certainly remain in you, notwithstanding the enmity of all the worlds. If otherwise, however you may try, it will never remain in you.

25. You are learned,—therefore, remembering all this, judge of the honesty and dishonesty of your ministers. Ascertain also who amongst them are wicked and who have spoken wisely and well.

Drona said:—

26. Wicked as you are, you say so out of the wickedness of your intentions. It is to injure the Pandavas, you find fault with us.

27. O Karna, know that what I have said is good for all. This is for the prosperity of the Kuru race. If you consider it as productive of evil, tell yourself what is the great good.

28. If the advice, productive of great good that I have given, is not followed, my opinion is that the Kurus will be exterminated.

Thus ends the two hundred and sixth chapter, the words of Drona, in the Viduragamana of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCVII.

VIDURAGAMANA PARVA—(Contd.)

Vidura said:—

1. O king, there is no doubt your friends have spoken to you what is good for you. But as you don't listen to their words, they find no place here.

2. O king, the best of Kurus, the son of Santanu (Bhisma) has said what is for your great good, but you do not accept it (his advice.)

3. What has been said by Drona is for your good, but the son of Radha, Karna, does not consider it for your good.

4. O king, after (due) reflection I do not find there is any who is a better friend of yours than these two best of men (Bhisma and Drona) or who excels them in wisdom.

5. These two are old in age, in wisdom, and in shastras. O king, they look at the sons of Pandu with equal eyes.

6. O descendant of the Bharata, O king, they are not certainly inferior to Rama, the son of Dasharatha and Gaya in the virtue and truthfulness.

7—8. It is not seen that they have ever given you evil advice. O king, you too have never injured them. Why should, therefore, these best of men, who are ever truthful, give you wicked advice?

9. O king, these foremost of men are endued with wisdom; they will never give you evil advices or say any thing that is crooked.

10. O descendant of Kuru, this is my firm conviction that being tempted by wealth these, learned as they are in the precepts of morality, will never utter anything savouring partizanship.

11. O descendant of Bharata, I consider what they have said is highly beneficial to you. O king, the Pandavas are certainly your sons as much as Duryodhana and others.

12. Therefore, those ministers who give you any advice that is fraught with evil intentions towards the Pandavas do not really look after your interest.

13. O king, if there is any partiality (for your sons) in your heart, it is certain that they who seek to excite it do you no good.

14. Therefore, O king, I think these illustrious and effulgent persons have not certainly said anything that leads to evil. You however do not understand it.

15. O best of kings, what these excellent men have said regarding the invincibility of the Pandavas is perfectly true. Do not think otherwise. Be blessed.

16. O king, can the handsome Pandava Sabyashachi Dhananjaya be ever vanquished in battle even by Maghavata (Indra) himself?

17. Can the powerful Bhimasena of strong arms possessing the might of ten thousand elephants be vanquished in battle even by the immortals?

18. Who having the desire of living can vanquish in battle the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), who are like the sons of Yama himself and who are both well-skilled in battle?

19. How can the eldest Pandava (Yudhisthira) in whom patience, mercy, forgiveness, truth and prowess are always present, be ever vanquished?

20. Is there any whom they have not already vanquished in battle, who have Rama (Valadeva) as their ally, Janardana (Krishna) as their counsellor, Satyaki as their supporter, Drupada as their father-in-law and the descendant of Prishata, Drupada's son Dhristadyumna and his other heroic brothers as their brothers-in-law?

21. O descendant of Bharata, remembering this and knowing that their claim to the kingdom is even prior to yours, behave virtuously towards them.

22. O king, the stain of calumny is on you on account of the act of Purochana. Wash yourself off it by kindly behaving towards them (the Pandavas).

23. Your kindly behaviour towards them will be for our great good. It will protect the lives of all of us of the Kuru race, and it will lead to the growth of the whole Kshatrya race.

24. O king, we have formerly waged a great war with the king of Drupada;—if we can now secure him as an ally, it will strengthen our party.

25. O king, the Dasarahas are numerous and powerful. They will be all there where Krishna will be. Where Krishna is, victory is certainly there.

26. O king, unless cursed by the celestials, who would seek to effect by means of war that which can be effected by conciliation?

27. O king, having heard that the sons of Pritha are alive, the men of the city and the country have become exceedingly glad; and they are all eager to see them. Do what will be agreeable to them.

28—29. Duryodhana, Karna, and the son of Suvala, Sakuni, are sinful, foolish and young. Do not listen to their words.

30. O king, endued with all accomplishments as you are, I have told you long ago that for the fault of Duryodhana, the subjects of this kingdom will be annihilated.

Thus ends the two hundred and seventh chapter, the words of Vidura, in the Viduragamana of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCVIII.

(VIDURAGAMANA PARVA)—*Contd.Dhritarastra said :—

1. The learned Bhisma, the son of Santanu, and the illustrious Rishi Drona, and you yourself, have said the truth and what is good for me.

2. There is no doubt that as those great car-warriors, the heroic sons of Kunti, are the sons of Pandu, so they are my sons also according to ordinance.

3. As my sons are entitled to this kingdom, so certainly are the sons of Pandu entitled to it.

4. O Khattwa, go and in due affectionate way, bring them (the Pandavas) here along with their mother. O descendant of Bharata, bring also with them Krishna (Draupadi) of celestial beauty.

5. From our good fortune the sons of Pritha are alive; from our good fortune Pritha is alive. From our good fortune those great car-warriors have obtained the daughter of Drupada.

6. From our good fortune our strength is increased; and from our good fortune Parochana is dead. O greatly effulgent one, from our good fortune my great grief is also removed.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. O descendant of Bharata, thereupon Vidura at the command of Dhritarastra went to Jagmasena and the Pandavas.

8. He carried with him numerous jewels and various kinds of wealth for Draupadi, for the Pandavas and for Jagmasena.

9. O king, having arrived there, that virtuous man, learned in all the Shastras, properly addressed Drupada and waited upon him.

10. He (Drupada) too received Vidura in proper form, and they both enquired after each other's welfare.

11. O descendant of Bharata, he saw there the Pandavas and Vasudeva (Krishna). He embraced them from affection and enquired after their welfare.

12—14. They too worshipped in due order Vidura of immeasurable intelligence. According to the command of Dhritarastra, he (Vidura) spoke to the sons of Pandu again and again words of affection. O king, he then gave to the Pandavas, Kunti, Draupadi, Drupada and Drupada's sons, the gems and various kinds of wealth, sent through him by the Kurus.

15. The immeasurably intelligent Vidura then, in the presence of the Pandavas, and Keshava (Krishna), thus modestly addressed Drupada in words of affection.

Vidura said :—

16. O king, listen to my words with your sons and ministers. Dhritarastra with his ministers, sons and friends,

17. Has again and again joyously enquired after your welfare. O king, he has been pleased by the alliance with you.

18. The son of Santanu, the greatly wise Bhisma with all the Kurus has enquired after your welfare in every respect.

19. The son of Bharadwaja, the greatly, wise Drona, your beloved friend, embracing you mentally, has enquired after your welfare.

20. O Panchala king, Dhritarastra and all the Kurus regard themselves very blessed by this alliance with you.

21. O Jagmasena, this alliance with you has made them more happy than if they had acquired a new kingdom.

22. Knowing all this, O Sir, permit the Pandavas to go there. The Kurus are exceedingly eager to see the sons of Pandu.

23. These best of men (the Pandavas) are long absent (from Hastinapur.) They and Pritha (Kunti) must be very eager to see their own city.

24. All the Kuru ladies, all the citizens and our subjects are eagerly waiting to see the Panchala princess Krishna.

25. Therefore, O Sir, my opinion is that you should permit the Pandavas to go there with their wife without any further delay.

26. O king, when the illustrious Pandavas will get your permission, I shall then send information to Dhritarastra by quick messengers. Then, O king, the Pandavas will set out with Kunti and Krishna (Draupadi.)

Thus ends the two hundred and eighth chapter, the colloquy of Vidura, in the Vaduragamana of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCIX.

(RAJYALAVA PARVA.)

Drupada said :—

1. O Vidura, O greatly learned man, it is as you say. O lord, I too have been exceedingly happy by this alliance.

2. It is highly proper for these illustrious princess to return to their ancestral kingdom. But it is not proper for me to say this myself.

3—4. If the hero, Yudhisthira, the son of Kunti, if Bhima and Aryuna, if these best of men the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) and if Ram and Krishna, both learned in the precepts of religion, wish it, then let the Pandavas go there. These two best of men (Rama and Krishna) are ever engaged in doing what is agreeable and beneficial to them (the Pandavas).

Yudhisthira said:—

5. O king, I with all my brothers, am now dependent on you. We shall all gladly do what you will command us to do.

Vaishampayana said:—

6. Thereupon Vashudeva said, "I am of opinion that they should go. But we must all abide by the opinion of the king Drupada who is learned in all the precepts of virtue."

Drupada said:—

7. Having considered all the circumstances, I certainly agree with the foremost of men, the heroic and mighty armed Dasaraha (Krishna).

8. There is no doubt the illustrious sons of Kunti, the Pandavas, are now to me as they are to Vashudeva.

9. The son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, himself does not seek the welfare of the Pandavas so much as this foremost of men Keshava (Krishna) does.

Vaishampayana said:—

10. O king, having been commanded by the illustrious Drupada, the Pandavas, Krishna, and Vidura

11. Taking with them the daughter of Drupada, Krishna, and the illustrious Kunti, journeyed in pleasure towards the city of Hastinapur.

12. The king, Dhritarastra, learning that those heroes (the Pandavas) had arrived, sent out the Kurus to receive them.

13. O descendant of Bharata, Vikarna, the great bowman Chitrasena, the foremost of bowmen Drona, and the son of Gotama Kripa (went out to receive them).

14. Surrounded by those (illustrious men), those mighty heroes (the Pandavas), their splendour (many times) increased, slowly entered the city of Hastinapur.

15. The city became radiant with the curious sight-seers of the city. Those foremost of men, the dispellers of grief and sorrow,

16. The Pandavas, dear to the hearts of the people, heard, as they proceeded, various exclamations which the citizens, ever desirous of obeying the wishes of those princes, loudly uttered.

17. They exclaimed, "Here return that best of men (Yudhisthira), learned in the precepts of virtue. He always protects us as if we are his nearest relatives.

18. It seems as if the great king Pandu, ever beloved of his subjects, returns to-day from the forest to do what is agreeable to us.

19. What good is not done to us to-day when the heroic sons of Kunti returns to our city?

20—21. If we have ever given away in charity, if we have ever poured libations of Ghee on the (sacrificial) fire, if we have any ascetic merit, let the Pandavas live in our city for one hundred years." They (the Pandavas) worshipped the feet of Dhritarastra, as also those of Bhishma, and also the feet of every body else that deserved the honour.

22. They enquired after the welfare of all the citizens. They then entered the palace assigned to them at the command of Dhritarastra.

23. When those illustrious and greatly strong heroes had taken rest for some time, they were summoned by the king Dhritarastra and the son of Santanu (Blisma.)

Dhritarastra said:—

24. O sun of Kunti, (Yudhisthira), listen with your brothers to what I say. Go to Khandavaprastha, so that no difference may arise again.

25. If you live there, none will be able to injure you. Taking half of the kingdom, live at Khandavaprastha protected by Partha (Aryuna), as the celestials are by the wielder of the thunder (Indra).

Vaishampayana said:—

26. Agreeing to what the king said, those best of men worshipped the kings and started for that fearful forest.

27. Receiving half of the kingdom, the Pandavas entered the Khandavaprastha, Krishna being at the head of the procession.

28—30. Those great car-warriors, selecting with the assistance of Dwipayana a sacred and auspicious place, performed the propitiatory ceremonies and measured out a piece of land to found a city. It was surrounded by a moat as wide as the sea and by walls rising high up to the sky. It was as white as the white clouds or the rays of the moon.

31. Those foremost of cities looked resplendent like the city of Bhagavati of the Nagas. It was adorned with mansions having windows like the out-stretched wings of Garuda.

32—34. It was protected with gates looking like the clouds, and they were as high as the Mandara mountain; the weapons of the enemy could not make any impression on them. They were almost covered with darts and other missiles like the double-tongued snakes. The turrets were filled with armed men and the walls were lined with warriors. It was well-stocked with various weapons of attack; there were thousands of sharp hooks and Satanghanis (a sort of weapon) and numerous other machines; there were also many iron wheels planted on them. With these were adorned that best of cities.

35—36. The streets were all wide and excellently laid out. Adorned with innumerable white mansions, the city looked like Amaravati (the celestial city); it looked like a mass of clouds charged with lightnings. It came to be called Indraprastha.

37. In a delightful and auspicious place stood the palace of those descendants of Kuru (the Pandavas). It was full of every kind of wealth like the palace of the (celestial) treasurer (Kuvera) himself.

38. O king, there came with the desire of living (in that city) numerous Brahmanas learned in all the Vedas and conversant with every language.

39. There came also from every direction numerous merchants with the desire of earning wealth. There also came with the desire of living (in that city) numerous men well-skilled in all arts.

40. Around the city were laid out many charming gardens with Amras, Amratakas, Kadamvas, Asokas, Champakas,

41. Punnagas, Nagas, Lakuchas, Panasas, Salas, Talas, Tamalas, Vakulas, and Ketakas.

42. They were all beautiful and blossoming; they bent down with the weight of their fruits. The old Amlokas, Lodras, blossoming Ankolas,

43. Jamvas, Patalas, Kangukas, Atimukhas, Kuraviras, Parijatas and various other trees were there.

44. All adorned with flowers and fruits and thronged with birds of various kinds. These verdant groves were resounded with the notes of the maddened peacocks and Kokilas.

45—47. There were various pleasure-houses bright as mirrors, and innumerable bowers of creepers, charming artificial hillocks, many lakes full to the brim with crystal water, and delightful tanks fragrant with lotuses and lilies and adorned with swans, ducks and Chakravakas. There were many tanks overgrown with fine aquatic plants, and various large and beautiful ponds.

48. O great king, the joy of the Pandavas increased from day to day in consequence of their residence in that large kingdom which was inhabited by pious men.

49. Thus in consequence of the virtuous conduct of Bhisma and the king (Dhritarastra) the Pandavas became the dwellers of Khandavaprastha.

50. Adorned with those excellent and great bow-men, each like an Indra himself, that best of cities looked like Bhagavati with the Nagas.

51. O king, having settled the Pandavas there, the heroic Krishna, on obtaining their leave, came back with Rama to Dwaravati.

Thus ends the two hundred and ninth chapter, the departure of Krishna, in the Rajyalava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCX.

(RAJYALAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Janamejaya said:—

1—2. O ascetic, what did those illustrious men, the high-souled ones, my grandsires, the Pandavas, do after obtaining the kingdom of Indraprastha? How did their wedded wife Draupadi obey them all?

3. How was it that no dissension arose amongst those illustrious rulers of men, though attached to one wife Krishna?

4. O ascetic Rishi, I desire to hear every thing in detail as regards their conduct towards one another after their union with Krishna.

Vaishampayana said:—

5. Having obtained their kingdom at the command of Dhritarastra, those chastisers of foes, the Pandavas, sported with Krishna at Indraprastha.

6. Having obtained the kingdom, the ever truthful and greatly effulgent Yudhis-thira with his brothers virtuously ruled the kingdom.

7. Having defeated all their foes, the greatly wise and ever devoted to truth and virtue, the sons of Pandu lived there in great happiness.

8. Those best of men, seated on costly royal seats, discharged all the duties of government.

9. When (one day) those illustrious heroes were so seated, there came to them the celestial Rishi Narada in course of his travels.

10—11. Yudhisthira gave him his own excellent seat. When the celestial Rishi was seated, the wise Yudhisthira duly offered him the Arghya with his own hands. The Rishi accepted the worship and became very much pleased.

12. Uttering benedictions on him, he (the Rishi) asked him (Yudhisthira) to take his seat. Thus commanded, the king Yudhisthira took his seat.

13. He sent words to Krishna informing her of the arrival of the high-souled (Rishi). Hearing it, Draupadi, after properly purifying herself,

14. Went there where Narada was with the Pandavas. And that lady of virtuous deeds worshipped his feet.

15. Then the daughter of Drupada, being properly covered with her veil, stood before him with joined hands. That virtuous, truthful and excellent Rishi,

16. The illustrious Rishi Narada, after uttering various benedictions on the princess, and saying that faultless lady, "Go," sent her away.

17. When Krishna retired, the illustrious Rishi thus spoke to the Pandavas with Yudhisthira at their head.

Narada said:—

18. The illustrious princess of Panchala is the wedded wife of all of you. Establish a rule amongst yourselves so that no dissension may arise amongst you.

19. There were in the days of yore two brothers, celebrated throughout the three worlds by the names of Sanda and Upasanda; they were incapable of being killed by any one else except one by the other.

20. They ruled the same kingdom, lived in the same house, slept on the same bed, sat on the same seat and ate off the same dish, yet they killed each other for the sake of Tilottama.

21. O Yudhisthira, therefore preserve your friendship for one another, and do that which may not produce dissension amongst you.

Yudhisthira said:—

22. O great Rishi, whose sons were Sanda and Upasanda? How did their dissension arise, and why did they kill each other?

23. Whose daughter was the Apsara, the celestial maiden Tilottama? Maddened by whose love they killed each other?

24. O ascetic, O Brahmana, I desire to hear all this in detail as it happened. Our curiosity has become very great.

Thus ends the two hundred and tenth chapter, the colloquy of Yudhisthira and Narada, in the Rajyalava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXI.

(RAJYALAVA PARVA)—contd.

Narada said:—

1. O son of Pritha, Yudhisthira, listen to it with your brothers, as I narrate this old story exactly as every thing happened.

2. In the days of yore there was a Danava chief, named Nikumbha, who was energetic and strong, and who was born in the race of Hiranyakashipu.

3. Two sons were born to him, named Sanda and Upasanda, both of them being chiefs of the Danavas, and both of them being very energetic and powerful, very fearful and wicked-minded.

4. Those two Danavas were both of the same resolution, and always engaged in performing the same work and in achieving the same end. They were ever the same to each other in weal and in woe.

5. Each speaking and doing what was agreeable to each other, the brothers never ate unless they were together and never went anywhere unless together.

6. Of exactly the same dispositions and habits, they seemed to be one individual divided into two parts. Possessing great energy and the same resolution in every thing, the brothers thus gradually grew up.

7. Always entertaining the same purpose, and ever desiring of subjugating the three worlds, the brothers went after due initiation to the mountains of Vyndhya; and going there, they performed severe penances.

8. They performed penances for a very long time till at last they received sufficient ascetic merits.

9. Exhausted with hunger and thirst, with matted locks on their heads and attired in barks of trees, besmearing themselves with dirt from head to foot, living on air alone, and standing on the toes of their own legs, they poured into fire pieces of flesh from their own body. With arms upraised and fixed eyes, they observed their vows for a long period.

10. (During the course of their ascetic penances), a wonderful incident happened. The Vindhya mountain, heated by their ascetic penances for many long years, began to emit vapours from every part of its body.

11. Thereupon, seeing their severe penances the celestials were alarmed. The celestials threw many obstacles for impeding their asceticism.

12. They again and again tempted them with gems and jewels and the most handsome maidens. But those two (brothers), firmly engaged in asceticism, did not break their vows.

13—14. Then the celestials displayed Maya (delusion) before those (two) illustrious Rishis. It appeared to them as if their sisters, mothers, wives and other relatives, with dishevelled hair, ornaments and robes, were running towards them in terror, pursued and struck down by a Rakshasha who had a lance in his hands.

15. It appeared as if they were all crying, "O save us! O save us." But even this could not break the vows of those two great vow-observing Rishis.

16. When all this did not produce any impression on any of the two (Rishis), then the women and all the other apparitions vanished (into space).

17. Thereupon the Grandsire (Brahma) himself came to those two heroes, and the Lord, who seeks the welfare of all, asked them to solicit the boon they desired.

18. Then the two greatly powerful brothers, Sanda and Upasanda, rose from their seat on seeing the Grandsire, and they stood before him with joined hands.

19. They both together spoke thus to that celestial Lord, "O Grandsire, if you are pleased with our worship,

20. And, O lord, if you are propitious to us, let us then possess the knowledge of all weapons and of all powers of Maya (delusion); let us possess great strength and assume any form at will; let us be immortal.

Brahma said:—

21. Except being immortal, you two will be all that you desire. Ask for some death by which you may be equal to the immortals.

22. As you have performed these severe penances from the desire of sovereignty alone, I cannot bestow on you the boon of immortality.

23. You have undergone your ascetic penances for the subjugation of the three worlds; O chiefs of the Danavas, it is for this I cannot grant you what you desire.

Sanda and Upasanda said:—

24. O Grandsire, let us then have no fear from any created thing, mobile or immobile in the three worlds, except only from each other.

The Grandsire said:—

25. I grant you what you have asked, said and desired. Your death is fixed according to your own desire.

Narada said:—

26. Having granted them this boon, the Grandsire made them desist from their asceticism; and he then went away to the region of Brahma.

27. Having received those boons, those two brothers, the chiefs of Danavas, became non-slayable by any creature in the universe. They then returned to their own home.

28. Seeing those intelligent beings successful in their desire and crowned with success as regards the boon, their friends and relatives became exceedingly glad.

29. They then cut off their matted locks and wore coronets on their heads. They adorned and attired themselves in costly ornaments and handsome robes.

30. They made the moon to rise untimely and at all times; and all their friends and relatives were always in joy.

31. "Eat," "Feed," "Give," "Make merry," "Sing," "Drink,"—such sounds were heard in every house (in their city).

32. Here and there arose loud uproars of merriment, mixed with the clappings of hands which filled the city of those two Danavas.

33. The Danavas, capable of assuming any form at will, engaged themselves in every kind of amusements and sports. They scarcely noticed that time was passing away. They regarded a whole year as if it was but a day.

Thus ends the two hundred and eleventh chapter, the history of Sanda and Upasanda, in the Rajyalava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXII.

(RAJYALAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Narada said:—

1. As soon as the festivities came to an end, they (Sanda and Upasanda), being desirous of the sovereignty of the three worlds, took counsel and commanded their forces to be arranged.

2. Having obtained the consent of their friends and relatives, of the elders, of the Danava race and of their ministers, and having performed the preliminary rites of departure, they started on the night when the constellation Mugha was on the ascendant.

3. A large army of the Danavas clad in mails and armed with clubs, axes, lances and maces, went with them.

4. The Charanas chaunted auspicious panegyrics indicative of their future victory; and they set out on their expedition with joyous hearts.

5. Furious in war and capable of going everywhere at will, the two Danavas rose to the sky and went to the region of the celestials.

6. Learning that they were coming and knowing also what boons they had obtained from the Supreme Lord, the celestials left heaven and sought refuge in the region of Brahma.

7. The greatly powerful (Danava) brothers subjugated the region of Indra and defeated various tribes of Yakshas and Rakshashas. They then returned.

8. The two great car-warriors then subjugated the Nagas of the nether regions, then the inmates of the ocean, and then all the Mlecha races.

9. Being desirous of subjugating the whole earth, those two greatly irresistible heroes, summoning their soldiers, spoke these cruel words,

10. "The royal sages with the help of the Brahmanas increase the strength and prosperity of the celestials by pouring libations on the fire and offering other foods in grand sacrifices.

11. Engaged in such works, they are the enemies of the Asuras. Therefore, the duty of all of us is to muster together and exterminate them."

12. Thus ordering them all on the eastern shore of the great ocean and forming such a cruel resolution, the Asura brothers started in all directions.

13. The two heroes immediately killed those that were performing sacrifices, and the Brahmanas that were assisting in those sacrifices. Killing them all, they started for another place.

14. Their soldiers threw into the water the sacrificial fires that were in the hermitages of Rishis who had controlled their souls.

15. The curses uttered by the high-souled ascetics in anger became futile on account of the boons granted to them (by Brahma); but they did not any way affect them.

16. When the Brahmanas saw that their curses make no impressions on them like arrows shot at stones, they fled in all directions, forsaking their rites and vows.

17. Even those, that were crowned with ascetic success in the world and that were self-controlled and wholly engrossed in meditation of the Deity, fled in their fear as snakes at the approach of the son of Vinata (Garuda).

18. All the sacred hermitages were trodden down and broken; and their contents were scattered all over the ground. The universe became empty, as if every thing was destroyed at a Dissolution.

19. O king, when all the Rishis had disappeared, the two great Asuras resolved upon their destruction and assumed various forms.

20. They assumed the forms of maddened elephants with temples rent (from excess of Juice), and they slaughtered the Rishis hidden in mountain caves.

21. Sometime they became lions, sometime tigers, and sometime, they disappeared. By assuming such forms, they killed the Rishis wherever they saw them.

22. Sacrifice and study ceased; kings and Brahmanas were exterminated. The earth became destitute of festivals and sacrifices.

23. The people cried, "Alas! Alas!" And all buying and selling were stopped. The works of the celestials ceased and sacred ceremonies and marriages discontinued.

24. Agriculture was neglected and cattle were not tended; both cities and hermitages became desolate. The earth, being covered with bones and skeletons, looked fearful.

25. The ceremonies in honour of the Pitris, the sacred sound of Vashata (Vedas) and all auspicious rites ceased. The universe looked frightful to behold.

26. The moon, the sun, the planets, the stars, the constellations, and the dwellers of heaven, became exceedingly sorry on seeing these works of Sanda and Upasanda.

27. Thus subjugating all the points of heaven by cruel acts, the Danavas lived at Kurukheshtra, having not a single rival (in all the earth.)

Thus ends the two hundred and twelfth chapter, the history of Sanda and Upasanda, in the Rajyalava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXIII.

(RAJYALAVA PARVA)—contd.

Narada said :—

1. Thereupon the tranquil and self-restrained celestial Rishis, Sidhyas and the Paramahansas, became exceedingly sorry on seeing that great massacre.

2. Being moved by compassion, they with their passions, senses and souls under complete control, went to the abode of the Grandsire.

3. They then saw the Grandsire seated with the celestials, surrounded by the Sidhyas and the Brahmarshis.

4. There was the Deity Mahadeva (Siva), there was Agni with Vayu. There were Chandra, Aditya, Indra and the Rishis devoted to the contemplation of the Supreme.

5. (There were) the Vaikhanasas, the Valikhilyas, the Vanaprasthas, the Marichipas, the Agas, the Avimudas and many other greatly effulgent ascetics.

6. All the Rishis came to the Grandsire, and those great Rishis all approached him with sorrowful hearts.

7—8. They represented to him all the acts of Sanda and Upasanda. The celestials and the great Rishis told the Grandsire of the universe in detail what they had done, and how and in what order they had done it.

9—10. They all pressed the matter to the Grandsire, and the Grandsire, having heard what they said, reflected for a moment and settled what ought to be done. Resolving to kill them, he summoned Vishwakarma.

11. Seeing Vishwakarma, the Grandsire commanded him saying, "O great ascetic, create a damsel who will be captivating to all hearts?"

12. Bowing down to the Grandsire, and receiving his command with reverence, he created a celestial damsel after good deal of thought.

13. Vishwavita (Vishwakarma) first collected whatever handsome there was in mobile or immobile things, in the three worlds.

14. He placed millions of gems on the body of the damsel. The celestial beauty that he created was a mass of gems and jewels.

15. She was created by Vishwakarma with good deal of care. She became matchless in beauty amongst the women of the three worlds.

16. There was not the minutest part of her body which by its wealth of beauty did not rivet the gaze of the beholder directed towards it.

17. She was like Lakshmi herself; and that extraordinarily beautiful damsel captivated the eyes and hearts of all creatures.

18. Because she was created with the portions of every gem in every minute portion, the Grandsire gave her the name of Tilottama.

19. She bowed down to Brahma and spoke to him with joined hands, "O lord of creatures, what task am I to accomplish, and for what purpose am I created?"

The Grandsire said :—

20. O Tilottama, go to the Asuras, Sanda and Upasanda. O amiable girl, tempt them with your desirable beauty.

21. Act in such a way that as soon as they saw you they may quarrel with each other in consequence of your wealth of beauty.

22. She promised to do it; and bowing down to the Grandsire, she walked round the celestial assembly.

23. The illustrious Deity (Brahma) was then sitting facing eastwards; Mahadeva (Siva) also was sitting facing eastwards; all the other celestials with their faces northwards and the Rishis with their faces towards all directions.

24. When she was walking round the assembly, Indra and the illustrious Sthanu (Siva) alone succeeded in preserving their tranquility of mind.

25. Because he (Siva) was very much desirous of seeing her, therefore when she came at his side, another face came out on the southern side of his body with eyes like full-blossomed lotuses.

26—27. When she came behind him,—another face appeared on his western side; and when she came on the northern side, a fourth face appeared on his northern side. Indra also came to have one thousand eyes before, behind and on his flanks, each large and reddish.

28. Thus in days of yore, Sthanu (Siva) the great Deity, came to have four faces, and the slayer of Vala (Indra) one thousand eyes.

29. All the celestials and the Rishis turned their faces to that direction where Tilottama went in her walking round the assembly.

30. Except those of the Deity, the divine Grandsire, the eyes of all those illustrious beings fell on her body.

31. When that great beauty went away, the celestials and the great Rishis regarded the task already accomplished.

32. After Tilottama had departed, the First Cause of the creation (Brahma) sent away all the celestials and the Rishis.

Thus ends the two hundred and thirteenth chapter, the creation of Tilottama, in the Rajyalava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXIV.

(RAJYALAVA PARVA)—Continued.

Narada said :—

1. Subjugating the whole earth, the two Danavas became unrivaled; and when they had brought the three worlds under their sway, they then considered themselves free from fatigue and regarded that their works were done.

2. Having taken all the wealth of the Devas, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Nagas, the Rakshashas, the kings, they become exceedingly happy.

3. When they saw they had no rival, like the immortals they gave up all labour and exertion, and they passed their time in pleasures and merriments.

4. They derived great pleasure in women, in garlands, in perfumes, in viands, in drinks and in various other articles of enjoyments.

5. Like the immortals they roamed in profuse pleasure and amusement in houses, in woods, in gardens, in forests and on hills, —nay wherever they liked.

6. Thereupon one day they went to sport to a table-land of the Vindhya mountain,—on perfectly level and stony ground, overgrown with Sala trees blossomed with flowers.

7. After every object of desire of the most agreeable kind had been brought, they (Sanda and Upasanda) sat on an excellent seat in happiness and joy with many handsome women (around them).

8. Wishing to please those two (heroes), those damsels danced in accompaniment with music and sang many songs in praise of the mighty brothers.

9. Thereupon Tilottama, attired in a single red silk cloth and thereby exposing all her charms, came there gathering flowers in the forest.

10. Gathering Karnikaras that grew along the banks of the river, she slowly came to the place where those two great heroes were.

11. They were intoxicated with a large quantity of liquor and their eyes had grown red. As soon as they saw that most beautiful damsel, they were filled with desire.

12. Leaving their seat, they immediately went to the place where she was. Both being full of desire, both sought her favours.

13. Sanda caught that beauty of fair eye-brows by her right hand, and Upasanda caught hold of the left hand of Tilottama.

14. Intoxicated with the boons that they had obtained, with their physical strength, with the wealth and gems they had amassed, and with the wine they had drunk.

15. Intoxicated with all this and maddened with desire, each of them contracted his eye-brows in anger; and they then spoke thus to each other.

16. Sanda said, "She is my wife and your superior." Upasanda said, "She is my wife and your sister-in-law."

17. They each exclaimed, "She is mine, not yours." Maddened by her beauty, they lost all love and friendship (that they bore for each other).

18. For her sake they went for their maces, and deprived of their reason by desire, they took of their fearful clubs.

19. (Crying), "I was the first," "I was the first" (in taking her hand), they attacked each other. Struck by those fearful clubs, both of them fell on the ground;

20. Their bodies being covered with blood they looked like two suns loosened from the sky. The women and the others that were present all fled away trembling in grief and tear; and they took refuge in the nether regions.

21. Thereupon the pure souled Grandsire with the celestials and great Rishis came there and applauded Tilottama.

22. The illustrious Grandsire cheered her by granting boons. Before she spoke, the Grandsire thus spoke in cheerfulness,

23. "O beautiful damsel, you shall roam in the region of the suns. Your splendour will be so great that none will ever be able to look at you."

24. Having granted this boon to her, the Grandsire of all creatures, the Supreme lord, placed Indra over the region of Indra and went away to the region of Brahma.

25. Thus those two Asuras, ever united and inspired with the same purpose, killed each other in anger for the sake of Tilottama.

26. O best of the Bharata race, therefore, from affection for you all, I tell you that if you wish to do anything agreeable to me, make some such arrangement as you may not quarrel with one another for the sake of Draupadi.

Vaishampayana said :—

27—29. O king having been thus addressed by the high-souled great Rishi Narada, they (the Pandavas) consulted with one another, and established a rule in the presence of the celestial Rishi of immeasurable energy that when one of them would be with Draupadi, any of the other four, who would see that one, must go to the forest for twelve years to lead the life of a Bramhachari. After the virtuous Pandavas had established this rule amongst themselves, the great Rishi Narada, being pleased with them, went to the place he wished (to go).

30. O descendant of Bharata, thus requested by Narada, they (the Pandavas) made in the days of yore a rule amongst themselves with respect to their common wife. It was, therefore, that no dispute ever arose amongst them.

Thus ends the two hundred and fourteenth chapter, the history of Santa and Upasanta, in the Rajyalava of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXV.

(ARYUNA VANAVASHA PARVA.)

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having made that rule (amongst themselves,) the Pandavas continued to live there (at Khandhavaprastha). They brought under their sway many kings by their prowess of arms.

2. Krishna (Draupadi) became obedient to all the five sons of Pritha,—those five best men of immeasurable energy.

3. She became exceedingly happy in her five heroic husbands as the Saraswati in elephants; and they (the Pandavas) also were exceedingly happy in her.

4. In consequence of the illustrious Pandavas being virtuous, all the Kurus, being free from sin and becoming very happy, grew in prosperity.

5. O king, O best of monarchs, many days after (it so happened) that a robber stole some kine of a certain Brahmana.

6. When his wealth (kine) was thus stolen, the Brahmana lost his senses in anger; and coming to Khandavaprastha, he thus reproved the Pandavas.

The Brahmana said :—

7. O Pandavas, despicable and wicked wretches are robbing away my kine in your dominion. Pursue the robbers.

8. Alas; the sacrificial Ghee of a peaceful Brahmana is being carried away by crows. Alas, the wretched jackal is invading the empty cave of a lion!

9. A king, who takes the sixth part of the produce, but does not protect his subjects, is called by all men as the most sinful in all the worlds.

10. The wealth of a Brahmana is being taken away by thieves; virtue is going to be destroyed. Take me up by the hand, for I am in great grief.

Vaishampayana said :—

11. Thus were the Pandavas reproved by the Brahmana weeping in bitter grief. The son of Kunti, Dhananjaya (Aryuna) heard his (weeping) words.

12. As soon as he heard it, the mighty-armed hero told the Brahmana, "Don't fear". But in the room where the arms of the illustrious Pandavas were,

13. Dharmaraja Yudhishthira was then sitting with Krishna (Draupadi). The Pandava (Aryuna) was, therefore, unable to enter the room or to go (with the Brahmana).

14. Being repeatedly urged by the weeping words of the Brahmana, the son of Kunti (Aryuna) pondered in sorrow.

Aryuna said :—

15. "Alas, this ascetic Bramhana's wealth is being robbed! It is certainly my duty to dry up his tears.

16. If I do not protect him who is weeping at our gate, the king (Yudhishthira) will be touched by sin for my indifference.

17. Our own irreligiousness will also be talked all over the kingdom, and we shall certainly incur a great sin.

18. There is no doubt that if I enter (the room) disregarding the king, I shall not truthfully behave towards that enemiless monarch.

19—20. If I enter (the room) where the king is, an exile in the forest will be my lot. But I must overlook every thing. I do not care if I am to incur sin by disregarding the king. I care not if I am to go to the forest and die there. Virtue is superior to body, and it lasts after the body perishes.

Vaishampayana said :—

21. O king, having resolved this, the son of Kunti Dhananjaya (Aryuna) entered the room and talked with the king (Yudhisthira).

22—23. Bringing the bow, he cheerfully told the Brahmana, "O Bramhana, come soon, so that those wretched thieves may not go far off. I shall accompany you and restore to you your wealth that has fallen into the hands of the robbers."

24. He then went away, armed with bow, cased in mail, riding on the chariot and holding the standard. Piercing those thieves with arrows, he took back that wealth (kine).

25. Thus helping the Brahmana by returning to him his kine and winning great renown, the Pandava,

26. The heroic Shabyasachi Dhananjaya returned to the city. He then bowed to all the elders and was in return congratulated by them all.

27. He then said to Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), "O Lord, give me permission to observe the vow. The rule that was established by us has been violated by me on my seeing you.

28. I shall go into exile to the forest, for we made this' rule." Suddenly hearing those most painful words uttered (by Aryuna), Yudhisthira 29—30. Was afflicted with grief and said in an agitated voice, "Why?" Then Yudhisthira thus spoke in grief to his vow-observing brother Gudakesha (curly haired) Dhananjaya (Aryuna), "O sinless one, if I am an authority worthy of regard, listen to what I say.

31. O hero, I know full well why you entered the room and did what you thought would be disagreeable to me. But I have not felt any displeasure for it.

32. The younger brother may enter the room in which his elder brother sits with his wife. There is no fault to be found in this. If the elder brother enters the room where his younger brother is with his wife, then he acts against the rules of propriety.

33. O mighty-armed hero, therefore, desist from your purpose. Do what I say. Your virtue has suffered no diminution, and you have not also shown any disregard towards me.

Aryuna said :—

34. I have heard from you that the virtue should not be practised by quibbling. I shall not waver from truth. Truth is my weapon.

Vaishampayana said :—

35. Having obtained the king's permission, he made preparations to live in the forest. He went away to dwell in the forest for twelve years.

Thus ends the two hundred and fifteenth chapter, the departure of Aryuna, for the forest, in the Aryuna Vanavasha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXVI.

(ARYUNA VANAVASHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When that mighty-armed hero, the spreader of the fame of the Kuru race, went away, the Veda-knowing Brahmanas followed him.

2. Followed by the Veda and Vedanga-knowing Brahmanas, ever devoted in the contemplation of the Supreme spirit, by persons skilled in music, by ascetics devoted to the Diety, by Pouranika Sutas (men learned in the Puranas),

3. By Kathakas (the reciters of sacred stories), by celebrate devotees, by dwellers of forests, by Brahmanas who recited sweetly the celestial histories.

4. And by many other sweet-speched men. With those men, the son of Pandu (Aryuna) travelled over the country like Indra followed by the Marutas.

5—6. O descendant of Bharata, that best of men (Aryuna) saw many charming and picturesque forests, lakes, rivers, seas, and countries, and many sacred pilgrimages. Coming to the source of the Ganges, the lord (Aryuna) thought of dwelling there.

7. O Janamejaya, listen to the wonderful feat which that foremost of the Pandavas, the high-souled hero, performed.

8. O descendant of Bharata, when the son of Kunti (Aryuna) and the Brahmanas lived there, the latter performed many Agni-hotras (fire sacrifices).

9—10. O king, in consequence of those learned, vow-observing, undeviatingly righteous Brahmanas' daily establishing and kindling fires for their sacrifices on the banks of that sacred river, and pouring libations of Ghee into it and worshipping it with flowers, that region from which the Ganges flowed became exceedingly beautiful.

11. One day that best of the Pandavas, the son of Kunti (Aryuna), in order to perform his ablutions, went to the Ganges which flowed in the midst of the Brahmanas.

12. O king, after performing his ablutions, and offering water to the grandsires, as he was getting out of the water with the desire of performing his sacrificial rites before the fire,

13. O great king, the mighty-armed hero was dragged into water by the daughter of the Naga king, named Ulupi, maddened with desire.

14—15. He saw a fire there in the house of the Naga, named Kaurava, and the son of Kunti, Dhananjaya, performed his sacrificial rites with devotion before that fire. Agni was much pleased to see the fearlessness with which he poured the libations.

16. Having performed the sacrificial rites before the fire, the son of Kunti (Aryuna) spoke thus smilingly to the daughter of the Naga king.

Aryuna said:—

17. O handsome maiden, O timid girl, what a bold act you have performed! O blessed damsel, where is this beautiful region situated? Who are you and whose daughter are you?

Ulupi said:—

18. O king, there is a Naga, named Kaurava, born in the race of Airavata. I am his daughter,—I am the Naga maiden, named Ulupi.

19. O best of men, seeing you descend into the river in order to perform your ablutions, I was deprived of my senses by the god of love.

20. O descendant of Kuru, I am still unmarried. O sinless one, afflicted as I am by the god of love, gratify me to-day by giving yourself up to me.

Aryuna said:—

21. O amiable girl, commanded by Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), I am observing Brahmacharya for twelve years. I am not in my own sway.

22. O aquatic lady, I am desirous of doing what is agreeable to you. I have never before spoken an untruth in my life.

23. Therefore, tell me, O snake-lady, how I may act so that while doing your pleasure, I may not be guilty of any untruth or sin.

Ulupi said:—

24. O son of Pandu, I know why you are roaming over the world and why you observe Brahmacharya at the command of your elder (brother).

25—26. This was the rule which all of you made amongst you for having Draupadi as your common wife, that he who would by ignorance enter the room in which one of you would be with her, he must adopt Brahmacharya for twelve years. The exile of any of you, therefore, is only for the sake of Draupadi.

27. You are but observing that vow. Your virtue cannot suffer any diminution, O large-eyed hero, it is your duty to relieve the distressed.

28—29. Your virtue cannot suffer any diminution by relieving me. O Aryuna, if your virtue (really) suffer a small diminution, you will acquire great merit by relieving me. O Partha, I am your adorer. O lord, accept me. This is the opinion of the wise.

30. If you do not accept me, know that I will destroy myself. O mighty-armed hero, earn great merit by saving my life.

31. O best of men, I solicit your protection. O son of Kunti, you always protect the distressed and the helpless. Weeping in sorrow I solicit your protection.

32. Being filled with desire, I woo you. Therefore, do what is agreeable to me. You should gratify my wish by giving up yourself to me.

Vaishampayana said:—

33. Thus addressed by the daughter of the Naga king, the son of Kunti, making virtue his motive, did everything as she desired.

34. The powerful hero passed the night in the mansion of the Naga and rose with the rise of the sun. From the mansion of Kaurava,

35. He came with her (Ulupi) back to the region from which the Ganges flowed to the plains. Taking his leave, the chaste Ulupi returned to her own abode.

36. O descendant of Bharata, she gave a boon (to Aryuna) making him invincible in water. (She said), "Every aquatic creature will certainly be vanquished by you."

Thus ends the two hundred and sixteenth chapter, the meeting with Ulupi, in the Aryuna Vanavasha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXVII.

(ARYUNA VANAVASHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O descendant of Bharata, the son of the wielder of thunder (Indra), having narrated everything to the Brahmanas, started for the side of the Himalayas.

2. Arriving first at Agasta Vata, the son of Kunti, then went to the Vashistha's hill. On the peak of Vrigu hill he performed his ablutions.

3. O descendant of Bharata, the best of the Kurus gave away to many Brahmanas thousands of kine and houses.

4. That best of men then bathed at the pilgrimage, named Hiranyavindu, and then that best of the Pandavas went to many other sacred places.

5. O best of the Bharata race, that best of men accompanied by the Brahmanas then descended (from those hills) and travelled towards the east, wishing to see the countries situated in that direction.

6—8. The best of the Kurus saw the pilgrimages one after the other. O descendant of Bharata, he saw the river Utpalosa in the forest of Naimisha; (he saw) the Nanda, the Upananda, the famous Kausika, the great rivers Gaya and Ganga and other Tirthas and hermitages where he purified himself and gave away to the Brahmanas (many) kine.

9. Whatever Tirthas and other holy places were in Anga, Banga and Kalinga, he went to all of them.

10. O descendant of Bharata, seeing them all and performing many ceremonies and giving away much wealth, he went to the gate of the kingdom of Kalinga where the Brahmanas, who were following him, bade the son of Kunti farewell and desisted from following him any further.

11. Having obtained their leave, the son of Kunti, the brave Dhananjaya, accompanied by only a few attendants, went there where the sea was.

12. Crossing (the country of) the Kalingas and seeing on his way many countries, holy places, and charming mansions, that lord proceeded on.

13. Seeing the Mahendra mountain adorned with the ascetics, and going slowly along the sea-shores, he went to Manipur.

14. O king, seeing all Tirthas and other holy places, the mighty-armed hero went

15. To the king of Manipur, the virtuous Chitravabana, who had a beautiful daughter named Chitrangada.

16. He saw her in his capital roaming at pleasure. Seeing the handsome daughter of Chitravabana, he was filled with desire.

17. Going to the king, he told him what he desired, saying, "O king, give your daughter to a son of an illustrious Kshatrya."

18. Having heard this, the king said, "Whose son are you and what is your name?" He (Aryuna) replied, "I am the Pandava, the son of Kunti, Dhananjaya."

19. The king then spoke thus in sweet accents, "There was born a king in our race named Pravanjana."

20. He was childless. In order to get a child he performed excellent penances. By his severe austerities, the god of gods, the wielder of Pinaka (Siva),

21. The supreme lord, the god of gods, and the husband of Uma, O Partha, was gratified. The illustrious Deity gave him the boon that only one child would be born in our race (in succession).

22. Thence only one child is born to every successive descendant of this race. All my ancestors had each a male child.

23. But I have only a daughter to perpetuate my race. O best of men, I always consider her as my son.

24—25. O best of the Bharata race, I have made her a Putrika (heir). O descendant of Bharata, the one son that will be born to her will be the perpetuator of my race. That son will be the dower in this marriage. O Pandava, you can take her if you like on this condition.

26. Promising to do it, he accepted that maiden, and the son of Kunti lived in that city for three years.

27. When she gave birth to a son, he (Aryuna) embraced her with affection, and taking leave of the king, he set out again in his travels.

Thus ends the two hundred and seventeenth chapter, the marriage with Chitrangada, in the Aryuna Vanavasha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXVIII.

((ARYUNA VANAVASHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. That best of the Bharata race Aryuna then went to the sacred Tirthas situated on the shores of the south sea, all adorned with the ascetics.

2. There were five Tirthas where also lived many ascetics, but these sacred waters themselves were shunned by the ascetics.

3. (They were named) Agastya, Saubhadra, the greatly holy Paulama, Karandhama which yielded the fruit of a horse-sacrifice,

4. And the great washer of sins Bharadwaja ;—these five Tirthas that best of men saw.

5—6. The Pandava, the descendant of Kuru (Aryuna), finding them uninhabited and ascertaining that they were shunned by the ascetics, asked with joined hands those pious men that lived near them, "Why these Tirthas are shunned by the Bramhabadis (the utterers of the Vedas)."

The Celestials said :—

7. O descendant of Kuru, there dwell (in their waters) five large crocodiles which carry away the ascetics (who go to bathe in them); therefore these Tirthas are shunned by all.

Vaishampayana said :—

8. Having heard these words of the ascetics, the mighty armed hero, that best of men, though dissuaded by them, went to see those Tirthas.

9. Then coming to that excellent Tirtha, Sauvadra, named after a great Rishi, that hero, that chastiser of foes, plunged into it to take a bath.

10. Thereupon a large crocodile under the water seized the leg of that best of men, the son of Kunti Dhananjaya.

11. But the mighty-armed, the son of Kunti, the foremost of all strong men, seized that aquatic animal and dragged it up to the shore.

12. Dragged up by the illustrious Aryuna, that crocodile became a most handsome woman adorned with all ornaments.

13. O king, that charming and celestial-like damsel appeared to shine in her own beauty. Thereupon the son of Kunti Dhananjaya, seeing that wonderful sight,

14. Spoke thus in great happiness to that lady, "O beautiful lady, who are you? O lady of the lake, where do you live? Why did you commit such a dreadful sin before?"

Barga said :—

15. O mighty-armed hero, I am an Apsara, a sporter in the celestial gardens. O greatly strong one, my name is Barga, I am ever beloved of the celestial treasurer (Kuvera).

16. I had four other friends, all handsome and all capable of going everywhere at will. One day accompanied by them, I was going to the abode of the protector of the world;

17. When we were all going, we saw a Brahmana of rigid vows, who was exceedingly handsome and who was studying the Vedas in solitude.

18. O king, the whole forest was covered with the effulgence of his asceticism. He seemed to have illuminated the whole region like the sun.

19. Seeing his that severe, excellent and wonderful asceticism, we alighted in that region, wishing to disturb his asceticism.

20. O descendant of Bharata, myself, Sauravi, Samichi, Vaduvuda and Lata all came to that Brahmana at the same time.

21. O hero, we sang, we laughed, we tried to tempt the Brahmana in various ways, but he did not set his mind on us even for a moment.

22. O best of the Kshatryas, his mind, being fixed on the meditation of the pure, the greatly effulgent (Brahmana), did not suffer his heart to waver. Angrily looking at us, he cursed us saying, "Becoming crocodiles, live in water for one hundred years."

Thus ends the two hundred and eighteenth chapter, the rescue of the crocodiles, in the Aryuna Vanavasha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXIX.

((ARYUNA VANAVASHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Barga said :—

1. O best of the Bharata race, we were all greatly distressed. We sought the protection of that ascetic of undeviating vows.

2. (We said), "O Brahmana, intoxicated with beauty and youth, and maddened by the god of love, we have acted very improperly,—you should pardon us.

3. It was enough death to us that we had at all come here to tempt such an ascetic of controlled soul as you are.

4. The virtuous men consider that women are created as non-slayable, therefore you should not kill us. Grow yourself in virtue.

5. O virtuous man, it is said that a Brahmana has always friendly feelings over all creatures. O Rishi of blessedness, let this saying of the learned be made true.

6. The good man always protects those that seek protection at his hands. We solicit your protection; you should therefore pardon us."

Vaishampayana said:—

7. O hero, having been thus addressed, that virtuous-minded Brahmana of good deeds, as effulgent as the sun or the Moon, became propitious to them.

The Brahmana said:—

8. The words "hundreds" and "hundred thousands" all indicate eternity. The "hundred" used by me should be understood as a limited period and not as eternity.

9. You shall, becoming crocodiles, seize and drag men into water. (After the expiration of one hundred years), a best of men will drag you all from the water to the land.

10. You will then resume your own real forms. I have never spoken an untruth even in jest.

11. From that day all those sacred Tirthas will be known by the name of Nari-Tirthas all over the world. All of them will be sacred and sin-cleansing in the eyes of the virtuous and the wise.

Barga said:—

12. Having saluted that Brahmana with reverence and walked round him, we left that place in great grief; and we all came away thinking (all the while),

13. "Where shall we soon meet with that man who will give us our own old forms?"

14. O descendant of Bharata, as we were thinking, at that very moment we met with the illustrious celestial Rishi Narada.

15. O Partha, seeing that celestial Rishi of immeasurable effulgence, our hearts were filled with joy. Having saluted him with reverence we stood before him with faces covered with blushes.

16. He asked us the cause of our sorrow, and we told him all. Having heard what had happened, he thus spoke to us,

17. "In the low lands on the coast of the southern sea there are five sacred and delightful Tirthas,—go there without delay.

18. That best of men the pure-souled Pandava Dhananjaya (Aryuna) will certainly deliver you from your this distressful state."

19. O hero, hearing the Rishi's words, all of us came here. O sinless one, I have been really delivered by you to-day.

20. But, those others of my friends are still within the waters of the other lakes. O hero, perform a good work,—deliver them all.

Vaishampayana said:—

21. O king, thereupon that best of the Pandavas (Aryuna) of great prowess gladly delivered all of them from that curse.

22. O king, rising from the waters, they all regained their old forms, and those Apsaras then all looked as they looked before.

23. Making safe those Tirthas and giving them (Apsaras) leave to go away, that lord (Aryuna) went again to Manipur to see Chitrangada once more.

24. He saw there on the throne Vavruvahana, begotten by him (on Chitrangada). Seeing her, O king, the Pandava (Aryuna) proceeded towards Gokarna.

Thus ends the two hundred and nineteenth chapter, Aryuna's Tirtha Visiting, in the Aryuna Vanavasha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXX.

(ARYUNA VANAVAHA SA PARVA).

—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2. The immeasurably powerful (Aryuna) then saw one after the other all the sacred waters and other holy places that were on the shores of the western ocean. Seeing them all, he at last came to the Provasha.

3. When the invincible Vivatsa (Aryuna) came to the holy and charming Provasha, the slayer of Madhu (Krishna) heard of it.

4—5. Madhava (Krishna) went there to see his friend, the son of Kunti. Krishna and the Pandava (Aryuna) met together, and they embracing each other, enquired after one another's health. Those two friends, who were none else than the Rishis Nara and Narayana of old, then both sat down together.

6. Then Vasudeva (Krishna) asked Aryuna about his travels, saying, "O son of Pandu, why are you roaming over the earth seeing all the Tirthas?"

7. Thereupon Aryuna narrated to him every thing that had happened. Having heard all, the lord of the Vrishni race (Krishna) said, "This is what it should be."

8. Krishna and the Pandava sported at pleasure for some time at the Provasha, and they then went to the Raivataka mountain to live there for some time.

9. Before their arrival (at Raivataka), that hill at the command of Krishna, was adorned by many artificers. Much food was also collected there.

10. Enjoying every thing that was provided there for him, the Pandava Aryuna sat with Vasudeva (Krishna) to see the performances of the actors and dancers.

11. Having dismissed them all with proper respect, the high-souled Pandava laid himself down on a well-adorned and excellent bed.

12. When that mighty-armed hero lay on that excellent bed, he described to him (Krishna) the sacred waters, the lakes, the mountains, the rivers, and the forests that he had seen.

13. O Janamejaya, when he was thus talking as he lay on the celestial-like bed, sleep (slowly) stole on the son of Kunti.

14. He rose in the morning, awakened by the sweet songs and melodious notes of the Vina, by the panegyrics and benedictions of the bards.

15. After he had performed the daily rites, he was accosted with affection by the hero of the Vrishni race (Krishna). Then riding on a golden car he set out for Dwarka.

16. O Janamejaya, Dwarka with its streets, gardens and houses was well adorned to give a grand reception to the son of Kunti.

17. The citizens of Dwarka, in order to see the son of Kunti, eagerly came to the royal (public) streets in hundreds and thousands.

18. In order to see him hundreds and thousands of women and men of the Vrishni, the Andhaka and the Bhoja races formed into a great crowd.

19. He was respectfully welcomed by all the Bhojas, the Vrishnis and the Andhakas. He in return worshipped all that deserved his worship, and received their blessings in return.

20. The hero was accorded the most welcome and affectionate reception by all the youngmen (of the Yadava race). He too again and again embraced those that were of his own age.

21. In the delightful mansion of Krishna, adorned with gems and filled with every article of enjoyment, he passed many nights with Krishna.

Thus ends the two hundred and twentieth chapter, Aryuna's arrival at Dwarka, in the Aryuna Vanavasha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXI.

(SUBHADRA HARANA PARVA).

Vaishampayana said:—

1. O best of kings, a few days after a great festival of the Vrishnis and the Andhakas was held on the Raivataka hill.

2. In that mountain-festival of the Bhojas, the Andhakas and the Vrishnis, the hero gave away much wealth to the thousands of Brahmanas.

3. O king, the region around the hill was adorned with many mansions filled with various gems, and they appeared as if they are all Kalpabrikshas (trees giving whatever wanted.)

4. The musicians played in concert all the musical instruments; the dancers danced and the songsters sang.

5. The effulgent youths of the Vrishni race, adorned with ornaments and riding on golden cars, looked handsome every where.

6. Hundreds and thousands of the citizens with their wives and attendants went there, some on foot and some on excellent cars.

7. O descendant of Bharata, there roved the lord Haladhara (Valadeva), intoxicated with wine, accompanied by his wife Revati and followed by many Gandharvas (musicians)

8. There was the powerful king of the Vrishnis, Ugrasena, accompanied by his one thousand wives and followed by the Gandharvas.

9. There were the son of Rokini, and ever furious in battle Samba. Intoxicated with drink, adorned with beautiful garlands, and attired in costly robes, they sported there like two celestials.

10. There were Akrura, Sarava, Gada, Vabhru, Viduratha, Nishatha, Charudeshna, Pritha, Vipratha.

11. Satgata, Satyaki, Bhangakara, Maharava, Haridikya, Uddhava and any mothers whose names are not mentioned.

12. They were each separately accompanied by their wives and followed by the musicians. They all adorned that festival on the Raivataka mountain.

13. When that wonderful festival of great grandure and delight was continuing, Vasudeva (Krishna) and Partha (Aryuna) went about together.

14. When thus walking about, they saw the beautiful daughter of Basudeva, Subhadra, adorned with ornaments in the midst of her companions.

15. As soon as Aryuna saw her, he was struck by (the arrows) of the god of love. Seeing that Partha was looking at her with absorbed attention, Krishna,

16. O descendant of Bharata, spoke thus to that best of men (Aryuna) with smiles, "How is it that the mind of one who roams in the forest is thus agitated by desire ?

17. O Partha, she is my sister and also the sister of Sarana. Her name is Subhadra ; she is the most beloved daughter of my father. If your mind is set upon her, I shall then speak to my father."

Aryuna said :—

18. She is the daughter of Basudeva and the sister of Vasudeva (Krishna) ; endowed with so much beauty, whom can she not fascinate ?

19. If your this sister, this lady of the Vrishni race, become my wife, then certainly do I win prosperity in everything.

20. O Janardana, tell me by what means I may obtain her. I shall do anything achievable by man (in order to obtain her).

Krishna said :—

21. O best of men, Saimvara is the marriage form of the Kshatryas, but, O Partha, that is doubtful, as we do not know her temper and disposition.

22. The men learned in the precepts of religion say that in the case of heroic Kshatryas, a forcible taking away of a girl for the purpose of marriage is also praiseworthy.

23. O Aryuna, therefore, carry away this my sister by force, for who knows what she may not do in a Saimvara ?

Vaishampayana said :—

24. Having thus settled everything about what should be done, Krishna and Aryuna sent some swift messengers to Yudhisthira at Indraprastha, informing him of every thing. That mighty-armed son of Pandu (Yudhisthira), as soon as he heard it, gave his assent to it.

Thus ends the two hundred and twenty first chapter, the assent of Yudhisthira, in the Subhadraharana of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXII.

(SUBHADRA HARANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O Janamejaya, having received information of the assent (of Yudhisthira) and learning that the maiden had gone on the Raivataka (hill), Dhananjaya (Aryuna),

2. That best of the Bharata race, obtained the assent of Vasudeva (Krishna) and also settled in consultation with him all that was to be done.

3—5. That best of men (Aryuna), attired in armour and armed with the sword and his figures encased in leather fences, set out as if in a hunting excursion on his (Krishna's) well-built golden car, adorned with rows of small bells and equipped with every kind of weapon. The clatter of its wheels resembled the roars of clouds ; its splendour was as that of a blazing fire ; it struck terror into the hearts of all foes ; and the two horses yoked with it were named Sugriva and Saivya.

6. Subhadra, having worshipped that king of hills, Raivataka and the celestials, and having been blessed by all the Brahmanas,

7—8. And having walked round the hill, was returning towards Dwarka. The son of Kunti, struck by the arrows of the god of love, suddenly rushed towards that faultless featured Subhadra and forcibly took her upon his chariot. Thereupon that best of men, having seized that lady of sweet-smiles, proceeded (in haste) on his golden car towards his own city (Indraprastha).

9. Seeing Subhadra thus forcibly carried away, her armed attendants all ran crying towards the city of Dwarka.

10. Having arrived all together to that (Yadava) court, called Sudharma, they represented to the Savapala (the chief officer of the court), all about the prowess of Partha.

11. Having heard this, the Savapala blew his golden decked trumpet of loud blare, calling every one to arms.

12. Alarmed by that sound, the Bhojas the Vrishnis and the Andhakas poured in from all directions;—even those who were eating and drinking came leaving their food and drink.

13—14. Like blazing fires taking faggots to increase their splendour, those best of men, the great car-warriors of the Vrishni and the Andhaka races, possessing the lustre of the blazing fire, took their seats on thousands of golden thrones, covered with excellent carpets and adorned with gems and corals.

15. When they were all seated like an assembly of celestials, the Savapala with his followers narrated all about the conduct of Jishnu (Aryuna).

16. Having heard it, the proud heroes of the Vrishni, with their eyes red with wine, rose up from their seats, being unable to brook the conduct of Parthā.

17—18. Some cried, "Yoke our cars", some "Bring our weapons," some "Bring our costly bows and strong armours," some loudly called upon their charioteers to yoke their horses adorned with gold to their cars.

19. While their cars, their armours, and their standards were being brought, the uproars of those heroes became exceedingly great.

20. Then proud and intoxicated with wine, Valadeva, who was like the Kailasha mountain, adorned with the garlands of wild flowers and attired in blue robes, thus spoke to all.

21. "O senseless men, what are you doing when Janardana (Krishna) is sitting silent? Without knowing what is in his heart, you are vainly roaring in wrath.

22. Let the high-minded (Krishna) speak out what he proposes to do. Accomplish with all alacrity what he desires to do."

23. Having heard these words of Halayudha (Valadeva) which deserved, to be accepted, they all exclaimed, "Excellent," "Excellent." They then became silent.

24. Silence have been restored by the words of the intelligent Valadeva, they again all took their seats in that court.

25. Then the chastiser of foes Rama (Valadeva) thus spoke to Vasudeva (Krishna), "O Janardana, why do you not speak, why are you silently gazing?"

26. O Achyuta, it was for your sake that Partha had been welcomed and received with all honour by us. It appears that wretch, that fool, does not deserve our welcome and honour.

27. Is there a man born of a respectable family who will break the very plate after having dined off it?

28. Even if one desires to have such an alliance, who is there who desiring happiness will act so rashly remembering the services he has received?

29. By insulting us and disregarding Keshava (Krishna) he has carried away Subhadra by force wishing to compass his own death.

30. He has placed his foot on my head. O Govinda, how shall I bear it, (shall I not resent it) like a snake trodden by foot?

31. I shall alone to-day make the earth free of all Kauravas. Never shall I put up with this insult offered to us by Aryuna."

32. Thereupon all the Bhojas, Vrishnis, and the Andhakas, assembled there approved of every thing that Valadeva said, and they roared like the sounds of kettle-drum or the clouds.

Thus ends the two hundred and twenty second chapter, the wrath of Valadeva, in the Subhadraharana of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXIII.

(HARANA HARANA PARVA.)

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When the powerful Vrishnis all began to speak in this strain, then Vasudeva (Krishna) spoke these words of deep import and true morality.

Krishna said :—

2. Gudakesha (Aryuna) has not insulted our family by what he has done. There is no doubt he has enhanced our glory.

3. Partha knows that we are never mercenary. The Pandava (Aryuna) also regards a Saimvara as doubtful in its results.

4. Who also would approve of accepting a bride in gift as if she were an animal? What man again is there on earth who would sell his offsprings?

5. I think the son of Kunti (Aryuna) saw these faults in all other methods, therefore the Pandava took the maiden away by force according to ordinance.

6. This alliance is very proper. Subhadra is an illustrious girl and so is Partha. Thinking all this, he has taken her away by force.

7. Who is there that would not desire to have Aryuna as a friend? He is born in the race of Bharata and the illustrious Santanu, and he is also the son of the daughter of Kuntibhoja.

8—10. I do not see such a man in all the worlds, even with Indra and the Rudras, who can vanquish him in battle except the three-eyed deity Siva. His car is well-known; my steeds are now yoked to it. Partha as a warrior is also well known, and his lightness of hand too is well-known. Who shall be equal to him? Go cheerfully to Dhananjaya; stop him by conciliation and bring him back. This is my opinion.

11. If Partha goes away to his city (Indraprastha) by defeating us, our fame will be destroyed. But there is no disgrace in conciliation.

12. O king, having heard these words of Vasudeva, they did as he directed. Stopped by them, the lord Arjuna returned to Dwarka, and he was then united with Subhadra in marriage.

13. Having worshipped by the Vrisnis, the son of Kunti remained for a year in Dwarka, sporting there at pleasure.

14. The lord (Arjuna) passed the last portion of his exile at Pushkara. When twelve years were thus complete, he came back to Khandavaprastha.

15. He went to Yudhishthira and worshipped him first; he then worshipped the Brahmanas, and at last he went to Draupadi.

16. Draupadi, out of jealousy, thus spoke to that descendant of Kuru, Arjuna, "O son of Kunti, go there where the daughter of the Swatata race is.

17. 19. A second tie always relaxes the first one, however strong it might be." Thus Krishna (Draupadi) lamented in various strains, and Dhananjaya (Arjuna) comforted her, asking again and again her forgiveness. Coming to Subhadra attired in red silk, Partha sent her (into the inner apartments) dressed in the garb of a cow-herd woman. The illustrious lady looked handsome even in that dress.

20. Arriving at that best of houses, that wife of a hero, the best of women, the illustrious Vadra (Subhadra) of large and redish eyes worshipped Pritha.

21. Out of excessive affection Kunti smelt the head of that maiden of perfectly charming features, and she then pronounced infinite blessings upon her.

22. Then that damsel of the face like the full moon, Vadra, soon went to Draupadi and worshipped her saying, "I am your maid."

23. Krishna hastily rose and embraced the sister of Madhava; and out of affection she then said, "Let your husband be without a rival."

24. 27. Vadra then with a delightful heart said to her, "Be it so." O Janamejaya, from that time, those great car-warriors, the Pandavas, lived happily, and Kunti also became very happy. Having heard that the best of the Pandavas, Arjuna, had reached that excellent city, Indraprastha, the lotus-eyed and pure-souled Keshava (Krishna) came there with Rama (Valadeva),

28. And the other heroes and great car-warriors of the Vrisni and the Andhaka races, and his brothers and sons and many other warriors.

29. That chastiser of foes, Souri, came with a large army, and there also came that chastiser of foes, that exceedingly liberal, greatly intelligent and illustrious commander-in-chief of the Vrisni heroes, Akrura. (There also came) the greatly illustrious Uddhava,

30. Who was a man of great soul and great intelligence, like a disciple of Vrihaspati himself. (There also came) Satyaka and Satyaki and Kritavarmana and Satwata,

31. Pradyumna, Samba, Nishatha and Sanku, Chandrasena, the greatly powerful Jhilli, Viprutha, the mighty armed Sarana, the foremost of all learned men Goda,

32. These and many other Vrisnis, Bhojas and Andhakas came to Indraprastha, bringing with them many bridal presents.

33. Hearing that Madhava (Krishna) had come, the king Yudhishthira sent the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) to receive him.

34. Having been welcomed by them, the Vrisni heroes of great prosperity entered Khandavaprastha which was well-adorned with flags and standards.

35. The streets were well-swept and watered; they were adorned with floral wreaths and bunches, sprinkled over with cooling and fragrant sandal-wood-water.

36. Every part of the town was full of the sweet scent of burning aloes. The whole city was full of happy and healthy people, and adorned with traders and merchants.

37—38. That best of men, the mighty-armed Keshava (Krishna) with Rama and many of the Vrisni, Bhoja and Andhaka races entered the town and was worshipped by thousands of citizens and Brahmanas. He then entered the king's palace which was like the palace of Indra himself.

39. Yudhishthira received Rama with all due ceremonies, and the king embraced Keshava with both his arms and smelt his head.

40. Being much pleased with the reception, Govinda (Krishna) worshipped him (Yudhisthira) with all humility. He duly worshipped that best of men Bhima.

41. The son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, then welcomed with all due ceremonies all the other chief men of the Vrisni and the Andhaka races.

42. He worshipped some as his superiors, he welcomed others as his equals; he received some with affection and he worshipped others with reverence.

43. Then the illustrious Hrishiksha (Krishna) gave much wealth to the bridegroom's party. He gave to the illustrious Shubhadra all the bridal presents given to her by her relatives.

44. (He gave the Pandavas) one thousand golden cars adorned with rows of bells, to each of which were yoked four steeds driven by well-trained charioteers.

45. Ten thousand well complexioned kine, belonging to the country of Mathura and yielding much milk, were also presented (to the Pandavas) by Krishna.

46. Being very much pleased, Janardana (Krishna) gave them one thousand moon-like white horses with golden harnesses.

47. (He also gave them) one thousand mules of white colour with black manes, all possessing the speed of wind and all well-trained.

48—49. (He gave them also) one thousand damsels of skin perfectly polished, all young and virgin, all well-attired and of excellent complexion, each wearing one hundred pieces of gold round her neck, adorned with all ornaments and well-skilled in serving at bath and at drink, and in every kind of service.

50. Janardana (Krishna) also gave them as an excellent dower of the bride, hundreds of thousands of draught horses, brought from the country of the Valhikas.

51. Janardana Gave her (Subhadra) as her dowry ten loads of first class gold, possessing the splendour of fire; some portions of it were purified and some portions in original state.

52—54. The wielder of plough as his weapon, the lover of heroism, Rama, gave Partha as his nuptial present one thousand elephants with secretions flowing in three streams from the three parts of their bodies, each as large as a mountain, each irresistible in battle, each decked with coverlets, well adorned with ever-ringing bells and other golden ornaments, and each equipped with excellent haudahs on its back.

55.—56. The large number of gems and the large quantity of wealth presented by the Jadavas looked like a sea, of which the cloths and blankets were the foams, the elephants were the aligators and sharks, and the flags the floating weeds. This sea, thus swelling into large proportions, mingled with the ocean of wealth of the Pandavas. It was filled to the brim to the great sorrow of all their foes.

57. Dharmaraja Yudhisthira accepted all these presents and worshipped all those great warriors of the Vrisni and the Andhaka races.

58. Those illustrious heroes of the Kuru, Vrisni and Andhaka races passed their time all in merriment and in pleasure, as do the virtuous men in heaven (after their death).

59. The Kurus and the Vrisnis sported there with joyous hearts, often shouting and clapping their hands.

60. Thus passing many days in pleasure, and worshipped and entertained by the Kurus, the greatly effulgent Vrisni heroes then returned to the city of Dwaravati.

61. The great warriors of the Vrisni and the Andhaka races, placing Rama at their head and carrying with them all those brilliant gems presented to them by the excellent Kurus, set out (for their own city).

62. O descendant of Bharata, the high-souled Vasudeva (Krishna, however) remained with Arjuna in the charming city of Indraprastha.

63. That greatly illustrious hero roamed along the banks of the Lamuna in search of deer. He sported and hunted with Kiriti (Arjuna), piercing deer and wild boars with his arrows

64. Then Subhadra, the beloved sister of Krishna, gave birth to an illustrious son, like Pulama's daughter (Shachi) giving birth to Jayanta (son of Indra).

65. He was of long arms, broad chest, and bull-like eyes; that chastiser of foes, that best of men, that hero, the son of Subhadra, was named Abhimanyu.

66. That best of the Bharata race, that chastiser of foes, that son of Arjuna, was called Abhimanyu, because he was fearless and wrathful.

67. That great hero was begotten by Dhananjaya on the maiden of the Swatata race, like fire produced by rubbing in a sacrifice from within the Sami wood.

68. O descendant of Bharata, on the birth of this child, the greatly powerful son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, gave away to the Brahmanas ten thousand kine and many thousand gold coins.

69. The child became a favourite of Vasudeva from his earliest years, and of his father and uncles. He shone like the moon become and the favourite of all the people.

70. Krishna performed all the usual rites of infancy on his birth. The child began to grow up like the moon in the white fortnight.

71. That chastiser of foes learnt from Arjuna the science of arms with its four branches and ten divisions, both human and celestial; and he also became learned in the Vedas.

72—73. That powerful boy (Abhimanyu) became equal to his father in counteracting the weapons hurled upon him, in great lightness of hands, in fleetness of motion, forward and backward, and in traversing and wheeling. Seeing his son, the son of Subhadra, (so skilful in arms), Dhananjaya became exceedingly happy.

74. He possessed the power of crushing all his enemies,—he had every auspicious mark on his body; he was invincible in battle and as broad shouldered as a bull; he had a face like that of a snake,

75. He was as proud as the lion, he was a great bowman and as powerful as a mad elephant. His voice was like that of the roars of clouds, and his face was like that of the full moon.

76. He was equal to Krishna in bravery, in energy, in beauty and in features. Vivatsu (Arjuna) saw his son as if he was Magavata himself.

77. The auspicious Panchala princess also obtained five heroic, excellent, and mountain-like sons from the five Pandavas.

78.—79. Prativindhya was begotten by Yudhisthira, Sutasoma by Vrikodara, Srukarmana by Arjuna, Satanika by Nakula and Srutasena by Sahadeva; they were all great car-warriors. The Panchala princess gave birth to these five heroes, as Aditi gave birth to the Adityas.

80. The Brahmanas from their fore-knowledge said to Yudhisthira, that because that son of his would be capable of bearing like the Vindhya mountains the weapons of the foe, he should be called Prativindhya.

81. Because the child that Draupadi bore to Bhimsena was born after Bhima had performed one thousand Soma sacrifices, he should be called the great bowman Sutasoma.

82. Because Arjuna's son was born on his return from exile during which he had achieved many celebrated feats, that child came to be called Srukarmana.

83. Nakula's son was named Satanika after a royal sage of that name in the illustrious race of Kuru.

84. And because the son, Draupadi bore to Sahadeva, was born under the constellation, called Vahni Daivata, therefore he was called after the commander-in-chief of the celestial army,—Srutasena.

85. The sons of Draupadi were all born each at the interval of one year. All of them became renowned and was much attached to one another.

86. O king, all their rites of infancy and childhood according to the ordinance, such as Chudakarana and Upanayana, were duly performed by Dhaumya.

87. After having studied the Vedas, those princes of excellent behaviour and vows learnt from Arjuna the use of all the weapons, both celestial and human.

88 O best of kings, having obtained sons, all of whom were celestial-like, all of whom possessed broad chests and all of whom became great warriors, the Pandavas became exceedingly happy.

Thus ends the two hundred and twenty third chapter, the birth of the Pandu princes in the Haranaharana of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCX XIV.

(KHANDAVADHA PARVA.)

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When at the command of the king, Dhritarashtra, and the son of Santanu, (Bhisma), the Pandavas had taken up their abode at Indraprastha, they brought under their sway many other kings and monarchs.

2. As a soul lives happily depending on the body blessed with auspicious marks and pious deeds, so all the subjects lived most happily, depending on Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira.)

3. O best of the Bharata race, he (Yudhisthira) served equally Dharma, Artha and Kama, as if each of them was a friend as dear to him as his own soul.

4. It appeared as if the three pursuits, Dharma, Artha and Kama, became personified on earth; and with them the king shined as the fourth (pursuit.)

5. Having obtained him as their king, they obtained a monarch who was devoted to the study of the Vedas, who was a performer of great sacrifices, and who was the protector of all good works.

6. (During his reign) Lakshmi became stationary and hearts became devoted to the Supreme Spirit. Vertue itself began to grow all over the world.

7. Surrounded by his four brothers the king looked as resplendent as a great sacrifice depending upon and assisted by the four Vedas.

8. Many learned Brahmanas with Dhaumya at their head,—each equal to Vrihaspati,—waited upon the king, as the celestials wait upon the Lord of creation.

9. On account of the excessive affection of the people, both their hearts and eyes equally took great delight in Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) who was like a full moon without a stain.

10. The people took delight in him, not only because he was their king, but because they bore for him a great affection. The king also did what was agreeable to them.

11. The sweet-speached and greatly intelligent son of Pritha (Yudhisthira) never uttered any thing that was improper, or untrue or unbearable or disagreeable.

12. That greatly powerful and best king of the Varata race happily passed his days in seeking the good of every body, as if every one was his own self.

13. (His brothers,) the Pandavas brought by their great powers many kings under their sway ; they passed their days in happiness, having nothing to disturb their peace.

14. After a few days, Vivatsu (Aryuna) thus spoke to Krishna, "O Krishna, the summer is come, let us go to the Jamuna."

15. O Jonardana, O slayer of Madhu, if you like, let us sport there with our friends, and then return in the evening.

Krishna said:—

16. O son of Kunti, this is also my wish. O Partha, let us sport with our friends in the waters (of the Jamuna)

Vaishampayana said:—

17. O descendant of Bharata, having consulted with each other and after receiving Yudhisthira's permission, Partha (Aryuna) and Govinda (Krishna) in company with their friends set out (for the Jamuna)

18. And arrived at a charming spot, fitted for the purpose of pleasure, overgrown with numerous tall trees and adorned with high mansions and looking like the city of Indra,

19—20. O descendant of Bharata, in these houses were collected for the descendants of Vrisni and Pritha (Arjuna and Krishna) numerous well-flavoured and costly viands, drinks and other articles of enjoyments, and floral wreathes and various perfumes. The party soon entered the inner apartments (of the house), adorned with many precious gems of pure brilliancy. Entering these appartments, every one of them began to sport at his pleasure.

21. The women with beautiful full hips and rising breasts with handsome eyes and unsteady gait for drink began to sport.

22. Some sported at their pleasure in the woods, some in the waters, and some within the houses as directed and commanded by Krishna and Partha (Arjuna).

23. O king, Draupadi and Subhadra, exhilarated with wine, gave away costly robes and ornaments to the women that were sporting there.

24. Some amongst them danced in joy, and some began to sing ; some laughed and jested and some drank excellent wines.

25. Some obstructed one another's progress, some fought with one another and some again talked with one another in private, and some cut jokes at one another.

26. Those woods, filled with the charming music of the flute, guitars and drums, became the scene of prosperity itself.

27. When such was the state of things there, the descendants of Kuru and Dasarha (Krishna and Arjuna) went to a certain charming spot near by.

28. O king, after having gone there, the two illustrious Krishnas, the two subjugators of the hostile cities, (Krishna and Arjuna) sat themselves down on two very costly seats.

29. Partha and Madhava amused themselves there by talking over their past achievements, and discoursing on heroism and various other topics.

30. When Vasudeva and Dhananjaya were thus happily sitting together (in that charming spot), like the twin Aswinas in heaven, a certain Bramhana came to them.

31. He looked like an old Sal tree, his complexion was like that of heated gold, his beard was bright yellow tinged with green, the height and thickness of his body were in just proportion,

32. He had matted locks, he was attired in rags, he was as effulgent as the morning sun, his eyes were like lotus-leaves, his colour was tawny, and he appeared to be blazing in splendour.

33. Seeing that foremost of Bramhanas blazing with splendour coming towards them, Arjuna and Vasudeva hastily rose up and stood waiting (to receive command).

Thus ends the two hundred and twenty fourth Chapter, the arrival of Agni, in the Khandavadaha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXV.

(KHANDAVA DAHA PARVA) Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon that Bramhana thus spoke to Aryuna and Vasudeva of Satwata race, "You two, who are now staying so near the Khandava, are two foremost of men.

2. I am a voracious Bramhana that eats much. O descendants of Vrisni and Pritha, I ask you to gratify me by giving me sufficient food."

3. Having been thus addressed, Krishna and the Pandava (Aryuna) thus spoke to him, "Tell us what food will gratify you. We shall try to give it to you."

4. Having been thus addressed, the illustrious Bramhana thus spoke to those two heroes who were enquiring what kind of food he wanted.

The Brahmana said :—

5. I do not wish to eat ordinary food. Know that I am Agni (fire). Give me that food which suits me.

6. This Khandava (forest) is ever protected by Indra. I always fail to consume it, because it is ever protected by that illustrious god.

7. There lives (in this forest) his friend the Naga Takshaka with his relatives and followers. It is for him that the wielder of thunder (Indra) protects it.

8. Many other creatures are also protected by him (in this forest) for the sake of Takshaka. Although I am ever desirous of consuming it, I cannot do it for Indra's prowess.

9. Whenever he sees me blazing up (in this forest), he pours upon me waters from the clouds. I cannot thus succeed to consume it, though very much desirous of doing it.

10. I have now come to you,—you are both great experts in arms. I shall be able to consume Khandava with your help. This is the food I desire to have from you.

11. Expert as you are in excellent weapons, I pray you to prevent the showers of rain from coming down upon me, and to prevent also any creatures from escaping when I begin to consume it (the forest).

Janamejaya said :—

12. Why did the high-souled Agni desire to consume the forest of Khandava, abounding in various living creatures and protected by Indra ?

13.—14. When Agni consumed the Khandava in wrath, there was certainly a grave cause for it. I desire to hear from you all this in detail. O Rishi, tell me why the Khandava (forest) was consumed (by fire) in the days of yore.

Vaishampayana said :—

15. O best of men, I shall narrate to you the story of the destruction of the Khandava as told by the Rishis in the Puranas.

16. O king, it has been heard in the Puranas that there was a king named Svetaki who was endued with both strength and prowess, and who was a rival to Indra himself.

17. None has equalled him in sacrifices, charity and intelligence. He performed five great sacrifices and many other smaller ones, in all of which Dhakshinas (presents to Bramhanas) were very large.

18. O king, the heart of that monarch was always set upon sacrifices, religious rites and gifts of all kinds.

19.—20. That greatly intelligent king performed sacrifices for many years, assisted by the Ritwijas till they, becoming weak and their eyes afflicted with smoke, left that king, wishing never more to assist him at his sacrifices. The king, however, again and again asked them to come to him, but on account of their sore eyes, they did not come.

21. Thereupon the king with the permission of the Ritwijas completed his sacrifices with the assistance of other Ritwijas.

22. Some days after, he desired to perform another sacrifice which would extend for one hundred years.

23.—24. But the illustrious king did not get any Ritwijas; the high-souled king with his friends and relatives again and again courted them by bowing down to them, by conciliatory speeches and by the gifts of wealth.

25. But they refused to accomplish the purpose of that greatly effulgent (king). Thereupon that royal sage thus spoke to them in anger, sitting in their own hermitage.

26. "O Brahmanas, if I were a fallen person, if I were in wanting in service to you, I should then deserve to be abandoned by you and other Bramhanas.

27—30. O excellent Bramhanas, as I am neither degraded, nor wanting in homage to you, you should not obstruct the sacrifice performed by me and abandon me thus without sufficient reason. O Brahmanas, I seek your protection, you should be propitious to me. O excellent Bramhanas, if you abandon me from enmity alone, I shall go to other Bramhanas and I shall ask for their assistance at my sacrifice. Conciliating them with sweet words and speeches, I shall tell them what is my business to be done so that they may accomplish it." Having said this, the king became silent.

31. The Brahmanas knew well that they could not assist that chastiser of foes at his sacrifice; therefore they pretended to be angry with that best of kings, and they said,

32. "O best of kings, your sacrifices are incessant; we have been fatigued by assisting you (at your sacrifices).

33. We are tired in consequence of this labour; therefore, you should give us leave (to go away). O sinless one, from your loss of judgment only you cannot wait.

34. Go to Rudra (Siva); he will assist you at your sacrifice." Having heard these words of censure and wrath, the king Swetaki became angry.

35. Going to the Kailasha mountain, he began to worship the God (Siva), observing rigid vows and performing austere penances

36—38. Giving up all food, he passed many years; he only ate fruits and roots, sometimes at the twelfth and sometimes at the sixteenth hour of the day. He stood like the trunk of a tree. For six months with upraised arms and eyes fixed, the king performed the severest penances there (on the Kailasha mountain.)

39. O descendant of Bharata, Sankara (Siva) was greatly pleased; and he at last appeared before him. He said, "O chastiser of foes, O best of men, I have been much pleased with your asceticism.

40. O king, now ask the boon you desire." Hearing these words of the immeasurably effulgent Rudra (Siva),

41—42. The royal sage bowed to him and thus replied to him, "O illustrious one, O chief of the celestials, O god of gods, if you are pleased with me, assist me then in my sacrifices."

43. Having heard these words of the king, the deity was pleased and smilingly replied, "We ourselves do not assist at sacrifices.

44. But O king, O chastiser of foes, as you have undergone the severest of penances with the desire of obtaining a boon, I shall assist you at your sacrifice on this condition.

45. O king of kings, if for full twelve years you can incessantly pour libations of ghee into the sacrificial fire,—you yourself leading all the while the life of a Bramhachari,—

46. Then, O king, you can obtain me for the purpose for which you ask me." Having been thus addressed by Rudra, the king Swetaki

47. Did what he was asked to do by the wielder of Sula (Siva). When twelve years were completed, he again came to Moha-shwara (Siva).

48. On seeing the king, and being much pleased with him, the creator of the world Sankara (Siva) spoke thus to that best of monarchs, Swetaki.

49. "O best of kings, I have been pleased with your (great) act. O chastiser of foes, the duty of assisting at sacrifices belongs to the Brahmanas.

50. O chastiser of foes, therefore, I shall not myself assist you at your sacrifice to-day. There is on earth a greatly illustrious and best of Bramhanas who is a portion of my own self.

51. He is known by the name of Durvasha. He will assist you at your sacrifice. He is endued with ascetic powers, he will assist you. Therefore, let every preparation be made (by you)."

52. Having heard these words of Rudra, the king returned to his capital and began to collect all that were necessary for his sacrifice,

53. When every thing had been collected, the king again appeared before Sankara and said, "Every necessary thing has been collected,

54. And through your grace all my preparations are ready O god of gods, let me, therefore, be installed in the sacrifice to-morrow." Having heard these words of the illustrious king,

55. Rudra summoned Durvasha and spoke to him thus, "O best of Bramhanas, this is the high-souled king Swetaki.

56. O chief of Bramhanas, assist him at his sacrifice at my command." The Rishi said to Rudra, "Be it so."

57. Thereupon the sacrifice for which the illustrious king made preparations was performed according to the ordinance, at the proper season and a with large amount of Dhakshinas.

58. When that sacrifice of that illustrious king came to an end, all the other priests that assisted at it went away with the permission of Durvasha.

59. All other greatly effulgent Sadasyas also, who had been installed in that sacrifice, went away. O king, then that high souled (royal sage) entered his own palace.

60. Thereupon the illustrious Agni became pale, (because he drank a very large quantity of ghee in that sacrifice). He could not shine as before.

61. Seeing himself pale, Agni went to the sacred abode of Bramha ever adored by all.

62. Coming to Brahma seated (on his throne), he spoke to him thus, "O lord of the universe, I am reduced both in splendour and strength.

63. I desire to regain my own permanent nature through your grace " Having heard these words of Agni, the illustrious creator of all the worlds,

64. Smilingly thus spoke to Agni, "You have drunk continuously for twelve years a very large quantity of ghee poured into your mouth,

65. O exalted Deity, it is for this you have been affected with illness. O Agni, you have, therefore, suddenly lost both your splendour and strength.

66.—67. O Agni, do not grieve for it. You shall soon regain your own nature. I shall despel your this malady. O Agni, the abode of the enemies of the celestials, the fearful forest of Khandava, which at the request of the celestials you reduced to washes in the days of yore has again been filled with numerous creatures.

68. When you will eat the fat of all those creatures (now living in the Khandava), you will then regain your own nature. Go there soon to consume it with all its living creatures. You will then certainly be cured of your mlady."

69. Having heard these words that were uttered by the Supreme Deity, Agni proceeded with great speed (towards that great forest).

70. Arriving at the fearful Khandava forest in full vigour, he suddenly blazed up with the help of the wind.

71. Seeing the Khandava on fire, the dwellers of that forest made great efforts to extinguish it.

72. Hundreds and thousands of elephants speedily brought water in their trunks, and they scattered it over the fire in great wrath,

73. Many-headed snakes, becoming mad with anger, speedily scattered on the fire water from their many hoods.

74. O best of the Bharata race, they and the other creatures that lived in that forest soon extinguished the fire by various means and efforts.

75. Thus Agni blazed forth again and again in the Khandava (forest), but the blazing fire was again and again extinguished by the dwellers of that forest.

Thus ends the two hundred and twenty fifth chapter, the defeat of Agni, in the Khandavadaha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXIV.

(KHANDAVA DAHA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then Agni in despair and his malady (uncured) came to the Grandsire in anger.

2. He told Bramha all that had happened. The illustrious one, then reflecting for a moment, spoke thus to him,

3. "O sinless one, I see a means by which you may consume Khandava today,—even before the very sight of the husband of Sachi (Indra).

4. O Vivavasu, the two old deities Nara and Narayana have become incarnates in the world of men to accomplish the purposes of the dwellers of heaven (the celestials).

5. They are called on earth Vasudeva (Krishna) and Arjuna. They are now staying near the Khandava (forest).

6. Ask those two (heroes) to help you in consuming the Khandava. You will then be able to consume it, even if it be protected by the celestials.

7. They will certainly prevent the dwellers of the Khandava to escape; and they will thwart Indra also. I have not the least doubt in this."

8.—10. Having heard his words, Agni speedily came to Krishna and Arjuna. What he said to those illustrious pair, I have already told you. O best of kings, hearing these words of Agni who desired to consume the foes of Pandava against the wishes of Indra, Vivatsu (Arjuna) said to him these words well-suited to the occasion.

11. "I have numberless excellent celestial weapons with which I can fight even with many weilders of thunder (Indra).

12. But, O illustrious one, I have no bow suited to the strength of my arms and capable of bearing the might I put forth in battle.

13. In consequence of the great lightness of my hands, I require arrows that will be inexhaustible (in the quiver). My car also is hardly able to bear the load of arrows that I desire to keep by me.

14. I desire to have (some) celestial horses of pure white colour, possessing the speed of the wind, and (I also desire to have) a car, possessing the splendour of the sun; the clatter of its wheels should resemble the roars of clouds.

15. Then there is no weapon suited to Krishna's prowess. He requires weapon like the one with which Mahadeva (Siva) kills Nagas and Pichashas in the battle.

16. O illustrious one, you should give us the means by which we may gain success; and we can prevent Indra from pouring rains on that extensive forest.

17. O Agni, we are ready to do what is possible to be done by manliness and prowess. O illustrious one, but you should give us the proper means.

Thus ends the two hundred and twenty sixth chapter the colloquy between Arjuna and Agni in the Khandava Daha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER C C C X I I.

(KHANDAVA DAHA).—Continued.

Vaisampayana said:—

1.—2. Having been thus addressed, the illustrious smoke-bannered (deity) Agni recollected Varuna, the protector of the world, the son of Aditi, and the lord of waters having his home in the waters. He too, knowing that he was thought of, appeared before Agni.

3. The smoke-bannered deity (Agni) with reverence welcomed the lord of the waters, the foremost of the Lokapalas, the eternal god of gods, and he then thus spoke to him,

4. "Give me without delay the bow and the quiver, and also the ape-bannered chariot which were obtained from the king Soma.

5. Partha will (today) accomplish a great deed with the Gandiva (the bow in question) and Vasudeva also with the discus. Therefore, give them both to me today."

6—9. Varuna said to Agni, "I am giving." He then gave him that jewel of a bow,—Gandiva,—a bow endued with great energy. It was a great enhancer of fame and achievements, it was incapable of being injured by any weapon, it was the chief of all weapons and the gem of them all,—it was the smiter of hostile armies, and it was alone equal to one hundred thousand bow; it was the enhancer of kingdoms, and it was variagated with excellent colour; it was well-adorned and beautiful to look at, without a mark of weakness and injury anywhere, and it was always worshipped both by the celestials and the Gandharvas.

10—11. He also gave him a chariot filled with celestial weapons, and having a large ape as its standard. Yoked to that chariot were steeds as white as the silver or the fleecy clouds,—they were born in the regions of the Gandharvas, and they were all adorned with golden harness. They had the speed of the wind or the mind. The chariot was equipped with every instruments of war, and was incapable of being vanquished by the celestials or the Asuras.

12.—13. Its splendour was very great, and the sound of its wheels were tremendous; it delighted the heart of every creature that looked at it. It was created by Prajapati after severe ascetic meditation. It was as effulgent as the sun, and its splendour was so great that none could gaze at it. It was that very chariot riding on which the lord Soma defeated the Danavas.

14.—15. Resplendent with beauty, it looked like an evening cloud reflecting the splendour of the sun. It was furnished with an excellent flag-staff of golden colour and beauty. And there sat upon that staff a fierce-looking celestial ape which looked like a lion or a tiger.

16. Stationed on high the ape seemed bent upon burning everything it saw. There were other creatures also on other flags,

17. Whose roars caused the soldiers of the enemy's army to faint away. Then walking round that excellent car adorned with various flags and banners, and bowing to the celestials,

18. Arjuna, attired in armour, armed with sword, and his fingers incased in leather, ascended it as a virtuous man (on a celestial car that takes him to heaven).

19. Taking up that celestial and the best of all bows, that which was created by Brahma in days of yore and which was called Gandiva, Arjuna became exceedingly glad,

20. Bowing down to Agni, the greatly powerful hero took up the bow with force, and stringed it.

21. His heart trembled who heard the noise that was made while the bow was stringed by the mighty Pandava (Arjuna).

22. Having obtained that chariot and bow, and the two inexhaustible quivers, the son of Kunti became exceedingly glad; and he then thought that he was competent to assist Agni in the task.

23. Then (Agni) gave Krishna a discus with a piece of iron attached to its centre. It was a desirable fiery weapon, and on receiving it, he too became competent to assist Agni.

24. Then Agni said, "O slayer of Madhu Krishna, you shall certainly, with the help of this weapon, be able to defeat your enemies, even if they are not human.

25—27. O Madhava, with this weapon you shall certainly be superior to men and gods, to Rakshashas and Pishachas, to Daityas and Nagas. You shall certainly be able to kill all creatures with this weapon. Being hurled at your enemy by you in battle, it will irresistibly kill the enemy, and it will then again come back to your hands."

28. Then lord Varuna gave him (iKrishna) a club, named Kaumadaki, capable of killing every Daityas, and producing a roar like that of the thunder.

29—30. Then Aryuna and Achyuta (Krishna) thus spoke to Agni in joy, "O illustrious one, furnished as we are now with great weapons and well conversant with their use, and possessed as we are of cars with flags and flag-staffs, we are now able to fight even with all the celestials and the Asuras put together, not to speak of the wielder of thunder (Indra) who desires to fight for the sake of the Naga Takshak.

Aryuna said :—

31—32. O Agni, when the greatly powerful Hrishiksha Krishna moves on the field of battle with this discus in hand, there is nothing in the three worlds which he is not able to consume by hurling his weapon. Having obtained the bow Gandiva, and these two inexhaustible quivers, I am also ready to vanquish the three worlds.

33. Therefore, O lord, blaze as much as you like. Surround this large forest with fire. We are quite capable of helping you.

Vaishampayana said :—

34. Having been thus addressed by Dasarha (Krishna) and Aryuna, the illustrious (Agni) put forth his most energetic form, and he then prepared himself to consume that forest.

35. Having surrounded it from all sides with his seven flames, and appearing as fearful as he appears at the end of a Yuga, he began to consume the Khandava,

36. O best of the Bharata race, having surrounded that forest and catching it on all sides, he roared like that of the clouds and made every creature within it tremble (with fear.)

37. O descendant of Bharata, that burning forest looked like the resplendent Meru, the king of the mountains, blazing with the rays of the sun falling on it.

Thus ends the two hundred and twenty-seventh chapter, the burning of the Khandava, in the Khandavadaha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXVIII.

(KHANDAVA DAHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Then those two foremost of car warriors (Krishna and Aryuna), riding on their cars and placing themselves each on one side of the burning forest, began a great slaughter of all creatures.

2. Wherever and whenever they saw any creature, any dweller of the Khandava, escaping from the fire, those two great heroes immediately shot it down.

3. Their cars moved so fast round the forest that the creatures dwelling in it saw not the smallest space between the two rushing cars (so that they might escape by that way). Those two excellent cars seemed to be one car, and those two heroes also seemed as if they were one man.

4. When the Khandava was on fire, hundreds and thousands of living creatures, uttering fearful yells, ran in all directions.

5. Some had their limbs burnt, some were scorched with the excessive heat, some had their eyes burst out, some were withered away, and some ran about in fear.

6. Some died calmly within the forest clasping their children and some their parents and brothers; they were unable to abandon those that were dear to them out of excessive affection.

7. Many rose high upwards, biting their nether lips,—but they soon again fell below whirling into the blazing fire.

8. Some were seen rolling on the ground with their wings, eyes and feet scorched and burnt. They were soon after found to be dead.

9. The tanks and the ponds that lay within that forest were heated with the fire and they began to boil. The fishes and tortoises that were in their waters were all ~~to~~ perish.

10. In that great massacre of creatures in that forest, the burning bodies of various animals looked as if Agni had assumed so many forms.

11. The birds that took to their wings to escape from that fire were soon pierced by Aryuna's arrows; and being cut down to pieces, they again fell into the burning fire.

12. Being pierced by Aryuna's arrows the flying birds again fell into the Khandava with great speed and uttering loud cries.

13. Being pierced by the arrows, the dwellers of that forest began to cry, and the noise they made was like the fearful noise that rose at the churning of the ocean.

14. The great flame of the blazing fire rose to the sky and created a great anxiety in the minds of the dwellers of heavens the Devas.

15. Thereupon all the illustrious celestials went in a body to their chief of one hundred sacrifices and one thousands eyes, the grinder of the Asuras, Indra.

The celestials said:—

16. O lord of the immortals, why does Agni burn all the creatures below? Has the time for the destruction of the world come?

Vaishampayana said:—

17. Having heard this, and himself seeing what Agni was doing, the slayer of Vitra (Indra) set out to save the creatures from the fire.

18. The lord of the celestials, Vasava soon covered the sky with masses of clouds of various kinds; he then began to pour rain.

19. As soon as commanded by the king of the celestials, those hundreds and thousands of clouds began to shower on the Khandava forest in as thick drops as the flag-staffs of war-chariots.

20. But the showers were all dried up even in the sky by the heat of the fire; and they could not reach the fire below.

21. The slayer of Nemuchi (Indra) becoming very angry with Agni, again collected many more masses of clouds and made them shower a heavy down-pour.

22. Then the flames faught with that heavy shower and those masses of clouds overhead. The forest, being filled with smoke and lightnings, became fearful to look at.

Thus ends the two hundred and twenty eighth chapter, the wrath of Indra, in the Khandavadaha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXIX.

(KHANDAVA DAHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The son of Pandu, Vivatsu (Aryuna), calling his excellent weapons to his help, stopped that shower of rain by means of a shower of his own.

2. The high-souled Pandava covered the Khandava forest with innumerable arrows, as the atmosphere is filled with a thick fog.

3. When the sky over the forest was thus covered with the arrows of Sabyasachi (Aryuna), not a single creature could escape (from that forest).

4. The greatly powerful king of the Nagas Takshaka, was not there. When the forest was on fire, he was absent in Kurukshetra where he had gone.

5. But the powerful son of Takshaka, named Ashwasena, was there (in the forest); and he made great efforts to escape from the fire.

6. Confined by Aryuna's arrows, he could not succeed to come out (of the forest), but the snake lady, his mother, determined to save his life.

7. She first swallowed his head, and then she began to swallow his tail; in that state she then attempted to save her son and rose to the sky.

8.—9. As soon as the Pandava (Aryuna) saw her escaping, he cut off her head by means of sharp arrows, but the husband of Sachi, the wielder of thunder, Indra, saw all this; and he resolved to save the son of his friend. He raised a violent wind and deprived Aryuna of his consciousness. In the meantime Ashwasena succeeded in effecting his escape.

10. Having seen this fearful delusion, and having been deceived by the Nagas, the Pandava cut down all creatures into two, three or more pieces.

11. Vivatsu (Aryuna) cursed in anger the Naga that had so dectiefly escaped; so did Vasudeva (Krishna) and Agni. They said, "Never shall you be able to win fame or position."

12. Then remembering the deception practised on him, Jishnu (Aryuna) became very much angry, and covering the sky with a cloud of arrows, he saught to fight with the god of thousand eyes (Indra).

13. Seeing Aryuna in wrath, the king of the celestials also sought to fight with him. He hurled his very fearful weapons and covered whole of the sky.

14. Then greatly roaring winds, agitating all the oceans, gathered together masses of clouds charged with torrents of rains.

15. Thereupon those clouds, charged with thunder-rattle, vomited thunder and flashes of lightnings; but to dispel them Aryuna hurled an excellent weapon,

16—17. Named Vayava (wind weapon) with proper Mantras. In a moment it destroyed the force and the energy of Indra's thunder, and it dried up the water that was in those masses of clouds; it then destroyed the lightnings that played amongst them.

18. (In a moment) the sky was cleared off dust and darkness; delicious and cool breeze began to blow, and the sun regained its normal state.

19. Then Agni, sprinkled over with the fat that came out of the burning bodies of the various creatures, blazed up with all his flames and filled the universe with his roars.

20.—21. O great king, seeing that the forest was protected by the two Krishnas, many feathery creatures of the Garuda race proudly came down from the sky with the desire of striking those two heroes Krishna and the Pandava (Aryuna) with their thunder like strong wings, beaks and claws.

22. Many Nagas also came down upon the Pandava (Aryuna), all with faces emitting most virulent poisons.

23. Partha cut them to pieces by his arrows which appeared as if they had been steeped in the fire of his wrath. They (those birds and snakes) all fell into the burning fire below.

24. Wishing to fight, there also came innumerable Asuras, Gandharvas, Yakshas, Rakshas and Nagas, all uttering fearful yells.

25. Armed with instruments which vomited iron balls and bullets from their throats, and with machines that propelled huge stones and rockets, they rushed forward to strike Krishna and Partha.

26. Though they rained a fearful shower of weapons, Vivatsu (Aryuna) cut off their heads with his sharp arrows.

27. That slayer of foes, the greatly effulgent Krishna, also made a great slaughter of the Daityas and the Danavas with his discus.

28. Being struck with the force of his discus and pierced with his arrows, many immeasurably powerful Asuras became as motionless as the waifs and strays thrown on the shores by the waves.

29—30. Then the lord of the celestials Indra, riding on his white elephant, rushed upon the two heroes, and speedily taking up his irresistible thunder-bolt he hurled it with great force. The slayer of the Asuras (Indra) said to the celestials, "These two (Krishna and Aryuna) are already killed."

31. Thereupon seeing the great thunder about to be hurled by the great Indra, the celestials each took up his own respective weapon.

32. O king, Yama took up his death-dealing club, the lord of wealth (Kuvera) his mace, Varuna his noose and his beautiful missiles,

33. Skanda (Kartikeya) took up his weapon Sakti, and he stood as motionless as the Meru mountain. The Aswinis stood up with their fiery plants in their hands.

34. Dhatri (creator) stood with his bow in hand, and Yaya with a great club; the greatly strong Tashtri took up in anger a huge mountain.

35. Surya took up a bright dart, and Mrityu a battle axe. Aryamana taking up a fearful bludgeon walked about.

36. Mitra stood there taking up a discus as sharp as a razor. O king, Puskara, Vaga and Savita

37. Rushed upon Partha and Krishna with bows and swords in their hands. The Rudras, the Vasus, the greatly powerful Marutas, 38—39. The Vishwadevas, and the *Sadhya*s,—all blazing in their own effulgence,—these and many other celestials, armed with various weapons, rushed upon those two best of men, Krishna and Partha, with the desire of killing them. Then a wonderful phenomenon was seen in that great battle.

40. Mysterious protents appeared, resembling those that appear at the great dissolution. Seeing this, and seeing also Indra with millions of celestials prepared for fight, 41—42. They (Krishna and Aryuna), fearless and invincible in battle, stood calmly with their bows in hands. Well-skilled in battle those warriors angrily attacked the advancing hosts of the celestials with their thunder-like arrows.

43. They the celestials left the battle (field) in fear and sought the protection of Indra. Seeing the celestials routed by Madhava (Krishna) and Aryuna,

44. The Rishis who were in the sky became very much astonished. Indra also, seeing that great prowess in the battle,

45—46. Became exceedingly pleased; and he once more rushed upon them. The chastiser of Paka (Indra) then sent down a shower of stones to ascertain the power of Sabyashachi (Aryuna) who could draw his bow even with his left hand. But Arjuna dispelled that shower.

47. Seeing his showers dispelled (by Aryuna), the god of one thousand sacrifices (Indra), the chastiser of Paka, once more sent down a thick shower of stones.

48. The son of the chastiser of Paka Aryuna gave great pleasure to his father Indra by dispelling that shower also by his greatly swift arrows.

48. Then Sakra Indra, wishing to kill the son of Pandu, tore up with his hands a large peak from the Mandara mountain with trees and all; he then hurled it against him.

50. But Aryuna soon cut down that mountain peak into thousand pieces by his swift and fire-mouthed arrows.

51. Fragments of that mountain peak, in falling through the sky, looked as if the sun, the moon and the planets loosened from their positions fell down on earth.

52. The fragments of that huge peak fell down on that forest, and they killed numerous creatures, the dwellers of the Khandava.

Thus ends the two hundred and twenty ninth chapter, the battle between the celestials and Krishna and Aryuna, in the Khandava daha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXX.

(KHANDAVA DAHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2. The dwellers of the Khandava, the Danavas, the Rakshashas, the Nagas, the wolves and the bears, the other wild animals, the elephants with their temples rent, the tigers, the lions with manes, hundreds of deer and buffaloes, birds and various other creatures, all being frightened by the falling stones and afflicted with anxiety, began to fly in all directions.

3. They saw the fire, and also two Krishnas ready with their weapons. Frightened at the fearful sounds, they lost their power of locomotion.

4. Seeing the fire burning in innumerable places, and seeing also Krishna with weapons to shoot them down they all set up a terrible roar.

5. The whole of the firmament resounded with a terrible roar and with also the roar of the fire, as when the clouds roar at the time of the great dissolution.

6. The mighty-armed Krishna (dark) Keshava hurled at them for their destruction his large, fierce and greatly effulgent discus

7. The dwellers of that forest, including the Danavas and the Rakshashas, were struck by that weapon; and being cut into hundreds of pieces, they fell into the mouth of Agni (fire).

8. Mangled by Krishna's discus, the Daityas were covered with fat and blood; and they looked like the evening clouds.

9. O descendant of Bharata, the Vrishni hero Krishna, moving about like Death himself, killed again and again thousands of birds, the Pishachas, the Nagas and other creatures.

10. The discus, being hurled from the hands of Krishna, the slayer of foes killed innumerable creatures; and then it came back again to his hands.

11. While he was thus engaged in killing the Pishachas, the Nagas and the Rakshashas, the face and the feature of Krishna, the soul of all creatures, became fearful to look at.

12. Now the celestials that came to fight and mustered there could not defeat Krishna and Aryuna in battle.

13. When the celestials found that they could not extinguish the fire or protect the forest from the prowess (of Aryuna and Krishna), they retired.

14. O king, the deity of one hundred sacrifices (Indra), seeing the immortals retreat (from the battle), became exceedingly glad and much praised Keshava (Krishna) and Aryuna.

15. When the celestials retreated, an invisible voice thus spoke in a loud and deep voice to the deity of one thousand sacrifices (Indra),

16. "Your friend, that best of the Nagas, Takshaha, has not been slain. Before the fire broke out in the Khandava, he had gone to Kurukshetra.

17. O Vasava, know from what I say that none can ever defeat in battle Vasudeva (Krishna) and Aryuna.

18. They are Nara and Narayana. These two Rishis were formerly heard of in heavens. You will know what is their prowess and energy.

19. They are invincible in battle; these two best of old Rishis are incapable of ever being defeated by any in all the worlds.

20. They deserve worship from all the celestials, the Asuras, the Jakshas, the Rakshashas, the Gandharvas, the human beings, the Asuras and the Nagas.

21. O Vasava, therefore, you should go away from this place with all the celestials. The destruction of the Khandava (forest) has been ordained by fate."

22. Having ascertained these words to be true, the lord of the immortals Indra gave up his wrath and jealousy and went back to heaven.

23. O king, seeing that illustrious celestial gone away, the dwellers of heaven all followed Indra with their soldiers.

24. When those two heroes, Vasudeva and Aryuna, saw the chief of the celestials retreat with all the dwellers of heaven, they set up a leonine roar.

25. O king, when Indra had gone away, Keshava and Aryuna became exceedingly glad. Those two heroes then fearlessly assisted Agni to consume that forest.

26. Having scattered the celestials as the wind scatters the cloud, Aryuna killed with the showers of arrows numberless creatures who dwelt in the Khandava.

27. Cut off by Sabyasachi's (Aryuna's) arrows, not one among those innumerable creatures could escape (from that burning forest).

28. Not to speak of fighting with him, none amongst the strongest creatures, who mustered together to fight, could even look at Aryuna with infallible arms.

29. Sometimes piercing one hundred creatures with one arrow, and sometimes piercing one creature with one hundred arrows, Aryuna (whirled about on his car). All creatures fell into the mouth of Agni as if struck dead by Death himself.

30. The creatures found no ease on the banks of the river, or on uneven plains, or in Sashanas (crematoriums.) Everywhere they were afflicted with great heat.

31. Innumerable creatures yelled in pain. Elephants, deer, and wolves all wept and set up cries of affliction.

32. At that sound the fishes that lived in the waters of the Ganges and the sea, and the various classes of Vidadharas, the dwellers of that forest became very much alarmed.

33. O mighty-armed hero, not to speak of fighting with Aryuna and Krishna dark Janarddana, none could even look at them.

34. (Krishna) killed with his discus all the Rakshashas, the Nagas and the Danavas who rushed out in crowds.

35. Those creatures of huge bodies, their heads and trunks cut off by the swift discus, deprived of their lives, fell down into the burning fire.

36. Being gratified with a large quantity of flesh, blood and fat, the flames rose up to a great height with curling wreath of smoke.

37—38. Agni with fiery and coppery eyes and with flaming tongue and large mouth, and also with fiery hair on his head, drank with the assistance of Krishna and Aryuna that nectar-like stream of fat. He was filled with great joy, and thus being much gratified, he enjoyed much happiness.

39. Then the slayer of Madhu saw an Asura, named Moya suddenly escaping from the abode of Takshaka.

40. Agni, whose charioteer was the wind, immediately assuming a body with (fiery) matted locks on his head, and roaring like the clouds, pursued the Asura with the intention of consuming him.

41. Seeing the Asura, Vasudeva stood with his weapon upraised, ready to cut him down. Seeing the discus upraised and Agni after him, with the intention of burning him,

42. Moya said "O Aryuna, come soon to me and protect me". Having heard his frightened voice, Dhananjaya (Aryuna) exclaimed, "Do not fear."

43.—44. O descendant of Bharata, the reply of Partha seemed to give (Moya) his life. As the kind Partha said to Moya not to fear, the Dasarha hero (Krishna) did not desire to kill him who was the brother of Nemuchi. Agni also did not burn him down.

45. Having been protected by Krishna and Partha from the attacks of the chastiser of Paka (Indra), the greatly intelligent Agni burnt the forest for fifteen days.

46. In the burning of that forest, he (Agni) spared the lives of only six creatures,—(namely) Ashwasena, Moya and the four Sarangakas (a kind of feathery creatures.)

Thus ends the two hundred and thirtieth chapter, the rescue of Moya, in the Khandavadaha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXXI.

(KHANDAVA DAHA PARVA)—
Continued.

Janamejaya said:—

1. O Brahmana, tell me why Agni did not consume the Sarangakas when that forest was being burnt?

2. O Brahmana, you have narrated the cause of Ashwasena and the Danava Moya having been not burnt,—but you have not narrated the cause of the Sarangakas having been not burnt.

3. O Brahmana, the escape of the Sarnagakas seems to be wonderful. Tell us why they were not destroyed by Agni in that great conflagration.

Vaishampayana said :—

4. O chastiser of foes, I shall tell you all about the reason for which Agni did not consume the Sarangakas in that conflagration.

5. O king, there was a great Rishi, the foremost of all virtuous men, known by the name of Mandapala. He was learned in all the Shastras and devoted to asceticism and rigid vows.

6. O king, following the footsteps of those Rishis who had brought their passion under complete control, he devoted himself to study and virtue, and he became a victor over all his senses.

7. O descendant of Bharata, having reached the opposite shore of asceticism (gaining success in asceticism), he gave up his human body and went to the region of the Pitris. But he did not get there the fruits (of his virtuous actions).

8. He asked the dwellers of heaven (celestials) sitting round Dharmaraja (the king of the dead) what was the cause of his not getting the fruits of his severe asceticism.

Mandapala said :—

9. Why have these regions become unattainable by me? I thought they have been acquired by me by my asceticism. What have I not done, the fruits of which are these regions?

10. O dwellers of heaven, tell me why these regions are shut against me. I will do that which will give me the fruit of my asceticism.

The celestials said :—

11. O Brahmana, hear of those acts and things for which men are born debtors. There is no doubt that men are born debtors for Kriya, religious rites, for Brahmacharjaya, study according to the ordinance and for progeny.

12. These debts are discharged by sacrifices, asceticism and offspring. You are an ascetic, you have also performed sacrifices, but you have no offspring.

13. These regions are shut against you, because you have no offspring. Therefore, beget offspring;—you will then enjoy various regions of felicity.

14. It is said in Smriti, that the son rescues the father from the hell, called Put, O best of Brahmanas, therefore, try to beget children.

Vaishampayana said :—

15. Having heard these words of the dwellers of heaven, Mandapala thought how he could obtain the largest number of offspring within the shortest period of time.

16. After reflection, he came to the conclusion that the birds alone have the greatest power of fecundity. Becoming a Sarangaka, he had connection with a female Sarangaka, named Jarita.

17—18. He begot on her four sons who were all utterers of the Vedas. Leaving these sons with their mother in that forest while they were still within the eggs, he went to Lapita. O descendant of Bharata, when the illustrious Rishi went away to Lapita,

19—20. Jarita, filled with affection for her offspring, became very thoughtful. Though forsaken by their father in that forest of Khandava, Jarita, out of her affection for her children, could not forsake her offspring, those infant Rishis still living within the eggs. She brought up those children, herself following the pursuit proper to her own species.

21. Sometime after, the Rishi Mandapala, while wandering in the forest with Lapita, saw Agni coming towards the Khandava to burn it.

22. Knowing the intention of Agni, and remembering also that his children were all young,—moved by fear, he gratified Agni, the greatly effulgent regent of the universe. He did it, wishing to say a word for his unfledged offspring.

Mandapala said :—

23. O Agni, you are the mouth of all the worlds, you are the carrier of sacrificial Ghee. O purifier, you move invisibly in the body of every creature.

24. The learned have said that you are a unit, and again you possess triple nature. The wise perform their sacrifices before you, and they consider you as having eight (mouths).

25. The great Rishis say that this universe is erected by you. O eater of the sacrificial Ghee, this whole universe will be destroyed in a single day if you were not present in it.

26. Bowing down to you, the Bramhanas, accompanied by their wives and children, go to the eternal regions acquired by them by their own (good) deeds.

27. O Agni, the learned say that you are the clouds charged with lightnings. The flames put forth by you consume every creature (on earth).

28. O effulgent deity, this universe is created by you. The Vedas are your words; all creatures, mobile and immobile, depend upon you.

29. Water primarily depends upon you, whole universe also depends upon you. All offerings of sacrificial Ghee and all libations of food offered to the Pitris have also been established in you.

30. O deity, you are the consumer, you are the creator, you are Vrihaspati himself. You are Surya, you are Soma and you are Vayu.

Vaishampayana said :—

31. O king, thus praised by Mandapala, Agni was much pleased with that immeasurably effulgent Rishi.

32. He thus spoke to him with a delightful heart, "What good can I do to you?" Thereupon Mandapala with joined hands said to the carrier of sacrificial Ghee fire, "When you will burn the Khandava, spare my sons."

33. The illustrious carrier of the sacrificial Ghee Agni promised it by saying "Be it so." And then at that very moment, he blazed up with the intention of burning the Khandava.

Thus ends the two hundred and thirty first chapter, the history of Sarangakas, in the Khandavadaha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXXII.

(KHANDAVA DAHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When the fire blazed up, the Sarangakas became very much distressed. Afflicted with anxiety, they did not find any means of escape.

2. Their ascetic mother Jarita, full of grief and sorrow, seeing that her sons were too young to escape, wept and lamented in grief.

Jarita said :—

3. Alas, the terrible fire, the enhancer of my misery, is coming towards us, illuminating the whole universe and burning the forest.

4. I am filled with sorrow for the sake of these infants with immature understanding and without feathers and feet, who are the sole refuge of our deceased ancestors.

5. The fire is rushing towards us, licking with its tongue the tallest trees and spreading fear all around. My unfledged children are incapable of effecting their escape.

6. I myself am incapable of escaping—specially taking all these (my children) with me. I am incapable of abandoning them; my heart is distressed for their sake,

7. Whom amongst my sons shall I leave behind, and whom shall I carry with me? What should I do which is consistent with duty? O my infant sons, what is your opinion?

8. Even after good deal of reflection, I do not see any way of escape for you. I shall now cover you with my wings and die with you.

9—10. Your cruel father went away saying, "O Jarita, my race will depend on this Jaritari, because he is the eldest of my sons. My second son Sarisrikka will beget offsprings for the spread of my forefather's race; my third son Stamvamitra will be devoted to asceticism; and my youngest son Drona will be the foremost of all the learned men in the Vedas."

11. Now this great calamity has befallen on us,—whom shall I take with me? I am deprived of my judgment. What should I do consistent with duty? By exercising my judgement, I do not find any means of escape for my children from this fire.

Vaishampayana said :—

12. The young Sarangakas thus spoke to their mother who was thus lamenting, "O mother, giving up all affection for us, go to the place where there is no fire.

13. If we are killed, you might have other children born to you, but, O mother, if you are killed, we shall have no children in our race.

14. O mother, taking into your consideration both these two calamities, the time has come for you to do that which will be for the good of our race.

15. Do not perform anything out of affection for your children. If you are saved, our father who is desirous of acquiring regions of felicity will have his wishes fulfilled.

Jarita said :—

16. There is a hole here in the ground near to this tree ;—enter this hole without any delay ; you shall then have no fear from fire.

17. O children, when you will enter it, I shall then cover its mouth with dust. This is the only means that I see for your escape from this blazing fire.

18. When the fire will be out, I shall then come back here to remove the ashes. If you want to escape from the fire, follow my advice.

The Sarangakas said :—

19. We are but so many balls of flesh without having our feathers. If we enter the hole, there is no doubt the carnivorous mouse will destroy us all. Seeing this fear before us, we cannot enter the hole.

20. We do not know how we may escape from the fire, or from the mouse. We do not see how our father's act of procreation may not be in vain, and how our mother may be saved.

21. If we enter the hole, the mouse will kill us. If we remain where we are, the sky-ranger Agni will destroy us. Taking both the (two) calamities into our consideration, (we think) death from the fire is preferable to the death by being eaten up.

22. To be eaten up by the mouse in the hole is a most ignoble death. But destruction of the body by fire is praised by the wise.

Thus ends the two hundred and thirty second chapter, the lamentation of Jarita, in the Khandavadaha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXXIII.

(KHANDAVADAHHA PARVA)—Contd.

Jarita said :—

1. The little mouse that came out of this hole was seized by a hawk with its claws, and it has been carried away. Therefore, you may enter it without any fear.

The Sarangakas said :—

2. We are not at all certain whether that mouse has been carried away by the hawk. There may be other mice living there. We have every fear from them.

3. There is every chance that the fire will not reach us in this place, for it may be carried away in some other direction by the wind. There is no doubt, however, that if we enter the hole, we shall be killed by the dwellers of the hole.

4. If we remain where we are, death is uncertain. O mother, a position in which death is uncertain is better than one in which it is certain. Therefore, it is your duty to escape, for if you live, you may have other children as good as ourselves.

Jarita said :—

5—6. O children, I myself saw the great hawk, that best of birds, swoop down with great speed and fly away with the mouse from the hole. I quickly followed the bird and I pronounced blessings upon him for his carrying away the mouse from the hole, saying,

7. "O king of hawks, as you are flying away with our enemy, the mouse, in your claws, may you live in heaven with a golden body, and having not a single foe.

8—9. When the hawk devoured the mouse, I then obtained his leave and returned to this place. O children, enter this hole with all confidence, you have nothing to fear. I myself has seen the mouse carried away by the illustrious hawk.

The Sarangakas said :—

10. O mother, we do not know whether the mouse has been really carried away by the hawk. We cannot enter the hole in the ground without knowing it.

The Jarita said :—

11. I know to a certainty that the mouse has been carried away by the hawk. Therefore, O children, you have nothing to fear. Do what I say.

The Sarangakas said :—

12. O mother, we do not mean that you are trying to dispel our fears with a false story. When a person's reason is confused, his acts cannot be called his deliberate acts.

13. You have in no way been benefitted by us ; you do not know who we are. Why do you then try to save us to so much cost to yourself ? Who are we to you ?

14. You are young and handsome you are able to search for your husband. O mother, go to your husband, and you will obtain excellent sons again.

15. Let us obtain the higher regions by entering the fire. If the fire does not consume us, you can then come back and obtain us.

Vaishampayana said :—

16. Having been thus addressed by them, the female bird (Jarita) left them (her sons) in the Kandhava ; with great speed she went to the place where there was no fire and where there was safety.

17. Then Agni in haste and with fearful flames came to the spot where the sons of Mandapala were.

18. The (young) birds saw the blazing fire coming towards them. Then Jaritari spoke these words in the hearing of Agni.

Thus ends the two hundred and thirty third chapter, the history of Sarangakas in the Khandavadaha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXXIV.

(KHANDAVA DAHA PARVA)—Contd.

Jaritari said :—

1. The intelligent men always remain wakeful in view of death. When the house of death approaches, he feels no pangs.

2. But a man with perplexed soul who does not remain wakeful (in view of death) feels the pangs of death when the hours of death come. He never gets salvation.

Sarisrikka said :—

3. You are patient and intelligent. The time has come when our lives are in danger. There is no doubt one only amongst many becomes wise and brave.

Stamvamitra said :—

The elder brother is called the protector. It is the eldest brother who rescues (the younger brothers) from danger. If the eldest fails to rescue them, what can the younger brothers do ?

Drona said :—

5. The cruel deity of fire with seven tongues and the seven mouths is coming towards our abode with all speed, blazing forth in his great splendour and licking up every thing on his way.

Vaishampayana said :—

6. Having thus addressed one another, the sons of Mandapala then each with reverence uttered an eulogistic hymn to Agni. O king, listen to them as I recite.

Jaritari said :—

7. O fire, you are the soul of our body ; you are the body of the earth's visitation. O Sukra, you are the progenitor of the water, and the water is your progenitor as well.

8. O effulgent deity, your flame like the rays of the sun exists above, below, behind and on every side.

Sarisrikka said :—

9. O smoke-bannered deity, we cannot see our mother ; we know not our father.

Our feathers have not grown as yet. We have no one except you who can protect us. We are infants,—therefore, O Agni, protect us.

10. O Agni, we are in (great) distress. Protect us with your auspicious form and with your seven flames. We pray for your protection.

11. O deity, O carrier of the (sacrificial) Ghee, O Agni, you are the giver of heat, you alone give heat to the rays of the sun. We are young,—we are Rishis—protect us ; and be pleased to go from this place by some other way.

Stamvamitra said :—

12. O Agni, you are every thing. The whole universe is established in you. You uphold every creature, and you support the worlds.

13. O Agni, you are the carrier of (sacrificial) Ghee, you are the great (sacrificial) Ghee itself. The wise know you to be One and (at the same time) Many.

14. O carrier of (sacrificial) Ghee (Agni), you create the three worlds and you again destroy them when the time comes for their destruction by swelling (your body to a fearful dimension). You are the progenerating mother of the whole universe ; you are the essence also in which the universe desolves.

Drona said :—

15. O lord of the universe, growing in strength and remaining within their bodies, you cause to be digested the food that creatures eat. Every thing is established in you.

16. O Sukra, O deity from whose mouth the Vedas have sprung,—in the form of the sun you suck up the waters of the earth and every liquid juice that earth yields. You then again in proper time and in proper season give them back in the form of rains ; and you thus cause every thing to grow.

17. O Sukra, these plants and creepers with green leaves have all sprung through you. These tanks and ponds, and the ever-blessed great ocean also, have all sprung from you.

18. O deity of fearful rays, this our (mortal) body depends on Varuna (the god of waters). We are incapable of bearing your heat. Therefore, (O deity) be our blessed protector. Do not destroy us to-day.

19. O Agni of copper-coloured eyes and of red neck, O deity whose path is marked by black colour, save us as the ocean saves the houses on its banks by going away (from this place) by some other way.

Vaishampayana said :—

20. Having been thus addressed by that utterer of the Vedas, Drona, the deity from whose mouth the Vedas have sprung (Agni), being well-pleased and remembering his promise to Mandapala, thus spoke.

Agni said :—

21. O Drona, you are a Rishi, what you have said is the Vedic truth. I shall do your pleasure. You have nothing to fear.

22—23. I was formerly asked by Mandapala to spare his sons when consuming the forest. The words he spoke and your speech also, both are entitled to great weight. Tell me what I am to do. O excellent Bramhana, I have been greatly pleased with your blessed hymn.

Drona said :—

24. O Sukra, these cats trouble us every day. O fire, consume them with their friends and relatives.

Vaishampayana said :—

25. O Janamejaya, telling them what were his intentions, Agni then accomplished all that the Sarangakas asked him to do. Growing in strength, he then again began to consume the Khandava.

Thus ends the two hundred and thirty fourth chapter, the history of Sarngakas, in the Khandava Daha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXXV.

(KHANDAVADAH PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O descendant of Kuru, Mandapala became anxious for his sons. Although he had spoken of them to the deity of fearful rays (Agni), his mind was not in peace.

2—3. Being very much anxious for his sons, he spoke thus to Lapita, "O Lapita, my children are not now in possession of the power of moving,—how are they (now)? When the fire will grow in strength and when the wind will begin to blow with violence, my children will be incapable of saving themselves.

4. How shall their ascetic mother be able to save them? She will be afflicted with great sorrow when she will find herself unable to save them.

5. She will run about uttering various lamentations; for my sons are incapable of flying or rising up in the air.

6. Alas, how is Jaritari, my son! How is Sarisrikka, how is Stamvamitra and how is Drona! Alas, how is also the ascetic lady (their helpless mother)!"

7. O descendant of Bharata, when the Rishi Mandapala was thus lamenting in the forest, Lapita, out of jealousy, thus replied to him,

8. "You need have no anxiety for your children who, as you have assured me, are all greatly effulgent and powerful Rishis. They can have no fear from the fire.

9. Did you not yourself in my presence speak to Agni on their behalf? Did not the illustrious deity promise to save them?

10. Being the protector of creatures, he (Agni) will never falsify his words. You have no anxiety in your mind,—your heart is never inclined towards your friends.

11. It is only by thinking of her,—my enemy (Jarita),—that you are so very much in anxiety. It is certain that the love you bear for her is not equal to that you bear for me.

12. He who has two parties to divide his attention can easily see one of them suffer all sorts of pangs. But he can never disregard the party next to his heart.

13. Go to Jarita for whom your heart is so very sorrowful. As for myself, I shall roam alone,—it would be a fit reward for me for having attached myself to a wicked man.

Mandapala said :—

14. I do not roam over the world with such intentions as you believe. It is only for begetting offspring that I am here. But even those that I have is now in danger.

15. He who casts off that which he has for the sake of what he may acquire (in future) is a wicked man. The world disregards and insults him. As for myself, you are at liberty to do what you choose.

16. This blazing fire that licks up the trees produces sorrow in my anxious heart; it creates in my mind anticipations of fear.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. After Agni has left the place where the Sarangakas lived, Jarita, very much attached to her sons, came with all speed to see how they all were.

18. She found that all of them had escaped from the conflagration, and they were all well. Seeing their mother, they too began to weep, although they were safe and well.

19. Seeing them (well), she too shed tears again and again. She embraced one by one all her weeping children.

20. O descendant of Bharata, just at that very time, Mandapala suddenly arrived there, but none of his sons expressed any joy on seeing him.

21. But he spoke to them one after the other, and he spoke also to Jarita, but none of them said ill or well to him in reply.

Mandapala said :—

22. Who amongst these (my sons) is your first born and who is born next to him? And who is the third, and who is the youngest?

23. I am speaking to you in sorrow; why do you not reply to me? It is true I left you, but I did not get peace where I was.

Jarita said :—

24. What business have you with the eldest of these (sons), and with him also who is the next, and with him also who is the third, and with him who is the youngest?

25. Go to Lapita of sweet smiles who is endued with beauty and youth, and to whom you had gone on seeing me deficient in everything.

Mandapala said :—

26. As regards woman, there is nothing that destroys their happiness more in this or the next world than a co-wife and a clandestine lover.

27—28. They inflame the fire of hostility and cause great anxiety. Even the auspiciously blessed and well-behaved Arundhuti, ever renowned among all creatures felt jealousy against the illustrious and pure minded Vashistha, ever devoted to the greatly good of his wife.

29. She insulted even that Rishi, one of the seven (great Rishis,—the mind-born sons of Bramha). On account of her that insulting thought, she has become a little star and looks like fire covered with smoke, sometimes visible and sometimes invisible, as if she is an evil omen.

30. I had connection with you for offspring. I have never wronged you as did not the Rishi (Vashistha) of old, but you have become jealous as Arundhuti (once was).

31. Men should never trust women, even if they be wedded wives. When women become mothers, they do not much care to serve their husbands.

Vaishampayana said :—

32. Thereupon all his sons came to worship him. And he too giving them all assurance spoke kindly towards them

Thus ends the two hundred and thirty fifth chapter, the history of Sarangakas, in the Khandavadaha of the Adi Parva.

CHAPTER CCXXXVI.

(KHANDAVADAH A PRVA)—Contd.

Mandapala said :—

1. I spoke to Agni about your safety; the illustrious deity also promised me that he would do what I wished.

2. On account of those words of Agni, and also knowing the virtuous character of your mother and the great effulgence that are in you, I did not come here earlier.

3. O sons, therefore do not allow anger to enter your hearts. You are all Rishis, learned in the Vedas. Agni knows you full well.

Vaishampayana said :—

4. Having thus assuring his sons, the Brahmana Mandapala took with him his wife and children; and leaving that region, he went away to some other country.

5. Having grown in strength, the illustrious deity of fearful rays also consumed the Khandava with the assistance of the two Krishnas for the good of the world.

6. Having drunk many rivers of fat and marrow, Agni became highly gratified; and he then appeared before Aryuna.

7. Then Purandara (Indra), surrounded by the Marutas, came down from the sky and thus spoke to Partha and Keshava.

8. "You have achieved a feat that even a celestial can never do. Ask each of you a boon that is not obtainable by man. I am very much pleased with you."

9. Partha asked Indra to bestow upon him all his weapons. Thereupon the greatly effulgent Sakra (Indra) fixed the time to bestow them (on Aryuna). He then said,

10. "O son of Pandu, when the illustrious Mahadeva (Siva) will be pleased with you, I shall then give you all my weapons.

11. O Kuru prince, O Dhananjaya, I shall know when that time will come. I will bestow upon you for your severe asceticism all my fire and wind-weapons; you will accept them all from me."

12. Vasudeva (Krishna) asked that his friendship with Aryuna might last for ever.

The chief of the celestials (Indra) granted to the intelligent Krishna the boon he asked.

13. Having granted these boons to those (heroes), and having spoken to Agni, the lord of the Marutas, accompanied by the celestials, went away to heaven.

14. Agni also, having burnt that forest with all its creatures, animals and birds (continually) for fifteen days, became gratified; and he then extinguished himself.

15. Having eaten flesh in plentiful quantities and drank fat and blood (to his heart's content), he became highly gratified; he then thus (spoke to Aryuna and Achyuta (Krishna),

16. "I have been gratified by you two best of men. O heroes, you shall be able to go at my command wherever you like."

17—18. Having been thus addressed by the illustrious Agni, Aryuna and Vasudeva (Krishna),—and the Danava Moya also,—then roamed there for sometime. They then all sat down on the charming banks of a river.

Thus ends the two hundred and thirty sixth chapter,—the end of Khandavadaha—in the Adi Parva.

SABHA PARVA.

CHAPTER I.

(SABHAKRYA PARVA.)

Having saluted the Supreme Deity (Narayana) and the highest of all male beings (Nara), and also the Goddess of Learning (Saraswati), let us cry "success"!

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon again and again worshipping Partha before Vasudeva, Moya spoke to him with joined hands and in sweet words.

Moya said :—

2. O son of Kunti, I have been saved by you from this angry Krishna and this Pavaka (fire) who was desirous of consuming me. Tell me what I shall do for you.

Aryuna said :—

3. O great Asura, every thing has been done by you. Be blessed. Go (wherever you like). Be always well-disposed towards me as we are well-disposed towards you.

Moya said :—

4. O lord, O best of men, what you have said fully deserves you. O descendant of Bharata, I gladly desire to do something (for you).

5. I am a great artist,—(in fact I am) the Vishwakarma of the Danavas. Therefore, O son of Pandu, I desire to do something for you.

Aryuna said :—

6. O sinless one, you consider that your life has been saved by me from instant death. Such being the case, I cannot make you do anything for me.

7. O Danava, I am not willing to frustrate your intention also. Do something for Krishna; that will be sufficient requital for my services to you.

Vaishampayana said :—

8. O best of the Bharata race, thus requested by Moya, Vasudeva (Krishna) reflected for a moment thus, "What should be done for me?"

9. Thereupon the lord of the universe, the creator of things, Krishna, having reflected (for a moment), thus commanded Moya.

Krishna said :—

10. O best of artists, O son of Diti, if you desire to do some good to me, build a large assembly-hall for Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira),—a hall to your own liking.

11. Build such an assembly-hall that persons belonging to this world may not be able to build another like it, though he sits within it and observes it carefully.

12. O Moya, build an assembly-hall in which we may see all the celestial, Asura, and human designs of artitecture.

Vaishampayana said :—

13. Having heard these words, Moya became exceedingly glad. He drew up a design of an auspicious palace for the Pandavas.

14. Then Krishna and Partha, having told every thing to Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, introduced Moya to him.

15. O descendant of Bharata, Yudhisthira received him with all the honour he deserved; and Moya accepted them showing all respects (to Yudhisthira).

16. O king, O descendant of Bharata, then that son of Diti (Moya) narrated before the sons of Pandu the old history of (Vrishaparva).

17. After resting for some time, that Vishwakarma (Moya) commenced after much reflection to build an assembly-hall for the illustrious Pandavas.

18. According to the wishes of the illustrious sons of Pritha (the Pandavas) and of Krishna, the greatly energetic (Moya) performed on an auspicious day initiatory rites of propitiation.

19. That greatly powerful (Danava) gratified thousands of excellent Brahmanas with Payasa (sweetened milk and rice) and with presents of various kinds of wealth.

20. He then measured out a piece of land five thousand cubits square; it was well-suited to the exigencies of every season, it was celestial-like and it was delightful.

Thus ends the first chapter, the choice of land for the assembly-hall in the Sabhakrya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER II.

(SABHAKRYA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Janardana, (Krishna) who deserved the worship of all, lived for sometime at Khandavaprastha, worshipped with love and affection by the sons of Pritha.

2—3. The receiver of the worship of all the world, the possessor of large eyes, Keshava (Krishna) being desirous of seeing his father, made up his mind to go to (Dwarka). He saluted both Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) and Pritha and bowed down to his aunt with his head touching her feet. She smelt his head and embraced him.

4—5. The greatly illustrious Hrishiksha Krishna, coming with affection and with tears in his eyes to the sweet-speeched and amiable Subhadra, his sister, spoke to her words of best import and truth,—words that were terse, proper and full of good.

6. She too saluted him in return and worshipped him with bowing down her head. She then told him all that she desired to be told to her relatives.

7. Bidding her farewell and uttering blessings on that beautiful lady, the hero of the Vrishni race Janardana (Krishna) then saw Krishna (Draupadi) and Dhananjaya.

8. That best of men (Krishna) then duly worshipped Dhananjaya; then consoling Draupadi he obtained her leave.

9. The learned and heroic (Krishna) then went with Partha (Aryuna) to his (other) cousins (the Pandavas). Surrounded by the five brothers Krishna looked like Sakra (Indra) surrounded by the celestials.

10. Being desirous of performing the due rites of departure, the Garuda-bannered hero (Krishna), purified himself by a bath and adorned himself with ornaments.

11. The best of the Yadu race, (Krishna) then worshipped the celestials and the Brahmanas with garlands, with Mantras, with various kinds of excellent perfumes and with bowing down his head.

12. Having performed all (those) ceremonies, that foremost of all virtuous men, that best of the Yadu race (Krishna), wishing to start, came out to the outer apartments.

13. By presenting vessels of curd, fruits and fried rice, he made the Brahmanas utter blessings on him. Presenting them wealth, he walked round them.

14—15. Ascending on his golden and Garuda-bannered swift chariot, to which was yoked Saibya and Sugriva (his two horses) and taking also his mace, discus, sword, his bow Saranga and other auspicious weapons, the lotus-eyed hero (Krishna) started on an excellent moment of a lunar day in an auspicious constellation.

16—18. The king of the Kurus, Yudhisthira, ascended the chariot after him (Krishna), and out of love for him he made that best of charioteers (Daruka) to stand aside, and himself took the reins. The long-armed Aryuna walked round him (Krishna) and he then got on the car and waved a golden-handled Chamara over him.

19. The heroic Bhimasena with the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), the Ritwikas and the citizens walked behind Krishna. That slayer of hostile heroes, Keshava (Krishna), thus followed by all the brothers,

20. Shone like a preceptor followed by his beloved pupils. After bidding farewell to Partha (Aryuna) Govinda (Krishna) embraced him firmly (with all the ardour of love).

21. He then worshipped Yudhisthira and also Bhimasena and he embraced the twins. Being embraced in return (by the sons of Pritha) and worshipped by the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva),

22. O Descendant of Bharata, that vanquisher of hostile cities, Krishna, bade Yudhisthira farewell and requested him to return, when he had gone about half a Yojana.

23. Govinda (Krishna) learned in all the precepts of virtue, then worshipped Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) and touched his feet. He (Yudhisthira) raised Keshava up and smelt his head.

24. The Pandava Dharmaraja Yudhisthira then gave permission to the best of the Yadava race, the lotus-eyed Krishna to go by saying "Go."

25. After duly making an appointment (for again coming to Indraprastha) and after preventing the Pandavas with great deal of difficulty from following him the slayer of Madhu (Krishna),

26—27. Went to his own city with a cheerful heart like Sakra (Indra) towards Amaravati (the celestial city). Out of love for him, they (the Pandavas) gazed at him so long he was within the sight ; and when he went out of sight, their minds followed him, but they were not satiated with seeing Keshava (Krishna).

28—29. The handsome hero (Krishna) soon disappeared from their view. The sons of Pritha, those best of men with their minds fixed on Govinda (Krishna) desisted (from following him) ; and they then soon returned to their own city, although they were not (at all) willing (to return). Riding on his car Krishna also soon started for Dwarka.

30. Followed by the hero, Satyaki, the son of Devaki, Sauri (Krishna) with his charioteer Daruka reached Dwarka with the speed of Garuda.

31. The king Dharmaraja of unfading glory and his brothers, surrounded by their friends and relatives, entered the excellent city (Indraprastha).

32. That virtuous king, that best of men (Yudhisthira) then sent away all his friends and relatives, his brothers and sons ; he then amused himself with Draupadi.

33. Keshava also, having been welcomed by the chief Yadus with Ugrasena at their head, entered the excellent city (Dwarka) with joy.

34. Worshipping his old father and his illustrious mother, and saluting Valadeva (his brother) also, the lotus-eyed (hero) took his seat.

35. He embraced Pradyumna, Samba, Nisatha, Charudeshna, Gada, Aniruddha and Bhanu. Receiving leave of the elderly men, Janardana then went to the house of Rukmini (his wife).

Thus ends the second chapter, the departure of Srikrishna to Dwarka, in the Sabhakrya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER III.

(SABHAKRYA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Then Moya spoke thus to the son of Pritha, Aryuna, the foremost of all victorious warriors, "I shall now go away with your permission, but I shall soon come back.

2—3. When the Danavas were engaged in a sacrifice on the banks of the Vindu lake, in the north of the Kailasha near the Mainaka mountains I gathered a charming and variegated Vanda (mass of rough stones) of jewels and gems. I kept it in the house of Vrishaparva.

4—5. O descendant of Bharata, if it still exists there, I shall come back with it. I shall then build a renowned, delightful and beautiful assembly-hall for the Pandavas, which will be adorned with all gems and jewels. O descendant of Kuru, there is also a club in the Vindu lake,

6. Kept there by the king (of the Danavas) who killed with it all his foes in battle. It is hard and strong and variegated with golden knobs,—it is capable of standing great weight.

7. It can kill all foes, and it is equal in strength to one hundred thousand clubs. It is a fit weapon for Bhima as the Gandiva (bow) is yours.

8. (There is also in that lake) a large conch-shell of loud sound, named Devadatta which was produced by Varuna (Ocean). There is no doubt I shall give all these to you."

9. Having said this to Partha, that Asura (Moya) went away in a north-eastern direction. On the north of the Kailasha near the Mainaka mountains.

10. There is a great peak full of many gems and jewels, called Hiranya Sringa. (There is) a charming lake named Vindusara where (once dwelt) king Bhagiratha.

11. He lived there for a long period with the desire of seeing the Ganges, which is called Bhagirathi (after him). Here the illustrious lord of all creatures,

12—13. O best of the Bharata race, performed one hundred great sacrifices. There were placed at this spot for beauty, many sacrificial stakes made of gems,—and many sacrificial altars made of gold though not according to the ordinance. Here after performing those sacrifices the deity of one thousand eyes, the husband of Sachi, acquired Siddhi (final success).

14. Here the greatly effulgent lord of spirits (Siva), the eternal lord of all creatures lived after creating all the worlds and here he was worshipped by all the spirits.

15. Here Nara and Narayana, Brahma, Yama, and the fifth Sthanu performed sacrifices after the expiration of one thousand Yugas.

16. Here for the establishment of virtue and religion Vasudeva with pious devotion performed his sacrifices which extended for many long years.

17. Where Keshava placed thousands and tens of thousands of sacrificial stakes adorned with garlands of gold and innumerable (sacrificial) altars of great splendour.

18. O descendant of Bharata, going there he (Moya) brought the club, the conchshell and the various articles of crystal which belonged to Vrishaparva, (the Danava king).

19. Going there the great Asura, Moya, took all that great wealth which was guarded by the Fakshas and Rakshas and Kinkaras.

20. Bringing them away, that Asura (Moya) built with them a matchless assembly-hall. It was celebrated throughout the three worlds, it was beautiful, it was celestial, and it was full of gems and jewels.

21. He gave to Bhimasena that best of clubs (that was in the lake) he also gave to Aryuna that excellent and the best conch.

22—24. The sound of that conch used to make all creatures tremble in fear. O great king, the assembly-hall that Moya built, stood on golden pillars, and it occupied an area of five thousand cubits square, possessing a most beautiful form. It (the hall) shone in great splendour like the fire, the sun or the moon. By its great effulgence it seemed to darken even the rays of the sun.

25—26. With its effulgence which was the mixture of both celestial and terrestrial light, it appeared as if it was on fire. Like a mass of new clouds rising in the sky, it filled the whole of the view. It was spacious, large, charming, soothing, full of celestial effulgence, and filled with all sorts of excellent things,—it was adorned with jeweled walls and gates,—with many pictures and much wealth. It appeared like the work of Vishwakarma himself.

27. The Sudharma (the assembly-hall) of the Dasarhas (Vrishnis)—nay even the abode of Brahma was not so grand and endued with so much beauty as this assembly-hall built by the intelligent Moya.

28. Being appointed by Moya, eight thousand Rakshashas, named Kinkaras, guarded and supported this assembly-hall.

29. They were capable of ranging the sky, they were fearful, huge-bodied, and greatly strong; they had blood-like red and coppery eyes, and arrowy-ears, they were all well-armed.

30—31. In that assembly-hall Moya built a matchless tank, and in that tank were lilies with leaves made of dark-coloured gems and with stalks made of brilliant gems; there were also other aquatic flowers of golden leaves. Various kinds of water-fowls played in its waters; it was adorned with full-blossomed lotuses; its water was transparent; and golden-coloured tortoises and fishes played in its bottom which was without mud. A flight of crystal steps rose from the edge of the water to the banks.

32. The gentle breeze shook the flowers that studded its waters; its banks were adorned with costly marble slabs set with pearls.

33. Seeing that tank thus adorned with jewels and precious stones, many kings that came there mistook it for land, and they fell into it with their eyes open.

34. The assembly-hall was adorned with many charming, large and ever blossoming trees, with green foliage and cool-shade,

35—36. And with many gardens, emitting a delicious fragrance. There were many tanks adorned with swans, Karandavas and Chakravakas. The breezes carried the fragrance of lotuses that grew in the waters and flowers that grew in the land and ministered to the pleasures of the Pandavas.

37. O king, having built such an assembly-hall in fourteen months, Moya informed Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) that it had been completed.

Thus ends the third chapter, the construction of the assembly-hall, in the Sabhakrya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER IV.

(SABHAKRYA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2.—Having fed thousands of Brahmanas with sweetened milk mixed with rice, honey and Ghee, with fruits and roots and with the meat of boar and deer, the ruler of men king Yudhisthira entered into it (the palace). With food seasoned with seasamum, with Febanti (a sort of vegetable), with rice mixed with Ghee,

3—4. With the various preparations of meat, with various kinds of other food, with various suckable and drinkable viands, with unused robes and clothes, and with excellent garlands, the king gratified the superior Brahmanas that had assembled there from various directions.

5. He also gave them each one thousand kine. O descendant of Bharata, their cry of "What an auspicious day!" rose to the sky.

6. Having worshipped the gods with various kinds of music and with numerous sorts of costly perfumes, that best of the Kurus (Yudhisthira) entered (the hall).

7. The athletes, actors, prize-fighters, bards and praise-singers exhibited their skill to amuse the illustrious son of Dharma (Yudhisthira.)

8. Having thus performed many ceremonies, the Pandava (Yudhisthira) with his brothers sported in that charming assembly-hall as Sakra (Indra) in heaven.

9. On the seats in that assembly-hall sat with the Pandavas the Rishis and the kings that came from various countries.

10—18. Asita, Devala, Satya, Sarpamali, Mahasira, Arvavasa, Sumitra, Maitreya, Sunaka, Vali, Vaka, Dalvya, Sthulasira, Krishna Dwaipayana, Suka, Sumanta, Jaimuni, Paila, the pupils of Vyasa, namely ourselves, Tittiri, Yajnavalka, Lomaharsana with his son, Apsahmya, Dhaumya, Animandavya, Kausika, Damoshnisha, Traivali, Parnada, Varajanuka, Maunjoyana, Vayubhaksha, Parasarya, Sarika, Valivaka, Silivaka, Satyapala, Kritasrama, Jatukarna, Sikhivam, Alamva, Parijataka, the high-souled Parvata, the great Rishi Markendeya, Pavitrapani, Savarna, Bhaluki, Galava, Jangabandu, Raibhya, Kopavega, Bhrigu, Harivabhru, Kaundinya, Vabhrumali, Sonatona, Kakshivana, Aushija, Nachiketa, Goutama, Painga, Baraha, greatly ascetic Sandilya, Kukura, Venujangha, Kalapa and Katha, —all were Rishis of great virtue and learning, with their souls under complete control and passions under complete subjugation.

19—20. These and many others, as numerous as the above, all learned in the Vedas and the Vedangas, conversant with all moralities,—all pure and spotless in conduct,—waited upon the illustrious (king) and pleased him with their sacred discourses. Many chief Kshatryas also waited upon Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira).

21—23. The fortunate and virtuous Manjaketu, Bivardhana, Sangramjit, Durmukha, the powerful Ugrasena, Kakshasena, the lord of the Earth, the invincible Kshemaka, the king of Kamvoja, Kamatha, the mighty Kampana who made the Javanas tremble at his name as the wielder of thunder Indra made the Asuras Kalkeyas tremble at his name.

24—31. Jatasura, the king of the Madrakas, Kunti, the king of the Kiratas, Pulunda, the kings of Anga and Banga, Pundraka and Pandrya, the king of Udhara and Andhaka, Samitra, the slayer of foes Saivya, the king of the Kiratas, Sumana, the king of the Yavanas Chanur, Devarata, Bhoja, Bhimaratha, the king of Kalinga, Srutayudha, the king of Magadha, Yoysena, Sukarman, Chekitana, that slayer of foes Puru, Ketumana, Vasudana, Vaideha, Kritakshana, Sudharma, Aniruddha, the greatly strong Srutayu, the invincible Anuparaja, the handsome Kramajin, Sisupala with his son, the king of Karusha, the invincible and celestial-like young heroes of the Vrishni race,—namely Ahuka, Viprithu, Gada, Sarana, Akrura, Kritavarman, the son of Sini, Satyaka, Bhisimaka, Ankriti, the powerful Dyumtsena, those chiefs of bowmen, the Kaikeyas and Yajnasena of the Somaka race.

32—34. These greatly powerful and all well-armed and wealthy, Ketuman and Vasumana and many other Kshatryas, as numerous as the above,—and all considered to be the foremost (men amongst the Kshatryas) waited on that assembly-hall upon the son of Kunti Yudhisthira. O king, those powerful princes that learnt science of arms from Aryuna, dressing themselves in deer skins, and those princes of the Vrishni race,

35. Namely, the son of Rukmini (Pradyumna), Samba, Yuyudhana, the son of Satyaka (Satyaki), Sudharmana, Anirudha, Saibya, these foremost of men (all waited upon Yudhisthira).

36—40. O lord of the earth, these and many other kings, (waited upon Yudhisthira) the friend of Dhananjaya (Aryuna) Tamvaru, Chitrasena with his ministers, and many other Gandharvas and Apsaras, all well-skilled in singing and playing music, and expert in cadence, and also the Kinnaras, well-skilled in measures and motions, all at the command of Tamvaru waited upon and amused the sons of Pandu and so did also the Rishis (that were present there) by singing celestial songs in proper and charming voices. Those best of men, those men of rigid vows, those men with heart devoted to truth all waited upon Yudhisthira, as the celestials wait upon Brahma in heaven.

Thus ends the fourth chapter, the entry to the assembly-hall, in the Sabhakrya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER V.

(LOKAPALA SABHAKHYANA PARVA.)

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O descendant of Bharata, when the illustrious Pandavas were seated in it (the assembly-hall) with the chief Gandharvas, there came Narada,

2. The celestial Rishi who was learned in the Vedas and the Upanishadas, who was worshipped by the celestials, who was learned in the histories and the Puranas, who was well-versed in all that had happened in old Kalpas,

3. Who was well-skilled in Naya, and in the truths of moral science, who was the possessor of the complete knowledge of the Angas, and a perfect master of reconciling contradictory texts,

4. Who was eloquent, resolute, intelligent, learned, possessor of powerful memory, learned in the science of morality and politics, proficient in distinguishing inferior things from the superior,

5. Skilled in drawing inferences from evidence, competent to judge of correctness or incorrectness of syllogistic statements consisting of five propositions, capable of answering successfully (the queries) of Vrihaspati,

6. Who was a man with definite conclusions properly framed about Dharma, Artha, Kama and Moksha (salvation), who was a man with a great soul seeing the universe above, below, and around as if it were present before his eyes, who was a master of Sankhya and Yoga (Philosophies), and who was ever desirous of humbling the Devas and the Asuras by fomenting quarrels amongst them,

7. Who was learned in the science of war and treaty, proficient in making dispositions of things by guesses, the teacher of six sciences (of treaty, war, march, defending military posts, stratagem by ambuscade &c) and learned in all the Shastras.

8—9. Who was fond of war and music, and incapable of being repulsed by any science or learning. Possessed of these and many other accomplishments, the greatly effulgent Rishi Narada with many other Rishis, after having travelled over all the world, came (at last) to the assembly-hall.

10. O king, the celestial Rishi of immeasurable effulgence was accompanied by Panjata, the intelligent Raivata, Saumya and Sumukha.

11. The Rishi who moved about with the speed of mind was filled with joy on seeing the assembly-hall of the Pandavas. The Brahmana (Narada) wishing him victory uttered blessings on Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira).

12. Seeing the Rishi Narada arrived (in the assembly-hall), that best of the Pandavas (Yudhisthira) learned in all religious precepts, soon stood up with his brothers.

13. Bowing low with humility, he saluted him with joy, and hither offered him with due ceremonies, a befitting seat.

14. The virtuous (king) offered him kine, Arghya and Madhuparka (a preparation of honey). He worshipped him with gems and jewels and with his whole heart.

15. He (Narada) was gratified by receiving the worship from Yudhisthira in proper form. Having been thus worshipped by all the Pandavas, the great Rishi, learned in the Vedas, spoke to Yudhisthira the following words on Dharma, Artha and Kama.

Narada said:—

16. Is the wealth you are earning spent in proper objects? Does your mind take pleasure in virtue? Are you enjoying the pleasures of life? Does not your mind sink under their weight?

17. O chief of men, do you continue in the noble conduct consistent with Dharma and Artha with respect to the three classes (good, bad and indifferent) of your subjects as practised by your ancestors?

18. Do you injure religion (Dharma) for the sake of profit (Artha), or profit for the sake of religion, or both religion and profit for the sake of pleasure which easily tempts men?

19. O foremost of pious men, O (king) learned in the timeliness (of everything), do you dividing your time judiciously follow religion, profit and pleasure?

20. O sinless one, do you attend with the six attributes of kings, to the seven means? Do you examine after surveying your own strength and weakness and the fourteen possessions (of your enemies)?

21. O foremost of pious men, O descendant of Bharata, do you attend to the eight occupations, having surveyed your own and your enemy's means and also having made peace (with your enemies)?

22. O best of the Bharata race, have your seven chief officers of state been tempted by your enemies? Have they become idle for the wealth they have earned? Are they all attached to you?

23. Your counsels are not surely divulged by your trusted and disguised spies, or by yourself or by your ministers.

24. Do you ascertain what your friends, your enemies and the ascetics are doing? Do you make war and peace at the proper time?

25—26. Do you observe neutrality towards the ascetics and towards those that show neutrality towards you? O hero, have you appointed as your ministers men like yourself, men who are old and pious, who are capable of understanding what should be done and what should not be done, who are nobly born and who are attached to you? O descendant of Bharata, the ministers are the basis of the victories of kings.

27. O child, is your kingdom protected by ministers, learned in the Shastras, men who are keeping all counsels secret? The enemies are surely not destroying it (the kingdom).

28. You have not (surely) become a slave to sleep. Do you get up from sleep at the proper time? O king learned in (the mysteries of) Artha, do you think at the dead of night what you should do and what you should not do?

29. You do not surely settle any thing alone or take advice of many. Counsels received from the ministers surely do not spread all over your kingdom.

30. Do you without procrastination accomplish measure of great utility that can be easily accomplished? Such measures are surely never obstructed (in your kingdom).

31. Do the ends of all works come to your sight? Are they all fearlessly examined? Once commencing any work are they given up and begun again? Do they fall into confusion at the commencement?

32—33. O king, do you accomplish your works by men that are trusted and incorruptible and that possess of practical experience? O hero, people surely know only the measures that have been accomplished or partially accomplished, and surely they can not know those that are merely in contemplation. Have you appointed teachers, learned in all the Shastras and religious precepts, for the princes and for the chief warriors?

34. Do you purchase one single learned man in exchange of one thousand ignorant men? The learned man confers the greatest good at the time of distress.

35. Are all your forts always kept filled with treasure, food, weapons, water, engines, and instruments, and are they protected by artizans and bowmen?

36. Even one single minister who is intelligent, heroic, self-controlled, and discriminating confers the greatest good on a king or on a king's son.

37. Do you ascertain by means of three and three spies who are all unaccounted with one another everything about the eighteen Tirthas of the enemy and fifteen of your own means?

38. O slayer of foes, do you watch your enemies with all possible care and attention and do you accomplish this unknown to them?

39—41. Does your honoured priest possess humility and purity of blood? Is he without jealousy and illiberality? Is he renowned? Has some well-behaved, intelligent and simple Brahmana learned in the ordinances been employed by you to perform your daily rites before the sacred fire? Does he always remind you in proper time as to when your

Homa (sacrifice) has been performed and when it should be performed (again)? Is the astrologer you have employed competent in reading physiognomy and interpreting omens and in neutralising the disturbances of Nature?

42. Have you appointed respectable servants in respectable posts, indifferent ones in indifferent posts and low ones in low posts?

43. Have you appointed in high posts ministers who are guileless and well-conducted from generations to generations, and who are above the common people?

44. O best of the Bharata race, your subjects are not (sorely) oppressed by your severe rule. Do your ministers govern your kingdom always receiving all orders from you?

45. Do they ever slight you as the sacrificial priests slight men that are fallen (from religious path), or as wives slight their husbands who are proud and who are debauchees?

46. Is your commander-in-chief brave, intelligent, patient, well-conducted, nobly born, competent, devoted to you and a man of confidence?

47. Do you treat with respect and regard the chiefs (generals) of your army, who are experts in every kind of war-fare, who are pushing, who are well-behaved and endued with great prowess?

48. Do you give to your soldiers their proper rations and pay at (the appointed) time? Surely you do not oppress them by withholding from them (their rations and pay).

49. Are you aware that the misery caused by the arrears of pay and the irregularity of the issue of rations create mutiny amongst the soldiers? The learned men call it the greatest of all mischiefs.

50. Are all the chief men (of your kingdom) nobly born? Are they all attached to you? Are they ready to give their lives cheerfully for you on the field of battle?

51. Surely (in your kingdom) a man who is beyond all control does not out of desire rule at pleasure over things pertaining military affairs.

52. Does a man who shows exceptional merit in an act get from you more regard, and also an increase of rations and pay?

53. Surely you reward by bestowing wealth and proper honours on men of learning and humility, and men who are skilled in every kind of knowledge.

54. O best of the Bharata race, do you support the wives and children of those that have given their lives for you, and those that have fallen into distress for you?

55. O son of Pritha, do you cherish as your sons the enemy who having been vanquished in battle, comes to you from fear, who has become weak and who has sought your protection?

56. O lord of earth, do the people of all the world consider you an embodiment of impartiality? Can they come to you fearlessly as if you are their mother and father?

57. O best of the Bharata race, do you reflecting well upon the three kinds of forces, (at once) march against your enemy when you hear that he is in distress?

58—59. O chastiser of foes, when the (proper) time comes, taking into your consideration all the omens you might see and having been convinced that the resolutions you have formed and their unsuccesses depend on the twelve Mandalas and having paid your troops their pays do you begin your march? O great king, O chastiser of foes, do you give gems and jewels to the chief officers of the enemy as they (each of them) deserve without the knowledge of the enemy?

60. O son of Pritha, do you try to conquer your angry enemies who are slaves to their passions? Do you do it by conquering your own soul and getting mastery over your own passions?

61. Before you march against your enemy do you properly employ the four arts of conciliation, gift of wealth, production of disunion and the application of strength?

62. O king, do you march against your enemy, after first strengthening your own kingdom? Having marched against them, do you try your best to obtain victory over them? Having conquered them with your might do (afterwards) you protect them?

63. Are your Chamus consisting of four kinds of troops, each furnished with eight limbs (wings) after having been well-trained by superior officers led out against your enemy?

64. O chastiser of foes, O great king, in having to the kingdom of your enemy you surely do not kill your enemies without regarding seasons of reaping or famine (raging).

65. Do the various servants in your own kingdom and those of your enemies continue to carry on their respective duties? Do they continue to protect one another?

66. O great king, you have surely appointed trusted servants to look after the food you eat, the robes you wear and the perfume you use.

67—68. O king, are your treasury, barns, stables, arsenals, and female apartments well-guarded by servants who are ever devoted to you and who always seek your welfare? You no doubt first protect yourself from your domestic and public servants; and you then protect those servants from your relatives and last of all you no doubt protect all of them from one another.

69. Can any body know in the forenoon any of your extravagance in drink, in sports (gambling) and in women?

70—71. Is your expense always covered by a half, a third or fourth part of your income? Do you always cherish with food and wealth your relatives, superiors, merchants, the old, the helpless, the protected and the distressed?

72. Do your accountants and clerks employ in looking after your income and expenditure always inform you in the forenoon all about your income and expenditure?

73. You surely do not dismiss without fault servants who are able in work, who are popular and who are always devoted to your welfare.

74. O descendant of Bharata, do you appoint after duly examining them (all the three classes of men, namely)—the good, indifferent and the bad in posts to which they are respectively fit to be appointed?

75. O king, do you appoint men who are thievish, who are open to temptation, who are under age?

76. Do you oppress (the people of) your kingdom by the help of thievish men or by men who are open to temptation or by minors or by women? Are the peasants of your kingdom contented?

77. Are large tanks dug in your kingdom at proper distances, for which agriculture is not in your realm entirely dependent on rains?

78. Are the agriculturists in your kingdom in want of food or seed? Do you kindly advance them loan (of seed grain) taken only a fourth part over every hundred (seer, maund &)?

79. O child, do the four kinds of Barta (agriculture, trade, cattle rearing and lending in interest) are carried on (in your kingdom) by honest men? O child, upon these depend the happiness of your subjects.

80. O king, do the five wise and brave men employed in the five chief ports,—(namely that of protecting the city, fort, the merchant and the agriculturists and of punishing the criminals) always do good to your kingdom by working in unison?

81. Have the villages been made (by you) like towns and the outskirts of towns like villages for the protection of your city? Are they all under your supervision and sway?

82. Are the thieves and the robbers that steal in your city and loot your towns pursued by your soldiers over even and uneven grounds?

83. Do you console and protect the women? You surely do not place any confidence on them, or divulge any secret before any of them?

84. O king, hearing of any danger, and even reflecting over it, do you lie in the inner-apartments and enjoy luxury there?

85—86. O king, O son of Pandu, having slept during the second and the third divisions of the night, do you reflect over Dharma and Artha (in the last division of the night)? Do you accompanied by your ministers, learned in the mystery of Time, show yourself well-adorned to your people after waking at the proper time?

87. O chastiser of foes, do men attired in purple clothes, armed with swords and adorned with ornaments, stand by you to protect your person?

88. O king, do you conduct yourself like Yama (the God of justice) in meting out proper punishments to those that deserve it, and also proper worship to those that deserve it? Do you do this equally to those that are dear to you and to those that you do not like?

89. O son of Pritha, do you take care of your bodily ailments by taking medicines and also taking recourse to fasts and regularity of diet, and of your mental illness, by taking advice of the old men?

90. The physicians that have been appointed by you to look after your health are surely learned in the eight divisions (of the science of treatment)? They are surely all attached to you and devoted to you?

91. O king, out of covetousness, or folly or pride you surely never fail to decide the case between the plaintiff and the defendant who come to you?

92. Do you, out of covetousness or folly, deprive of the pensions of the men that have come to you for protection out of trustfulness or love?

93. Do the citizens and the people of your kingdom, being bought by your enemies (with bribe), try to create a quarrel with you by forming into an united party?

94. Are your enemies,—especially those that are weak,—always repressed by you with the help of your troops? Are those that are strong repressed with the help of good counsel or with the help of both good counsel and troops?

95. Are all your principal (tributary chiefs) rulers of land attached to you? Are they ready to give their lives for you, if they are commanded by you?

96. Do you worship Brahmanas and wise men according to their respective merits as regards their knowledge in all the branches of learning? Such worship is undoubtedly beneficial to you.

97. Have you your faith in the religion based on the three (Vedas) and followed by men who have gone before you? Do you with care follow the practices practised by them?

98. Are the accomplished Brahmanas entertained in your presence with delicious and nutritive food in your house? Do they get (proper) Dakshinas after the feast?

99. With steadiness of mind and with complete self-possession, do you try to perform Vajpaya, Pundarika and other sacrifices with all necessary rites?

100. Do you bow your head to your relatives and to your superiors, to the gods, to the ascetics, to old men, to the large trees that are so beneficial (to men), and to the Brahmanas?

101. O sinless one, you do not surely inspire anger or create grief in another person? Do men that are capable of granting you auspicious fruits always stand at your side?

102. O sinless one, are your disposition and practice such as I have described, and such as always lengthen the period of life, spread fame and help the cause of Dharma, Artha and Kama?

103. He who conducts himself thus never finds his kingdom distressed or afflicted. Such a king subjugates the whole earth and enjoys great happiness.

104—105. O best of men, no well-beloved, pure-souled and respected person is surely deceived and his life is not taken in a false charge of theft by your ministers, who are ignorant of Shastras and who are covetous? Your ministers do surely never, out of covetousness, allow a real thief to escape, knowing him to be such and after arresting him with the booty on him?

106. O descendant of Bharata, your ministers being bribed do never decide wrongly the disputes that arise between the poor and the rich?

107—110. Do you keep yourself aloof from the fourteen vices of kings, namely,—atheism, untruthfulness, anger, carelessness, procrastination, non-visiting the wise, idleness, restlessness of mind, taking counsel with one man only, consultation with persons ignorant of the science of Artha, abandonment of a settled plan, divulgence of counsels, unaccomplishment of beneficial projects and undertaking everything without reflection? O king, even those kings that are firmly seated on their thrones are ruined by these (vices).

110. Has your study of the Vedas been successful? Have your wealth, the knowledge of Shastras and marriage been successful?

Yudhisthira said :—

111. O Rishi, how do the study of the Vedas, wealth, wife and the knowledge of Shastras become successful?

Narada said :—

112. The study of the Vedas is successful when he who studies it performs Agnihotra sacrifice. Wealth is successful when the possessor of wealth enjoys it himself and gives it away in charity. Marriage is successful when the wife is enjoyed and when she bears offspring. The knowledge of the Shastras is successful when it results in humility and good conduct.

Vaishampayana said :—

113. Having told this the greatly ascetic Rishi Narada then again asked the virtuous-minded Yudhisthira.

Narada said :—

114—115. O king, do your officers who are paid from the taxes to be realised from merchandise, take only their just dues from the merchants that come from distant places (to your kingdom) with the desire of gain? Are the merchants and traders well-treated in your capital and kingdom? Are they capable of bringing their goods without being any way deceived?

116. O child, do you daily listen to the words fraught with Dharma and Artha, the words of old men learned in the science of Artha and capable of pointing out the ways of (both) Dharma and Artha?

117. Are Ghee and honey presented to Brahmanas for the increase of crops, kine, fruits, flowers and virtue?

118. Do you always give to the artizans employed in your works all the materials that are required for their construction and also their wages at periods (at least) not extending more than four months?

119. O great king, do you examine the works done for you? Do you praise before good men those that are employed by you? Do you reward them after showing towards them due respect?

120. O best of the Bharata race, O lord, do you follow all the Sutras (aphorisms) of the sages,—especially those in respect of elephants, horses and chariots.

121. O best of the Bharata race, are the Sutras regarding the science of arms and also those regarding instruments so necessary (for attacking) fortified towns, carefully studied in your house?

122. O sinless one, are you acquainted with all weapons, all mysterious incantations and with all the secrets of poison destructive of all enemies?

123. Do you protect your kingdom from the fear of fire, snakes, other carnivorous animals, diseases and Rakshashas?

124. O (hero), learned in all virtuous precepts, do you cherish like a father the blind, the dumb, the lame, the deformed, the friendless, and also the homeless ascetics?

125. O great king, have you banished from you the six evils (to which human flesh is heir to), namely sleep, fear, anger, weakness of mind and procrastination?

Vaishampayana said :—

126. Having heard these words of that best of Brahmanas, the celestial-like Narada and having been pleased with what he heard, the best of the Kuru race, the high-souled king (Yudhisthira) bowed down to him and worshipped his feet.

Yudhisthira said :—

127. I shall do what you have said. My knowledge has increased by your instructions.

Vaishampayana said :—

Having said this, the king did as he was directed and gained (the sovereignty of) the earth bounded by the belt of sea.

Narada said :—

128. The king who is ever engaged in the protection of the four orders (the four chief casts) passes his days in happiness in this world and attains the region of Ikra (Indra) in the next (world).

Thus ends the fifth chapter, the history of Lokapalas, in Lokapala Savakha, the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER VI.

(LOKAPALA SAVAKHYANA
PARVA)—Continued.(Vaishampayana said :—

1. At the end of the Brahmarsi's, (Narada's) words, Dharmaraja Yudhisthira duly worshipped him ; and then having been commanded by him he replied in detail (to the questions asked by the Rishi.)

Yudhisthira said :—

2. O blessed one, the truth of religion and morality indicated by you are just and proper. I duly observe them to the best of my power.

3. There is no doubt that the acts properly performed by the kings of the olden days should be regarded as having borne proper fruit and having been undertaken from sound motive for the attainment of proper objects.

4. O lord, I wish to walk in the virtuous path of those kings ; but we are not able to walk along it like those self-controlled monarchs.

Vaishampayana said :

5—6. The greatly effulgent son of Pandu, Yudhisthira, having received with reverence the words of Narada, and having also replied to the Rishi, reflected for some time. Getting a proper opportunity the king who sat by the side of the Rishi capable of going everywhere at will asked him thus in the presence of the assembly of kings.

Yudhisthira said :—

7. You possess the speed of mind, you roam over various worlds created in the days of yore by Brahma, thus everywhere seeing everything in them.

8. O Brahmana, tell me I ask you, if you have ever before seen anywhere an assembly-hall like this one belonging to me or superior to it.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. Having heard the words of Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), Narada smiling by answered the Pandava in these sweet words.

Narada said :—

10. O child, O king, O descendant of Bharata, I have never heard nor seen amongst men any assembly-hall built of gems and precious stones like this one belonging to you.

11. I shall describe to you the assembly-halls of the regions of the king of the Pitris (Yama), of the intelligent Varuna, of Indra, and of the diety whose abode is on the Kailasha (Kuvera).

12—13. I shall (also) describe to you the assembly-hall of Brahma that dispells all misery. All these assembly-halls exhibit in their structure both celestial and human designs and present every kind of form that exists in the Universe. They are worshipped by the celestials, the Pitris, the Ganas, the Sadhyas, the self-controlled ascetics engaged in sacrifices and the mild Rishis that are ever employed in the Vedic sacrifices with Dakshinas. O best of the Bharata race, if your mind is set upon hearing all this, (I shall describe them to you).

Vaishampayana said :—

14. Having been thus addressed by Narada, Dharmaraja Yudhisthira with all the excellent Brahmanas (that were present there) joined his hands.

15. The high-minded Dharmaraja then thus spoke to Narada, "Describe to us all those assembly-halls. We desire to hear (all about them) from you."

16. O Brahmana, which Sabha (assembly-hall) is made of what articles? What is the area of each, and what is the length and breadth of each? Who waits upon the Grandsire in his Sabha?

17. Who waits upon the king of the celestials Vasava (Indra), upon the son of Vivaswata Yama, upon Varuna, and upon Kuvera in their assembly-halls?

18. O Brahmarsi, tell us all about this. We all together desire to hear you describe them. We are full of great curiosity."

19. Having been thus addressed, Narada replied, "O king, hear all about these Sabhas one after the other."

Thus ends the sixth chapter, the inquiry about Sabhas, in the Lokapala Sabhakhyana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER VII.

(LOKAPALA SABHAKHYANA PARVA)—continued.Narada said :—

1. The celestial Sabha of Sakra (Indra) is full of lusture ; and it was obtained by him as the fruit of his actions. O descendant of Kuru, it was made by Sakra (Indra) himself as effulgent as the Sun.

2. Its breadth is one hundred Yoyanas, its length is also one hundred and fifty Yoyanas; it is five Yoyanas in height. It can go anywhere at will.

3. It dispells decrepitude, grief, fatigue, and fear; it is beneficial and auspicious, it is furnished with rooms and seats, it is charming and adorned with celestial trees.

4. O son of Pritha, O descendant of Bharata, in that Sabha sits on an excellent seat the lord of the celestials with his wife Sachi who is the embodiment of beauty and wealth.

5. With an indescribable vague form, with a crown on his head, with bright bracelets on the upper arms, attired in pure white robes, and adorned with many coloured garlands, he sits there with Beauty, Fame and Glory by his side.

6. There daily wait upon that illustrious deity of one thousand sacrifices (Indra) all the Marutas,—that lead the life of house holders,

7. The Sidhyas, the celestial Rishis, the Sadhyas, the celestials, and the bright complexioned Marutas adorned with golden garlands;

8. These with their followers all possessing celestial forms and adorned with ornaments always wait upon and worship the illustrious chastiser of foes, the lord of the celestials.

9. O son of Pritha, there wait upon Sakra (Indra) all the celestial Rishis of pure soul, all as effulgent as the fire, and all whose sins are completely washed off,

10. All that are energetic, without grief of any kind, and without any fever (of anxiety),—all performers of Soma sacrifice. Parasara, Parvata, Savarni, Galava, 11—14. Sankha, Likhita the Rishi Gourasira, Durvasha, Krodhana, Swena, the Rishi Dirghatama, Pavitrapani, Sabarni, Yajnavalka, Bhaluki, Uddalaka, Swetaketu, Tandya, Bhandayani, Havishman, Garishta, king Harishchandra, Hridhya, Udarashandilya, Parasaya, Krishivala, Vataskandha, Vishakha, Vidhata, Kala, Karaladanta, Tasta, Vishwakarma, and Tumvaru.

15—19. Some born of women,—some not born of women;—some living on air, some on fire,—(all these Rishis) worship the wielder of thunder (Indra), the lord of all the world. Sahadeva, Sunitha, the greatly ascetic Balmiki, Samika of truthful speech, promise keeping Prachetas, Meghatithi, Vamadeva, Pulastha, Puloha, and Kratu, Marutta, Marichi, greatly ascetic Sthanu, Kakshivan, Goutama, Tarkshya, the Rishi Vaishwanara, the Rishi Kalakatakshya,

Asravya, Hiranmaya, Samvartta, Debahavya, greatly powerful Vishwakasena, Kanwa, Katyana, Garga, Kawshika—(all these) and the celestial waters and plants, faith, Intelligence and the goddess of learning,

20. Dharma, Artha, and Kama also lightning, clouds charged with rains, the winds, all the loud-sounding forces of heaven,

21. The eastern point, the twenty seven fires conveying the sacrificial Ghee, Agni, Soma, the fire of Indra, Mitra, Savitri and Aryama,

22. Bhaga, Vishwa, the Sadhyas, the preceptor (Vrihashpati), Sukra, Vishwavasva, Chitrasena, Sumana, Taruna.

23. The sacrificial Dakshinas (gifts to Brahmanas), the planets, the stars, the Mantras which are uttered in sacrifices,—O descendant of Bharata, all these are present there.

24—26. O king, many charming Apsaras and Gandharvas gratify there the lord of the celestials, Satakratu, (Indra) with their various kinds of dances and vocal and instrumental music, with the practice of auspicious rites, and with the exhibition of many skillful feats. They gratify there the illustrious slayer of Vitra and Vala with their various skill. The Brahmana Rishis, all the royal and celestial sages,

27. As effulgent as fire, adorned with garlands and ornaments often come to and go from that celestial assembly-hall riding on various kinds of celestial cars.

28. Vrihashpati and Sukra are always present there on all occasions. These and many other illustrious Rishis of rigid vows,

29. O king, Bhrigu and the seven Rishis who are equal to Brahma himself, use always to come to and go from that assembly-hall, riding on cars as beautiful as the car of Soma.

30. O king, I have seen this Sabha, named Pushkaramalini of the deity of one thousand sacrifices (Indra). Hear now about the assembly-hall of Yama.

Thus ends the seventh chapter, the description of Indra Sabha, in the Lokapala Sabhakhyana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER VIII.

(LOKAPALA SABHAKHYANA PARVA)—continued.

Narada said:—

1. O Yudhisthira, I shall now describe the assembly-hall of Yama, the son of Vivaswata. O son of Pritha, it was built by Vishwakarma; hear all about it.

2—3. O king, that effulgent Sabha covers an area of one hundred Yoyanas. O son of Pandu, it possesses the splendour of the sun; it yields every thing that one may desire to have from it. It is neither very cold nor very hot. It delights the heart.

4. There is no grief, and no decrepitude, no hunger, no thirst; nor there was any thing disagreeable, nor there was any kind of wretchedness or distress. There can be no fatigue or any kind of evil-fellings in that Sabha.

5—6. O chastiser of foes, every object of desire, celestial or human, is to be found in that hall; all kinds of enjoyable articles, as also sweet, juicy, agreeable and delicious things that are lickable, suckable or drinkable are all there in profusion. The garlands that are there are of the most delicious fragrance, and the trees that stand (around it) yield whatever fruits are desired.

7. There are both cold and hot waters,—they are all sweet and agreeable. There sit holy royal sages and stainless Brahmana Rishis.

8. O child, they all cheerfully wait upon Yama, the son of Vivaswata. Yayati, Nahusha, Puru, Mandhata, Semaka, Nriga,

9—12. The royal sage Trasadasyu, Kritavirja, Srutasrava, Arishtanemi, Sidha, Kritavega, Kriti, Nimi, Prataradhana, Sivi, Matsya, Prethulaksha, Vrihadratha, Vartta, Marutta, Kusika, Sankshasya, Sankriti, Druva, Chaturaswa, Sadaswormi, the king Kirtavirja, Bharata, Suratha, Sunitha, Nishatha, Nala, Devocasa, Sumana, Ashwaripa, Bhagiratha, Vyaswa, Sadaswa, Vadhraswa, Prithuvega, Prithusrava, Preshadaswa, Vasumana, Kshupa, and Sumahavala, Vrishadguba, Vrishasena, Purukutsa, Dhewaji Rathi, Arshitisena, Dwilipa, the high-souled Ushinara, Aushinari, Pundorika, Saryati, Sarava, Suchi, Anga, Arishta, Vena, Dushmanta, Srinjaya, Jaya, Bhangasuri, Sunitha, Nishada, Vahinara, Karandhama, Valhika, Sudyumna, the powerful Madhu, Aila, the powerful king of the earth Maruta, Kapotaroma, Trinaka, Sahadeva, Aryuna, Vyaswa, Saswa, Krishaswa, the king Sashavindu, the sons of Dasharatha Rama and Lakshmana, Prataradhana, Alarka, Kakshasena, Gaya, Gauraswa, the son of Jamadagni (Parasu) Rama, Nabhaga, Sagara, Bhuridugma, Mahaswa, Prithashwa, Janaka, king Vaindhya, Varisena, Purujit, Janamejaya, Brahma-datta, Trigra, the king Uparichara, Indradyumna, Bhimajanu, Gauripristha, Nala, Goya, Padma, Muchukunda, Bhuridyumna, Prasenajit, Arishtanemi, Sudyumna, Prithulaswa, Astaka,—one hundred kings of the Matysa race, one hundred of the Nepa, and one hundred of the Huya races.

23. One hundred kings of the name of Dhritarastra, eighty of the name of Janamejya, one hundred of the name of Brahma-datta, one hundred of the name of Iri and Ari,

24. Two hundred Bhismas, one hundred Bhimas, one hundred Prativinda, one hundred Nagas, and one hundred Hayas.

25. One hundred Palasas, one hundred Kashas, and Kushas, the king of kings, Santanu, your father Pandu,

26. Usangana, Sataratha, Devaraja, Jayadhrata, the wise royal sage Vrishad-arva with his ministers.

27. One thousand others of the name of Sashavinda who have died after performing many great horse sacrifices with large Dakshinas;

28. O king of kings, these holy royal sages, all of great achievements and great knowledge of the Shastras, waited upon the son of Vivaswata, (Yama) in that assembly-hall.

29—30. Agastha, Malanga, Kala, Mri-tyu, the performers of sacrifices, the Sadhyas, Yogins, the Pitris of the classes of Agniswatta's, Fenapa, Ushmapa, Swadhat and Varhishuda, and those other living Pitris,

31. The wheel of Time, the illustrious conveyor of sacrificial Ghee (Agni), all sinful men and those that died during winter solistice, 32—33. Those officers of Yama who have been appointed to count the allotted days of every body and every thing, Singsapalasa, Kasa, and Kusha trees and all plants in their spiritual form, O king, waited upon Dharmaraja (Yama). These and many others are the Savasadhas (members of the assembly-hall) of the king of the Pitris (Yama).

34. O son of Pritha, they are so numerous that I am unable to describe them, either mentioning them by their names or deeds. The Sabha is capable of going everywhere at will, it is wide of extent; it is beautiful. Vishwakarma has built it after long continued asceticism.

35—36. O descendant of Bharata, it is resplendent with its own effulgence. It is visited by the ascetics of severe penances, of excellent vows, of truthful speech, of pure and peaceful mind, and of heart sanctified by holy deeds,—all of shining bodies and all attired in spotless robes,

37. All adorned in bracelets and garlands, with ear-rings of burnished gold, and with their own holy acts and with the marks of their orders.

38. Many illustrious Gandharvas and many Apsaras fill all parts of it with both instrumental and vocal music, and with sounds of dance and laughter.

39. O son of Pritha, sacred perfumes and sweet sounds and the celestial garlands are all there in crowds.

40. Hundreds of thousands of virtuous men of celestial beauty and great wisdom always wait upon and worship the illustrious lord of all created beings.

41. O king, such is the assembly-hall of the illustrious king of the Pitris (Yama). I shall now describe the Sabha of Varuna, named Pushkaramalini.

Thus ends the eighth chapter, the description of Yama's Sabha, in the Lokapala Sabhakhyana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER IX.

(LOKAPALA SABHAKHYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Narada said :—

1. O Yudhisthira, the celestial Sabha of Varuna is matchless. Its dimension is exactly like that of Yama. It is adorned with white walls and arches.

2. It is built by Vishwakarma under the waters, it is surrounded on all sides by many celestial trees made of gems and jewels and producing excellent fruits and flowers.

3. Many plants with blue, yellow, black, dark, white and red blossoms has formed themselves into excellent bowers.

4. Hundreds and thousands of beautiful and variegated birds of various species always pour forth their melodies within them.

5—6. That Sabha is very delightful, it is neither cold nor hot. It is ruled by Varuna, and it consists many rooms furnished with many charming seats. Here sits Varuna with his queen (Varuni) adorned with celestial ornaments and jewels.

7. Adorned with celestial garlands, perfumed with celestial scents and besmeared with paste of celestial fragrance, the Adityas wait there upon the lord of waters Varuna.

8—12. O Lord of the earth, Vasuki, Takshaka, the Naga, named Airavata, Krishna, Lohita, Padma, the powerful Chitra, the Nagas called Kamvalas, Aswatara, Dhritrastra, Valahaka, Matiman, Kundadhara, Karkate, Dhananjaya, Paniman, the powerful Kundaka, Prohada, Mushikada, Janamejaya,—all having auspicious marks and Mandalas and broad hoods,—these and many other Nagas, O Yudhisthira, wait without any anxiety upon the illustrious Varuna. O king, the son of Virochona, Vali, the subjugator of the earth, Naraka,

13—15. Sangradha, Viprachitti, those Danavas, called Kalakpanja, Suhanu, Durmukha, Sankha, Sumana, Samati, Ghatodara, Mahaparswa, Karthana, Pithara, Vishwarupa, Swarupa, Virupa, Mahasira, Dasagriva, Vali, Meghavara, Dasavara, Tittiva, Vitavuta, Sanghrada, Indratahapa, these Daityas and Danavas all adorned with ear-rings,

16—23. Floral garlands and crowns and attired in celestial robes,—all blessed with boons and possessed of great bravery and immortality all well-conducted and of excellent vows,—wait upon the illustrious Varuna, the wielder of the noose (as his weapon). O king, there (wait upon him) the four oceans, the rivers Bhagirathi, the Kalindi, the Vidisa, the Venwa, the rapid Narmada, the Vipasa, the Satadru, the Chandrabhaga, the Saraswati, the Iravati, the Vitasta, the Sindu, the Devanadi, the Godavari, the Krishnavenwa, the queen of river, Kaveri, the Kimpuna, the Visalya, the Vaitarini, the Tritiya, the Jeshtlila, the great Sone, the Charmanwati, the great river Parnasa, the Saraju, the Varavatyia, that queen of rivers the Langali, the Karatoya, the Atriya, the red Mahanada, the Laghanti, the Gomati, the Sandhya, and the Trisrotasi, these and many others,—all sacred and famous pilgrimages,

24—26. All other rivers, sacred Tirthas, lakes, wells, springs, tanks,—large and small,—all in their personified forms, the points of heavens, the earth, all the mountains, every species of aquatic animals, O Yudhisthira, O descendant of Bharata, all these wait upon the illustrious (Varuna). The Gandharvas and the Apsaras, experts in vocal and instrumental music,

27. Wait there upon Varuna singing his eulogistic songs. All the mountains, that are rich in jewels and that are charming,

28—29. Are present there engaged in sweet conversation. Varuna's minister, named Sunava, surrounded by his sons and grandsons, wait upon him along with the Pushkara Tirtha, called "Go". All these in their personified forms worship that deity Varuna.

30. O best of the Bharata race, such is the charming assembly-hall of Varuna that I saw before in my travel. Hear now about the assembly-hall of Kuvera.

Thus ends the ninth chapter, the descriptions of Varuna's Sabha, in the Lokapala Sabhakhyana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER X.

(LOKAPALA SAVAKHYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Narada said:—

1. O king, the greatly effulgent assembly-hall of Vaisravana (Kuvera) is one hundred Yoyanas in length and seventy Yoyanas in breadth.

2. O king, it was built by Vaisravana himself by his ascetic powers. It was like the peaks of the Kailasha (mountain), and it darkens the brilliancy of the moon herself.

3. Being supported by the Guhakas, it looks as if it is attached to the firmament. Being adorned with celestially made large places of gold, it displays great beauty.

4. It is extremely delightful and rendered fragrant with celestial perfumes. It is ornamented with many great jewels. Resembling the peaks of a mass of white clouds, it seems to float in the sky.

5—6. It is painted with colours of celestial gold; and therefore it appears as if it is adorned with streaks of lightning. Here (in this assembly-hall) sits on an excellent seat which is as bright as the sun and which is covered with celestial carpets and furnished with beautiful foot stools, the handsome king Vaisravana (Kuvera) attired in excellent robes and adorned with costly ornaments and greatly brilliant ear-rings, and surrounded by his one thousand wives.

7—8. Delicious and cool breezes blowing through the generous forests of Mandaras and carrying the fragrance of the fragrant field of Jesamine and also of the lotuses on the breast of the Aloka (the celestial river) and of the gardens of Nandana (the celestial wood) wait upon the king of the Yashkhas (Kuvera).

9. O Great king, there sing the celestials with the Gandharvas surrounded by various tribes of Apsaras in notes of celestial sweetness.

10.—11. Misrakeshi, Rambha, Chitrasena Suchismita, Charunetra, Ghritachi, Menaka, Punjikashthala, Viswachi, Sahajanya, Pramlocha, Urvasi, Ira, Varga Sravaiga, Sauraveyi, Samichi, Vudvuda, Lata, 12. These and a thousand other Apsaras and Gandharvas, all great experts in music and dance, wait upon the lord of wealth.

13. That assembly-hall filled with the notes of instrumental and vocal music and with the sounds of various Gandharvas and Apsaras is extremely charming and delicious.

14—18. The Gandharvas named Kinharas, and others named Naras, Manibhadra, Dhana Swetabhadra, Guhyaka, Kasheraku, Gandakandu, the powerful Pradyota, Kustumvaru, Pistacha, Gajakarna, Visalaka, Varahakarna, Tamraushtha, Falakaksha, Falodaka, Hansachura, Sikhavarta, Vivishana, Pushpanana, Pingalaka, Seninoda, Pravalaka, Vrikshavaspa—Niketa and Chiravasas,— O descendant of Bharata, these, and many other Yakshas by hundreds and thousands (always wait upon Kuvera.)

19. The illustrious (goddess) Lakshmi and also Nala-Kuvera always remain there (in that Sabha). Myself and many others like myself often go there.

20—24. Many Brahmana Rishis and many celestial Rishis always go there; many Rakshashas and Gandharvas, besides those already mentioned, wait in that assembly-hall upon the illustrious lord of wealth. O best of kings, there wait upon his friend the lord of wealth, being ever cheerful and knowing no fatigue, the illustrious (deity), the husband of Uma, the lord of all creatures, the three-eyed Col, the wielder of trident, the slayer of Asura Bhaganetra, the mighty deity of fearful bow, accompanied by his wife and surrounded by hundreds and thousands of spirits, some of dwarfish stature, some of fearful face, some hunch-backed, some with blood-red eyes, some of fearful yells,—some feeding upon fat and flesh, some fearful to look at, and all armed with various weapons and possessed of the speed of wind.

25. With cheerful heart hundreds of Gandharva chiefs attired in their respective robes,—Vishwavasa, Haha and Huhu,

26—27. Tumvaru, Parvata, Sailusha, the great expert in music Chitrasena, Chitraratha,—these and innumerable other Gandharvas worship the lord of wealth. The chief of the Vidyadharas, Chakradhamana with his followers, 28. Wait there upon the lord, the master of wealth. Hundreds and thousands of Kinnaras wait upon the lord, the master of wealth.

29—30. Innumerable kings with Bhagdatta at their head, and the chief of Kimpurushas, Druma, the chief of the Rakshashas, Mohendra, Gandamadana with many Yakshas, Gandharvas and Rakshashas (all wait upon Kuvera).

31. The virtuous Vivishana wait upon his elder brother, the lord (Kuvera). The (mountains) Himalayas, Paripatra, Vindhya, Kailasha, Mandara,

32. Malaya, Dardura, Mohendra, Sunava, the eastern and the western mountains,

33. These and many others in their personified forms with Meru at their head wait upon the illustrious lord of wealth.

34—38. The illustrious Nandiswara, Mahakala, many spirits with arrowy ears and sharp-pointed mouths, Kashta, Kuthimukha, Danti, greatly ascetic Vijaya, the powerful and the deep-roaring white bull of Siva, many other Rakshashas and Pishachas, all wait upon the lord of wealth. The son of Pulastha (Kuvera), surrounded by his attendants, always with his permission formerly used to worship by bowing his head to the great deity, the god of gods, Siva, the creator of the three worlds. One day the high-souled Bhava (Siva) made friendship with Kuvera, and from that day he is always present in the assembly-hall of the lord of wealth.

39. Those best of Jewels,—those princes of all wealth, Sanka and Padma (in their personified forms) accompanied by all gems, wait upon the lord of wealth.

40. O king, such is the charming assembly-hall of Kuvera which I saw. It is capable of moving in the firmament. Now I shall describe to you the assembly-hall of the Grandsire. Listen to it.

Thus ends the tenth chapter, the description of Kuvera's Sabha, in the Lokapala Sabhakhyana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XI.

(LOKAPALA SABHAKHYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Narada said :—

1. O child, I shall describe to you the assembly-hall of the Grandsire. Listen to it. O descendant of Bharata, None is capable of describing it saying, "It is such."

2. O king, in the Deva Yuga of old, the illustrious deity, Aditya, came down from heaven and roamed at ease over the world of men.

3. O son of Pandu, having seen (before) the Sabha of the Self-created (Brahma), he roamed (on earth) in human form, wishing to see what could be seen here. On that occasion he spoke to me,

4. O best of the Bharata race, about that celestial Sabha (of the Grandsire) which is immeasurable and immaterial and which delights the heart of every creature by its splendour.

5. O best of the Pandavas, hearing the merits of that Sabha, I became desirous of seeing it. O king, I then spoke thus to Aditya,

6—7. "O illustrious one, I desire to see the sacred Sabha of the Grandsire. O exalted one; O lord of light, tell me by what ascetic penances, by what acts, by what charms, and by what rites, I may be able to see that sin-cleansing excellent Sabha."

8—9. O best of the Bharata race, hearing my words, the deity of one thousand eyes, the god of day (Aditya) replied, "Observe with mind rapt in meditation the Brahma-vow extending for a period of one thousand years." Thereupon I commenced that great vow on the breast of the Himalayas.

10. (When I completed my vow), then the illustrious and powerful and sinless Surya who knows no fatigue came and took me to the Sabha of Brahma.

11. O king, none is able to describe it by saying "It is such"; for it assumes an indescribable form within a moment.

12. O descendant of Bharata, it is impossible to indicate its dimensions or shape. I have never seen any thing like it before.

13. O king, it ever contributes to the happiness of those that live within it. It is neither cold nor hot; hunger, thirst and all kinds of uneasiness disappear from one as soon as one enters into it.

14—16. It is made of brilliant gems of many kinds, it does not seem to be supported on any pillars, it knows no deterioration,—it is eternal. That self effulgent Sabha seems to surpass the moon, the sun, and the fire by its numerous matchless and blazing celestial indications.

17—18. O king, in this (Sabha) sits the supreme deity, the Grandsire of all created things, having himself alone created everything by his own Maya. Daksha, Pracheta Pulaha, Marichi, lord Kashyapa,

19—20. Vrigu, Atri, Vashishta, Gautama, Angirasa, Pulastya, Kratu, Prahlada, Kardama, the Prajapaties, Angirasa of the Atharva Veda, the Valikhilas, the Marichipas, Mind, Space, Knowledge, Air, Heat Water, Earth,

21. Sound, Touch, Form, Taste, Scent, Nature, the Modes, the Elemental and Prime causes of the world,—O descendant of Bharata, (all these sit there).

22—24. The greatly effulgent Agasta, the great ascetic Markandeya, Jamadagni, Bharadwaja, Samvarata, Chyavana, the illustrious Durvasa, the pious Rishasringa, the high-souled Sanatkumara, who is a great ascetic and the preceptor of Yoga, Asita, Devala, Jaigishavya, learned in all truths, Rishava, Ajitsatan, greatly resplendent Mani,

25. The Science of Healing with its eight branches, all these in their personified forms, O descendant of Bharata, wait there (in that assembly-hall). Moon with stars and constellations, sun with its rays,

26—27. Declaration of purpose in sacrifices, the Ritual principles,—these illustrious and vow-observing beings in their personified forms, and many others too numerous to mention, all wait upon Brahma. Artha Dharma, Kama, Joy, Aversion, Asceticism and Peace of Mind,

28. With them come the twenty seven different tribes of the Gandharvas and of the Apsaras and others also, and also the Lokapalas,

29—30. Sukra, Vrihaspati, Vudha, Angaraka, Sani, Rahu, and the other planets, the Mantras, the special Mantras, Hasimat, Vasumat, Adityas with Indra, the two Agnis,

31—32. The Vishwakarma, the Vasus, the Pitris, all kinds of sacrificial libations, the four Vedas, namely Rik, Sama, Yaju and Atharva, all Sciences and branches of learning,

33. Histories and all minor branches of learning, all the Vedangas, the Planets, the Sacrifices, the Soma, all the celestials,

34. Savitri, the seven kinds of Speech, Understanding, Patience, Memory, Wisdom, Intelligence, Fame, Forgiveness,

35—36. The hymns of the Sama Veda, the Science of hymns, various kinds of verses and songs, various commentaries with arguments, various dramas, poems and stories, abridged glosses,—these and other holy worshippers of Brahma, all in their personified forms, O king, stay there.

37—40. O descendant of Bharata, O Yudhisthira, Khanas, Lavas, Muharttas (parts of time), the day, the night, the fortnights, the months, the six seasons, the years, the Yugas, the four kinds of days and nights, the eternal, indestructible, and undeteriorating, excellent Wheel of Time, the Wheel of Virtue, all of them stay there.

Aditi, Diti, Danu, Surasas, Venata, Ira, Kalika, Suravidevi, Sarama, Gautami,

41. Pradha, Kadru,—all these goddesses, the mothers of the celestials, Rudrani, Sree, Lakshmi, Vadra, 42—43. Sasti, the earth, Ganga, Hri, Swaha, Krita, Sura, Sachi, Pushti, Arundhati, Samvriti, Asa, Niyati, Srishti, Rati,—these and other goddesses wait upon the Prajapati (Brahma).

44. The Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the Marutas, the Aswinis, the Vishwadevas, the Sadhyas, the Pitris,—all possessing the speed of mind, (wait upon the Grandsire).

45. O best of men, know that there are seven classes of Pitris, of which four classes have embodied forms,—the three remaining classes have no forms.

46. O descendant of Bharata, it is well-known amongst men that the illustrious Vairajas, Agniswattas and Garapatyas (three classes of the Pitris) roam in heaven.

47. O king, the Sompas, the Ekasringas, the Chaturvedas, and the Kalas (the four classes of the Pitris) are always worshipped amongst the four orders of men (namely Brahmanas, Kshatryas, Vaisyas and Sudras).

48. Being first gratified by Soma, these (Pitris) gratify Soma next. All these Pitris wait upon the Prajapati.

49. They cheerfully worship the immeasurably effulgent Brahma. The Rakshasas, the Pishachas, the Danavas, the Guhakas,

50. The Nagas, the birds, the various other animals, all other mobile and immobile great beings, worship the Grandsire.

51. The lord of the celestials, Purandara (Indra), Varuna, Kuvera, Yama, Mahadeva with Uma (his wife), all often go there (to that Sabha).

52—53. O king of kings, Mahasena also worship the Grandsire. Know, O king, that Narayana himself, the celestial Rishis, the Rishis named Valikhilyas, all beings born of females or not born of females,—nay whatever else is seen in the three worlds,—mobile and immobile,—were all seen by me there in that assembly-hall (of Brahma).

54. O son of Pandu, eighty thousand Rishis who have gained complete control over their sexual passions, and fifty thousand Rishis who have begotten offspring were also seen by me there.

55. All the dwellers of heaven see him (Brahma) there at their pleasure,—and worshipping him by bowing down their heads all go back to the place from which they come.

56—58. O king of men, the immeasurably intelligent Brahma, the Grandsire of all created things, the self-created Supreme Deity of immeasurable effulgence, is ever kind equally on all creatures, honours each as each deserves and gratifies with sweet speech, gift of wealth and other enjoyable things all those Devas, Daityas, the Nagas, the Yakshas, the Brahmanas, the birds, the Kaleyatas, the Gandharvas, the Apsaras and all other illustrious beings that come to him as his guests.

59. O descendant of Bharata, O child, that charming Sabha is always being agitated with crowds of beings coming and going.

60. Filled with every splendour and worshipped by the Brahmarsis, that celestial Sabha, the dispeller of all fatigue and misery, looks extremely beautiful, it being brightened with the wealth of Brahma.

61. O best of kings, as your Sabha is matchless in the world of men, so is matchless in all the worlds that Sabha which was seen by me before.

62. O descendant of Bharata, I saw these Sabhas before in the region of the celestials. Your this Sabha is the foremost in the world of men.

Thus ends the eleventh chapter, the description of Brahma's Sabha, in the Lokapala Sabhakhyana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XII.

(LOKAPALA SABHAKHYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. O best of eloquent men, O lord, from your descriptions it appears that all the monarchs (of the earth) are in the Sabha of the son of Vivaswata (Yama.)

2. O lord, you have said that in the Varuna's Sabha are the Nagas, the chief Daityas, the rivers, and the oceans,

3. And in that of the lord of wealth (Kuvera) are the Yakshas, Guhakas, Rakshashas, Gandharvas, Apsaras, and the exalted Vishadweva (Siva.)

4. You have said that in the Sabha of the Grandsire are the great Rishis, all the celestials, and all the Shastras.

5. O Rishi, you have said that in the Sabha of Sakra (Indra) are the celestials, the Gandharvas and the various great Rishis.

6. O great Rishi, you have said that one king namely the royal sage Harishchandra, is in the Sabha of the illustrious lord of the celestials.

7. What act, what asceticism, what steady vows were performed by that greatly famous (king) that he has alone become equal to Indra?

8. O Brahmana, how did you meet with my father, the illustrious Pandu, now living in the region of the Pitris?

9. O exalted one, O Rishi of excellent vows, what did he tell you? Tell me all. I am filled with great curiosity to hear all this.

Narada said :—

10. O king of kings, O lord, I shall tell you all about the greatness of the greatly intelligent Harishchandra which you ask me to narrate.

11. That king (Harishchandra) was very powerful and an Emperor over all the monarchs of the earth. All the kings of the world were under his sway.

12. O king of men, riding alone on his car adorned with gold, he conquered all the seven islands (of the world) by the prowess of his weapons.

13. O great king, having conquered the whole of the earth with her mountains, forests and woods, he made preparation to perform a great Rajshuya sacrifice.

14. All the monarchs at his command brought wealth to that sacrifice. They became the distributors of food to the Brahmanas in that sacrifice.

15. The king (Harishchandra) in that sacrifice cheerfully gave away to the sacrificial Brahmanas wealth five times more than what each asked.

16. At the conclusion of the sacrifice, the king gratified the Brahmanas that assembled there from various quarters with large presents of various kinds of wealth.

17. Having been gratified by various kinds of food and enjoyable things given to them to their fill and by the heaps of jewels distributed amongst them, the Brahmanas said :—“The king Harishchandra has become superior to all the kings in energy and in renown.”

18. O king, O best of the Bharata race, know that for this reason, Harishchandra has shone more brightly than thousands of other kings.

19. O king, having concluded his great sacrifice, the mighty Harishchandra, being installed in his Empire, looked resplendent.

20. O best of the Bharata race, all the kings that perform the great Rajshuya sacrifice pass their time in bliss in company with Indra,

21. O best of the Bharata race, those kings, that give their lives on the field of battle without turning their backs, go to the abode (of Indra) and pass their time in felicity.

22. Those also that give up their lives after undergoing severe ascetic penances go to the same region and shine brightly there for ages.

23. O son of Kunti, O descendant of Kuru, seeing the good fortune of Harishchandra and being much astonished at it, your father Pandu has told you something (through me).

24. O king of men, knowing that I was coming to the world of men, he bowed to me and said, "Tell this to Yudhishthira,

25. That he can subjugate the whole earth as his brothers are obedient to him." O descendant of Bharata, he said, "Let him perform the great Rajshuya sacrifice.

26. He is my son,—if he performs that sacrifice, I can go like Harishchandra to the region of Indra and pass my time there in everlasting bliss in company with Indra in his Sabha."

27. O king, I told him thus (in reply), "If I go to the world of men, I shall speak to your son." I have told you what Pandu told me.

28. O best of men, O son of Pandu, accomplish then the intentions of your father. If you do this, you will go with your ancestors to the region of Indra.

29. O king, it is said that this sacrifice is full of many obstacles. The Brahma-Rakshashas who always harm sacrifices search for holes when this sacrifice is begun.

30. On the commencement of such a sacrifice a war may break out which may destroy the Kshatryas, and which may be the cause of the total destruction of the whole world. A slight obstacle (to it) may cause the ruin of the whole earth.

31. O king of kings, reflecting on all this, do what is beneficial to you. Be always watchful in protecting the four orders (of your subjects).

32. Grow in prosperity,—enjoy felicity, gratify the Bramhanas with wealth. I have thus answered in detail all that you have asked me. With your permission, I shall now go towards the city of the Dasrahas (Dwarka.)

Vaishampayana said :—

33. O Janamejaya, O king, having said this to the son of Pritha, Narada went away with those Rishis with whom he had come.

34. O descendant of Kuru, on the departure of Narada, the King (Yudhishthira), the son of Pritha, began to think with his brothers (how to perform) that best of sacrifice, Rajshuya.

Thus ends the twelfth chapter, the description of Brahma Sabha, in the Lokapala Sabhrakhyana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XIII

(RAJSHYUARAMBHA PARVA.)

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O descendant of Bharata, having heard these words of the Rishi (Narada) Yudhishthira heaved sighs. Full of the thought of the Rajshuya, (sacrifice), the king did not get any peace of mind.

2—3. Having heard the glory of the illustrious kings of old and having known their acquisition of regions of felicity by the performance of sacrifices and sacred deeds, and having also thought the great sacrifice performed by the royal sage Harishchandra, the king Yudhishthira desired to make preparations for the Rajshuya sacrifice.

4. Having worshipped all his Savasadas (counsellors and officers) and having been worshipped by them in return, he consulted with them about the sacrifice.

5. O king of kings, having reflected much, the best of the Kurus, (Yudhishthira) resolved to make preparations to perform that sacrifice.

6. Reflecting upon virtue and righteousness, that king of wonderful energy and prowess set his heart to find out what should be beneficial to all his people.

7. The foremost of all virtuous men—Yudhishthira, ever kind to all his subjects, always acted without any distinction for the good of all.

8. Dispelling all anger and vengeance—he always said, "Give to each what each is to have." The only sounds that could be heard (in his kingdom) were, "Blessed be Dharma, Blessed be Dharma."

9. Having thus conducted himself and having given every one paternal assurance, he had none in his kingdom who entertained any hostile feelings towards him. He therefore came to be called Ajatasatru (enemyless).

10. The king treated every one as if he was one of his own family ; and Bhima ruled them all justly and impartially. Vivatsu Shabyashachi (Aryuna) by using both his hands protected all from their enemies.

11. The intelligent Sahadeva administered justice with all impartiality, and Nakula treated all with humility which was natural to his character. (For all this the kingdom became) free from quarrels and fear of all kinds. All people were engaged in their respective works.

12. The rains were as much as could be desired and the kingdom became full of prosperity. Persons living on usury, things necessary for sacrifices, cattle-rearing, tillage, and trades,—all and everything grew in prosperity.

13. In consequence of the good deeds of the king, there was in his kingdom no extortion, no oppression in the realization of rents, and no fear of disease, of fire, of death by poisoning, and of incantations,

14—16. In consequence of Yudhisthira being ever devoted to virtue, it was never heard that thieves or cheats or royal favourites did any wrong towards one another. In consequence of Yudhisthira's devotion to virtue, his tributary chiefs always waited upon him to render him good service on the six occasions (of war, treaty &c); and the traders and merchants of different classes paid him their due taxes leviable on their respective trades. Thus the kingdom grew in prosperity.

17. The prosperity of the kingdom increased even by greatly voluptuous and luxurious persons. The king possessed every accomplishment and he bore every thing in patience. His sway extended over all.

17. O king, whichever countries this renowned and the illustrious king conquered, the people of them, from Brahmanas to peasants, were all more attached to him than to their own parents.

19. That foremost of speakers (Yudhisthira) summoned together his brothers and ministers and asked them again and again about the Rajshuya sacrifice.

20. Having been thus asked by the greatly wise Yudhisthira eager to perform the sacrifice, they spoke to him these words of grave import.

The Ministers said :—

21. A king already in possession of a kingdom wishes to acquire all the attributes of an emperor by means of the sacrifice, (Rajshnya)—a sacrifice that helps to acquire the attributes of Varuna.

22. O descendant of Kuru, you are worthy of the attributes of an emperor; therefore your friends consider that the time has come for you to perform the Rajshuya sacrifice.

23. In consequence of your Kshatrya possessions, the time for the performance of that sacrifice has come,—the sacrifice in which the Rishis of rigid vows establish the six fires with the Mantras of the Sama Veda.

24. At the conclusion of a Rajshuya sacrifice,—the performer is said to be installed in the sovereignty of an empire; he is then rewarded with the fruits of all sacrifices including the Agnihotra sacrifice. It is for this he is called the conqueror of all.

25. O mighty armed hero, O great king, you are quite capable of performing this sacrifice. We are all obedient to you. You will soon be able to perform the Rajshuya.

26. O great king, set your mind to perform the Rajshuya without any further discussion."

Vaishampayana said :—

Thus spoke to the king all his friends and counsellors separately and together.

27. O king, having heard their these virtuous, bold, agreeable and weighty words, the son of Pandu (Yudhisthira), accepted them in his mind.

28. O descendant of Bharata, having heard these words of his friends and having known his own strength also, the king again thought in his mind about the Rajshuya.

29. The intelligent Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, ever wise in counsel, again consulted with his brothers, with his ministers, his Ritwijas, (his priest, Dhaumya and Dwaipayana and others.

Yudhisthira said :—

30. How can this Rajshuya sacrifice, which is worthy of an emperor and which my mind is desirous to perform, be accomplished only by my faith and speech?

Vaishampayana said :—

31. O lotus-eyed hero, having been thus asked by the king, they thus spoke to the Dharmaraja Yudhisthira at that time.

32. "O king, learned in the precepts of virtue, you are worthy of performing the great sacrifice of Rajshuya." When the Retwijas and the Rishis told these words,

33—34. His ministers and his brothers highly approved of his words. The greatly wise and self-controlled son of Pritha (Yudhisthira), ever desirous to do good to the world, again thought over the matter in his mind, taking into his consideration his own strength and means, the time and the place, his income and expenditure.

35. He knew that the wise never come to grief, because they always act after due deliberation. He thought that the sacrifice should not be commenced pursuant to his own resolution only.

36. Carefully bearing on his shoulder the weight of affairs, he (Yudhisthira) thought of Krishna Janardana as the fittest person to decide the matter.

37. Knowing him (Krishna) to be the foremost of all persons, the possessor of immeasurable energy, the mighty-armed, (hero), being without birth and was born among men only out of his pleasure, he (Yudhisthira) thought of Hari (Krishna) in his mind.

38—39. Having reflected upon his God-like feats, the son of Pandu (Yudhisthira) thought that there could be nothing unknown to him, nothing unacheivable by him and nothing that he could not bear. Having argued thus, he remembered Krishna. Having come to this settled conclusion, the son of Pritha Yudhisthira

40. Soon sent a messenger to that lord of all beings,—sending through him (the messenger) blessings and agreeable words such as the elder should send to his younger. Riding on a swift car, that messenger soon reached the Yadavas.

41. He arrived at Dwaravati in which Dwaravati city Krishna was living. Having heard that the son of Pritha (Yudhisthira) was eager to see him, Achyuta (Krishna) also became eager to see him.

42. Passing quickly through various countries on (the car yoked with) his swift horses, he arrived at Indraprastha with Indrasena.

43. Having arrived at Indraprastha, Janardana (Krishna) came to the son of Pritha (Yudhisthira). He was worshipped by his cousin Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) in his house with paternal affection.

44—45. He was also received by Bhima as affectionately. He then went cheerfully to see the sister of his father (Kunti). He was worshipped by the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) as their superiors. He then conversed with his friend Aryuna with joy; Aryuna was very glad to see him. Then when he had rested for some time in that pleasant place, and become fully refreshed, Yudhisthira came to him and spoke to him his business.

Yudhisthira said :—

46. § Krishna, I have desired to perform the Rajshuya sacrifice; but it cannot be performed by my simply wishing to perform

it. You know every thing by which it may be accomplished.

47. He in whom every thing is possible, he who is worshipped everywhere and he who is the king of all kings can alone perform this sacrifice.

48. O Krishna, my friends and ministers have said that I should perform it, but your words will be my guide in this matter.

49. Some (counsellors) do not notice faults (difficulties) out of friendship. Some out of self interest say only that which will be agreeable to the hearer.

50. Some again consider that which is beneficial to them as the fittest thing to be adopted. Men are seen to advice thus in business.

51. You are above all motives; you have conquered anger and desire; you should tell me which is most beneficial to the world.

Thus ends the thirteenth chapter, the arrival of Krishna, in the Rajshuyarambha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XIV.

RAJSHUYARAMBHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Krishna said :—

1. O great king, you are endued with all accomplishments, and you are worthy of performing the Rajshuya. O descendant of Bharata, you know everything, (therefore) I shall tell you only something.

2. The men now known as Kshatryas are inferior to those Kshatryas that were exterminated by Rama, the son of Jamadagni.

3. O lord of earth, O best of the Bharata race, you are aware of the rules that those Kshatryas established amongst their order, guided by the traditions (coming down from generations to generations).

4. All the numerous royal dynasties and other Kshatryas in the world claim to be descended from Aila and Ikshaku.

5. O king, O best of the Bharata race, the monarchs (the descendants) of Aila and those of Ikshaku became divided into one hundred separate dynasties.

6. O great king, the descendants of Yayati and the Bhoja are also great in birth, number and accomplishments. They are scattered in all directions.

7. O king, all the Kshatryas worship the wealth and prosperity of all these kings. At the present time the king Jarasandha,

8. Having overcome that prosperity ever revered by the whole (Kshatrya) order, and also having overcome them by his prowess, has set himself up over the heads of all the kings.

9—12. Enjoying the sovereignty of the middle portion of the earth, he tried to create disunion among ourselves. O great-king, the monarch, who is the lord of all kings and whose sway extends over the whole earth, is the proper person to be an Emperor. O king, the powerful Shisupala having every way placed himself under his protection, has become his commander-in-chief. O great king, the powerful king of the Kurushas, Bakra, who fight with the power of illusion, also waits upon him as his disciple. The two other greatly powerful and illustrious monarchs have taken the protection

13. Of the greatly powerful Jarasandha, —namely Hansa and Dimvaka. Dantravakra, Karusha, Karava (also wait upon Jarasandha.) He who bears on his head the gem which is known as the most wonderful gem in the world,

14. That king of the Yavanas who has chastised Mura and Naroka and who is the matchlessly powerful king of the West like a (second) Varuna.

15. O great king, who is called Bhagadatta and who was your father's old friend, has, also lowered his head (to Jarasandha) by his speech and specially by his acts.

16. But he is in his heart tied to you by affection. He loves you as a father loves his son. The king, who has his kingdom on the west and south of the earth,

17. Who is your maternal uncle, that heroic Purujit, the spreader of the Kunti race, that chastiser of foes, is the only one king who is on your side.

18—19. That wicked wretch amongst the Chedis, whom I did not kill before, who has become known in the world as the Supreme Being, who gives himself out as such, and who out of foolishness always bears all my signs, has gone over to the side of Jarasandha.

20. The powerful king of Banga, Paundra and the Kiratas who is known by the names of Pandraka and Vasudeva, (also waits upon Jarasandha).

21—22. O great king, that mighty king of the Bhojas, Bhishmaka, who is a friend of Indra, that chastiser of foes, who governs a fourth part of the world, who has conquered by his learning the Pandyas and Krathakausikas, and whose brother Atri is like the son of Jamadagni Rama has (also) become a servitor to the king of Magadha (Jarasandha).

23. We are his (Bhishmaka's) relatives, and therefore, we are always engaged in doing what is agreeable to him. But though we respect and regard him much, yet he does not at all regard us. He is always doing us ill.

24. O king, without knowing his own strength and the dignity of the race to which he belongs, he (Bhishmaka) has placed himself under Jarasanda's shelter, only seeing his blazing fame.

25—26. O lord, the eighteen tribes of the Bhojas from the fear of Jarasandha, have fled to the west; so also have fled the Surasenas, the Bhadrakas, the Vodhas, the Salwas, the Patacheras, the Susthatas, the Mukuttas, the Kulendas and the Kuntis.

27—28. The kings of the Salvwayas, with their brothers and followers, the southern Panchalas and the eastern Koshalas have also fled to the country of the Kuntis. So also the Matsyas and the Samyastapadas have left their kingdoms in the north and have all fled from fear to the southern country.

29. Afflicted with the fear of Jarasandha, all the Panchalas have left their own kingdoms and fled in all directions.

30. Sometime before, the foolish minded Kansa, having persecuted the Yadavas, married two of the daughters of the son of Brihatratha (Jarasandha).

31. They are named Asti and Prapti, and they are the sisters of Sahadeva. Strengthened by such an alliance, the fool (Kansa) persecuted his relatives and gained an ascendancy over them all.

32. By his such acts he earned a very bad repute. The wicked wretch persecuted the old chiefs of the Bhoja race.

33. These chiefs sought our protection from the persecution of their relative (Kansa). Having bestowed upon Akrura the beautiful daughter of Ahuka, Satarinka,

34. I did a service to my relatives. Making Sankerasana (Baladeva) my second, I killed both Kansa and Savamana with the assistance of Rama.

35. O king, though the immediate cause of our fear was thus removed, yet Jarasandha (Kansa's father-in-law) took up arms. We eighteen branches of the Yadavas consulted together;

36. And we came to the conclusion that even if we continually strike at our enemy with weapons capable of killing the shall not be able to do anything of him in three hundred years.

37—38. He had two friends, who were like the two immortals; and they were as powerful as the foremost men of all powerful men. They were named Hansa and Dimvaka who were incapable of being slain by any weapons. When the powerful Jarasandha was united with them, he was incapable of being defeated by the weapons of all the world. This was my opinion.

39. O foremost of all intelligent men, this was not only our opinion,—but all the other kings were of the same opinion.

40. There was a great king named Hansa,—he was killed by Rama in a battle which lasted for eighteen days.

41—42. O descendant of Bharata, O king, hearing people say that Hansa had been killed, Dimvaka thought that he could not live without Hansa. He went to the Yamuna, jumped into its waters and thus killed himself.

43. Thereupon when that subjugator of hostile cities, Hansa, heard what Dimvaka had done, he too went to the Yamuna, jumped into its waters and drowned himself.

44. O descendant of Bharata, when Jarasandha heard of the death of the two heroes, he returned to his city with an empty heart.

45. O slayer of all foes, on the departure of the king (Jarasandha), we were filled with great joy, and we continued to live at Mathura.

46—47. But when the wife of Kansa and the daughter of Jarasandha, that lotus-eyed lady (Prapti) went to her father lamenting for the death of her husband, and when, O king, she again and again urged the king of Magadha, saying, "O chastiser of foes, kill the murderer of my husband," then, O great king, we thought of acting according to the conclusion we came to before.

48—49. We became exceedingly cheerless, and we became ready to fly. We divided our great wealth into small portions to make it portable. We then fled from the fear of Jarasandha with our sons, cousins and relatives. After reflecting thus over everything, we fled towards the west.

50. O king, there is a charming city, named Kushasthali, adorned by the Raivataka (mountain). In this city we took up our abode.

51. We repaired its fort and made it so strong that it became impregnable even to the celestials. Even women could fight from within it,—not to speak of the great car-warriors of the Vrishni race.

52—53. O slayer of all foes, we are now living in that city without fear of any kind. O best of the Kuru race, thinking of the inaccessibility of that foremost of hills (Raivataka), and considering that they had no longer any fear of Jarasandha, the descendants of Madhu (Yadavas) have become exceedingly glad.

54. Though we were capable of defending ourselves (from the attacks of Jarasandha), yet we have taken shelter on the Gomota mountain which is three Yoyanas in length. Within its each Yoyona have been placed twenty one posts of armed men.

55. At the intervals of each Yoyana have been made one hundred gates,—the heroism of the Vrishni heroes are the arches of these gates. They are (always) protected by the heroes of the eighteen branches of the Yadavas.

56. There are eighteen thousand brothers and cousins in our race. Ahuka has one hundred sons, each of whom is like the best of the celestials.

57. Charudeshna with his brother Chakradeva, Satyaki, myself, the son of Rohini (Valadeva), Samba, as heroic as myself,

58. O king, these seven are Atirathas. Besides these there are others, whom I shall (presently) mention. Kritavarma, Anadhristi, Samika, Samitinjaya,

59. Kanka, Sankha, Kunti—these seven are Maharathas. The old king Andhakabhoja has two sons, and the king himself,—these ten (are Maharathas).

60. Possessing great prowess, all these heroes are as mighty as the thunderbolt. These Maharathas, choosing the middle country, now live among the Vrishnis.

61. O best of the Bharata race, O descendant of Bharata, you alone are worthy of becoming an emperor. You should establish your empire over all Kshatryas.

62. O king, but it is my opinion that you will not be able to perform the Rajshuya (sacrifice), so long the greatly powerful Jarasandha remains alive.

63. Many kings have been kept imprisoned in Giribraja (his city), as dead carcasses of elephants are kept in the cave of a great mountain by the lion.

64—65. O chastiser of foes, having been desirous of performing a great sacrifice by (offering) kings (to the sacrificial fire), the king Jarasandha, has adored with fierce ascetic penances the illustrious god of gods, the husband of Uma (Siva). He has by this means been able to defeat many kings of the earth and to fulfil his vow.

66. By defeating all the kings, one after the other and their soldiers, he has brought them all as prisoners to his city; and he has thus daily swelled the crowd (of kings).

67. O great king, we too from the fear of Jarasandha left Mathura and fled to the city of Dwaravati.

68. O great king, if you desire to perform the sacrifice, try to release those (the kings) kept prisoners by Jarasandha, and try to kill him.

69. O descendant of Kuru, O foremost of all intelligent men, if you do not try to do it,—your undertaking can never be successful. If you wish to perform Rajshuya (sacrifice), you must do it.

70. O king, O sinless one, this is my opinion. Do as you think (proper) after reflecting over everything, noting the causes and effects of all. Tell us what you yourself think proper to do.

Thus ends the fourteenth chapter, the words of Krishna, in the Rajshuyarambha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XV.

(RAJSHUYARAMBHA-PARVA)— Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. Intelligent as you are, you have said what none else is capable of saying. There is none else in the world but you who can settle all doubts.

2. There are kings in every province engaged in doing good to their respective selves. But none of them has been able to become an Emperor. The title of Emperor is difficult to be achieved.

3. He who knows the valour and the strength of others never applauds himself. He is really worthy of praise who even in fighting with his enemies bears himself with all commendation.

4. O supporter of the Vrishni dignity, man's desires and propensities are varied and extensive like the wide earth adorned with various gems and jewels. As by travelling in distant places experience is gained,—so man can get the highest good by the highest culture of his understanding.

5. I consider peace of mind as the highest quality, for from peace of mind proceeds prosperity. In my opinion, if I undertake to perform this sacrifice, I shall not win the highest reward.

6. O Janardana, these intelligent and powerful men born in our race think that one amongst them will at one time become the foremost man amongst all the Kshatriyas.

7—8. But, O exalted one, O sinless being, we also were all alarmed at the prowess and the wickedness of the king Jarasandha, O hero, invincible in battle, O lord, the prowess of your arms is our refuge. When you are alarmed at Jarasandha's might, how should I consider myself strong (enough to cope with him)?

9—10. O Madhava, O descendant of the Vrishni race, I have often become depressed at the thought whether Jarasandha is at all capable of being killed by you, by Rama, or by Aryuna. O Keshava, what shall I say? You are my highest authority in everything.

Vaishampayana said :—

Having heard this, the able speaker Bhima then spoke these words :—

Bhima said :—

11. The king, who is without any exertion, or the king who being himself weak and without resources, enters into hostility with one who is strong, perishes like an ant-hill.

12. It is often seen that even weak king may defeat a strong enemy; and he may become successful in his attempts by his wakefulness and by using policy.

13. (We have) in Krishna policy, in me strength, and in Partha (Dhananjaya) victory. Like the three (sacrificial) fires, we shall bring about the death of the king of Magadha (Jarasandha).

Krishna said :—

14. Men of immature understanding begin an act without having an eye to what may happen in future. It is, therefore, not a self-seeking enemy with immature understanding is ever forgiven by a sensible man.

15—17. It has been heard by us that in the Satya Yuga, Yanvanaswa brought every one under his sway, by the remission of taxes, Bhagiratha by kind treatment of his subjects, Kartavirya by his great asceticism, the lord Bharata by his extraordinary prowess and Maruta by his prosperity, and thus they became emperors. O Yudhisthira, you, who wish to acquire the imperial dignity, have all the (above mentioned) five qualities.

18. O best of the Bharata race, the son of Vrihatratha, Jarasandha, is (also) one such (a candidate for the imperial dignity). One hundred families of kings have failed to oppose him.

19—20. He is ruling over an empire by his own great prowess. The monarchs that wear jewels wait upon and worship Jarasandha. Wicked from his childhood, he is not satisfied even by such worship.

21. Having become the foremost of all, he attacks with force the kings that wear crowns. There is not to be found a single king who does not pay tributes to him.

22. O son of Pritha, thus has he brought under his sway one hundred kings. How can then a weak king approach him with hostile intentions?

23. O best of the Bharata race, kept as they are prisoners in the temple of Siva like so many animals to be offered to the sacrifice, do not these kings feel the greatest possible misery?

24. A Kshatrya who is killed by weapons (on the field of battle) is ever considered to be blessed. Why shall we not then assemble together and oppose the king of Magadha?

25. He has already brought under his sway eighty-six kings,—only fourteen (more) are wanted to make the number of one hundred complete. As soon as he will collect them (the fourteen others), he will begin his cruel act (sacrificing them before Siva).

26. He, who will be able to prevent him from doing this act, will surely earn blazing fame. He, who will defeat Jarasandha, will certainly become the emperor of all the world.

Thus ends the fifteenth chapter, the words of Srikrishna, in the Rajshuyarambha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XVI.

(RAJSHUYARAMBHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. O Krishna, depending only on courage, how can I send you (to Jarasandha) out of selfish motives and out of the desire of the imperial dignity?

2. I consider Bhima and Aryuna as my eyes and you Janardana as my mind. How shall I be able to live without my eyes and mind?

3. Even Yama cannot defeat the powerful army of Jarasandha who himself is endued with terrible valour. What valour can you show against him?

4. This affair that promises to terminate otherwise may lead to a great mischief. It is, in my opinion, therefore, that the proposed task should not be undertaken.

5. O Janardana, O excellent man, listen to what I think. To desist from this act seems to be beneficial to me. My heart is full of misery to-day. The Rajshnya sacrifice seems to me very difficult to be accomplished.

Vaishampayana said :—

6. Partha (Aryuna) who had the excellent bow (Gandiva), the couple of inexhaustible quivers and the car with the (Ape) standard and also that Sabha, spoke thus to Yudhisthira.

Aryuna said :—

7. O king, I have obtained the bow, the weapons and the arrows, and also energy, allies, dominions, fame and strength. They are all difficult to be obtained, though they may be often desired.

8. All famous men of learning always praise in good society the nobleness of descent; but nothing is equal to prowess. There is nothing I like more than prowess.

9. One, born in a race famous for valour, but without valour, is scarcely worthy of regard. One who is born in a race noted for valour and also possesses valour is much superior to the former.

10. O king, he is in every way a real Kshatrya who increases his fame and possessions by the subjugation of his enemies. He who is possessed of valour, though he has no other merits, will vanquish his enemies.

11. One, who is endued with all accomplishments, but who is destitute of valour, can hardly ever accomplish any thing. Every merit exists by the side of valour in an incipient state.

12—14. Concentration of mind, exertion and destiny, (these three) exist as the three causes of victory. One who possesses valour, but does act with carelessness can never win victory; It is for this that a many endued with strength sometimes suffers death at the hands of his enemies. As meanness overtakes the weak, so folly sometimes overtakes the strong. A king, therefore, who is desirous of victory, should forsake both these causes of destruction.

15. If for the purpose of performing our sacrifice, we try to kill Jarasandha and to rescue the kings kept prisoners by him for his cruel purpose, there could be no act higher than this in which we could employ ourselves.

16. If we do not undertake the task, the world will always regard us as worthless. O king, we have certainly the ability, why should we then be regarded (by the people) as worthless?

17. Those that have become Rishis with the desire of obtaining peace of mind get the red clothes with ease. Therefore, if we defeat the enemy, the imperial dignity will be easily obtained by us. We should, therefore, fight with the enemy.

Thus ends the sixteenth chapter, the consultation for killing Jarasandha, in the Rajshuyarambha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XVII.

(RAJSHUYARAMBHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Krishna said :—

1. Aryuna has shown what should be the inclination of one born in the Bharata race,—specially of one who is the son of Kunti.

2. We do not know when death will overtake us, whether in the night or in the day; nor have we heard that immortality has been obtained by desisting from battle.

3. Therefore, the duty of a man (a hero) is to attack all enemies with the help of the policy indicated in the ordinance. This always gives satisfaction to the heart.

4. If aided by good policy, and if not frustrated by destiny, an undertaking is sure to be crowned with success. If both the parties are aided by such means, and if they fight with each other, one must get the better of the other, for both cannot win or lose.

5. If aided by bad policy which is desitute of all well-known arts, a man is sure to be defeated and meet with destruction. If, however, both parties are equally circumstanced, the result becomes doubtful, but both cannot win.

6. When such is the case, why should we not, with the aid of good policy, go to the enemy and kill him as a river uproots a tree? If hiding our own drawbacks and taking advantage of his holes (faults), we attack the enemy, why should we not be successful?

7. It is the policy of all intelligent men that one should fight with enemies who are exceedingly powerful and who stand at the head of their well-arrayed forces. It is my opinion also.

8. If we can accomplish our purpose by secretly entering the abode of our enemy and attacking his person, we shall never meet with obloquy.

9. That best of men (Jarasandha) alone enjoys unfading prosperity like him who is inner-soul of every created being. But I see his destruction (before me).

10. Desirous as we are of protecting our relatives we shall either kill him, in battle, or being ourselves killed by him we shall ascend to heaven.

Yudhisthira said :—

11. O Krishna, who is this Jarasandha? What is his might, and what is his prowess that he has not been burnt by touching you as a insect is burnt at the touch of fire?

Krishna said :—

12. O king, hear who is Jarasandha, what is his might and prowess, and why he has been spared by us, though he repeatedly offended us.

13. There was a king, named Vrihathara who was the heroic lord of Magadha. He was proud in battle and had an army of three Aukshahinis of soldiers.

14. He was handsome, mighty, wealthy and matchlessly powerful. He always bore (sacrificial) marks on his person and looked like a second Sakra (Indra).

15. He was like Surya in glory, like earth in patience, like the destroyer Yama in anger and like Vaisravana (Kuvera) in wealth.

16. O best of the Bharata race, as the rays of the sun (covers the whole earth), so the whole earth was covered by his merits which descended to him from a long line of ancestors.

17—20. O best of the Bharata race, that greatly powerful hero married the two beautiful twin-daughters of the king of Kashi. That best of men made an engagement in secret with his two wives, namely that he would equally love them both, and that he would never show a preference for any of them. Like a mighty elephant in the company of two female-elephants; or like the ocean in his personified form in the company of the Ganga and the Yamuna, that lord of the earth passed his days in joy in the company of his two wives, both of whom suited him well. His youth passed away in the enjoyment of his wealth.

21. No son was (however) born to him to perpetuate his line; though he performed many auspicious rites, Homas, and sacrifices with the desire of getting a son, yet that best of men did not get a son who could perpetuate his line.

22—23. He heard one day that the illustrious Sandakausika, the son of Kakshivana of the Goutama race, having been tired of ascetic penances, have come to his city in his wandering at pleasure, and that he sat under a tree. The king with his wives gratified the Rishi with presents of jewels.

24. That best of Rishis, ever truthful in speech and firmly devoted to truth, thus spoke to him (the king), "O king of kings, I have been much gratified. O hero of excellent vows, ask from me a boon."

25. Thereupon Vrihatratha with his wives bowed down to the Rishi, and he spoke thus to him, his voice being choked with tears in consequence of his despair to obtain a son.

The king said:—

26. O exalted one, I am about to give up my kingdom and to go into the forest to lead an ascetic life. I am unfortunate, (for not having a son),—what shall I do with the kingdom or with a boon?

Krishna said:—

27. Having heard this the Rishi, sitting in the shade of that very mangoe tree where he was, controlled his outer senses and entered into the Yoga meditation.

28. There fell in the lap of the seated Rishi a juicy mangoe, untouched by the beak of parrots or other birds.

29. That best of Rishis, taking up the fruit and mentally pronouncing some Mantras over it, gave it to the king as the means of his obtaining a son.

30. That greatly learned Rishi spoke thus to the king, "O king, go. Your wish is fulfilled. O king, desist from going to the forest."

31. Having heard these words of the Rishi, the greatly intelligent king bowed down his head before the Rishi and returned to his own house.

32. O best of the Bharata race, recollecting his former promise, that best of kings gave that one fruit to his two wives.

33—34. His two beautiful wives ate the mangoe, dividing it into two equal parts. In consequence of the certainty of the Muni's words and his truthfulness both of them conceived as an effect of their having eaten that fruit. Seeing them in that state, the king was filled with great joy.

35. O greatly wise (king), sometime after when the (proper) season came, each of the two queens brought forth two fragmentary bodies.

36. Each of those two bodies had one eye, one arm, one leg, half a stomach, half a face, and half an anus. Seeing the fragmentary bodies, they (the queens) trembled much.

37. The helpless sisters then in great anxiety consulted with each other; and they abandoned in sorrow the fragments that had life in them.

38. The two midwives then carefully wrapped up those still-born fragments and went out of the inner apartments (of the palace) by the back door. Throwing away the bodies, they returned in haste.

39. O best of men, sometime after a Rakshasha woman, named, Jara who lived on flesh and blood, took up the fragments that lay on a crossing (of roads).

40. Being impelled by Fate, that Rakshasha woman united the fragments to make them easier to carry.

41. O best of men, as soon as the fragments were united, they formed into a heroic child of one body.

42. O king, the Rakshasha woman, with her eyes wide opened in wonder, found herself unable to carry that child who had a body as hard and strong as the thunder-bolt.

43. Closing his coppery red fists and inserting it into its mouth, that child roared as terribly as the clouds charged with rains.

44. O best of men, O chastiser of foes, being much alarmed by the sound, the inmates of the palace along with the king, all came out (to see what was the matter).

45. The helpless, disappointed and the sad queens also, with their breasts full of milk, suddenly came out to get back their child.

46. Seeing them (the queens) in that condition and the king also, who was so much desirous of getting a son, and also the child which was so very strong, the Rakshasha woman reflected thus.

47. "I live in the kingdom of the king who is so eager to get a son. I should not, therefore, kill the child of such a virtuous and illustrious king.

48. Then hiding the child in her arms as the clouds envelope the sun, and assuming a human form, she thus spoke to the lord of the earth (Vrihatratha).

The Rakshashi said:—

49. O Vrihatratha, this is your son. It is given to you by me. Take it. It is born in the wombs of your two wives in consequence of the boon granted to you by the Brahmana. It was abandoned by the midwives, but it was protected by me.

Krishna said:—

50. O best of the Bharata race, having obtained the child, the handsome daughters of the king of Kashi drenched it with their lacteal streams.

51. Having ascertained everything, the king was filled with joy. He then spoke thus to the Rakshasha woman who was in the guise of a human female possessing the complexion of gold.

52. "O lotus-complexioned lady, who are you that give me the child? O blessed lady, you appear to me as a goddess roaming (over the earth) at pleasure."

Thus ends the seventeenth chapter, the birth of Jarasandha, in the Rajshuyarambha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XVIII.

(RAJSHUYARAMBHA PARVA)

—Continued.

The Rakshashi said:—

1. O king of kings, be blessed, I am a Rakshasha woman, called Jara. I am capable of going everywhere at will. Worshipped by all, I live in your house in joy.

2. I am a Rakshashi who always wander from house to house of men. I was formerly created by the self-creator (Brahma) and was named Grihadēvi (household goddess).

3—5. I was endued with celestial beauty, and I was placed (in the world) for the destruction of the Danavas. He, who with devotion paints on the walls (of his house) a likeness of myself who am young and who have children, must have prosperity in his house. He, who does not do it, must meet with decay and destruction. O lord, a likeness of myself, surrounded by many children, is painted on the walls of your house. Placed there, I am daily worshipped with scents, flowers, incense, edibles and various objects of enjoyments.

6. Therefore, O virtuous man, I always think of doing some good to you. It happened that I chanced to see the fragments of the body of your son.

7. On my accidentally uniting them, a boy was born. O great king, it has so happened only out of your good fortune. I have been mere an instrument (in reviving the child).

8. I can swallow (even) the mountain of Meru,—what to speak of your child. I am gratified with the worship that I receive in your house; therefore the child is returned to you.

Krishna said:—

9. O king having said this, she disappeared there and then. Obtaining the child the king then entered his own house.

10. The king then caused all the rites and ceremonies of infancy to be performed on the child; he ordered a festival to be observed in Magadha (by his subjects) in honour of the Rakshasha woman.

11. The father (the king) who was equal to the Grandsire, then bestowed a name on that child. As the (fragments of the body of the child) was united by Jara, he was named Jarasandha.

12—13. The greatly powerful son of the Magadha king began to grow up in bulk and in strength, like a fire into which libations of Ghee have been poured. He delighted the heart of his father and mother, increasing day by day like the moon in the white-fortnight.

Thus ends the eighteenth chapter, the birth of Jarasandha, in the Rajshuyarambha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XIX.

(RAJSHUYARAMBHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Krishna said:—

1. Sometime after, the great ascetic, the illustrious Sandakausika came again to the kingdom of Magadha.

2. Being overjoyed at the arrival of the Rishi, Vrihatratha with his ministers, priest, his son and wives went out to receive him.

3. O descendant of Bharata, worshipping the Rishi with water to wash his feet and with Arghya, the king offered him his son with the whole of his kingdom.

4. O king, the illustrious Rishi accepted the worship of the king and thus spoke to the king of Magadha with a delightful heart.

5. "O king, everything is known to me through my spiritual sight. O king of kings, hear what this your son will be.

6—7. (Hear also) what will be his beauty, excellence, strength and courage. There is not the least doubt that your this son will grow in prosperity and will obtain them, endued as he is with great prowess. No king will be able to equal your greatly powerful son in prowess,

8. As other birds, can never equal the speed of Vinata's son (Garuda). All those that will stand in his way will meet with certain destruction.

9. O king, as the river can make no impression on the mountain, so the weapons hurled upon him even by the celestials will not be able to make any impression on him.

10. He will blaze forth above the heads of all that wear crowns on their heads. Like the sun he will rob all other kings of their splendour.

11. The kings who are rich in their armies and troops will meet with destruction at the hand of your son like insects in the fire.

12. He will seize the growing prosperity of all the kings, as the ocean receives the rivers swollen with the waters of the rainy season.

13. As the wide earth bears all kinds of produce and supports those that are both good and bad, your this greatly powerful son will support all the people of the four orders.

14. All the kings will remain obedient to him, as all embodied beings remain obedient to the wind, which is as dear to beings as the self.

15. This Magadha prince, this mightiest of all mighty men in the world, will see with his physical eyes the god of gods, Rudra, the slayer of Tripura, Hara."

16. Having said this, the Rishi, thinking of his own business, dismissed that slayer of foes, the king Vrihatratha.

17. The Magadha king then re-entered his capital; and summoning all his friends and relatives, he installed Jarasandha on the throne.

18. The king Vrihatratha became greatly disgusted with all worldly pleasures. After the installation of Jarasandha, the king Vrihatratha followed by his two wives went into a forest to lead the life of an ascetic.

19. O king, after his father and mother had retired into the forest, Jarasandha brought numerous kings under his sway by his valour.

Vaishampayana said :—

20. Having lived for a long time in the forest and practised asceticism, (the king) Vrihatratha ascended to heaven with his wives.

21. As told by Kausika, the king Jarasandha received the boons and ruled the kingdom after obtaining the (sovereignty of the) whole world.

22. Sometime after, when the king Kansa was killed by Vasudeva (Krishna), an enmity arose between him and Krishna.

23. O descendant of Bharata, the greatly powerful king of Magadha whirled a club ninety nine times and he hurled it towards Mathura from Giribraja (his capital).

24. Krishna of wonderful deeds was then living in Mathura. That excellent club fell at a distance of ninety-nine Yoyanas,

25. Seeing well all the circumstances the citizens (of Mathura) all went to Krishna and told him all about the fall of the club. The place (where the club fell) was near Mathura, and it was known by the name of Gadavasana.

26. He (Jarasandha) had two supporters, named Hansa and Dimvaka, both incapable of being killed by any weapons, both were learned in the science of politics and morality, and both were in counsel foremost of all intelligent men.

27. I have already told you before every thing about these two greatly powerful heroes. My opinion is that these two heroes and Jarasandha were more than a match for the three worlds.

28. O hero, O great king, it was for this reason that the powerful Akrura, Andhaka and Vrishni tribes, acting from policy, did not fight with him (Jarasandha).

Thus ends the nineteenth chapter, the praise of Jarasandha, in the Rajshuyambha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XX.

(JARASANDHABADHA PARVA).

Krishna said :—

1. Hansa and Dimvaka have fallen, Kansa also with his followers has been killed; the time has, therefore, come for killing Jarasandha.

2. He is incapable of being vanquished in battle by all the celestials and the Asuras. Therefore, my opinion is to defeat him in a single combat.

3. In me is policy, and in Bhima is strength, and we are both protected by Aryuna. We shall vanquish the Magadha king like three (sacrificial) fires.

4. If we three go secretly to that king, there is no doubt he will be engaged in a single combat with one of us.

5. From the fear of disgrace, from covetousness, and from the pride of strength of arms, he will certainly challenge Bhima to a single combat.

6. Like death himself who kills a person however proud he might be, the mighty armed and the greatly powerful Bhima will surely bring about the destruction of the king (Jarasandha.)

7. If you know my heart, if you have any faith in me, then without any further loss of time, give me as a pledge Bhima and Aryuna.

Vaishampayana said :—

8. Having been thus addressed by that exalted being (Krishna), and having seen Bhima and Aryuna standing there with cheerful faces, Yudhisthira thus replied.

Yudhisthira said :—

9. O Achyuta, O chastiser of foes, do not say so. You are the lord of the Pandavas. We are all dependant on you.

10. O Govinda, what you say is (always) consistent with wise counsel. You never lead those on whom Lakshmi (the goddess of prosperity) has turned her back.

11. I am, who always at your command, consider that Jarasandha is already killed, that the kings kept prisoner by him have already been liberated, and that the Rajshuya sacrifice is already accomplished by me.

12. O lord of the universe, O best of men, act soon with care in such a way as this task may be accomplished.

13. Like a sorrowful man afflicted with disease and like a man without Dharma, Artha and Kama, I dare not live without you.

14. Partha (Aryuna) cannot live without Souri (Krishna), and Souri cannot live without Partha. My opinion is that there is nothing unconquerable by these two, namely Souri and Partha.

15. This handsome Vrikodara (Bhima) is the foremost of all strong men. Greatly famous as he is, what may not be achieved by him with you.

16. Troops when led properly do excellent service. The wise men say that troops without a leader is useless. Therefore, troops should be (always) led by experienced leaders.

17. The wise always conduct the water to places that are low. The fishermen take the water through the place where there are holes.

18. We shall, therefore, try to accomplish our object by following the leadership of Govinda (Krishna), who is learned in the science of politics, and whose fame has spread all over the world.

19. If one desires to have a successful end of his purpose, he should always place Krishna at the head,—he is the foremost of all men whose strength consists in wisdom and policy; he is the man who possesses the knowledge of both the means and the methods.

20. For the accomplishment of our purpose, let the son of Pritha (Aryuna) follow the best of the Yadavas, Krishna, and let Bhima follow Dhananjaya (Aryuna). Policy, victory and prowess will bring about success in a matter requiring valour.

Vaishampayana said :—

21. Having been thus addressed (by Yudhisthira), all the three brothers, the two Pandavas and the Vrashneya (Krishna), all possessing great prowess, started for the kingdom of Magadha.

22. They were attired in the garb of Snataka Brahmanas of effulgent bodies; they were blessed by the agreeable speeches of friends and relatives, (when they started).

23. They possessed great prowess, and their bodies were like the sun, the moon and the fire. Being inflamed by the wrath for (the persecution that was perpetrated by Jarasandha on their relatives), their bodies now looked more blazing than before.

24. Seeing the two Krishnas (Krishna and Aryuna) who are invincible in battle, and seeing Bhima at their head,—all the three bent upon performing the same act,—the people considered that Jarasandha was already killed.

25. The illustrious pair (Krishna and Aryuna) were the masters that directed the every operation of the universe; they directed all acts relating Dharma, Artha and Kama.

26. Having started from the Kuru country, they passed through the Kurujangala. They then arrived at the (lake) Padmasara, whence they went to the Kalkuta (mountain). Crossing it,

27. They (finally) crossed the (rivers) Gandaki, the Sadanira and the Sarkaravarta and other rivers, all these (rivers) taking their rise from the same mountain.

28. They then crossed the charming Saraju and saw the eastern Koshalas. Crossing through it, they went to Mithila; and then crossing the rivers Mala and Charmanwati,

29. The Ganges, and the Soae, they proceeded eastwards. Going to the heart of the Kusamva (country), the matchlessly effulgent heroes arrived at Magadha.

30. Getting on the (hill) Goratha, they saw the city of the Magadha king, full of kine, wealth and water. It was very beautiful with the trees that stood everywhere in it.

Thus ends the twentieth chapter, the departure for Magadha, in the Jarasandhabadha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXI.

(JARASANDHABADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Krishna said :—

1. O Partha, behold the great city of Magadha standing in all its beauty. It is full of cattle and other beasts of burden; its stock of water is inexhaustive; it is adorned with fine mansions; and it is (entirely) free from all dangers.

2. The five large hills,—namely Vaihara, Varaha, Vrishava, Rishigiri and the beautiful fifth hill Chaityaka,

3. These five hills, all with high peaks, and with tall trees with cool shades,—all being connected with one another, seem jointly to protect the city of Giribraja.

4. They are concealed by the forests of charming and fragrant Lodhra trees with their branches covered with flowers.

5. This was the place where the illustrious Gotama of the rigid vows begot on the daughter of Ushinara, a Sudra woman, Kakshivana and other famous sons.

6. The race sprung from such a man as Goutama worships the sway of ordinary human race,—it shows the great kindness of Goutama towards kings.

7. O Aryuna, it was here that in olden times the powerful kings of Anga, Banga and other countries came to the hermitage of Goutama and lived in joy and happiness.

8. O Partha, behold the charming forests of Pippalas and beautiful Lodhras standing near the place where Goutama lived.

9. Here were the abodes of the chastisers of foes, the Nagas, Arvuda, Chakrapani, and Swastika, and also that of the excellent Naga, called Mani.

10. Manu himself had made the country of the Magadhas to be free from draught. Kaushika and Maniman also have favoured and blessed this country.

11. Having secured such a charming and impregnable city, Jarasandha does not fear to accomplish all his unrivalled purposes. We shall, however, to-day humble his pride by attacking him.

Vaishampayana said :—

12. Having said this, those brothers of matchless effulgence, the Vrashneya (Krishna) and the two Pandavas (Bhima and Aryuna) entered the city of Magadha.

13. Then they went towards the impregnable city of Girivraja, full of cheerful and well-fed inhabitants belonging to all the four orders of men. The city was ever enlivened with perinial festivities.

14—15. Going to the gate of the city (they did not enter through it); the brothers pierced the heart of the high Chaityaka (hill) which was ever worshipped by the race of Vrihatratha and by the citizens (of Girivraja),—the hill that delighted the hearts of all the Magadhas.

16—19. Here (on this Chaityaka hill) Vrihatratha had killed a cannibal, called Rishava. Having killed the monster, he caused three drums to be made of his skin. He then kept these drums in his city. They were such that if once played upon, their sound lasted for full one month. The brothers (Krishna &c.) broke down the Chaityaka,—ever charming to all the people,—at the place where these drums, covered with celestial flowers, sent forth their continuous sound. Desirous as they were to kill Jarasandha, they seemed to place their feet on the head of their foe by their this act.

20—21. Attacking with their powerful arms that immovable, huge, high, old and famous peak, ever worshipped with perfumes and garlands, those heroes broke it down. They then with joyful hearts entered the city.

22. At that very time the Veda-knowing Brahmanas inhabiting the city saw many evil omens which they duly reported to Jarasandha.

23. The priest made the king mount on an elephant; and he then sanctified him by whirling lighted woods about him. The greatly powerful king Jarasandha commenced a fasting with proper vows to ward off these evils.

24. O descendant of Bharata, they (the brothers) in the meantime, unarmed and with their bare arms as their only weapons, entered the city in the guise of Snataka Brahmanas in order to fight with Jarasandha.

25. They saw many beautiful shops, full of various eatables and garlands,—every shop swelling with every article and every wealth that man can ever desire.

26. Seeing the great wealth of those shops, those best of men, Krishna, Bhima and Dhananjaya (Aryuna), proceeded along the public streets. Those greatly powerful heroes snatched garlands from the flower vendors.

27—29. Having attired in robes of various colours and adorned with garlands and earrings, the heroes entered the palace of the greatly intelligent Jarasandha as Himalayan lions longingly look at the pen of cattle. The arms of those warriors, smeared with sandal and aloe paste, looked like the trunks of Sala trees. O great king, when the people of Magadha saw those heroes with necks as broad as those of Sala trees and with wide chests, they began to be very much astonished.

30. Passing through three rooms crowded with men those best of men, with pride and cheerfulness came to the king.

31—32. Jarasandha rose up in haste saying "Welcome to you." He received his visitors with proper ceremonies, with water to wash their feet, with honey, with Arghya, with gift of kine and with the other forms of respect. O Janamejaya, both Partha and Bhima remained silent.

33. Amongst them the greatly intelligent Krishna thus spoke to him, "O king of kings,—these two are observing a vow. They will not therefore speak.

34. They will remain silent till midnight. After that hour they will talk with you." The king quartered them in the sacrificial apartments, and he then went to his own royal apartments.

35—36. O king, at midnight he (Jarasandha) came to the place where the Brahmanas (Krishna &c.) were. O descendant of Bharata, that ever victorious king observed the vow which was known all over the earth that as soon as he should hear of the arrival of any Snataka Brahmanas in his palace—even if it be midnight, he would immediately come out and grant them an interview.

37. Seeing the strange attire (of his guests), that best of kings, Jarasandha, became, very much astonished, but he waited upon them with all respect.

38. O best of the Bharata race, seeing the king Jarasandha, those best of men, those slayers of foes (Krishna &c.) thus spoke to him,

39. "O king, let salvation be attained by you without any difficulty." And O best of king, having said this to the king, they stood looking at one another.

40. O king of kings, then Jarasandha said to the Pandavas (Bhima and Arjuna) and the Yadava (Krishna), who were all disguised as Brahmanas, "Take your seat."

41. Blazing forth in their own beauty like the three fires of a great sacrifice, these three best of men then took their seats.

42—43. O descendant of Kuru, the firmly truthful king Jarasandha spoke to them thus, "It is well-known to me that no where in the whole world the Brahmanas engaged in observing the Snataka vows ever adorn themselves with garlands or with fragrant paste. Who are you then, thus adorned with flowers and with hands that bear the marks of the bow-string ?

44. Attired in ascetic robes and adorned unseasonably with flowers and fragrant paste, you give me to understand that you are Brahmanas, though you bear all the signs of the Kshatryas. Tell me truly who you are. Truth adorns (even) kings.

45. Breaking down the peak of the Chaityaka hill, why in disguise have you entered (the city) by the other ways than the gates without fearing the royal anger ?

46. The prowess of a Brahmana rests mainly in his speech. Your action does not suit the order you profess to belong. Tell me what is your object to-day.

47. Though you have arrived by such an improper way, why do you not accept the worship I offer to you ? What is your object in coming to me ?"

48. Having been thus addressed, the high-minded Krishna, well-skilled in speech, thus replied to him in a calm and grave voice.

Krishna said :—

49. O king, know us for Snataka Brahmanas. O king of men, O monarch, Brahmanas, Kshatryas and Vaisyas are all competent to observe the Snataka vow.

50. This vow has both special and general rules. A Kshastrya who observes this vow with special rules always obtains (great) prosperity.

51. Persons who adorn themselves with flowers always gain prosperity,—therefore we have adorned ourselves with flowers. The Kshatryas are powerful in their prowess of arms and in the prowess of speech. O son of Vrihadratha, it is therefore the speeches of the Kshatryas are never audacious.

52. O king, the creator has placed his own energy in the arms of the Kshastrya. If you desire to see it,—you will certainly see it to-day.

53. The intelligent men enter the house of the enemy through a way which is not the general gate ; but in the house of a friend they enter by the right gate. This is the rule of the ordinance.

54. O king, know that this is our eternal vow that having entered the house of the enemy for the purpose of accomplishing an object, we do not accept the worship offered by him.

Thus ends the twenty-first chapter, the colloquy between Jarasandha and Krishna, in the Jarasandhabadha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXII.

(JARASANDHABADHA PARVA).

—Continued.

Jarasandha said:—

1. I do not recollect when I have ever done you any injury. After careful reflection, I cannot recollect the injury I have done you.

2. O Brahmanas, when I have never done you any harm, why do you consider me, who am innocent, as your enemy? Tell me truly, for this is the rule followed by the honest.

3—4. If injury is done to one's Dharma and Artha, the mind feels pain. Even a great car-warrior, well versed in all the precepts of morality, gets the fate of sinners and falls off from prosperity, if he injures an innocent man.

5. For honest men the practices of the Kshatriyas are the best in the three worlds. The men that are learned in the precepts of virtue praise nothing else (than the practices of the Kshatriyas.)

6. I adhere to the practices of my order with a steady soul. I never injure any of my subjects. In bringing this charge against me, it appears you speak in error.

Krishna said:—

7. O mighty-armed (hero), there is one who upholds the dignity of a (royal) line. We have come against you at his command.

8. O king, the Kshatriyas of the world have been brought captive by you. Having done this cruel wrong, how do you consider yourself innocent?

9. O best of kings, how can a man, being a king himself, act cruelly against other virtuous kings? After persecuting them, you want to offer them as sacrifices to Rudra.

10. O son of Vrihadratha, this sin, committed by you, may even touch us. We practise virtue, and we are capable of protecting virtue.

11. The slaughter of human beings as sacrifice to the gods is never seen. Why do you then desire to sacrifice human beings to the god Sankara?

12. You are calling all men belonging to your own order as beasts. O Jarasandha, foolish as you are, who else is capable of doing it?

13. Whatever actions are performed by a man under whatever circumstances, he gets the fruits of those actions under whatever circumstances they may be performed.

14. We are desirous of helping all distressed people. For the prosperity of our race, we have come here to kill you, the slayer of our relatives.

15. O king, you consider there is not a Kshatriya equal to you in the world; it is a great error of your judgment.

16. O king, what Kshatriya is there who, possessing greatness of mind and recollecting the dignity of his own parentage, would not ascend the unrivalled heaven by falling on the field of battle?

17. O best of men, know that Kshatriyas, being installed in the sacrifice of war with the view of heaven before them, conquer the whole world.

18. The study of Brahma, great fame, ascetic penances and death in battle are acts that lead men to heaven. The attainment of heaven by the three other acts may be uncertain, but death in battle has heaven for its certain result.

19. It is graced with many merits; it is through this, Satakratu (Indra) has become what he is; he rules the universe by vanquishing the Asuras.

20. Fighting with you is the certain path to heaven, for you are proud of your prowess of arms and of the excessive might of your large Magadha army.

21. O king, do not disregard others'; valour exists in every man. O king of men, there are men whose valour is equal or superior to yours.

22. So long it is not known (to the world), so long only you are famous. O king, I tell you, your prowess can be borne by us.

23. O Magadha king, throw away your superiority and pride in the presence of those that are your equals. Do not go to the abode of Yama with your sons, ministers, and troops.

24. Damvodhvaba, Kartavirya, Uttara, and Vrihadratha,—all these kings met with their destruction, along with all their troops, for disregarding their superiors.

25. We are desirous of liberating the captive monarchs from you. Know that we are certainly not Brahmanas. I am Hrishikesha Sauri,—and these two are the Pandavas.

26. O king, O monarch of the Magadha kingdom, we challenge you (to a single combat). Fight with us with steadiness. Either liberate the kings (now kept prisoner by you) or go to the abode of Yama.

Jarasandha said:—

27. I never make a king prisoner without first defeating him. Who is kept prisoner here who has not been defeated (by me)?

28. O Krishna, it has been said that the duty of the Kshatrya is to bring others under his sway by displaying his own prowess, and then to treat them in the way he likes.

29. O Krishna, recollecting the duty of a Kshatrya, how can I from fear to-day liberate the kings collected by me for the purpose of the god ?

30. I am ready to fight with troops against troops placed in a battle array, or alone against (you) one, two, or three, either at the sametime or separately.

Vaishampayana said :—

31. Having said this, and being willing to fight with those heroes of fearful deeds (Krishna &c.), Jarasandha ordered his son Sahadeva to be installed on the throne.

32. O best of the Bharata race, when the day for the combat came, the king thought of his commanders-in-chief, Kausika and Chitrasena.

33. O king, they were formerly called by the ever renowned names of Hansa and Dimvaka by every body in the world.

34—35. O king, that foremost of all powerful men, the self-controlled lord Sauri (Krishna), that best of men, that slayer of Madhu, ever devoted to truth, the younger brother of Haladhara, knowing that the king of Magadha was destined to be killed in battle by Bhima and not by the destroyer of Madhu, did not at the command of Brahma desire to kill that foremost of all powerful men, that hero as powerful as the tiger, that warrior of terrible valor, king Jarasandha.

Thus ends the twenty second chapter, the preparation for the fight, in the Jarasandhabadha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXIII.

(JARASANDHABADHA PARVA)

—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. The excellent speaker, the descendant of Yadu (Krishna), then thus addressed the king Jarasandha who was resolved upon fight.

Krishna said :—

2. O king, with whom amongst us three you have the mind to fight ? Who amongst us should be ready for battle (with you) ?

Vaishampayana said :—

3. Having been thus addressed, the king of Magadha, the greatly effulgent Jarasandha, desired to fight with Bhimasena.

4. The priest brought the yellow pigment obtained from the cow, garlands of flowers, and other auspicious articles, and also various excellent medicines for restoring lost consciousness and for alleviating pains. He came (with these articles) to the king Jarasandha who was panting for fight.

5. The king's propitiatory ceremonies with benedictions having been performed by an illustrious Brahmana, Jarasandha, remembering the duty of a Kshatrya, dressed himself for battle.

6. Removing his crown and properly binding his hair, Jarasandha stood up like an ocean brusting through its shore.

7. The terribly powerful and intelligent king then thus spoke to Bhima, "O Bhima, I shall fight with you. It is better to be vanquished by a superior man."

8. Having said this, the greatly effulgent Jarasandha, that chastiser of foes, rushed at Bhimasena like the Asura Vala at Sakra (Indra).

9. After having consulted with Krishna and having his propitiatory ceremonies with benedictions been performed by him (Krishna), the powerful Bhimasena also advanced towards Jarasandha with the desire of fight.

10. Then those two best of men, those two greatly powerful heroes, with their bare arms as their only weapons, being each eagerly desirous of defeating the other, cheerfully engaged in the fight.

11. Seizing each other's arms and twining each other's legs, they slapped their arm-pits. They caused the arena to tremble with that sounds.

12. O lord, seizing each other's necks with their hands now and again, and dragging and pushing them with great force, each pressed every limb of the other's body and began to roar.

13. Sometimes stretching their arms, sometimes drawing them close, sometimes raising them up and sometimes dropping them down, they began to seize each other. Striking neck against neck and forehead against forehead, they caused fiery sparks to emit like the flashes of lightning.

14—15. Grasping each other by arms in various ways and kicking each other with such force as to impress the innermost nerves, they struck at each other's breast with clenched fists and with their bare arms as their only weapons. Roaring like clouds, they grasped and struck each other like two mad elephants fighting with their trunks.

16. Becoming angry at each other's blow, they dragged and pushed each other, and they fought on, looking fiercely at each other like two angry lions.

17. Each striking every limb of the other, and each catching hold of the other's waist, they hurled each other to a great distance.

18. Both the heroes were greatly accomplished in wrestling; each clasping the other with arms and each dragging the other to himself, they began to press each other with great force.

19. They then performed the grandest of all feats in wrestling, namely Prishtha-bhanga,—they also performed the feats, called Sampurva Nemcha and Purnakumbha.

20. They also performed the feats Trinapira at pleasure, and then the feat Purnayoga with fists. Thus did the two heroes fight with each other.

21—22. O best of men, thousands of citizens, consisting of Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras, and also women, and even old men, came out and assembled there to witness the fight. The crowd became so great that it grew to be a solid mass of human beings with no space between two persons.

23. The sound they made by the slapping of arms, by the seizing of each other's necks, and by the grasping of each other's legs became so loud that it resembled the roar of thunder or the noise of a falling cliff.

24. Both of them were foremost of strong and powerful men, and both took great delight in such fights. Each was eager to vanquish the other, and each was on the alert to take advantage of the slightest carelessness of the other.

25. O king, the powerful Bhima and Jarasandha, like Vitra and Vasava of old, terribly fought on in the arena, driving the people at times by the motions of their hands.

26—28. Pressing each other forward and dragging each other backward, throwing each other's face downwards and side ways with sudden jerks, they dreadfully mangled each other. They struck each other with keen joints. They loudly addressed each other in stinging words; they struck each other with clenched fists, the blows descending like a mass of stone on another mass of stone. With broad shoulders and long arms, the two well-skilled wrestlers struck each other with their long arms which were like clubs made of iron.

29—30. The fight began on the first day of the month of Kartic, and those two illustrious heroes fought on continuously without food, and without intermission of day or night till the thirteenth day. It was on the night of the fourteenth day, the Magadha king stopped from fatigue.

31. O king, seeing the monarch (Jarasandha) tired, Janardana (Krishna) thus spoke to Bhima of terrible deeds to encourage him.

Krishna said :—

32. O son of Kunti, the foe that has become tired in the fight cannot be pressed. If pressed at such a time, he may even die.

33. Therefore, O son of Kunti, you should not oppress this king (now). O best of the Bharata race, fight with your arms only in such a way as your antagonist may be equal to you.

Vaishampayana said :—

34. Having been thus addressed by Krishna, and knowing the state of Jarasandha, the Pandava (Bhima), the slayer of hostile heroes, determined to kill him.

35. That foremost of all strong men, that descendant of Kuru, Vrikodara (Bhima), mustered all his strength and courage with the desire of now vanquishing the hitherto unvanquished Jarasandha.

Thus ends the twenty third chapter, the fatigue of Jarasandha, in the Jarasandha-badha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXIV.

(JARASANDHA-BADHA PARVA.)

—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. Thereupon Bhimsena, his mind firmly set on the desire of killing Jarasandha, thus spoke to the descendant of Yadu, Krishna, "O Krishna, O best of the Yadu race, this wretch is still before me with girded loins and with sufficient strength. He should not be excused by me."

3—4. Having been thus addressed, Krishna, that best of men, with the desire of seeing soon an end of Jarasandha, thus replied to Vrikodara (Bhima), "O Bhima, the strength that you have derived from the celestials,—the might that you have obtained from Maruta, display them to-day towards Jarasandha."

5. Having been thus addressed, that chastiser of foes, that greatly strong (hero), Bhima, raised up the strong Jarasandha and whirled him on high.

6. O best of the Bharata race, having thus whirled him high for one hundred times, he (Bhima) pressed his knee against his (Jarasandha's) backbone and broke his body into two parts. (Having thus killed him), he roared aloud.

7. The roar of the Pandava (Bhima), mingled with that of Jarasandha while he was being broken by Bhima's knee, raised such a loud roar that it struck fear into the heart of every creature.

8. The people of Magadha became dumb with fear; and even many women were prematurely delivered by the roars of Bhima and Jarasandha.

9. Hearing the roars of Bhima, the people of Magadha thought that either Himalayas were coming down or the earth is being rent assunder.

10. The chastiser of foes (Krishna) left at night the dead body of the king at the palace gate, as if he was but asleep. They then came out (of the palace.)

11. Krishna made ready the chariot of Jarasandha with the excellent standard; and he then placed on it the two brothers (Bhima and Aryuna). He then liberated the friends (the captive kings).

12. Having been freed from their great fear, those monarchs, those kings, those possessors of gems came to Krishna and presented him with many gems and jewels.

13. Unwounded, (now) with (many) weapons, vanquishing the foe, he (Krishna), riding on the celestial car (of Jarasandha), came out with the kings from the city of Giribraja.

14. He, who wielded the bow with both hands, who was invincible to all kings, and who was exceedingly handsome and well-skilled in killing the enemy, came out with that possessor of great strength Bhima, and Krishna drove the car.

15. That celestial car,—invincible to all warriors,—ridden by the heroes, Bhima and Aryuna, and driven by Krishna, looked exceedingly beautiful.

16. It was in this very car that Indra and Vishnu fought in the battle of old (with the Asuras) in which Taraka (the wife of Vrihaspati) was the cause, and the result of which was a great slaughter. Riding on that very car, Krishna now came out.

17. It possessed the splendour of heated gold, it was adorned with rows of jingling bells, it had wheels that made the clatter like the roars of the clouds, it was ever victorious in battle and it always killed the foes.

18. Riding on it, Sakra (Indra) killed ninety nine Danavas of old. Those best of men (Krishna &c.) were exceedingly pleased on obtaining this car.

19. Seeing the long-armed Krishna on the chariot with the two brothers, (Bhima and Aryuna), the people of Magadha became very much astonished.

20. O descendant of Bharata, that car, with which were yoked celestial horses with the speed of the wind and which was driven by Krishna, looked exceedingly beautiful.

21. On this best of cars there was a flag-staff without being visibly attached thereto. It was the product of celestial art. That beautiful flag-staff could be seen from a distance of a Yojana, and it had the splendour of the rainbow.

22. When coming out, Krishna thought of Garuda. As soon as thought of, he came there like a large tree worshipped by all.

23. The eater of snakes, Garuda of immense weight of body, sat on that excellent car along with innumerable other open-mouthed and fearfully roaring creatures on its flagstaff.

24. Thereupon that best of cars became more dazzling than before; and like the sun in midday, surrounded by thousand rays, it became incapable of being looked at by any living creature.

25. O king, such was that celestially made and the best flagstaff that it never struck against a tree. The weapons could not any way injure it, although it was visible to the human eye.

26. That best of men, Achyuta (Krishna), riding with the two Pandavas (Bhima and Aryuna) on that celestial car, the wheels of which made a clatter like the roars of the clouds, came out (of Giribraja.)

27. It (the car) was obtained by the king Vasu from Vasava (Indra). From Vasu it was obtained by Vrihatratha; from Vrihatratha it was in due course obtained by the king (Jarasandha), the son of Vrihatratha.

28. The long armed, the lotus-eyed and the greatly famous (Krishna), coming out (of Giribraja), stopped on a level plain outside the city.

29. O king, all the citizens with the Brahmans at their head then hastened there to adore him according to the due rites of the ordinance.

30. The kings, who had been liberated from their confinement, worshipped the slayer of Madhu ; and they thus spoke to him in eulogistic words.

31—32. " O mighty armed (hero), O son of Devaki, such an act of virtue is not (at all) wonderful in you. Assisted as you are by the prowess of Bhima and Aryuna, you have to-day rescued the kings who sank in the fearful mire of sorrow in the lake of Jarasandha.

33. O Vishnu, O descendant of Yadu, we were languishing in the fearful hill-fort (of Jarasandha) ; from our good fortune alone, you have rescued us and earned a great renown.

34. O best of men, we bow to you. Command us what we shall do. However difficult it may be to carry out your command, know, it is already carried out by the kings (ourselves)."

35. Giving them every assurance, thus replied to them Hrishikesha (Krishna), " Yudhisthira is desirous of performing the Rajshuya (sacrifice).

36. That king, ever devoted to virtue, is solicitous to acquire the imperial dignity. Knowing this from me, help him in his attempt."

37. O best of kings, thereupon all those monarchs, saying "Be it so," accepted with joyous heart all that Krishna said.

38. The monarchs made presents of jewels to the hero of Dasarha race (Krishna). Govinda (Krishna), out of kindness towards them, only took a portion of those presents.

39. The son of Jarasandha, the high-minded Sahadeva, came out there with his relatives and his ministers, his priest being at the head of the procession.

40. Sahadeva bowed low before the god among men, Vasudeva ; and presenting him many gems and jewels, he worshipped him.

41. That best of men (Krishna) gave every assurance to that very much frightened prince and accepted his very valuable presents.

42—43. He (Krishna) gladly installed there the son of Jarasandha ; and thus being installed on the throne of Magadha by those exalted men and having been obtained the friendship of Krishna and being treated with respect and kindness by the two sons of Pritha, the mighty armed and the illustrious son of Jarasandha (Sahadeva) entered the city of the son of Vrihatratha (Jarasandha).

44. That best of men (Krishna), accompanied by the sons of Pritha and enriched with much wealth and laden with numerous jewels, went away (from Giribraja).

45. Achyuta (Krishna), accompanied by the two Pandavas (Bhima and Aryuna), arrived at Indraprastha and went to Yudhisthira. He joyfully addressed the king and said,

46. "O best of kings, the powerful Jarasandha has been killed by Bhima from good fortune. The kings, confined at Giribraja, have all been liberated.

47. O descendant of Bharata, from good fortune, these two Bhima and Dhananjaya (Aryuna), are well. They have arrived at their own city unwounded."

48. Then Yudhisthira worshipped Krishna as he deserved ; and he embraced Bhima and Aryuna in joy.

49. Having obtained victory through the agency of his brothers by the death of Jarasandha, Ajatsatru (Yudhisthira) passed his time with his brothers in great merriment.

50. The Pandava (Yudhisthira) with his brothers came to the kings (who had come to Indraprastha.) Entertaining and worshipping them each according to his age, he sent them away.

51. Having been commanded by Yudhisthira, those kings with joyful hearts and without any further loss of time started on their excellent vehicles for their own respective kingdoms.

52. O king, thus did that best of men, the greatly intelligent Janardana (Krishna), cause his foe Jarasandha to be killed through the instrumentality of the Pandavas.

53. O descendant of Bharata, having caused the death of Jarasandha by policy, that chastiser of foes, (Krishna) took leave of Yudhisthira, Pritha, (Kunti), Krishna (Draupadi).

54. Suvadra, Bhimasena, Falguni (Aryuna); and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva). Taking leave of Dhaumya, he started for his own city (Dwarka)

55. On that celestially-made and the best of cars, which possessed the speed of mind, and which was given to him by Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), and which filled the ten points of the horizon with the rattle of his wheels.

56. O best of the Bharata race, when Krishna was about to start, the Pandavas with Yudhisthira at their head walked round that best of men (Krishna) who was never fatigued with exertion.

57. O descendant of Bharata, having acquired that great victory and having also dispelled the fears of the kings, when the illustrious Krishna, the son of Devaki went away,

58. That feat of his increased the fame of the Pandavas. O descendant of Bharata, O king, the Pandavas (thus) increased the great happiness of Draupadi.

59. Whatever is consistent with Dharma, Artha and Kama continued at that time to be properly performed by king Yudhishthira in the exercise of his duties in protecting his subjects.

Thus ends the twentyfourth chapter, the death of Jarasandha, in the Jarasandha badha of the Sabha Parva

CHAPTER XXV.

(DIGVIJAYA PARVA).

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having obtained that best of bows (Gandiva) and the couple of inexhaustible quivers and the car and the (ape standard) flagstaff, Aryuna spoke to Yudhishthira thus.

Aryuna said :—

2. O king, bow, weapons, great prowess, allies, dominions, fame, troops,—all these have been obtained by me, though they are all difficult to be gained, however a man may desire to have them.

3. O best of kings, I think we should now do that by which we shall be able to increase our treasury. I desire to make the (other) kings pay tribute to us.

4. I shall start, in an auspicious moment of a holy day of the moon under a favourable constellation, to conquer the kingdoms situated in the quarter protected by the lord of wealth (Kuvera).

Vaishampayana said :—

5. Having heard the words of Dhananjaya (Aryuna), Dharmaraja Yudhishthira thus replied to him in a grave and calm voice.

Yudhishthira said :—

6. O best of the Bharata race, start, but first cause the holy Brahmanas to utter benedictions on you, so that you may plunge your enemies into grief and make your friends happy.

7. O Partha, victory will surely be yours. Your desires will surely be fulfilled.

Vaishampayana said :—

Having been thus addressed, Aryuna, surrounded by a large number of troops, started (for conquest).

8—9. He started on the celestial car of great deeds which he had obtained from Agni. Bhimasena, and those best of men, the long-armed twins Nakula and Sahadeva, also having been affectionately worshipped by Dharmaraja Yudhishthira, started (for conquest). The son of the chastiser of Paka (Aryuna) conquered all the countries situated in the direction protected by the lord of wealth (Kuvera).

10. O king, Bhimasena conquered the East, Sahadeva the south, and well-skilled in arms, Nakula, conquered the west.

11. Surrounded by his friends and relatives, the lord Dharmaraja Yudhishthira lived in the enjoyment of great affluence within the Khandavaprastha.

Thus ends the twentyfifth chapter, the summary of conquests, in the Digvijaya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXVI.

(DIGVIJAYA PARVA)—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. O Brahmana, narrate to me in full the history of the conquests of the various directions (by the Pandavas). I am not satiated with listening to the great history of my ancestors.

Vaishampayana said :—

2. The earth was conquered simultaneously by all the sons of Pritha. I shall first describe the conquest of Dhananjaya (Aryuna).

3. The mighty armed Dhananjaya, by the greatest courageous feats first, conquered the king of the Kulindas.

4. Having conquered the Kulindas, the Anastas and the Kalkuttas, he conquered Sumandala with his troops.

5. O king, the chastiser of foes, Shabyashachi (Aryuna) conquered with him (Sumandala) the island of Sakala, and also the king Pritivindhya.

6. Sakala was one of the seven islands of the earth, and there were many kings on that island. A fearful battle took place between them and their troops and Aryuna.

7. But O best of the Bharata race, those great bowmen were all defeated by Aryuna. With them all, he then attacked the kingdom of Pragjotisha.

8. O king, the king of that country was Bhagadatta. A great battle was fought by the illustrious Pandava with him.

9. The king of Pragjotisha was supported by hosts of Kiratas and Chins and by numerous other warriors that dwelt on the sea-coast.

10. Having fought with Dhananjaya (Aryuna) continuously for eight days and having found him not the least tired in the battle, the king Bhagadatta smilingly said to him,

11. "O mighty-armed (hero), O descendant of Kuru, this energy in battle is well-suited to you, (for) you are the son of the chastiser of Paka (Indra) and an ornament in battle.

12. O child, I am the friend of Indra,—I am scarcely inferior to him in battle, (but) I cannot stand before you.

13. O son of Pandu, tell me what is your desire? What can I do for you? O mighty-armed hero, O son, I shall do what you will tell me to do.

Aryuna said :—

14. That foremost of the Kurus, the king Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, learned in the precepts of all virtues, devoted to truth and a performer of sacrifices in which Dakshina is very large, (desires to obtain imperial dignity).

15. I desire to see him acquire (it) the imperial dignity. Let tribute be paid by you to him. You are my father's friend, and you have been also gratified by me. I cannot command you. Therefore, let the tribute be paid by you with cheerfulness and at your own (free) will.

Bhagadatta said :—

16. O son of Kunti, as you are to me, so is also the king Yudhisthira. I shall do all this; tell me what else I can do for you.

Thus ends the twenty sixth chapter, the victory over Bhagadatta, in the Digvijaya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXVII.

(DIGVIJAYA PARVA)—Continued,

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having been thus addressed, Dhananjaya (Aryuna) thus replied to Bhagadatta. "If you give me your promise to do it, you will have done all that I desire."

2. Having thus conquered him, the mighty armed son of Kunti, Dhananjaya, then went towards the north, the direction presided over by the lord of wealth (Kuvera).

3. The son of Kunti, that best of men, conquered the inner-mountains, the outer-mountains and the smaller mountains.

4. Having conquered all the mountains and all the kings that lived on them and having brought them under his sway, he exacted tribute from them all.

5. O king, having won the affection of those kings, and having united himself with them, he next marched against Vrihanta, (who was) the king of Uluka,

6. Trembling the earth with the sound of his drums, with the clatter of his chariot wheels and with the roar of the elephants that were with his troops.

7. Vrihanta soon came out of his city with his five kinds of troops and gave battle to Falguni (Aryuna).

8. The battle that took place between Vrihanta and Dhananjaya was a terrible one. But Vrihanta was not able to stand against the prowess of the son of Pandu (Aryuna).

9. Thinking that the son of Kunti was incapable of being withstood, that invincible mountain-king came to him with all his wealth.

10. O king, having made peace with him and having placed him in his kingdom, he (Aryuna) marched against Senvindu whom he expelled from his kingdom.

11. He then subjugated Modapura, Vamadeva, Sudamana, Susankula, the northern Ulukas and the kings and the people of those countries.

12. O king, at the command of Yudhisthira, Kiriti (Aryuna) brought under his sway all these five countries and their people by sending only his troops against them and not moving himself from the city (of Senvindu).

13. After his arrival at Devaprastha, the city of Senvindu, the lord (Aryuna) took up his quarters there with his five kinds of troops.

14. Surrounded by the kings and all the people whom he subjugated, he marched against that best of men, the descendant of Puru, Vishwagosa.

15. O king, having subjugated in battle the brave mountaineers who were all great warriors, the son of Pandu (Aryuna) conquered with the help of his troops the city protected by the Puru king.

16. Having vanquished the Puru king, and also the robber tribes of the mountains, the son of Pandu brought under his sway the seven tribes, called Utsavasankata.

17. That best of Kshatriyas (Aryuna) then vanquished the brave Kshatriyas of Kasmira, and also the king Lohita, as well as ten minor chiefs.

18. O king, then the Trigarthas, the Danavas, the Kokonadas and various other Kshatryas advanced against the son of Kunti.

19. That descendant of Kuru (Aryuna) then conquered the charming city, named Avisari. He then vanquished Rochomana, who ruled in Urga.

20. The son of the chastiser of Pakka (Aryuna) then conquered the charming city of Singhapura which was well protected by all kinds of weapons.

21. Then that best of the Pandavas, the descendant of Kuru, Kiriti (Aryuna), marched against the countries, called Sumba and Sumala, and attacked them.

22. Then after attacking with great force, the son of Indra (Aryuna) subjugated the Valhikas, ever difficult to vanquish.

23. The son of Pandu, and the son of Indra, Falguni (Aryuna), then took with him a select force and defeated the Daradas along with the Kambojas.

24. The lord (Aryuna) vanquished the robber tribes that lived in the north-eastern frontier, and those also that lived in the forest.

25. O great king, the son of Indra also subjugated the allied tribes of the Lokas, the eastern Kambhojas and the Northern Rishikas.

26. The battle with the Rishikas was very fearful. The battle that took place between them and the son of Pritha (Aryuna) was equal to that between the gods and the Danavas, the immediate cause of which was Taraka (the wife of Vrihaspati).

27. O king, having vanquished the Rishikas on the field of battle, he took from them as tribute eight horses that were of the colour of the parrot's breast,

28. And some other horses also which had the colour of peacocks, these horses were all born in northern and other countries, and possessed great speed.

29. Thus having conquered all the Himalayas and the Nishkuta mountains, he at last arrived at the white mountains and encamped on it.

Thus ends the twentyseventh chapter, the conquests of various countries, in the Digvijaya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

(DIGVIJAYA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. After having crossed the white mountains, that greatly powerful hero conquered the country of the Kimpurashas which was ruled by Drumaputra.

2. After a great battle in which great was the slaughter of Kshatryas, that best of the Pandavas brought the country under his complete control.

3. Having conquered this country, the son of Indra, with a determined mind and with a large number of troops, subjugated the country, named Hutaka, ruled by the Guhakas.

4. Having subjugated them by a policy of conciliation, that descendant of Kuru saw that excellent lake, called Manasa. He saw also various other lakes and tanks sacred to the Rishis.

5. Having arrived at the Manasa (lake), the lord Pandava (Aryuna) conquered the regions, ruled by the Gandharvas—the regions that lay around the Hataka countries.

6. The victor (Aryuna) took from the city of the Gandharvas as his tribute many excellent horses, called Tittiri, Kularasha, and Manduka.

7. Wishing to conquer that country, the son of Indra, the Pandava (Aryuna), came to the country of North Harivarsha.

8. Thereupon some greatly powerful, strong and huge-bodied frontier guards came to him and thus cheerfully spoke to him.

9. "O Partha, this country cannot be conquered by you. If you seek your good, return from this place. O Achyuta, your conquests are already enough.

10. He that enters this country,—if he is human,—is sure to perish. We are pleased with you,—your conquests are (already) too many.

11. O Aryuna, there is nothing to be seen here; there is nothing to be conquered here by you. The Northern Kurus live here,—there cannot be any war here.

12. O son of Kunti, even if you enter this country, you will not be able to see any thing, for nothing can be seen here with human eyes.

13. O best of men, O descendant of Bharata, if, however, you desire to have any thing else, tell us, we may do your bidding."

14. Having been thus addressed, Aryuna smilingly thus spoke to them, "I desire the Acquisition of the imperial dignity for the intelligent Dharmaraja Yudhisthira.

15. If this country is shut against human beings, I shall not enter it. Let something be given by you as tribute to Yudhisthira."

16. Thereupon they gave him as tribute many celestial clothes and ornaments, and many celestial silks and celestial skins.

17. It was thus that best of men (Aryuna) conquered the northern countries, and all the kings (of those countries); and he fought many battles both with the Kshatryas and the robber tribes.

18. Having thus vanquished and subjugated many kings and countries, he exacted tribute from them all, and (he thus) obtained much wealth and many gems and jewels,

19. And many swift horses of the species, called Tittiri and Kalunsha, and also many others with the colour of peacocks.

20. O king, surrounded by a large army of the four kinds of troops, the hero (at last) returned to the city of Indraprastha.

21. Partha (Aryuna) offered to Dharmaraja all the wealth and the animals brought by him. Commanded by the king, the hero went to his chamber to take rest.

Thus ends the twenty eighth chapter, Arjuna's northern conquests, in the Digvijaya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXIX.

(DIGVIJAYA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. In the meantime, having received the permission of Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), the powerful Bhimasena marched towards the east.

2—3. That best of the Bharata race (Bhima), that hero of great valour and enhancer of the enemy's sorrow, was accompanied by a powerful army with the full compliment of elephants, horses and cars, —an army well-armed and capable of grinding all hostile kingdoms,—that best of men (Bhima) first went to the great country of the Panchalas.

4—5. The Pandava (Bhima) began to conciliate the Panchalas by various means. Then that best of the Bharata race soon defeated the Gandakas and Videhas. The lord (Bhima) then subjugated the Dasarnas. The king of the Dasarnas, Sudharma,

6. Fought a fearful battle with Bhima without any arms. Seeing the feat of that illustrious (king), Bhimasena installed the mighty Sudharma as the generalissimo (of his army.)

7. O king, causing the earth itself to tremble with the tread of the mighty army that followed him, then Bhima of fearful valour marched towards the east.

8. O king, that hero, the foremost of all mighty men, then defeated in battle Rachaman, the king of Ashwameda, with all his troops.

9. Having vanquished that king by performing feats that excelled in fierceness, the greatly powerful descendant of Kuru subjugated the eastern region.

10. He then went to the south in the great city of the Pulindas and subjugated Sukumara and the king Sumitra.

11. O Janamejaya, then at the command of Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, that best of the Bharata race marched against the greatly powerful Shishupal.

12. Having heard the intentions of the Pandava (Bhima), the king of Chedi came out of his city. That chastiser of foes then received the son of Partha with all respects.

13. O great king, those two best of the Kuru and the Chedi races then met together and enquired after each other's welfare.

14. O king, the king of Chedi offered his kingdom to Bhima, and he smilingly said, "O sinless one, what are you bent upon to do.?"

15. Thereupon Bhima told him all about the intentions of the king Yudhisthira. That king acted as desired (by the Pandava).

16. O king, having been duly entertained by Sishupala, Bhima lived there for thirty nights. He then set out from Chedi with his troops and vehicles.

Thus ends the twenty ninth chapter, the conquests of Bhima, in the Digvijaya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXX.

(DIGVIJAYA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon that chastiser of foes vanquished (king) Sriniman of the country of Kumara, and then Vrihadvala, the king of Koshala,

2. The best of the Pandavas (Bhima) then vanquished the greatly powerful and virtuous (king) Dirghayagma of Ayodhya by performing greatly fearful deeds.

3. The lord (Bhima) then subjugated the country of Gopalakaksha and the northern Koshalas, and then the king of the Mallar.

4. The powerful (hero), then arrived at the damp country at the foot of the Himalayas and soon subjugated the whole of that country.

5. That best of the Bharata race (Bhima), thus brought under his sway various countries. He conquered the country of Ballata and also the mountains of Saktimanta.

6. The foremost of all powerful men, the greatly mighty Pandava (Bhima), then vanquished in battle Suvahu, the king of Kashi, who never retreated (from the field);

7—8. And the mighty armed Bhima of fearful prowess brought him also under his sway. Then that best of the Pandavas by great force vanquished in battle Kratha who reigned (over a kingdom) near Suparsa. Then the greatly effulgent (hero) vanquished the Matsas and the mighty Malavas,

9. And all the countries, called Pashubhumi, which were free from all fear of oppression. Returning (from these places), that mighty armed (hero) vanquished Madadhara and Mahidhara,

10. And the Sinadheyas. He then marched towards the north. The mighty son of Kunti (Bhima) then by force conquered the country, named Vatsavumi.

11. He then conquered the king of the Bhargas, the king of the Nishadas, and many other rulers, Maniman being at their head.

12. Then Bhima without any very great effort soon vanquished the southern Mallas, and the mountain Bhagavanta.

13—14. He then vanquished the Samakas and the Varmakis by a policy of conciliation. That best of men then without any very great exertion vanquished the king of Videha, the lord of the universe, Janaka. He then by craftiness vanquished the Sukas and the barbarians.

15. The son of Kunti, the Pandava (Bhima), sent forth expeditions from Videha and conquered the seven kings of the Kiratas, living on the Indra Parvata (mountain).

16—17. Thereupon the greatly energetic and powerful hero, the son of Kunti (Bhima), vanquished the Suhamas and the Prashumas, winning over to his side Danda and Dandadhara. Being accompanied by all other kings, the Pandava (Bhima) then marched towards Girivraja.

18. Having subjugated the son of Jarasandha by conciliation and having made him pay tribute, the hero, accompanied by all the kings he had vanquished, marched against Karna.

19. Making the earth tremble by his troops of four kinds, that best of the Pandavas fought (a battle) with that slayer of foes, Karna.

20. O descendant of Bharata, having vanquished and brought under his sway Karna, he then vanquished the powerful kings who lived on the mountains.

21. The Pandava (Bhima) then in a fearful fight killed by the strength of his arms the mighty king who dwelt in Madagiri.

22. O king, he then subjugated the heroic and greatly powerful Vasudeva, the king of Pandra, and the king Manjasha who lived in Kausikacha.

23. O great king, having vanquished both these heroic and greatly powerful kings, the son of Pritha (Bhima) then attacked the king of Banga.

24. Having vanquished Savendrasena and the king Chandrasena, the king of Tamralipta and the king of Karkata,

25. The ruler of the Sumashas and also the kings that lived on the sea coast, the best of the Bharata race (Bhima) subjugated all the Mlechas.

26. Having thus conquered various countries and having taken much wealth from them all, the powerful son of Pavana (wind), came to Lohitya.

27. From all the kings of the Mlechas who lived on the coast of the sea, he exacted tribute in the shape of various gems and jewels,

28. Sandal-wood, ales, cloths, gems, pearls, blankets, gold, silver and valuable corals.

29. They (the Mlecha kings) showered upon the illustrious son of Kunti, the Pandava (Bhima), a very thick shower of wealth counted by hundreds of millions.

30. Having arrived at Indraprastha, Bhima of fearful prowess offered all those wealth to Dharmaraja (Yudhishthira).

Thus ends the thirtieth chapter, the northern conquests of Bhima, in the Digvijaya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXXI.

(DIGVIJAYA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. O king, having been sent away with affection by Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), with a very large army Sahadeva was marched towards the south.

2. That powerful descendant of Kuru, the lord (Sahadeva), strong in his own strength, vanquished the Surasenas at the very outset. He then subjugated the king of Matsa.

3. Having vanquished the powerful king of the Adhirajas, Dantavakra, and having made him pay tribute, the hero (Sahadeva) then replaced him on his throne.

4. He then subjugated Sukumara and the king Sumitra, and then the other Matsas, and then the Patacharas.

5. The greatly intelligent (Sahadeva) then soon conquered the country of the Nishadas and also the best of hills, called Gosringa, and the king, called Sriniman.

6. Having then conquered the country, named Navarashtra, he marched against Kuntibhoja. He (the king of Kuntibhoja) very willingly accepted the sway (of the Pandavas).

7. Then on the banks of the Sarmanvati, he met the son of the king Jamvaka who had been formerly defeated by Vasudeva for some old hostilities.

8. O descendant of Bharata, he fought a battle with Sahadeva, but he (Sahadeva) defeated him and then marched towards the south.

9. The greatly powerful hero then subjugated the Shekas and the other Shekas, and exacted tribute from them in the shape of various gems and jewels.

10—11. With them all, he then went towards the country watered by the Narmada. The mighty son of Ashwinis (Sahadeva) then vanquished in a battle the two heroic kings of Avanti, named Vinda and Anuvinda who were surrounded by a large number of soldiers. Having exacted much wealth from them, he went towards the city of Bhojakota.

12. O king, O Achyuta (unfading glory), a great battle was fought there for two days. But the son of Madri, Sahadeva, defeated the invincible Bhisma.

13. He then defeated in battle the king of Koshala, the king of Venatatha, the Kantarakas, and the kings of the eastern Koshalas.

14—15. Having then defeated in battle, the Natakeyas and the Heramvakas, and having subjugated the Marudas, he conquered Munjagrama by force. He then vanquished the kings of the Nachinas, the Arvukas and the various other forest kings who ruled in that part of the country. The greatly powerful son of Pandu then subjugated the king Vatadhira.

16. Having defeated in battle the Pulindas, he marched towards the south. The younger brother of Nakula (Sahadeva) then fought for a day with the king of Pandra.

17. Having vanquished him, the mighty armed (hero) went (further) towards the south. He then came to the world-renowned caves of Kiskindhya.

18. Here fought he for seven days with the monkey kings, named Mainda and Dwivida. They too, however, did not at all feel fatigued (in the fight.)

19. Those two illustrious monkey-kings (were much) pleased with Sahadeva, and they thus joyfully spoke to him these affectionate words.

20. "O best of the Pandavas, go (back) on receiving wealth from us. Let the work of the intelligent Dharmaraja be accomplished without any hinderance."

21. Thereupon, having received wealth, that best of men, (Sahadeva), marched towards the city of Mahesmati. He fought there a battle with king Nila.

22. The battle between that chastiser of foes, the powerful Pandava, Sahadeva, and the king (Nila) was very fearful.

23. It destroyed many soldiers, and it endangered the life (of the hero Sahadeva), for the lord, the carrier of sacrificial libation (Fire), was helping him (the king Nila).

24. The cars, horses, elephants, and the well-armoured men of Sahadeva's army all appeared as if they were on fire.

25. Seeing this, that descendant of Kuru was filled with great anxiety. O Janmejaya, seeing this, the hero could not resolve upon what he should do.

Janamejaya said:—

26. O exalted one, O Brahmana, why was it that the deity Agni became hostile in battle to Sahadeva who was fighting for the accomplishment of a sacrifice?

Vaishampayana said:—

27. It is heard that Agni, living in the city of Mahesmati, was formerly taken for an adulterer.

28. The daughter of the king Nila was exceedingly handsome. She always used to stay near her father's Agnihotra (sacred fire) to stir it up.

29. Being fanned as much as was possible, the fire did not blaze up, till it was not blown by the breaths of the sweet lips of that girl.

30. It was said in the king Nila's palace and in the houses of all (men) that the illustrious Agni wanted to marry that beautiful maiden; and he was (in fact) accepted by her.

31. One day when he (Agni), assuming the form of a Brahmana, was enjoying at pleasure in the company of that handsome girl, he was discovered by the king. The virtuous monarch then ordered the Brahmana to be punished according to law.

32. Thereupon the illustrious carrier of sacrificial libations (Agni) blazed up in wrath. Seeing this, the king was filled with astonishment, and he bent his head to the ground.

33. After sometime, bending his head low, the king bestowed his that daughter on Agni who was in the disguise of a Brahmana.

34. The illustrious Vivavashu (Agni) accepted that fair-browed daughter of the king Nila, and he bestowed on the king his favours.

35. The illustrious gratifier of all purposes (Agni) also asked the king to solicit a boon from him. The king asked the boon by which he with his troops while engaged in battle might never be struck with panic.

36. O king, from that day he, who out of ignorance of this, desires to subjugate the city of the king (Nila), is consumed by fire.

37—38. O perpetuator of the Kuru race, from that day the girls of the city of Mahesmati became rather unacceptable to others (as wives). Agni by his boon granted them sexual liberty. The women of that city, being not confined to a particular husband, always roamed as Sairini at will.

39. O best of the Bharata race, O great king, from that day all the kings avoid this city for the fear of fire.

40. O king, the virtuous-minded Sahadeva also, seeing his troops afflicted with fear and encircled with flames, stood motionless as a mountain. Touching water and purifying himself, he thus spoke to Pavaka (fire).

Sahadeva said:—

41. O Pavaka, O Krishnabartana (having smoke for marking your track), I bow to you. You are the mouth of the celestials; you are the sacrifice itself.

42. You are called Pavaka, because you sanctify every thing; you are called Havva-vahana, because you carry the sacrificial libation of Ghee. The Vedas have all sprung from you, and therefore, you are called Fatavedas.

43. You are Suresha (chief of the celestials), you are Chitravanu, Avala, Sargadarspari, Vivavasu, Hutasa, Jalana, Sikhi,

44. Vaishwanara, Pingesa, Plavanga and Bhuitagas. You are the origin of Kumara (Kartikeya). O exalted one, you are called Rudragarva and Hiranyaksit.

45. O Agni, let yourself grant me energy and let Vayu grant me life. Let earth grant me nourishment and strength, and let water grant me prosperity.

46. O the first cause of waters. O great purity, O the origin of the Vedas, O the chief of the celestials, O the mouth of the celestials, purify me by your truth.

47. The Rishis, the Brahmanas, the celestials and the Asuras every day pour Ghee in the sacrifice according to the ordinance. Let the rays of truth emanate from you as you exhibit yourself in sacrifices. Purify me,

48. O smoke-bannered deity, O possessor of flames, O deity born of Vayu, O god who is present in all creatures. Purify me by your rays of truth.

49. O exalted one, having cheerfully cleansed myself, I do pray to you. O Agni, grant me now contentment and prosperity, knowledge and gladness.

Vaishampayana said:—

50. He, who will pour Ghee into Agni reciting these Mantras, will be ever blessed with prosperity. Having his souls under his complete control, he will be cleansed of all his sins.

Sahadeva said:—

51. O carrier of sacrificial libation (Agni), you should not put obstacle to a sacrifice.

Vaishampayana said:—

Having said this, the son of Madri (Sahadeva) spread some Kusa grass on the ground.

52. O descendant of Bharata, that best of men in expectation of the approaching fire then sat himself down in front of his terrified and anxious troops.

53. Like the ocean that never pass beyond its shore, Agni did not pass over him (Sahadeva). Agni quietly came to him, and he thus spoke to that descendant of the Kuru,

54. Sahadeva, that god among men, these words of assurance. "O descendant of Kuru, rise up, rise up. I was only trying you.

55. I know all your purposes as well as those of the son of Dharma (Yudhisthira). O best of the Bharata race, this city will be protected by me,

56. So long as there will be a scion in the king Nila's dynasty. O son of Pandu, I shall, however, accomplish the desire of your heart."

57. O best of the Bharata race, the son of Madri rose up with a cheerful heart and bowing down his head with joined hands, he worshipped Pavaka, (Agni).

58—59. On the disappearance of Pavaka, king Nila came there, and at the command of that deity (Agni), the king worshipped with due rites that best of men and that master in war, Sahadeva. He accepted his worship and made him pay tribute.

60. Thereupon the victorious son of Madri went further towards the south. Having subjugated the immeasurably effulgent Tripura,

61. The mighty-armed (hero) soon vanquished and subjugated the Paurava king; and he then with great deal of effort subjugated the preceptor of Kausika, Akriti.

62—63. The mighty-armed (hero) then subjugated the king of Surashtra. He sent an ambassador to king Rukmin of Bhisma in the territories of Bhojakota, who, rich in wealth and intelligence, was the friend of Indra.

64. O great king, remembering his friendship with Vasudeva (Krishna), that king with his son cheerfully accepted their (the Pandavas') sway.

65. Taking many jewels and much wealth from him (Rukmin), that master of war (Sahadeva) then subjugated Suparaka and Talakata.

66. The greatly powerful (hero) then brought under his sway the exceedingly energetic Dandaka. Then he subjugated many kings born of the Mlecha race and living in the islands in the sea;

67. Then the Nishadas, the cannibals, the Karnapravanas, those tribes called Kalamukhas who were a cross race between the men and Rakshashas,

68. The whole of the Cole mountains, also Suraviratna, the island called Copper Island and the mountain called Ramaka.

69. Having brought under subjection, king Timingila, the illustrious warrior subjugated a wild tribe, named the Kerakas who were men with one leg.

70. The son of Pandu also subjugated the city of Sanjayanti and the country of the Pashandas and Karanatakas by means of his messengers alone; and he made them all pay tribute to him.

71. The hero also subjugated and exacted tribute from the Pandyas, the Dravidas, the Udrakeralas, the Andhas, the Talavanas, the Kalinger, and the Ushtrakarnikas.

72. He brought under his sway the charming city of Atavi and also the city of the Yavanas by sending messengers and by exacting tribute.

73—74. O king of kings, that slayer of foes, the virtuous and intelligent son of Madri (Sahadeva), having (at last) arrived at the sea coast, sent ambassadors to the illustrious Vivisana, the grandson of Pulastya. He also cheerfully accepted his sway.

75. He (Vivisana) sent to him (Sahadeva) various kinds of jewels and gems, sandal and aloe-woods, many celestial ornaments,

76. Many costly apparels and many valuable pearls. Thereupon the intelligent Sahadeva returned to his kingdom.

77. Having vanquished by war and by conciliation many kings and having also made them pay tribute to him, that chastiser of foes returned (to his own city.)

78. O king, O Janamejaya, that best of the Bharata race (Sahadeva) presented all that wealth to Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) and regarded himself crowned with success; and he became very happy.

Thus ends the thirty first chapter, the conquests of Sahadeva, in the Digvijaya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXXII.

(DIGVIJAYA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. I shall now describe to you the conquests of Nakula and how that lord conquered the countries once subjugated by Vasudeva (Krishna).

2. The intelligent (Nakula), surrounded by a large army, started from the Khandavaprastha and marched towards the west.

3. The earth trembled with the shouts and the leonine roars of the warriors and the rattle of the chariot wheels.

4. He first attacked the hilly countries called Rahitaka which was dear to Kartikeya, and which was delightful, prosperous, and full of kine and every kind of wealth.

5—6. The battle between him and the heroic Mattamayarakas was a great one. The greatly effulgent (hero) then conquered the desert country and then the country, called Sairishaka which was full of wealth and paddy, then also that country, called Mahetta. A great battle was then fought with the royal sage, Akrosa.

7—9. Having subjugated the Dasarnas, the Sivis, the Trigartas, the Ambashtas, the Malavas, the five tribes of Karpatawas the twice-born tribes called Madhyamukeyas and Vatadhanas, the son of Pandu (Nakula) marched onwards. Then turning back, that best of men (Nakula) subjugated all the tribes named Utsavasanketas, the greatly powerful Gramaneyas living on the sea coast,

10. The Sudras, the Abhiras living on the banks of the Saraswati, and all those tribes that lived on fishing and those that lived on the mountains.

11—12. The whole country, called after the five-rivers, the mountains called Aurga, the country called Uttarayohtra, the city of Devyakuta and the tribe called Darapala, the Rumathas, the Harahunas, and the various other kings of the west were all subjugated by the greatly effulgent hero.

13. O descendant of Bhurata, having brought them all under his sway, the Pandava Nakula then sent messengers to Vasudeva (Krishna)

14. He (Krishna) with all the Yadavas accepted the sway (of the Pandavas). He then went to Sakala, the city of the Madras.

15. The hero made his uncle Salya to accept cheerfully their (the Pandava's) sway. O king, deserving as he was of his uncle's hospitality and entertainment, he was well entertained by him.

16. The well-skilled hero in war, (Sahadeva), taking a large amount of wealth and gems and jewels, marched onwards. He then subjugated the greatly fearful Mlechas living in the ocean,

17. Also the barbarians called Pashavas, the Kiratas, the Yavanas and the Sakas. Having thus subjugated and exacted tribute from all the kings,

18. That best of the Kuru race, Nakula of great resources, then returned (to Indraprastha). So great was the treasure that he brought that ten thousand camels carried the treasure of that illustrious prince.

19. O great king, having arrived at Indraprastha, the hero offered all the wealth to Yudhisthira.

20. O best of the Bharata race, thus did Nakula conquer the west, presided over by Varuna,—the countries that had been once before conquered by Vasudeva (Krishna).

Thus ends the thirty second chapter, the conquests of Nakula, in the Digvijaya of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

(RAJSUYIKA PARVA.)

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Protected by Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) and supported by Truth, and also all their enemies being kept in check, all subjects (of the Pandava king) were always engaged in their respective business.

2. In consequence of the equitable taxation and the virtuous and the just rule of the king, the clouds poured as much rain as desired, and the country became prosperous.

3. As the result of the king's (virtuous) acts every thing of the kingdom,—specially the breeding of cattle, agriculture and trade,—greatly flourished.

4. O king, even cheats and thieves, nay even the king's favourites, were never heard to speak lies amongst themselves.

5. During the reign of Yudhisthira, who was ever devoted to virtue, there were no draughts, or floods, or plagues, or fires, or premature deaths.

6. The (other) kings used to come to him only for agreeable services, or for paying their respects to him, or for offering to him tribute that did not (any way) impoverish them. They never used to come for any other purpose (such as conquests).

7. The large treasury of the king became so much filled with the hoards of wealth virtuously obtained that it could not be emptied even in one hundred years.

8. Having ascertained the state of his treasury and the extent of his possessions, the son of Kunti (Yudhisthira) set his heart upon performing the (Rajshuya) sacrifice.

9. His friends and relatives all separately and jointly said, "O lord, the time for the sacrifice has come. Let it be now performed without delay."

10—11. When they were thus talking, there came that omniscient and ancient one, that soul of the Vedas, that invincible one as described by the learned, that foremost of all lasting existences in the universe, that origin of all things, that receptacle in which every thing is destroyed, that slayer of Keshi, Hari (Krishna).

12—14. Having appointed Vasudeva to the command of the army and having brought with him for Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) a large amount of wealth, the bulwark of all the Vrishnis, the dispeller of all fears in danger, the grinder of all foes, that best of men, Madhava, entered the excellent city (Indraprastha), surrounded with a large army and filling the atmosphere with the rattle of his chariot's wheels. The inexhaustible ocean of gems, that the Pandavas possessed,

15. Was brought to a full limit by the wealth that he (Krishna) brought, and thus all their (the Pandava's) griefs were removed. By the arrival of Krishna, the capital of the Bharata race was gladdened like a sunless region by the sun, or a region of still air by gentle breeze.

16. Coming to him with joy and receiving him with all due respect, Yudhisthira asked him his welfare. When he (Krishna) was comfortably seated,

17. That best of men (Yudhisthira) with the Ritwikas, Dhaumya and Dwaipayana being at their head, and also with Bhima, Arjuna and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) thus spoke to Krishna.

Yudhisthira said :—

18. O Krishna, it is for you that the whole earth has come under my sway. O descendant of the Vrishni race, it is through your favour that this vast wealth has been earned by me.

19. O Madhava, O son of Devaki, I desire to devote all this wealth to the Brahmanas and to the carrier of sacrificial libations (Agni) according to the ordinance.

20. O prince of the Dasarha race, O mighty-armed hero, you should grant me permission to celebrate the Rajshuya sacrifice along with you and with my brothers.

21. O Govinda, O long-armed hero, O prince of the Dasarha race, install yourself in that sacrifice. If you perform the sacrifice, I shall be cleansed from sin.

22. O lord, O Krishna, grant permission to me that I may be installed in the sacrifice along with my these younger brothers, for if permitted by you, I shall be able to enjoy the fruit of that excellent sacrifice.

Vaishampayana said :—

23. To him replied Krishna after extolling his many virtues.

Krishna said :—

O best of kings, you deserve the imperial dignity. Let therefore the great (Rajshuya) sacrifice be performed.

24. If you perform that sacrifice, and if you obtain its fruit, we shall all consider ourselves as crowned with success. I am always engaged in seeking your good. Perform the sacrifice you desire.

25. Appoint me in some office in that sacrifice. I shall obey all your commands.

Yudhisthira said :—

26. O Krishna, O Hrishikesh, when you have come here agreeably to my wish, my resolve is fulfilled ; success is sure to come to my work.

Vaishampayana said :—

27. Having been commanded by Krishna, the son of Pandu (Yudhisthira) with his brothers employed himself to collect the necessary materials for the Rajshuya (sacrifice).

28. That chastiser of foes, the son of Pandu (Yudhisthira), commanded that foremost of all warriors, Sahadeva, and also all his ministers, saying,

29—30. " Let men be appointed to collect without loss of time all those articles which the Brahmanas will direct as necessary for the performance of this sacrifice, and also all auspicious necessities and things that Dhaumya may order to be collected ; (collect) each of the kind required and one after the other in due order.

31. Let Indrasena and Visoka and the charioteer of Arjuna, Puru, if,—they desire to please me,—be employed in collecting them.

32. O best of the Kuru race (Sahadeva), let them gather every article agreeable to taste and smell,—articles which may delight and attract the hearts of the Brahmanas."

33. As soon as these words were uttered by Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, that foremost of all warriors, Sahadeva, informed the king that they had been all done.

34. O king, Dwaipayana then appointed the Ritwikas, who were high-souled, and who were like the Vedas in their personified forms.

35. The son of Satyavati (Vyasa) himself became the Brahma in that sacrifice, that best of the Dhananjaya race, Sosama, became the chaunter of the Sama Veda.

36. The Brahma-knowing Jainavalka became the Adhyarju, the son of Vasu, Paila, with Dhaumya, became the Hotas.

37. O best of the Bharata race, the disciples and the sons of these men, all well-acquainted with the Vedas, became Hotrugas.

38. Having uttered benedictions, and having recited the objects of the sacrifice, all of them worshipped the large (sacrificial) ground according to the ordinance.

39. Commanded by the Brahmanas, the builders and the artificers erected there many houses that were spacious and that were well perfumed like the temples of gods.

40. Thereupon that best of kings, and that best of men, the king (Yudhisthira) immediately commanded his minister Sahadeva saying,

41. "Despatch soon (some) swift messengers to invite all." Having heard the royal command, he (Sahadeva) soon sent messengers saying, "Invite all the Brahmanas of the kingdom, all the owners of land (Kshatryas),

42. All the Vaisyas, and all the respectable Sudras. Bring them all here (in this sacrifice)"

43. At the command of the Pandavas, those swift messengers invited every one without any loss of time; and they brought with them many persons both friends and strangers.

44. O descendant of Bharata, at the proper time the Brahmanas installed the son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, in the sacrifice.

45. When the virtuous Dharmaraja Yudhisthira was installed in the sacrifice, he went to the sacrificial ground, surrounded by thousands of Brahmanas,

46. And accompanied by his brothers, relatives, friends and ministers, and also by many best of men among the Kshatryas who had assembled from various countries,

47—48. And also by many councillors. Many Brahmanas, learned in all the branches of knowledge and well versed in the Vedas and the Vedangas, began to assemble there from various directions. At the command of the Dharmaraja, habitations were erected for them,

49. And their attendants, separately for each by thousands of artizans who were endued with all qualifications. they were filled with much food and many clothes.

50. O king, having been duly worshipped by the king, Brahmanas continued to live there, passing their time in conversation on various topics and seeing the performance of actors and dancers,

51. The noise of these illustrious Brahmanas eating and talking cheerfully was continuously heard.

52. "Give, Give", "Eat, Eat," were the words that were continuously and every day heard there.

53. O descendant of Bharata, Dharmaraja separately gave to each of those Brahmanas thousands of kine, beds, golden coins and dawnsels.

54. Thus like the sacrifice formerly performed by Sakra (Indra) in heaven, began the sacrifice of that matchless hero, the illustrious Pandava (Yudhisthira), on earth.

55—56. Then that best of men, the king Yudhisthira, sent the Pandava Nakula to Hastinapur to Bring Bhisma, Drona, Dhritarastra, Vidura, Kripa, and all those cousins who were attached to him.

Thus ends the thirty third chapter, the ins'allation in the Rajshnya, in the Rajshuyika of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

(RAJSHUYIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having gone to Hastinapur the ever-victorious son of Pandu Nakula. at their head, invited Bhisma and Dhritarastra.

2. Having (thus) been invited by due ceremonies, the elders of the Kuru race, with the preceptor at their head and with Brahmanas walking in front came joyfully to sacrifice.

3—4. O best of the Bharata race, O descendant of Bharata, having heard of the sacrifice of king Yudhisthira, and wishing to see the son of Pandu Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) and his Sabha, hundreds of other Yagma-knowing Kshatryas joyfully came there from various countries,

5. They brought with them various costly gems and jewels. The high-minded Bhisma, Dhritarastra and Vidura,

6. All the (Kuru) brothers with Duryodhana at their head, the king of Gandhara Suvala, the greatly strong Sakuni,

7. Achala, Vrishaka, that best of all car-warriors, Karna, the greatly powerful Salya, the exceedingly strong Valhika,

8. Somadatta, Bhimi of the Kuru race, Bhurisrava, Sala, Ashwathama, Kripa, Drona, the king of Sindhu, Joyadratha,

9. Jagmasena with his sons, that lord of the earth Salva, that great car-warrior, Bhagadatta, the king of Pragjotisha,

10. वृषा and the Mlechas living in the marshy regions along the sea coast, many mountain kings, king Vrihadvala,

11. The king of the Paundras, Vasudeva, the kings of Banga and Kalinga, Akarsa, Kuntala, the kings of the Malavas and the Andhakas,

12. And of the Dravidas and the Singahalas, the king of Kasmir, the greatly effulgent king Kuntibhoja, the king Gouravahana,

13. Valhika, and many other heroic kings, Birata with his two sons, the greatly powerful Mavilla, 14—15. Various other kings and potentates ruling over various countries, the greatly effulgent and invincible in battle king Sisupala with his son,—O descendant of Bharata, (all these kings) came to the sacrifice of the Pandava. Rama, Aniruddha Kanaka, Sarana.

16. Gada, Pradyumna, Samva, the greatly energetic Charudesna, Ulmukha, Nishatha, the brave Angavaha,

17. And numerous other Vrishnis,—all great car-warriors,—came (to that sacrifice). These and many other kings of the middle country

18. Came to that great Rajshuya sacrifice of the son of Pandu. At the command of Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), houses were assigned to them all.

19. O king (these houses) were full of various kinds of eatables; they were adorned with tanks and tall trees. There in those houses the son of Dharma (Yudhisthira) worshipped all those illustrious (monarchs).

20. Having been duly worshipped by the king, they retired to the houses assigned to them. Those houses were like the cliffs of Kailasha, they were delightful and adorned with every kind of furniture.

21. They were enclosed on all sides with well-built, high and white-washed walls. Their windows were covered with net works of gold and their interior was adorned with strings of pearls.

22. Their stairs were easy of ascent, and their floors were all covered with costly carpets. They were all adorned with garlands of flowers and perfumed with excellent aloes.

23. Being white as the snow or the moon, they looked exceedingly beautiful even from the distance of a Yoyana. Their doors were all uniformly made, and they were wide enough to admit a crowd of persons (all at once).

24—25. Made of many metals, they looked like the peaks of the Himalayas. After resting for a while (in these mansions) all those kings saw the great Dakshinagiving Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, surrounded by numerous Sadashyas. O king, the sacrificial ground, crowded with kings, Brahmanas and great Rishis, looked as beautiful as heaven crowded with the celestials.

Thus ends the thirty fourth chapter, the arrival of the invited guests, in the Rajshuyika of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXXV.

(RAJASHUYIKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. O king, having approached and worshipped his grandfather (Bhisma) and his preceptor (Drona), Yudhisthira thus spoke to

2. Bhisma, Drona, Kripa, the son of Drona (Ashwathama), Duryodhana and Vivansati. "Be all of you gracious to me in my this sacrifice.

3. All this my great wealth is yours. Consult you all with one another, and guide me as you desire."

4. Having thus spoken to all, the eldest of the Pandavas (Yudhisthira), who had been already installed in the sacrifice, appointed every one of them in suitable offices.

5. He appointed Dushasana to superintend the department of food and other enjoyable articles. Ashwathama was solicited to look after the Brahmanas.

6. Sanjaya was appointed to return worship to all (invited kings). The high-minded Bhisma and Drona were employed to see what was done and what was left undone.

7. The king (Yudhisthira) appointed Kripa to look after the diamonds, the gold, the pearls and the gems, and he was also appointed to distribute Dakshinas (gifts) to the Brahmanas.

8. Thus other best of men were all appointed in various other offices. Having been brought there by Nakula, Valhika, Dhritarastra, Somadatta, and Jayadratha enjoyed there as the lords (of the sacrifice).

9. Khattwa (Vidura), learned in all the precepts of virtue, became the master of exchequer. Duryodhana became the receiver of tributes brought by the kings.

10. Krishna, the centre of all men, with the desire of gaining the excellent fruit, himself willingly took the task of washing the feet of the Brahmanas.

11. Wishing to see that Sabha and also Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, no one came there with less tribute than one thousand (in kind, number or quantity).

12—15. All (the assembled kings) honoured Dharmaraja with large presents of jewels. Every one of those kings proudly said, "Let the Kuru king complete his sacrifice with the gems and wealth that I present to him, (without taking any presents from any other king)." O king, the sacrificial ground of the illustrious son of Kunti, crowded with guards and warriors, with the cars of the celestials and with the kings, all possessing beauty and wealth, looked extremely handsome with the numerous palaces, so built as to last for ever, and so high that their tops touched the car of the celestials who came to see that sacrifice, with the dwellings of the Brahmanas, and the mansions that were built for the kings which resembled the cars of the celestials, and adorned with gems and filled with every kind of wealth.

16. Yudhisthira, as if vying with the deity Varuna himself in wealth, commenced the (Rajshuya) sacrifice which was distinguished by large Dhakshinas to Brahmanas and enblazoned with the six fires.

17. The king gratified every body with presents of great value and with every object that one could desire, with abundance of rice and of every kind of food, and also with a large quantity of jewels brought as tribute. Every one of that vast concourse of people was fed to his fill.

18. The celestials were gratified in that sacrifice by the Ida, Ghee, Homa and libations poured by the great Rishis, learned in Mantras and pronunciations.

19. Like the celestials, the Brahmanas were also gratified with the sacrificial gifts, food and great wealth. Men of all the orders were gratified and were filled with joy.

Thus ends thirty-fifth chapter, the commencement of the sacrifice in the Rajshuyika of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

(ARGHYASHARANA PARVA).

Vaishampayana said:—

1. On the last day of the sacrifice when the king (Yudhisthira) was to be sprinkled over with sacred water, the great Brahmana Rishis with (all) the monarchs (present there) entered the inner enclosure (of the sacrificial ground).

2—3. Those illustrious and Mantra-knowing Rishis, with Narada at their head and with the royal sages seated at their ease looked like the celestials seated in the mansion of Brahma in the company of the celestial Rishis. Those Rishis of immeasurable energy, having then obtained leisure, started various topics of conversation.

4. "This is so," "This is not so," "This is even so," "This cannot be otherwise,"—thus did many of them engage in arguments with one another.

5. Some amongst the disputants made the weaker arguments to appear stronger, and the stronger ones the weaker by their arguments based on Shastras.

6. Some greatly intelligent disputants fell upon the position urged by others as hawks dart at meat thrown into the air.

7. Some amongst them, learned in the interpretations of Shastras, and some others of rigid vows, well acquainted with every commentary and gloss, engaged themselves in pleasant conversations.

8. That (sacrificial) platform, crowded with the celestials, Brahmanas and the great Rishis,—all endued with the Vedas,—looked as beautiful as the sky studded with the stars.

9. O king, there was no Sudra or any man without vows near the inner (sacrificial) platform of Yudhisthira's palace.

10. Seeing the prosperity of the prosperous and intelligent Dharmaraja, which was the result of that sacrifice, Narada became exceedingly happy.

11. O ruler of men, seeing the assemblage of all Kshatryas (in that sacrifice), the Rishi Narada became thoughtful.

12. O best of men, he recollected the words he had heard in the abode of Brahma regarding the Angsavatarana, (incarnations of portions of every deity.)

13. O descendant of Kuru, knowing that assembly was an assembly of the celestials, Narada thought in his mind the lotus-eyed Hari.

14—15. He knew that the creator of every object, the exalted god of all gods, Narayana,—who had formerly commanded the celestials saying, "Take your births on earth and kill one another and then come back to heaven,"—that chastiser of all the enemies of the celestials, that subjugator of all hostile towns, had taken his birth in the Kshatrya order to fulfil his own purpose.

16. The illustrious lord of the universe, Sambhu, Narayana, having thus commanded all the celestials, had taken his birth in the race of Yadu.

17. Having been born in the Andhaka Vrishni race on earth, that foremost of all perpetuator of races was graced with great good fortune and was shining like the moon among the stars.

18. He whose prowess of arms was adored by the celestials with Indra,—that Hari, that chastiser of foes,—was then living in the world of men in a human form.

19. "Oh! what could be greater wonder than that the self-create himself will take away (from earth) all these Kshatryas endowed with great strength.

20. Thus reflected the omniscient Narada who knew that Hari, Narayana, (Krishna) was no other than the Supreme Being, whom every body worships with sacrifices.

21. That foremost of all men, learned in the precepts of virtue, that greatly intelligent man (Narada), (thinking of all this,) sat in the sacrifice of the intelligent Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) with feelings of awe.

22. O king, Bhisma then thus spoke to Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, "O descendant of Bharata, now offer Arghyas to the kings as each deserves."

23—24. O Yudhisthira, hear,—the preceptor, the sacrificial priest, the relative, the Snataka, the friend and the king,—these are the six (classes of persons) who deserve to get the Arghya. The wise men have said that when any of these live with one for a full one year, he deserves to be worshipped with the presentation of Arghya. These kings have been staying with us for a very long time,

25. Therefore, O king, bring Arghya for each of them; and let the Arghya be first presented to him who is the foremost of all of them.

Yudhisthira said:—

26. O descendant of Kuru, O grandsire, whom do you consider to be the foremost of these (men present here), and to whom should the Arghya be presented first. Tell me this.

Vaishampayana said:

27. O Descendant of Bharata, the son of Santanu, Bhisma, settled it by his great intelligence that Krishna was the foremost of all on earth.

Bhisma said:—

28. As sun shines among all luminous objects, so shines this (Krishna) among all (these kings and potentates) by his egfugence, strength and prowess.

29. This sacrificial ground is illuminated and gladdened by Krishna like a sunless region by the sun and a airless region by the air.

Vaishampayana said:—

30. Then commanded by Bhisma, the powerful Sahadeva proceeded to present in due form the excellent Arghya to the prince of the Vrishni race, (Krishna).

31. Krishna also (agreed to) accept that worship according to the forms of the ordinance. But Sishupala could not bear that worship (proposed to be) offered to Vasudeva (Krishna.)

32. The greatly powerful Chedi-king (Sishupala), after reproving Bhisma and Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) in the presence of that assambly, began to censure Vasudeva (Krishna).

Thus ends the thirty sixth chapter, the Arghya-presentation to Krishna, in the Arghyaharana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

(ARGHYAHARANA PARVA)—Contd.

Sishupala said:—

1. O descendant of Kuru, when so many illustrious kings are present here, this man of the Vrishni race does not deserve a royal worship like a king.

2. Your this conduct in wilfully making this lotus-eyed hero worshipped by the Pandavas is not worthy of the illustrious Pandavas.

3. O sons of Pandu, you are children; you do not know what Dharma is, for it (the ways of Dharma) is very subtle. This son of the river (Bhisma) has but little knowledge, and therefore he has transgressed the Smriti (rules of morality).

4. O Bhisma, if a man like you, possessing virtue and morality, acts from motives of pleasing others, he (surely) becomes worthy of censure among all the honest and wise men.

5. How does this man of the Dasarha race, who is not a king, deserve to be worshipped among these kings that you have worshipped him?

6. O foremost man of the Puru race, if you consider him to be the eldest,—why, here is Vasudeva. How can his son be worshipped before him?

7. If you consider him your well-wisher and supporter, why,—what Drupada is here, how can he get the (first) worship?

8. O descendant of Kuru, if you consider Krishna your preceptor,—when Drona is here, how have you worshipped the Vrishni prince ?

9. O descendant of Kuru, if you consider Krishna as the Ritwija, when old Dwaipayana is here, how have you worshipped Krishna ?

10. O king, when that best of men, the son of Santanu, old Bhishma, who can die only at his will, is here, why have you worshipped Krishna ?

11. O king, O descendant of Kuru, when the hero Ashwathama who is learned in every branch of knowledge is here, why has Krishna been worshipped by you ?

12. When that best of men, that king of kings, Duryodhana, and also that preceptor of the Kuru race, Kripa, are present here, why Krishna has been worshipped ?

13. Passing over the preceptor of the Kimpurashas, he (Krishna) has been worshipped by you. When the invincible Bhismaka, auspicious marked king of Paundrya,

14. That best of kings, Rukmi, and Ekalya, and the king of the Madras, Salya, are present, why Krishna has been worshipped ?

15—16. O descendant of Bharata, this greatly powerful hero whose prowess is the pride amongst all kings, who is the favourite disciple of the son of the Brahmana Jamadagni, the hero who defeated all the kings by his prowess alone, that Karna being present here, passing over him, why Krishna has been worshipped ?

17. O best of the Puru race, the slayer of Madhu (Krishna) is neither a sacrificial priest, nor a preceptor, nor a king, why have you worshipped Krishna with the motive of pleasing others ?

18. O descendant of Bharata, if it was your intention to offer the first worship to the slayer of Madhu, why were these kings brought here to be insulted ?

19. We have not paid tribute to the illustrious son of Kunti out of fear or temptation (the desire of gain) or conciliation ;

20. We have paid him tribute only because he was desirous of obtaining the imperial dignity from the motive of virtue. He it is who is now insulting us.

21. What else could be your motive, except that of insult, that in the midst of this assembly of kings, you have worshipped Krishna, who does not possess the insignia of royalty, with the Arghya ?

22. The title of "virtuous" achieved by the son of Dharma (Yudhisthira,) has been obtained without any cause. Who will offer such unworthy worship to one who has fallen from religion ?

23. This wretch, born in the Vrishni race, formerly most unrighteously killed the illustrious king Jarasandha.

24. Righteousness has to-day left Yudhisthira, and his meanness only has been displayed by his offering the Arghya to Krishna.

25. O Janardana, if the helpless sons of Kunti are frightened, and if they have become mean for their asceticism, you ought to have enlightened them as to your claim to the first worship.

26. O Janardana, why did you accept the worship of which you are not worthy, although it was offered to you by these mean-minded princes ?

27. You (surely) think much of the worship so unworthily offered to you, as a dog (joyfully) licks in solitude a quantity of Ghee which he has obtained.

28. O Janardana, this is no insult to the kings, but it is you whom the Kurus have insulted.

29. O slayer of Madhu, as a wife is to an impotent man and a beautiful sight to a blind man, so is this worship to you who are not a king (at all.)

30. What (sort of man) Yudhisthira is, it has been (well) seen to-day ; what (sort of man) Bhishma is, it has (also) been seen ; what (sort of man) Vasudeva is, it has been also seen. All these men) have been seen as they (really) are.

Vaishampayana said :—

31. Having said this, Sishupala rose from the excellent seat (on which he was seated). He then went out of the assembly accompanied by the kings.

Thus ends the thirty seventh chapter, the wrath of Sishupala, in the Arghyahanana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

(ARGHYAHARANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon king Yudhisthira ran after Sishupala and spoke thus to him in sweet and conciliating tone.

Yudhisthira said :—

2. O lord of the earth, what you have said does not sult you, O king, it is highly sinful and needlessly cruel.

3. O king, do not insult the son of Santanu, Bhisma, by erroneously thinking that he does not know what is the great Dharma.

4. Look,—these many kings, who are all older than you, approve the worship offered to Krishna. You should also approve it.

5. O king of Chedi, the descendant of Kuru, Bhisma, knows truly and well what Krishna is. You do not know him so well as he knows.

Bhisma said:—

6. He, who does not approve of the worship offered to Krishna, who is the oldest in the universe, deserves neither soft words nor conciliation.

7. That chief of warriors in the Kshatrya race, who, having overcome a Kshatrya in battle and brought him under his power, sets him free, becomes his preceptor.

8. I do not see any king in this assembly of monarchs who has not been defeated by the prowess of this descendant of Satwata race (Krishna).

9. This mighty-armed hero of unfading glory deserve to be worshipped not only by us alone, but by all the three worlds.

10. Many best of Kshatryas have been defeated by Krishna in battle. The infinite universe is established in this Vrishni hero.

11. Therefore, we worship Krishna. Amongst the best and the oldest, we do not worship any other. You should not say so,—your understanding should not be so.

12—14. O king, I have worshipped many men who are old in knowledge. I have heard from all those wise men when they came and talked to me what are the many accomplishments of Souri (Krishna). I have heard many times narrated by the people all the acts which greatly intelligent Krishna performed since his birth. O king of Chedi, we do not worship Janardana only from caprice,

15. Or from keeping in view our relationship with him, or from expected benefits (to be received from him). He is worshipped by all the pious men on earth, and he is the source of all happiness.

16. We have offered him the first worship in consideration of his fame, his heroism and his success. There is none here, even if he is a child, whom we have not taken into our consideration (when offering the Arghya to Krishna.)

17. Passing over many persons who are accomplished and learned, we have thought Hari as deserving of the first worship. Amongst Brahmanas he, who is old in knowledge, amongst Kshatryas he, who is great in strength,

18. Amongst Vaisyas, he, who is rich in possessions and wealth; and amongst the Sudras he, who is old in age, deserves to be worshipped. There are two reasons for offering the worship to Govinda (Krishna);

19. He is vastly learned in the Vedas and the Vedangas, and he is also very great in prowess. Who else is there in the world of men except Keshava (Krishna) who is so distinguished?

20. Liberality, cleverness, knowledge of the Sruti (Veda), bravery, modesty, achievements, excellent intelligence, humility, beauty, firmness, contentment and prosperity, all live for ever in Achyuta (Krishna),

21. Therefore, you should approve the worship offered to one who is endued with such accomplishments, who is (our) preceptor, father, and Guru, and who is worthy of the Arghya and of the worship.

22. Hrisiksha (Krishna) is the Ritwija, preceptor,—worthy of being solicited to marry one's daughter,—the Snataka, the king and the friend. Therefore, Achyuta (Krishna) has been worshipped.

23. Krishna is the origin of the universe, and he is that in which the universe is to dissolve. This universe of mobile and immobile creatures has sprung into existence from Krishna alone.

24. He is unmanifest primal Nature, he is the creator, he is eternal, and he is beyond all creatures. Therefore, Achyuta deserves the highest worship.

25. The intellect, the seat of sensibility, the primal elements, air, heat, water, space, earth and the four kinds of life, are all established in Krishna.

26. The sun, the moon, the stars, the planets, the chief directions and the intermediate directions are all established in Krishna.

27—28. As the Agnihotra is the foremost of all Vedic rites, as Gayatri is that of the metres, as the king is that of men, as the ocean is that of all rivers, as the moon is the foremost of all constellations, as the sun is that of luminous bodies, as the Meru is that of all mountains, as Garuda is that of all birds,

29. So is the illustrious Keshava, (Krishna) the foremost in all the worlds, including that of the celestials,—so he is as long as the upward, downward and sideway course of the universe lasts.

30. This Sishupala is a mere child. He does not know who Krishna is, and therefore everywhere and always he speaks of Krishna thus.

31. This ruler of Chedi cannot see virtue in that light in which those intelligent men who desire to acquire high merits sees it.

32. Who is there among the young or the old or among these illustrious kings who does not consider Krishna worthy of worship, or who does not worship Krishna ?

33. If Sishupala considers this worship undeserved, in this undeserved worship he should do that which is proper in this matter.

Thus ends the thirty eighth chapter, the words of Bhisma, in the Arghyahanana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

(ARGHYAHARANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having said this, the greatly strong Bhisma stopped. Then Sahadeva gave this reply (to Shishupala) of grave import.

2. "If there is any king (present here) who cannot bear the worship offered by me to Keshava, the slayer of Keshi, and the possessor of immeasurable energy,

3. On the head of such heroes I place my foot. When I say this, let that one give me the proper reply.

4—6. Let those kings who possess intelligence approve the worship of the preceptor, the father, and the Guru (Krishna) who (fully) deserves the Arghya and the worship." When Sahadeva thus showed his foot, no one among those intelligent, wise, proud and powerful kings said anything. Thereupon, showers of flowers fell upon the head of Sahadeva.

7. An invisible voice said, "Excellent, Excellent!" Clad in a black deer skin, the speaker of both the past and the future,

8. The dispeller of all doubts, Narada, learned in (the mysteries) of all the world, then said in the midst of innumerable creatures these words of the clearest import.

9. "Those men, who will not worship the lotus-eyed Krishna, should be considered as dead though living. He should never be talked to."

Vaishampayana said :—

10. Having worshipped those that deserved worship, then that god among men, Sahadeva, well-acquainted with the difference between a Brahmana and a Kshatriya, completed the ceremony.

11. When Krishna received the first worship, that slayer of foes, Sunitha (Sishupala), with eyes red as copper in anger, thus addressed the kings (present there).

12. "When I am here to be the generalissimo, what are you thinking now? In battle array let us stand against the assembled Vrishnis and the Pandavas."

13. Having thus stirred up the kings, that best of the Chedis (Sishupala) began to consult with them how to obstruct the completion of the sacrifice.

14. The invited kings, who had come to the sacrifice, all with Sunitha (Sishupala) at their head, looked angry, and their faces became pale.

16. They all said, "We must act in such a way as the final sacrificial rites to be performed by Yudhisthira and this worship of Krishna may not be supposed to have our acquiescence."

16. Having been impelled by a belief in their great power and confidence, and having been also deprived of all sense by anger, all the kings began to talk in this way.

17. Though they were appeased by their friends, their faces glowed with anger, and they roared like lions driven away from their prey.

18. Krishna understood that the undeteriorating great sea of kings with its countless waves of soldiers was making preparation for a fight.

Thus ends the thirty ninth chapter, the consultation of the kings, in the Arghyahanana of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XL.

(SISHUPALA BADHA PARVA).

Vaishampayana said :—

1—3. Seeing that assembly of kings agitated by anger, as the fearful ocean is agitated by the winds at the time of the universal dissolution, Yudhisthira thus spoke to that foremost of all intelligent men, the grandsire of the Kurus, the aged Bhisma, as that slayer of foes, Purohita (Indra) of extraordinary prowess, speaks to Vrihaspati. "This vast ocean of kings have been agitated by wrath. O grandsire, tell me what should be done now.

4. O grandsire, tell me what I should do now that my sacrifice may not be obstructed and my subjects may not be injured."

5. When Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, learned in morality, said this, the grandsire of the Kurus Bhisma thus spoke to him.

6. "O best of the Kurus, do not be alarmed. Can the dog kill the lion? I have already settled some means that is both beneficial and conformable to policy.

7. As a pack of dogs bark all together at a sleeping lion, so do all these rulers of the earth.

8. O child, like the dogs at the lion, these (kings) are angrily barking before the sleeping lion of the Vrishni race (Krishna.)

9. Achyuta (Krishna) is now like a lion that is asleep. So long he does not wake up this king of the Chedis, this foremost of men, makes these monarchs look like the lions.

10. O best of kings, O child, this Sishupala possesses but little intelligence. He is desirous of taking along (with him) all these monarchs to the abode of Yama through the agency of him who is the soul of this Universe.

11. O descendant of Bharata, Krishna has been surely desirous of taking back to himself the effulgence and prowess that now lives in Sishupala.

12. O son of Kunti, O foremost of all intelligent men, the intelligence of this wicked king of the Chedis, as well as that of all these kings, have become perverse.

13. The intelligence of all men whom this best of men (Krishna) desires to take to himself become as perverse as that of this Chedi king.

14. O Yudhisthira, Madhava is the creator and destroyer of all the four kinds of beings existing in the three worlds."

15. O descendant of Bharata, having heard his words, the king of the Chedis spoke thus to Bhisma in stern and harsh words.

Thus ends the fortieth chapter, the consolation to Yudhisthira, in Sishupala Badha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XLI.

SISHUPALA BADHA PARVA.—

Continued.

Sishupala said :—

1. Old and infamous wretch of your race, are you not ashamed to frighten all these kings by these false terrors?

2. You are the foremost of the Purus,—living as you do in the third state (celibacy), it is but fit that you should give such advice, which is so void of morality.

3. O Bhisma, when you are their leader the Purus are like a boat tied to a boat, or like a blind man following a blind man.

4. You have once again given pains to our hearts by reciting the deeds of this (Krishna), such as his killing Putana and others.

5. O Bhisma, arrogant and fool as you are, and also desirous of praising Krishna, why does not your tongue split into a hundred parts?

6. O Bhisma, how do you, superior as you are in knowledge, desire to praise the cowherd (Krishna) whose evil repute is told even by men with childish intelligence.

7. O Bhisma, if he (Krishna) has killed a vulture in his childhood, what is there to praise in that feat? What is there also in his killing of Ashwa and Breshava, both of whom were ignorant of the science of war?

8. O Bhisma, what is there wonderful if this (Krishna) threw down by a kick an inanimate piece of wood, namely a car?

9. O Bhisma, in my opinion there was nothing remarkable in this one's holding for a week the Govardhana hill which is like an ant-hill.

10. O Bhisma, "while sporting on the hills, this one ate a large quantity of food," hearing these words of yours, many have been much astonished.

11. O (Bhisma) learned in the precepts of religion, what could be more wonderful than this one's killing Kansa, by whose food he became fatter and strong.

12. O Bhisma, O wretch of the Puru race, you are ignorant of the precepts of religion. You have not heard from the pious men what I would now tell you.

13—14. The pious men always instruct good men not to use weapons against women, kine, Brahmanas and the men whose food has been partaken, and also those whose shelter has been enjoyed. O Bhisma, it appears all this teaching has been thrown away on you.

15. O wretch of the Puru race, wishing to praise Keshava (Krishna), you describe him before me as great and superior in knowledge and age, as if I know nothing.

16. O Bhisma, if at your word one who has killed women and kine be worshipped, what then is to become of this teaching? O Bhisma, how can he deserve praise who is such?

17. "This one is the foremost of all wise men," and "This one is the lord of the universe," hearing these words of yours,

Janarda. . . . . it they are all true. . . . . false.

18. The verses that a chaunter chaunts, though he chaunts them often, would produce no impression on him. Every creature acts according to his own disposition like the bird Bhulinga.

19—20. There is not the least doubt that your disposition is very mean. It appears the Pandavas also who consider Krishna as deserving of worship and who have you for their leader are of sinful dispositions. Though you possess the knowledge of virtue, yet you have fallen from the path of virtue,

21. O Bhisma, who will so act as you have from the motives of virtue, knowing himself to be virtuous and superior in knowledge?

22—23. O Bhisma, if you know Dharma, if your mind is guided by wisdom, why was that virtuous maiden Amba, who desired to have another for her husband, was forcibly carried away by you? Your brother Vichitravirya who followed the path of the pious men,

24. Knowing her state of mind, did not marry her, though she was brought by you. Proud as you are of your virtue, in your very sight sons were begotten by another on the widow of your brother according to the ways of the pious.

25. O Bhisma, where is your virtue? Your Bramhacharja is in vain. Your celebrity is no doubt the result of your ignorance or impotence.

26. O (Bhisma), leaned in Dharma, I do not see your prosperity. You who thus preach morality does not seem to have ever waited upon the old.

27. Worship, gift, study, large-Dakshina giving sacrifices,—these all are not equal to one sixteenth part of that merit which is obtained by the possession of a son.

28. O Bhisma, the merit that is obtained by observing many vows and fasts surely goes all in vain if one is childless.

29. You are childless,—you are old,—you are an expounder of false morality. Like the swan in the story, you shall now be killed by your own relatives.

30. O Bhisma, the learned men have said this (story) of old. I shall presently narrate it in full in your hearing.

31. In the days of yore there lived an old swan on the coast of the sea. He always spoke of morality and used to instruct all the birds, but his conduct was otherwise.

32. O I . . . . . virtue and forego sin"—these were the words that the truthful (birds) heard him say.

33. O Bhisma, it has been heard by us that oviparous creatures, (all) dwelling in the sea, brought him food for the sake of virtue.

34. O Bhisma, all those birds left their eggs with him, ranged and dived in the waters of the sea. But that sinful wretch ate them (eggs) all.

35. That swan, always attentive to his own purpose, ate the eggs foolishly trusted to him. Some time after seeing the eggs decreased in number, another greatly intelligent bird suspected him, and one day he saw him (eat those eggs)

36. Having witnessed the sinful act of the swan, that bird spoke of it to all the other birds in great sorrow.

37. O excellent Puru, then all those birds, witnessing with their own eyes the act of the (old), swan, came to him, and they then killed that wretch of false conduct.

38. O Bhisma, your conduct is like that of the old swan. These kings might kill you in anger as the birds killed the old swan.

39. O Bhisma, the Purana-knowing men mention a proverb as regards this occurrence. O descendant of Bharata, I shall repeat it to you in detail.

40. It is this:—"O bird, though your heart is affected, yet you preach. But your this sinful act of eating the eggs transgresses all your speeches."

Thus ends the forty-first chapter, the words of Sisupala, in the Sishupala Badha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XLII.

(SISHUPALA BADHA)—Continued.

Sishupala said:—

1. The greatly powerful king Jarasandha, who did not desire to fight with Krishna, saying that he was but a "servant," was (surely) worthy of my greatest esteem.

2. Who will consider praiseworthy the act of killing Jarasandha which was done by Keshava (Krishna), as also by Bhima and Aryuna?

3. Entering (the city) by a way which was not the (public) gate, and disguised as a Veda-knowing (Brahmana,) this Krishna saw the prowess of king Jarasandha.

4. When that illustrious king offered this wretch water to wash his feet, it was then he said from seeming motives of virtue that he was not a Brahmana.

5. O descendant of Kuru, when Bhima, Dhananjaya and Krishna were asked by Jarasandha to eat, that request was refused by this Krishna.

6. If this one (Krishna) is the lord of the universe, as this fool thinks himself to be, why does he not then consider himself a Brahmana?

7. It is greatly surprising that though you often lead the Pandavas away from the path of the pious, yet they consider you (Bhisma) to be honest.

8. O descendant of Bharata (Bhisma), there is nothing to be surprising (perhaps) in those who have got you, who is no better than a woman and who is old, to be their counsellor in all things.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. Hearing his these harsh words—harsh both in import and sound,—that foremost of all strong men, the powerful Bhimasena, became angry.

10. Under the influence of anger, his lotus-like eyes, naturally large and expanding, became still more extended, and also as red as the copper.

11. The assembled kings saw on his forehead three lines of wrinkles like the Ganges with her three currents on the three-peaked mountain.

12. When he began to grind his teeth in anger, the kings saw his face resemble like that of the Death preparing to swallow every creature at the end of the Yuga.

13. As the strong-minded (hero) was about to jump up with great impetuosity, the mighty-armed Bhisma caught him (by the hand), as if Mahadeva seized Mahasena.

14. O descendant of Bharata, Bhima's anger was soon appeased by Bhisma with various words of sound counsels.

15. That chastiser of foes could not disobey Bhisma's words, as the ocean never goes beyond its shore, though swollen with the waters of the rainy season.

16. O king, though Bhima was angry, the heroic Sishupala, depending on his own valour, did not tremble in fear.

17. Though Bhima was every moment jumping up (from his seat) with great impetuosity, yet Sishupala did not bestow a single thought on him, as a lion does not mind a small animal who leaps up in rage.

18. Seeing Bhima of terrible prowess in such great rage, the mighty king of Chedi laughingly spoke thus.

19. "O Bhisma, release him. Let all these kings see him burnt down by my prowess like an insect by fire."

20. Having heard these words of the king of the Chedis, that foremost of the Kurus, that best of all intelligent men, Bhisma thus spoke to Bhima.

Thus ends the forty second chapter, the wrath of Bhima, in the Sishupala Badha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XLIII.

(SISHUPALA BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhisma said :—

1. This Sishupala was born with three eyes and four hands in the dynasty of the kings of Chedi. As soon as he was born, he screamed and brayed like an ass.

2. His father and mother along with all their relatives were struck with fear (on seeing this fearful phenomenon). Seeing these evil omens, they resolved to abandon him.

3. But at that time an invisible voice (thus) said to the king and his wife with their ministers and priest, all of whose hearts were paralyzed by anxiety.

The Voice said :—

4. O king, this your son, who has been (just) born, will become fortunate and superior in strength. Therefore you have no fear from him. Cherish this child without (any) anxiety.

5. O king, he will not die. His time is not yet come. He that will kill him with weapons has also been born.

Bhisma said :—

6. Having heard these words, the mother becoming anxious by affection for her son spoke thus to the invisible being.

7. "I bow with joined hands to him that has uttered these words regarding my son. Let him (the invisible being), whether he is an exalted god or any other being, tell me another word.

8. I desire to hear who will be the slayer of this my son."

9—11. The invisible being then again said, "He, upon whose lap this child being taken, his extra arms will fall down on the ground like a pair of five headed snakes, and observing whom his third eye on the forehead will disappear, will be his slayer." Having heard of the child's three eyes and five arms and also of the words of the invisible being,

12. All the kings of the world came to see him. The (Chedi) king worshipped the monarchs that came as each deserved,

13—14. And gave his child upon their laps one after the other. Thus the child was placed on the laps of one thousand kings one after the other. But what was heard (from the invisible being) did not come to pass. Having heard this (about the child) at Dwaravati, the two greatly powerful heroes,

15. The Yadu princes, Sankarsana (Valadeva) and Janarddana (Krishna) went to the capital of the Chedi (king) to see their aunt, the princess of the Yadu race (the queen of the Chedi king.)

16. Saluting every body according to his rank and saluting also the king and the queen and inquiring after every body's welfare, Rama and Keshava (Valarama and Krishna) took their seats.

17. When those two heroes were duly worshipped, the queen with great pleasure and joy herself placed the child on the lap of Damadora (Krishna).

18. As soon as the child was placed on his lap, his extra arms fell down and the eye on his forehead disappeared.

19. Seeing this, the queen became alarmed and agrieved; she begged Krishna to grant her a boon. (She said), "O mighty armed hero, I am afflicted with fear; grant me a boon.

20. You are the assuager of all men afflicted with grief; you are the dispeller of every body's fear." Having been thus addressed, the descendant of Yadu, Krishna, replied,

21. "O lady, do not be alarmed. O virtuous queen, you have no fear from me. O aunt, what boon shall I give you? What shall I do?"

22. Whether I am able or not, I shall do what you will say." Having been thus addressed, she thus spoke to the descendant of Yadu, Krishna,

23. "O greatly powerful hero, O best of the Yadu race, you will have to pardon for my sake the offences committed by Sishupala. O lord, know, this is the boon I ask."

Krishna said :—

24. O aunt, even when he will deserve to be killed,— in such one hundred (occasions of) offences of this (Sishupala), I will pardon him. Do not be (therefore) agrieved.

Bhisma said :—

25. O Bhima, such is this wretch Sishupala, a king with a wicked heart.

Being proud for the boon granted by Govinda (Krishna), he now calls you to battle.

Thus ends the forty third chapter, the history of Sishupala, in the Sishupala Badha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XLIV.

(SISHUPALA BADHA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Bhisma said :—

1. The desire, that causes the Chedi king to call you, whose strength knows no deterioration, to fight, is hardly his own wish. This is surely the purpose of Krishna himself, who is the lord of the universe.

2. O Bhimasena, what king was there on earth who could abuse me as this wretch of his race, who has been already taken for his own by Death, has done to-day?

3. This mighty armed (hero) is certainly a portion of Hari's (Krishna's) energy. The lord (Krishna) wishes to take back to himself his that energy.

4. O best of the Kuru race, for this reason (only) this wicked-minded and tiger-like Chedi king roars in this way without caring little for any of us.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. Having heard these words of Bhisma, the Chedi king could not brook them. He thus replied to Bhisma in great wrath.

Sishupala said :—

6. O Bhisma, when always rising from your seat you are praising him like a (professional) chaunter, let our enemies possess that prowess which is possessed by this Keshava (Krishna).

7. O Bhisma, if your mind takes pleasure in praising others, then praise these kings (present) here, and leave off Janarddana (Krishna).

8. Praise this best of kings Danda, the monarch of Valhika, who, as soon as he was born, rent this earth.

9. O Bhisma, praise this Karna, the king of Anga and Banga, who is like Indra in strength, who draws the great bow,

10. Who is adorned with the celestial ear-rings of heavenly make and with the armour possessing the splendour of the rising sun, with (both of) which he was born,

11. And who vanquished and mangled in a wrestling match the greatly invincible Jarasandha equal to Vasava (Indra).

12. O Bhisma, praise always Drona and his son (Ashwathama), who are, both father and son, worthy of praise, who are great car-warriors, and who are best of Brahmanas.

13. O Bhisma, it is my opinion that if they are enraged, either of the two can annihilate this earth with all its mobile and immobile creatures.

14. O Bhisma, I do not see any king who is equal to Drona or Ashwathama in battle. Why do you not desire to praise them?

15. Passing over Duryodhana who is the mighty-armed king of kings, and who is unrivalled on earth girt with the seas;

16. Also king Jayadratha, who is accomplished in weapons and who is of great prowess; and also Druma, the preceptor of the Kimpurushas, who is renowned on earth for his prowess,

17. And also old Kripa, the son of Saradwatta, who is the preceptor of the Bharata race,—passing over these greatly powerful men, why do you praise Keshava (Krishna)?

18. Passing over that foremost of bowmen, that excellent man, the greatly powerful Rukmin, why do you praise Keshava?

19. Passing over the greatly energetic Bhisma, and the king Dantabakra, and also Bhagadatta celebrated for his many sacrificial stakes, the king of Magadha Joyatsena,

20. And also Drupada and Birata, Sakuni and Vrihadbala, Vinda and Anuvinda of Avanti, Pandya, Swata, Uttama,

21. The greatly prosperous Sanka, the proud Vrishasena, the powerful Ekalavya, the great car-warrior the king of Kalinga,—passing over all these powerful men, why do you praise Keshava?

22. O Bhisma, if your mind is always eager to praise others, why do you not praise Salva and other rulers of the earth?

23. O king, what am I capable of doing (giving you good advice) when you have never before heard any thing from the virtuous men who are learned in the precepts of virtue?

24. O Bhisma, have you not heard that reproach and glorification of self and reproach and glorification of others are not the practices of those who are respectable?

25. O Bhisma, there is none who approves your conduct in thus continually praising this Keshava, who is unworthy of any praise; you (surely) do it from ignorance alone.

26. How can you from your desire alone establish the whole universe in this wicked-minded slave and cow-herd of Braja?

27. O descendant of Bharata, perhaps your inclination is not conformable to your true nature, like that of the bird Bhulinga, the story of which has been already told by me.

28. O Bhisma, there was a bird, called Bhulinga living on the other side of the Himalayas. His words were always without any meaning.

29. "Never act rashly" was what he always said, but he never knew that he himself always acted rashly.

30. O Bhisma, that foolish bird used to pick from the lion's mouth the pieces of flesh sticking between its teeth when the lion was engaged in eating.

31. O Bhisma, that bird surely lived at the pleasure of the lion. O sinful wretch, you always speak like that bird.

32. O Bhisma, surely you live at the pleasure of these kings. There is none else like you who is engaged in doing things contrary to the opinions of all.

Vaishampayana said:—

33. O king, having heard these rude and harsh words of the Chedi king, Bhisma spoke thus in the hearing of the king of Chedi.

Bhisma said:—

34. Truly am I alive at the pleasure of these rulers of earth. But I do not consider these kings as equal to even straws.

Vaishampayana said:—

35. Having been thus addressed by Bhisma, the kings became full of anger. Some amongst them stood erect and some began to reproach Bhisma.

36. Having heard these words of Bhisma, some of these great bowmen said, "This sinful wretch, Bhisma, though old, is exceedingly boastful. He deserves no pardon.

37. Therefore, O kings, let this wicked-minded Bhisma be killed like an animal, or let us master all together, and let him be burnt in a fire made of straw."

38. Having heard their these words, the grandsire of the Kurus, the intelligent Bhisma, then thus spoke to the kings.

Bhisma said:—

39. O rulers of earth, I do not see the end of our speeches, for words may be answered with words. Therefore, listen to what I say.

40. Whether I may be killed by you like an animal or be burnt in a fire made of straw, I say, I place my foot on the head of all.

41—42. Here is Govinda (Krishna) who knows no deterioration. Him have we worshipped. Let him, who is willing to meet a speedy death call to-day to battle Madhava, Krishna, the wielder of discus and club. Falling (in the battle), let him enter and mix with the body of this Deity.

Thus ends the forty fourth chapter, the words of Bhishma, in the Sishupala Badha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XLV

(SISHUPALA BADHA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having heard these words of Bhishma, the greatly powerful Chedi king, being desirous of fighting with Vasudeva (Krishna), thus spoke to Vasudeva.

Sishupala said:—

2. O Janardhana, I challenge you. Come, fight with me till I kill you to-day with all the Pandavas.

3. O Krishna, the Pandavas also deserve to be killed by me with you, for they, having passed over all these kings, have worshipped you who are not a king.

4. O Krishna, it is my opinion that those, that have from childishness worshipped you, as if you deserve it, although you are unworthy of worship, you being only a slave and a wretch and not a king, deserve to be killed by me.

Vaishampayana said:—

5. Having said this, that best of men (Sishupala) stood up and roared in anger. When he ceased (talking), Krishna spoke these words in a soft voice to all the kings in the presence of the Pandavas.

Krishna said:—

6. O kings, this cruel-hearted man who is the son of a lady of the Swatwata race is a great enemy of the Swatwata race. Though we never seek to injure him, yet he always seek to do us injury.

7. O kings, hearing that we had gone to the city of Pragjyotisha, this wretch of cruel deeds came and burnt Dwarka, though he is the son of my aunt (father's sister.)

8. When the Bhoja king was sporting on the Raivataka Hill, he killed many of that king's attendant and carried away many in chains to his own city.

9. This wretch, sinful in all his purposes, in order to obstruct my father's sacrifice, stole the horse of the horse-sacrifice which was let loose under armed guards.

10. This wretch, prompted by sinful motives, though she was unwilling, stole the wife of saintly Vabru (Akrura), when she was on her way from Dwarka to the country of the Sauvaras.

11. This wretch, ever intent to injure his maternal uncle, ravished in the disguise of the king of Kurusha the saintly Bhadra, the princess of Vishala, who was the intended bride of the Kurusha king.

12. I have patiently borne all these for the sake of my father's sister. It is, however, very fortunate that (to-day) all this has happened before all these kings.

13. Look, Sirs, at the hostility that he bears towards me. Know also all that he has done against me at my back.

14. He deserves to be killed by me only on account of the great pride that he has displayed to-day before all these kings. I am hardly able to pardon him to-day for the injuries he has done me.

15. Desirous as he was of a speedy death, this fool had (once) desired to possess Rukmini (Krishna's wife), but the fool did not obtain her, as a Sudra cannot get a hearing of the Vedas.

Vaishampayana said:—

16. Having heard these words of Vasudeva, all the kings assembled there, began to reproach the Chedi king.

17. Having heard these words, the powerful Sishupala laughed aloud and spoke these words.

Sishupala said:—

18. O Krishna, are you not ashamed to talk in this assembly, specially before all these kings, of Rukmini who had been intended for me.

19. O slayer of Madhu, who else is there but you, who, regarding himself a man, would say in the midst of respectable men that his wife was intended for some body else?

20. O Krishna, if you please pardon me or pardon me not. Angry or friendly, what can you do to me?

Vaishampayana said:—

21. When he (Sishupala) was thus talking, the high-souled slayer of Madhu, (Krishna), thought in his mind of the discus that humbles the pride of the Daityas.

22. As soon as the discus came into his hands, the skillful speaker, the high-souled (Krishna), spoke loudly these words.

Krishna said:—

23. O rulers of earth, hear why this man has been hitherto pardoned by me. Asked by his mother, I promised to pardon his one hundred offences.

24. This was the boon that she asked me and this was the boon that I granted to her. O kings, that number has (now) become full. I shall now kill him in the presence of the kings.

Vaishampayana said:—

25. Having said this, the chief of the Yadu race, that chastiser of foes (Krishna), immediately cut off in anger by his discus, the head of the Chedi king.

26. The mighty armed hero fell like a cliff struck by thunder. The kings saw a fearful effulgence from the body of the Chedi king.

27. Issuing like that of the sun in the sky. O great king, that effulgence then adored the lotus-eyed Krishna, ever worshipped by all the worlds, and it then entered his (Krishna's) body.

28. Seeing the effulgence (of Sishupala) enter (the body of) that mighty armed and excellent of men (Krishna), all the kings thought (the phenomenon) as very wonderful.

29. When the Chedi king was killed by Krishna, the cloudless sky poured showers of rain, blasting thunders were hurled and the earth itself began to tremble.

30. Some amongst those kings did not speak a word during those unspeakable moments; they sat gazing at Janarddana (Krishna).

31. Some rubbed in anger their palms with their fore fingers, others, being deprived of their senses by anger, bit their lips with their teeth,

32. Some kings praised the Vrishni hero in private, some became excited with anger, while others became mediators.

33—34. The great Rishis became much pleased and praised Keshava (Krishna), and the high-souled Brahmanas and the greatly powerful kings, seeing the prowess of Krishna, became glad at heart and praised him. The Pandava (Yudhisthira) then commanded his brothers to perform the funeral ceremony of the king (Sishupala), 35—36. The heroic son of Damaghosha without delay and with all proper respect. They obeyed (their brother's command). Then the son of Pirtha (Yudhisthira), with his brothers and with all the kings, installed the son of the king Sishupala in the kingdom of Chedi.

37—38. O king, furnished with plentiful of corn, rice and every kind of food and with abundance of wealth that sacrifice of the greatly effulgent king of the Kurus, blessed with every kind of prosperity, and well protected by Keshava, commenced with all auspicious ceremonies and became exceedingly beautiful and pleasing to all young men.

39. So long the great Rajshuya sacrifice was not completed, the mighty armed Janarddana, the illustrious Sauri (Krishna), guarded it with his bow, called Saranga, and with his discus and club, and thus in due time it was completed.

40. Thereupon all the Kshatrya kings came to the virtuous minded Yudhisthira who had bathed (after the completion of the sacrifice) and thus spoke to him,

41. "O virtuous man, you have grown in prosperity by good fortune. You have acquired the imperial dignity. The fame of the Ajamira race has been greatly increased by (you) the descendant of Ajamira.

42. O king of kings, you have acquired great religious merit by your this act. O best of kings, we tell you we have been worshipped by you to the full extent of our desires.

43. We now desire to return to our own kingdoms. You should give us permission." Having heard the words of the kings, Dharmaraja Yudhisthira

44. Worshipped them as each deserved, and then commanded his brothers thus, "All these kings have come to us at their own pleasure ;

45. These chastisers of foes are now desirous of returning to their kingdoms after bidding me farewell. Blessed (brothers), follow these excellent kings to the confines of our kingdom."

46. Having been thus commanded by their brothers, the virtuous Pandava princes followed the kings one after the other as each deserved.

47. The powerful Dhistadyumna followed the king of Birata. Dhananjaya (Aryuna) followed the great car-warrior and high-souled Yagmasena.

48. The mighty Bhimasena followed Bhisma and Dhritarastra. The lord of battle, Sahadeva, followed the heroic Drona and his son.

49. O king, Nakula followed Suvala and his son, the sons of Draupadi and the son of Suvadra followed the great car-warrior, the mountain kings.

50. The other best of Kshatryas followed other Kshatryas ; and thousands of Brahmanas also, after being duly worshipped, went away.

51. On the departure of all the kings and the Brahmanas, the powerful Vasudeva (Krishna) thus spoke to Yudhisthira.

Krishna said :—

52. O descendant of Kuru, with your permission I shall now go to Dwarka. By good fortune you have accomplished the best of sacrifices, Rajshuya.

Vaishampayana said :—

53. Having been thus addressed Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) thus replied to Janardana (Krishna), "O Govinda, through your grace I have accomplished the great sacrifice.

54. Through your grace, all the Kshatrya (kings) came under my sway and brought here for me valuable tribute.

55. O sinless one, O hero, how can I give you permission to go? Without you my heart never feels any delight.

56—57. But (I know) you must have to go to the city of Dwarka." Having been thus addressed, the virtuous-minded and the world renowned Hari (Krishna), accompanied by Yudhisthira, went to Pritha and cheerfully said, "O aunt, your sons have to-day obtained the imperial dignity.

58. They have obtained vast wealth, and they have been crowned with success. Be pleased with all this; with your permission, I shall now go to Dwarka."

59. Keshava (Krishna) then bade farewell to Subhadra and Draupadi. Then he came out of the inner apartments accompanied by Yudhisthira.

60—61. He performed his ablutions and went through the daily rites of worship. The Brahmanas uttered benedictions. Then the mighty armed Daruka came with the car of excellent make and of body resembling the clouds. Seeing the Garuda-bannered car arrived,

62. The high-souled and lotus-eyed (Krishna) walked round it respectfully and ascending on it, started for the city of Daravati.

63. The blessed Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, accompanied by his brothers followed on foot the greatly powerful Vasudeva (Krishna),

64. Then the lotus-eyed Hari (Krishna) stopped for a moment that excellent chariot; and thus spoke to the son of Kunti Yudhisthira.

65. "O kings, cherish your subjects with ceaseless vigilance and patience. As the clouds are to all creatures, as the large tree to the birds,

66. And as the thousand-eyed deity (Indra) to the immortals, so you also become the refuge of all your friends and relatives."

Krishna and the Pandava (Yudhisthira), thus talking with each other,

67. Took each other's leave and went towards their respective homes. O king, when the foremost of the Satwata race, Krishna, had gone away to Daravati,

68. King Durjodhana and the son of Suvala, Sakuni,—these two best of men, only—remained in that celestial Shabha (Assembly Hall).

Thus ends the forty fifth chapter, the killing of Sishupala, in the Sishupala Badha of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XLVI

(DYUTA PARVA.)

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When that best of sacrifices, Rajshuya, ever difficult of accomplishment, was completed, Vyasa, surrounded by his disciples, came before him (Yudhisthira).

2. On his arrival he soon rose from his seat, surrounded by his brothers, and worshipped his grandfather (Vyasa) with offering him a seat and water to wash his feet.

3. When the illustrious (Rishi) took his seat on a best seat made of gold, he said to Dharmaraja Yudhisthira "to take his seat."

4. When the king was seated surrounded by his brothers, the illustrious Vyasa, the skilful speaker, thus spoke.

5. "O son of Kunti, you grow in prosperity for good fortune; you have acquired the imperial dignity which is very difficult to be acquired. O perpetuator of the Kuru race, all the Kurus have grown in prosperity for your sake.

6. O king, with your permission -I shall (now) go. I have been duly worshipped." Having been thus addressed by Krishna (Vyasa), Dharmaraja Yudhisthira,

7. Saluted his grandfather by touching his feet and thus spoke to him, "O foremost of all men, a very great doubt has arisen in my mind.

8—9. O best of the twice-born, there is none else except you who can remove it. The illustrious Rishi Narada said that three kinds of portents, namely caelestial, atmospheric and terrestrial, happen (if Rajshuya sacrifice is performed). O grandsire, have these portents been removed by the fall of the Chedi king?"

10. Having heard these words from the king, the son of Parasara, the lord Krishna Dwaipayana, Vyasa, thus spoke to him,

11. "O king, for thirteen years those portents will produce great results. O king, they may even cause the destruction of all the Kshatryas.

12. O best of the Bharata race, O descendant of Bharata, in course of time, making you the sole cause, the assembled Kshatrya kings will all be destroyed for the fault of Duryodhana and the prowess of Bhima and Aryuna.

13—15. O king of kings, in your dream you will see towards the end of this night Vrishadhaja (Bull-marked), Nilkanta (blue-throated), Bhava, Sthanu, (deep in meditation) Kapali, (dinking from human skull), Tripurantaka (slayer of Tripura), fierce and terrible Pashupati (the lord of creatures), Mahadeva (the god of gods), Umapati, (the husband of Uma) Hara, Sarva, Vrisha, Suli, (holding the trident) Pinaki (armed with Pinaka bow),—attired in skin, Siva, tall and white as the cliff of the Kailasha, seated on his bull and always gazing towards the direction, presided over by the Pitris (South).

16. O king, you will see such a dream (today). Do not be grieved for it, for none can rise superior to Time.

17. Be blessed. I shall now (go towards the Kailasha mountain). Rule the earth with vigilance and steadiness and bear patiently all privations."

18. Having said this, the illustrious Krishna Dwaipayana, Vyasa, accompanied by his disciples, who always followed the dictates of the Vedas, went towards the Kailasha mountain.

19. On the departure of the grandfather (Vyasa), the king became afflicted with grief and anxiety. He continuously sighed and reflected on what the Rishi said.

20. He said to himself, "What the great Rishi has said must come to pass. How can fates be warded off by human exertions?"

21. Thereupon, the greatly effulgent Yudhisthira thus spoke to all his brothers, "O best of men, you have heard what Dwaipayana (Vyasa) has said.

22. Hearing his words, my firm resolve is to die, when I have been ordained to be the cause of the destruction of all the Kshatryas.

23. O children, if Time has willed it, what need is there for me to live?" To the king who was thus speaking replied Falguni (Aryuna),

24. "O king, do not yield yourself to the great depression which destroys one's reason.

O great king, mustering fortitude, do what is beneficial".

25. Thereupon Yudhisthira, ever devoted to truth, thinking all the while the words of Dwaipayana (Vyasa), spoke thus to all his brothers.

26. "O children, O blessed ones, listen to the vow I make from this day. For what other purpose am I to live for thirteen years?"

27. I shall not speak a harsh word to my brothers or to any of the kings of the earth. I shall remain obedient to my relatives and practise virtue.

28. If I live in this way, making no distinction between my own sons and those of others, there will be no disagreement in the world. Disagreement is the cause of war.

29. O best of men, I shall keep war at a distance, and I shall ever do what is agreeable to others. Thus no evil reputation will touch me in the world."

30. Having heard these words of their eldest brother, the Pandavas, ever engaged in doing what is agreeable to Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), approved of them.

31. O king, Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), having thus taken the vow with his brothers in that assembly, gratified the Pitris and the celestials.

32. O best of the Bharata race, on the departure of all the Kshatrya kings, he (Yudhisthira), surrounded by his brothers, performed the usual auspicious rites.

33. Yudhisthira then with his ministers entered his excellent palace. O great king, Durjodhana and the son of Suvala, Sakuni, (then) lived in that charming Sabha (Assembly Hall).

Thus ends the forty sixth chapter, the vow of Yudhisthira, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XLVII.

(DYUTA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. O best of men, Duryodhana lived in their (the Pandava's) that Assembly-Hall. He slowly examined the whole of that mansion with Sakuni.

2. The Kuru prince saw in it many celestial designs which he had never seen before in the city of Hastinapur.

3—5. One day the son of Dhritarastra, king (Duryodhana), coming to a place made of crystal, mistook it for water and drew up his clothes. Finding his mistake out, he wandered over the Sabha in great sorrow.

6. Sometime after, he mistook a lake of crystal water, adorned with crystal water-flowers for land and fell into it with all his clothes on.

7. Seeing him fallen into the water, the greatly strong Bhima laughed aloud, the servants also laughed at Sujodhana (Duryodhana).

8. Other handsome and dry clothes were soon given to him at the command of the king (Yudhisthira). Seeing his this plight, the mighty Bhimasena,

9. Aryuna, and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) all laughed aloud. Ever incapable of putting up with insults, he (Duryodhana) could not bear their laughter.

10—11. Concealing his emotions, he even did not cast his eyes on them. Seeing him again draw up his clothes to cross a piece of land (made of crystal), mistaking it for water, all men laughed aloud. Then king (Duryodhana) mistook a closed door made of crystal as open,

12. And he hurt his head to pass it and stood with his brains swimming. In this way mistaking another open door made of crystal as closed, he attempted to open it with out-stretched hands and tumbled down.

13. Coming upon another door that was really open, the king, thinking it closed, went away from it.

14—15. O king, having thus become the victim of various mistakes there (in that Assembly-Hall) and having seen the vast wealth (that was collected) in the great Rajshuya sacrifice, the king Duryodhana, with the permission of the Pandavas, returned to the city of Hastinapur.

16. As he proceeded (towards the city), reflecting (on all he had seen,) the heart of the king Duryodhana,—having been afflicted with the sight of the prosperity of the Pandavas,—became inclined to sin.

17—18. O perpetuator of the Kuru race, seeing the sons of Pritha happy and all the kings of the world obedient to them, and (seeing also) that every body (both) young and old engaged in doing good to them,—reflecting also on the splendour and prosperity of the illustrious Pandavas, the son of Dhritarastra, Duryodhana, became pale.

19. In proceeding (towards his city) with an afflicted heart, he only reflected on the matchless Assembly-Hall and the great prosperity of the intelligent Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira.)

20. The son of Dhritarastra, Duryodhana, was so much taken up with his own thoughts that he did not speak a word to Suvala's son (Sakuni), though he repeatedly spoke to him.

21. Seeing him very much agitated (in heart), Sakuni thus spoke to him, "O Duryodhana, why are you proceeding,—sighing (all the while)?"

Duryodhana said :—

22—23. O uncle, seeing the whole earth brought under Yudhisthira's sway by the force of the illustrious Aryuna's weapons, and seeing also the sacrifice of the son of Pritha like that of the greatly effulgent Sakra (Indra) among the celestials,

24. I have been filled with jealousy, and I am burning day and night. I am being dried up like a shallow tank in the summer season.

25. Behold, when Sishupala was killed by the chief of the Satwata race, there was none to take his side.

26. The kings appeared (as if) they were consumed by the Pandava fire; therefore they were forgiving, for else who could pardon such an offence?

27. That greatly improper act of Vasudeva was only successful on account of the prowess of the illustrious sons of Pandu.

28. Various kings brought with them various kinds of wealth to the son of Kunti, king (Yudhisthira) and worshiped him like the tribute-paying Vaisyas.

29. Seeing the splendour of the Pandava's prosperity, and being afflicted with jealousy, I am as if on fire, although I should not be jealous.

Vaishampayana said :—

30. Having been burnt as if by fire and having made the (following) resolve, he (Duryodhana) thus again spoke to the king of Gandhara (Sakuni).

Duryodhana said :—

31. I shall throw myself into the fire, or I shall drink the poison, or I shall drown myself in water. I am unable to live.

32. What man is there in the world possessing manliness who can bear to see his foes in prosperity and himself in destitution?

33. Therefore, I, who bear the sight of the prosperity and fortune of my foes, am neither a woman nor one who is not a woman, neither a man nor one who is not a man.

34. Seeing their lordship over the world, their such vast wealth, and also their that sacrifice,—who is there like me that will not smart under it ?

35. I am alone incapable of acquiring such royal prosperity. I do not also see any one who can help me in doing it. Therefore I think of death.

36. Seeing the great and serene prosperity of the son of Kunti, I consider Fate to be supreme and exertion useless.

37. O son of Suvala, I formerly tried to destroy him, but baffling all my efforts, he has grown in prosperity like the lotus (in the tank).

38. Therefore, I consider Fate to be supreme and (all) exertions useless. The sons of Dhritarastra are decaying, (but) the sons of Pritha are prospering.

39. Seeing their prosperity and their that Assembly-Hall, and also the laughter of their servants, I am burning (in my heart), as if I am on fire.

40. O uncle, know me now to be in great grief and full of jealousy. Speak of it to Dhritarastra.

Thus ends the forty seventh chapter, the lamentations of Duryodhana, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Sakuni said :—

1. O Duryodhana, you should not be jealous of Yudhishthira. The Pandavas are enjoying what their good fortune yields them.

2—3. O chastiser of foes, O great king, you were unable to destroy them by repeatedly adopting various plans, many of which you reduced to practice. These best of men for their good fortune escaped (all) your machinations.

4. They obtained Draupadi as wife and Drupada with his two sons (as allies); and also the greatly powerful Vasudeva (Krishna) as a help to acquire the whole world.

5. O ruler of earth, having obtained their paternal share of the kingdom and not being deprived of it, they have grown (in prosperity) by their own energy. What is there to make you sorry in all this ?

6. Having worshipped Hutasana (Fire) Dhananjaya (Aryuna) has obtained the Gandiva (bow), the two inexhaustible quivers and many celestial weapons.

7. With that best of bow and by the prowess of his arms, he has brought all the rulers of earth under his sway. What is there to be sorry at ?

8. Having saved the Danava Moya from the conflagration of fire, the chastiser of foes, Sabyasachi (Aryuna) made him build that Assembly-Hall.

9. At the command of Moya, those fearful Rakshashas, named Kinkaras, guard that Assembly-Hall. What is there then to be sorry at ?

10. O descendant of Bharata, O king, you have said that you have no one to help you. This is not true. These your brothers are all obedient to you.

11. The wielder of the great bow the greatly powerful Drona with his son, the Suta's son, Radheya (Karna), the great car-warrior, Goutama (Kripa),

12. I with my brothers, the king Somadatti,—these are all your allies. Conquer the whole earth with them.

Duryodhana said :—

13. O king, if it please you, I shall conquer the Pandavas with you and with these great car-warriors.

14. If I can conquer them, the whole world will be mine; as also the kings and the Assembly-Hall which is so full of wealth.

Sakuni said :—

15. Dhananjaya, Vasudeva, Bhimasena Yudhishthira, Nakula, Sahadeva, Drupada, and his two sons,

16. These (heroes) cannot be conquered in a battle even by the celestials. They are all great car-warriors, and the wielders of great bows; they are accomplished in arms and invincible in war.

17. But I know the means by which Yudhishthira may be vanquished. O king, listen to it and adopt it.

Duryodhana said :—

18. O uncle, without any danger to our friends and other illustrious men, if there is means to conquer him, tell it to me.

Sakuni said :—

19. The son of Kunti (Yudhishthira) is very much fond of gambling, but he does not know how to play. That king of kings, (Yudhishthira) if asked to play, will not be able to refuse.

20. I am skilful in the play at dice. There is none equal to me (in this play).—on earth, nay, not even in the three worlds.

O descendant of Kuru, (therefore) ask him to play.

21. O king, O best of men, expert as I am in the play at dice, I am certain to win for you his kingdom and his greatly effulgent prosperity.

22. But, O Duryodhana, tell all this to the king (Dhritarastra). At the command of your father, I will win the whole of Yudhishthira's possessions without the least doubt.

Duryodhana said :—

23. O son of Suvala, tell yourself all this to the chief of the Kurus, Dhritarastra. I shall not be able to do it.

Thus ends the forty eighth chapter, the lamentations of Duryodhana, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER XLIX.

(DYUTA PARVA) Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—3. O king, having been impressed with the great Rajshuya sacrifice of king Yudhishthira and having also learnt the intentions of Duryodhana, from what he said, and also in order to do what was pleasing to him (Duryodhana), the son of Suvala, Sakuni, accompanied by Gandhari's son (Duryodhana) came to the king Dhritarastra whose knowledge was his eye, seated (on his throne). Approaching that greatly intelligent (king), Sakuni thus spoke to him.

Sakuni said :—

4. O great king, O best of the Bharata race, know that Duryodhana has become colorless, pale, and emaciated with anxiety.

5. Why do you not after due enquiry ascertain the cause of the grief that is in the heart of your eldest son,—the grief caused by the enemy ?

Dhritarastra said :—

6. O Duryodhana, O son, what is the cause of your grief ? O Kuru prince, if it is fit for me to hear, tell it to me.

7. This Sakuni says you are colorless, pale and emaciated. After reflection I can not find any cause for your grief.

8. O son, all my vast wealth is at your command. Your brothers and our relatives and friends never do anything injurious to you.

9. You wear the best robes, you eat food prepared with meat, you ride the best horses,—why then are you pale and emaciated ?

10. Costly beds, the charming damsels, finely furnished mansions and grounds of sport are at pleasure (when you amuse.)

11. All these certainly wait your command as do they in the case of the celestials, O invincible hero, O son, why do you grieve (then) like a destitute person ?

Duryodhana said :—

12. I, no doubt, eat and dress but I pass my time all the while like a wretch, for I am a prey to jealousy.

13. He is called a (true) man who lives after having vanquished his enemy in order to liberate his own subjects from the tyranny of that enemy.

14. O descendant of Bharata, contentment and pride destroy (one's) prosperity. Being engrossed with compassion and fear he can never rise.

15. Seeing the prosperity of Yudhishthira, whatever I enjoy does not gratify or please me. The great and splendid prosperity of the son of Kunti makes me pale.

16. Though I am not now seeing the greatly effulgent prosperity of the son of Kunti, yet knowing the affluence of the foe and my destitution, I (feel as if I) see it before me. For this reason I am colorless, melancholy, pale and emaciated.

17. Yudhishthira supports by giving thirty servant maids to each of eighty-eight thousands Snataka Brahmanas who lead domestic life.

18. Besides these, ten thousand other Brahmanas daily eat well cooked food from golden plates at the palace of Yudhishthira.

19—20. The king of Kambhoja sent to him hundreds and thousands of black, darkish and red skins of the deer called Kadali, and also blankets of excellent texture. Hundreds and hundreds and thousands and thousands of female elephants, horses and cows and thirty thousand female camels wander (within his palace);—the kings brought them all as tribute when they assembled there.

21. O lord of earth, the kings brought to that foremost of sacrifice heaps of gems and jewels for the son of Kunti.

22. I never heard or saw such enormous wealth as was brought to the sacrifice of the intelligent (son) of Pandu (Yudhishthira).

23. O king, seeing that enormous collection of wealth belonging to the enemy,

I cannot enjoy peace of mind. I am afflicted with their thoughts. O king,

24. Being stopped there by the gatekeepers hundreds of Brahmanas, supported by the land presented to them (by Yudhishthira) and possessing wealth of kine, waited at the palace gate with three thousands of millions of tribute.

25. Even having brought with them Ghee in golden Kamandalus (a sort of water pot), they could not get admission into the palace.

26. Ocean himself brought to him in vessels of white copper Ambrosia which was generated within his waters and which was superior to that which the wives of the immortal (Soma, i. e., flowers and annual plants) produce for Sakra (Indra).

27. Having brought an excellent conch, Vasudeva bathed him (Yudhishthira at the conclusion of the sacrifice) with the holy water brought in one thousand golden jars inlaid with numerous gems.

28—29. Seeing all this, I felt myself as if attacked with fever. O best of men, O sire, they (jars) were taken to the eastern and the southern seas. They were also taken to the western sea. But none can go to the northern sea except birds.

30. Aryuna, however, went there and exacted as tribute a vast quantity of wealth. There happened another wonderful incident, which I shall describe to you. Listen to it.

31. When (full) one lac Brahmanas were every day fed, it was arranged (to notify) the fact by blowing conchs in a chorus.

32. O descendant of Bharata, I continually heard (choruses of) conchs blown; and that too often repeatedly. It each time indicated that one lac Brahmanas had been fed. Having heard these sounds, my hairs stood on end.

33. O great king, that palatial grounds, crowded with many kings who came there as spectators, looked as beautiful as the cloudless sky studded with stars.

34. O ruler of men, O great king, the monarchs came to the sacrifice of the wise son of Pandu, bringing with them every kind of wealth.

35. Like the Vaisyas the kings became the distributors of food to the Brahmanas. Such wealth does not belong even to the king of the celestials (Indra) or to Yama or to Varuna,

36. Or to the lord of the Guhyakas;—as belongs to Yudhishthira. O king, seeing that great prosperity of the son of Pandu, my heart is burning. I cannot get peace (of mind).

Sakuni said :—

37. O hero whose prowess is truth, hear the means by which you can obtain the matchless prosperity that you have seen in the Pandava.

38. O descendant of Bharata, I am an adept in dice, superior to all in the world. I can ascertain the success or otherwise of every throw, and also when to stake and when not to stake. I have special knowledge of the play.

39. The son of Kunti (Yudhishthira) is also fond of the play, although he possesses little skill in it. He is sure to come, if challenged to play or to fight.

40. O lord, I shall always defeat him at every throw by practising deception. I shall win all his celestial-like wealth; and you will (then) be able to enjoy it.

Vaishampayana said :—

41. Having been thus addressed by Sakuni, the king Duryodhana, without allowing a moment to elapse, spoke thus to Dhritarastra,

42. O king, this (Sakuni) is an adept in dice; he is ready to win at dice the wealth of the sons of Pandu. You should grant him permission.

Dhritarastra says :—

43. I always follow the counsel of greatly intelligent Khattwa (Vidura), my minister. Having consulted with him, I shall inform you my decision (in this matter).

44. He is endued with great foresight; keeping the rules of morality before his eyes, he will point out what is good and what is proper for both parties and what should be done in this matter.

Duryodhana said :—

45. If you consult with Khattwa (Vidura), he will make you desist (from it). O king of kings, if you desist (from this), I will certainly kill myself.

46. O king, when I am dead, be happy with Vidura. Enjoy then the whole earth. What need have you with me?

Vaishampayana said :—

47. Hearing his (Duryodhana's) words of affliction, Dhritarastra, ever ready to do what Duryodhana said, commanded his servant thus.

Dhritarastra said :—

48. Let artificers be employed to erect without delay a delightful, charming and spacious Sabha with one hundred doors and with one thousand pillars.

49. Having brought carpenters and joiners, set jewels and precious stones all over its walls. Make it handsome and easy of access ; and then inform me when every thing is complete.

Vaishampayana said :—

50. O great king, having resolved to pacify Duryodhana the ruler of earth, Dhritarastra, sent men to Vidura to summon him (before his presence.)

51. Because without asking Vidura, he (Dhritarastra) never framed any resolution. Knowing (full well) the evils of gambling, he was still attracted towards it out of his fondness for his son.

52. Having heard this, the intelligent Vidura knew that the arrival of Kali (Yuga) is near at hand. Seeing also the way to destruction (of the Kuru race) about to be opened, he soon came to Dhritarastra.

53. Coming to his illustrious eldest brother and bowing his head to his feet, he thus spoke to him.

Vidura said :—

54. O king, O lord, I do not approve of the resolution you have formed. You should act in such a way that no dispute may arise amongst your sons on account of this gambling.

Dhritarastra said :—

55. O Khattwa, there is no doubt that if the gods are propitious to us, no dispute will ever arise amongst my children.

56. Auspicious or not auspicious, beneficial or not beneficial, let this friendly gambling match be held. This is certainly what Fate has ordained (for us).

57. O descendant of Bharata, when Drona, Bhishma, you and I will be near at hand, no evil, can possibly happen, even if Fate has ordained it.

58. Go ascending a car yoked with horses possessing the speed of wind, so that you may reach Khandavaprastha today. Bring Yudhisthira with you.

59. O Vidura, I tell you, this is my resolution. Do not tell me any thing. I regard Fate as supreme ; she brings all this.

Vaishampayana said :—

60. Having heard this, and having concluded that his race was doomed, the intelligent Vidura went to the greatly wise Bhishma in great sorrow.

Thus ends the forty ninth chapter, lamentations of Duryodhana in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER L.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Janamejaya said :—

1. How did that gambling take place, —the play which was full of such evils to the brothers and which plunged my grandsires into such sorrow ?

2. O best of all Veda-knowing men, who were the kings that were present in that Sabha and who amongst them approved of the play and who forbade it ?

3. O sinless one, O foremost of the twice-born, I desire to hear narrated by you in detail all this which became the cause of the destruction of all the world.

Souti said :—

4. Having been thus addressed by the king, the powerful disciple of Vyasa, (Vaishampayana), learned in all the Vedas, narrated every thing as it happened.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. O best of the Bharata race, O great king, if you desire to hear it, listen to it. I narrate all this in detail.

6. Knowing the opinion of Vidura, the son of Ambika, Dhritarastra, thus spoke to Duryodhana in private.

Dhritarastra said :—

7. O son of Gandhari, there is no need of playing dice. Vidura does not praise it. That greatly intelligent man will never give me advice that is not good for me.

8. I consider that what Vidura said is greatly beneficial to me. O son, do it ; for I consider it to be for your good also.

9. The greatly learned man, Vidura, knows all the sciences with their mysteries which the illustrious, learned and wise Vrihaspati, the great Rishi who is the preceptor of Vasava (indra); taught to the intelligent king of the immortals.

10. O son, I always follow his counsel. The greatly wise Vidura is considered to be the foremost of the Kurus,

11. As the greatly intelligent Udhava (is considered to be the foremost) of the Vrishnis. O son, O prince, have nothing with gambling. Dissension is the evident result of gambling,

12—13. Dissension causes ruin to a kingdom. O son, therefore, abandon (the idea of gambling.) O son, you have obtained all that is hard to be obtained from the father and the mother. You have obtained the rank and the possessions of your ancestors, you are taught, you are made learned in the Sastras, you were carefully brought up in the house,

14. You are the eldest amongst all your brothers, you are placed over the kingdom; why do you not consider yourself fortunate and happy? You get the very best kind of food and robes, unobtainable by ordinary men.

15—16. O mighty armed hero, O son, having obtained all this, why do you grieve? O mighty armed hero, ruling over your large ancestral kingdom swelling with people and wealth, you shine as splendidly as the chief of the celestials in heaven. O possessor of knowledge, you should tell me what can be the root of your grief which has made you so melancholy.

Duryodhana said :—

17. I am a sinful wretch that I eat and dress, though see the prosperity of the enemy. It has been said that a man is a wretch who does not feel jealousy at the sight of his enemy's prosperity.

18. O king of kings, O lord, this ordinary prosperity does not please me. I am greatly pained on seeing the burning prosperity of the son of Kunti.

19. I tell you, my life must be very hard to be parted with from my body, and therefore I am still alive after seeing all the kings of the world enduring the sway of Yudhishthira.

20. The Nipas, the Chitrakas, the Kakuraras, the Karaskaras and the Lohajangas are living in the Yudhishthira's palace like bondsmen.

21. The Himalayas, the ocean, the regions on the sea-shore and the numberless other regions that yield gems and jewels have all acknowledged their inferiority to the palace of Yudhishthira.

22. O king, on consideration of my being the eldest and the foremost, I was engaged in receiving the gems and jewels (brought as tribute by the kings).

23. O descendant of Bharata, the limit and the like of the excellent and the invaluable jewels that were brought there have never been seen.

24. O king, my hands were tired to receive that wealth. When I became tired they that brought that wealth from distant places waited (till I could resume my task).

25. Having brought jewels from Vindu lake, Moya built a lake-like ground made of crystal. O descendant of Bharata, seeing the place full of lotuses, I mistook it for water.

26. Seeing me draw up my clothes, Vrikodara (Bhima) laughed at me, considering me as destitute of jewels and deprived of my reason at the affluence of the enemy.

27. O king, if I had the ability, I would have instantly killed Vrikodara (for his laughter). O king, if we now try to kill Bhima,

28. Our fate will be certainly as that of Sishupala. O descendant of Bharata, that insult by the enemy burns me.

29. O king, again seeing a similar lake full of water, I mistook it for a crystal surface, and I fell into it.

30. At this Bhima with Partha (Aryuna) laughed aloud, and Draupadi with other females laughed also. This greatly pains my heart.

31. My robes having been wet, the servants gave me other clothes at the command of the king (Yudhishthira). That also is my great sorrow.

32. O king, listen to another mistake (I made) which I speak of. In attempting to pass through what was exactly of the shape of a door, but which was not really a door,

33. I struck my forehead against it and injured myself. Thereupon the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), seeing from a distance that I was struck, came and supported me in their arms, and expressed great concern (for my injury).

34. Sahadeva then again and again told me with smiles, "O king, this is the door. Go this way."

35. O king, Bhimasena laughed aloud; and addressing me, he spoke thus to me, "O son of Dhritarastra, this is the door."

36. I had not even heard the names of the gems that I saw in that palace. It is for this reason my heart is so much burning.

Thus ends the fiftieth chapter, the lamentations of Duryodhana, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER L I.

(DYUTA PARVA)—continued.

Duryodhana said :—

1. O descendant of Bharata, hear about all the best of wealth that belongs to the Pandavas and that was brought by the kings of earth one after another.

2—3. Seeing that wealth of the enemy, I lost my reason, and I scarcely knew myself. O descendant of Bharata, hear as I describe that wealth consisting of both manufactures and the produce of land. The king of Kambhoja gave many of the best kinds of skins, woolen blankets, blankets made of the soft fur of mice and other animals living in holes and blankets made of the wool of cats,—all inlaid with threads of gold ;

4. Also three hundred horses of the Tittiri and Kalmasha kinds,—all possessing nose like the parrots ; also three hundred camels, three hundred female asses, all fattened with olive and Pilusha.

5. O great king, many Brahmanas, who rear cattle and who are fit to be engaged in menial service, in order to gratify the illustrious Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) waited,

6—8. At the gate with hundred millions of tribute and were denied admittance. Hundreds of Brahmanas, possessing wealth of kine and living upon the lands that Yudhisthira gave them, came there with their handsome golden Kamandalus (water-pot) filled with Ghee. Though they brought such tribute, yet they were refused admittance. Hundred thousands of serving maids of the Kampasika country,

9—10. All of beautiful features of slender waist, and of long hair, and all adorned with golden ornaments, also many skins of Renku deer worthy of the best Brahmanas, and also horses of the Gandhara country, were brought by the Sudra kings who lived in the regions on the coast of the sea. O great king,

11—13. The Vairamas, the Parradas, the Tungas and the Kitavas who lived upon crops that depended on water from the sky or of the river, and those who were born in regions on the sea shore, in woodlands or in countries on the other side of the sea, being refused admittance waited at the gate, though they brought with them goats and kine, asses and camels, vegetable honey and blankets, jewels and gems of various kinds.

14—15. The brave ruler of Pragjyotisha, and the powerful king of the Mlechas the car-warrior king Bhagadatta, waited at the gate at the head of a large number of Yavanas. He too was unable to enter, though he brought a large tribute comprising of horses of the best breed and of the speed of the wind.

16. Thereupon the king of Pragjyotisha Bhagadatta had to go away from the gate, giving away a number of swords with handles made of the purest ivory and well-adorned with diamonds and every kind of gems.

17. Many races, coming from various regions, some possessing two eyes, some three, some with eyes on the forehead, and also the Aushnikas, the Nishadas, the Romakas,—also those that were cannibals,

18—19. And also those that possessed only one leg, I saw, were refused admittance at the gate. These kings brought as tribute ten thousand celebrated asses of various and innumerable colors, with black necks and huge bodies, with great speed and much docility ;

20. They were all of good size and delightful colour ; they were all born on the coast and shore the Vanku, of all these king gave much gold and silver.

21—23. Having given so much tribute they got admission to the palace of Yudhisthira. The one legged people who came there gave him (Yudhisthira) many wild horses, some red as coccinella (a sort of red insect) and some white, some of the rainbow color, some looking like evening clouds and some of variegated colour, and all possessing the speed of mind. They also gave to the king much gold of superior quality. Innumerable Chins, Sakas, Uddras and many barbarians and dwellers of forest,

24. The Vrishnis, the Harahunas, the dark people of the Himalayas, the Nipas and the people living on the sea coast, were all refused admittance at the gate.

25—26. They gave as tribute ten thousand various asses of good size and black necks and capable of daily running two thousand miles, all of many shapes and all well-trained and celebrated over the world, all possessing symmetrical proportion and excellent color, their skins being pleasant to the touch,—also many woolen blankets made in Chin, also many skins of Renku deer, and also many clothes made of jute and many others made of the threads of insects.

27—29. They also gave thousands of other cloths not made of cotton and all possessing the colour of the lotus,—being made of smooth and soft texture. They also gave thousands of soft sheepskins, also many sharp and long swords and scimitars, hatchets and fine-edged battle-axes, manufactured in the western countries, also thousands of perfumes, jewels and gems. But being refused admittance they all waited at the gate.

30—31. The Sakas, the Takharas, the Kankas, the Romakas and the men with horns, bringing with them (as tribute) many large elephants which could go long distances, and also ten thousand horses and also hundreds of millions of gold, waited at the gate being refused admittance.

32—33. Costly carpets, vehicles and beds, armours of various colours, decked with jewels, gems and ivory, and also weapons of various kinds and cars of various shapes handsomely made and adorned with gold,

34. Well-trained horses covered with the tiger skins, rich and variegated blankets for covering elephants, various kinds of gems and jewels,

35. Long and short arrows, and various other kinds of weapons—such valuable things were presented by the eastern kings. They then entered the sacrificial palace of the illustrious Pandava.

Thus ends the fifty first chapter, the lamentations of Duryodhana, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Duryodhana said:—

1. O sinless one, listen to me as I describe that large mass of wealth, consisting of various kinds of tributes presented to him (Yudhisthira) by the kings of the earth.

2. Those, that live on the banks of the river Sailada flowing between the mountains Meru and Mandara and enjoy the delicious shade of the groves of Kichaka bamboo,

3. Namely (the kings) of the Khashas, the Ekasanas, the Arhas, the Pradaras, the Dirghavenus, the Paradas, the Kulindas, the Tanganas, and the other Tanganas,

4. Brought as tribute heaps of gold measured in Dronas (jars) and raised from underneath the earth by ants, and therefore called after the ants.

5—7. The powerful mountain tribes, having brought as tribute many soft and black Chamaras and many others as white as the moon-beam, and also sweet horey extracted from the flowers growing on the Himalayas and also from the Mechelia champaka, and also garlands of flowers brought from the land of the northern Kurus, and also various kinds of plants from the north, even from the Kailasha (mountain), waited at the gate with their heads down, being refused admittance.

8—9. O lord, I also saw many Kirata kings, armed with cruel weapons and ever engaged in cruel deeds, living on fruits and roots and wearing skins, who live on the slopes of the Himalayas and the mountain from behind which the sun rises and in the Karusha country on the sea coast and on the both sides of the Lohitya mountain.

10—11. O king, having brought loads of Chandana and aloes and also black aloes, and heaps of valuable skins and much wealth and perfumes, and also ten thousand serving maids of the Kirata race, and many beautiful birds and animals of remote countries,

12. And also much gold of great splendour procured from the mountains, waited at the gate, being refused admittance.

13. The Kiratas, the Daradas, the Darvas, the Suras, the Vaiamakas, the Audumvaras, the Durvibhagas, the Paradas, the Valbikas.

14. The Kashmiras, the Kumaras, the Ghorakas, the Hansakayanas, the Sivis, the Trigartas, the Yodheyas, the rulers of the Madras, the Kaikeyas,

15. The Amvasthas, the Kaukuras, the Tarkshyas, the Vastrapas, with the Palvas, the Vashatayas, the Mauleyas, the Khudrakas, the Malavas,

16. O king, the Paundrayas, the Kukuras, the Sakas, the Angas, the Bhangas, the Pauadras, the Sanavatayas, and the Gayas,

17. These well-born, greatly fortunate, excellent and well-skilled in arms Kshatriyas brought tribute by hundreds and thousands.

18. The Bhangas, the Kalingas, the Magadhas, the Tamraliptas, the Supandrakas, the Dauvalikas, the Sagarakas, the Patroras, the Saisavas,

19. O descendant of Bharata, innumerable Karnapravaranas who came to the gate were told by the gate-keepers at the command of the king (Yudhisthira) that if they could wait and bring good tribute, they would (then) get admittance.

20—21. They (therefore) each gave one thousand elephants with tusks like the shafts of plough and girdles made of gold and with coverlets of fine blankets of the colour of lotus. They were darkish like rocks and they were always rusty, they were all procured from the banks of the Kamyaka lake and they were covered with defensive armour. They were also very patient and they were all of the best breed. Having made these presents, the kings were admitted (into the sacrificial ground).

22. These and many other (kings), coming from various regions, and also others who brought a great mass of gems and jewels, all assembled there.

23. The king, named Chitraratha, the friend of Indra, gave five hundred horses with the speed of wind.

24. The Gandarva Tumvuru cheerfully gave one hundred horses of the colour of the mango leaf, all adorned with gold (ornaments).

25. O king, O descendant of Kuru, the renowned king of the Sukaras gave many hundreds of valuable elephants.

26. The king of Matsya, Birata, gave as tribute two thousand elephants adorned with gold (ornaments).

27. O monarch, king Vasudana from the kingdom of Pansu gave twenty-six elephants and two thousand horses all adorned with gold (ornaments).

28. O king, they were all endued with speed and strength and they were all in the full vigour of their youth. These and many other wealth he offered to the Pandavas.

29—30. O king, Yagmasena presented to the sons of Pritha for their sacrifice fourteen thousand serving maids and ten thousand serving men with their wives. O great king, also many hundreds of excellent elephants, twenty-six cars with elephants yoked to them and also his whole kingdom. Vasudeva of the Vrishni race (Krishna) in order to increase the dignity of Kiriti Aryuna

31. Gave fourteen thousand excellent elephants. Krishna is the soul of Partha (Aryuna), and Dhananjaya (Aryuna) is the soul of Krishna.

32. Whatever Aryuna may say Krishna is certain to accomplish. Krishna can abandon heaven itself for the sake of Dhananjaya (Aryuna).

33. Partha also can sacrifice his life for the sake of Krishna. Though, numberless golden jars filled with fragrant Chandana

34. From the Malaya hills and loads of sandals and aloe woods from the Darduras hills, many very costly gems and many fine cloths inlaid with gold

35. Were brought by the kings of Chola and Pandya, yet they could not get admittance. That best of sea-born gems, Vaidurya and heap of pearls,

36. And hundreds of coverlets for elephants were presented by the kings of the Singhalas. Innumerable dark-colored men with copper coloured eyes, attired with robes adorned with gems

37—38. Waited at the gate with their presents being refused admittance. In order to gratify (Yudhisthira) many Brahmanas and many Kshatryas who have been vanquished, Vaisyas and serving Sudras brought tribute. From the love and respect for Yudhisthira even all the Mlechas came to his palace. Men of all orders, good, indifferent and low belonging to various tribes came from various regions,

39—41. And made the palace of Yudhisthira an epitome of all the world. Seeing the king offer such excellent and valuable presents, I wish for death from grief. O king, I shall now tell you about the servants of the Pandavas,

42. To whom Yudhisthira supplies both cooked and uncooked food. There are a hundred thousand billions of soldiers mounted on elephants, and also horsemen.

43. And also a hundred millions of cars and numberless foot—soldiers. At one place raw food grains are being measured out and at another they all being cooked.

44—45. At another place they are distributed; the sound of festivity is heard everywhere. I have not seen a single man amongst the four orders who had not got in Yudhisthira's palace food, drink, ornament, and reception. Eighty-eight thousand Snatakas leading domestic life

46. Were all supported by Yudhisthira who presented each with thirty serving girls. They being thus gratified always pray for the destruction of his foe.

47. Ten thousand Ascetics with their passions under complete control daily eat in golden plates in Yudhisthira's palace.

48. O king, Jagmaseni (Draupadi) without herself taking any food, daily sees whether everybody, including even the dwarfs and the deformed has eaten.

49. O descendant of Bharata, only two (races) do not pay tribute to the son of Kunti, the Panchalas on account of their relationship by marriage and the Andhakas and the Vrishnis on account of their friendship (with the Pandavas).

Thus ends the fifty second chapter, lamentations of Duryodhana in the Gyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LIII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—continued.

Duryodhana said :—

1. Those high-souled kings, who are devoted to truth, who are greatly observant of vows, who are vastly learned, who are eloquent, who are learned in the Vedas and their branches and in sacrifices,

2. Who have piety and modesty, who are virtuous-minded, who are renowned and on whom the grand rites of coronation have been performed,—all these worship the king (Yudhisthira).

3. I saw many thousands of wild kine with as many vessels of white copper for milking them, brought there by the kings of the earth to be given away as Dakshina (sacrificial presents) by Yudhisthira.

4. O descendant of Bharata, many kings with greatest alacrity themselves brought there many excellent jars (of water) for the purpose of bathing the king at the end of the sacrifice.

5. Valhika himself brought there a car decked with gold. Sudakshina himself yoked to it four white horses of the Kamboja kind.

6. The greatly strong Sunitha gladly fitted its lower pole and the ruler of Chedi with his own hands took up and fitted its flag-staff.

7—8. The king of the southern country stood ready with the coat of mail and the Magadha king with garlands of flowers and the head-dress. The great bow-man Vasudeva stood with a sixty years old elephant, the king of Matsya with side-fittings of the cars decked with gold, Ekalabya with the shoes, the king of Avanti with various kinds of water for the final bath,

9. Chekitana with the quiver, the king of Kashi with the bow, Salya with a sword, the hilt and straps of which were inlaid with gold.

10. Dhaumya and greatly ascetic Vyasa with Narada and Asita's son, Rishi Devala, at the head, performed the ceremony of sprinkling sacred water over the king.

11—12. The great Rishis sat with cheerful heart at the place where the sprinkling ceremony took place. As the seven Rishis approached the chief of the celestials Indra in heaven, so the illustrious Rishis, learned in the Vedas, with the son of Jamadagni, came uttering Mantras to the great Dakshina-giving (Yudhisthira).

13. The greatly powerful Satyaki held the umbrella and Dhananjaya (Aryuna) and Bhima fanned the Pandava (Yudhisthira).

14. The twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) held two excellent Chamaras in their hands which was presented by Prajapati to Indra in a former Kalpa.

15. That big conch of Varuna which Vishwakarma had constructed with a thousand Nishkas of gold was brought by the Ocean himself.

16. With it Krishna bathed Yudhisthira after the conclusion of the sacrifice. Seeing this I partly lost my senses. People go to the eastern and the western and also the southern seas ;

17—18. But, O father, except birds none can go to the northern seas. They have spread their dominion even there ;—for I heard hundreds of conches that had been brought from that region blown indicating auspicious rejoicings. While those conches were simultaneously blown, my hair stood on end ; and those among the kings who were weak in strength fell down in a swoon.)

19—21. O descendant of Bharata, Dhristadyumna, Satyaki, the Pandavas and Keshava (Krishna),—these eight handsome and greatly powerful men having seen the kings deprived of consciousness and myself in that state, laughed aloud. Then Vivatsu (Aryuna) gave to the foremost of Brahmanas with a cheerful heart five hundred bullocks with their horns covered with gold. Rantideva, Nabhaga, Jauvanashwa, Manu,

22. King Pritha, the son of Vena, Bhagiratha, Yayati or Nahusha was not like the king Yudhisthira.

23. The son of Kunti (Yudhisthira), having completed the Rajshuya sacrifice, obtained the prosperity as was obtained by the lord Harishchandra.

24. O descendant of Bharata, O lord, seeing such prosperity in the son of Pritha as that of Harishchandra, I do not find any good in my living any longer.

25. O king, a yoke tied by a blind man becomes loosend. Such is the case with us. The younger ones are growing, while the elder ones are decaying.

26. O chief of the Kurus, seeing all this, however, I try to console my mind by thoughts. I cannot enjoy peace. It is for this I am plunged into grief ; and I am becoming pale and emaciated.

Thus ends the fifty third chapter, lamentations of Duryodhana, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LIV.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. You are my eldest son, born of my eldest wife. Therefore, O son, be not jealous of the Pandavas. He who is jealous is always unhappy and suffer the death-pangs.
2. O best of the Bharata race, Yudhisthira does not know what deception is ; he possesses wealth equal to yours ; he has your friends for his ; and he is not jealous of you. Why then are you jealous of him ?
3. O prince, you are equal to Yudhisthira in friends and allies. Why should you then out of folly covet the property of your cousin ? Be not so. Cease to be jealous. Do not grieve.
4. O best of the Bharata race, if you desire to possess the dignity of performing a sacrifice, let Ritwajas arrange for you the great sacrifice, called Suptatantu.
5. The kings will then gladly bring (for you) much wealth and many gems and ornaments.
6. O son, to covet other's property is exceedingly mean. He, who is contented and is engaged in the practices of his own order, enjoys happiness.
7. Not to try to get the wealth of others, to persevere in one's own affairs and to protect what has been earned,—these are the indications of true greatness.
8. He who is unmoved in calamity, is skilled in his own business, is ever exerting, vigilant, and humble will always meet with prosperity.
9. The Pandavas are like your arms ; do not chop off your those arms. Do not plunge yourself into internal dissensions coveting the wealth of your brothers.
10. O prince, do not be jealous of the Pandavas. Your wealth is equal to that of your cousins. To quarrel with one's own friends is a great sin. They who are your grandsires are their grandsires also.
11. O best of the Bharata race, give away (wealth) in charity on the occasions of sacrifices ; gratify every dear object of your desire ; sport freely in the company of women, and enjoy peace.

Thus ends the fifty fourth chapter, the words of Dhritarastra, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LV.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Duryodhana said :—

1. He, who has no personal knowledge, but has merely heard of many things, cannot understand the real meaning of the Sastras, like the spoon which has no perception of the taste of the soup it touches.
2. You know every thing, but you still confound me. Like a boat tied to another boat, you and I are tied to each other. Are you unmindful of your own interest ? Do you entertain hostile feelings towards me ?
3. The sons of Dhritarastra are doomed to destruction in as much as they are ruled by you. That which should be done at once, you say should be done in future.
4. He often loses his way whose guide follows the instruction of others. How can those who follow him obtain the right path ?
5. O king, you are of mature wisdom ; you wait on the old, and your passions are also under complete control. You should not confound us, when we are ready to seek our own interest.
6. Vrihaspati has said that the usage of kings are different from those of common people. Therefore, kings should always look to their interest with vigilance.
7. O great king, the character of a Kshatriya is to be known from (his) success. Whether sinful or virtuous, what scruples can there be in performing the duties of one's own (caste.)
8. O best of the Bharata race, he, who is desirous of securing the blazing prosperity of his enemy, should bring all directions under his subjection, as the charioteer does his steeds with his whip.
9. The men, skilled in arms, say that the means, either covered or open, which can vanquish the enemy, is to be called the (true) weapon and not that which cuts.
10. O king, there is no figure or dimension to know who is one's friend and who is one's foe. He who gives pain to the other is to be called by him his enemy.
11. O king, discontent is the root of prosperity. Therefore, I desire to have it. O king, he who tries to acquire prosperity is truly a man of policy.
12. None should love his wealth and affluence, for the wealth, that has been earned and hoarded, might be plundered. This (such plundering) is the usage of the kings.

13. It was during an armistice and also at the time when a pledge was given (not to fight) that Sakra (Indra) cut off the head of Nemucli. As he approved of this eternal usage towards the enemy, he did act in this way.

14. Like a snake that swallows up frogs and other animals living in holes, the earth swallows up a king who is peaceful and (also) a Brahmana who does not stir out of his house.

15. O king, none can by nature be any person's foe. He, and none else, is one's enemy who has common pursuits with another.

16. He who foolishly neglects a growing foe cuts off his root, as a disease which he keeps without treatment (destroys his body.)

17. If a foe, however insignificant he is, be allowed to grow in prowess, he swallows one, as the white ants at the root of a tree eat up the tree itself.

18. O descendant of Ajamira, O descendant of Bharata, let not the enemy's prosperity be acceptable to you. The wise men should carry on their heads this policy like a load.

19. He, who always wishes for the increase of his wealth, grows and prospers amongst his relatives, as the body naturally grows from the day of birth. Prowess brings speedy growth.

20. Covet as much as I do the wealth and prosperity of the Pandavas, they have not as yet become my own. I am doubtful about my ability; I am, however, determined to remove my doubt. I will either obtain their wealth or lay my own life in battle.

21. O king, when the state of my mind is such, when the Pandavas are daily growing in prosperity and our possessions are daily decreasing, what do I care for life?

Thus ends the fifty fifth chapter, the lamentations of Duryodhana, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LVI.

(DYUTA PARVA)—continued.

Sakuni said :—

1. O foremost of all virtuous men, I shall win by dice the prosperity of the son of Pandu, Yudhisthira, seeing which you so much grieve.

2—3. O king, let the son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, be summoned. A skillful man, keeping himself uninjured, and by throwing dice may vanquish one that has no skill.

4. O descendant of Bharata; know that betting is my bow, the dice are my arrows, the marks of them (dice) are my bow-strings, and the dice-board is my car.

Duryodhana said :—

5. O king, this expert in dice (Sakuni) is ready to win the prosperity of the son of Pandu by means of dice. You ought to give him permission.

Dhritarastra said :—

6. I am always obedient to the counsel of my brother, the high-souled Vidura. After consulting with him, I shall settle what should be done in this matter.

Duryodhana said :—

7. O descendant of Kuru, Vidura is always engaged in doing good to the Pandavas. His feelings towards me is not so.

8. O descendant of Kuru, he is sure to withdraw your mind from the proposed act. No man should engage in doing a thing by depending on the counsel of another, for the minds of two persons seldom agree in any thing.

9. The fool who cherishes himself by shunning all causes of fear destroys himself like an insect in the rainy season.

10. Neither disease nor Yama (Death) waits till one is in prosperity. Therefore, so long there is life and breath, let us accomplish this purpose.

Dhritarastra said :—

11. O son, enmity with those that are strong is never liked by me. Enmity brings about a change of feelings, and it is itself a weapon, though not made of steel.

12. O prince, you consider an act, which will bring in its train the fearful consequences of war and which is really fraught with mischief, as a great blessing. If it once begins, it will produce sharp swords and pointed arrows.

Duryodhana said :—

13. The dice has been created and used by the men of ancient times. There is neither destruction nor striking with weapons in it. Therefore, let the counsel of Sakuni be accepted by you to-day. Let your commands be soon issued for the construction of the Assembly-Hall.

14. The door of heaven will be opened to us by gambling. It will lead us to great happiness. They that betake to gambling (truly) deserve such good fortune. The Pandavas will be then our equal ; therefore (allow us to) gamble with them.

Dhritarastra said :—

15. The words uttered by you do not recommend themselves to me. (However) O ruler of men, do what is agreeable to you. You shall have to repent for acting according to these words, for words fraught with such impiety cannot bring in prosperity.

16. All this has been foreseen by the learned Vidura, who follows the path of learning and wisdom. The great calamity which would cause the destruction of the Kshatrya-lives comes as willed by Fate.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Having said this the weak-minded Dhritarastra considered that Fate was supreme (in this world.) The king (Dhritarastra), deprived of his (good) sense by Fate and obedient to the words of his son, loudly commanded his men, (saying),

18. "Build with all care as soon as possible an Assembly-Hall of the most beautiful description to be called "Crystal-gate Palace" with one thousand pillars and one thousand gates,—decked with gold and Vaidurya gems and extending two miles in length and two miles in breadth."

19. Hearing (the command), thousands of wise and skillful artificers soon built the palace with the greatest alacrity. Having built it, they brought there every kind of article.

20. They (then) gladly informed the king that the Sabha was ready,—it has been made delightful and beautiful, and it had been furnished with every kind of gems and covered with many coloured carpets inlaid with gold.

21. Thereupon the ruler of men, Dhritarastra, thus spoke to his chief minister, the learned Vidura, "Going (to Indraprastha), soon bring the prince Yuddishthira here at my command.

22. Coming here with his brothers, let him see my this beautiful Assembly-Hall furnished with countless gems and jewels and with costly beds and carpets. Let then a friendly match at dice be played in that Hall."

Thus ends the fifty six chapter, fetching Yudhishthira, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LVII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. The king Dhritarastra, knowing the inclinations of his son and considering also that Fate was unavoidable, acted in this way.

2. The foremost of all learned men, Vidura, did not approve the words of his brother so unjustly uttered ; and he then thus spoke to him.

Vidura said :—

3. O king, I do not approve of your this command. Do not act thus. I am afraid this will bring about the destruction of our race. O ruler of men, I apprehend that your sons will lose unity from this match at dice ; and dissension will certainly arise amongst them.

Dhritarastra said :—

4. O Khattwa, if Fate be not unfavourable to me, this quarrel will not certainly grieve me. The whole universe moves at the will of its Creator, but (it moves) under the controlling influence of Fate. It is not free.

5. Therefore O Vidura, going to the king (Yudhishthira), soon bring (here) the invincible son of Kunti, Yudhishthira.

Thus ends the fifty seventh chapter, fetching of Yudhishthira, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LVIII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thus commanded against his will by king Dhritarastra, Vidura started for (the palace of) the wise Pandavas by means of quiet and patient horses of best species, possessing great speed and strength.

2. The greatly intelligent (Vidura) proceeded by the way leading to the city of the Pandavas ; and having arrived there, he, being duly worshipped by the Brahmanas, entered the city.

3. Coming to the royal palace which was like the palace of Kuvera, the virtuous-minded (Vidura) went to the son of Dharma, Yudhishthira.

4. The illustrious and enemiless descendant of Ajamira, ever devoted to truth, re-verentially saluted Vidura and asked him about the welfare of Dhritarastra and his sons.

Yudhisthira said :—

5. O Khattwa, your mind seems to be cheerless. Do you come in peace? Are the sons (of Dhritarastra) obedient to their old father? Are the people obedient to his (Dhritarastra's) rule?

Vidura said :—

6. The illustrious king with his sons is well. Surrounded by his relatives, he reigns like Indra. O king, the illustrious monarch is happy with his sons who are all obedient to him. But he is bent upon his own aggrandisement.

7. The Kuru king has commanded me first to enquire after your peace and prosperity, and then to tell you on his behalf the following. (He says to you), "The Assembly-Hall of your cousin (built by me) is equal to your Sabha. Therefore, (come) and see it.

8. O son of Pritha, coming there enjoy the palace and play a friendly match at dice with your cousins. We shall be very happy at your arrival, so will be all the Kurus assembled there."

9. O king, you will see there all those gamblers,—those cheats who have been brought there by the illustrious king Dhritarastra. I have come here for this. Let the king's command be approved by you.

Yudhisthira said :—

10. O Khattwa, gambling may produce quarrel. Knowing this, who is there who will consent to gamble? What do you think proper for us to do? We are all obedient to your advice.

Vidura said :—

11. I know gambling is the root of all misery. I tried to dissuade the king from it. The king, however, has sent me to you. O learned man, knowing all this, do what is good.

Yudhisthira said :—

12. Besides the sons of king Dhritarastra who are the other dishonest gamblers that are present there to play? O Vidura, I ask you, tell us who are the men with whom we shall have to play staking hundreds upon hundreds.

Vidura said :—

13. O king, expert in dice, with great skill of hand, ever desperate at stakes the Gandhara king, Sakuni, Vivingsati, Chitrasena, king Satyavrata, Puramitra and Jaya (these are present there).

Yudhisthira said :—

14. It appears that some of the most desperate and terrible gamblers who always depend on deceit (in their play) are present there. The whole universe, however, is at the will of its creator under the control of Fate. It is not free.

15. O learned man, I do not desire to engage in gambling at the command of king Dhritarastra, for a father always wishes to benefit his son. You are our master, O Vidura, tell me what is proper (for us to do).

16. I am unwilling to gamble. I will not do it (gamble) unless the wicked Sakuni does not challenge me in the Sabha. If however he challenges me, I will never refuse. This is my settled and eternal vow.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Having said this to Vidura, Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) commanded that preparations for his journey might be soon made. The next day accompanied by his relatives and attendants and taking with him Draupadi and the women of the household he started (for Hastinapur.)

18. "As a brilliant body falling before the eye deprives the power of seeing, so does Fate our reason. Man, tied as it were with a cord, submits to the sway of Providence."

19. Having said this, the chastiser of foes Yudhisthira, went with Khattwa (Vidura) without deliberating over the summons (of Dhritarastra).

20. The slayer of hostile hosts, the son of Pritha, the Pandava (Yudhisthira), attired in royal robes and riding on the car presented to him by the Valhika king, started with his brothers.

21. Summoned by Dhritarastra and impelled by what has been ordained by Time and blazing with royal prosperity, the king with the Brahmanas walking before him went (from his city).

22. Arriving at Hastinapur, he went to the Dhritarastra's palace. The high-souled Pandava (Yudhisthira) then met Dhritarastra,

23. Bhishma, Drona, Karna and Kripa. The lord (Yudhisthira) also met the son of Drona (Ashwathama); he duly saluted and embraced all of them and was saluted and embraced by them in return.

24. The greatly powerful and mighty armed (hero) then met Somadatta, Duryodhana, Salya, the son of Savala (Sakuni),

25. And the other monarchs that had arrived there before him; and also the brave Dushyasana and all his other cousins ;

26. Also Jayadhratha and all other Kurus. Then the mighty armed hero, surrounded by all his brothers,

27. Entered the palace of the wise king Dhritarastra, and saw there lady Gandhari, ever obedient to her husband,

28. Surrounded by her daughters-in-law like Rohini by the stars. Having saluted Gandhari and having been blessed by her in return,

29. He saw his old father (uncle, Dhritarastra), the great lord whose knowledge was his eye.

30. O king, the monarch (Dhritarastra) smelt his head as also those of the four other Kuru princes,—the Pandavas, Bhima being at their head.

31. O king, seeing these best of men, the handsome Pandavas, all the Kurus became exceedingly glad.

32. Commanded by the king Dhritarastra, the Pandavas retired to rooms, adorned with gems and jewels. Here the ladies of the household with Dushala (Duryodhana's sister) at their head visited them.

33. Seeing the blazing and splendid beauty and prosperity of Jagināseni (Draupadi), Dhritarastra's daughters-in-law were filled with jealousy and became cheerless.

34. Having conversed with the ladies, those best of men (then) went through their daily physical exercises, and they then performed the usual daily religious rites.

35. Having performed their daily rites and decked their body with excellent Chandana, and having desired to secure good luck and prosperity they caused Brahmanas to utter benedictions. Then having eaten best food, they retired to the sleeping apartments.

36—37. Those best of the Kurus, those subjugators of hostile towns, were sung into sleep by beautiful damsels. Receiving what came in due succession, they passed that delicious night in pleasure and sport. Having awakened by the sweet music of the bards, they rose from their bed after rest.

38. Having passed the day in happiness, they rose in the morning and having performed the usual rites, they entered the Sabha and were saluted by those who assembled there for gambling.

Thus ends the fifty eighth chapter, the arrival of Yudhishthira, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LIX.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. Having entered the Sabha, the sons of Pritha with Yudhishthira at their head met all the kings that were present there. Worshipping all those that deserved to be worshipped and saluting others as each deserved according to his age, they took their seats on pure seats covered with costly carpets.

3. When they were seated, and when the kings took their seats also, the son of Suvala, Sakuni, thus spoke to Yudhishthira.

Sakuni said :—

4. O king, the Assembly is full. All was waiting for you. O Yudhishthira, let now the dice be cast and the rules of play be fixed.

Yudhishthira said :—

5. O king, deceitful gambling is a sin. There is no Kshatrya prowess (to be found) in it. There is certainly no morality in it ; why then are you praising gambling ?

6. O Sakuni, the wise men do not praise the pride that gamblers feel in deceitful play. Do not like a cruel man defeat us by deceitful means.

Sakuni said :—

7—8. That high minded player, who knows the secrets of winning and losing, who is skilled in baffling the deceitful arts of those with whom he plays, and who is united with the various operations which gambling consists of, knows truly the play and suffers all in course of it. O son of Pritha, it is the staking of dice that may be lost and won, and which may injure us. And it is for this reason gambling is considered to be a fault. Therefore, O king, let us begin the play. Fear not, let the stakes be fixed. Do not make any further delay.

Yudhishthira said :—

9—10. That best of Rishis, the son of Asita, Devala, who always instructs us about all those acts that may lead (men) to heaven, hell or to the other regions, has said that it is sinful to play deceitfully with a gamester. The best sport is to obtain victory in a righteous battle. Gambling is not a sport.

11. Those that are respectable do not use the Mlecha language, nor do they adopt deceitfulness in their behaviour. The act of honest men is to carry on a war without crookedness or cunning.

12. O Sakuni, by playing desperately do not dectetfully win from us that wealth with which according to our ability we try to benefit the Brahmanas. Even enemies should not be vanquished by desperate stakes in a dectetful play.

13. I do not desire to have happiness or wealth by means of cunning. The conduct of one that is a gamester, even if his playing be without dectetfulness, should still never be praised.

Sakuni said :—

14. O Yudhisthira, it is with the desire of vanquishing, which is (of course) not a very honest motive, that a high-born man approaches another (like him); so does a learned man an ignorant one;

15. O Yudhisthira, so also a man skilled in dice approaches one who is not so from the desire of vanquishing (his opponent). One who is conversant with the truths of science approaches another that is not from the desire of victory, which is scarcely an honest motive;

16. O Yudhisthira, so also a man skilled in weapons approaches one who is not so; so does a strong man a weak one. This is the practice in every contest. The victory is (always) the motive.

17. If, therefore, in approaching me to play, you consider that I am actuated by dishonest motives, and if you are afraid, then desist from the play.

Yudhisthira said :—

18. O king, challanged, I do not withdraw; this is my established vow. (I know) Fate is (all) powerful. We are all under the sway of Fate.

19. In this Assembly with whom am I to play? Who is there who can stake equally with me? Let the play begin (with him).

Duryodhana said :—

20. O king, I shall supply gems and jewels and wealth, and my uncle, Sakuni, will play the dice on my behalf.

Yudhisthira said :—

21. Gambling by one on another's behalf seems to me to be contrary to rule. O learned man, you too will admit this. If, however, you still desire it, let the play begin.

Thus ends the fifty ninth chapter, the cology between Yudhisthira and Sakuni, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LX.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When the play commenced, all the kings, Dhritarastra being at their head, took their seats in that Assembly-Hall.

2. O descendant of Bharata, Bhisma, Drona, Kripa, the high-souled Vidura followed their example with cheerless heart.

3. Those lion-necked and greatly effulgent (kings) took their seats separately and in pairs on many high (royal) seats of various make and colour.

4. O king, that Assembly-Hall looked beautiful with the assembled monarchs like the heaven with a conclave of greatly fortunate celestials.

5. O great king, they were all heroes, they were all learned in the Vedas, and they all bore resplendent countenances. The friendly match at dice then commenced (in due form).

Yudhisthira said :—

6. O king, this excellent and most valuable chain of pearls, so beautiful and adorned with gold and procured from the ocean by churning it,

7. O king, is my stake. O great king, what is your counter stake,—the wealth with which you wish to play with me?

Duryodhana said :—

8. I have many jewels and much wealth, but I am not proud of them. However, let yourself win this stake.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. Thereupon Sakuni, well-skilled in dice, took up the dice and said to Yudhisthira, "Lo, I have won it!"

Thus ends the Sixtieth chapter, the commencement of the play, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXI.

(DYUTA PARVA)—continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. O Sakuni, you have won this stake by unfair means. Do you feel pride for it? Let us play, staking thousands and thousands.

2. O king, I have many beautiful jars, each filled with one thousand Nishikas (gold coins). I have in my treasury inexhaustible gold, and much silver and other minerals. This is the wealth with which I shall (now) stake with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. Having been thus addressed, Sakuni thus spoke to the perpetuator of the Kuru race, the eldest Pandava of undeteriorating glory, " Lo, I have won ?"

Yudhisthira said :—

4—6. This my sacred, victorious and royal car, which gladdens the heart and which brought us here, which is equal to one thousand cars, which is symmetrical in make and covered with tiger's skins, which is furnished with excellent wheels and flag-staff, which is beautiful and adorned with small bells, the clatter of the wheel of which is like the roars of clouds or the ocean and which is drawn by eight noble steeds renowned all over the kingdom,—(the steeds) that are white as the moon-beam and from whose hoofs no earthly being can escape,—this, O king, is my wealth with which I shall (now) stake with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Having heard this, and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice said to Yudhisthira, " Lo, I have won !"

Yudhisthira said :—

8. I have one hundred thousand serving girls, who are all young and all adorned with golden bracelets on their wrists and upper arms, who have Nishikas and other ornaments,

9—10. And also costly garlands round their necks, who are attired in rich garments and annointed with sandal paste, who are well-skilled in sixty four elegant arts, specially in dancing and singing, and who wait upon and serve at my command the celestials, the Snatakas and the kings. With this wealth, I shall (now) stake with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

11. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira, " Lo, I have won !"

Yudhisthira said :—

12. I have thousands of serving men, skilled in waiting upon guests, who are always attired in silken robes,

13. Who possess wisdom and intelligence, who are self-controlled, young, adorned with ear-rings and who feed all guests with plates and dishes in hand. With this wealth, O king, I shall (now) stake with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

14. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira, " Lo, I have won !"

Yudhisthira said :—

15. O son of Suvala, I have one thousand musty elephants with golden girdles, who are adorned with ornaments, who have the marks of the lotus on their temples, necks and other parts and who are adorned with golden garlands,

16—17. Who possess fine (white) tusks,—tusks like plough-shafts, who are worthy of carrying kings and capable of withstanding every kind of noise on the field of battle, who have huge bodies, who are capable of battering down the walls of the hostile cities, who are of the colour of newly formed clouds and each of whom possesses eight female elephants. With this wealth, O king, I shall (now) stake with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira, " Lo, I have won !"

Yudhisthira said :—

19. I have as many cars as elephants, all furnished with golden poles and flag-staffs, and also well-trained horses and car-warriors who fight wonderfully,

20. And each of whom receives one thousand coins as his monthly salary whether he fights or not. With this wealth, O king, I shall (now) stake with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

21. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira, " Lo, I have won ?"

Yudhisthira said :—

22—23. The steeds of the Tittiri, Kalmasha and Gandharva breeds, adorned with golden garlands, all of whom were gladly presented to the wielder of the Gandiva (Aryuna) by the chastiser of foes, Chitraratha, who was vanquished and subdued in battle ;—with this wealth, O king, I shall (now) stake with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

24. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira, " Lo, I have won !"

Yudhisthira said :—

25. I have ten thousand waggons and vehicles to which are yoked draught animals of the foremost breed.

26. I have soldiers picked up by thousands from each order who are all brave and who are endued with the prowess of (great) heroes,

27. And who drink milk and eat good rice. They are sixty thousands in number, and all of them possess broad chests. With this wealth, O king, I shall (now) stake with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

28. Having heard this and adopting unfair means Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira, "Lo, I have won!"

Yudhisthira said :—

29—30. I have four hundred Nidhis (very valuable jewels) encased in sheets of copper and iron; each one of them is equal to five Draunikas of the costliest and purest gold leaf of the Fatarupa kind. With this wealth, O king, I shall (now) stake with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

31. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira, "Lo, I have won!"

Thus ends the sixty first chapter, the gambling match, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. During the course of this fearful gambling, which was certain to bring about utter ruin, that dispeller of all doubts, Vidura, thus spoke (to Dhritarastra).

Vidura said :—

2. O great king, O descendant of Bharata, attend to what I say, although it may not be agreeable to you like medicine to one who is at the point of death.

3. When this sinful wretch Duryodhana, this destroyer of the Bharata race, cried like jackal immediately after his birth, it was well-known that he had been ordained to bring about the destruction of you all.

4. A jackal is living in your house in the form of Duryodhana. You do not know this out of folly. Listen to what Kavya (Sukra) said.

5. Those that collect honey, having received what they seek, do not (at all) mark that they are about to fall (down from the tree). Ascending dangerous heights and being deeply engaged in what they seek, they fall down and perish.

6. He (Duryodhana) too, maddened with the gambling, is absent-minded (in the pursuit of the play) like the collector of honey. He does not mark its (future) consequences. Creating hostilities with these great car-warriors, he does not see the fall (which is before him).

7. O greatly wise one, it is known to you, that amongst the Bhojas, (there is a custom) of abandoning a son, who is unworthy of their race, for (the sake of the general) good of the people.

8. The Andhakas, the Yadavas the Bhojas, uniting together, abandoned Kansa. At the request (of the whole tribe) Kansa was killed by that slayer of foes, Krishna.

9. Knowing this, they all became exceedingly happy for one hundred years. Let Sabyasachi (Aryuna) kill Suyodhana (Duryodhana) at your command.

10. Let the Kurus be glad and pass their time in happiness by the death of this wretch. O king, purchase these peacocks (Pandavas) at the exchange of this crow (Duryodhana); and buy these tigers, the Pandavas, at the exchange of this jackal (Duryodhana). Do not sink into the ocean of grief.

11. For the sake of a family a member (of that family) may be sacrificed; for the sake of a village, a family may be sacrificed; for the sake of a town, a village may be sacrificed; and for the sake of one's own soul, the earth may be sacrificed.

12. The omniscient, the knower of all creatures' thoughts, the terror to all foes, Kavya, thus spoke to the great Asuras (to induce them) to abandon Jamba (Asura).

13—14. It is said that a (certain) king, having (first) made some wild birds which used to vomit gold to take up their quarters in his own house, killed them afterwards from temptation. O chastiser of foes, blinded by temptation and by the desire of enjoyment he destroyed both his present and future for the sake of the gold. O king, O monarch, like that king, do not persecute the Pandavas from the desire of gain.

15—16. O descendant of Bharata, from (this) folly you will have to repent afterwards like the man who killed the birds.

Like the flower-seller who plucks (flowers) from trees that he cherishes with affection from day to day, continue, O king, to pluck flowers from the Pandavas. Do not burn them to their roots like the fire-producing wind which reduces every thing to charcoal. Do not go to the abode of Yama with your sons, ministers, and forces.

17. O descendant of Bharata, who is capable of fighting with the sons of Pritha if they stand together? O king, not to speak of others, even the chief of the celestials with all the celestials cannot do it.

Thus ends the sixty second chapter, the words of Vidura, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXIII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vidura said :—

1. Gambling is the root of dissensions. It brings about disunion. Its consequences are frightful. Taking recourse to it, Dhritarastra's son creates for himself fearful hostility.

2. The descendants of Pratipa and Santanu with the Valhikas and their fearful troops all will be destroyed for the fault of Duryodhana.

3. In consequence of this intoxication, Duryodhana forcibly drives away luck and prosperity from his kingdom like an infuriated bull who breaks his own horns.

4. O king, that brave and learned man, who follows another man's heart disregarding his own foresight, sinks into terrible affliction like the man who goes into the sea in a boat guided by a child.

5. Duryodhana is gambling with the Pandava (Yudhisthira), and you are in ecstasy of joy that he is winning. It is such success that begets war which (finally) ends in the destruction of men.

6. This fascination that you have well-devised will lead to fearful results. You have by these counsels brought on great affliction to your heart. This quarrel with Yudhisthira, who is so nearly related to you,—even if you have not foreseen it,—is still approved by you.

7. O descendant of Santanu, O descendant of Pratipa, listen in this assembly of the Kurus, to the words of wisdom. By following a wretch, do not enter into the terrible fire that has blazed forth.

8. When the Pandava, Ajatsatru (Yudhisthira), intoxicated with dice, will be angry, so will be Bhima, Aryuna and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), who (I say) will be your island (refuge) in that hour of confusion?

9. O great king, you are yourself a mine of wealth. You can earn as much wealth as you desire to earn by not taking recourse to gambling. What will you gain by winning the vast wealth of the Pandavas? Win the sons of Pritha, who will be more than all the wealth they have?

10. We all know the skill of the son of Suvala (Sakuni) in play. This mountain-king knows many nefarious methods of gambling. Let Sakuni go back to the place whence he has come. O descendant of Bharata, do not rage a war with the Pandavas.

Thus ends the sixty third chapter, the words of Vidura, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXIV.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Duryodhana said :—

1. O Khattwa, you are always boasting of the fame of our foes. You always deprecate the sons of Dhritarastra. O Vidura, we know whose friend you really are—You always disregard us as if we are children.

2. That man who wishes for the success of those that are dear to him and defeat of those that are not dear to him stands confessed. He is known by his praise and blame. Your tongue and mind betray your heart.

3. You are kept by us on our lap as a serpent. Like a cat you wish to injure him who cherishes you. The wise men have said that there is no sin greater than that of injuring one's supporter. O Khattwa, how is it that you do not fear sin?

4. O Khattwa, having vanquished our enemies we have gained great advantage. Do not use harsh words towards us. You are always willing to make friendship with the foes, and it is for this reason that you always hate us.

5. A man becomes a foe by speaking words that are unpardonable. In praising the enemy, the secrets of one's own party is never to be divulged. Therefore, O shameless man, why do you obstruct us in this way? You are speaking whatever comes to your mind.

6. O Vidura, do not disregard us ; we know your mind. Go,—learn sitting at the feet of the old. Save the reputation that you have won. Do not middle with other men's affairs.

7. O Vidura, do not disregard us. Imagining that you are our master, do not always tell us harsh words. O Vidura, we do not ask you (to say) what is for our good. O Khattwa, do not irritate those that have already suffered much (at your hand),

8. There is but one controller (of man's Destiny), and there is no second. He controls even (the Destiny of) the child which is in its mother's womb. I am controlled by Him. Like water that always flows in a downward course, I am acting in the way He is directing me.

9. He, who breaks his head against a stone-wall and he that feeds a serpent, is guided in those acts of his by his own reason. He who wants to control another by force becomes his enemy.

10. When advice is offered in a friendly spirit, the learned man does not (very much) mind it. O descendant of Bharata, he who sets fire to such a highly inflammable object as camphor, can not see its ashes, if he does not hasten to extinguish the fire.

11. One should not give shelter to one who is a friend of his enemy, or to one who is always jealous of his protector. O Vidura, therefore go away wherever you like. An unchaste wife, however well-treated, (always) forsakes her husband.

Vidura said :—

12. O king, tell us (impartially) like a witness what you think of the conduct of those who abandon men that give them such instruction (as I give you). The hearts of kings are unsteady. Granting protection first, they strike with clubs afterwards.

13. O prince, you regard yourself as mature in intellect. O wicked hearted man, you consider me a child. But consider him a child who, having first accepted one as a friend, afterwards finds fault with him.

14. Like an unchaste wife in the house of a well-born man, a wicked-minded man can never be brought to the path of rectitude. As a husband of sixty years' can never be agreeable to a young wife, so instruction is not agreeable to this chief of the Bharata race.

15. O king, if you hereafter wish to hear words that are agreeable to you as regards all good or bad acts, you should ask (for it to) women, idiots, cripples or all persons of such descriptions.

16. Many sinful men who speak agreeable words may be had in this world, but a man, who will speak words that are disagreeable though fit as regimen or a man who will hear such words, is very rare.

17. He is a king's true friend who, disregarding what is agreeable or disagreeable to his master, conducts himself virtuously and utters what may be disagreeable, but what may be required as regimen.

18. O great king, drink that which is drunk by the honest and shunned by the dishonest,—that (drink of) humility which is like a medicine that is bitter, pungent, burning, unintoxicating, disagreeable and revolting. Drinking it (humility), regain your sobriety.

19. I always wish prosperity and affluence to the son of Vichitravirya (Dhritarastra) and his sons. Happen what may to you, here I bow to you. Let the Brahmanas wish me well.

20. O descendant of Kuru, this is the moral I carefully inculcate, that the learned men should never enrage such adders as have venom in their eyes.

Thus ends the sixty fourth chapter, the sound counsel of Vidura, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXV.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Sakuni said :—

1. O Yudhisthira, you have lost much wealth of the Pandavas. O son of Kunti, if you have any other wealth which is not yet lost, tell us.

Yudhisthira said :—

2. O Sakuni, O son of Suvala, I know my wealth is untold. Why do you ask me of my wealth ?

3—4. You can bet (with me) tens of thousands, and millions, tens of millions and billions, hundreds of billions, and trillions, tens of trillions and hundreds of trillions, tens of quadrillions and hundreds of quadrillions and even more. O king, I will bet such wealth. With this wealth at stake I shall play with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

5. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice said to Yudhisthira, " Lo, I have won !"

Yudhisthira said :—

6. O son of Suvala, I have innumerable kine, horses, milch cows with calves, goats and sheep in the country extending from the Parnasha to the eastern bank of the Sindhu (river). With this wealth I shall (now) play with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira, "Lo, I have won!"

Yudhisthira said :—

8. O king, I have my city, the country, land, the wealth of houses thereon, except those belonging to the Brahmanas, and also all those persons, except Brahmanas living therein—the wealth which still belongs to me. With all this wealth, O king, I shall (now) play with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice; said to Yudhisthira; "Lo, I have won!"

Yudhisthira said :—

10. O king, these princes here, who look resplendent in their ornaments and their ear-rings, and Nishkas and the royal ornaments on their persons are still my wealth. With this wealth, O king, I shall (now) play with you.

Vaishampayana said :—

11. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira, "Lo, I have won?"

Yudhisthira said :—

12. This youthful, fair-coloured Nakula with mighty arms, with lion-like necks, and with red eyes is now one of my stakes.

Sakuni said :—

13. O king, O Yudhisthira, the prince Nakula is dear to you. (Know) he is already under our subjection (won by us). With what will you now play?

Vaishampayana said :—

14. Having said this, Sakuni cast the dice and thus spoke to Yudhisthira, "Lo, I have won!"

Yudhisthira said :—

15. This Sahadeva administers justice, he has acquired a reputation for learning in this world. Though this prince does not deserve to be staked in play, yet with such dear object as my stake, I shall play, as if he is not so.

Vaishampayana said :—

61. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira, "Lo, I have won."

Sakuni said :—

17. O king, the two sons of Madri are dear to you; but (know it for certain,) they have already) been won by me. It appears Bhimasena and Dhananjaya (Aryuna), are more loved by you (than these two).

Yudhisthira said :—

18. Fool, disregarding morality you sinfully act in thus trying to create disunion amongst us who are all of one heart.

Sakuni said :—

19. O king, one who is intoxicated falls into a pit and remains there, being deprived of his power of motion. O best of the Bharata race, you are senior to us in age and in everything, I bow to you.

20. O Yudhisthira, know, gamesters in the excitement of the play utter such raving as they would never do in their waking moments or in their dreams.

Yudhisthira said :—

21. He who takes us like a boat to the other shore of the sea of battle, who is ever victorious over foes, who is endued with great activity and who is the only one hero in this world (is Aryuna). With that Falguni as stake, O Sakuni, though he does not deserve it, I shall (now) play.

Vaishampayana said :—

22. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice; said to Yudhisthira, "Lo, I have won?"

Sakuni said :—

23. This foremost of all wielders of bows, this Pandava Sabyashachi (Aryuna) has been won by me. O king, O Pandava, play now with (staking) your beloved Bhima, the only wealth that is now left to you.

Yudhisthira said :—

24—25. Though he does not deserve to be made a stake, I shall now play with staking Bhimasena, the prince who is our leader, who is foremost in fight like the wielder of thunder (Indra), the enemy of the Danavas, who is the illustrious hero with lion-like neck, arched eye-brows and expansive eyes, who is incapable of putting up with an insult, who is matchless in proWess in all the world, who is the foremost of all wielders of clubs and who grinds all foes.

Vaishampayana said:—

26. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, ever ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira; "Lo I have won?"

Sakuni said:—

27. O son of Kunti, you have lost much wealth, horses and elephants with your brothers. Tell us if you have anything else which you have not as yet lost.

Yudhisthira said:—

28. I alone, the eldest of my brothers and beloved of all of them, am still not won (by you). If won by you, I shall do that which one who is won is bound to do.

Vaishampayana said:—

29. Having heard this and adopting unfair means, Sakuni, even ready with the dice, said to Yudhisthira; "Lo I have won!"

Sakuni said:—

30. O king, you have allowed yourself to be won,—an act which is worthy of a sinful man. When there is still wealth belonging to you, it is sinful to lose one's own self.

Vaishampayana said:—

31. Having said this, (Sakuni), well-skilled in dice, spoke to all the brave kings present there of having won all the Pandavas one after the other.

Sakuni said:—

32. O king, there is still one stake dear to you which is not yet won. Bet Krishna, (Draupadi), the princess of Panchala. By her, win yourself back.

Yudhisthira said:—

33. I shall (now) play with you staking her who is neither short nor tall, neither lean nor corpulent, who possesses blue curly hair,

34. And eyes are like the leaves of the autumn lotus, and fragrance like that of the lily, who is like Sree herself in symmetry and grace,

35. Who is such that for her softness of heart, wealth of beauty and virtue, one may desire her for a wife.

36. Who possesses every accomplishment, who is compassionate and sweet-speeched, who is such that for the acquisition of Dharma, Artha and Kama one may desire her for his wife.

37. Who, retiring to bed last and rising from bed first, looks after the comforts of the cowherds and shepherds,

38. Whose face when covered with sweat looks like the lotus or the jessamine, whose waist is like that of the wasp, who possesses flowing hair, red lips and body without down;

39. O king, O son of Suvala, making that princess of Panchala, the slender-waisted Draupadi, as my stake, I shall (now) play with you.

Vaishampayana said:—

40. When this was said by the wise Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira)—"Fie! Fie!" were the words uttered by all the elders that were present in the assembly.

41. O king, the whole assembly was agitated. The kings began to grieve. Bhishma, Drona and Kripa were covered with perspiration.

42. Vidura, holding his head between his hands, sat like one who has lost his reason. He sat with down cast face giving away to his own thoughts and sighing like a snake.

43. (But) Dhritarastra, being glad at heart, could not conceal his emotions and, asked again and again, "Is the stake won?" "Is the stake won?"

44. Karna with Dushashana and others laughed aloud, but tears began to flow from the eyes of all those that were present in the assembly.

45. The son of Suvala (Sakuni), proud of success, and flurried with excitement, repeating "You have still one stake dear to you &c." said, "Lo, I have won!" He then took up the dice that had been cast.

Thus ends the sixty fifth chapter, the losing of Draupadi, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXVI.

(DYUTA PARVA) Continued.

Duryodhana said:—

1. Come, Khattwa, bring here Draupadi, the dear and the beloved wife of the Pandavas. Let her be forced to sweep the chambers, and let the unfortunate woman remain where our serving women are.

Vidura said:—

2. O wicked man, do you not know that by uttering such words you are tying yourself with cords? Do you not feel that you are standing on the edge of a precipice? Do you not know that being but a deer you are provoking to anger so many tigers?

3. O greatly wicked-minded man, deadly venomous and angry snakes are on your head. Do not provoke them any further and go to the land of Yama.

4. In my opinion the slavery cannot attach to Krishna (Draupadi), as she was staked by the king (Yudhisthira) after he lost himself and ceased to be his own master.

5. Like bamboo which bears fruits when it is about to die, this king, this son of Dhritarastra, wins this treasure at play. Intoxicated (in play), he does not perceive in his these last moments what enmity and frightful terrors the dice bring in.

6. No man should utter harsh words, and thus pierce the heart of others. No man should subjugate his enemies by dice and by such other foul means. No one should utter such words,—as give pain and lead men to hell and annoys others.

7. One man utters from his lips words that are harsh. Stung by them the other burns day and night. Those words pierce the very heart of another. Therefore, the learned men should never utter such (harsh) words towards others.

8. Once at a time a goat swallowed a hook, and when it was pierced with it, the hunter placed its head on the ground and frightfully tore its throat in drawing it out. Like it do not create a terrible enmity with the Pandavas.

9. The sons of Pritha never use such words. It is only low men who are like dogs that use harsh words towards all classes of people,—namely towards those that live in the forest, those that lead domestic life, those that are employed in asceticism, and those that are greatly learned.

10. The son of Dhritarastra does not know that dishonesty is one of the fearful doors of hell. Many Kurus with Dushashana amongst them have followed him in the path of dishonesty in this play at dice.

11. Even gourds may sink and stone may float and boats may always sink in water, but still this foolish king (Duryodhana) the son of Dhritarastra, will not listen to my words which are like regimen to him.

12. He will certainly be the cause of the destruction of the Kurus. When the words of wisdom spoken by friends,—words that are like the proper regimen,—are not listened to,—when temptation is on the increase,—a fearful and universal destruction is sure to overtake all the Kurus,

Thus ends the sixty sixth chapter, the words of Vidura, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXVII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

Intoxicated with pride, the son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana) spoke "Fie on Khattwa." Casting his eye on the Pratikamin, he spoke thus in the Sabha and in the midst of (all) the revered elders.

Duryodhana said:—

2. Go, Pratikamin and bring Draupadi here. You have no fear from the Pandavas. It is only Khattwa (Vidura) who raves in fear. He never wishes for our prosperity.

Vaishampayana said:—

3. Having been thus commanded and having heard the words of the king, the Pratikamin, the man of the Suta caste, went with (great haste). As a dog enters a lion's den, he (entered the house) and came to the queen of the Pandavas.

Pratikamin said:—

4. O Draupadi, Yudhisthira having been intoxicated with dice you have been won by Duryodhana. Therefore, O Jagmaseni, come now to the house of Dhritarastra. I shall take you (with me) and put you to some menial work.

Duryodhana said:—

5. O Pratikamin, why do you say so? Is there any prince who plays staking his (own) wife? The king was certainly intoxicated with dice, or else could he not find any other object to stake?

Pratikamin said:—

6. When he had nothing else to stake, it was then that Ajatasatru (Yudhisthira), the son of Pandu, staked you. The king had first staked his brothers, then himself, and then, O princess, he staked you.

Draupadi said:—

7. O son of Suta, go (back) to the Sabha and ask that gambler (Yudhisthira) whom he has lost first,—himself or me.

8. Ascertaining this, O son of Suta, come here and then take me with you. Knowing the desire of the king (Yudhisthira), I shall go with a sorrowful heart.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. Having returned to the Sabha, he (Pratikamin) told all present there the words of Draupadi. He spoke these words to Yudhisthira sitting in the midst of the kings.

Pratikamin said :—

10. Draupadi has asked you, "Whose lord were you at the time when you lost me in play? Did you lose yourself first or me?"

Vaishampayana said :—

11. Yudhisthira sat like one demented and deprived of reason. He did not give any reply to the Suta, good or ill.

Duryodhana said :—

12. Let the princess of Panchala come here and put her question. Let every one here in this Sabha hear the words that pass between them (her and Yudhisthira).

Vaishampayana said :—

13. Going back to the palace, himself much distressed, the Suta, Pratikamin obedient to the command of Duryodhana, spoke thus to Draupadi.

Pratikamin said :—

14. O princess, those that are in the assembly are summoning you. It seems the destruction of the Kurus is near at hand. O princess, when the weak-brained (Duryodhana) is for taking you before the assembly, he will no longer be able to protect his prosperity.

Draupadi said :—

15. The great ordainer of the world has ordained this. Happiness and misery come to both the old and the young (the wise and the unwise.) Dharma has been said to be the highest object in the world. If cherished, it certainly pours blessings on us.

16. Let not Dharma now abandon the Kurus. Going back to the Sabha, speak these my words conformable to virtue and morality. I am ready to do what those virtuous-minded elders conversant with the precepts of morality, definitely tell me (to do).

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Having heard these words of Jagmaseni (Draupadi), the Suta returned to the Sabha and repeated her words. But all sat with downcast faces, knowing the eagerness and resolution of the son of Dhritarashtra (Duryodhana)

18. O best of the Bharata race, having heard of the intentions of Duryodhana, Yudhisthira sent a trusted messenger to Draupadi,

19. (Saying) "Panchali should appear before her father-in-law by coming to the Sabha,—though she is weeping and attired in one piece of cloth with her naval exposed in consequence of her season having come."

20. O king, having gone to Krishna's (Draupadi's) house in great speed, the intelligent (messenger) informed her of the intentions of Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira).

21. The illustrious Pandavas, distressed and sorrowful and bound by promise, could not settle what they should do.

22. Looking at their countenance, the king Duryodhana with cheerful heart thus addressed the Suta, "O Pratikamin, bring her here. Let the Kurus give their answer before her presence."

23. Thereupon the Suta, ever obedient to his command, and at the same time afraid of the anger of Draupadi's daughter, giving up his pride, again spoke thus in the assembly, "What shall I say to Krishna (Draupadi)?"

Duryodhana said :—

24. O Dushashana, this foolish son of Suta is afraid of Vrikodara (Bhima). Go you yourself and forcibly bring Jagmaseni (Draupadi) here. Our enemies are now dependant on our will. What can they do?

Vaishampayana said :—

25. Having heard the command of his brother, that prince (Dushashana) rose with blood red eyes. Entering the house of those great car-warriors (the Pandavas), he thus spoke to the princess, Draupadi.

Dushashana said :—

26. O Panchali, O Krishna, come, you have been won by us. Behold Duryodhana (now) casting aside your modesty. O lady of eyes like the wide lotus leaves, accept the Kurus as your lords. You have been virtuously won by us, therefore come to the Sabha.

Vaishampayana said :—

27. Thereupon she, being (much) distressed, rose up in great affliction, and covering her pale face with her hands, ran to the place where were the ladies of the old king, the foremost of the Kurus (Dhritarashtra.)

28. Thereupon Dushashana, roaring in anger, ran after her and seized the queen

(Draupadi) by her long, blue and wavy hair.

29. The hair that was (once) sprinkled with the water sanctified with Mantras in the great Rajshuya sacrifice were now forcibly siezed by the son of Dhritarastra who disregarded the prowess of the Pandavas.

30. Dragging the greatly long-haired Krishna (Draupadi) as if she was protectorless, although she had great protectors, Dushashana brought her into the Sabha trembling like the banian tree in a storm.

31. Having been thus dragged by him, she bent her body down and spoke in a low voice "O wretch, O rude one, you should not take me before the assembly. I am in my season. I am attired only in one cloth."

32. While she was piteously praying to Krishna and Jishnu (Aryuna) who were Hari (Narayana) and Nara (on earth,) he (Dushashana) dragged her forcibly by her black hair.

Dushashana said :—

33. O Jagmaseni, whether you are in your season, whether you are attired in one cloth, or whether you are naked, when you have been won (by us) at dice and made our slave, you are to live amongst our serving-women as you best can.

Vaishampayana said :—

34. With dishevelled hair and her attire half loosened on account of the cruel dragging of Dushashana, the modest Krishna (Draupadi), being consumed as it were by anger, thus spoke in a low voice.

Draupadi said.

35. All these persons in this assembly are men learned in all the Shastras, all devoted to the performances of sacrifices and other rites and all equal to Indra (in prowess). Some of them are my Gurus (superiors) and some who stand to me as such. I cannot stay before them in this state.

36. O Wretch, O man of cruel deeds, do not make me uncovered. Do not drag me in this way. The princes (the Pandavas) will not pardon you, even if the celestials with Indra become your allies.

37. The high-souled son of Dharma (Yudhisthira) is (now) bound by the obligation of the rules of morality. The ways of Dharma is subtle. Those only can ascertain them who possess great clearness of vision. Forgetting his virtue, I am unwilling to admit even an atom of fault in my husband (Yudhisthira.)

38. It is a most unworthy act that you are dragging me before these Kuru heroes, though I am in my season. But none rebukes you here ;—they are certainly of the same mind with you.

39. O Pie ! When all the Kurus in this assembly look silently on this act which transgresses the shore of the Kuru morality ; the morality of the Bharatas have certainly been destroyed and the usage of those coversant with the Kshatrya practices have surely disappeared.

40. Drona and Bhisma, Khattwa and also the king (Dhritarastra) have lost their greatness, else why do these best of the Kuru elders look silently on this great crime.

Vaishampayana said :—

41. The slender-waisted (Draupadi) thus cried in distress in that Sabha and cast a glance on her enraged husbands, the Pandavas, who were filled with fearful wrath. She inflamed them more by her that glance.

42. They were not so much pained at the robbing of their kingdom, their wealth, and their costly gems, as they were by that glance of Krishna (Draupadi), full of modesty and anger.

43. Seeing Krishna (Draupadi) looking at her helpless husbands, Dushashana dragged her more forcibly and repeatedly called her " slave " " slave," and he laughed aloud.

44. At these words, Karna became very glad and approved them by laughing aloud. The Gandhara king, the son of Suvala (Sakuni), similarly applauded Dushashana.

45. Amongst all those that were present in the assembly, except these three and the son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana), every one was filled with great sorrow on seeing Krishna (Draupadi) thus dragged in the Sabha.

Bhisma said —

46. O blessed lady, knowing that one who has no wealth of his own cannot stake the wealth belonging to others and (knowing also) that wives are always at the command and disposals of their husbands, I am unable to decide properly the point put forward by you. The ways of morality is subtle.

47. Yudhisthira can abandon the whole world full of wealth, but he will never sacrifice morality. The Pandava (Yudhisthira) himself has said, " I am won ". Therefore, I am unable to decide this matter.

48. Sakuni is matchless in dice. The son of Kunti has still willfully staked with him. The illustrious (Yudhisthira) does not consider that Sakuni played with him deceitfully. Therefore, I am unable to decide this matter.

Draupadi said:—

49. The king (Yudhisthira) was summoned to this assembly, and though he does not possess any skill in dice, yet he was made to play with skillful, wicked, deceitful and desperate gamblers. How then can he be said to have staked voluntarily?

50. The chief of the Kurus and the Pandavas was deprived of his senses by the wretches of deceitful conduct and unholy instincts acting in concert. He could not understand their tricks though vanquished, but he has now understood all.

51. Here in this assembly are present the Kurus who are the lords of their sons and daughters-in-law. Let all of them, after duly reflecting on my words, properly answer me the question I have asked.

Vaishampayana said:—

52. Dushashana spoke many disagreeable and harsh words to Krishna (Draupadi) who was thus piteously weeping and bewailing and casting glances on her helpless husbands.

53. Seeing her who was in her season thus dragged and her upper garments loosened,—seeing her in that condition which she did not deserve,—Vrikodara (Bhima), afflicted beyond endurance, cast his eyes on Yudhisthira and gave vent to his anger.

Thus ends the sixty seventh chapter, Draupadi's question, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhima said:—

1. O Yudhisthira, the gamblers have in their house many loose women. They do not play staking even those women. They have kindness even towards them.

2—3. Whatever wealth and other excellent articles which the king of Kashi gave, and the gems and jewels, animals, wealth, armours, and weapons which the other kings presented,—nay even our kingdom, yourself and ourselves,—have all been won by our enemies at play.

4. Even at all this, my anger was not excited, for you are our lord. But I consider it a highly improper act,—this your staking Draupadi.

5. Having obtained the Pandavas as her husband, this innocent girl does not deserve this (treatment). It is only for you that she is persecuted by these low, despicable, cruel and mean-minded Kurus.

6. O king, it is for her sake that my anger falls on you. I shall burn your hands. Sahadeva, bring some fire?

Aryuna said:—

7. O Bhimasena, you have never before uttered such words as these. Your high morality has certainly been destroyed by these cruel foes.

8. You should not fulfil the wishes of the enemy. Practise the highest morality. Should any body transgress his virtuous eldest brother?

9. Having been summoned by the Kurus and having remembered the Kshatrya Dharma (usage), the king played at dice against his will. This is certainly conducive to one's great fame.

Bhima said:—

10. O Dhananjaya, if I had not known what the king did, he did according to the Kshatrya usage, I would have long ago snatched his arms by force and burnt them in a blazing fire.

Vaishampayana said:—

11. Seeing the Pandavas thus distressed and the Panchala princess thus afflicted, the son of Dhritarastra, Vikarna, thus spoke.

Vikarna said:—

12. O kings, answer the question that has been asked by Jagmaseni (Draupadi). If we do not decide a matter referred to us, we shall certainly have to go to hell without delay.

13. Bhisma and Dhritarastra,—the two eldest of the Kurus,—and the high-souled Vidura, uniting together, do not say any thing.

14. The son of Bharadwaja (Drona), the preceptor of all of us and also Kripa,—why these best of Brahmanas do not answer her question?

15. Let the kings that have assembled here from all directions, leaving aside all motives of anger and desire, speak out according to their judgment.

16. O kings, answer the question asked by Draupadi and say after due reflection on which side each of you is.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Thus did he (Vikarna) repeatedly appeal to those that were present in the assembly to answer Draupadi's question. But the kings present did not say a word good or ill.

18. Repeatedly appealing to the kings, rubbing his palms and sighing like a snake, Vikarna thus (again) spoke.

Vikarna said :—

19. O kings, O Kurus, whether you answer this question or not, I shall say what I consider just and proper.

20. O best of men, it has been said that hunting, drinking, gambling, and enjoying women are the four vices of the kings.

21. The man who is addicted to these vices lives by forsaking virtue. People do not consider the acts done by a person who is thus improperly engaged as of any authority.

22. This son of Pandu (Yudhisthira), while madly engaged in one of these vicious acts (namely gambling) and urged thereto by deceitful gamblers, staked Draupadi.

23. The faultless Draupadi is the common wife of all the sons of Pandu. Having first lost himself, the Pandava (Yudhisthira) offered her as a stake.

24. The son of Suvala (Sakuni), himself being desirous of a stake, prevailed upon the king to stake Krishna (Draupadi). Considering all these circumstances, I consider Draupadi as not won.

Vaishampayana said :—

25. Hearing these words, a loud uproar rose from those present in the assembly. They all applauded Vikarna and censured the son of Suvala (Sakuni).

26. The son of Radha (Karna) became out of sense from anger. Waving his well-shaped arms he spoke thus.

Karna said :—

27. O Vikarna, I observe many opposite and inconsistent conditions in this assembly. As the fire, produced from a faggot, consumes the faggot itself, so you will be consumed by your this anger.

28. These (great) personages (present) here, though (repeatedly) urged by Krishna (Draupadi), have not uttered a single word. They all consider that the daughter of Drupada has been righteously won.

29. O son of Dhritarastra, you alone for your boyish age are bursting into rage. Though you are but a boy, you speak as if you are an old man.

30. O younger brother of Duryodhana, you know not what really the rules of morality are. You say like a fool that this Krishna (Draupadi), who has been won, as not won (at all).

31. O son of Dhritarastra, how do you consider that Krishna (Draupadi) is not won, when the eldest of the Pandavas have staked all his possessions in this assembly?

32. O best of the Bharata race, Draupadi is (surely) included in his possessions. Why do you consider that Krishna (Draupadi) who has been righteously won as not won?

33. Draupadi was mentioned (by Sakuni) in conversation, and she was approved of as a stake by the Pandava,—why is it (then) your opinion that she is not won?

34. If you consider it wrong to bring her in the Sabha attired in only one piece of cloth, listen to the excellent words I say.

35. O descendant of Kuru, it has been ordained by the gods that a woman should have only one husband; she (Draupadi) has (however) many husbands; therefore it is certain that she is an unchaste woman.

36. In my opinion there is nothing surprising if she is brought before the assembly in one cloth or if she be made naked.

37. Whatever wealth the Pandavas had,—including her and also the Pandavas themselves,—have been righteously won by the son of Suvala (Sakuni).

38. O Dushashana, this Vikarna, speaking words of wisdom, is but a boy. Take off the robes of the Pandavas and also that of Draupadi.

Vaishampayana said :—

39. O descendant of Bharata, having heard this, the Pandavas took off their upper garments; and throwing them down, they sat (silently) in the Sabha.

40. O king, thereupon Dushashana, in the sight of all (present) in the assembly, began to drag forcibly the cloth of Draupadi.

41. When the cloth of Draupadi was being thus dragged,—she thought of Hari.

Draupadi said :—

O Govinda, O dweller of Dwarika, O Krishna, O favourite of the milk-maids,

42. O Keshava, do you not see that I am persecuted by the Kurus. O lord, O husband of Lakshmi, O lord of Braja, O destroyer of all affliction, O Janardana, save me who am sinking in the Kuru ocean!

43. O Krishna, O great Yogee, O soul of the universe, O creator of the world, O

Govinda, save me who am distressed, who am losing her senses in the midst of the Kurus!

Vaishampayana said:—

44. O king, thus being afflicted, the lady, covering her face, cried aloud thinking of Krishna (Hari), the lord of the three worlds.

45. Hearing the words of Jagmaseni (Draupadi), Krishna was deeply moved. Leaving his seat, the kind Deity from compassion came there on foot.

46. When Jagmaseni (Draupadi) was crying for protection to Krishna, Vishnu and Hari and also Nara, the illustrious (Deity) Dharma, remaining unseen, covered her with many excellent cloths.

47. O king, as the cloth of Draupadi was being dragged, after one was taken off, another of the same kind appeared and covered her.

48. O lord, in consequence of the protection (extended towards Draupadi) by Dharma, hundreds and hundreds of cloths of many colour appeared.

49. Thereupon there rose a great uproar. All the kings (present there), seeing this most extraordinary sight in the world, applauded Draupadi and censured the son of Dhritarastra.

50. Thereupon Bhima, squeezing his palms, and his lips quivering in anger, took a terrible oath in a loud voice in the midst of the kings.

Bhima said:—

51. O Kshatriyas, O men of the world, listen to my these words,—words never before uttered by any man or will be (ever) uttered by any man in future.

52—53. O lords of earth, if having spoken these words, I do not accomplish them hereafter, and if I do not forcibly tearing open the breast of this sinful wretch, this wicked-minded scoundrel of the Bharata race, drink his life-blood in the field of battle, let me not obtain the path of my ancestors.

Vaishampayana said:—

54. Hearing his these terrible and hair-stirring words, every one present there applauded him and censured the son of Dhritarastra.

55. When a mass of cloths were heaped in the assembly, Dushashana, becoming fatigued and ashamed, sat down.

56. Seeing the sons of Kunti in that state, all those gods among men who were present there cried hair-stirring words of "Fie!" "Fie!" (on the son of Dhritarastra).

57. All the good men who were present there exclaimed, "Alas, the Kurus do not answer the question asked to them." They all censured Dhritarastra.

58. Thereupon Vidura, learned in all the precepts of religion, waving his hands and silencing every one in the assembly, spoke these words.

Vidura said:—

59. O men present in the assembly! Draupadi, having put her question, is piteously weeping. You do not answer her question. Dharma is here persecuted.

60. A person in distress comes to an assembly of good men like a man in a blazing fire. Those that are in the assembly extinguish that fire and cool him by means of truth and morality.

61. The person in distress asks the assembly about his rights as sanctioned by morality. Those that are in the assembly should answer his question without being unmoved by anger or desire.

62. O kings, Vikarna has answered the question according to his knowledge and judgment. You should also answer it as you think proper.

63. The man who knows the rules of morality and sits in an assembly, incurs half the demerit that attaches to a lie, if he does not answer a question put to him.

64. The man who knows the rules of morality and sits in an assembly, certainly incurs the sin of lie, if he answers falsely a question put to him.

65. The learned men quote as an example in connection with this matter the old history of Prahlada and the son of Angirasha.

66. There was a chief of the Daityas named Prahlada, whose son was Virochana. He (Virochana) quarrelled with Sudhanna, the son of Angirasha, for the sake of a bride.

67. We have heard that they wagered even their own lives, saying "I am superior," "I am superior," for the sake of obtaining a bride.

68. When they thus quarrelled with each other, they both asked Prahlada, saying, "Who amongst us is superior? Answer this question,—do not speak falsely,"

69. He (Prahlada), being alarmed at their quarrel, looked at Sudhanna. (Thereupon) Sudhanna thus spoke to him burning in rage as the Brahmadanda (club of Brahma).

70. "O Prahlada, if you answer falsely, or do not answer at all, your head will then be spilt into a hundred pieces by the wielder of thunder (Indra) with his thunder."

71. When Sudhanna thus spoke, the Daitya (Prahlada) trembling like a leaf of the fig tree went to the greatly effulgent Kashyapa, to consult with him.

Prahlada said :—

72. O exalted one, you are learned in the precepts of morality which should guide the celestials, the Asuras and the Brahmanas. Here is a great dilemma in respect of a duty. Hear it.

73. Tell me, I ask you, what regions are obtained by men who, being asked a question, does not give answer to it or answer it falsely.

Kashyapa said :—

74. He, who knows but answers not a question from temptation, anger or fear, brings upon himself one thousand Pashas (a sort of weapons) of Varuna upon his person.

75. A man, who is cited as a witness with respect to any matter of ocular or auricular knowledge, speaks falsely, brings upon him one thousand Pashas of Varuna.

76. On the completion of one full year, one such Pasha is loosened (from his body). Therefore, he, who knows, should speak the truth without concealment.

77. If virtue, pierced with sin, goes to an assembly, it is the duty of every man in that assembly to take off the dart. If they fail to do it, they themselves are pierced with it.

78. In an assembly where a truly censurable act is not rebuked, half the demerit of that act attaches to the head of that assembly, fourth to the person who acts censurably, and fourth to all men present there.

79. On the other hand, in an assembly in which he that deserves censure is rebuked, the head of that assembly becomes freed from all sins, and others that are present there incurs none. It is only the perpetrator of the (sinful) act, who becomes responsible for it.

80. O Prahlada, those who, being asked about morality, answer falsely, destroy the meritorious acts of their ancestors seven generations upwards and downwards.

81—83. The grief of one who has lost all his wealth, of one who has lost a son, of one who is in debt, of one who is separated from his companions, of a woman who has lost her husband, of one who has lost all in consequence of the king's demand, of a woman who is sterile, of one who is being devoured by a tiger, of one who is a co-wife, and of one who has been deprived of his property by false witnesses, is said by the celestials to be uniform in degree.

84. He who speaks false gets all these sorts of grief. A man becomes a witness in consequence of his having seen, heard and understood a thing.

85. Therefore a witness should always tell the truth. A witness who tells the truth never loses his religious merits and earthly possessions.

Vidura said :—

86. Having heard the words of Kashyapa, Prahlada thus spoke to his son.

Prahlada said :—

87. Sudhanna is superior to you as Angirasha (his father) is to me. The mother of Sudhanna is superior to your mother. Therefore, O Virochana, Sudhanna is now the lord of your life.

Sudhanna said :—

88. As without being moved by affection for your son you have adhered to virtue, I command that your this son will live for one hundred years.

Vidura said :—

89. Hearing these great truths of Dharma, let all persons present in this Subha reflect upon what should be the answer to the question asked by Krishna (Draupadi).

Vaishampayana said :—

90. Even hearing the words of Vidura, the kings did not answer a word. Karna said to Dushashana, "Take away the servant-woman Krishna in the inner apartment."

91. Thereupon Dushashana began to drag in the assembly the helpless, modest and ascetic Draupadi who was trembling and weeping petiously to the Pandavas.

Thus ends the sixty eighth chapter, the dragging of Draupadi, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXIX.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Draupadi said :—

1. I have a duty to perform. I have not as yet performed that great work. Forcibly dragged by this strong man (Dushashana), I am deprived of my senses.

2. I salute all my superiors in this assembly of the Kurus. It is not my fault if I have not done it before.

Vaishampayana said :—

3. Dragged with greater force the afflicted and ascetic lady (Draupadi) who did not deserve such treatment, fell on the ground and wept in the assembly.

Draupadi said :—

4. I was once seen on the occasion of my Saimvara by the assembled kings in the arena. I was never before seen (by them) any where else. I am to-day been brought before the assembly.

5. She, who is never before seen by even the wind and the sun in her house, is seen to-day in the assembly and is exposed before all men.

6. We have never heard before that a wedded wife is brought before an assembly. That old and eternal rule is to-day destroyed by the Kurus.

7. She, whom the Pandavas did not suffer to be touched (even) by the wind before, is to-day suffered by them to be persecuted by the wicked-men.

8. It appears the time has become out of joint, when the Kurus suffer their daughter and daughter-in-law, who is so unworthy of such treatment, to be thus persecuted.

9. What could be more distressing to me than that though I am high-born and chaste, yet I should be brought into the assembly. Where is the Dharma of these kings ?

10. How is it that the chaste wife of the Pandavas, the sister of the son of Prasita, the friend of Vasudeva (Krishna), is brought before the assembly of the kings ?

11. O Kauravas, I am the wife of Dharmaraja (Yudhishthira), born in the same order to which the king belongs. Tell me whether I am a servant-woman or not. I shall cheerfully do what you would say.

12. O Kurus, this low man, this destroyer of the Kuru fame, is cruelly persecuting me. I cannot bear it any longer.

13. O kings, O Kurus, I desire you to answer whether you consider me as won or unwon. I shall do what you would say.

Bhisma said —

14. O blessed lady, I have said the course of Dharma is subtle. Even the illustrious wise men cannot understand it in the world.

15. What a powerful man says morality in the world is regarded as such by others, however otherwise it may really be. What a weak man says, however morality it may be, is not regarded as such.

16. From the importance of the issue involved, from its intricacy and subtlety, I am unable to answer with certainty the question you have asked.

17. It is certain that as all the Kurus have become the slaves of covetousness and folly, the destruction of this our race will happen on no distant date.

18. O blessed one, the family into which you have been admitted as a daughter-in-law is such that there are men and women born in it, however they might be afflicted by calamities, they never deviate from the path of virtue.

19. O Panchali, your this conduct,—namely though persecuted, you still cast your eyes on Dharma,—is certainly worthy of you.

20. These men of mature years, learned in the precepts of morality, (namely) Drona and others, sit with down-cast heads like men who are dead and whose lives have departed from their bodies.

21. My opinion is that Yudhishthira himself is an authority in this question. He should say whether you are won or not won.

Thus ends the sixty ninth chapter, the words of Bhisma, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXX.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Though the kings present there saw the lady (Draupadi) crying piteously in affliction like a female osprey, yet they, out of the fear for the son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana), did not utter a word good or evil.

2. Seeing the sons and grandsons of kings sitting silent, the son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana) smiled and spoke thus to the daughter of the Panchala king.

Duryodhana said :—

3. O Jagmaseni, the question you have asked depends on the greatly powerful Bhima, on Aryuna, on Nakula and on Sahadeva. Let them answer your question.

4. O Panchali, let them for your sake declare in the midst of these most noble men (present here) that Yudhishthira is not their lord and that he is a liar ; you will then be freed from the slavery.

5. Let the illustrious son of Dharma (Yudhisthira), ever devoted to virtue, who is like Indra himself,—declare whether he is or is not your lord. At his words, accept us or accept the Pandavas without (further) delay.

6. All the Kurus present in this assembly are floating in the sea of your affliction. They are endued with magnanimity and looking at your husbands they are unable to answer your question.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Hearing these words of the Kuru king (Duryodhana), all persons present in the assembly loudly applauded him. Some shouting approvingly made signs to one another by motions of their eyes and lips and some made sounds of distress such as "Oh," "Alas."

8. Hearing his these delightful words, the Kurus present in the assembly became exceedingly glad. All the kings, becoming much pleased, applauded the virtuous chief of the Kurus.

9. All the kings, turning their faces sideways, looked at Yudhisthira, learned in the precepts of morality, and they all became curious to learn what he would say,

10. And they became curious to learn also what the invincible Pandavas, Vivatsa (Aryuna), Bhimasena and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) would say.

11. When the noise was silenced, Bhimaseua, waving his strong and well-armed arms smeared with sandal paste, thus spoke (in the assembly).

Bhima said :—

12. If our this Guru (superior), this high-souled Dharmaraja, were not our lord, we would not have pardoned this (Kuru) race.

13. He is the lord of our all religious and ascetic merits,—he is the lord even of our lives. If he considers himself won,—then we are all won.

14. If it were not so, who is there amongst creatures that touch the earth with his feet or amongst the mortals that would escape from me with life after having touched the hair of the Panchala princess ?

15. Look at my powerful and well-formed arms-like two iron clubs,—if once within them, even Satakratu (Indra) cannot escape.

16. Bound by the ties of virtue, for the reverence that is due to our elder brother and repeatedly urged by Aryuna to remain silent, I am doing nothing awful.

17. If I am once commanded by Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), I would, by making my slaps do the work of swords, kill these sinful sons of Dhritarastra as a lion kills a number of small animals.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. Thereupon Bhisma, Drona, and Vidura spoke thus to Bhima, "Forbear, everything is possible in you."

Thus ends the seventieth chapter, the words of Bhima, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXXI.

Karna said :—

1. Of all the persons in this assembly, Bhisma, Khattwa (Vidura) and the preceptor of the Kurus (Drona) appear to be independent (men), for they always speak of their master as wicked,—they always censure him and never wish for his prosperity.

2. The slave, the son, and the wife,—(these three) are always dependent. They can have no wealth, for whatever they possess belong to their master. You are (now) the wife of a slave incapable of possessing anything of her own.

3. Go to the inner apartments of the king and serve his relatives. This is the work that is now justly assigned to you. O princess, the sons of Dhritarastra, and not the sons of Pritha (the Pandavas), are now your masters.

4. O beautiful lady, select now another husband who will not make you a slave by gambling. It is well-known that it is not censurable in a slave to proceed with freedom in selecting her husband.

5. O Jagmaseni, Nakula, Bhimasena, Yudhisthira, Sahadeva and Aryuna are all won (by us). You are (also) now a slave. Your husbands who are slaves cannot be now your masters.

6. Did not the son of Pritha (Yudhisthira) consider life as useless,—did he not care for prowess and manhood, that he offered the daughter of Drupada, the Panchala king, as a stake at dice in the presence of all this assembly.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Hearing these words, the wrathful Bhima breathed hard ;—he became a very picture of woe. But obedient to the king (Yudhisthira) and bound by the ties of virtue and duty. (he still did nothing awful). But as if burning every thing with his eyes inflamed with anger, he thus spoke.

Bhima said :—

8. I cannot be angry at these words of the Suta's son (Karna), for we have really entered the state of slavery. O ruler of men, if you have not played staking this princess, could our enemies ever dare to speak thus to me ?

Vaishampayana said :—

9. Hearing these words of Bhimasena, king Duryodhana thus addressed Yudhisthira who was sitting silent as one who is deprived of his senses.

10. "O king, Bhima, Aryuna, and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) are ever under your sway. Answer this question. Say whether you regard Krishna as won".

11—12. Having spoken thus to the son of Kunti, Duryodhana proud of his affluence, and desirous of encouraging the son of Radha (Karna) and of insulting Bhima, uncovered his right thigh, which was like a stem of the plantain tree or like the trunk of an elephant and which was graced with every auspicious mark, and endued with the strength of thunder ; he showed it to Draupadi in her very sight.

13. Seeing this Bhimasena, expanding his red eyes, thus spoke to him (Duryodhana) in the midst of the kings, as if piercing them (with his words).

14. "Let not Vrikodara go to the regions obtained by his ancestors, if he does not break that thigh in a great battle."

15. Like the fire that comes out of every crevice of a burning tree,—sparkles of fire emitted from every part of angry Bhima's body.

Vidura said :—

16. O kings of Pratipa's race, look at the great danger that arise from Bhimasena. Know for certain that this great calamity that threatens to overtake the descendants of Bharata has been sent by Destiny itself.

17. The sons of Dhritarastra have gambled disregarding every proper consideration. They are now quarrelling in the Sabha over a lady. Your kingdom's prosperity is at an end. Alas ! The Kurus are engaged in sinful consultation.

18. O Kurus, take to your heart this high precept that I declare to you. If virtue is persecuted (in an assembly,) the whole assembly becomes polluted. If he (Yudhisthira) had staked her before he was himself won, he would have certainly been regarded as her master.

19. If a man stakes any thing at a time when he has no wealth,—to win from him any wealth (then) is like obtaining wealth in a dream. O Kurus, listening to the words of the Gandhara king, do not fall from the path of virtue.

Duryodhana said :—

20. I am willing to abide by the words of Bhima, Aryuna and the twins. Let them say that Yudhisthira is not their master ; and Jagmaseni will (then) be freed from slavery.

Aryuna said :—

21. This illustrious son of Kunti, Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) was certainly our lord and master before he began to play. But having lost himself, let all the Kurus decide whose master he is now.

Vaishampayana said :—

22. Thereupon a jackal loudly cried in the Homa chamber of king Dhritarastra. O king, asses began to bray responsively (with the jackal), and fearful birds from all quarters joined with them in their cries.

23. At this sound, Vidura, learned in everything, and also the daughter of Suvala (Gandhari), knew what it meant. Bhisma, Drona, and the learned Goutama (Kripa) also knowing it, loudly cried, "Swasti" "Swasti" (peace).

24. Seeing that fearful omen, Gandhari and the learned Vidura told everything in great affliction to the king (Dhritarastra). Then the king thus spoke.

Dhritarastra said :—

25. O wicked-minded Duryodhana, O wretch, destruction has already overtaken you when you insult in such language a wife of the Kuru chiefs,—especially this wedded wife (of the Pandavas) Draupadi.

Vaishampayana said :—

26. Having said this, the wise Dhritarastra, who possessed great knowledge, reflecting (on the matter) with the aid of his wisdom and being desirous of saving his relatives and friends from destruction, consoled the Panchala princess. Krishna and thus spoke to her.

Dhritarastra said :—

27. O Panchali, ask from me any boon you desire. Chaste and devoted to virtue, you are the foremost of all my daughters-in-law.

Draupadi said :—

28. O best of the Bharata race, if you grant me a boon, I say, let the handsome Yudhisthira, ever obedient to all duties, be freed from slavery.

29. Let not unthinking children speak of my greatly intelligent son Prativindya as the son of a slave.

30. Having been born a prince, to whom there is no man superior, and nurtured by kings, it is not proper that he should be called the son of a slave.

Dhritarastra said :—

31. O blessed girl, what you have said, let it be so. O excellent one, ask for a second boon. I shall grant it to you. My heart desires to give you a second boon. You do not deserve to get only one boon.

Draupadi said :—

32. O king, grant me this boon that Bhimasena, Aryuna and the twins with their bows and cars be freed from slavery and gain their liberty.

Dhritarastra said :—

33. O greatly blessed girl, let it be what you say. O daughter, ask for a third boon, you have not been sufficiently honoured with two boons. Ever treading the path of virtue, you are the foremost of all my daughters-in-law.

Draupadi said :—

34. O illustrious one, covetousness destroys virtue. O foremost of kings, I do not deserve a third boon; I dare not ask any.

35. O king of kings, it is ordained that a Vaisya may ask one boon, a Kshatriya woman two, a Kshatriya three and a Brahmana one hundred.

36. O king, these my husbands, freed from the wretched state of slavery, will be able to achieve prosperity by their own virtuous acts.

Thus ends the seventy first chapter, Draupadi's obtaining boon, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXXII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Karna said :—

1. We have not heard of such an act performed by any woman who are noted in this world for their beauty.

2. When the sons of Pandu and Dhritarastra were excited with anger, this Krishna, the daughter of Drupada, become their salvation.

3. The sons of Pandu were sinking boatless in an ocean of distress, this Panchali, becoming a boat to them, brought them safely to the shore.

Vaishampayana said :—

4. Hearing the words, "A woman is the refuge for the sons of Pandu," uttered in the midst of the Kurus (by Karna), the angry Bhima in great affliction said :

Bhima said :—

5. (O Aryuna), Devala has said that offspring, acts and learning, these are the three lights that is in every person, for from these (three) has sprung the creation.

6. When life becomes extinct and the body becomes impure and is cast off by the relatives, these three (offspring, acts and learning) become of service to every person.

7. But the light that is in us has been dimmed by this act of insult done to our wife. O Dhananjaya, how can a son born from this insulted wife of ours prove serviceable to us?

Aryuna said :—

8—9. O descendant of Bharata, great men never care about the harsh words that may or may not be uttered by inferior men. Persons that have earned respects for themselves,—even if they are able to retaliate,—do not remember the acts of hostility done by their enemies, but they treasure up only their good deeds.

Bhima said :—

10. O king of kings, shall I here at once kill all these foes assembled together, or O descendant of Bharata, shall I destroy them all by the roots outside the palace?

11. O descendant of Bharata, what need is there for discussion (in this matter) or what need is there for (your) command? I shall kill all these (men) even now, and O king, (then) rule the whole earth without a rival.

Vaishampayana said :—

12. Having said this Bhima with his younger brothers repeatedly cast his angry glances around as a lion does towards a herd of small animals.

13. Partha (Aryuna) of pure and pacified him with appealing looks, but the mighty-armed and powerful (Bhima) began to burn in the fire of his anger.

14. O king, fire with smokes, sparks and flames began to issue out of his ears and other senses,—so much angry he became.

15. His face became terrible to look at in consequence of his furrowed brows as that of Yama himself at the time of universal destruction.

16. O descendant of Bharata, thereupon Yudhisthira embracing him with his arms asked the mighty armed hero to forbear, telling him "Be not so. Remain in silence and peace." And

17. Having pacified the mighty armed (Bhima) with eyes red in anger, the king (Yudhisthira) approached his sire Dhritarastra.

This ends the seventy second chapter, the wrath of Bhima, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

(DYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. O king, you are our lord. Command us what we shall do. O descendant of Bharata, we desire to remain always under your sway.

Dhritarashtra said :—

2. O Ajatasatru, be blessed. Go in peace and safety. Rule your kingdom with your wealth at my command.

3. Take to heart the command of an old man, the wholesome advice that I give and which is like a nutritive regimen.

4. O child, O greatly wise Yudhisthira, you are full of humility, and you wait upon the old. You know the path of Dharma is subtle.

5. O descendant of Bharata, where there is intelligence there is forbearance. Therefore follow the path of peace. Axe falls upon wood, it does not fall upon stone.

6. Those are superior men who do not remember the acts of hostility of their enemies, who see only the merits and not the faults of their enemies, and who themselves never enter into hostilities.

7. Those that are good remember only the good deeds of their enemies and not any act of hostility that their enemies might do. The good men do good to others without any expectation of getting a return.

8. O Yudhisthira, only the worst of men use harsh words in quarrel. Men of indifferent character reply to such words when spoken by others. But superior men do not think of such words or recapitulate them.

9—11. Those that are good, taking their own feelings under consideration, can understand the feelings of others. Therefore, they remember only the good deeds, and not the acts of hostility, of their enemies. You have acted, as is done by good men of prepossessing appearance who does not transgress Dharma, Artha and Kama.

12. O child, do not remember the harshness of Duryodhana. If you desire to remember what is only good look at your mother Gandhari and myself.

13—15. O descendant of Bharata, look at me, your father, present here who am old, and blind. It was for meeting with our friends, and also for examining the strength and weakness of my children that I allowed out of policy this match at dice to proceed. O king, there is no fear for those Kurus who are under your sway and who follow the counsel of the greatly intelligent Vidura, learned in all Shastras. In you is virtue, in Aryuna is patience, and in Bhimasena is prowess,

16. And in those foremost of men, the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), are pure reverence and service to superiors. O Ajatasatru, be blessed. Return to Khandhavaprastha. Let there be brotherly love between you and your cousins. Let your mind be always fixed in virtue.

Vaishampayana said :—

17. Having been thus addressed, and performing all the ceremonies of politeness, the best of the Bharata race, Dharmaraja Yudhisthira, started with his brothers.

18. Accompanied with Krishna, and ascending their cars of colour of clouds, (Draupadi), they started for that best of cities, Indraprastha.

Thus ends the seventy third chapter, the boons of Dhritarastra, in the Dyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

(ANUDYUTA PARVA)

Janamejaya said :—

1. How did the sons of Dhritarastra feel when they came to know that the Pandavas had with Dhritarastra's permission left Hastinapur with all their wealth and jewels?

Vaishampayana said :—

2. O king, having learnt that the Pandavas had been commanded by the wise Dhritarastra to return to their capital, Dushashana soon went to his brother.

3. O best of the Bharata race, having come before Duryodhana (sitting) with his counsellors he spoke thus in a sorrowful heart.

Dushashana said:—

4. O great car-warrior, the old man has thrown away, what we earned with so much trouble. Know that he had made over the whole of that wealth to our enemies.

Vaishampayana said:—

5—6. Thereupon, Duryodhana, and Karna,—all exceedingly proud and vain,—being united together and wishing to counteract the Pandavas went in haste and saw the king Dhritarastra, the son of Vichitravirya. They spoke to him these smooth and artful words.

Duryodhana said:—

7. O king, have you not heard what the learned Vrihaspati, the preceptor of the celestials, said on morals and politics when advising Sakra (Indra).

8. O chastiser of foes, (he said), "Those enemies who always harm by force or stratagem should be destroyed by every means".

9. If we gratify with the wealth of the Pandavas, the kings of the world and then fight with the sons of Pandu, what reverses can overtake us?

10. When one places on his neck and back angry snakes full of venom, which has come to bring about his destruction,—is it possible for him to take them off?

11. O father, equipped with weapons and seated on cars, the Pandavas will annihilate us like angry and poisonous snakes.

12. Even now Aryuna,—attired in armour and furnished with couple of quivers,—is proceeding, frequently taking up the Gandiva (bow) and breathing hard and casting angry glances around.

13. We are told that Vrikodara (Bhima), hastily ordering his chariot to be made ready and then riding on it, frequently whirling his heavy club is proceeding along.

14. Nakula also is proceeding with the sword in his grasp and the semi-circular shield in his hand; Sahadeva and the king (Yudhishthira) have made signs clearly indicating their intentions.

15. Having ascended their cars which were full of all kinds of weapons, they are all whipping their horses, (so that they might soon reach their capital) to assemble their forces.

16. Persecuted (as) they are (by us), they cannot forgive us for those injuries. Who is there amongst them who will be able to forgive the insult to Draupadi?

17. O foremost of all men, be blessed. We shall again gamble with the Pandavas in order to send them to exile in the forest. We are able to bring them under our sway in this way.

18. Attired in skins, either they or we, having (first) been defeated at dice, shall go into the forest for twelve years.

19. The thirteenth year shall have to be spent in some inhabited country without being recognised. If recognised, an exile for another twelve years shall be the consequence (of such recognition).

20. Either they or we shall live (according to this engagement). Let therefore the game begin. Throwing the dice, let the Pandavas once more play.

21. O best of the Bharata race, O king, this is our highest duty. This Sakuni is highly proficient in the whole science of dice-playing.

22. We shall in the meantime be firmly rooted in the kingdom; and making alliances (with other kings), we shall be able to get together a vast and invincible army and to keep them content.

23. O king, O chastiser of foes, we shall then be able to defeat the Pandavas if they re-appear. Let this plan recommend itself to you.

Dhritarastra said:—

24. Then bring back the Pandavas, even if they have gone a great way off. Let them come and throw dice once again.

Vaishampayana said:—

25. Thereupon, Drona, Somadatta, Vatiklika, Goutama, the son of Drona, the powerful son of Vaishya (Vidura),

26. Bhurisrava, Bhisma, and the mighty car-warrior Vikarna all said, "Let not the play commence. Let there be peace."

27. But disregarding the counsels of all his wise friends and relatives, Dhritarastra, ever partial to his sons, (again) summoned the Pandavas.

Thus ends the seventy fourth chapter, the re-summoning of Yudhishthira, in the Anudyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXXV.

(ANUDYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. O great king, it was then the virtuous Gandhari, afflicted with grief on account of her affection for her sons, addressed king Dhritarastra and said.

Gandhari said :—

2. When Duryodhana was born, the high-souled Khattwa (Vidura) said, "It is better to send this disgrace of the race (Duryodhana) to the other world."

3. For he (Duryodhana) cried repeatedly and dissonantly like a jackal when he was born. It is certain he will prove the destruction of our race. Take this (the words of Vidura) to heart.

4. O descendant of Bharata, do not sink for your own fault in the ocean of calamity. O lord, do not approve the counsel of these wicked-minded ones who are but boys.

5. Do not be the cause of the fearful destruction of this race. Who is there that will break an embankment which has been completed or re-ignite a conflagration which has been extinguished?

6. O best of the Bharata race, who is there that will provoke the peaceful sons of Pritha (Kunti)? O descendant of Ajamira, you remember everything, but I shall still call your attention to this.

7. The Shastras can never control the wicked-minded men, either in good or in evil acts. A man of boyish intelligence can never act as an old man.

8. Let your sons follow you as their leader. Let them not for ever be separated from you (by death). Therefore, abandon at my word this disgrace of our race.

9. O king, O ruler of men, you could not do it before from the affection you bear for your son. Know that the time has come for the destruction of our race through him.

10. Let your mind, guided by counsels of peace, virtue and true policy, be what it naturally is: Do not err. The prosperity which is acquired by the aid of wicked acts is soon destroyed, while that which is won by honest means takes root and descends from generation to generation.

Vaishampayana said :—

11. Having been thus addressed by Gandhari who pointed out to him the path of virtue, the king replied to her saying, "If the destruction of our race has come, let it take place without any hinderance. I cannot prevent it.

12. Let it be what they desire. Let the Pandavas return. Let my sons again gamble with the sons of Pandu."

Thus ends the seventy fifth chapter, the words of Gandhari, in the Anudyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

(ANUDYUTA PARVA) Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon at the command of the intelligent Dhritarastra Pratikamin, thus spoke to the son of Pritha, king Yudhishthira who had gone (by this time) to a great distance from Hastinapur.

Pratikamin said :—

2. O descendant of Bharata, your father has said, "O Yudhishthira, the assembly is ready. O son of Pandu, O king, O Yudhishthira, come and throw the dice."

Yudhishthira said :—

3. All creatures obtain good or evil fruits according to the appointment of the Ordainer of the creation. Whether I play or I do not play, those fruits are inevitable.

4. This is a summons to dice; it is also the command of the old king. Though I know it will prove destructive to me, yet I cannot refuse.

5. Though (a living) animal made of gold was an impossibility, yet Rama suffered himself to be tempted by a (golden) deer. The mind of men over whom calamities hang become deranged and out of order.

Vaishampayana said :—

6. Having said this, the Pandava (Yudhishthira) with his brothers retraced his steps (towards Hastinapur). Knowing full well the deception practised by Sakuni, the son of Pritha (Yudhishthira) came back to sit at dice with him again.

7. O best of the Bharata race, giving great pain to the hearts of all their friends those great car-warriors again entered that assembly.

8. Guided by Fate, they once more sat down at ease for gambling in order to bring about the destruction of men.

Sakuni said :—

9. O best of the Bharata race the old king has given you back all your wealth.

That is well. But listen to me, there is a stake of great value.

10—11. (It is this),—If we are defeated by you at dice, we shall enter the great forest attired in deer skins and live there for twelve years and pass the thirteenth year in some inhavited place unrecognised. If recognised, we shall return to an exile of another twelve years.

12—14. (On the other hand), if you be defeated by us, you shall with Krishna (Draupadi) live for twelve years in the forest and pass the whole of the thirteenth year unrecognised in an inhabited country. If recognised, an exile of another twelve years is to be the consequence. On the expiry of the thirteenth year, each is to have his kingdom surrendered to the other.

15. O Yudhishthira, O descendant of Bharata, with such stake, play with us again by throwing the dice.

Vaishampayana said :—

16. Thereupon those that were present in the Sabha, raising up their arms, said in great anxiety of mind and in great emotion,

17. "Alas! Fie on the friends of Duryodhana that they do not tell him of his great danger! O best of the Bharata race (Dhritarastra), whether he understands or not out of his own sense, it is your duty to tell him plainly.

18. The king, the son of Pritha (Yudhishthira, even hearing these various remarks, again sat at dice from shame and sense of (Kshatrya) duty.

19. Fully knowing the consequence, the greatly intelligent one (Yudhishthira) again began to play, as if he was fully aware that the destruction of the Kurus were (inevitably near at hand.

Yudhishthira said :—

20. O Sakuni, how can a king like me who always observe the duty of his order refuse when challenged to dice? Therefore, I shall (again) play with you.

Sakuni said :—

21—23. O son of Pandu, we have many kine and horses and milch cows and innumerable goats and sheep and elephants, treasures, gold and servants, both male and female. All these have been staked by us before. But now, let this be our stake,—namely exile into forest (for twelve years) and then living in the thirteenth year unrecognised in an inhabited place. O foremost of men, with this stake let us (now) play.

Vaishampayana said :—

24. O descendant of Bharata, when this proposal about going to the forest was but once uttered, the son of Pritha (Yudhishthira) accepted it; and the son of Suvala (Sakuni) (then) took up the dice. (Finally) Sakuni said to Yudhishthira, "Lo! I have won!"

Thus ends the seventy sixth chapter, the defeat of Yudhishthira once again, in the Anudyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

(ANUDYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thereupon the vanquished sons of Pritha, preparing for their exile in the forest, attired themselves in deer skins and Uttaria (upper garment).

2. Seeing those chastisers of foes attired in deer skins and robbed of their kingdom at the point of going to the forest, Dushashana exclaimed.

Dushashana said :—

3. The absolute sovereignty of the son of Dhritarastra, the high-souled king, (Duryodhana) has (now) commenced. The Pandavas are vanquished, and they have been plunged into great misery.

4. The gods are propitious to us,—whether or not we have proceeded in the very narrow path (of sin); for we are to-day superior to our enemy in wealth and in every thing.

5. The sons of Pritha are plunged into eternal hell. They are deprived of happiness and kingdom for ever-lasting days.

6. Those Pandavas, who, being intoxicated with the pride of wealth, laughed at the son of Dhritarastra, will now have to go to the forest defeated and deprived of their wealth.

7. Let them abandon their variagated armours, and their resplendent robes of celestial make. Let them all put on deer skins according to the stake they had accepted of the son of Suvala (Sakuni).

8. The Pandavas, who always boasted that they had no equals in all the world, will now know and regard themselves in this their calamity as grains of sesame without kernal.

9. Though in this dress, the Pandavas appear like wise and powerful men installed in a sacrifice, but see (consider) them as persons not entitled to perform sacrifices.

10. The greatly wise descendant of Somoka, Jagmasena (Drupada), having bestowed the Panchala princess on the Pandavas, did not act well. The husbands of Jagmaseni (Draupadi) are impotent.

11. O Jagmaseni, what joy will you get in seeing these your husbands in the forest attired in skins and rags, and deprived of their wealth and possessions. Select a husband from these present.

12. These Kurus, assembled here, are all forbearing and self-controlled. They are all vastly wealthy. Select one amongst these as your husband, so that this calamity may not drag you (in its train).

13. All the Pandavas are now like grains of sesame that are without kernal, or toy animals incased in skins, or the grains of paddy without kernal.

14. Why do you wait any longer upon the fallen sons of Pandu? The labour is thrown away that is bestowed on pressing the sesame grain that is without the kernal.

Vaishampayana said :—

The son of Dhritarastra (Dushashana) uttered such cruel and harsh words in the hearing of the Pandavas.

15. Having heard them, the unforbearing Bhimasena suddenly rushed towards that prince in anger like a Himalyan lion does towards a jackal. He loudly rebuked him in these words.

Bhima said :—

16. O crooked-minded wretch, you rave in words that are uttered only by the sinful. Being advanced by the skill of the Gandhara king, you (dare to) boast in the midst of these kings.

17. As you pierce our hearts with these your words like arrows, so will I pierce your heart in battle, making you recollect all this.

18. I shall send to the abode of Yama all those with their descendants and relatives who are from anger or covetousness walking behind you as your protectors.

Vaishampayana said :—

19. Dushashana, abandoning all sense of shame, danced around in the midst of the Kurus and loudly said, "O cow," "O cow." Bhima uttered these words of wrath, but did nothing, for he could not deviate from the path of virtue.

Bhima said :—

20. Wretch, do you dare use harsh words as these? O Dushashana, who should boast having thus won wealth by foul means?

21. I tell you, if Vrikodara, the son of Pritha, does not drink your life-blood piercing open your breast in battle, let him not attain to regions of blessedness.

22. I tell you truly that killing the sons of Dhritarastra in battle in the presence of all the warriors, I shall without the least delay pacify my this anger.

Vaishampayana said :—

23. When the Pandavas were going out of the Sabha, the wicked king Duryodhana from excess of joy mimicked by his own steps the playful and lion-like movements of Bhimasena.

24. Thereupon Vrikodara (Bhima), half turning towards him, said, "O fool, do not think that by this you gain any ascendancy over me. I shall soon kill you with all your followers and answer you recalling all this to your mind."

25. Seeing this insult offered to him, the powerful and proud Bhima, supressing his rising anger and following the king (Yudhis-thira) spoke these words when going out of the Kuru court.

Bhima said :—

26. I shall be the slayer of Duryodhana, Dhananjaya (Aryuna) will be the slayer of Karna. Sahadeva will kill the gambler Sakuni.

27. I repeat in the midst of this assembly these proud words which the celestials will surely make good, if ever we engage in battle (with the Kurus).

28. I shall kill this sinful wretch Sujoydhan (Duryodhana) in a club-fight. Felling him on the ground, I shall place my foot on his head.

29. As regards this wicked-minded man Dushashana, who is bold in speech, I will drink his blood like a lion.

Aryuna said :—

30. O Bhima, the resolutions of superior men are not known only in words. On the fourteenth year, they will see what will happen.

Bhima said :—

31. The earth will drink the blood of Duryodhana, Karna, the wicked-minded Sakuni and the fourth Dushashana.

Aryuna said :—

32. O Bhimasena, I will as you direct, kill in battle this Karna so malicious, jealous, harsh-speeched and vain.

33. For doing what is agreeable to Bhima, Aryuna vows that he will kill in battle with his arrows this Karna with all his followers.

34. I will send to the abode of Yama with my arrows also those other kings that will from foolishness fight against me.

35. If my this vow be not carried out, then the Himalaya mountains might be removed from where they are, the maker of the day (Sun) might lose his rays and the Moon his coolness.

36. All this will surely happen if on the fourteenth year from this, Duryodhana does not return us our kingdom with proper respect.

Vaishampayana said :—

37. When Aryuna said this, the handsome and powerful son of Madri, Sahadeva, waving his mighty arms,

38. And sighing like a snake and desiring to kill Sakuni, spoke thus with eyes red with anger.

Sahadeva said :

39. O fool, O destroyer of the fame of the Gandhara kings, what you are thinking as dice is not dice. They are sharp-pointed arrows which you have invited in battle.

40. I shall certainly accomplish all which Bhima has said as regards you with all your followers. If you have anything to do, do it before that day comes.

41. O son of Suvala, I shall certainly kill you with all your friends and relatives, if you stay in the fight according to the usage of the Kshatriyas.

Vaishampayana said :—

42. O king, hearing the words of Sahadeva, Nakula, the handsomest of men, spoke thus.

Nakula said :—

43—44. I shall certainly send to the abode of Yama all those wicked-minded sons of Dhritarastra, who, being desirous of death and impelled by Fate, and also moved by the wish of doing what would please Duryodhana, have used harsh and insulting words towards this Jangmaseni, (Draupadi) at the gambling match.

45. At the command of the king (Yudhishthira) and remembering the wrongs done to (Draupadi,) I shall soon make the earth freed from the sons of Dhritarastra.

Vaishampayana said :—

46. Having thus taken many vows, those mighty armed and foremost of men (the Pandavas) went to Dhritarastra.

Thus ends the seventy seventh chapter, going to Dhritarastra, in the Anudyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

(ANUDYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1. I bid farewell to all the descendants of Bharata, to my old grandsire (Bhisma) to king Somadatta, the great king Valhika,

2. To Drona, to Kripa, to all the other kings, to Ashwathama, Vidura, Dhritarastra, and to all the sons of Dhritarastra,

3. To Yuyutsu, Sanjaya, and all the Sabhasadas (court-officials). I bid you all farewell. I shall see you (again) on my return.

Vaishampayana said :—

4. Those that were present there could not out of shame tell anything to Yudhishthira, but they all prayed for the welfare of the intelligent (king).

Vidura said :—

5. The reverend Pritha (Kunti) is a princess. She should not go to the forest. She is delicate and old, and she is ever in happiness.

6. The blessed lady will remain in my house (well) respected by me. O sons of Pritha, know this, and let safety be yours in every way.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Thereupon they (the Pandavas) all said, "O sinless one, let it be as you say. You are our uncle, and (therefore) you are the same as our father. We are all obedient to you.

8. O learned man, you are our most respected Guru (superior). O high-souled one, command us what else is there to be done".

Vidura said :—

9. O Yudhishthira, O best of the Bharata race, know this to be my opinion that he who is defeated by sinful means need not be pained for such defeat.

10. You know every rule of Dharma. Dhananjaya (Aryuna) is ever victorious in battle. Bhimasena is the slayer of foes, Nakula is the gatherer of wealth.

11. Sahadava has administrative talents, Dhaumya is the best of all men learned in the Vedas, and the virtuous Draupadi is learned in Dharma and Artha.

12. You are all attached to one another and you all feel delight at one another's presence; enemies cannot separate you from one another, and you are all contented.

13. O descendent of Bharata, for this patient abstraction from the worldly possessions will be of great benefit to you. No enemy, even if he be like Sakra (Indra), will be able to stand it.

14. You were instructed on the mountains of Himalaya by Meru-Savarani. You were instructed in Varanavata by Krishna Dwai-payana (Vyasa),

15. On the Vrigu mountain by Rama, on the banks of the Drisadvati by Sambhu (Siva). You have also received instructions from the great Rishi Asita on the Anjana mountains.

16. You became a disciple of Vrigu on the banks of the Kalmashi. Narada and your this priest Dhaumya will be now your instructors.

17. Do not abandon the excellent lessons, ever adored by the Rishis, as regards the next world. O sons of Pandu, you surpass in intelligence even Pururava, the son of Ila,

18. In strength all other kings, and in virtue even the Rishis. Resolve earnestly to win the victory which is the attribute of Indra, to control anger which is the attribute of Yama,

19. To give in charity which is the attribute of Kuvera, and to control all passions which is the attribute of Varuna. Obtain the power of gladdening from the moon, the power of sustaining all from the water,

20. Forbearance from earth, energy from the whole of the solar disc, strength from the winds, and affluence from the creatures.

21—22. Welfare and immunity from disease be yours. I hope to see you return (in all safety). O Yudhisthira, act properly and duly in all seasons—in the time of distress, in that of difficulty, and in respect of every thing. O son of Kunti, O descendant of Bharata, with our permission depart. Blessings be on you.

23. None can say that you have done any thing sinful before. We hope to see you return in safety and crowned with success.

Vaishampayana said :—

24. Thus addressed the greatly powerful Pandava (Yudhisthira), saying, "Be it so" and bowing low to Bhisma and Drona, went away.

Thus ends the seventy eighth chapter, Yudhisthira's departure to the forest, in the Anudyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

(ANUDYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

Thereupon, when Krishna (Draupadi) was about to start, she went to the illustrious Pritha (Kunti) and asked her leave and that of the other ladies who were all plunged in grief.

2. Saluting and embracing every one of them as each deserved, she desired to go away. Thereupon loud lamentations rose within the inner apartments of the Pandavas.

3. Kunti, being greatly afflicted on seeing Draupadi on the eve of her journey; uttered these words in a voice choked with grief.

Kunti said :—

4. O child, do not grieve that this great calamity has overtaken you. You are well-aware of all the duties of the female sex. Your character and conduct are as they should be.

5. O lady of sweet smiles, I need not instruct you as to your duties towards your lords. You are chaste and accomplished; your qualifications and accomplishments have adorned our two races (those of the Kurus and the Pandavas).

6. The Kurus are (very) fortunate that they have not been burnt by your wrath. O sinless one, go away in safety, blessed by my prayer.

7. The hearts of good women never moved by what is inevitable. Protected by great virtue, you will soon obtain good fortune.

8. While living in the woods, keep your eyes always on my child Sahadeva, so that his mind may not sink under this great calamity.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. Saying "So be it," the lady Draupadi, clad in one cloth stained with blood, and with dishevelled hair, came out (of the inner-apartment in tears.

10. As she went away weeping and lamenting, Pritha (Kunti) herself in grief, followed her. She saw her sons, shorn of their ornaments and robes,

11. Their body clad in deer-skins and their heads cast down. They were surrounded by rejoicing foes and they were pitied by friends.

12. Kunti, possessing excess of parental affection, approached her sons who were in that state. Embracing them all, she spoke thus her voice choked with grief.

Kunti said :—

13—14. You are virtuous and well-conducted ; you are adorned with all excellent qualities ; your behaviour is (always) respectful. You are all high minded, you are (always)

15. Engaged in the service of your superiors ; you are ever devoted to the gods and the performance of sacrifices,—why then this calamity has overtaken you ? Whence is this your reverse of fortune ? I do not see whose wickedness and sin have fallen on you.

16. All this must be due to my bad fortune, for I have given birth to you. It is for this you have been overtaken by this calamity, notwithstanding your possessing excellent accomplishments.

17. You are not wanting in energy, prowess, strength, firmness and might. How will you live in great wilderness shorn of your wealth and possession ?

18. If I had known before that you were destined to live in the forest, I would not have (then) come after Pandu's death from the mountains of Satasringa to Hastinapur.

18. Fortunate was your father ; I consider it now, for he reaped the fruit of asceticism and therefore did not meet with the misery appertaining to one's sons. He considered the desire to attain to heaven as the most delightful.

19. I consider to-day the virtuous and the blessed Madri as very fortunate, for she had, a fore-knowledge of what would happen and had thus obtained the great emancipation.

20. Madri looked upon me as her stay ; and her mind and her affections were ever fixed on me. Fie on my desire of life ? I suffer all this woe for it.

21. O sons, you are all excellent ; and you are all dear to me. I have obtained you after much suffering. I cannot leave you ; I will go with you. O Krishna, alas, why do you leave me so ?

22. Every thing possessing life is sure to perish. Has Dhuta (Creator) forgotten to ordain my death ? Perhaps it is so ; and that is why life does not quit me.

23. O Krishna, O dweller of Dwarka, O younger brother of Sankershana (Valadeva), where are you ? Why do you not save me and these best of men (the Pandavas) ?

24. The men say that you are without beginning and without end and that you save those who think of you. Why does this saying now turn to be false ?

25. These my sons are ever attached to virtue, nobility, good fame and prowess.

They do not deserve to suffer afflictions. Show kindness towards them.

26. When such leaders of our race as Bhishma, Drona, and Kripa, all learned in morality and Artha, are present how could such a calamity (at all) happen ?

27. Alas Pandu ! Alas, lord where are you ? How could you see your good children sent into exile thus persecuted by gambling ?

28. Sahadeva, you do not go. You are dearer to me than my own body. O son of Madri, do not forsake me ; you should be kind to me.

29. If they are bound by the dictates of virtue, let these your (elder) brothers go. You earn that virtue which is the fruit of waiting upon me (a mother).

Vaishampayana said :—

30. Consoling their weeping (mother) Kunti and bowing to her, the Pandavas, set for the forest in great grief.

31. Vidura, himself greatly grieved, consoled the afflicted Kunti with reasons ; and Khattwa (Vidura) then led her slowly to his house.

32. The ladies of Dhritarastra's household, hearing every thing as it had happened namely the exile (of the Pandavas) and the dragging of Krishna (Draupadi) in the assembly of gambling,

33. Loudly wept, all greatly censuring the Kurus. The ladies of the royal household sat silent for a long time covering their lotus like faces with their hands.

34. King Dhritarastra, thinking of the dangers that threatened his sons, became a prey to anxiety and could not get any peace of mind.

35. Anxiously meditating on everything and with mind deprived of its equanimity by grief, he sent for Khattwa (Vidura) asking him to come (to him) without delay.

36. Thereupon Vidura went to Dhritarastra's palace and the ruler of men Dhritarastra asked him in great anxiety.

Thus ends the seventy ninth chapter, the colloquy between Draupadi and Kunti, in the Anudvuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXX.

(ANUDVUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. As soon as Vidura of great foresight came, the king Dhritarastra, the son of Amvika, asked him timidly.

Dhritarastra said :—

2. How does the son of Kunti, and Dharma, Yudhisthira, proceed along? How does Bhimasena, also Sabyashachi (Aryuna) and the two Pandavas, the sons of Madri?

3. O Khattwa, how does Dhaumya? How does the illustrious Draupadi (proceed along)? I desire to hear everything. Describe to me all their acts.

Vidura said :—

4. The son of Kunti (has gone away), covering his face with cloth, the Pandava Bhima has proceeded along looking at his mighty arms.

5. Sabyasachi (Aryuna) has followed the king, (Yudhisthira) scattering sands along. The son of Madri, Sahadeva proceeds (the way) besmearing his face.

6. That handsomest of men in the world, Nakula, has gone following the king in great grief, staining himself with dust.

7. The large eyed and beautiful Krishna (Draupadi) has followed the king, covering her face with her dishevelled hair and bathing in tears.

8. O king, Dhaumya proceeds along with Kusha grass in hand, uttering the fearful Mantras of the Sama Veda relating to Yama.

Dhritarastra said :—

9. The Pandavas are going assuming various guise. O Vidura, tell me why they are going in this way.

Vidura said :—

10. Though persecuted by your sons, and robbed off his kingdom and wealth, the mind of the wise Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) has not deviated from the path of virtue.

11. O descendant of Bharata, the king (Yudhisthira) is always kind to the sons of Dhritarastra. Deprived of kingdom by foul means, he does not open his eyes in anger.

12. "I shall not consume men by looking at them with fearful eyes,"—thinking this, the Pandava king proceeds along with covered face.

13. Hear, I tell you, why Bhima goes in this way. O best of the Bharata race, thinking "There is none equal to me in strength of arms,"

14—15. O king, Bhima ever proud of his strength of arms, goes repeatedly stretching forth his mighty arms and exhibiting them and desiring to do to his enemies, deeds worthy of those arms. The son of Kunti,

Aryuna, capable of using both his arms (in throwing weapon),

16—17. That Sabyasachi, O descendant of Bharata, follows the king, scattering dust emblematical of the arrows he will shower in the battle. O descendant of Bharata, it indicates that as the sand grains are scattered by him with ease, so will he rain arrows with ease on the enemy. O lord, thinking "None may recognise me in this day of calamity,"

18. Sahadeva proceeds along besmearing his face. Nakula goes with his body besmeared with ashes, thinking, "I may steal the hearts of the ladies that may look at me."

19. Draupadi, attired in one piece of cloth, stained with blood, and her hair dishevelled (proceeds along) weeping and saying,

20—21. "The wives of those for whom I have been reduced to such a plight shall, on the fourteenth year hence, deprived of their husbands, sons, relatives and dear ones smeared all over with blood, all in their seasons, and with hair dishevelled enter Hastinapur having offered oblations of water to the manes of their dead husbands.

22. O descendant of Bharata, the learned and self-controlled priest Dhaumya, holding the Kusha (grass) in his hand and pointing them towards the south-west, walks before (the Pandavas) singing the Mantras of the Sama Veda.

23. Dhaumya is proceeding, saying "When the descendants of Bharata will be killed in battle, the priests and preceptors of the Kurus will thus sing the Sama Mantras."

24. "Alas, alas, our lords are going away! O fie on the Kuru chiefs who have acted like children

25. In thus banishing the heirs of Pandu from covetousness! We shall be masterless, being thus separated from the Pandavas.

26. What love can we bear for the wicked and covetous Kurus? The citizens repeatedly bewailed thus in great grief.

27. The sons of Kunti, all possessing great energy of mind, has gone away to the forest indicating by signs the resolutions that were in their minds.

28. At the departure of those foremost of men from Hastinapur, lightning flashed in the cloudless sky, earth began to tremble,

29. Rahu came to devour the sun, although it was not the day of an eclipse, meteors began to fall, keeping the city to their right.

30. Jackals, vultures, ravens, and other carnivorous beasts and birds began to shriek from the temples of the gods, from the tops of sacred trees and from walls and house-tops.

31. O king, thus extraordinary and fearful protents were seen and heard, indicating the destruction of the Bharata race as the consequence of your evil counsels.

Vaishampayana said :—

32. O king, when the king Dhritarastra and the intelligent Vidura were thus talking, there came

33. To the Sabha (and stood) in the midst of the Kurus, Narada surrounded by great Rishis. He then uttered these terrible words.

Narada said :—

34. On the fourteenth year hence, for the fault of Duryodhana will be destroyed the Kurus by the prowess of Bhima and Aryuna.

Vaishampayana said :—

35. Having said this, that foremost of all celestial Rishis, adorned with surprising Vedic grace, disappeared from the scene, passing into the sky.

36. Thereupon Duryodhana, Karna and the son of Suvala, Sakuni, considering Drona as the island (refuge) offered him the kingdom.

37. Then Drona spoke thus to the wicked Duryodhana, Dushashana, Karna and all the other Bharatas.

Drona said :—

38—39. The Bramhanas have said that the Pandavas of celestial origin are incapable of being killed. The sons of Dhritarastra, with all their forces, heartily and with reverence have sought my protection ; I shall look after them to the best of my power. I cannot abandon them. Destiny is Supreme.

40. The sons of Pandu, being defeated at dice, are going to the forest to save their virtue. The Pandavas will live for twelve years in the forest

41. Practising Brahmacharya. The Pandavas will to our great grief return in anger (at the end of the thirteenth) to take great vengeance on their foes.

42. I formerly deprived Drupada of his kingdom in a quarrel over friendship. O descendant of Bharata, robbed of his kingdom, the king (Drupada) performed a sacrifice to obtain a son who would kill me.

43. By the ascetic power of Yaya and Upayaya, he has obtained a son from (the sacrificial) fire, —(namely) Dhristadyumna and (a daughter) the faultless Krishna (Draupadi), both risen from the sacrificial alter.

44. Dhristadyumna is the brother-in-law of the sons of Pritha by marriage ; he is ever engaged in doing the favourite works of the Pandavas. I have, therefore, a great fear.

45. Of celestial origin and of effulgence as that of fire, he was born with bow, arrows and armour. I have great fear from him.

46. The slayer of hostile heroes, the son of Prisata (Drupada), has taken the side of that young hero who stands at the head of all great car-warriors.

47. I shall have to lose my life if he and I have ever to meet each other in battle. O Kurus, what could be a greater grief to me than this in the world ?

48. "Dhristadyumna is the slayer of Drona" is the general belief. I have heard that he is born to kill me. This is also widely known in the world.

49. For your sake, that fearful time of destruction has come, Do without any loss of time what may be beneficial to you.

50. Your happiness will last but for a moment as the shadow of the top of the palm tree rests in winter only but a moment at its base. Perform various sacrifices ; enjoy and give away every thing at your heart's content.

51. On the fourteenth year a great calamity will overwhelm you.

Vaishampayana said :—

Having heard the words of Drona, Dhritarastra said.

Dhritarastra said :—

52. O Khattwa (Vidura), the preceptor has said what is true. Go and bring back the Pandavas. If they do not come back, let them go, but after being treated with respect and affection ; let my these children (the Pandavas) go with arms, soldiers and cars, enjoying every good thing.

Thus ends the eightieth chapter, the words of Dhritarastra, in the Anudyuta of the Sabha Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

(ANUDYUTA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. At the departure of the Pandavas to the forest after being defeated at dice, the great king Dhritarastra was afflicted with great anxiety.

2. When the ruler of men, Dhritarastra was thus seated in anxiety and restlessness and sighing in grief, Sanjaya came to him and spoke thus.

Sanjaya said :—

3. O lord of the world, you have (now) obtained the whole earth with all its wealth; you have banished the Pandavas,—why then do you grieve so?

Dhritarastra said :—

4. What have they not to grieve for who will have to meet in battle those foremost of heroes, the Pandavas those great car-warriors aided by allies.

Sanjaya said :—

5. O king, this is assuredly a great act of yours,—this great hostility which is inevitable and which will cause the destruction of the whole world.

6—7. Forbidden by Bhisma, Drona, and Vidura, your wicked minded and shameless son, Duryodhana sent his Pratikamin, born in the Suta caste, commanding him to bring into the Sabha the beloved and virtuous wife of the Pandavas.

8. The celestials first deprive that man of his reason to whom they ordain defeat and disgrace. It is for this, he sees every thing in a strange light.

9—10. When destruction is at hand, evil, appearing as good to the mind polluted by sin, remains stuck to it. That which is improper appears as proper, and that which is proper appears as improper to a man overwhelmed by destruction. And this he (always) likes.

11. The Time that brings on destruction does not come with upraised club to smash one's head. Peculiarity of Time is this that it makes a man see evil in good and good in evil.

12. The wretches have brought on themselves this fearful, wholesale and horrible destruction by dragging into the Sabha the ascetic princess of Panchala.

13—14. Who else than that false player at dice (Duryodhana) could bring into the Sabha with insults the daughter of Drupada, possessing beauty and intelligence, being conversant with every rule of morality and duty, and sprung not from any woman's womb but from the sacred fire. That beautiful lady was in her season covered with blood

15—16. And in one cloth. Panchali (Draupadi) saw the Pandavas, plunged in slavery and robbed of their wealth, of their kingdom, of their attire, of their beauty, and of every object of enjoyment. Bound by the tie of virtue, they were then unable to exert their prowess.

17. In the midst of the Kuru assembly, Duryodhana and Karna spoke cruel and harsh words to the distressed and enraged Krishna (Draupadi) who did not deserve such treatment.

Dhritarastra said :—

18. O Sanjaya, the glances of the afflicted Draupadi may consume the whole world. Is there any chance of any of my son's living?

19. The ladies of the Bharata race, with Gandhari, seeing the virtuous, young and beautiful Krishna (Draupadi), the wedded wife (of the Pandavas), dragged into court wept aloud. They are even now weeping every day along with all (my) subjects.

20. Enraged at the persecution on Draupadi, all the Brahmanas refrained from performing the Agnihotra in the evening.

21—23. The winds frightfully begun to blow as they do at the universal destruction. A fearful thunder-storm raged, Meteors fell from the sky and devoured the sun, and unseasonably and fearfully alarmed all the people. The fire came blazing out from the chariot-house.

24. All their flag-staffs fell down, foreboding evil to the Bharatas. Jackals fearfully cried out within the sacred fire chamber of Duryodhana.

25. Asses from all directions began to bray in response (to the jackal). O Sanjaya, then left the assembly Bhisma, Drona with

26. Kripa, Somadatta, and the high-souled Valhika. It was then at the advice of Vidura, I spoke thus (to Draupadi).

27. "O Krishna, I shall grant you boons whatever you desire to have." Panchali (Draupadi) begged of me the liberation of the Pandavas.

28. I then set free the Pandavas and commanded them to go away with their cars, bows and arrows. It was then the greatly intelligent Vidura spoke thus.

Vidura said :—

29. This will prove the destruction of the Bharata race,—namely the dragging of Krishna into the Sabha. This excellent daughter of the Panchala is Sree (the goddess of wealth) herself.

30. Of celestial origin, Panchali is the wedded wife of the Pandavas. The wrathful sons of Pritha will never forgive this insult offered to her.

31. The mighty bowmen of the Vrishni race, and the mighty Panchal car-warriors will not suffer this in silence. Supported by Vasudeva (Krishna),

32. Vivatsu (Aryuna) will certainly come back surrounded by the Panchala heroes. Among them, the great Bowman and greatly powerful Bhimasena

33—34. Will also come back whirling his club like Yama himself his mace. There will be no kings who will be able to stand the sound of the Gandiva (bow) of the intelligent Partha (Aryuna) and the terrible force of the club of Bhima. Therefore it seems to me to be the best to have peace and not hostility with the sons of Pritha.

35. The Pandavas are always stronger than the Kurus. The greatly effulgent king Jarasandha

36. Was killed in battle by Bhima with his bare arms. O best of the Bharata race, you should therefore make peace with the Pandavas.

37. O great king, without scruples of any kind,—unite the two parties. If it is done, you are sure to obtain good fortune."

Dhritarastra siad :—

38. The son of Gavalgana, Khattwa (Vidura) spoke in words replete with Dharma and Artha. I did not accept his words moved by the affection I bear for my sons.

Thus ends the eighty first chapter, the reflections of Dhritarastra, in the Anudyuta of the Sabha Parva.

VANA PARVA.

CHAPTER I.

(ARANYAKA PARVA.)

Having saluted the Supreme Deity (Narayana), and the highest of all male beings (Nara) and also the Goddess of Learning (Sarasvati), let us cry "success!"

Janamejaya said:—

1—2. O best of Brahmanas, having been deceitfully defeated at dice by the sons of Dhritarastra with their counsellors, and having been provoked by the wicked-minded ones (the Kuru princes), who thus brought about a fearful hostility by addressing them in cruel words,—what did the Kurus, my grandsires do?

3. How did the sons of Pritha (the Pandavas), equal to Sakra (Indra) in effulgence, thus suddenly robbed of their affluence and overwhelmed with misery, pass their days in the forest?

4. Who are the men that followed them, (the Pandavas) that were plunged in great affliction. What was their conduct, what was their food, and where did those illustrious ones live?

5. O great Rishi, O best of the Brahmanas, how did the twelve years of those heroes, those slayers of foes, pass away in the forest?

6—7. How did that foremost of all women, the royal princess (Draupadi), ever devoted to her husbands,—greatly fortunate and truthful,—undeserving of suffering misery, endure that painful exile in the forest? O great ascetic, tell me all this in detail.

8. O Brahmana, I desire to hear the history of those greatly effulgent heroes narrated by you. I am in great curiosity.

Vaishampayana said:—

9. Having been thus defeated at dice and provoked by the wicked-minded sons of Dhritarastra with their counsellors, the sons of Pritha (the Pandavas) set out from Hastinapur.

10. Coming out through the Vardhamana gate of the city, the Pandavas with Krishna and with their arms went away in a northerly direction,

11. Indrasena and others, taking with them their fourteen servants with all their wives, followed them on their swift cars.

12. Having learnt that they had gone away, the citizens were overwhelmed with great grief; and having all met together, they began without fear to censure amongst themselves Bhisma, Drona, Vidura and the son of Gotama (Kripa).

The citizens said:—

13. When the sinful Duryodhana, helped by the son of Suvala (Sakuni), Karna and Dushashana, aspires to this kingdom, our families, our homes, nay we ourselves are all gone,

14. When this sinful man with the help of other sinful men aspires to the kingdom, our families, usages, virtue and prosperity are all doomed. How can there be happiness (where these are destroyed)?

15. Duryodhana is malicious towards his superiors; he has abandoned all good conduct; he is covetous, vain, mean, and by nature cruel.

16. Where Duryodhana is the king, there the whole earth is doomed. Let us proceed there where the virtuous Pandavas are going.

17. They are self-controlled, high-souled, victorious over foes, endued with modesty and renown and devoted to virtue.

Vaishampayana said:—

18. Having said this, they all went together after the Pandavas. With joined hands, they thus spoke to the sons of Kunti and Madri.

The citizens said:—

19. Be blessed. Where will you go leaving us (behind) who are in great grief? We shall go where you will go.

20. We have been greatly distressed in learning that you have been defeated with sinful means by the cruel enemies. You should not forsake us,

21. Who are your devoted and loving friends, and who are ever engaged in doing your good and seeking your welfare. We all do not desire to meet destruction by living in the kingdom of a bad king.

22. O foremost of men, listen to the merits and demerits, as we indicate, that respectively arise from associating with what is good and what is bad.

23. As cloth, water, sesame-seeds and ground are perfumed by their association with flowers, so qualities are derived from association.

24. Association with the fools produces delusion, as daily association with the honest and good produces virtue.

25. Therefore those who are virtuously inclined should associate with men who are wise, old, honest, and pure in conduct and who are ascetics.

26. Those whose triple possessions, namely knowledge, birth and acts, are pure, should be waited upon. To associate with them is superior to the study of the Shastras.

27. Without performing any special virtuous act, we shall be able to reap religious merits by associating with the righteous. We shall (assuredly) get sin by serving the sinful (Duryodhana and others).

28. The very sight and the touch of the sinful, and conversation and association with them, cause diminution of virtue. Men (who act thus) never attain purity of soul.

29. Association with the mean and the low makes one's understanding mean and low; association with the indiffererent makes it indiffererent, and association with the good makes it good.

30—31. All those attributes, which are spoken of in the world as the source of religious merit, worldly prosperity, and sensual pleasure, which are highly regarded by men, extolled in the Vedas and approved by the good, exist in you separately and jointly. Desiring our own welfare, we wish to live amongst men who possess such attributes.

Yudhisthira said :—

32. Blessed are we, since moved by affection and compassion, our subjects, headed by the Brahmanas, credit us with merits we do not possess.

33. I, with my brothers, would ask all of you to do one thing. For the sake of the love you bear for us, you should not act otherwise.

34. Our grandfather Bhisma, the king (Dhritarastra), Vidura, our mother (Kunti), and our other friends are all in Hastinapur.

35. They are overwhelmed with sorrow and afflictions; if you want to please me, uniting all together, (go and) cherish them with care.

36. Grieved at my departure, you have come far away. Go back. Let your heart be affectionately directed towards the relatives whom we leave behind as our pledges to you.

37. This is the one act on which my heart is set. If you do it, you will give me the greatest satisfaction and pay your best regards.

Vaishampayana said :—

38. Having been thus exhorted by Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), the subjects raised up all together a fearful wail, exclaiming "Alas, O king!"

39. Afflicted and overwhelmed with grief, they unwillingly retraced their steps after asking leave of the Pandavas and remembering the virtues of Pritha's sons.

40. At the departure of the citizens, the Pandavas ascended their cars and came to a great banian tree, named Primana, on the banks of the Ganges.

41. Coming to the banian tree at the close of the day, the heroic Pandavas became purified by touching the water. They then passed the night there.

42—43. Afflicted with grief, they passed that night, living on water only. Some Brahmanas, both those that maintained fire and those that did not, followed the Pandavas there for the love they bore for them. Surrounded by those Brahma-knowing men, the king (Yudhisthira) shone resplendent.

44. That terrible evening hours became in a moment delightful on account of those Brahmana's lighting their fires, chaunting the Vedas and holding mutual conversations.

45. Those foremost of Brahmanas with their swan-like sweet voices spent the night in comforting that best of Kurus, the king (Yudhisthira).

Thus ends the 1st chapter, the returning of the citizens, in the Aranyaka of Vana Parva.

CHAPTER II.

(ARANYAKA PARVA) Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. When that night passed away and morning appeared, those Brahmanas, who supported themselves by alms, stood before those doers of exalted deeds (the Pandavas) who were on the point of entering the forest.

2. Thereupon the son of Kunti, king Yudhisthira, thus spoke to them, "We are robbed of our kingdom, prosperity and everything.

3. Living on fruits, roots and meat we go to the forest in sorrow. The forest is full of dangers, and it abounds in reptiles and beasts of prey.

4. It appears to me that you will have to suffer much privations and misery there. The sufferings of the Brahmanas may overwhelm even the celestials,—what to speak of me! O Brahmanas, go back wherever you like.

The Brahmanas said :—

5. O king, we are ready to go where you are going. You should not abandon us who are devoted to you and who follow the path of the true religion.

6. The celestials have compassion on their devotees, specially on the Brahmanas whose conduct is pure.

Yudhisthira said :—

7. O Brahmanas, I have always great devotion towards the Brahmanas. But this destitution has overwhelmed me.

8—9. My these brothers who are to procure fruits and roots and the deer are stupified with grief for the afflictions that have overtaken them, and for the distress of Draupadi, and for the loss of our kingdom. Alas,—as they are distressed, I cannot employ them in painful tasks!

The Brahmanas said :—

10. O king, do not allow any anxiety for our maintenance to find a place in your heart. Procuring our food ourselves, we shall follow you;

11. And we shall do you good by meditation and prayers, and we shall entertain you with pleasant conversations, and we shall ourselves be cheered in return.

Yudhisthira said :—

12. There is no doubt that it must be as you say. I am ever pleased with the company of Brahmanas. But my fallen condition makes me regard myself as an object of reproach.

13. How shall I see you all, my well-wishers, who do not deserve to suffer any trouble, subsist on food procured by yourselves? O fie on the sons of Dhritarastra!

Vaishampayana said :—

14. Having said this, that king (Yudhisthira) sat down weeping on the ground. Then a learned Brahmana, named Saunaka, who was learned in the philosophy of the soul, and in the Sankhya and Yoga, thus spoke to the king.

Saunaka said :—

15. Thousand causes of grief and hundred causes of fear overwhelm the ignorant day after day, but not the learned.

16. Intelligent men like you never allow themselves to be deluded by acts which are opposed to true knowledge, which is fraught with every kind of evil, and which is destructive of salvation.

17. O king, the understanding with the eight attributes, which is said to be capable of providing against all evils which results from the study of the Śrutis, is in you.

18. Men like you are never stupified by poverty or by meeting with difficult ways, or by afflictions that overtake his friends, or by bodily or mental miseries.

19. Hear, I shall recite to you the slokas which were chaunted by the high-souled Janaka of old on the subject of controlling the soul.

20. This world is afflicted with both bodily and mental sufferings. Listen to the means of allaying them as I indicate them both briefly and in detail.

21. Disease, contact with painful things; toil and want of objects desired,—these are the four causes of the sufferings of the body.

22. Disease may be allayed by the application of medicine, but mental ailments are cured by Yoga meditation.

23. Therefore, intelligent physicians first seek to allay the mental sufferings of their patients by agreeable conversations and by the offer of desirable objects.

24. As a hot iron ball makes the water of a jar hot, so mental grief brings in bodily pains.

25. As water quenches fire, so knowledge allays mental ailments. When mind enjoys peace, body also enjoys peace.

26. It appears attachment is the root of all mental agonies; it is attachment that makes every creature miserable and brings on every kind of woe.

27. Attachment is the root of all misery and of all fear. Attachment produces joy and grief of every kind.

28. From attachment spring all worldly desires, and it is from attachment that springs the love of worldly goods. Both of these are evils, but the first is worse than the second.

29. As fire in the hollow of a tree consumes the tree itself to its roots, so attachment, however little it may be, destroys both Dharma and Artha.

30. He, who has merely withdrawn from possessions, cannot be regarded as to have renounced the world. He, however, who remains in contact with the world, but sees its faults, may be said to have truly renounced the world. Such a man becomes freed from all evil passions, and his soul is dependent on nothing.

31. Therefore none should place his attachment on either friends or on wealth which he has earned. The attachment towards one's own body is destroyed by knowledge.

32. Like the lotus leaf which is never drenched by water, souls of those men who are capable of knowing the everlasting, and of men who are devoted to the pursuit of the eternal, learned in the Shatras and purified by knowledge, can never be touched by attachment.

33. The man that is influenced by attachment is tortured by desire, and from the desire that springs up in his heart, his thirst for worldly possessions increases.

34. This thirst is sinful, and is regarded as the source of all anxieties. It is this terrible thirst, fraught with sin, that leads to unrighteous acts.

35. Those men, who can renounce this thirst, which can never be renounced by the wicked, which decays not with the decay of the body and which is a fatal disease, can be freed from misery.

36. This thirst has neither beginning nor end. Like the fire of incorporeal origin, it destroys creatures by living within their hearts.

37. As a fagot of wood is consumed by the fire that is fed by that faggot, so a person of impure soul meets with destruction from the covetousness born in his own heart.

38. Creatures endued with life have always a dread of death; so men having wealth are in constant dread of the king, the water, the fire, the thief and his relatives.

39. If a piece of meat be in the air, it may be devoured by the birds, if it is on the grounds, it may be devoured by beasts of prey, and if in the water, by the fishes, so a man having wealth is exposed to dangers wherever he might be.

40. To many men, the wealth they possess is their bane. The man, who sees happiness in wealth and becomes attached to it, knows not what true happiness is.

41. Therefore, the accession of wealth is what increases covetousness and folly. It is the root of niggardliness, boastfulness, pride, fear and anxiety.

42—43. These are the miseries that wise men see in wealth. Men have to suffer infinite miseries in the acquisition and retention of wealth. Its expenditure also is painful. Sometimes men are even killed for the sake of wealth. To abandon wealth is painful; even those men who are cherished become enemies for the sake of wealth.

44. As the possession of wealth is fraught with such misery, one should not (at all) mind its loss. Ignorant men alone are discontented, but the wise men are always contented.

45. The thirst for wealth can never be assuaged. Contentment is the highest happiness, therefore the wise men consider contentment to be the highest object to attain.

46. The learned men, knowing youth, beauty, life, treasure, prosperity, and association with beloved ones to be (all) unstable, never covet them.

47. Therefore one should refrain from the acquisition of wealth, and thus avoid the sufferings of misery. The man of wealth can never be without dangers. For this reason virtuous men praise those who have no desire for wealth.

48. As regards those that acquire wealth for the virtuous purposes, it is better for them not to do it at all. It is better not to touch mud than to wash it off after being besmeared with it.

49. O Yudhishthira, you should not covet anything. It you want to acquire virtue, free yourself from all desires for the possession of wealth.

Yudhishthira said:—

50. O Brahmana, this my desire for wealth is not for the purpose of enjoying it when obtained. I do not desire it through avarice. I desire it only for the support of the Brahmanas.

51. O Brahmana, for what purpose would one like to lead a domestic life, if he cannot cherish and support those that follow him ?

52. All creatures are seen to divide their food amongst those that depend on them. So should a person leading a domestic life give a share of his food to Brahmacharis who have given up cooking.

53. The houses of good men can never be in want of grass, space, water and sweet words, the fourth.

54. Bed to the tired, seat to one who is fatigued by standing, water to one who is thirsty and food to one who is hungry should be always given.

55. Pleasant looks, cheerful heart and sweet words are due to a guest. Rising up, the host should advance towards the guest ; he should offer him a seat, and duly worship him. This is the eternal Dharma.

56—57. They who do not perform Agnihotra, they who do not wait upon bulls, and cherish their kinsmen, guest, friends, sons, wives and servants, for such negligence are consumed with sin. None should cook his food for himself, none should kill any animal for nothing. None should eat that food which is not duly dedicated.

58. By scattering morning and evening food on the earth for dogs, Chandalas and birds, a person should perform the Vishwadeva (sacrifice.)

59. He who eats Vighasa eats ambrosia. That, which remains after dedication in a sacrifice, is (also) regarded as ambrosia.

60. The pleasant looks (one casts on his guests), the attention he devotes to him, the sweet words with which he addresses him, the respect with which he follows him, and the food and drink with which he treats him, are the five Dakshinas in that sacrifice.

61. He, who gives food freely to a fatigued way-farer, whom he has never seen before, obtains great virtuous merit.

62. He, who leading domestic life, follows such practices, obtains, it is said, great religious merit. O Brahmana, what is your opinion ?

Saunaka said :—

63. Alas, alas, this world is full of contradictions! That which makes the good and the honest ashamed gratifies the wicked.

64. Moved by ignorance and passions, and becoming slaves to their senses, ignorant men perform many acts to gratify their stomachs and sexual organs.

65. Men are led astray by their seducing senses, as a charioteer who has lost his senses (is led astray) by wicked horses.

66. When any of the six senses finds its particular object, the desire springs up in the heart to enjoy that particular object.

67. Thus when one's mind proceeds to enjoy the objects of any particular sense, a wish is entertained ; that wish in its turn gives birth to a resolve.

68. As an insect falls into a flame from love of light, man falls into the fire of temptation, as it were pierced by (the arrows of the objects of enjoyments) which are discharged by the desire which is the seed of resolve.

69. Blinded by sensual pleasure which he freely seeks and steeped in dark ignorance and folly which he mistakes for happiness, he thenceforth knows not himself.

70—71. Like a wheel that is incessantly whirling, every creature, from ignorance, acts and desire, roves in various states in the world, wandering from one birth to another, ranging from Brahma to a blade of grass, and taking birth again and again now in water, now in earth and now in the sky.

72. This is the career of those that are without knowledge. Listen to that of the wise, the men who are intent on virtue and who are desirous of Moksha (emancipation).

73. This is the word of the Vedas,—act, but act with renunciation. Therefore you should act renouncing Abhimana.

74. Performances of sacrifices, study, gifts, penance, truth, forgiveness, subduing the senses and renunciation of desire,—these are the eight Dharmas declared by the Smriti.

75. Of these the first four pave the way to the regions of Pitris. Therefore it is the duty of all to act by renouncing Abhimana.

76. The last four are always observed by the pious who aspire to attain to the region of the celestials. The men of puré soul should observe these eight (paths).

77—79. Those, who wish to subdue the world for the purposes of salvation, should always act by fully renouncing all motives and by subduing their senses, rigidly observing vows, devotedly serving their preceptors, austere regulating their food, diligently studying the Vedas, renouncing action as mean and restraining their hearts. By renouncing desire and aversions, the celestials have obtained prosperity.

80. It is for the virtue of their wealth of Yoga, that the Rudras, the Sadhyas, the Adityas, the Vasus and the Aswinis support all these creatures (of the world).

81. O son of Kunti, O descendant of Bharata, therefore you too like them, entirely renouncing actions with motive, try to obtain success in Yoga and austerities.

82. You have already obtained success as far as your debts to the Pitris, both male and female are concerned, and you have obtained that success also which is derived from action. Try now to obtain success in penances in order to support the Brahmanas.

83. Those that are crowned with ascetic success can by virtue of that success do whatever they like. Therefore practising asceticism, realise all your wishes.

Thus ends the second chapter, the Pandava's reflections, in the Aranyaka of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER III.

(ARANYAKA PARVA).—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having been thus addressed by Saunaka, the son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, coming to his priest, thus spoke to him in the midst of his brothers.

Yudhisthira said :—

2. The Brahmanas, learned in the Vedas, are following me who am departing. Afflicted with many calamities, I am unable to support them.

3. I cannot forsake them, but I have no power to provide them with their sustenance. O exalted one, tell me what should be now done by me.

Vaishampayana said :—

4. After reflecting for a moment to seek out the (proper) course by the help of his Yoga prowess, that foremost of all virtuous men, Dhaumya, thus spoke to Yudhisthira.

Dhaumya said :—

5. In the days of yore, all living beings that had been created were greatly afflicted with hunger. Thereupon Savita (sun) took compassion on them, as a father (does to his children).

6. Going to the Northern declension, the sun drew up water by his rays, and then coming back to the Southern declension and having centered his heat in himself, he stayed over the earth.

7. While the sun so stayed, the lord of the vegetable world (moon), converting the effects of the sun's heat (vapours), created the clouds.

8. Thus it is the sun himself who, being drenched by the lunar influence, is transformed from the sprouting of seeds into holy vegetables furnished with the six tastes. It is this which constitutes the food of all creatures on earth.

9. Thus the food which supports the lives of creatures is the sun, and therefore he is the father of all creatures. Therefore take shelter in him.

10. All illustrious kings of noble birth and great deeds are known to have delivered their people by practising high asceticism.

11. Bhaumya, Kartavirja, Vainya and Nahusa all protected their subjects from dangers by virtue of ascetic meditation and vows.

12. Therefore, O descendant of Bharata, O virtuous one, as you are purified by acts, you too, like them, support virtuously the Brahmanas by entering upon a life of austerities.

Janamejaya said :—

13. How does, for the sake of the Brahmanas, that foremost of the Kurus, king Yudhisthira, worshipped the sun of wonderful appearance ?

Vaishampayana said :—

14. O king, (first) purify yourself and (then) withdrawing your mind from all (the worldly) objects, (at that appointed hour) hear it with all attention. O king of kings, appoint a time. I shall (then) tell you every thing in detail.

15. O high souled one, listen to the one hundred and eight names (of the sun), as they were told by Dhaumya to the greatly illustrious son of Pritha (Yudhisthira).

Dhaumya said :—

16—27. Surya, Arjama, Bhaga, Tasta, Pusha, Arka, Savita, Ravi, Gabhastiman, Aja, Kala, Mrityu, Dhata, Probhakara, Prithivi, Apa, Teja, Kha, Vayu, Parayana, Soma, Vrihaspati, Sukra, Budha, Angaraka, Indra, Vivaswana, Diptangsu, Suchi, Souri, Sanaichara, Brahma, Vishnu, Rudra, Skanda, Vaisravana, Yama, Vaidyutagni, Jatharagni, Aindhana, Tejaspati, Dharmadhwa, Vedakarta, Vedanga, Vedavahana, Krita, Treta, Dwapara, Kali, Kala, Kastha, Muhurta, Kshapa, Yama, Kshana, Samvatsarakara, Aswatha, Kalachakra, Bibhabasu, Purusha, Saswata, Yogin, Vyakta, Avyakta, Sanatana, Kaladhyaksha, Projadhokshya, Vishwakarman, Tamanooda, Varuna, Sagara, Ansa, Jimuta, Jivana, Ariha, Bhutasraya, Bhutapati, Srasta, Samvartaka, Vanhi, Sarvyadi, Alolupa, Ananta, Kapila, Bhanu, Kamaprada, Sat-vatamukha; Jaya, Visala, Varada, Manas, Suparna, Bhutadi, Sighraga, Pranadharna, Dhanwantari, Dhumaketu, Adideva, Aditi-suta, Dwadasatma, Arabindaksha, Pitri, Matri, Pitamaha, Swargadara, Projadvara, Mokshadara, Prasanatma, Viswatma, Vishwatamukha, Characharatman, Sukshatma and the merciful Maitra.

28. These are the one hundred and eight names of immeasurably effulgent Surya as told by the self-created (Brahma).

29. O Bhaskara (sun), who blazes like gold or fire, who is worshipped by the celestials, the Pitris, the Yakshas, and who is adored by Asuras, Nishacharas, and Siddhas, I bow to you for the acquisition of prosperity."

30. He who recites with fixed attention this hymn at sunrise, obtains wife, offspring, riches, and the memory of his former existence. Men always get patience and memory (by reciting it).

31. Let a man, concentrating his mind, recite this hymn of the foremost of gods (the sun). He will be proof against grief, forest-fire and ocean; and he will obtain every object of desire as he will wish for.

Vaishampayana said:—

32—33. Having, heard these words uttered by Dhaumya suitable to the occasion, Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira), moved by the desire of supporting the Brahmanas of controlled and pure souls and of austere vows, began to observe excellent asceticism. Worshipping the sun with flowers and other articles,

34. And turning his face towards the lord of day (the sun), he bathed in the water. That virtuous minded man became rapt in Yoga, living on air and becoming a victor over his passions.

35. Purifying himself with the touch of the Ganges water, and restraining his speech, he practised Pranayama (one of the processes of Yoga) for some time, and he then recited this hymn of praise.

Yudhisthira said:—

36. O sun, you are the eye of the universe. You are the soul of all corporeal existences. You are the creative organ of all things. You are the acts of all religious men.

37. You are the refuge of all Shankhyas (the followers of Sankhya philosophy) and you are the support of all Yogins (the followers of Yoga philosophy). You are the door with bolts unfastened, you are the refuge of men aspiring to salvation.

38. You support the world, you make it manifest; you purify it and support it from compassion.

39. The Brahmanas, learned in the Vedas, adore you by coming to you in proper time, and by reciting the hymns from the respective branches (of the Vedas what each of them follows). You are the adored of the Rishis.

40. The Sidhyas, the Charanas, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas, the Guhakas and the Nagas, being desirous of obtaining boons, follow your moving celestial car.

41. Thirty three gods, with Upendra (Vishnu) and Mohendra (Indra) and the Vaimanikas (an order of celestials) have all attained success by worshipping you.

42. By offering you garlands of the celestial Mandaras (celestial flowers), the best of the Vidyadharas have obtained all their desires.

43. The Guhyas and the seven orders of the Pitris,—both divine and human,—have attained superiority by adoring you.

44. The Vasus, the Marutas, the Rudras the Saddhyas, the Marichipas, the Valkhilyas, and the Siddhas have (all) attained prominence by bowing to you.

45. There is nothing that I know in the whole of the seven worlds including that of Brahma which is beyond you.

46. There are other beings both powerful and great, but none of them possesses lustre and prowess as you do.

47. All light is in you. You are the lord of all light. In you are the elements, you are the knowledge, and you are all the ascetic properties.

48. The discus, by which the wielder of the Saranga (the bow of Vishnu) humble the pride of the Asuras and which is furnished with a beautiful nave, was made by Vishwakarma with your effulgence.

49. You draw by your rays moisture from all corporeal existences, and from plants and liquid substances in summer. You pour it down (on the earth as rain) in the rainy season.

50. Your rays are warm, and they scorch (things). Becoming clouds they roar and flash with lightning; they pour down showers when the season comes.

51. Neither fire, nor shelter, nor woollen blankets give greater comfort to one in cold than what is got from your rays.

52. You illuminate by your rays the whole earth with her thirteen islands. You alone are (ever) engaged in doing good to the three worlds.

53. If you do not rise, the universe becomes blind. The learned men cannot employ themselves in the attainment of Dharma, Artha and Kama.

54. It is through your grace that the Brahmanas, Kshatryas and Vaisyas are able to perform Adhana, Pashabandha, Ishti, Mantra, Yajona and Tapakrya (names of various duties, sacrifices and vows.)

55. Those that know all about the Time say that you are the beginning and the end of one Brahma-day which consists of full one thousand Yugas.

56. You are the lord of the Manus, of the sons of Manus, of the universe, of mankind, of the Manwantaras and of all lords.

57. When the time for final dissolution comes, the Samvartaka fire, born of your anger, only exists and reduces the three worlds to ashes.

58. Clouds of various colors, born of your rays, accompanied by Airavata (Indra's elephant) and the thunder, produce the appointed deluges.

59. Dividing yourself into twelve parts and becoming as many suns, you then drink up the ocean with your rays.

60. You are called Indra, you are Vishnu, you are Rudra, (you are) Prajapati, you are fire, you are the subtle mind, you are the lord and the eternal Brahma.

61. You are Hansa, you are Savitri, you are Vanu, Aungsumali, Vrisakapi, Vivaswama, Mihira, Pusha, Mitra, and Dharma.

62. You are thousand-rayed sun, you are Tapana, the lord of rays. You are Martanda, Arka, Ravi, Surya, Saranga, the maker of the day,

63. Divakara, Saptasasti, Dhumakeshin, Virochana, Ashugami, Tamagna, and Haritashwa,

64. He who reverentially worships you on the sixth or the seventh lunar day with humility of mind obtains the grace of Lashkmi (goddess of wealth.)

65. Those that adore and worship you with undivided attention are delivered from all dangers, agonies, and afflictions.

66. Those that believe you in every thing becoming freed from all disease and all sins, grow happy in all their life.

67. O lord of all food, you should grant me abundance of food to entertain all my guests with reverence.

68—69. I bow to all your followers that have taken your feet,—(namely) Mathura, Aruna, Danda, and others including Asani, Kshava and others. I also bow to the celestial mothers of all creatures, namely Kshava and Maitri and to the others of the class. Let them deliver me who am suppliant (at their feet).

Vaishampayana said :—

70. Thereupon the sun became gratified and that maker of day, self-luminous and blazing like fire, appeared before the Pandava (Yudhisthira).

The Sun said :—

71. You shall get all that you desire to have. I shall provide you with food for all the twelve years (of your exile).

72—73. O king, accept this copper vessel that I present you. O man of excellent vows, so long the Panchala Princess (Draupadi) will hold this vessel without partaking of its contents,—fruits, roots, meat and vegetables, cooked in your kitchen,—the four kinds of food,—shall from this day be (there) inexhaustible. You shall regain your kingdom on the fourteenth year from this.

Vaishampayana said :—

74. Having said this, the deity (Sun) then and there vanished away. He, who with the desire of obtaining a boon, recites this hymn concentrating his mind with ascetic abstraction, obtains it from the sun, however difficult of acquisition it may be.

75—76. A man or a woman that recites or hears this hymn day after day,—if he or she is desirous of a son, obtains one ; if desirous of wealth, obtains it ; and if desirous of learning, obtains it. The man or woman who always reads it in the two twilights (early morning and evening)

77. Is delivered from danger and is freed from the bonds. This hymn was given of old to the high-souled Sakra.

78. From Sakra it was obtained by Narada, and from Narada by Dhaumya. Receiving it from Dhaumya, Yudhisthira obtained all that he desired.

79. It is by the virtue of this hymn one may win victory in a war and acquire immense wealth. Making one freed from all sins, it leads a man to the region of the sun.

80. The virtuous son of Kunti (Yudhisthira), having obtained the boon, rose from the water. He then took hold of Dhaumya's feet, and then embraced his brothers.

81. O lord, the Pandava (Yudhisthira), going to the kitchen with Draupadi and being durly worshipped by her, began to cook food.

82. The food, however little that was cooked,—becoming four kinds,—increased and became inexhaustible. With them he (Yudhisthira) fed the Brahmanas.

83. After the Brahmanas had been fed and his younger brothers also, Yudhisthira himself ate the food that remained and which was called Vighasa.

84. After Yudhisthira had partaken his food, the daughter of Prisata (Draupadi) took what remained. After Draupadi had taken her meal, the food became exhausted.

85. The lord (Yudhisthira), as resplendent as the sun, thus obtaining the boon from the sun, entertained the Brahmanas agreeably to their wishes.

86. Obedient to his priest, he performed sacrifices with due Mantras and according to the ordinances and Shastras on auspicious lunar days, constellations and conjunctions.

87. Thereupon the Pandavas, blessed by the auspicious rites and accompanied by Dhaumya and surrounded by the Brahmanas, set out for the forest of Kamyaka.

Thus ends the third chapter, Pandavas' departure for the Kamyaka, in the Aranyaka of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER IV.

(ARANYAKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. After the departure of the Pandavas to the forest, the son of Amvika (Dhritarastra) whose knowledge was his eye, became exceedingly sorrowful. The king, seated at his ease, thus spoke to the virtuous-minded and highly intelligent Vidura.

Dhritarastra said:—

2. Your intelligence is as great as that of Bhargava (Sukra); you know all the subtleties of holy Dharma. You look on all the Kurus with an equal eye. Tell me what is good for me and for them (the Kurus.)

3. O Vidura, things having taken this course, what should be done by us? How can we secure the adoration of the citizens? How can we avoid the danger of total annihilation? Tell us (what we should do), for you are conversant with all excellent expedients.

Vidura said:—

4. O king, Trivarga (Dharma, Artha, and Kama) has its foundation on virtue, and the sages say that a kingdom also stands on virtue as its basis. O king, therefore cherish with virtue and to your best power your own sons and those of Pandu.

5. Virtue was destroyed by the wicked souls (the Kuru princes) with Suvala's son (Sakuni) at their head when your sons invited the virtuous Yudhisthira to play and defeated him at dice.

6. I see this expiation of this deed of utter iniquity. O chief of the Kurus, your son (Duryodhana) may win by it a position among good men.

7. Let the Pandavas have what was given to them by you. The highest morality is that a king should remain content with his own and never covet the possessions of others.

8. Your good name would not then suffer; family dissensions would not then ensue; you will have then no unrighteousness. This is your first duty,—(namely) to gratify the Pandavas and to disgrace Sakuni.

9. O king, if you wish to restore to your sons the good fortune they have lost, then speedily act as I say. O king, if you do not act thus, the Kurus will be soon destroyed.

10—11. For neither Bhimasena, nor Aryuna, if angry, will leave any of their enemies unslain. What is there in the world which is unattainable to those who count amongst their warriors Sabhyasachi Arjuna, well-skilled in war, who possesses the Uruma diva, the most powerful of all weapons in the world, and who have the mighty Bhishma warrior.

12. I told you formerly as soon as your son was born, "Abandon this unrighteous child of yours. The curse of you lies in it (abandoning)." But you did not accept my advice. If you did, I advised you to do, you would not have repented.

13. If your sons were to reign jointly in peace with the sons of Pandu, you will then pass your days in happiness and you shall not have to repent.

14. Having asked Duryodhana, install the son of Pandu (Yudhisthira) in the sovereignty, and Yudhisthira, who is free from sin, shall rule the earth virtuously.

15. O king, the monarchs of the world, the Kshatriyas will pay homage to Yudhisthira, the Brahmins, the Kshatriyas, the Vaishyas will pay homage to Yudhisthira, the Sudras will obey Duryodhana, Sakuni, and Bhishma (Dhritarastra) gladly wait upon the Pandavas.

16. O king, Dushasana ask pardon of Yudhisthira and of the daughter of Drupada (Draupadi) in open court. After pacifying Yudhisthira,—place him on the throne with all respects. O king, asked by you, what else can I advise? If you do this, you will do what is proper.

Dhritarastra said :—

17. O Vidura, the words you have spoken in this assembly with reference to the Pandavas and myself are for their and not for our good. My mind does not approve them.

18. How have you settled all this in your mind? When you have spoken all this on behalf of the Pandavas, I perceive you are not at all friendly to me. How can I forsake my son for the sake of the sons of Pandu?

19. There is no doubt they (the Pandavas) too are my sons, but Duryodhana has sprung from my (own) body. Speaking impartially how will you advise me to renounce my own body for the sake of others?

20. Vidura, though I hold you in great esteem, (yet I must say) all that you have said is crooked. Stay (here) or go (away) as you please. However an unchaste wife is humoured, she forsakes her husband.

Vaishampayana said :—

21. O king, having said this, Dhritarastra suddenly rose and went into the inner apartments. Saying "this race is doomed," Vidura (also) went away where the sons of Pritha were.

Thus ends the fourth chapter, the words of Vidura, in the Aranyaka of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER V.

(ARANYAKA PARVA) Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Being desirous of living in the forest, those foremost men of the Bharata race, the sons of Pandu, went with their followers from the banks of the Ganges to the Kurukshetra.

2. Performing their ablutions in the Saraswati, the Drisadvati and the Yamuna, they went from one forest to another travelling in an westerly direction.

3. Then (at last) they saw before them the forest of Kamyaka on the banks of Saraswati, and on a level and wild plain which was ever charming to the ascetics.

4. O descendant of Bharata, entertained and comforted by the Munis, there did they live in that forest abounding in birds and animals.

5. Vidura, ever longing to see the Pandavas, went (alone) in a single car to the forest of Kamyaka abounding in every good thing.

6. Thereupon going to the Kamyaka forest on a car drawn by swift horses, he saw Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) at a retired part (of the forest) sitting with Draupadi and surrounded by his brothers and the Brahmanas.

7. Thereupon seeing Vidura coming in speed, the virtuous king spoke thus to his brother Bhimasena, "With what message Khattwa (Vidura) comes to us?"

8. Does he come here, having been despatched by the son of Suvala (Sakuni) to invite us again to a game at dice? Does the mean-minded Sakuni desire to win our weapons by playing again at dice?

9. O Bhimasena, if challenged by one who says "Come," I am unable to stay, if our possessions of the Gandiva (bow) be doubtful,—then the acquisition of our kingdom again will be (equally) doubtful."

10. Then the Pandavas all rose up and welcomed Vidura with all respects. Received by them, that descendant of Ajamira (Vidura) sat in their midst and made to the sons of Pandu the usual enquiries.

11. After Vidura had taken some rest, those foremost of men (the Pandavas) asked him the reason of his coming and he related to them in detail everything with regard to the conduct of the son of Amvika, Dhritarastra.

Vidura said :—

12. O Ajatasatru, Dhritarastra summoned me, his dependent,—and honouring me duly, he said, "Things have thus fared. Tell me what is good for me as well as for them (the Pandavas)."

13. I told him what was good for the Kurus and for Dhritarastra. But he did not relish what I said. I did not consider any other course to the beneficial.

14. O Pandavas, what I advised was highly beneficial, but the son of Amvika, (Dhritarastra), did not care to accept it. As medicine is not acceptable to a man who is ill, so my advice failed to please the king.

15. O Ajatasatru, as an unchaste wife of a man of noble birth can never be brought back to the path of virtue, (so is the case with Dhritarastra). As a young damsel does not certainly like a husband of sixty years, so that foremost of Bharata race did not like my words.

16. O king, the destruction of the Kurus is certain; Dhritarastra will never meet with good fortune. As water dropped on a lotus leaf does not remain there, so my counsels failed to have any effect on him.

17. Thereupon angry Dhritarastra told me saying, "O descendant of Bharata, go away wherever you like. I shall never more seek your aid in ruling the earth or in ruling the city."

18. O ruler of men, having been (thus) abandoned by the king Dhritarastra, I have come to you for giving you good counsel. What I said in the Sabha I shall now repeat to you. Hear and bear them in mind.

19. That wise man, who patiently bearing all the wrongs done to him by his enemies, bides his time and multiplies his resources by degrees as a man makes a small fire a large one, rules alone this entire earth.

20. O king, he who enjoys his wealth with his adherents finds them sharers of his adversity. This is the best means of securing adherents. It is said he that has adherents wins the sovereignty of the whole world.

21. O son of Pandu, share your wealth with your adherents; behave truthfully towards them and talk with them agreeably. Share also your food with them, and never boast in their presence. This conduct increases the prosperity of kings.

Yudhisthira said:—

22. Having the aid of such intelligence (as yours), undisturbed by passion as you advise in respect of time and place, I will carefully and entirely follow (your advice).

Thus ends the fifth chapter, the exile of Vidura, in the Aranyaka of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER VI.

(ARANYAKA PARVA) Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. O king, O descendant of Bharata, after Vidura had gone to the hermitage of the Pandavas, the greatly wise Dhritarastra repented for his actions.

2—3. Remembering the great intelligence of Vidura in war and in peace, and thinking of the future prosperity of the Pandavas, he (Dhritarastra), having been pained at the recollection of Vidura, and having come to the door of the Assembly-Hall, fell down senseless in the presence of the kings.

4. Regaining consciousness, the king rose from the ground and spoke thus to Sanjaya who was standing by.

Dhritarastra said:—

5. My brother and my friend (Vidura) is like the God of Justice himself. Remembering him, my heart burns in grief.

6. Go bring to me soon my brother, learned in the precepts of morality.

Vaishampayana said:—

Saying this, the king wept bitterly.

7. Burning in repentance and being overwhelmed with sorrow at the recollection of Vidura, the king, from the brotherly love again spoke to Sanjaya thus.

Dhritarastra said:—

8. O Sanjaya, go and ascertain whether my brother, Vidura, expelled by my wretched self through anger, still lives or not.

9—10. That greatly wise and immeasurably intelligent brother of mine has never done me the slightest wrong. It is that greatly wise man who has suffered wrong at my hands. O Sanjaya, seek him and bring him here, or else I shall not live.

Vaishampayana said:—

11. Having heard these words of the king, Sanjaya respectfully approved them, and saying "Be it so", he set out for the Kamyaka (forest).

12—13. He soon arrived at the forest where were the Pandavas. He saw Yudhisthira, clad in deer skin, guarded by his brothers and seated with Vidura and thousands of Brahmanas, like Purandara (Indra) in the midst of the celestials.

14. Coming to Yudhisthira, Sanjaya duly worshipped him. He was received with due respect by Bhima, Arjuna and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva).

15. He was asked by the king about the welfare of all. When he was comfortably seated, he told the reason of his coming in these words.

Sanjaya said:—

16. O Vidura, the son of Amvika, king Dhritarastra, has remembered you. Returning soon, revive that king.

17. O descendant of Kuru, O excellent one, with the permission of these best of men, the Pandavas, you should at the command of that lion among kings (Dhritarastra) return to him.

Vaishampayana said:—

18. Having been thus addressed, the intelligent Vidura, ever attached to his relatives, returned to Hastinapur with the permission of Yudhisthira.

19. The greatly powerful and energetic Dhritarastra thus spoke to him, "O virtuous man, O sinless one, by good luck alone I have got you. By good luck alone, you have remembered me.

20. O best of the Bharata race, I was sleepless through the day and through the night. I was suing myself as one that has been lost on earth.

21. He then took Vidura on his lap and smelt his head. He said, "O sinless one, forgive me for the words that I spoke to you.

Vidura said :—

22. O king, I have forgiven you. You are my Guru (superior), worthy of my highest respect. I have speedily come here, being eagerly desirous of seeing you.

23. O best of men, all virtuous men are partial to those that are distressed. O king, this is scarcely the result of deliberations.

24. O descendant of Bharata, your sons are as dear to me as those of Pandu. But as they are now in distress, my mind yawns for them.

Vaishampayana said :—

25. Addressing each other thus in apologetic words, the two illustrious brothers, Vidura and Dhritarastra, became greatly happy.

Thus ends the sixth chapter, the returning of Vidura in the Aranyaka of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER VII.

(ARANYAKA PARVA).—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having heard that Vidura had returned, and he has been consoled by the king, the wicked-minded son of Dhritarastra (Duryodhana) began to burn in grief.

2. His intelligence, (fully) clouded by ignorance, he summoned the son of Suvala (Sakuni), Karna and Dushashana and thus spoke to them.

Duryodhana said :—

3. The intelligent minister of Dhritarastra (Vidura) has returned. The learned Vidura is the friend of the sons of Pandu and he is ever engaged in doing good to them.

4. So long Vidura does not succeed to induce him (Dhritarastra) to bring back the Pandavas, let us think what may benefit us.

5. If ever I see the sons of Pritha (the Pandavas) returned to the city,—I shall again be emaciated by abandoning food and drink.

6. I shall either take poison or hang myself ; (I shall) either enter a pyre or kill myself with my own weapon. I shall not be able to see (endure) their (the Pandavas') prosperity.

Sakuni said :—

7. O king, O ruler of the world, what folly has taken possession of you ? They have gone (to the forest) after making a pledge. Therefore what you fear can never take place.

8. O best of the Bharata race, all the Pandavas follow the path of truth. They will never accept your father's words.

9. If however they accept them (the words of your father) and again come to the city, violating their vow,—this will be our conduct.

10. Assuming an aspect of neutrality and in apparent obedience to the will of the king (Dhritarastra), we, keeping our counsels to ourselves, will closely watch the Pandavas.

Dushashana said :—

11. O greatly intelligent uncle, it is exactly as you say. The words of wisdom you utter always recommend themselves to me.

Karna said :—

12. O Duryodhana, all of us seek to accomplish your wish. O king, I observe unanimity of opinion amongst us all.

13. These self-controlled men (the Pandavas) will never return without living (in the exile) the promised period. If however they come from confusion, defeat them again at dice.

Vaishampayana said :—

14. Having been thus addressed by Karna, king Duryodhana with a less heart turned his face (from them).

15—16. Marking all this, Karna expanding his beautiful eyes and vehemently moving his arms and limbs, spoke, thus in great anger to Dushashana, to the son of Suvala (Sakuni) and to him (Duryodhana) " O rulers of land, know what is my opinion.

17. We all wait with joined hands like the servants of the king (Duryodhana). We must do what is agreeable to him. But we are not always able to seek his welfare with promptness and activity.

18. Let us now, attired in our armours and armed with our weapons, mount on our chariot and go in a body to kill the Pandavas now living in the forest.

19. When they (the Pandavas) will be rooted out and when they will go to the unknown journey, both ourselves and the sons of Dhritarastra will be in (eternal) peace.

20. As long as they are in distress, as long as they are in sorrow, and as long as they are destitute of allies and friends, so long we will be able to destroy them. This is my opinion."

21. Having heard his these words, they repeatedly applauded him, and they all replied to the Suta's son (Karna) saying "Be it so."

22. Having said this, each of them being full of hopes of success separately mounted their chariots. They then started in a body with the resolve of killing the Pandavas.

23. Knowing by his spiritual eyes that they had gone away (to kill the Pandavas), that lord, the pure-souled Krishna Dwipayana (Vyasa), came.

24. The illustrious lord, ever worshipped by all the world, commanded them to stop. He then soon appeared before the king whose knowledge was his eye sitting at his ease.

Thus ends the seventh chapter, the arrival of Vyasa, in the Aranyaka of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER VIII.

(ARANYAKA PARVA)—Continued.

Vyasa said :—

1. O greatly wise Dhritarastra, hear my words. I shall tell you what will be the great good of all the Kurus.

2. O mighty-armed hero, it has not pleased me that the Pandavas have gone to the forest, having been dishonestly defeated by Duryodhana and others.

3. O descendant of Bharata, on the expiration of the thirteenth year, recollecting all their woes, they may shower virulent poisons on the Kurus.

4. Why does your wicked-minded and sinful son angrily want to kill the Pandavas for the sake of the kingdom?

5. Let the fool be checked; let your son remain quiet. In attempting to kill them (the Pandavas) now living in the forest, he will lose his own life.

6. You are as pious as the wise Vidura, Bhishma, myself, Kripa or Drona.

7. O greatly intelligent man, dissension with relatives is improper. It is sinful and reprehensible. O king, you should desist from it.

8. O descendant of Bharata, he (Duryodhana) looks towards the Pandavas with such jealousy that unless you interfere, great harm will be the consequence.

9—10. Or let this wicked son of yours go to the forest alone and unaccompanied. O king, O lord of men, if the Pandavas, from association with him, feel an attachment for your son, then good fortune will be yours.

11. O great king, it has been heard that a man's nature derived from his birth does not leave him till death.

12. What do Bhishma, Drona, and Vidura think? What do you think? What is proper should be done at once, else your purposes will ever remain unrealised.

Thus ends the eighth chapter, the words of Vyasa in the Aranyaka of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER IX.

(ARANYAKA PARVA) Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. O illustrious one, I did not like this business of gambling. O Rishi, I think I was made to give my consent having been drawn by Fate.

2. Neither Bhishma, nor Drona, nor Vidura, nor Gandhari, liked this game of dice. There is no doubt it was begot by Moha (delusion).

3. O illustrious one, O (Rishi), who delights in observing vows, knowing every thing, but yet for the sake of paternal love I was unable to abandon the senseless Duryodhana.

Vyasa said :—

4. O king, O son of Vichitravirja, what you say is right. We too know it for certain that the son is the greatest of all things. There is nothing greater than the son.

5. Instructed by the Suravi (celestial cow), Indra came to know that the son surpasses in worth other valuable possessions.

6. O king, I shall relate to you in this connection that excellent and best of stories, —the conversation between Indra and Suravi.

7. O king, O child, in the days of yore Suravi, the mother of cows, was once weeping in the celestial regions. Indra took compassion on her.

Indra said :—

8. O blessed one, why do you weep? Is everything well with the celestials? Has any misfortune, however so little, befallen on the world of men or of the Nagas.

Suravi said :—

9. O lord of heaven, I do not see any evil that has befallen you. I am agrieved on account of my son. O Vasava, therefore I weep.

10--11. O chief of the gods, O lord of the celestials, see the (your) cruel husband-man belabouring my weak son with the wooden stick, and oppressing him with the stick, for which my son is afflicted with agony and he is falling on the ground and is at the point of death. I am filled with compassion and my mind is agitated.

12. One of those (in the plough) is the stronger (of the pair) and bears his burden of greater weight (with ease), but the other (my son) is lean, and weak and but a mass of veins and arteries.

13. O Vasava, he bears his burden with difficulty. Therefore, I am weeping. Being whipped again and again and harassed exceedingly,

14. O Vasava, look, he is unable to bear the burden. Therefore, afflicted with grief for his sake, I weep in agony; and tears of sorrow roll down my eyes.

Indra said :—

15. O handsome one, thousands of your sons are oppressed (all over the world), why do you then grieve for one who is under inflictions?

Suravi said :—

16. Though I have thousands of offspring, yet my affection flows equally towards them all. But, O Sakra, I feel greater compassion for one who is weak and honest.

Vyasa said :—

17. Having heard the words of Suravi, Indra was much surprised. O descendant of Kuru, he became convinced that a son is dearer than one's own life.

18. Thereupon the illustrious chastiser of Paka (Indra) suddenly poured a very great shower of rains. Thus he caused obstruction to the husbandman's work.

19. O king, as Suravi said, your affection flows equally towards all your sons.

Let it be greater towards those that are weak.

20. O son, as my son Pandu is to me, so are you and also greatly wise Vidura. It is out of affection I tell you all this.

21. O descendant of Bharata, you possess one hundred and one children. Pandu has only five. They are in misery, and they are greatly afflicted.

22. "How might they save their lives how might they thrive?" Such thoughts about the distressed sons of Pritha make me agrieved.

23. O king, if you wish to keep all the Kurus alive, let your son Duryodhana make peace with the Pandavas.

Thus ends the ninth chapter, the anecdote of Suravi, in the Aranyaka of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER X.

(ARANYAKA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. O greatly intelligent Rishi, it is exactly as you say. I know it well, as do all these kings.

2. O Rishi, what you consider beneficial for the Kurus was pointed out to me by Vidura, Bhishma and Drona.

3. If I deserve your grace and if you have kindness for the Kurus, then teach my wicked son Duryodhana (to be good).

Vyasa said :—

4. O king, after having seen the Pandava brothers, there comes the illustrious Rishi Maitreya with the desire of seeing us.

5. O king, this great Rishi will admonish your son Duryodhana for the sake of the welfare of this race.

6. O descendant of Kuru, what he will advise should be done without any hesitation, for if what he will recommend is not done, the Rishi will curse your son in anger.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Having said this, Vyasa went away, and Maitreya came there. The king with his sons received with all respect.

8. That way-worn chief of the Rishis, by offering him Arghya and performing other rites. The son of Amvika, king Dhritarastra, then asked him these questions.

Dhritarastra said :—

9. O illustrious one, has your journey from the Kurujangal been a pleasant one? Are the heroes, the five Pandava brothers, living happily (there)?

10. Do those foremost (heroes) of the Kuru race intend to pass all the time (they have pledged?) Will the brotherly affection of the Kurus remain unimpaired?

Maitreya said :—

11. Setting out on a pilgrimage, I arrived at the Kurujangala. I suddenly met there Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) in the forest of Kamyaka.

12. Attiring himself in deer skin and wearing matted locks, he is living in the forest in asceticism. O lord, many Rishis have assembled there to see him.

13. O great king, it was there that I heard of the grave errors that your sons have committed, and also of the (approaching) calamity and fearful danger that have arisen from gambling.

14. Therefore, I have come to you for the good of the Kurus. O lord, my affection for you is great, and I am always pleased with you.

15. O king, when yourself and Bhishma are (still) alive, it is not proper that your sons should quarrel amongst themselves.

16. O king, you are (as it were) the stake at which bulls are tied. You are competent to punish and reward. Why do you then overlook this great evil that is about to overtake all?

17. O descendant of Kuru, O king, as these wrongs have been perpetrated in your Sabha,—wrongs that are like the acts of thieves,—you cannot shine in the assembly of ascetics.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. Thereupon turning to the angry Duryodhana, the illustrious Rishi Maitreya spoke to him thus in soft words.

Maitreya said :—

19. O mighty-armed Duryodhana, O best of all eloquent men, O blessed one, listen to the words I utter for your good.

20. O king, do not quarrel with the Pandavas. O best of men, thus accomplish the good of your own, of the Pandavas, of the Kurus and of all the world.

21. All these foremost of men (the Pandavas) are heroes of great prowess in war. They are endued with strength of ten thousand elephants; their bodies are as hard as the thunder.

22. They are all truthful and proud of their manliness. They have killed the enemies of the celestials, the Rakshasas, who are able to assume any form at will;

23—24. (The Rakshasas) such as were headed by Hidimba, Vaka, and Kirmira. When departing from this place, he (Kirmira) of fearful soul obstructed in the night the path of those high-souled ones like an immovable hill, that foremost of all strong men, Bhima, ever delighting in fight,

25. Killed him like a beast, as a tiger kills a small deer. O king, see how Bhima, when out for conquest, killed

26. The great bow-man Jarasandha who possessed the strength of ten thousand elephants. Related (as they are) with Vasudeva (Krishna) and having sons of Prisata (Drupada) as their brothers-in-law,

27. Who is there such a hero who being subject to old age and death will cope with them? O best of the Bharata race, let there be peace between you and the Pandavas. Follow my advice; surrender not yourself to danger.

Vaishampayana said :—

28. O king, having been thus addressed by Maitreya, Duryodhana slapped his thigh which resembled the trunk of an elephant, and he then smilingly began to scratch the ground with his foot.

29—30. That wicked wretch (Duryodhana) did not speak a word, but he hung down his head. O king, seeing Duryodhana thus offer an insult to him by silently scratching the earth (by his foot), Maitreya became angry. That best of Rishis, Maitreya, overwhelmed with anger,

31. And, as if commissioned by Fate set his mind to curse him. Thereupon touching water, and with eyes red in anger,

32. Maitreya cursed the evil-minded son of Dhritarastra, saying, "Since slighting my words you decline to follow my advice, you shall soon reap the fruit of your this insolence.

33. In the great war which will spring out of the wrongs perpetrated by you (on the Pandavas) the mighty Bhima shall smash your that thigh with a blow of his club."

34. When the Rishi had thus spoken, the ruler of earth, Dhritarastra, began to gratify the Rishi, so that what he had said may not happen.

Maitreya said :—

35. O king, if your son make peace (with the Pandavas) then, O child, my curse will not take effect. Otherwise it would.

Vaishampayana said :—

36. The king of kings, the father of Duryodhana (Dhritarastra), thus averting the curse, asked Maitreya (to tell him) how Kirmira had been killed by Bhima,

Maitreya said :—

37. I shall not again speak to you as my words are not accepted by your son. When I shall go away, Vidura will tell you all.

Vaishampayana said :—

38. Having said this, Maitreya went away whence he came. Duryodhana (also) went away much agitated by the thought of the death of Kirmira.

Thus ends the tenth chapter, the words of Maitreya, in the Aranyaka of Vana Prava.

CHAPTER XI.

(KIRMIRA BADHA PARVA.)

Dhritarastra said :—

1. O Khattwa, I desire to hear (the account) of the destruction of Krimira. Tell me how the encounter between Bhimasena and the Rakshasa (Krimira) took place.

Vidura said :—

2. Hear that feat of Bhimasena of super-human deeds. I have heard of it in my conversation with them.

3. O king of kings, having been defeated at dice, the Pandavas departed from this place. Travelling for three days and three nights, they arrived at a forest, called Kamyaka.

4. O king, after the dreadful hours of midnight were passed and when all nature fell asleep, then man-eating Rakshashas of fearful deeds began to wander.

5. (Therefore) the ascetics, the cowherds and other rangers of forest used to shun that forest for the fear of the cannibals.

6. O descendant of Bharata, as they (the Pandavas) were entering that forest, a fearful Rakshasha with flaming eyes stood before them with a lighted brand and obstructed their path.

7. With out-stretched arms and terrible face he stood obstructing the way, on which those perpetrators of the Kuru race (the Pandavas) were proceeding.

8. With his eight teeth stretching out, with his copper-coloured eyes, with the hair of his head blazing and standing erect, he looked like a mass of clouds, mingled with the rays of the sun, charged with lightning, and adorned with a flock of cranes (flying underneath those clouds).

9. Uttering fearful yells and roaring like clouds charged with rain, he spread the Rakshasha illusion.

10. Being terrified by his yells, birds along with other creatures that live on land or in water uttering cries of fear dropped down in all directions.

11. In consequence of the deers, the leopards and the buffaloes and the bears flying in all directions, it appeared as if the forest itself was in motion.

12. Blown by the wind raised by his thighs, creepers growing at a great distance from that place seemed to embrace in alarm the tree of copper leaves.

13. At that time a violent wind began to blow and the sky became darkened with the dust that covered it.

14. As grief is the greatest enemy of the objects of the five senses, so that unknown foe appeared to the five Pandavas.

15. Seeing from a distance the Pandavas clad in black deer skin, he obstructed their path through the forest like the Mainaka mountain.

16. At the sight of that fearful creature never seen by her before, the lotus-eyed Krishna (Draupadi), being much terrified, closed her eyes.

17. She whose hair was dishevelled by the hand of Dushashana stood in the midst of the Pandavas like an agitated river amid five hills.

18. Seeing her overwhelmed with fear, the five Pandavas supported her, as the (five) senses influenced by desire are supported by the worldly objects.

19—22. (Thereupon) the greatly powerful Dhaumya destroyed in the presence of the sons of Pandu, the fearful Rakshasha illusion by applying various Mantras calculated to destroy the Rakshashas. Seeing his illusion destroyed, that Rakshasha of crooked ways, who was capable of assuming any form at will, expanded his eyes in anger, and he appeared like Death himself. Then the greatly intelligent Yudhisthira thus spoke to him.

23. "Who and whose are you? Say what we shall do." That Rakshasha thus replied to Dharmaraja Yudhisthira.

Kirmira said :—

24. I am the brother of Vaka, and I am known by the name of Kirmira. I live in this uninhabited Kamyaka forest in comfort and ease.

25. Defeating men in battle I always eat them. Who are you that have come before me as my food? Defeating you all in battle, I shall eat you in comfort.

Vaishampayana said:—

26. O descendant of Bharata, having heard the words of that wretch, Yudhisthira told him his name and lineage.

Yudhisthira said:—

27—28. I am the son of Pandu, Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira); you may have heard of me. Deprived of my kingdom, I with my brothers, Bhima, Aryuna and others have come in my wanderings to this fearful forest which is your dominion. I desire to pass the period of my exile here.

Vidura said:—

29—30. Kirmira replied, "By good luck, Fate has accomplished to-day my long cherished desire. With weapons upraised, I have been continually wandering over the earth with the object of killing Bhima. But I did not find him. By good luck that slayer of my brother (Vaka) whom I have been seeking so long has come before me.

31. O king, it is he who, in the disguise of a Brahmana, killed my beloved brother Vaka in the Vetrakeja forest

32. Through his knowledge of skill only. He has no strength of arms. My friend Hidimva, who lived in the forest,

33. Was formerly killed by this wretch; and he then took possession of his sister. That fool has now come to my this deep forest,

34. At a time when the night is half-spent and when we wander about, I shall to-day kill him; and (I shall now) wreak my vengeance on my old enemy.

35. I shall gratify (the manes) of Vaka with plentiful blood of his (body). I shall to-day be freed from my debts which I owe to my friend and brother.

36. I shall obtain great peace by killing to-day this enemy of the Rakshashas. If Bhima was formerly allowed to escape from the hands of Vaka,

37. O Yudhisthira, I shall to-day devour him in your presence. Killing this huge bodied Vrikodara (Bhima) to-day,

38. I shall eat him up and digest him as Agasta did the great Asura (Vatapi). Having been thus addressed, the virtuous-minded and steady in his pledges, Yudhisthira,

39. Saying "It cannot be," rebuked the Rakshasha in anger. Thereupon the mighty armed Bhima soon tore up a tree, 40—42. Of the length of ten Vyamas and stripped it of its leaves. Within a twinkling of an eye the ever victorious Aryuna stringed the Gandiva (bow) of the force of the thunder. Making Jishnu (Aryuna) desist, Bhima said to that Rakshasha in a voice as that of the roaring louds "Stay, Stay." Saying this, the Pandava Bhima tightened the cloth round his waist in anger.

43. Rubbing his palms and biting his nether lips, the heroic Bhima, armed with the tree, rushed towards him.

44. As Maghavata (Indra) hurls his thunderbolt, so he (Bhima) made it (the tree), which was like the mace of Yama, descend with force on his (Kirmira's) head.

45. The Rakshasha was seen to stand in the battle unmoved. He hurled his lighted brand (at Bhima) which was as flaming as the lightning.

46. But that foremost of all warriors (Bhima) turned it off with his left foot, and it then went back towards Rakshasha.

47. Kirmira also, suddenly tearing up a tree, himself angrily rushed to fight with the Pandava (Bhima) like mace bearing Yama.

48. That battle, so destructive to the trees, looked like that of the old one which was fought for the sake of a woman between Vali and Sugriva.

49. The trees, struck at the heads (of the two combatants), were broken into minute pieces, like lotus-stalks thrown on the temples of mad elephants.

50. In that great forest innumerable trees, crushed like reeds, lay scattered like rags.

51. O best of the Bharata race, that fight with trees between that foremost of Rakshashas (Kirmira) and that best of men (Bhima) lasted but for a moment.

52. Thereupon the angry Rakshasha hurled a stone at Bhima standing in the fight, but Bhima did not waver.

53. Thereupon as Rahu goes to devour the sun, shadowing his rays with out-stretched arms, so did the Rakshasha rush upon Bhima who had remained firm under the blow that was inflicted by the (Rakshas) with the stone.

54. Grappling and dragging each other in various ways, they appeared like two infuriated bulls struggling with each other;

55. Or like two mighty tigers armed with teeth and claws. The fight between them was fierce and hard.

56. Vrikodara (Bhima), being proud of his strength of arms and conscious of Krishna's (Draupadi's) looking at him, and remembering their disgrace at the hand of Duryodhana, began to swell in vigour.

57—58. Inflamed with wrath, Bhima seized the Rakshasha by his arms as one elephant in rut seizes another. The mighty Rakshasha also in his turn seized his adversary, but that foremost of all warriors Bhimasena threw the cannibal down with violence.

59. The sounds that rose from those mighty combatants pressing each others hands were fearful. They resembled the sounds of splintering bamboos.

60. Hurling the Rakshasha down, Vrikodara seized him forcibly by the waist, and he then began to shake him, as trees are shaken by the wind.

61. Having been thus seized by the mighty Bhima, he became weakened in the fight with that strong man. But thus being shaken he still pressed the Pandava (Bhima) with all his strength.

62. Finding him (the Rakshasha) fatigued, Vrikodara (Bhima) twined his own arm round the body of the enemy, as one binds a beast with a cord.

63. The monster then roared fearfully like a trumpet out of order. But the hero (Bhima) whirled him for a long time, till he became insensible.

64. Finding the Rakshasha exhausted the son of Pandu, (Bhima) took him up on his arms without loss of time, and he then killed him like a beast.

65. Placing his knees on the breast of that wretch of Rakshashas, and seizing his throat, Vrikodara (Bhima) began to press his neck.

66. Then dragging along on the earth the bruised body of the Rakshasha whose eye-lids were about to close, Bhima spoke thus.

67. "O sinful wretch, you will no more have to wipe away the tears of Hidimba and Vaka, for you too are going to the abode of Yama."

68. Having said this, and seeing the Rakshasha destitute of clothes and ornaments and insensible, that foremost of men, his heart filled with wrath left him dead.

69. When that cloud-coloured Rakshasha was killed, the son of the great king (Pandus i.e. Yudhisthira) praised Bhima for his many qualities. And then placing Krishna (Draupadi) in their front, they set out for the forest of Daitya.

70. O ruler of men, O descendant of Kuru, it was thus that Kirmira was killed by Bhima at the command of Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira).

71. Having made the forest free from its pest, the invincible and virtuous man (Yudhisthira) lived with Draupadi there in their abode.

72. Comforting Draupadi, those foremost of heroes of the Bharata race with glad hearts praised Vrikodara cheerfully.

73. After the Rakshasha had been killed by the strength of arms of Bhima, the heroes (the Pandavas) entered that peaceful forest (now) being free from its pest.

74. Passing through that great forest, I saw the body of the wicked and fearful Rakshasha lying killed by Bhima's prowess.

75. O descendant of Bharata, I heard there (in the forest) of this great deed of Bhima from the Brahmanas who had assembled there (round the Pandavas).

Vaishampayana said:—

76. Having thus heard of the account of the destruction of that foremost of Rakshasha, Kirmira, the king (Dhritarastra) sighed in sorrow and became absorbed in thought.

Thus ends the eleventh chapter, the words of Vidura, in the Kirmira Badha of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XII

(ARYUNABHIGAMANA PARVA).

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having heard that the Pandavas had been banished, the Bhojas with the Vrisnis, and the Andhakas went to the afflicted Pandavas in the great forest.

2. The relatives of (the king) Panchala, Dhristadyumna, the king of Chedi, and the greatly powerful and renowned brothers, the Kaikeyas

3. Went to see the sons of Pritha in the forest. Their heart inflamed with wrath, they reproaching the sons of Dhritarastra said, "What should we do?"

4. All those foremost of Kshatriyas with Vasudeva (Krishna) at their head sat around Dharmaraja Yudhisthira. Saluting that chief of the Kurus, Keshava (Krishna) spoke thus in sorrow.

Krishna said:—

5. The earth will drink the blood of Duryodhana, Karna, Sakuni and the fourth (of their allies) Dushashana.

6. Killing all these and defeating all their followers and royal allies,

7. We shall all install Dharmaraja Yudhisthira (on the throne). The crafty men deserve to be slain. This is eternal morality.

Vaishampayana said:—

8. Janardana (Krishna) became angry for the wrongs done to the sons of Pritha, and he seemed bent upon consuming all created things. But Aryuna tried to pacify him.

9—10. Seeing Keshava (Krishna) angry, Falguni (Aryuna) began to recite the feats achieved in his former lives by that soul of all things who is immeasurable, who is the eternal one of infinite energy, the lord of Prajapati, the supreme ruler of the world, and the greatly wise Vishnu.

Aryuna said:—

11. O Krishna, in the days of yore, you had wandered on the Gandhamadana mountain for ten thousand years as a Fatrashayanagriha Rishi.

12. O Krishna, living on water alone, you passed eleven thousand years in the days of yore by the side of the Pushkara (lake).

13. O slayer of Madhu, you with your arms upraised and standing on one leg, living all the while on air, passed one hundred years on the high hills of Vadari.

14. O Krishna, leaving aside your upper garment, and looking like a bundle of veins, with your body emaciated you lived on the banks of the Saraswati, employed in your sacrifice extending for twelve years.

15. O greatly effulgent Krishna, in observance of your vow, you stood on one leg for one thousand celestial years on the plains of Pravasha which the virtuous ought to visit.

16. Vyasa has told me that you are the cause of the creation and its course. O Keshava, the lord of Kshetra, you are the mover of all minds and the beginning and the end of all things.

17. O Krishna, all asceticism rests in you; you are the embodiment of all sacrifices and you are the eternal one. O Krishna, killing the fearful Naraka, the first begotten offspring of the earth, you have obtained his ear-rings by the performance of the first horse sacrifice.

18. O foremost of all the worlds, having performed that feat, you have become victorious over all. You have killed all the Daityas and the Danavas mustered in battle.

19. O mighty-armed Keshava, giving the lord of Sachi (Indra) the sovereignty of the universe, you have taken your birth among men.

20. O chastiser of foes, having floated on primordial waters, you subsequently became Hari, Brahma, Surya, Dharma, Dhatri, Yama, Anala,

21. Vayu, Vaisravana, Rudra, Kala, and the sky, the earth, the air and the directions. O foremost of Purushas, you are your own creator, you are the lord of all mobile and immobile universe,

22. O slayer of Madhu, O greatly effulgent one, O Krishna, you gratified with your sacrifice in the forest of Chitraratha the chief of the celestials, the highest of the high.

23. O Janardana, at each sacrifice you offered, according to (each one's) shares, gold by hundreds and thousands.

24. O descendant of Yadu, becoming the son of Aditi you have been known as the younger brother of Indra, though you are the exalted one of the supreme attributes.

25. O chastiser of foes, O Krishna, while you are but a child, you filled by three steps the heaven, the sky and the earth in consequence of your energy.

26. O soul of all creatures, covering th<sup>o</sup> heaven and the sky, you dwell in the body of the sun and afflict him with your own effulgence.

27. O exalted one, O Krishna, in your incarnations on three thousand occasions, you have killed the sinful Asuras by thousands.

28. By destroying the Mansavas and the Pashas, and killing Nishunda and Naraka; you have again made the road to Pragjotisha safe.

29. You killed Ahvriti at Jarutha, Kratha, and Shishupala with his followers and allies, Jarasandha, Saivya and Satudhanwan.

30. You defeated on your car which is as effulgent as the sun and as roaring as the clouds, Rukmi in battle, and then obtained for your queen the daughter of Bhoja.

31. You killed in fury Indradyumna and the Yavana called Kaseruman. Killing Salya, the king of Saivya, you destroyed his city.

32. At Iravati, you killed king Bhoja, who was equal to Kirtavirja in battle. Both Gopati and Taluketu also have been killed by you.

33. O Janardana, you have also obtained for yourself the sacred city of Dwarka which abounds in wealth and which is agreeable to all Rishis. You will submerge it into the ocean at the end.

34. O slayer of Madhu, O descendant of Dasahara race, how can crookedness be in you, devoid as you are of anger, envy, untruth and cruelty?

35. O undeteriorating one, all the Rishis come to you when seated in your glory on the sacrificial ground and seek your protection.

36. O slayer of Madhu. O chastiser of foes, contracting all things and withdrawing this universe into your own self, you stay at the end of Yuga.

37. O descendant of the Vrisni race, there at the beginning of the Yuga, sprang from your lotus-like navel Brahma himself who is the lord of all mobile and immobile things and whose is this entire universe.

38—39. O Hari, when the fearful Danavas Madhu and Kaitava were bent on killing Brahma, seeing their impious endeavour you grew angry and from your head then sprang Sambhu, the holder of trident, the deity of three eyes. Thus have these two foremost of the deities sprung from your body to accomplish your work.

40. It was Narada who has told me (all) this. O Narayana, you performed in the forest of Chaitraratha a grand sacrifice with multitudes of rites and plentiful of gifts.

41—42. O lotus-eyed deity, the feats you accomplished with your prowess aided by Valadeva have never before been done by others. They are not capable of being done by others in future. You dwelt even in Kailasha accompanied by Brahmanas.

Vaishampayana said :—

43. Having spoken thus to Krishna, the high-souled Pandava (Aryuna) who was his (Krishna's) soul became dumb. Janardana (Krishna) then thus replied to Partha (Aryuna).

Krishna said :—

44. You are mine and I am yours. All that is mine is yours also. He who hates you hates me, and he who follows you follows me.

45. O irreprissible hero, you are Nara and I am Narayana (Hari). We are the Rishis Nara and Narayana born in the world of men for a special purpose.

46. O Partha, you are from me and I am from you. O best of the Bharata race, none can understand the difference that exists between us.

Vaishampayana said :—

47—48. When the high-souled Krishna said this in the midst of that assembly of the heroic kings, who were all excited with anger

49. The Panchala princess (Draupadi), surrounded by Dhristadyumna and her other heroic brothers, came to the lotus-eyed one (Krishna) who was seated with his cousins. Desirous of getting protection, she spoke thus to the refuge of all (Krishna) in angry words.

Draupadi said :—

50. Asita and Devala have said that in the matter of creation of things you have been indicated as the only Prajapati and the creator of all the worlds.

51. O irrepressible one, Jamadagni says you are Vishnu. O slayer of Madhu, you are the sacrifice, you are the sacrificer, and you are he for whom the sacrifice is performed.

52. O best of Purushas (male beings), the Rishis call you Forgiveness and Truth. Kashyapa has said that you are the sacrifice sprung from Truth.

53. O lord, Narada says that you are the God of the Sadhyas and of the Sivas, you are the creator and the lord of all.

54. O foremost of men, as children sport with their toys, you repeatedly sport with the celestials including Brahma, Sankara (Siva) and Sakra (Indra).

55. O lord, the firmament is covered by your head and the earth by your feet. These worlds are your womb, and you are the Eternal one.

56. You are the best of all objects to those Rishis who have been sanctified by the Vedic lore and asceticism, whose souls have been purified by penance, and who are contended with some visions.

57. O best of Purushas, you are the refuge of all royal sages, who are devoted to piety, who never turn their looks on the field of battle, and who possess every accomplishment. You are the lord of all; you are omnipresent, you are the soul of all things, you are the active power pervading every thing.

58. The rulers of the several worlds,— those worlds themselves, the steller-conjunctions, the ten points of horizon, the firmament, the moon and the sun are all established in you.

59. O mighty armed hero, the mortality of all creatures, and the immortality of the universe are established in you.

60. O slayer of Madhu, impelled by the affection, you bore for me, I shall relate to you my griefs. You are the supreme lord of all creatures, both celestial and human.

61. O Krishna, how could one like me, the wife of Pritha's sons (the Pandavas), the sister of Dhristadyumna, and the friend of yours, be dragged to the assembly?

62. Alas, in my season, stained with blood, with but a single cloth on, trembling and weeping, I was dragged into the court of the Kurus!

63. Seeing me stained with blood (standing) in the presence of the kings in that assembly, the wicked-minded sons of Dhritarastra laughed at me.

64. O slayer of Madhu, though the Pandavas, the Panchalas and the Vrisnis were present, yet they (the sons of Dhritarastra) dared express their desire of making me their slave.

65. O Krishna, I am the daughter-in-law of both Bhishma and Dhritarastra according to the ordinance, yet, O slayer of Madhu, they wished to make me their slave by force.

65. I blame the Pandavas who are mighty and the foremost (heroes) in battle, for they (silently) looked at the cruel treatment that was offered to their renowned wedded wife.

67. O Janardana, fie to the prowess of Bhimasena, and fie to the Gandiva of Aryuna, for they both suffered me to be thus disgraced by men of no importance!

68. This eternal course of morality is ever followed by the pious men,—namely the husband, however weak he might be, should protect his wedded wife.

69. By protecting his wife one protects his offspring, and by protecting the offspring one protects his own self.

70. One's own self is begotten on one's wife, and therefore wife is called Jaya. A wife should also protect her husband, remembering that he would take his birth in her womb.

71. The Pandavas never forsake the persons who ask for their protection, but they abandoned me who asked for their protection.

72. Five greatly powerful sons have been born of me by my five husbands; O Janardana, for their sake it was necessary to protect me.

73. Prativindhya (was begotten) by Yudhishthira, Satasoma by Vrikodara (Bhima), Srutakirti by Aryuna, Satanika by Nakula,

74. Srutakarman by the youngest (of my husbands) Sahadeva. They are all of irrepressible prowess. O Krishna, they are all as great car-warriors as Pradyumna (Krishna's son).

75. They are all foremost of all bowmen, and they are all invincible in battle by any foe. Why do they (silently) bear the wrongs inflicted (on me) by the weak sons of Dhritarastra?

76. Having been deprived of their kingdom by deception, the Pandavas were made slaves, and I myself in my season and in one cloth was dragged into the Sabha.

77. O slayer of Madhu, fie to the Gandiva, which none else can string except Aryuna, Bhima and yourself!

78. O Krishna, fie to the strength of Bhima and to the prowess of Partha (Aryuna) for Duryodhana lived for even a moment (after what he did).

79. O slayer of Madhu, it was he who formerly drove the guileless Pandavas with their mother from the kingdom while they were but boys engaged in study and in the observance of their vows.

80. It was that sinful wretch who mixed fresh, virulent, horrible and excessive poison with the food of Bhimasena.

81. O Janardana, but Bhima without sustaining any injury digested that poison with the food, for O mighty armed hero, O best of men, Bhima's days had not (then) ended.

82. O Krishna, it was Duryodhana, who at the house that stood by the banian tree, called Pramana, bound the sleeping and unsuspecting Bhima; and then throwing him into the Ganges, he returned to the city.

83. But the son of Kunti, the greatly strong and mighty armed Bhima, on waking from his sleep, tore his bonds and rose from the water.

84. It was he (Duryodhana) who caused venomous snakes to bite all over the body of Bhimasena, but that slayer of foes did not die.

85. Awaking, the son of Kunti (Bhima) killed all the serpents with his left hand; and he killed his (Duryodhana's) favourite charioteer (also).

86. Again, while the children (the Pandavas) were sleeping unsuspecting with the revered one (their mother), he set fire to the house (Jatugriha). Who is there who is capable of doing such an act?

87. It was then the revered madam (Kunti), overtaken by this calamity and surrounded by the flames, began to cry in terrors.

Kunti said:—

88. Alas, I am undone! How shall we to-day escape from this fire! Alas, I shall meet with destruction with my sons who are but children!

Draupadi said:—

89. Thereupon the mighty-armed Bhima Vrikodara whose prowess is like that of wind, comforted the revered madam (Kunti) and his brothers.

Bhima said:—

90. I will spring up into the air like the son of Vinata that best of birds, Garuda. We have no fear from this fire.

Draupadi said:—

91. Then taking the revered lady (his mother) on his left flank and the king (Yudhisthira) on the right, the twins on each shoulder and Vivatsu (Aryuna) on his back,

92. The powerful hero (Bhima), taking all of them, cleared off the fire at one leap, and thus delivered his mother and brothers from the conflagration.

93. Setting out that night with their illustrious mother, they (the Pandavas) came near the great forest, the forest of Hidimba.

94. Fatigued and distressed they fell asleep with their mother. A Rakshasha woman, named Hidimba, then came to them.

95. Seeing the Pandavas asleep on the ground with their mother, and being influenced by desire, she sought to have Bhimasena as her lord.

96. That weak and blessed one (the Rakshasha woman), thereupon taking up Bhima's feet on her lap, began to press them with her soft hands.

97. The immeasurably energetic, irrepressibly powerful and greatly strong Bhima then awoke and asked, "O faultless one, what do you wish (here)?"

98. Having been thus addressed by Bhima, the faultless Rakshasha woman, who could assume any form at will, thus replied to the high-souled Bhimasena.

99. "Speedily fly from this place; my powerful brother will (soon) come to kill you. Therefore speed away, do not tarry here any longer."

100. Thereupon Bhima spoke thus in haughtiness, "I do not fear him. If he comes here, I shall kill him."

101. Having heard their conversations, that worst of Rakshashas of fearful form and dreadful appearance uttered a loud cry as he came.

The Rakshasha said:—

102. O Hidimba, with whom are you talking? Bring him to me; I will eat him up. You ought not to tarry.

Draupadi said:—

103. But moved by compassion, the faultless featured and pure hearted Rakshasha woman did not speak a word out of pity.

104. Then the man-eating Rakshasha, uttering dreadful cries, rushed with great force at Bhimasena.

105. Coming furiously and angrily at him, the mighty Rakshasha caught hold of Bhimasena's hand by his own.

106. Catching hold of his other hand and making it as hard as the thunder of Indra, he suddenly struck Bhima a blow that descended with the force of lightning.

107. His hand having been seized by the Rakshasha, the mighty-armed Vrikodara (Bhima), without being able to brook it, flew into rage.

108. Then a fearful combat took place between Bhimasena and Hidimba,—both skilled in all sorts of weapons,—like the battle between Vasava (Indra) and Vritra.

109. O sinless one, after playing with (the strength of) the Rakshasha for a long time, the powerful and greatly energetic Bhima killed him when he became exhausted and weak.

110. Having thus killed Hidimba, Bhima proceeded with his brothers, placing Hidimba in their front,—(Hidimba) of whom Gatatka was born.

111. Thereupon all those chastisers of foes, accompanied by their mother and surrounded by many Brahmanas, proceeded towards Ekachakra.

112. In their this journey, Vyasa, ever engaged in their welfare, became their counsellor. Then the Pandavas of rigid vows, arriving at Ekachakra,

113. Killed there a greatly strong man-eating monster, named Vaka, who was as terrible as Hidimba.

114. Having killed him, that foremost of smiters, Bhima, with all his brothers went to the capital of Drupada.

115. O Krishna, as you have obtained Rukmini, the daughter of Bhisma, so Satsuchi (Aryuna) obtained me while he lived there (at Drupada's capital).

116. O slayer of Madhu, I was thus obtained in the Saimvara by Partha (Aryuna) who performed a feat difficult of achievement by others and who fought with assembled kings.

117. O Krishna, thus afflicted with numerous griefs, I am living in sorrow and in great distress with Dhaumya at our head, but deprived of the company of the revered ady (Kunti).

118. Why do these (Pandavas), who are gifted with strength and who possess the prowess of the lion, sit silently on seeing me afflicted by so despicable enemies (as the Kurus).

119. Suffering such wrongs at the hands of the sinful, evil-doing and weak foes, am I to suffer misery so long?

120. I was born in a great race, and I came to the world in an extraordinary way. I am the beloved wife of the Pandavas and the daughter-in-law of the illustrious Pandu.

121. O Krishna, O slayer of Madhu, being the foremost of women and devoted to my husbands, even I was seized by the hair in the very sight of the Pandavas, each of whom was like an Indra.

Vaishampayana said :—

122. Having said this, the mild-speeched Krishna (Draupadi) hid her face with her soft hands which were like the buds of lotus and began to weep.

123. The tears of the Panchala princess,—the out-pourings of her grief,—washed her deep, plump and graceful breasts, which were crowned with auspicious marks.

124. Wiping her eyes and sighing frequently she thus spoke in anger and in a choked voice.

Draupadi said :—

125. O slayer of foes, husbands, sons, friends, brothers, father, or you,—I have none.

126. For you all, seeing me treated so cruelly, by inferior foes, (still) sit unmoved in silence. My grief at Karna's ridicule is capable of being assuaged.

127. O Keshava, O Krishna, I always deserve to be protected by you for four reasons,—namely for our relationship, for the respect you bear for me, for our friendship, and for your lordship over me.

Vaishampayana said ;—

128. Thereupon Krishna thus spoke to her in that assembly of heroes.

Krishna said :—

129. O fair lady, the wives of those with whom you are angry will weep like you on seeing their husbands lying dead on the ground, their bodies covered with the arrows of Vivatsu and weltering in blood. Do not grieve; I shall do for the Pandavas whatever lies in my power.

130. I tell you the truth; you shall be the queen of kings. The heavens might fall, and the Himalayas might split, the earth might be rent,

131. And the waters of the ocean might be dried up, but, O Krishna (Draupadi), my words shall never be futile.

Vaishampayana said :—

Having heard these words of Achyuta (Krishna), as a reply to her, Draupadi

132. The princess of Panchala, glanced obliquely at her third husband (Aryuna). O great king, Aryuna then thus spoke to Draupadi.

Aryuna said :—

133. O copper-colour-eyed lady, do not weep. What the slayer of Madhu (Krishna) has said will (surely) happen. O lady, O beautiful one, it cannot be otherwise.

Dhristadyumna said :—

134. I shall kill Drona, Sikhandi will kill the Grandsire (Bhisma), Bhimasena will kill Duryodhana, and Karna will be killed by Dhananjaya (Aryuna).

135. O sister, with the assistance of Rama (Valadeva) and Krishna we are invincible even in a battle with the slayer of Vritra (Indra),—what (to speak of a battle) with the sons of Dhritarastra.

Vaishampayana said :—

136. When this was spoken, all the heroes turned their faces towards Vasudeva, and the mighty armed Keshava (Krishna) thus spoke in their midst.

Thus ends the twelfth chapter, comforting Draupadi, in the Arjunavigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XIII.

(ARYUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Krishna said :—

1. O king of the earth, had I been then present at Dwarka, O king, this misfortune would not have overtaken you.

2. Even if uninvited by the Kauravas the son of Amvika, (Dhritarastra) and the king Duryodhana, I would have come to the gambling match, O irrepressible one, and I would have been able to prevent it by pointing out (to them) its many evils,

3—4. And by inviting to my help Bhisma, Drona, Kripa and Valhika. O descendant of Kuru, I would have said to the king, the son of Vichitravirja, for your sake, "O lord of kings, your sons should desist from gambling." I would have also pointed out the evils by which you have been reduced to this distress,

5. And in the days of yore Virasena's son was deprived of his kingdom. O king of the earth, gambling brings on unthought of misfortunes.

6. I would have also described duly the continued desire of playing.

7. Women, gambling, hunting and drinking which originate from desire have been designated as the four evils by which people are deprived of their prosperity.

8. Those conversant with the sacred lore observe that evils exist in all these, and the wise consider that they particularly exist in gambling.

9. From gambling proceeds the destruction of property, misfortune, the squandering of untasted wealth and the use, of harsh words only.

10. O mighty armed hero, O descendant of Kuru, approaching the son of Amvika, I would have pointed out these evils of gambling, and other attendant evils.

11. Being thus accosted by me, if he had listened to my words, the well-being and the virtue of the Kurus, O enhancer of the Kuru race, would have been secured.

12. And if he had not accepted, O king of kings, my sweet words like medicine, O foremost of the Bharata race, I would have compelled him to accept them by force.

13. And if he had been supported by his courtiers who pass for his friends, but who are in reality his enemies, I would have destroyed all his retinue and the gamblers present there.

14. O descendant of Kuru, it is on account of my absence at that time from the country of Anartha that you have been beset by the misfortunes engendered by gambling.

15. Having reached Dwarka, O foremost of Kurus, O son of Pandu, I heard all about your misfortune from Yuyudhana.

16. Having heard this, O king of kings, and having been stricken with great anxiety, I have speedily come here, O king, to see you.

17. O Bharata chief, you have all been overtaken by great calamity; I see you along with your brothers sunk in misfortune.

Thus ends the thirteenth chapter, the words of Krishna, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva,

CHAPTER XIV.

(ARYUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Yudhishtira said:—

1. O Krishna, O son of Vrishni, why were you absent? Where did you live in your sojourn and what did you do?

Srikrishna said:—

2. O Bharata chief, O foremost of the Kurus, I went to destroy the city of Salya; listen to the reasons thereof.

3—4. O foremost of the Bharatas, at the sacrifice of Rajasuya, the heroic son of Damaghosha, the highly effulgent, the mighty-armed, and the illustrious king Shishupala was killed by me, for he could not bear to see the first worship offered to me.

5. O descendant of Bharata, having heard of his destruction, Salya, stricken with dreadful anger, went to the empty Dwarka, —myself living here.

6. Having reached there, O king, in a chariot, coursing at will, made of precious metals and called accordingly Saubha, he fought ruthlessly with the young and leading princes of the Vrishni family.

7. Thereupon slaying a numberless young princes of the Vrishni race, the wicked-minded one laid waste all the gardens belonging to the city.

8—9. O mighty armed hero, he (Salya) said, "Where has that greatly vicious-minded son of Vasudeva, that disgrace of the Vrishni race Vasudeva (Krishna) gone? I shall humiliate in battle his pride. Tell me truly, O Anartha, I shall repair where he has gone.

10. I shall go back after slaying that destroyer of Kansa and Keshi; I swear by my weapon that I shall not return without slaying him."

11. (Exclaiming repeatedly) 'Where is he! Where is he!' the lord of Saubha, being desirous of fighting with me again and again rushed hither and thither in battle.

12. "Being enraged at the destruction of Shishupala, I shall despatch to-day to the abode of Yama that mean, and treacherous wight of vicious deeds.

13. Oh king of the earth, "I shall slay him, vicious charactered as he is, by whom, my brother, the great king Shisupala, was killed.

14. My royal brother was a boy, and that hero was killed in the battle field unprepared, and therefore I shall kill Janardana."

15. O great king, having thus bewailed, and abused me, O descendant of Kuru, he rose up in the sky in (his car) Saubha, coursing at will.

16. Returning there, O descendant of Kuru, I heard all that the vicious-minded and evil-souled king of Martika had said regarding myself.

17. Thereupon, O descendant of Kuru, O king, having my mind agitated by wrath and resolving in my mind to kill him, I determined to do it.

18. O descendant of Kuru, having heard of his oppressions on the Anarthas, of his vilifying me, and also of the increasing arrogance of that one of impious deeds (I resolved upon his destruction).

19. Thereupon, I proceeded, O lord of the earth, to destroy Saubha. He (Salya) was espied by me in an island in the midst of an ocean.

20. Thereupon, O king, blowing my conch, called Panchajanya, obtained from the ocean, and inviting Salya to an encounter I prepared myself for battle.

21. There took place at once a dreadful encounter between me and the Danavas, and they were all vanquished and prostrated on earth by me.

22. It is for this, O mighty-armed hero, that I could not come to you. But no sooner I heard of the unfair gambling at Hastinapur than I have come here to see you who have been thus sunk in calamity.

Thus ends the fourteenth chapter, the destruction of Saubha, in the Arjunabhisamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XV.

(ARYUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. O Vasudeva, O mighty-armed and high-minded hero, tell me in detail the account of the death of the king of Saubha I am not as yet fully satisfied.

Krishna said :—

2. O mighty-armed king, O best of the Bharata race, having heard that the son of Srutasrava (Shisupala) was killed, Salya came to the city of Daravati.

3. O son of Pandu, the wicked-minded Salya, stationing his forces in battle-array, invaded that city all around, and from above.

4. Thereupon, that ruler of earth, stationing himself in the sky, began to fight with that city. The battle commenced with a thick shower of weapons from all sides.

5. The city (was then) well furnished with pennons, arches, soldiers, walls, turrets, engines and miners,

6. With streets barricaded with spiked wood-works, with towers and edifices on gateways, with plentiful provisions, with offensive weapons, with engines for hurling burning brands and fires,

7. O best of the Bharata race, O king, with deer-skin vessels (for carrying water), with trumpets, tabors and drums, with lances and forks and Satagnis, with ploughshares,

8. With rockets, stones, battle-axes and other weapons, with shields protected by iron, with engines for hurling balls and bullets and fires.

9. O best of the Bharata race, all this was kept according to the Shastras. It was also well-protected by numerous cars, and also by Gada, Samba, Udhava and others,

10. O best of the Kurus, and also by warriors of prowess, all well-trying in battle, all well-born, and all capable of encountering any foe.

11. All these warriors, placing themselves in commanding positions and being aided by cavalry and standard bearers, began to protect the city.

12. To prevent carelessness and to avoid danger Ugrasena, Udhava and others, proclaimed throughout the city that none should drink liquor.

13. Well-knowing that they would be killed by king Salya, if they became intoxicated all the Vrisnis and the Andhakas, remained sober and watchful.

14. The guards soon drove out of the city all actors, dancers and singers of the Anartha country.

15—16. O descendant of Kuru, all the bridges over rivers were destroyed, and boats were forbidden to ply (in those rivers) and the trenches around the city were spiked with poles at the bottom, O best of the Kurus, the land around the city for full two miles was rendered uneven, and holes and pits were dug there; combustibles were secreted below its surface.

17. O sinless one, our fort is naturally strong. It is always well-defended and filled with all kinds of weapons.

18. And in consequence of the preparations made, our city became then more prepared than ever to meet the enemy. O best of the Bharata race, in consequence of all this, it looked like the abode of Indra.

19. O king, when Salya thus came, none could, without presenting the sign, that was agreed upon, either enter or leave the city of the Vrisnis and the Andhakas.

20. O descendant of Kuru, O great king, all the streets of the city and its open spaces were filled with numerous horses and elephants.

21. O mighty-armed hero, the soldiers were all gratified with the allowances, wages, rations, weapons and dresses (that were given to them).

22. Among those soldiers there was none who was not paid in gold, who was not paid at all, who was not somehow obliged and who was not of tried valour.

23. O lotus-eyed hero, it was thus that Dwarka, abounding in well-ordered arrangements, was defended by Ahuka (Ugrasena).

Thus ends the fifteenth chapter, the destruction of Saubha, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XVI.

(ARYUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Krishna said:—

1. O king of kings, the lord of Saubha Salya, came to the city of Dwarka with numerous men, elephants and soldiers.

2. The army, headed by king Salya, consisting of four kinds of troops, occupied a level ground where there was plentiful supply of water.

3. Avoiding cremation-grounds, temples of gods, sacred trees and grounds covered with ant-hills, his army occupied every other places.

4. O king, the roads (leading to Dwarka) were all blocked up by the (various) divisions of his army, and the secret passages (from the city) were also all blocked up by the encampment of Salya's troops.

5—7. O descendant of Kuru, O best of men, like the king of birds (Garuda), he rushed upon Dwarka, with his army, equipped with every kind of weapons, skilled in all arms, furnished with numerous chariots, elephants and cavalry,—full of pennons and banners,—and strengthened with well-paid, well-fed and greatly powerful foot soldiers who bore every mark of heroism and who used wonderful chariots and bows.

8. Seeing the army of the king Salya approached, the youthful princes of the Vrisni race sallied out with the desire of giving him battle.

9. O descendant of Kuru, without being able to bear the pride of king Salya, Charudeshna, Samba and the great car-warrior, Pradyumna,

10. Clad in armour and adorned with ornaments with color flying, sallied out on their chariots, with the desire of meeting the numerous great warriors of king Salya.

11. Samba, taking up his bow, eagerly attacked on the field of battle Kshemavridhi, the minister and the commander of Salya's army.

12. O best of the Bharata race, as Indra showers down rain, so did the son of Jambhavati (Samba) shower down arrows in a continuous stream.

13. O great king, the commander of (Salya's) forces, Kshemavridhi, bore that shower of arrows (and stood) as immovable as the Himalayas.

14. O king of kings, thereupon Kshemavridhi, aided by his power of illusion, poured a great shower of arrows.

15. Then dispersing by counter illusion that shower of arrows aided by illusion, Samba showered on his (adversary's) car one thousand arrows.

16. Then pierced and overwhelmed by the arrows of Samba, the commander of (Salya's) forces, Kshemavridhi fled from the field with the help of his fleet steeds.

17. When the crooked-minded commander of Salya's army fled from the field, a powerful Daitya, named Vegavan, rushed at my son.

18. O king of kings, thus attacked, the heroic Samba, the perpetuator of the Vrisni race, withstanding the attack of Vegavan, kept his ground.

19. O son of Kunti, the heroic and irresistibly powerful Samba, whirling a swift-going club, soon hurled it at Vegavan.

20. O king, thus struck with it, Vegavan fell on the ground like a faded, weather-beaten and decayed-rooted lord of the forest (banian tree).

21. When that heroic and great Asura was killed with the club, my son rushed into (enemy's) troops and began to fight with all.

22. O great king, a well-known Danava, named Vivindha, a great car-warrior and a great bow-man, then rushed upon Charudeshna.

23. O king, the battle between Charudeshna and Vivindha was as fierce as that in the days of yore between Vitra and Vasava (Indra).

24. Enraged with each other, the combatants pierced each other with their arrows and uttered loud roars like two powerful lions.

25. Having first vivified it with incantations the son of Rukmini fixed on his bow-string a powerful weapon which possessed the splendour of the sun or the fire and which was capable of destroying all foes.

26. O king, that great car-warrior, my son, inflamed with anger, challenged Vivindha and discharged the weapon at him. He (thus struck) fell dead.

27. Seeing Vivindha killed and his army (very much) agitated, Salya came back again on his (car) Saubha, capable of going everywhere at will.

28. O mighty-armed king, thereupon seeing Salya seated on his (car) Saubha, the warriors of Dwarka became very much alarmed.

29. O descendant of Kuru, Pradyumna sallied out and asked the Anarthas not to lose courage. He then thus spoke.

30. "(O warriors), do not lose courage; stay and see me fight. I shall repel with force (the car) Saubha with the king (Salya) on it.

31. O Yadavas, I shall this day destroy the army of the lord of Saubha with my serpent-like weapons discharged from my bow with my hand.

32. Be of good cheer. Fear not. I shall to-day kill him. Attacked by me, the wicked-minded (Salya) with (his car) Saubha will be destroyed."

33. O son of Pandu, O hero, when Pradyumna thus spoke with a cheerful heart, the Yadava warriors stood on the field and began to fight cheerfully.

Thus ends the sixteenth chapter, the destruction of Saubha, in the Aryunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XVII.

(ARYUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Krishna said:—

1. O best of the Bharata race, having thus spoken to the Yadavas, the son of Rukmini (Pradyumna) ascended on his golden car yoked with horses clad in armour.

2. On it (the car) stood a standard, bearing, the figure of a gaping-mouthed Makara. It was as fearful as Yama himself. He rushed upon the enemy with his steeds who were rather flying than running over the ground.

3—4. The hero, equipped with quiver and sword, and with his figures incased in leather, stringed with great strength the bow which possessed the splendour of lightning. Transferring it from hand to hand as if in contempt of the enemy, he spread confusion amongst the Danavas and the other warriors, the inhabitants of Saubha.

5. As he went on killing the Danavas in battle, and as he sat in contempt of the foe (on his car), none could mark the slightest interval between the successive arrows (shot by him.)

6. The color of his face did not change and his limbs did not tremble. People only heard his lion-like roars which indicated his wonderful valour.

7. The aquatic creature (Makara), that devourer of all fishes, which was on the golden flagstaff of that best of cars with wide-opened mouth, struck terror into the hearts of all the warriors of (king) Salya.

8. O king, that chastiser of foes, Pradyumna, rushed there with speed against Salya himself who was so desirous of fighting with him.

9. O perpetuator of the Kuru race, challenged by the heroic Pradyumna in that great battle, the angry Salya could not bear it.

10. Resolved to fight with Pradyumna and maddened with anger, that conqueror of hostile city, Salya, then descended from his beautiful car of unchecked speed.

11. All the people (as spectators) looked at that battle between Salya and that foremost of the Vrisni heroes (Pradyumna) which was like the battle between Vasava (Indra) and Vali.

12—13. O hero, O lord, O descendant of Kuru, ascending on his beautiful, illusive and best of all chariots, decked with gold and furnished with flags and flagstaves and (equipped) with quivers, the illustrious and the mighty Salya began to discharge his arrows at Pradyumna.

14. Thereupon Pradyumna also overwhelmed Salya in the battle by a thick shower of arrows shot by the strength of his arms.

15. The king of Saubha thus attacked did not endure it. He discharged, at my son, arrows that were like blazing fire.

16. That great warrior (my son) drove off that shower of arrows. Seeing this, he (Salya) rained on my son other weapons of blazing splendour.

17. O king of kings, having been thus pierced, the son of Rukmini without loss of time discharged an arrow which was capable of reaching the vitals of a foe.

18. That winged arrow, discharged by my son, pierced his (Salya's) armour and entered into his heart; whereupon he fell down in a swoon.

19. When the heroic king Salya fell down senseless, all the chief Danavas rending the earth beneath their feet fled away.

20. O ruler of earth, seeing their king, the lord of Saubha drop down senseless (on the ground), the soldiers of Salya sent up exclamations of "Oh," and "Alas."

21. O descendant of Kuru, (soon) regaining his consciousness, that greatly powerful hero (Salya) suddenly discharged arrows at Pradyumna.

22. Thereupon the heroic and the mighty-armed Pradyumna, having been thus severely wounded about his throat by his adversary in the battle, was enfeebled on his car.

23. O great king, thus wounding the son of Rukmini, Salya roared like a lion and filled the entire earth with his roars.

24. O descendant of Bharata, thereupon when my son became senseless, he (Salya) without losing a moment again discharged at him other weapons, all difficult to withstand.

25. O best of Kurus, thus pierced with numberless arrows and deprived of his consciousness, Pradyumna fell (on his car) motionless in the field of battle.

Thus ends the seventeenth chapter, the destruction of Saubha, in the Arjuna-bhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XVIII.

(ARYUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Krishna said :—

1—2. O king, when Pradyumna (wounded by the arrows) became very much disheartened and aggrieved, the Vrisnis and the Andhakas began to exclaim, "Oh" and "Alas." The enemies (Salya's men) became exceedingly joyful.

3. Having seen him thus unconscious, his trained charioteer, the son of Daruka, carried him off the field with the help of his fleet steed.

4. The chariot had not been taken far off, when that foremost of warriors (Pradyumna) regained his consciousness. Taking up his bow, he thus spoke to his charioteer.

Pradyumna said :—

5. O son of Suta, what have you done? Why do you go away, leaving the field of battle? This is not the usage of the Vrisni heroes in battle.

6. O son of Suta, have you been bewildered at the sight of Salya in that great battle? Have you been disheartened at the sight of the battle? Tell me truly your mind.

The Charioteer said :—

7. O son of Janarddana, I am not bewildered. Fear has not taken possession of me. But O son of Keshava, I think it is difficult to defeat Salya.

8. Therefore, O hero, I am slowly retiring from the field. This wretch is stronger than you. A charioteer ought to protect the warrior on his car when he is deprived of his senses in battle.

9. O hero of long life, you should always be protected by me, as you ought to protect me always. Thinking that a warrior on a car should always be protected by his charioteer, I am carrying you away (from the field of battle).

10. O mighty-armed hero, you are but only one, whereas the Danavas are many. O son of Rukmini, thinking that you are not equal to them in battle, I am going away (from the battle).

Krishna said :—

11. O descendant of Kuru, when the son of Suta thus spoke, the Makara-standard hero (Pradyumna) said to the Suta, "Turn back the chariot?"

12. O son of Daruka, never do so again. O son of Suta, never turn back from the battle till I am alive.

13. He is no son of a Vrisni who forsakes the field of battle, who kills the enemy fallen at his feet and crying "I am yours,"

14. Who kills a woman, a boy, an old man, or a warrior who is in distress and who is deprived of his car or whose weapons are broken.

15. You are born in the race of Sutas (charioteers), and you are well-skilled in your profession. O son of Daruka, you know the usage of the Vrisnis in battle.

16. Conversant as you are with all the usages of the Vrisnis in battle, O son of Suta, you should never again fly from the field as you have done now.

17. What will the irrepressible Madhava, the elder brother of Gada, say when he will hear that I have run away from the battle in bewilderment, and that I have been struck on my back?

18. What will the elder brother of Keshava, the mighty-armed Valadeva, who is clad in blue and inebriated with wine, say when he will return?

19. O Suta, what will that best of men, the grandson of Sini that great Bowman (Satyaki), say when he will hear that I have run away from the battle? What will the ever-victorious Samba,

20. O charioteer, and irrepressible Charudeshna, Gada, Sarana and the mighty-armed Akrura say to me?

21. What will the wives of the Vrisni heroes when they would meet together say of me who have been hitherto considered as brave, well-conducted, respectable and possessing manly pride.

22. They will say "Here comes Pradyumna, the coward, running away from the great battle. Fie on him." They will never say "Well done?"

23. O son of Suta, ridicule with the exclamation of fie is to me or to a person like me is more than death. Therefore never again leave the field of battle.

24. Giving charge (of the city) to me, the slayer of Madhu, Hari (Krishna), has gone to the sacrifice of the foremost of the Bharata race (Yudhisthira). Therefore I cannot bear to be quiet now.

25. O son of Suta, when the heroic Kritavarma was coming out to meet Salya, I made him desist, saying "I will resist him (Salya). You better stay."

26. The son of Hridika (Kritavarma) desisted in order to honour me. Having left the field of battle, what shall I say to that great car-warrior?

27. When that irresistible and mighty-armed hero, that holder of the conch, the discus, and the club, will return, what shall I say to that lotus-eyed one?

28. What shall I say to Satyaki, Valadeva and others of the Vrisni and the Andhaka races who always boast of me?

29. O son of Suta, having left the battle and having been struck at the back with arrows, and carried away by you (from the field of battle) as I was insensible, I shall by no means be able to live (any longer).

30. O son of Daruka, turn speedily the chariot back again. Never act in this way again, even not at the time of the greatest danger.

31. O son of Suta, having fled from the field like a coward and having been wounded at the back by arrows I consider life worth nothing?

32. O son of Suta, have you ever seen me fly from the battle like a coward?

33. O son of Daruka, you ought not to have left the battle while my desire for fight had not been gratified. Therefore, go back to the battle again.

Thus ends the eighteenth chapter, the destruction of Saubha, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva,

CHAPTER XIX.

(ARYUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Krishna said:—

1. O son of Kunti, having been thus addressed, the son of Suta (the charioteer) then replied to Pradyumna, that foremost of heroes, in these sweet words.

The Charioteer said:—

2. O son of Rukmini, I am not afraid to guide horses in battle. I am acquainted with the usage of the Vrisnis in war. It is in no way otherwise.

3. O hero of long life, those that are placed as charioteers (on the cars) are taught to protect the warriors on their chariots. You were greatly afflicted,

4. O hero, you were very much wounded by the arrows shot by Salya, you were also deprived of your senses. Therefore I retired (with you) from the field of battle.

5. O foremost of the Satyatas, O son of Keshava, now that you have regained your senses, without further trouble you will now see my skill in guiding the horses.

6. I am born of Daruka and I have been duly trained (in my art) ; I shall now enter into the well-arranged army of Salya without the least fear.

Krishna said :—

7. O hero, having said this, the charioteer pulled the reins and led the horses with great speed to the field of battle.

8—9. O king, struck with the whip and pulled by the reins, those excellent horses, appeared as if they were flying in the air by performing various beautiful motions, now circular, now similar, now dissimilar, now going to the right, and now going to the left.

10. O king, those horses, understanding as it were the desire of the son of Daruka, became as if burned with energy and seemed to fly without touching the ground with their feet.

11. O foremost of men, he wheeled round Salya's army so easily that they who witnessed it became very much surprised.

12. Being unable to bear that manœuvre of Pradyumna, the king of Saubha, instantly discharged three arrows at the charioteer (of his adversary).

13. O mighty-armed hero, without taking any notice of the force of those arrows the son of Daruka, continued to lead the chariot round the (Salya's) army as he was doing (from the start.)

14. O hero, thereupon the king Salya, again discharged at my son, the son born of Rukmini, a shower of various kinds of weapons.

15. But that slayer of hostile heroes, the son of Rukmini, smilingly showed the lightness of his hand and cut off all those weapons before they reached him.

16. Seeing all his weapons cut down, the Saubha king, taking recourse of the terrible illusion, natural to the Asuras, poured a shower of weapons.

17. Cutting off those greatly powerful weapons of the Daitya in the mid-air by means of the Brahma weapon, he (Pradyumna) discharged winged weapons of other kinds.

18. These (weapons), which ever delighted (in tasting) blood, warded off the arrows of the Daitya and pierced his head, bosom and face. Thereupon he (Salya) fell down senseless.

19. When wounded by arrows, the mean-minded Salya fell down, the son of Rukmini discharged at him another arrow capable of destroying every enemy.

20. When that arrow, which was worshipped by all the Dasarhas, which was flaming like the fire, and which was as fatal as a venomous snake, was fixed on the bow-string, that sight filled the air with cries of "Oh" and "Alas."

21. Thereupon all the celestials with Indra and the lord of wealth (Kuvera) at their head sent (to Pradyumna) Narada and the god of wind (Vayu) with the speed of mind.

22. These two (celestials), coming to the son of Rukmini, thus told him the message (sent) by the celestials. They said "O hero, the king Salya is never to be killed by you.

23. There is none who cannot be killed by that arrow. He is however unslayable by you in battle, therefore draw back the arrow.

24. O mighty-armed hero, the creator has ordained that he will be killed by Krishna, the son of Devaki. Let it not be falsified."

25. Thereupon that excellent hero, Pradyumna, withdrew that foremost of arrows from his excellent bow and kept it back into his quiver.

26. O king of kings, then the mighty Salya, pierced with the arrows of Pradyumna, rose up disheartened ; and he then speedily fled away.

27. O king of kings, the wicked-minded (Salya), thus defeated by the Vrisnis, ascended (his car) Saubha made of precious metals ; and leaving Dwarka he disappeared through the skies.

Thus ends the nineteenth chapter, the defeat of Salya, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XX.

(ARYUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Krishna said :—

1. O king, when he (Salya) left the city of the Anarthas, I returned there on the completion of your great Rajshuya sacrifice.

2—3. O great king, on my arrival I found Dwarka shorn of its splendour. Vedic recitations and sacrificial offerings were stopped, beautiful damsels were destitute of ornaments and the gardens were devoid of beauty. Alarmed by the sight, I asked the son of Hridika,

4. "O best of men, why are the men and the women of the Vrisni race are all woe-begone. I desire to hear all about it."

5. O best of kings, having been thus addressed by me, the son of Hridika narrated to me in detail the invasion of the city by Salya and his subsequent defeat and departure.

6. O best of the Bharata race, thereupon having heard all, I instantly made up my mind to kill king Salya.

7—8. O best of the Bharata race, encouraging the citizens, I thus addressed with cheerfulness king Ahuka and Anakadunduvi and also all the chief heroes of the Vrisni race, "O best of the Yadavas, stay all of you in the city with all caution.

9. Know, I shall go to kill Salya. Without killing him, I shall not return to the city of Daravati.

10. I will again come back to you after destroying Salya with his city Saubha made of precious metals. Strike up the three notes of the Dunduvi (musical instrument) which are so dreadful to the foes."

11. O best of the Bharata race, thus adequately encouraged by me, they all with cheerful hearts said to me, "Go and kill the enemy."

12—13. O king, having received the benedictions of those cheerful heroes, and having caused the Brahmanas to utter auspicious words, and having also bowed down to the best of Brahmanas and to Siva, I started on my car yoked with (my horses) Saivya and Sugriva, filling all directions with the clatter of its wheels and blowing that best of conches named the Panchajanya.

14. O best of men, surrounded by my invincible and victorious army consisting of four kinds of troops, all so persevering in battle, I started.

15. Passing over many countries, mountains and trees, many lakes and rivers, I at last arrived at the country of Martikavarta.

16. O best of men, here did I hear that Salya was coursing in his (car) Saubha near the ocean. I soon followed him there.

17. O slayer of foes, having reached the ocean (I saw) Salya on his (Saubha, car made of precious metals in the midst of the ocean full of heaving billows.

18. O Yudhisthira, having seen me from a distance, that wicked-minded (Asura) challenged me again and again to the fight.

19. Many arrows, each capable of piercing to the very heart, discharged from my bow, did not reach his car. Thereupon I became filled with wrath.

20. O king, that greatly sinful and irrepressively powerful wretch of a Daitya's son began to shoot at me thousands of arrows in torrents.

21. O descendant of Bharata, he showered arrows on my soldiers, on my charioteer, and on my horses. But without much caring for his arrows, we continued to fight.

22. Thereupon those warriors who were at the command of Salya showered on me thousands of straight arrows.

23. The Asura heroes covered my horses, my car and my charioteer, Daruka, with arrows each capable of piercing to the very heart.

24. O hero, I could not at that time see either my car, or horses, or my charioteer Daruka. For I and my soldiers were covered with arrows.

25. O son of Kunti, thereupon I too discharged from my bows tens of thousands of arrows inspiring them with proper Mantras and shooting them with celestial methods.

26. O descendant of Bharata, as that (car) Saubha made of precious metals was in the sky full two miles off, it could not be seen by my troops.

27. Therefore, they only looked on from that field of battle like (so many) spectators in a place of amusement but they cheered me on by clappings and by shouts loud as the roars of lions.

28. The beautiful arrows discharged from the fore part of my hand penetrated into the bodies of the Danavas like biting insects.

29. Thereupon loud cries of those dying of the wounds inflicted by the arrows rose on the Saubha (car); and they (those wounded) fell into the water of the great ocean.

30. Having lost their arms and necks and having appeared like Kavandas (a sort of headless ghosts), the Danavas fell (down into the sea) with fearful cries.

31—32. As they fell, they were devoured by the animals, living in the waters of the ocean. Thereupon I powerfully blew the (conch) Panchajanya, which was obtained from the waters and which was as graceful as the lotus stock and as white as the milk, or the Kunda flower, or the moon, or the silver. Having seen them fall, the king of Saubha Salya

33—34. Began to fight with me with the help of illusion. Then he began to hurl upon me clubs, plough-shares, winged darts, lances, javlins, thunder-bolts, nooses, broad-swords, bullets, shafts, axes and rockets.

35. Allowing them to come towards me, I soon destroyed them all by counter illusion. On his illusion being rendered ineffectual, he began to fight with mountain-peaks.

36. O descendant of Bharata, then there was darkness and light alternately, the day was now fair, now gloomy, and now hot and now cold.

37. There was a fearful shower of coals, ashes and weapons. Creating such illusions, the enemy fought with me.

38. Knowing this, I destroyed his illusion by counter illusion; and at the proper times I showered arrows all around.

39. O great king, O son of Kunti, then the sky blazed forth with one hundred suns, with one hundred moons, and thousands and tens of thousands of stars.

40. None could ascertain whether it was then day or night. None could distinguish even the points of heaven. Thereupon becoming bewildered, I fixed on my bow-string the weapon, named Pragnastra.

41. O son of Kunti, that weapon rushed onwards like flakes of cotton blown away by the winds. Then a great and hair-stirring battle took place. O king of kings, having regained light, I again fought with the enemy.

Thus ends the twentieth chapter, the destruction of Saubha, in the Arjunabhisgamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXI.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Krishna said:—

1. O best of men, the great enemy, the king Salya, thus encountered by me in battle, again rose in the sky.

2. O great king, thereupon eagerly desiring victory, that wicked-minded (Dana-va) hurled at me Satagnis, great maces, flaming lances, big clubs and swords.

3. As the weapons came down through the sky I speedily stopped them with my swift arrows. I cut them off into two or three pieces before they could reach me. Thereupon a great uproar rose in the sky.

4. He (Salya) then covered Daruka, my horses and car with hundreds and thousands of straight arrows.

5. O hero, Daruka, who was about to faint away, spoke thus to me, "As it is my duty to stay, therefore I stay, though severely afflicted with the arrows of Salya. But I am unable any longer to stay,—my body has become weak."

6. Hearing these piteous words of my charioteer, I looked at him and saw that my charioteer had been fearfully wounded with arrows.

7. O best of the Pandavas, there was not a spot on his breast, or on his head or in his body or in his two arms which was not covered with arrows.

8. Blood flowed profusely from his wounds thus inflicted by the arrows. He looked like a hill of red chalk after a shower of rain.

9. O mighty-armed hero, seeing my charioteer thus pierced and enfeebled by the arrows of Salya, with the reins still in his hands I cheered him.

10. O descendant of Bharata, (at this time) a certain person quickly came to my car and addressed me like a friend.

11. O hero, O Yudhishthira, know he appeared (to me) to be a servant of Ahuka, and he delivered to me a message from him (Ahuka) in a sad and choked voice.

12. (He said), "O hero, the king of Dwarka, Ahuka, has said this to you. "O Keshava, hear what your father's friend has said.

13. O descendant of Vrisni race, O irripresible hero, Salya came to Dwarka in your absence, and by main force he has killed the son of Sura (Vasudeva, Krishna's father).

14. O Janarddana, therefore there is no need of fighting here. Cease fighting and defend Dwarka. This is (now) your principal duty."

15. Having heard his words, my heart became heavy and I could not ascertain what I should do and what I should not.

16. O hero, having heard of this great evil, I mentally censured Satyaki, Valadeva, and also the great car-warrior Pradyumna.

17. O descendant of Kuru, having reposed on them the duty of protecting Dwarka and my father, I had come to the destruction of Saubha.

18—19. I asked myself in sorrow, "Do that slayer of foes Valadeva, Satyaki, the son of Rukmini, (Pradyumna) the greatly powerful Charudeshna, Samba and others live? O best of men, if they were alive,

20. Even the wielder of thunder (Indra) could not have killed the son of Sura (my father). It is evident the son of Sura is dead; it is also evident that the others

21. With Valadeva at their head have all lost their lives. This is my firm belief." I was again and again filled with the thought of their destruction. I was overwhelmed with grief, O great king, but I again fought with Salya.

22. O great king, O hero, I now saw the son of Sura (my father) himself falling from the Saubha (car). At this sight I fainted away.

23. O ruler of men, my father appeared like Yayati when he (that king) losing all his virtues fell down towards earth from heaven.

24. I saw my father falling like a luminary whose merit is lost, his headgear pale and loosely flowing his hair and dress disordered.

25. O son of Kunti, thereupon my Saranga bow fell from my hand; I fainted away and sat down on the side of the car.

26. O descendant of the Bharata race, seeing me in a swoon on the car and one like dead, my soldiers all exclaimed, "Oh" and "Alas!"

27. My father with out-stretched arms and legs appeared like a bird dropping from the sky.

28. O mighty-armed hero, when he was thus falling, the hostile warriors with lances and axes in their hands began to strike him grievously. At this my heart trembled.

29. O hero, regaining my consciousness soon after, I did not find them in that great battle either the (car) Saubha or the enemy Salya, or my old father.

30. I then concluded in my mind that it was nothing but illusion. Thereupon regaining my senses, I again began to discharge hundreds of arrows.

Thus ends the twenty first chapter, the destruction of Saubha in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXII.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Krishna said :—

1. O best of the Bharata race, then taking up my beautiful bow, I began to cut off with my arrows the heads of the enemies of the celestials from the (car) Saubha.

2. I began to discharge from the Saranga (bow) many excellent arrows of the forms of snakes, each capable of going to a great height and each possessing great energy.

3. O perpetuator of the Kuru race, I could not then see the Saubha, for it had then disappeared on account of the illusion (displayed by the Danava). I became astonished.

4. O descendant of Bharata, O great king, the host of Asuras of fearful visages and hair then sent up a loud roar as I was waiting for it (Saubha).

5. In that great battle, I then with the object of destroying them, fixed on my bow-string the weapon capable of piercing the foes, if only their voice could be heard. Thereupon their roarings ceased.

6. But all those Danavas that had sent up that shout were killed by my those arrows, which were as blazing as the sun and which were capable of striking (at a foe) if only his voice could be heard.

7. O great king, when the shout (of the Danavas) ceased at one place, it arose at another place. There also I sent up my arrows.

8. O descendant of Bharata, in this way the Asuras sent up roars from all the ten quarters, above and across. But they were all killed by me.

9. O hero, bewildering my eyes, and going to Pragyotisha the Saubha, capable of going every where at will, reappeared again.

10. Thereupon those agents of destruction, the Danavas of fearful forms suddenly covered me with a great shower of rocks.

11. O king of kings, he tried to kill me again and again by showers of rocks; and I looked like an ant-hill covered with those rocks.

12. O king, being covered with those rocks along with my horses, charioteer, (car with) flagstaff, I altogether disappeared from the view.

13. Thereupon the foremost heroes of the Vrisni race who were in my army were seized with panic, and they suddenly began to fly in all directions.

14. O king, seeing me in that state, the heaven, the sky and the earth were all filled with exclamations of "Oh" and "Alas".

15. O king, my friends, afflicted with sorrow and grief, then wept and wailed in sorrowful hearts.

16. O hero, O undeteriorating one, delight filled the hearts of the enemies as sorrow filled those of my men. I heard of this after I had defeated the enemy.

17. Then wielding the thunder, the favourite (weapon) of Indra, which is (ever) capable of grinding stones, I destroyed that entire mass of rocks.

18. O great king, my horses, afflicted with the weight of the rocks and almost at the point of death, stood trembling.

19. Seeing me, all my friends rejoiced as men are rejoiced on seeing the sun rising in the sky after dispersing the clouds.

20. Seeing my horses, afflicted with the weight of the rocks and almost at the point of death, my charioteer spoke to me in words suitable to the occasion.

21. "O descendant of the Vrisni race, behold there stays Salya, the lord of Saubha. Do not disregard him. Exert yourself.

22. O mighty-armed Keshava, abandon all mildness and consideration for Salya. Kill him,—do not allow him to live (any longer).

23. O hero, O slayer of your enemies, a foe should be killed with all exertion. Even a weak enemy should not be disregarded by a strong man,

24. Even if he is at his feet, not to speak of one who dares to stay in battle. O best of men, O lord, put forth every exertion

25—26. And conquer him. O best of the Vrisni race, O hero, do not make any further delay. That one is not to be killed by milder means. In my opinion he can never be a friend who devastated Dwarka and who is now fighting with you." O son of Kunti, hearing such words of my charioteer

27. And knowing that what he had said was true, I again engaged myself in the fight with the intention of killing Salya and destroying his Saubha (car).

28—29. O hero, telling Daruka "Stay for a moment," I then in that Danava-destroying battle fixed on my bow-string, my favourite fire-weapon of celestial origin, of blazing splendour of irresistible force, of great effulgence and of bursting energy, incapable of being ever baffled, and capable of penetrating into every thing.

30—32. "Destroy Saubha with all the enemies that are in it" and saying this, after having inspired it with Mantras, I hurled in anger with the strength of my arms the greatly powerful discus which reduces to ashes all the Yakshas, Rakshas, Danavas and kings born in impure races and which is as sharp-edged as the razor, which is without stain as Yama himself, which is incomparable and which kills all enemies.

33. Rising into the sky, the Sudharsana (discus) seemed to look like the exceedingly effulgent sun at the end of the Yuga.

34. Approaching the city of Saubha, the splendour of which had disappeared, it went right through it as a saw divides a tall tree.

35. Cut in twain by the force of the Sudharsana, the Saubha fell like the city of Tripura shaken by the weapon of the great God (Siva).

36. When the Saubha fell, the discus came (back) to my hand. Taking it up, I once more hurled it with great force, saying "Go to Salya."

37. Thereupon it suddenly cut Salya in twain who was at the point of hurling a great club in that great battle. With its effulgence it soon set the foe (Salya) ablaze.

38. When that brave warrior was killed by my bow, the disheartened Danavas fled in all directions, exclaiming "Oh" and "Alas."

39. Thereupon taking my chariot in front of the city of Saubha, I cheerfully blew my conch and gladdened the hearts of my friends.

40. Seeing their city as high as the peak of the Meru (mountain) with its palaces and gate-ways utterly destroyed and all ablaze (in fire), the Danavas all fled in fear.

41. Having thus killed Salya and destroyed Saubha, I returned to the Anarthas and delighted my friends.

42—43. O king, O slayer of hostile heroes, this is the reason why I could not come to Hastinapur. If I had come Duryodhana would not have been alive and the gambling match would not have taken place. What can I do to-day? It is difficult to stop the water when the dam is broken."

Vaishampayana said:—

44. Having thus spoken to the Kurus, that handsome slayer of Madhu, that foremost of men, that mighty-armed hero, saluting the Pandavas, was prepared to go away.

45. The mighty-armed hero was saluted in return by king Dharmaraja Yudhishthira. And the mighty-armed Bhima also smelt the crown of his head.

46. He was embraced by Arjuna; and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva) saluted him with all reverence. He was duly honoured by Dhaumya and worshipped by Draupadi with her tears.

47. Causing Subhadra and Abhimanyu to ascend his golden car, Krishna, being duly worshipped by the Pandavas, ascended it himself.

48. Consoling Yudhishthira, Krishna started for Dwarka on his car which was as effulgent as the sun and to which were yoked (his horses) Saibhya and Sugriva.

49. When the hero of the Dasarha race had gone away, Dhristadyumna, the son of Prisata, taking with him the son of Draupadi started for his own city.

50. After seeing the Pandavas the king of Chedi, Dhristaketu also, taking his sister (Karenumati, the wife of Nakula) started for his beautiful city, named Suktamati.

51. O descendant of Bharata, the Kaikeyas also, with the permission of Kunti's immeasurably energetic son (Yudhisthira) and having reverentially saluted all the Pandavas went away.

52. Though the Brahmanas, the Vaisyas and the (other) inhabitants of his kingdom, were repeatedly requested to go, but they did not leave the Pandavas.

53. O king of kings, O best of the Bharata race, the crowd of people that surrounded those high-souled men the (Pandavas) in the forest of Kamyaka was extraordinary.

54. Honouring those high-souled Brahmanas, Yudhisthira in due time ordered his men to "Make ready the chariots."

Thus ends the twenty second chapter, the destruction of the Saubha in the Arjunabhisgamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXIII.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2. When the chief of the Dasarhas had gone away, Yudhisthira, Bhima, Arjuna, the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), Krishna (Draupadi) and the priest (Dhau-mya) ascending costly chariots yoked with excellent horses, departed for another forest. The heroes, each looking like the lord of spirits (Siva,) distributed (at the time of their departure) Nishkas of gold, cloth and kine to the Bramhanas, learned in Sikha, Akshara and Mantras.

3. Twenty body-guards followed them armed with bows, bowstrings, blazing weapons, shafts, arrows and other engines of destruction.

4. Taking the clothes, the ornaments, the nurses and the maid-servants, Indraseni soon followed (the princes) on another chariot.

5. Thereupon the high-souled citizens, approaching that best of Kurus, walked round him. The principal Brahmanas of Kurujangala cheerfully saluted him.

6. Dharmaraja (Yudhisthira) together with his brothers saluted them cheerfully in return. Seeing the concourse of the people of Kurujangala, the virtuous-minded king stayed there for some time.

7. The high-souled hero, the foremost of the Kurus, felt for them as a father feels for his sons; and they too felt for the Kuru chief as sons feel for their father.

8. That great crowd (of the people of Kurujangala) coming near the Kuru chief stood around him. O king, overwhelmed with shame and with tears in their eyes, they all exclaimed, "Alas, O lord," "Alas, Oh Dharma!"

9. (They said), "You are the chief of the Kurus, you are our king,—we are your subjects. O Dharmaraja, where do you go leaving all these citizens and the inhabitants of the country (your kingdom) as a father leaves his sons.

10. Fie on the cruel-hearted son of Dhritarastra! Fie on the evil-minded son of Suvala (Sukani)! Fie on Karna! O ruler of men, those sinful wretches always wish evil to you who are so firm in virtue.

11. O virtuous-minded Dharmaraja of extraordinary deeds, having yourself founded the matchless city of Indraprastha having the splendour of the city of the great god (Kailash), where do you go leaving us?

12. O virtuous-minded Dharmaraja, leaving that matchless Sabha, built by Moya, which possesses the splendour of the celestial Sabha, which is like a celestial illusion itself and which is ever guarded by the celestials themselves, where do you go?"

13. To them in a loud voice said Vivatsa (Arjuna), learned in the rules of Dharma, Artha and Kama, "By living in the forest the king (Yudhisthira) intends to take away the fame of his enemies.

14. O men, with the Brahmanas at your head, all learned in Dharma and Artha, going to the ascetics, separately and each praying for their grace, represent to them what is for your supreme good."

15. O king, at these words of Arjuna, the Brahmanas and the men of other orders saluted him cheerfully and walked round that foremost of all virtuous men.

16. Then bidding farewell to the son of Pritha (Yudhisthira), Vrikodara (Bhima) Dhananjaya and Jajmaseni (Draupadi) and the twins (Nakula and Sahadeva), they at the command of Yudhisthira, sorrowfully returned to their respective house in the kingdom.

Thus ends the twenty third chapter, the departure of the citizens, in the Arjunabhisgamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXIV.
(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)
—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. They having gone, the virtuous-souled son of Kunti, Yudhisthira, of firm vows addressed all his brothers.

2—3. "We shall have to live in this lonely forest for twelve years; do you find out in this huge forest a spot, charming, auspicious and abounding in many deer, birds, flowers and fruits, and filled with pious men, where we may live happily for all these years."

4. Being thus addressed, Dananjaya replied to the pious and intelligent (Yudhisthira) having honored him as if he were his spiritual guide.

Arjuna said:—

5. You have respectfully worshipped the old and great Rishis; there is nothing on this earth which is unknown to you.

6. O best of the Bharatas, you have always worshipped the Brahmanas of great austerities such as Dwaipayana and Narada,

7. Who, having controlled over senses, always wander over all the regions from the region of the celestials to those of Brahma, Gandharvas and Apsaras.

8. You know well, without any doubt, the opinions of all the Brahmanas; you know, O king, the prowess of all.

9. You know also, O king, what conduces to our well-being; and wherever you wish, O great king, we shall fix our habitation.

10. Here is the lake called Dwaitavana, resorted to by the pious, abounding in many flowers and fruits, charming and inhabited by birds of diverse species.

11. If you please, O king, we would like to live here for twelve years; do you think otherwise?

Yudhisthira said:—

12. I do fully approve of what you have said. O Partha, let us repair to that sacred and celebrated lake Dwaitavana.

Vaishampayana said:—

13. Thereupon the pious sons of Pandu, followed by numberless Brahmanas all repaired to the holy lake Dwaitavana.

14—15. The Brahmanas, some offering sacrifice to the fire, some without it, some engaged in the study of the Vedas, some depending upon alms and some living in the forest,—all these numberless Brahmanas as well as hundreds of Mahtmas of accomplished ascetic piety and hard austerities surrounded Yudhisthira.

16. And setting out with these numberless Brahmanas the Bharata chiefs, the sons of Pandu, entered the holy and the charming forest of Dwaita.

17. The king saw that huge forest covered, at the end of summer, with Shalas palms, mangoes, Madhukas, Nipas, Kadamvas, Sarjas, Arjunas, Karnikaras clothed with flowers;

18. And peacocks, Datyugas, Chakoras, Varhins and Kokilas sat on the top of the highest trees and emitted their sweet notes.

19. In that forest the king (also) saw the leaders of elephant-herds, gigantic like hills with temporal juice trickling down in the season of rut and accompanied by herds of she-elephants.

20. And approaching the picturesque Bhogavati (Saraswati) he saw many ascetics of accomplished piety in that forest in the hermitages of pious (Rishis) of purified souls and wearing bark and matted-locks.

21. Thereupon descending from his chariot, the king, the foremost of the pious, with his brothers and followers, entered the forest like Indra of immeasurable prowess entering heaven.

22. With a view of seeing the truthful king many Charanas and Siddhas approached him; and the dwellers of the forest stood encircling that highly intelligent chief of kings.

23. Then saluting all the Siddhas and being adored by them in return like a king or a god, that foremost of the pious, accompanied by all the leading twice-borns, entered (the forest).

24. And being worshipped in return by those pious ascetics who had approached him that pious and high-souled king, sat down with them at the foot of a huge tree covered with flowers like her father Pandu in the days of yore.

25. Bhima, Krishna (Draupadi), Dhananjaya, the twins and all their retinue all wearied and leaving conveyances sat on all sides of that foremost of kings.

26. The huge tree, bent down with the weight of creepers, with those five illustrious bowmen sitting under it for rest, appeared like a mountain with five gigantic elephants resting at its side.

Thus ends the twenty fourth chapter, the Pandavas' entrance into the Dwaitavana, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana-Parva.

CHAPTER XXV.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having arrived at that forest those princes resembling Indra, (formerly) used to happiness, (but now) labouring under misfortune, began to sport in that sacred forest of Shala trees washed by Saraswati.

2. In that forest, that king, the foremost of the Kurus, began to please all the Yotis, Munis and all the leading Brahmanas by offering them excellent fruits and roots.

3. And their highly energetic priest Dhaumya, like a father, began to perform for those Pandavas living in the forest, the sacrificial rites (in honour of their departed manes) of Ishti and Paitreya.

4. The old Rishi Markandeya, of profuse and increasing energy, approached as a guest to the hermitage of the illustrious Pandavas who had repaired there on the loss of their kingdom.

5. The high-minded Kuru chief Yudhisthira of incomparable energy and prowess welcomed that great ascetic, who had come there gifted with the effulgence of blazing fire and worshipped by the celestials.

6. Seeing Draupadi, Yudhisthira, Bhima and Arjuna in the midst of the ascetics, that illustrious and omniscient ascetic of incomparable prowess, smiled thinking of Rama in his mind.

7. The pious Yudhisthira who was beside himself (with grief) said :—“ All these ascetics are sorry for seeing me here ; why is it that you alone smile, as if in delight, before all these ?”

Markandeya said :—

8. I am not delighted, O my child, but I am struck with amazement ; nor does haughtiness begotten of delight, possess me. Seeing your calamity to day I think of Dasaratha's son Rama of truthful vows.

9. O son of Pritha, at the behest of his sire he (Rama) resided in the forest ; I saw him in the days of yore wandering with his bow, at the summit of the mount Rishyamuka.

10. The high-souled and innocent son of Dasaratha, resembling the thousand-eyed Deity, the lord of Yama and the slayer of Namuchi, lived in the forest at the command of his father and for the satisfaction of his duty.

11. He was equal to Sakra in prowess, high-minded and invincible in warfare, still he had to range the forest, renouncing pleasure ; therefore, none should act unrighteously thinking “ I am powerful.”

12. Having conquered by truth this earth bounded by seas the kings headed by Nabhaga and Bhagiratha obtained, O my son, all the regions hereafter. Therefore, none should act unrighteously thinking “ I am powerful.”

13. O foremost of men, for forsaking his kingdom and wealth, the pious and truthful king of Kashi and Karusha was called a mad-dog. Therefore, none should act unrighteously thinking “ I am powerful.”

14. O best of men, O son of Pritha, for satisfying the ordinances, laid down by the Creator himself in the Vedas, the seven pious Rishis shone brilliantly in the sky. Therefore, none should act unrighteously, thinking “ I am powerful.”

15. Behold, O king, O foremost of men, (even) the powerful elephants, having tusks as huge as the mountain tops, do not pass by the laws of the Creator. Therefore none should act unrighteously, thinking, ‘ I am powerful.’

16. Behold, O king of men, all creatures act according to the laws (of their species) as laid down by the Creator. Therefore none should act unrighteously thinking, “ I am powerful.”

17. O son of Pritha, you have excelled all men in truth, piety, decorum and modesty ; your fame and energy are brilliant as fire or the sun.

18. O great king, having spent the painful days of your exile in the forest as promised, you shall again snatch from the Kauravas your blazing prosperity by dint of your own energy.

Vaishampayana said :—

19. Having addressed these words to him in the midst of the ascetics with friends, the great Rishi saluting Dhaumya and all the Pandavas, proceeded towards the north.

Thus ends the twenty fifth chapter, the Pandavas' entrance into the Dwaitavana, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXVI.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The high-minded Pandavas while residing in the forest of Dwaita that great forest was filled with Brahmanas.

2. Resounding always and all over with the recitations of the Veda, the lake of the forest became as holy as the region of Brahma.

3. The sounds of Yajus, Riks, Saman and other words uttered by the Brahmanas, were exceedingly charming.

4. The Vedic recitations of the high-minded Brahmanas, mingling with twang of the bows of the sons of Pritha brought about a delightful union of the Brahmana and Kshatriya customs.

5. Thereupon one evening (the Rishi) Vaka of the Dalvya family addressed the son of Kunti, the pious king Yudhishthira seated in the midst of the Rishis,

6. "Behold, O Partha, O Kuru chief, in this forest Dwaita the hour of the ascetic Brahmanas for performing Homa when the (sacred) fires have all been enkindled.

7—8. Being protected by you, they of firm vows, are observing their religious rites in this sacred (forest). Bhrigu and Angiras together with Vashistha and Kashyapa, the renowned sons of Agastya, the offspring of Atri, all of excellent vows, in fact, all the leading Brahmanas of the world are united with you.

9. O son of Pritha, O son of Kunti, O descendant of Kuru, hear along with your brothers what I speak to you.

10. Brahma-energy combined with Kshatriya-energy, Brahma-prowess united with Kshatriya-prowess, when rendered strong, might consume the enemies as fire united with the wind consumes the forest.

11. O my son, O king, one should never be without a Brahmana, if he wishes to conquer this world and the next for long. Having got a Brahmana, well-versed in religion and worldly affairs and cleansed of passion and folly a king destroys his enemies.

12. Having governed his subjects, the King Vali performed those duties that lead to salvation and did not know of any other means in this world than the Brahmanas.

13. It was for this, that all the desires of the Asura (Vali) Virochana's son, were satisfied and his wealth was even inexhaustible. Having obtained (the entire) earth through the instrumentality of the Brahmanas, he met with destruction when he began to oppress (people).

14. The earth with her wealth, never worships him for long, as her lord, who is without a Brahmana. The earth however surrounded by the sea worships him who is governed by a Brahmana and is instructed by him regarding his duties.

15. Like an elephant without a driver in battle, the strength of a Kshatriya, without a Brahmana, decreases.

16. Incomparable is the sight of a Brahmana and the might of a Kshatriyas; when they proceed in unision the whole world is delighted.

17. As fire rendered stronger by the wind destroys straw and wood, so kings united with Brahmanas destroy (all their) enemies.

18. An intelligent man, for acquiring what he has not got and for multiplying what he has got, should take the advice of the Brahmanas.

19. Therefore for obtaining what you have not got and multiplying what you have got and for spending that on proper objects and persons, do keep with you a Brahmana of fame, wise, experienced and well-versed in the knowledge of the Vedas.

20. O Yudhishthira, you have always highly respected the Brahmanas, it is for this that your reputation shines brilliantly in the three worlds.

Vaishampayana said:—

21. Then all the Brahmanas, who were with Yudhishthira, adored Vaka of Dalvya family; and hearing him eulogize Yudhishthira they were greatly delighted.

22—25. Dwaipayana, Narada, Jamadagniya, Pithusrava, Indradyumna, Bhaklaka, Kritachetas, Sahasrapat, Karnasravas, Munja, Lavanashwa, Kashyapa, Harita, Sthulakarna, Agnivishya, Sounaka, Kritavak, Suvak, Vrihadashya, Vibhavasu, Urdharetas, Vrishamitra, Suhotra, Hotravahana,—all these and many other Brahmanas of firm vows worshipped Yudhishthira like celestial sages worshipping Purandara in the celestial region.

Thus ends the twenty sixth chapter, the Pandavas' entrance into the Dwaitavana, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXVII.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Thereupon the sons of Pritha with Draupadi banished to the forest, sat one evening, stricken with grief and sorrow and began to talk with one another.

2. The beloved, beautiful, learned and faithful Draupadi addressed the following words to the pious king (Yudhishthira).

Draupadi said:—

3. No feeling for us exists in the mind of that vile, vicious-souled and cruel son of Dhritarastra.

4. For, that vicious-minded one, O king, having sent you along with me to the forest clad in deer-skin, feels no mortification.

5. For, the heart of that one of impious deeds is made of steel since he could address harsh words to his pious eldest brother.

6. Having brought you, who are used to happiness, to such a miserable plight that vicious-souled wretch delights with his friends.

7—8. O descendant of Bharata, O king, when clad in deer-skin you set out for the forest, only four vicious wights did not shed tears;—Duryodhona, Karna, the evil-minded Sikuni and the fierce and vicious brother Dushashana.

9. O foremost of the Kurus, the other Kurus filled with sorrow, shed tears from their eyes.

10. O great king, seeing this your bed and recollecting what you had before I grieve for you, who do not deserve misery and have been brought up in every luxury.

11. Thinking of that ivory seat in your court crested with jewels and seeing this seat of Kusa grass grief assails me.

12. I saw you in your court surrounded by the kings; seeing you without kings how can my mind have peace?

13. O descendant of Bharata, I am beside myself on seeing you pasted with mud, you, gifted with the effulgence of sun whom I saw before pasted with sandal.

14. O king of kings, I see you now clad in bark, whom I saw before clothed in white silken raiment.

15. (Formerly) pure food of every kind was taken from your house, on golden plates to thousands of Brahmanas.

16. O lord, best food was given by you to ascetics, the houseless and those leading domestic lives, like an accomplished king.

17. Formerly living in your palace you had thousands of plates filled with every kind of food and used to worship the Brahmanas, satisfying every desire of theirs.

18—21. Not beholding all these, how can my heart, O king have peace! Thy youthful brothers, adorned with ear-rings, were formerly treated by cooks with sweet and skilfully prepared dishes—I now behold them all, unused to misery, in the forest living on the produces of the forest. My mind finds no peace, O lord of men. Beholding this Bhimasena sorry and living in forest, and thinking over this, does not your mind in proper time become wrathful,—Bhimasena who used to perform all actions unaided.

22. Beholding him stricken with sorrow who was used to all happiness, surrounded by numerous conveyances and clothed in costly raiment, why does not your anger blaze up?

23. Beholding him in the forest why does not your anger blaze up,—this great one is prepared to slay all Kurus in battle.

24—25. In honour of your promise Vrikodara bears all this; this Arjuna though possessed of two hands is equal to Arjuna of a thousand arms for light handedness in discharging arrows; he is equal to Yama at the end of Yuga; humbled by the prowess of whose weapons all the kings,

26. Waited upon the Brahmanas in your sacrifice, O great king. Beholding this foremost of men worshipped of Devas and Danavas,

27. Arjuna stricken with anxiety, does not your mind become worked with anger? O king, beholding Partha used to happiness and unworthy of misery, living in the forest,

28. Your anger is not excited. I am stricken with wonder for this, O Bharata, who, mounted on a single car, vanquished men and serpents.

29. Beholding him in the forest why is not your anger excited? He was honoured with the present of various vehicles, horses and elephants;

30. He, the slayer of foes, wrested wealth by force from various other kings and discharges with one velocity hundreds of shafts;

31. Is not your mind worked up with ire beholding him in exile? Beholding him fair, able-bodied, youthful and the best of swordsmen,

32—35. Nakula in exile does not your anger blaze up? Beholding, O Yudhisthira, O king, the heroic and handsome son of Madri, Sahadeva, in exile do you forgive (them)? Beholding, O king of men, these Nakul and Sahadeva, unworthy of misery, stricken with grief does not your anger blaze up? Beholding me in the forest born in the race of Drupada, the daughter-in-law of the great Pandu, sister of Dhristadyumna, the devoted spouse of a hero, do you forgive them, O king?

36. Forsooth, O foremost of Bharatas, you have no anger, since beholding me and your brothers your mind is not pained.

37. This is the saying of Srmiti, that in this world there is not a Kshatrya who is without anger—but in you do I behold today the contradiction.

38. The Kshatrya who does not manifest his energy in proper hour is disregarded by all creatures, O son of Pritha.

39. Therefore you should, by no means, vouchsafe your forgiveness to the enemies; forsooth, by your energy you may destroy them all.

40. So that Kshatrya too becomes unpopular with all and meets with destruction both in this world and in the next, whose anger is not appeased when the time for forgiveness comes.

Thus ends the twenty seventh chapter, the words of Draupadi, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Draupadi said:—

1. On this is cited as an example the ancient history relating to the conversation between Prahlada and Vali the son of Virochana.

2. One day Vali accosted his grandfather Prahlada, the king of Asuras and Danavas, endued with great wisdom and well-versed in duties (saying).

Vali said:—

3. Does forgiveness lead to well-being, O father, or prowess or energy? I have great doubt in this; father, tell me who am asking you.

4. Tell me, without any doubt, O you conversant with duties, whatever leads to well-being, I shall obey duly all your commands.

Draupadi said:—

5. Being thus accosted the wise grandfather, conversant with all truths, replied at length for the removal of his doubts.

Prahlada said:—

6. Do you learn, my son, these two truths without any doubt—neither does prowess always lead to well-being nor does forgiveness.

7. He who forgives always, O my son, suffers many evils—servants, strangers and enemies always disregard him.

8. No one does ever bow to him; perpetual forgiveness therefore, O my son, is avoided by the learned.

9. Disregarding him his servants contract many vicious habits; all those evil-minded men try to deprive him of his wealth.

10—12. Those vicious servants also appropriate to themselves his conveyances, clothes, ornaments, dress, beds, seats, food, drink and other articles of use. They do not at the behest of their master, give to others things they are commanded to do. Nor do they treat their master with that respect which is his due. Disregard in this world is worse than death.

13. O my child, sons, servants attendants and even strangers use harsh words to such a forgiving person.

14. Disregarding him even they wish to have the wife of a forgiving person and his wife too does whatever she likes.

15. The pleasure-loving servants, if a slight punishment is not meted out to them, contract all sorts of vices and the wicked always injure such a master.

16. These and various other evils attend always upon the forgiving. Listen, O son of Virochana, to (other) evils that beset a person that never forgives.

17—18. If an angry person, always beset by the quality of darkness, inflicts punishments, by this own energy, upon deserving and non-deserving persons, he is alienated from his friends and hated by outsiders as well as his own relations.

19. Such a man who insults others is subject to loss of wealth, disregard, misery and hatred and creates enemies.

20. A man, in anger, inflicts various punishments upon people and is soon deprived of his wealth, life and even kinsmen.

21. People are afraid of him who abuses his power equally upon his benefactor and enemy, as the inmates of a house are of a snake.

22. How can good betide him of whom the people are afraid—forsooth do the people injure him as soon as they find a hole.

23. Therefore people should not be always angry or mild; they should exhibit their anger or mildness in proper hours.

24. He, who is forgiving in proper hour, and angry when the occasion arises, attains to happiness both in this world and in the next.

25. Hear, I shall now describe to you the hours of forgiveness as pointed out by the learned and which should always be followed.

26. If your former benefactor commits a heinous offence you should forgive him considering his former benefaction.

27. Those that commit an offence out of ignorance or foolishness should be forgiven—for people cannot always easily attain to learning.

28. Those crooked men, who having committed an offence wittingly plead ignorance should be punished even if their offence be trifling.

29. The first offence of all men should be forgiven; when they commit the second, however insignificant it might be they should be punished.

30. If a person unknowingly commits an offence—he should be pardoned, it is said, after having made a proper enquiry.

31. Strength might be vanquished by forgiveness, weakness might be vanquished by forgiveness; there is nothing which forgiveness cannot accomplish, therefore forgiveness is truly fiercer.

32. Considering his own strength or weakness one should act with reference to time or place; nothing is successful that is not taken in hand with reference to time or place; therefore wait for place or time; sometimes, offenders should be forgiven for fear of people.

33. These have been described as the proper hours of forgiveness; and at other times besides these one should exhibit his prowess.

34. I therefore consider, O king, this to be the time when you should display your might to the avaricious sons of Dhritarastra who always injure others.

35. This is not the time for showing forgiveness towards the Kurus; when the hour for showing might arrives, it behoves you to display it.

36. The humble and forgiving person is always neglected; while those that are powerful assail others; he is the king who takes recourse to both in proper time.

Thus ends twenty eighth chapter, the words of Draupadi, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXIX.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Yudhisthira said:—

1. Anger is the destroyer of mankind and anger again places them in prosperity; consider, therefore, O highly-intelligent lady, that anger is the root of prosperity and adversity.

2. Prosperity crowns him, O beautiful lady, who destroys anger; and the greatly terrible anger brings on his adversity who cannot always control it, O fair one.

3. Anger is in this world, the root of the destruction of mankind; how can, one like me indulge in anger which brings about the destruction of the world?

4. The angry man commits a sin; the angry man murders his preceptor; the angry man insults his elders with harsh words.

5. The angry man cannot distinguish what should be and should not be said by him; there is nothing which cannot be said or done by an angry man.

6. From anger a man may kill one who should not be killed and adore one that should be slain; an angry man may even despatch his own self to the abode of Yama.

7. Beholding these evils, anger is conquered by one desirous of excellent well-being both in this world and in the next.

8. Why should persons like myself indulge in that anger which has been controlled by persons of tranquil mind; thinking this, O Draupadi, my anger is not excited.

9. One, that does not act against a person whose anger has been excited, saves himself and others from great fear—in fact he is the physician of both.

10. When a weak man when oppressed by others is angry with those that are more powerful, he brings about his own ruin.

11. There is no region hereafter for such a man who deliberately brings about his own destruction; therefore it is said, O Draupadi, that a weak man should control his anger.

12. And the wise man too, who though oppressed does not allow his anger to be excited, rejoices in the next world for having treated his persecutor with indifference.

13. For this, it is said that a wise man whether he be strong or weak, should always forgive his persecutor, even if he is in difficulty.

14. The pious always praise him, O Krishna (Draupadi), who has conquered his anger; it is held by the pious that the honest and forgiving man is always victorious.

15—18. Truth is superior to untruth and gentle to cruel conduct; why should I, for slaying Suyodhana, display that anger of many evils, renounced by the virtuous? The far-seeing sages regard him as a man of character in whom anger does not exist; the learned men, seeing the real things, always regard him as a man of character who restrains his rising wrath. O you of fair hips, the angry man does not observe the real state of things; the angry man does not see his way nor regard persons.

19. The angry man kills those who should not be killed; he even slays his preceptor; therefore a man of character should always leave off anger at a distance.

20. The man that is possessed by anger does not easily acquire generosity, dignity, bravery, skill and other accomplishments of a real man of character.

21. Renouncing anger a man can display his true energy, whereas it is difficult, O highly wise one, for an angry man to display energy at the proper hour.

22. Anger is regarded by the illiterate as equivalent to energy,—anger has been given to mankind for the destruction of the world.

23. The person, who wishes to behave with decorum, should renounce anger; even one who has forsaken the virtues of his own order, does not indulge in anger.

24. Light-minded fools might transgress all these, but O faultless damsel, how can persons like myself (transgress).

25. If there were not persons amongst mankind equal to the earth in forgiveness there would be no peace amongst them but perpetual dissensions engendered by anger.

26. If the injured persons were to return their injuries; if one admonished by his superiors were to chastise his superiors in return, the result would be the destruction of all creatures and sin would take its root firm.

27—29. If the man when vilified by another vilifies him in return; if the injured man returns his injuries; if the chastised man chastises in return; if fathers kill their sons and sons their fathers; and if husbands destroy their wives and wives their husbands; then, how can, O Krishna, births take place in this world where anger so predominates? know you, O fair damsel, that birth of creatures in this world, is dependent upon peace.

30. If the kings yield to anger, O Draupadi, their subjects soon meet with ruin. Thus anger brings on destruction and distress of mankind.

31. Because persons forgiving like the earth are seen in this world, it is therefore that creatures are born and enjoy prosperity.

32. O fair damsel, in every form of injury, persons should forgive; it is said that the birth of creatures is due to the forgiveness of mankind.

33. He is considered as an excellent and learned person who, having conquered his anger, always shows his forgiveness even when insulted, oppressed and excited by a strong man.

34. Eternal regions are for that person, who, though powerful (conquers his anger), while he that is angry, is foolish and meets with ruin both in this world and in the next.

35. As an illustration of this, the following hymn, O Krishna, in honor of the forgiving, has been sung by the high-souled and ever-forgiving Kashyapa.

36. Forgiveness is virtue, forgiveness is sacrifice, forgiveness is the Vedas, forgiveness is Sruti; he who knows all this is capable of forgiving all.

37. Forgiveness is Brahma, forgiveness is truth, forgiveness is the accumulated and future (ascetic) merit, forgiveness is the devout penance and forgiveness is purity; and by forgiveness the universe is sustained.

38. Forgiving persons attain to the regions of those conversant with the rituals, of those well-versed with the knowledge of Brahman and those of ascetics.

39. Persons performing Vedic rites as well as those performing other rituals attain to other regions; whereas forgiving persons attain to the highly adored regions in the world of Brahma.

40. Forgiveness is the energy of the energetic; forgiveness is the sacrifice and forgiveness is the control of mind; forgiveness is the truth of the truthful; forgiveness is the control of mind.

41. How can, O Krishna, the persons like me renounce such forgiveness in which are established Brahma, truth, wisdom and the three worlds.

42. Even, knowing all, persons should always forgive; whoever forgives everything attains to Brahma.

43. This world belongs to the forgiving, the other world also belongs to the forgiving, they obtain honors here and holy blessedness in the next.

44. Those persons, whose anger is overpowered by forgiveness, attain to the higher regions; therefore forgiveness is considered the highest (virtue).

45. These verses were always chanted by Kashyapa in honor of the forgiving; hearing these verses of forgiveness, be pleased and be not angry, O Draupadi.

46. Our grandfather, the son of Santanu, worships peace, as well as Krishna, the son of Devaki.

47. The preceptor and Vidura, (known as) Kshattwa both speak of peace; Kripa as well as Sanjaya also speak of peace.

48. Somadatta, Yuyutsa, Drona's son as well as our grandfather Vyasa daily speak of peace.

49. Being led by all these towards peace the king will return us the kingdom; if he yeilds to temptation he will meet with destruction.

50. A dreadful time has set in to bring about the misfortune of the Bharatas; from some time before this has been settled conclusion, O fair damsel.

51. Suyodhana does not deserve kingdom and therefore he does not know forgiveness; I deserve it and therefore forgiveness has taken possession of me.

52. Forgiveness and humility are the qualities of the self-controlled and constitute the eternal virtue and I shall therefore adopt them.

Thus ends the twenty ninth chapter, the conversation between Draupadi and Yudhisthira in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXX.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Draupadi said:—

1. I bow to Dhatri and Vidhatri who have thus bewildered my sense; you think otherwise from your father and grandfather regarding what you have got to bear.

2. By actions men are placed in different situations of life; consequences of action, are inevitable, from ignorance people desire for the liberation from action.

3. A man does not even attain prosperity in this world by virtue, gentleness, forgiveness, straight-forwardness and fear of censure.

4. Or else, O descendant of Bharata, this unbearable misfortune would not have befallen you, who are so unworthy of it and your brothers of great energy.

5. Neither then, nor even now, O descendant of Bharata, has anything appeared to you dearer than virtue—which is dearer to you even than your life.

6. That your kingdom is for virtue and your life even is for virtue, is known by Brahmanas, superiors and even celestials.

7. You can abandon Bhimasena, Arjuna these twin sons of Madri along with myself, I think, but you can never renounce virtue.

8. I have heard from elders that a king protects virtue and virtue in return protects him—but methinks it does not protect you.

9. O best of men, like a shadow following a man, you with a singleness of purpose always follow virtue.

10. You have never disregarded your equals, inferiors and superiors; obtaining even the entire universe your pride never increased.

11. O son of Pritha, with Swahas and Swaddhas and other forms of worship you ever adore the Brahmanas, the celestials and the Pitris.

12. O son of Pritha, you have always pleased the Brahmanas by granting all their desires; the Yotis, the ascetics, the householder ascetics, have always been fed by you on golden plates where (myself) have distributed food.

13. You always give food and gold to Vanaprasthas: there is nothing in your house which you cannot bestow upon the Brahmanas.

14. Having distributed duly, O king, all to the guests in the Vishwadeva sacrifice that is solemnised in your house for your peace you live upon what remains.

15. Ishtis, Pashubandhas, sacrifice for obtaining the gratification of desires and ordinary household ceremonies, Paka sacrifices and various other rites are daily performed in your house.

16. Even in this huge solitary forest frequented by robbers, living in banishment, deprived of your kingdom your virtue has suffered no decrease.

17. The Ashwamedha, the Rajshyua, Pundarika, the Gosava—all these great sacrifices requiring large gifts have been celebrated by you.

18. O king, by your perverse understanding, in your defeat at the gambling match you lost your kingdom, wealth, weapons your brothers and even myself.

19. How could your mind, simple, gentle, liberal, modest and truthful as you are, be drawn to the vice of gambling?

20. Beholding this your calamity and misfortune my sense is bewildered and mind overwhelmed.

21. I shall cite here an old historical incident as an illustration that men are subject to the will of Providence and not to themselves.

22. The Lord Ishana ordains beforehand, with reference to weal and woe, happiness and misery, of all creatures like a seed.

23. O hero among men, O king, as a wooden figure is made to move its limbs by the wire-puller so are all these creatures (made to act by the lord.)

24. O descendant of Bharata, pervading all creatures, like ethereal space the Providence ordains its happiness or misery.

25. Like a bird tied with a string all creatures depend upon God; they all live in dependence upon God not upon others; nor are they their own masters.

26. Like a pearl set on a string, a bull tied by a rope passing through its nose, or a tree fallen from the bank into the middle of a river

27. All creatures follow the ordinances of the Creator for they are identical with Him and live in Him; they are not subject to themselves and cannot pass an hour independently.

28. Ignorant as they are, creatures are not masters of their own happiness or misery; despatched by the Providence they either go to heaven or hell.

29. As light straws are brought to the subjugation of the strong wind, so all creatures, O descendant of Bharata, depend upon the Creator.

30. Again, performing actions right or wrong and pervading the universe, the Lord exists but is not perceived by any (who can say) "This is God."

31. This physical body is merely the instrument of God by which the Lord engages them in actions, the fruits of which are either good or bad.

32. Behold the power of the illusive energy by which he makes them kill their fellows.

33. This is seen in a different light by the sages seeing the real truths; they appear to them in a different light like the rays of the sun.

34. Ordinary people see all those things in a different view; the Lord creates and destroys them in a different way.

35. As one can break a piece of inactive senseless wood with wood, stone with stone and iron with iron,

36. So, O Yudhishthira the Self-create, divine Grand sire spreading his illusive energy destroys creatures, with creatures,

37. Like a child playing with his creatures, creating and destroying them.

38. O king, the Providence behaves towards the creatures, like a father or mother; like an ordinary person he (sometimes) seems to be angry towards them

39. Seeing elderly, well-behaved and modest persons, in distress and the vicious, in happiness, I am beside myself with thought.

40. O son of Pritha, seeing your misfortune and the prosperity of Suyodhana, I blame the Providence who sees such an inequality.

41. Conferring prosperity upon the wily avaricious son of Dhritarastra, who transgresses the sacred scriptures, and injures virtue, what fruit shall the Creator reap?

42. If the act done follows the performer then forsooth, the God himself is contaminated with the sin of every action.

43. If the sin consequent upon actions does not touch the doer then the individual power is the cause and I grieve for those who are weak.

Thus ends the thirtieth chapter, the conversation between Draupadi and Yudhishthira, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXXI.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. O Yajmaseni, your speech is sweet, clear and full of nice expressions ; we have listened to it ; you speak of atheism.

2. O princess, I never act being desirous of the fruits thereof ; I distribute (a thing) which should be distributed and I perform a sacrifice which should be performed.

3. I perform, as best as I can, O Krishna, what a householder should do, not caring for the fruits (of my actions).

4. O fair lady, I act piously not for getting the fruits of virtue but for not transgressing the Vedas and seeing the conduct of the pious.

5—6. My mind and nature, O Krishna, are naturally bent upon virtue ; that vile trader of virtue, the worst of the virtuous, who wishes to reap the fruits of virtue, does never obtain them ; nor does a vicious-minded person, for his scepticism, who doubts a virtuous act, having accomplished it.

7. From the evidence of the Vedas I say :—“ You should never doubt virtue ; the person doubting virtue is destined to be born amongst the brutes”.

8. A weak-minded man who doubts religion, virtue and the words of the Rishis, is precluded from the regions of immortality and bliss as the Sudras are from the Vedas.

9. O large-minded lady, one studying the Vedas, virtuous, and born in a high race, (though young) is considered aged by the pious royal saints.

10. That vicious-minded one, who transgresses the scriptures and doubts virtue is regarded as lower even than the Sudras and robbers.

11. You have seen with your own eyes the great ascetic Markandeya of incomparable magnanimity come to us who has been rendered immortal by virtue.

12. Vysa, Vasistha, Maitreya, Narada Lomasha, Suka and all other Rishis have become of pure souls by virtue.

13. You yourself see all these endued with celestial asceticism capable of cursing or blessing and superior even to the celestials.

14. O sinless lady, these sages, equal to the Rishis and who can see what is written in the Vedas, describe virtue as the foremost duty.

15. You should not, O blessed queen, with a foolish mind either doubt or censure the Providence or (His act).

16—17. The fool, who doubts religion and disregards virtue and being proud of the proof of his own reasoning, does not receive it from others, considers all these sages who look upon the future as present, like mad man. He considers the external world as conducive to the gratification of senses and is blind to everything else.

18. Whoever, doubts religion has no expiation of his sin ; that wretched and vile person feels anxiety (here) and does not attain to the regions (of bliss) hereafter.

19. That stupid person, who does not regard evidences, who vilifies the interpretation of the Vedic texts, and who commits sin under the influence of lust and covetousness, is doomed to hell.

20. O blessed lady, he however, who, with faith and without any doubt follows religion, attains to eternal bliss in the next world.

21. That stupid person, who transgresses the evidences of the Rishis, who does not follow religion and who transgresses all the scriptures, never obtains bliss in any life.

22. For him, O fair lady, who disregards the words of the Rishis and does not care for the evidence of the pious, neither this world nor the next exists.

23. Doubt not, O Krishna, the ancient religion which is followed by the good and formulated by the omniscient and omnipotent Rishis.

24. O Draupadi, virtue is the only raft and nothing else to those who wish to go to heaven, like a ship to the merchant wishing to cross the ocean.

25. O blameless lady, if the pieties practised by the virtuous had no fruits then this world would have been enshrouded by by infamous darkness.

26. None would have followed emancipation, none would have cared for the acquisition of knowledge or even of wealth and people would have lived like beasts.

27—28. If devout penances, life of celibacy, sacrifice, the study of the Vedas, charity and honesty—these were fruitless then people would not have practised virtues, generation after generation. If all the actions had been fruitless a terrible confusion would have set in.

29. Why do the Rishis, the gods the Gandharbas, the Asuras and the Rakshasas who are lords of themselves, with love practise virtues ?

30. Considering for certain that Providence is the giver of fruits in virtue, they practise virtues ; O Krishna, for them is eternal bliss.

31. Whereas the fruits of knowledge and ascetic observances are seen, virtue and vice can never be devoid of fruits.

32. Recollect, O Krishna, the circumstances of your birth, as you have heard and also the manner in which the powerful Dhristadyumna was born.

33. These are sufficient proofs, O you of sweet smiles ; the self-controlled reap the fruits of acts and are satisfied with a little.

34. Ignorant and stupid persons are not satisfied even with much and they have no happiness begotten of virtue for them in the next world.

35. The fruits of the holy acts laid down in the Vedas as well as of sinful acts, the root and the destruction of actions, O fair lady, are mysteries even to the celestials.

36. These are not known to all ; ordinary people are ignorant of these ; he does not follow in a thousand Kalpa the well-being of the celestials.

37. These are kept (in secrecy) by the celestials—for their *illusiv*e energy is mysterious ; those Brahmanas that have conquered their aspirations, those that have built up their hopes, those whose sins have been burnt down by ascetic observances, those who have got contented minds, can observe these.

38. For not seeing the fruit you should not doubt religion or the gods ; you should perform sacrifices assiduously and charities without any insolence.

39. Acts have their fruits in this world and virtue is eternal ; as said by Kashyapa, Brahma told all this to his sons.

40. O Krishna, let your doubt be destroyed like dews meditating upon all this. Let your scepticism yield to faith.

41. Do not speak ill of God who is the lord of all creatures ; learn to know Him ; bow to him ; let not your understanding be such.

42. Never disregard that Supreme being, O Krishna, by whose mercy the mortals, by pious observances, become immortals.

Thus ends the thirty first chapter, the conversation between Draupadi and Yudhisthira, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXXI.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Draupadi said :—

1. I never disregard or speak ill of religion, O son of Pritha ; why should I disregard God, the lord of creations ?

2. O descendant of Bharata, consider me raving as being stricken with misery, listen to me, I shall again bewail.

3. O represser of enemies, forsooth every conscious being should engage in actions in this world ; it is only the immobile and not even other creatures that can live without action.

4. Immediately after the birth the calf sucks the mother's teat. (People feel distress) as soon as incantations are performed on their statues ; the creatures, O Yudhisthira, deserve the character of their lives according to pristine actions.

5. O foremost of Bharatas, this is the difference of man from mobile creatures, that he aspires to like his course of life both in this world and in the next by means of his acts.

6. O descendant of Bharata, all creatures perceive the impression of the pristine life and they visibly reap in this world the fruits of their acts.

7. All creatures live according to the impression of the pristine life, even the creatures and the ordainers of the universe like a crane that lives on the water.

8. The course of life for a creature that does not act is impossible ; for them there is action and never inaction.

9. You should therefore act and never incur censure by leaving affection ; cover yourself with action as with an armour. There might not be one in a thousand who does not truly understand the utility of work.

10. One should act either for increasing or protecting his wealth ; if spent without being earned it vanishes although it be like (the mount) Himavana.

11. All creatures would have been exterminated if there were no action ; if acts had born no fruits they would not have multiplied.

12. It is sometimes observed that creatures perform acts that give them no fruits ; for without action the course of life would be an impossibility.

13. Whoever in this world believes in Destiny and whoever in chance are both the worst of people; those only are praise-worthy who believe in the efficacy of acts.

14. He, who has been at ease without any action and believing in Destiny, is soon consumed like an unburnt earthen pot in water.

15. So also that man, who believes in chance, and who, though capable of work, does not work, does not live long, for his life is one of weakness and helplessness.

16. If a person in the world attains, by accident, to an accession of wealth—people consider it derived from chance for none has tried for it.

17. O son of Pritha, whatever good fortune a person acquires in consequence of religious rites is called Providential.

18. The fruit, that a person reaps by acting himself, and which is the direct outcome of his actions, is considered as a proof of manliness.

19. Of best of men, know that the riches acquired spontaneously and without cause are considered as a spontaneous acquisition.

20. Whatever is thus acquired accidentally, providentially or spontaneously by a person is the outcome of his pristine actions.

21. And judging according to their pristine actions, the good and bad, the ordainer of the universe distributes among men, their portions in this world.

22. Know that whatever actions, either good or bad, that a person performs are the outcome of God's arrangements with reference to their pristine actions.

23. This body is the instrument of God for actions; inert in itself, it performs what is urged on by God.

24. O son of Kunti, it is the supreme Lord of all who makes all creatures do what they do, though they themselves are all inert.

25. O hero, having settled upon some object in mind, a man carries it out into action aided by his intelligence; man is himself therefore the cause.

26. O best of men, the number of actions cannot be ascertained for towns and palaces are the result of man's acts.

27. By the aid of their intelligence, intelligent men know that oil may be had from sesame, curds from milk and that food may be cooked by means of igniting fuel; they know the means for accomplishing them.

28. Thereupon they set themselves, by instruments, to accomplishing them; and creatures maintain their lives by the results acquired in these directions by their own acts.

29. If a work is done by a clever workman it is done well; from the difference in execution another work may be said to be that of an unskilled hand.

30. If a person were not himself the instrument of his acts, the sacrifices would not bear any fruits in his case nor would any body be a disciple or preceptor.

31. It is because a person is himself the instrument of his action that he is praised when he acquires success, so the doer is censured when he is unsuccessful; nothing else exists.

32. Some say that everything is the outcome of chance, some say everything is providential, whereas others hold that this, is not so, but everything that is said to be the outcome of Destiny or chance is the result of pristine actions.

33. It is seen that wealth proceeds from chance or Destiny; something accidental and something natural.

34. In the acquisition of fruits for a man, there is not the fourth cause; this is said by those who are cognisant of truth and well-versed in knowledge.

35. If God himself were not the bestower of good or bad fruits then amongst creatures there would not be any miserable being.

36. If pristine actions had no existence then all purposes for which a man would work should prove successful.

37. Those persons, who do not observe these three doors for the accomplishment of objects as well as for the failure, are dull and exist like the body itself.

38. Man should always act; for this is the conclusion of Manu; a person that does not act is always defeated.

39. A man of action in this world, O Yudhishthira, generally meets with success; the idle however never acquire success.

40. If success becomes impossible a person should remove the difficulties; when engaged in action, O king, he is freed from debts (whether he is successful or not).

41. Adversity overpowers a person who is idle and lies down; whereas whoever is active reaps success and enjoys prosperity.

42. Intelligent persons engaged confidently in acts consider all who are diffident as doubting and unsuccessful.

43. Now we are overtaken by misfortune and if you engage in action this misfortune will certainly be removed.

44. Even if you are unsuccessful it shall be proved to you, Vrikodira, Vivatsu and the twins (that you are unable to take the kingdom).

45. The actions of others have been seen crowned with success and ours might be as well; how can one, performing action, perceive beforehand what would be the result?

46. Having tilled the ground with plough one sows the seeds; the tiller then sits silent (for) the clouds are the next cause.

47. If however the clouds do not favour him the cultivator is not to blame—he says:—"I have done what others do."

48. If however I do not meet with success I am not to blame" thinking this he contents himself and does not reproach himself.

49. O descendant of Bharata, no one should despair, saying:—"I am working still I do not succeed," for besides exertion there are two other causes for success.

50. Success or failure, no one should despair, for success in action depends upon the union of many circumstances.

51. One element wanting proportionate success does not come or nothing at all; if however no exertion is made no success is acquired, nor any quality is seen.

52. The man is by his intelligence, and according to his might and power, brings place, time, means and auspicious rites for the acquisition of prosperity.

53. One should assiduously engage in action, his guide being his prowess; amongst the qualities necessary for action energy is the foremost.

54. If an intelligent man finds his enemy superior to him in many qualities he should accomplish his object by the arts of conciliation and proper appliances.

55. O Yudhishthira, he should wish for the calamity and banishment (of his foe)—what of mortal men, even he be an ocean or a mountain.

56. A person, by actively prying into the holes of his enemy, satisfies a debt to himself as well as to his enemies.

57. A man should never think ill of himself; whoever thinks ill of himself never earns splendid prosperity.

58. O descendant of Bharata, the success of persons is thus situated; it is said that the course of success depends upon time and situation.

59. In the days of yore my father housed a learned Brahmana; he said all this to my father, O foremost of Bharatas.

60. My brothers, formerly accepted from Vrihaspati moral precepts and then in our house I heard all this from them.

61. O king, O Yudhishthira, he said this to me, consoling, who had approached my father for some work and who for serving was seated on my father's lap.

Thus ends the thirty second chapter, the conversation between Draupadi and Yudhishthira, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having heard these words of Jagmaseni (Drupadi), Bhimasena came to the king (Yudhishthira.) And sighing in wrath, he thus spoke to him.

Bhima said:—

2. O king, walk as regards kingdoms in the customary path trodden by good men. What do you gain by living in the hermitage of the ascetics, thus deprived of Dharma, Artha and Kama?

3. Your kingdom has been robbed by Duryodhana by an unfair gambling at dice and not by virtue, or by honesty or by prowess.

4. He has robbed our kingdom like a weak offal-eating jackal that steals the prey from mighty lions.

5. O king, why do you, abandoning the wealth which is the source of both virtue and pleasures and in obedience of the (mere) trifling virtue of keeping one's promise, suffer such afflictions?

6. Our kingdom, protected by the wielder of Gandiva (Arjuna) and incapable of being snatched from us by (even) Sakra (Indra), was robbed from us in our very sight (only) on account of your carelessness.

7. It was for you, that notwithstanding we were alive, our prosperity was wrested from us like a fruit from one who is unable to use his arms or like kine from one who cannot use his legs.

8. O descendant of Bharata, you are firm in the desire of acquiring virtue. It was to please you that we suffered ourselves to be overwhelmed with such calamities.

9. O best of the Bharata race, it was because we are at your command that we are giving pain to our friends and joy to our enemies.

10. It was on our part an act of folly which gives me great pain that we did not, obeying your command, kill the sons of Dhritarastra then and there.

11. O king, this your living in the forest like an wild animal is an act which only a weak man alone would submit to.

12. Your this act is approved of neither by Krishna, nor by Vivatsu (Arjuna), nor by Abhimanyu, nor by the Srinjayas, nor by myself, nor by the sons of Madri.

13. Afflicted with your vow you always cry, "Virtue, virtue." O king, have you from despair become a man of no manliness?

14. Cowards only, being unable to win back their prosperity, cherish despair which is fruitless and destructive of one's own purpose.

15. You have ability and eyes. You see that we possess manliness. O king, it is because you have adopted a peaceful life that you do not feel (the pain of) this distress.

16. The sons of Dhritarastra consider us, who are only forgiving, as men really incompetent and weak. O king, this gives me more pain than death in battle would have given me.

17. If we all die in a fair fight without turning our backs on our foes, even that would be better than this exile, for we shall then obtain regions of bliss.

18. O best of the Bharata race, on the other hand if we become the ruler of the whole earth by killing them, that would be doing us a great good.

19. This is our bounden duty,—we who ever adhere to the duties of our own order, who are ever desirous of great achievements, and who wish to take revenge on our enemies.

20. Our kingdom having been robbed from us, if we (under the circumstances) engage in a war, our that act, when it will be known in the world, will bring us praise and not, condemnation.

21. O king, the virtue, that produces afflictions on one's ownself and on one's own friends, is no virtue at all. It is vice that produces calamities.

22. O sire, virtue is sometimes (the indirect cause of) the weakness of men. Dharma and Artha forsake such men, as pain and pleasure forsake a dead man.

23. He who practises virtue only for the sake of virtue always suffers afflictions. He can never be called a wise man. He cannot know the (real) purpose of virtue, as a blind man is incapable of seeing the light of the sun.

24. He who considers that his wealth exists for himself alone does not at all understand the purpose of wealth. He is like the servant tending kine in the forest.

25. He, again, who pursues Artha (profit or wealth) too much without pursuing Dharma (virtue) and Kama (pleasure) deserves to be censured and killed by all creatures.

26. He who always pursues Kama without pursuing Dharma and Artha loses his friends and also loses virtue and profit.

27. Such a man, indulging in pleasure at will, becoming destitute of virtue and profit, meets with certain death at the expiration of the period of enjoyment, as the fish dies when the water is dried up.

28. It is for this, those that are wise always pursue both virtue and profit, for the union of virtue and profit is the essential requisite of pleasure, as wood is of fire.

29. Pleasure has always virtue for its root, and virtue is always united with pleasure. Know that both are dependent on one another, as the ocean and the clouds (depend on each other.)

30. The sensation that one feels in consequence of the contact with the objects of touch or in consequence of the possession of wealth is called pleasure. It exists in the mind and has no corporeal existence.

31. O king, he that wishes to have Artha should seek a large share of virtue. Those that wish Kama should seek (also) Artha, but Kama does not yield any thing in return.

32. Pleasure brings its own fruit; it cannot lead to another (pleasure). Ashes may be had from wood, but nothing could be had from ashes.

33. O king, as a fowler kills the birds, so does sin kill all the creatures of the world.

34. He who, being misled by pleasure and covetousness, does not understand the nature of virtue, deserves to be killed by all. He becomes a wretch here and hereafter (after death.)

35. O king, it is evident that you know that pleasure is to be derived from virtuous objects of enjoyments. You also know (what) their ordinary states as well as their great changes (are).

36. From their (objects of enjoyment's) loss, destruction, decrepitude and death, arises what is called affliction. That affliction has overtaken us.

37—38. The pleasure that is produced by the five senses, by the mind and by the heart being directed to the objects proper to each, is in my opinion, one of the best fruits of our actions. Thus Dharma, Artha and Kama should be taken into one's consideration one after the other.

39. One should not pursue virtue alone. No man should consider profit or pleasure as the highest object of his desire. All the three should always be (equally) pursued.

40. The Shastras ordain that one should pursue virtue in the morning, profit at noon, and pleasure in the evening.

41. The Shastras ordain that one should pursue pleasure in the first, profit in the second and virtue in the last portion of his life.

42. O foremost of eloquent men, those that are learned and fully conversant with the proper divisions of time, dividing their time properly, pursue all three, Dharma, Artha and Kama.

43. O king, O descendant of Kuru, whether freedom from all these three (Dharma, Artha and Kama) or possession of them is the better course for those that desire happiness, should be settled by you after careful thought.

44. O king, you should then without the least hesitation act either to achieve them or to abandon them, for he who lives wavering between the two becomes most miserable.

45. It is well that your conduct is ever regulated by virtue. Knowing this, your sensible friends advise you to act (thus).

46. O king, gift, sacrifice, adoration to the honest, study of the Vedas and honesty, —these are the highest virtues strong both here and hereafter.

47. But, O foremost of men, these virtues, cannot be attained by one that has no wealth, even if he possesses infinite other accomplishments.

48. O king, the universe depends on virtue. There is nothing higher than virtue. O king, virtue is attainable (only) by those who possess wealth.

49. But wealth cannot be acquired by leading the life of a mendicant nor by bearing a life of weakness. O king, wealth can be earned by virtuous intelligence.

50. O best of men, in your case, begging, which is a success to the Brahmana, has been forbidden. Therefore try to acquire wealth by prowess and energy.

51. It is not proper for you to lead a life of mendicancy or the life of Sudra. Prowess and energy constitute the special virtue of the Kshatrya.

52. Therefore, O son of Pritha, perform the duty of your own (order) and destroy the enemies. Destroy the prowess of the sons of Dhritarastra with my help and with that of Partha (Arjuna).

53. The wise and learned man says that prosperity is virtue. Therefore, acquire prosperity, for you ought not to be in frivolity.

54. O king of kings, awake and understand the eternal virtues (of one's own order). You belong by birth to an order the acts of which are cruel and are the sources of pain to others.

55. O king, cherish your subjects and reap the fruits (of that good act) that can never be wrong. This is the eternal duty ordained (for us the Kshatryas) by the Creator himself.

56. O son of Pritha, if you fall off from it, you will be the laughing stock (of all men). Deviation from the duties of one's own (order) is never praised.

57. O descendant of Kuru, therefore, making your heart as the order in which you belong requires it, and abandoning this your course of weakness, summon prowess and bear your weight (of duty) like one that bears it manfully.

58. O king, no monarch can acquire the sovereignty of earth, or prosperity, or affluence by means of being only virtuous-minded.

59. As a fowler catches a flock of very easily-tempted games by offering them some attractive food, so does an intelligent man acquire a kingdom by offering bribes to his enemy's men and covetous enemies.

60. O foremost of monarchs, the Asuras, though they were elder brothers of the Devas and though they were in affluence were, vanquished by the Devas by means of stratagem.

61. O mighty armed hero, O ruler of the world, thus every thing belongs to those that possess might. Destroy your enemy by means of stratagem.

62. There is none equal to Arjuna in wielding the bow in battle. There is none equal to me in wielding the mace.

63. O king, men of prowess engage in battle depending on their prowess alone,—and not on the strength of numbers, and not on informations of the enemy's plan through spies. O son of Pandu, therefore exert your prowess.

64. Prowess is the root of wealth ; whatever else is called its root is not so. As the shade of the tree in winter is useless, so is every thing fruitless without prowess.

65. O son of Kunti, wealth should be spent in the way that seeds are scattered on the ground by one who wishes to increase it. Let there be no doubt (about it) in your mind.

66. But where wealth is more than sufficient, there should be no expenditure of wealth. In such cases investment of wealth is like the scratching of an ass, which is first pleasurable and then painful.

67. O king of men, a man, who in order to earn a greater measure of virtue casts away like seeds the little virtue that he is sticking to, is certainly considered to be wise.

68. Those, that are learned, alienate the friends of the foe that possesses friends. Having thus weakened him by making his friends abandon him, they bring him to subjugation.

69. O king, those that are strong engage in battle by depending on their own courage. They do not conquer people by continued efforts or by the arts of conciliation.

70. O king, sometimes those that are weak kill a powerful enemy by combination, as bees kill the spoiler of their honey by the force of their numbers.

71. O king, like the sun that sustains as well as destroys all creatures by his rays, you too adopt the ways of the sun.

72. O king, it has been heard by us in the Puranas that to protect one's own kingdom and cherish one's own subjects,—as was done by our forefathers,—is a kind of Tapa (austerities).

73. O king, a Kshatrya cannot acquire those regions of blessedness which he can by fair fight, whether (that fight) ends in victory or defeat.

74. Seeing your this affliction, (the people of) the world have come to this conclusion that light may (some day) forsake the sun and beauty may (some day) forsake the moon.

75. O king, the learned men, both separately and assembling together, talk with one another by praising you and blaming the other (Duryodhana)

76. O king, over and above this the Brahmanas and the Kurus assembling together talk cheerfully of your great adherence to truth.

77. They say that you have, never from delusion, from meanness, from covetousness, from fear, from desire or from wealth, uttered an untruth.

78. Whatever sin a king commits in acquiring dominions, he consumes it all by means of performing sacrifices in which large Dakshinas are given away.

79. O king, as the moon emerges from the clouds, so does a king emerge from all sins by bestowing thousands of villages and kine on the Brahmanas.

80. O descendant of Kuru, O Yudhishthira, all the citizens and the inhabitants of the country, both young and old, praise you.

81. "As milk in a bag made of a boar's hide, as the Vedas in a Sudra, as truth in a robber and as strength in a woman, so is sovereignty in Duryodhana."

82. Thus talk the people amongst one another. O descendant of Bharata, even women and children are repeating it, as if it were a lesson they wanted to commit to memory.

83. O chastiser of foes, you have fallen into this state along with us. Alas ! we too are lost with you on account of your this calamity.

84—86. Therefore, ascending on your chariot, furnished with every implement of war and making the chief Brahmanas utter benedictions on you, march at once,—even this very day,—against Hastinapur, so that you may be able to give to the Brahmanas the spoils of your victory. Surrounded by your brothers, who are all great wielders of bows and by (other) heroes, who are all skilled in weapons and all like virulent snakes, start (at once) like the slayer of Vitra (Indra) surrounded by the Marutas. Destroy with your prowess your weak enemies as the slayer of Vitra (Indra) destroyed the Asuras. O son of Kunti, snatch away from the son of Dhritarasta (Duryodhana) the prosperity he (now) enjoys.

87. There is no mortal who can withstand the touch of the arrows which are equipped with the feathers of vulture and which are like the snakes of virulent poison, when these are shot from the Gandiva (bow.)

88. O descendant of Bharata, there is not a warrior, not an elephant, not an horse that can withstand the force of my mace when I am angry in battle.

89. O son of Kunti, why should we not snatch back our kingdom from our foe after fighting a great battle with the help of the Srinjayas the Kaikeyas, and the chief of the Vrisnis.

90. O king, why should we not succeed in snatching away the (sovereignty of the) earth from the hands of our enemy? Let us but try with the help of a large army.

Thus ends the thirty third chapter, the words of Bhima, in the Arjunabhigamana of the Vana Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

(ARJUNABHIGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having been thus addressed by Bhimasena, the high-souled and ever devoted to truth, Ajatsatru (Yudhisthira), mastering his patience, thus spoke after a few moments.

Yudhisthira said:—

2. O descendant of Bharata, no doubt all this is true. I cannot reproach you for giving me pain by piercing me with your arrowy words. From my folly alone this great calamity has overtaken you all.

3. I was engaged to play at dice with the desire of snatching from Dhritarastra's son his kingdom with its sovereignty. It was thus that the cunning gambler, the son of Suvala (Sakuni), played with me on behalf of Suyodhana (Duryodhana).

4. O Bhimasena, that dweller of the mountainous country, Sakuni, is exceedingly artful. Playing at dice in the midst of the assembly—unacquainted as I am with the artifices of any kind,—he defeated me by adopting all possible artful means. It is therefore we have been overwhelmed with this calamity.

5. Seeing the dice obedient to the wishes of Sakuni in Ayuja and Yuja (odds and evens), I could have controlled my mind, but anger (you know) drives off a person's patience.

6. O child, the mind cannot be controlled when it is influenced by manliness, pride and prowess. O Bhimasena, I do not reproach you for what you have said. I consider that what have happened was pre-ordained.

7. O Bhimasena, when the king (Duryodhana) the son of Dhritarastra, wishing to get possession of our kingdom, plunged us into misery and even slavery, it was Drupadi who rescued us.

8. When summoned again to the Sabha for playing once more, you as well as Arjuna know what the son of Dhritarastra told me in the presence of the Bharatas.

9. (He said), "O prince Ajatsatru, you shall have to live for twelve years with all your brothers (if defeated in the play) in the forest which you will chose to dwell in, but which must be known to all men; you shall have to spend the thirteenth year in disguise without your whereabouts being known to any body.

10. O sire, O son of Pritha, (if during that period) spies of the Bharatas, hearing of you, become successful in discovering you, you shall then have again to live in the forest for the same period passing once more the last year in secrecy. Reflecting on this, pledge yourself to it.

11. O king, as regards myself, I pledge myself in this assembly of the Kurus, if you can pass this period of time evading the vigilance of my spies and if you can remain undiscovered by them, then O descendant of Bharata, this kingdom of the five rivers will be once more yours.

12. O descendant of Bharata, we also, if defeated by you at play, shall all of us, abandoning all our wealth, pass the same period according to the same rules." Thus said that king in the midst of the Kurus; and I said "So Be it."
