UDYOGA PARVA. 5.

CHAPTER I.

(SAINYODYOGA PARVA).

Having saluted the Supreme Deity (Narayana), and the highest of all male beings (Nara) and also the Goddess of Learning (Saraswati), let us cry success!

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then the heroic sons of Kuru belonging to the party of Abhimanyu pleased at having celebrated his (Abhimanyu's) nuptials and having rested during the night, awoke at break of day and went to the court of Virata.

2. The court of the Lord of the Matsyas was richly decorated and adorned with a collection of precious stones and choice gems, with seats arranged in it, having garlands and filled with fragrance. Those aged kings among men came there.

3. On the front seats sat the two kings Virata and Drupada, aged and revered among the rulers of the earth, and Rama and Janardana also along with their father.

4. Near the king of Panchala sat the brave ruler of Sini along with the son of Rohini and next to the king of Matsya (sat) Janardana and Yudhisthira.

5. (There sat) also all the sons of king Drupada, Bhima and Arjuna, the two sons of Madri, Pradyumna and Samba, who were valiant in battle, and Abhimanyu in company with the son of Virata.

6. And on the best seats wrought in gold sat the heroic sons of Draupadi who were equal to their fathers in valour, beauty and strength.

7. Those mighty heroes, shining in ornaments and clothes, being seated, that assemblage of kings shone like the firmament studded with beautiful stars.

8. Then those kings, heroes among men, having engaged in conversation with one another on various topics, remained for a moment gazing pensively on Krishna.

9. Those lions among kings, having reached the end of their talk, and their attention having been called by Madhava to the affairs of the Pandavas, listened to his lofty speech which conveyed deep meaning.

Krishna said:—

10. It is known to you all how this Yudhisthira was defeated by a trick at a game of dice by the son of Suvala, how he was robbed of his kingdom, and how he made a stipulation regarding his exile in the forest.

11. The sons of Pandu, who are capable of subjugating the world by sheer force of arms, whose chariots go unrestrained to the celestial or the terrestrial regions and who are true to their words, have fulfilled that austere vow for thirteen years.

12. The thirteenth year in the forest has been very hard, but this these great men have passed, unknown to you and suffering various sorts of unbearable hardships.

13. Even they who have been engaged in the menial service of others seek their family and their kingdom; such being the case, consider what is best for the son of Dharma (Yudhisthira) and for king Duryodhana.

14. (Consider) also what is right, suitable and calculated to redound to the glory of the illustrious Kauravas. The virtuous king Yudhisthira does not want even the kingdom of the gods wrongfully.

15—16. He would rather prefer the rightful lordship of some single village. It is known to all the kings (assembled here) how he has been robbed of his ancestral kingdom with the help of a mean trick by the sons of Dhritarashtra by whom the son of Pritha has not been vanquished through prowess borne by him.

17—19. Still the king Yudhisthira with his friends wishes them prosperity. The sons of Kunti, heroes among men, and the two sons of Madri, seek only what has been earned by the sons of Pandu by overthrowing the king and winning victory over him. It is also well known to you how, when they were mere boys, their enemies who were cruel, dishonest and who sought to get the kingdom, attempted by several means to kill them. Consider their greediness and also the extreme piety of Yudhisthira.

20. Consider also the relationship between them; consult together and also think each of you yourself. They have always been attached to truth and have always fulfilled their promises.

21. If they are now wrongfully treated let them slay all the sons of Dhritarastra or let their friends who see the unworthy treatment they get in this matter make them (the sons of Dhritarastra) desist.

22—23. If they (the sons of Dhritarastra) oppose them (the Pandavas) in battle the latter thus opposed will kill them; and if you are of opinion that the Pandavas, owing to insufficiency of numbers, will not be able to win victory over them let them combine with all their friends and try to overthrow them. The intentions of Duryodhana are not known nor what he is going to do.

24. The intentions of the other side not being known, how can you determine on what to do yourself. Therefore let a man virtuous, holy, of good parentage and wileless go from here—a capable ambassador who will be able to persuade them into surrendering half of Yudhisthira's kingdom.

25. Hearing this speech of Janardana which was pregnant with meaning and virtue, interesting and impartial, his elder brother accepted the suggestions and after praising the speech addressed him O king, thus.

CHAPTER II.

(SAINYODYOGA PARVA)—Contd.

Baladeva said:—

1. The speech of the elder brother of Gada which is at once marked by a sense of virtue and prudence and which has aimed at the good of both Yudhisthira (one who has created no enemies) and king Duryodhana, has been listened to by you.

2. The heroic sons of Kunti, being willing to forego half of their kingdom, are trying to get the other half; the sons Dhritarastra too should give up half and pass his days very happily with us.

3. These heroes among men, having obtained half of the kingdom, will take to a quiet life, if the other party does the same for their quietness means the good of their subjects.

4. I should be glad if some body were to go there to bring about good feelings among the Kauravas and the Pandavas, to know the intentions of Duryodhana and to tell them the views of Yudhisthira.

5. Let him invite Bhisma, the heroic son of Kuru, and the noble minded son of Vichitraviryya, Drona, with his son, Vidura and Kripa, and the king of Gandhara with the son of Suta.

6. And (with) also all the other sons of Dhritarashtra who have under their command the best army and a thorough knowledge of politics, who adhere to virtue, who are heroes among men, and who know the meaning of the Vedas and the signs of the times.

7. Let him tell all these men, and also the citizens and aged men, assembled together what the son of Kunti has said with all deference, and which is fraught with meaning.

8. Though they have taken possession of Yudhisthira's kingdom by force when he was addicted to gambling, still they ought not to be provoked under all situations.

9. This brave son of Kuru, unskilful at the game of dice, though dissuaded by all his friends, challenged this son of Gandhari, an expert in the game, to a match.

10—11. Although there were then at the place a thousand other people whom Yudhisthira could defeat at a game of dice, he took no notice of these and none of Karna and Suyodhana but challenged Suvala's son and was defeated by him in the game. He lost at every step.

12. Having once commenced, he lost through anger, and no blame can for this attach to the son of Sakuni; therefore it behoves him (the messenger) to speak with due deference to the son of Vichitraviryya, and assume a conciliatory tone.

13. By this means can the son of Dhritarashtra be persuaded, to enlist himself in our service, by the messenger. Let him address Duryodhana in a conciliatory tone, and with the desire of the reverse of war.

14. A point gained by peaceful means is really beneficial, that gained by war is not a gain at all—it is only injurious.

Vaishampayana said :—

15. While that valiant son of Madhu was yet speaking, all on a sudden rose the brave descendant of Sini and condemning his speech addressed these words to him.

Thus ends the second chapter, the speech of Baladeva in the Sainyodyoga of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER III.

Satyaki said :—

1. As the inner nature of a man is, so he speaks. As your inner nature is, so do you speak.

2. There are brave men and there are cowards. Both these well defined divisions are seen among human beings.

3. In the same family are born very powerful men, and powerless ones, as the same forest contains trees that bear fruits and those that do not.

4. O you who have the sign of a plough on your standard, I am not finding fault with your speech; I am, O son of Madhu, only blaming these who are listening to it.

5. How can one, who even in the slightest degree speaks ill of the virtuous king, dare continue in that strain without being checked, in this assembly.

6—7. People, experts at the game of dice, challenged the noble minded one who was unskilful in the game and defeated him; how can this be a defeat in the proper sense? If the son of Kunti had been playing with his brothers at home and those people coming there, defeated him, then that would have been a proper defeat. But they challenged the king who was ever attached to the observance of the rites of a Kshatriya.

8. They won by a mean trick; how can prosperity attend such men? And why should this man here, after fulfilling his vow, approach them in a humiliating spirit.

9—10. Freed now from his exile in the forest he has now attained to the position of his grandfather. Even if this Yudhishthira is seeking property wrongfully, it is not proper that he should beg other people's property though it would be righteous on their part not to surrender the kingdom.

11. Though Bhishma, Drona, and Vidura have passed the prescribed period unknown in exile, yet have they said that they have been recognized.

12. They would not now consent to give back the ancestral territories of the Pandavas. And I shall persuade them by means of cold arrows in the field of battle,

13. And make them fall at the feet of the noble son of Kunti. If they refuse to fall at the feet of the wise (Yudhishthira)

14. Then must they with their ministers go to the kingdom of death (Yama), ; they can not surely withstand Jujudhana (myself) determined to fight.

15. Can the mountains bear the force of the thunderbolt? Who can bear the force of him who uses the Gandiva as his bow (Arjuna) and of him who has the wheel in his hand (Bhimasena)?

16. (Who can bear the force of) myself when in wrath, or of Bhima who is hard to approach or of the twin brothers who firmly grasp the bow and whose effulgence is like that of Yama (who carries away life) and Kala (who cuts the thread of life) and the heroes Virata and Drupada who have the same quality?

17. What man valuing his life can approach the descendant of Preshata, Dhristadumna also the five sons of the Pandavas who have added to Draupadi's glory,

18. And who are the equals of the Pandavas in valour and in every other respect and having the true pride of a soldier, or (who can approach) the son of Subhadra, whose impetus is hard to be borne even by the gods,

19—20. And (who can approach) Gada, Pradyumna and Samba resembling Kala, the sun or the fire. We shall after killing the son of Dhritarastra, with Sakuni, and also Karna in battle appoint (as king) the Pandava. It is no sin to destroy an enemy who would have slain ourselves.

21. It is both impious and shameful to beg from enemies; do speedily, therefore that which is his (Yudhishthira's) heart-felt desire.

22. Let the Pandava get the kingdom surrendered by Dhritarastra. This day either shall Yudhishthira, the son of Pandu get the kingdom or all our enemies fall on the ground slain in battle.

CHAPTER IV.

(SAINYODYOGA PARVA)—Contd.

Drupada said :—

1. O you with long arms, it will doubtless turn out as you have said. Duryodhana will not give back the kingdom by peaceful means.

2. And Dhritarashtra, fond of his son, will follow him. So will Bhima and Drona out of a false regard for the kingdom and the two sons of Suvala out of folly.

3. In my opinion the suggestion of Baladeva is not appropriate ; it can certainly be acted on by a man who is desirous of an amicable settlement.

4. The son of Dhritarashtra ought by no means to be addressed to in a conciliatory tone ; I think that it is impossible to bring the ill-natured Duryodhana to reason by peaceful means.

5—6. Peaceful means should be adopted for asses ; but severe measures should be resorted to for kins. He who uses mild words to the ill-hearted Duryodhana would be set down as an incapable man by that vicious one, and if a mild course is adopted the fool will think himself to have won.

7. We shall do this ; let us make preparations here and send word to our friends to collect armies for us.

8. Let swift going messengers go to Salya, Dhristaketu, Jayatsena and the ruler of the Kekayas.

9. Duryodhana, too, will certainly send his messenger to all places and good men attend to those who send word first and who ask for help first.

10. Make haste, therefore, in first sending words to these kings among men. I think that some great event is about to come.

11. Send quickly to Salya and to those kings who are under his suzerainty, and the king Bhagadatta and the inhabitants of the Eastern seas,

12. And to Hardikya of unequalled prowess and to the haughty Andhaka and to Rochamana, the hero of good understanding.

13. Invite Brihanta, the king Senavindu and Senajit, Pratibindhya, Chitrabarma and Subastuka,

14. Also Vahlika, Munjakesha and the lord of the Chedis, Suparshwa, Suvahu, and the mighty Paurava,

15. Also those who rule over the Shakas the Pahlavas and the Duradas and Surari Nadija and the king Karnabeshta.

16. And Nila, Viradharm and the heroic Bhumipala, Dantabakra hard to vanquish, Rukmi and Janamejaya,

17. And Ashada, Vayubega and king Purvapali, Devaka of unusual prowess and Ekalabya with his son.

18. And the kings of the Karusha and the heroic Kshemaadhurti, and the rulers Kambaja and the Rishika tribes and the races inhabiting the west.

19. And Jayatsena and the rulers of Kashi and of the land of the five rivers and the invulnerable son of Kratha and the rulers of the hilly districts.

20. And Janaki, Susarma and Manimana and Potimatsyaka, and the king Pansarashtra and the heroic Dhristaketu.

21. And Tunda and Dandadhara and the valiant Brihatsena and the unconquered Nishada and Sreniman and Vasuman.

22. And Bahu of great strength and prowess and Parapuranjaya and Samudrasena with his brave son.

23. And Uddhaba and Kshemaka and the king Batadhana and Srutayu and Dridhayu and the valiant son of Shalya.

24. And Kumara and the Prince of the Kolingas haughty in battle.

25. I think that you should send (messengers) quickly to these and this Brahmin, O king, who is my priest, is a wise man.

26. Send him to Dhritarashtra and tell him what he is to say—how Duryodhana is to be addressed, how the king Shantanva, how Dhritarashtra, and how Drona, the best among the charioteers.

CHAPTER V.

(SAINYODYOGA PARVA)—Contd.

Vasudeva said :—

1. These words befit the chief of the king of the Pandu race who is unequalled in prowess.

2. It ought to be done first of all by us, who desire to act on the principles of politics and the man who acts otherwise is a fool.

3. But our relations are the same with the sons of Kuru and of Pandu, whatever at this present moment might be those amongst themselves.

4. We all have been invited here, and you as well, for the wedding, and the ceremony being over we shall go well pleased homeward bound.

5. You are the oldest among the kings both in age and in learning and we doubtless are like your pupils.

6. Dhritarastra too always reveres you much and you are the friend of the preceptors Drona and Kripa.

7. This day, therefore, tutor us in what is to the interests of the Pandavas. None of us shall question what you say.

8. If the chief among the Kurus seek peace on equal terms, there will be no injury done to the brotherly feeling between the Kauravas and the Pandavas.

9. If the son of Dhritarastra does not thus seek peace owing to the ignorance mixed with vanity, summon us after sending word to others.

10. Then the bad man Duryodhana along with his ministers and friends will meet his fate at the hands of him who uses the Gandiva as his bow and who will be fired with wrath.

Vaishampayana said :—

11. Then the lord of the earth, Virata, having treated the descendant of Vrishni with due honours, sent him home along with his men and his friends.

12. Krishna having gone to Dwaraka the followers of Yudhisthira, and also the king Virata made all preparations for the war.

13. Then did Virata and his friends and also the king Drupada send word to all the rulers.

14. At the request of those lions among the Kauravas and of the rulers of the Matsya and Panchala, came there cheerfully kings with large armies.

15. Having heard that a large army was being collected for the sons of Pandu, Dhritarastra too brought together many rulers.

16. At that time, O king, the earth became crowded with the throng of kings who had come either for the Kauravas or for the Pandavas.

17. And the earth at that time became thronged with the four elements of the army. The armies of those heroes began to pour in from all quarters.

18. And the goddess earth, with her mountains and forests seemed as if trembling.

19. And the king of the Panchalas, who was of the same opinion with Yudhisthira, sent to the Kauravas his own priest who was old both in wisdom and in age.

CHAPTER VI.

Drupada said :—

1. Of all beings, those that have life are superior. Of those that have life, those that live with the help of their intelligence are superior, of those that have intelligence man is superior and among men, those that are twice-born are superior.

2. Among the twice-born, those that know the Vedas are superior, and among the Veda-knowing, people whose understanding is cultured are superior, and among people with cultured understanding those living practical lives are superior, and among practical people those that know Brahma are superior.

3. I am of opinion that you are the chief among those who have cultured understanding, you come of a respectable family and you are aged both in years and in learning.

4. Your wisdom is equal to that of Sukra or the son of Angirasa and it is known to you what sort of a man the Kaurava is.

5. Also what sort of a man Yudhisthira and the son of Kunti the descendant of Pandu is. The sons of Pandu were dispossessed (of their kingdom) with the help of the knowledge of Dhritarastra.

6. Though he is advised by Vidura, he follows the instructions of his son and it was at the instigation of Sakuni that he challenged the son of Kunti.

7. Adepts at the play, they robbed the virtuous king Yudhisthira who was holy, attached to the rules of the Kshatriya class and unskilful at the game of dice.

8. On no account whatever will they give back the kingdom voluntarily. You, too, who will speak words of virtue to Dhritarastra,

9—10. Will certainly gain the hearts of his soldiers. And Vidura also by means of your words will try to create disaffection in the minds of Bhishma, Drona Kripa and others. With difference o opinion among the ministers and disaffection in the soldiers,

11.—12. It will be their duty to make them agree and join one another; and in the meantime the very wise sons of Pritha will easily make preparations for the war and collect stores.

13. While you are still there and their men are delaying, they no doubt will not be able to make preparations. This is necessary and here it seems imperative.

14. Yourself, being virtuous, should behave virtuously with them and Dhritarashtra, on your meeting him, may act in conformity with your virtuous words.

15. By detailing before those that are kind the hardships of the Pandavas and telling before old people the virtuous acts in the family done by their ancestors,

16. I have no doubt you will estrange the minds of the men, and you need not have any fear for them for you are a Veda-knowing Brahmin,

17. And engaged in the post of an ambassador especially as you are aged. You therefore set out quick for the accomplishment of the interests of the son of Kunti at the moment called Jaya and at the position of the planets named Pushya.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. Being instructed in this way by the noble-hearted Drupada the priest went to the city called after the elephant.

Thus ends the sixth chapter the instruction of priest in the Sainyodyoga of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER VII.

(SAINYODYOGA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. His (Drupada's) priest, having gone towards the city called after the elephant, the Pandavas sent messengers to the rulers in the several parts.

2. Having sent messengers elsewhere, the best among men, Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti, of the race of Kuru himself, went to Dwaraka

3. The sons of Madhu, Krishna and Valarama, in company with the Vrishni race, and Andhaka and Bhoja by hundreds, having gone to Dwarabati,

4. The son of Dhritarashtra, himself a king, by sending scouts privately, came to know all that had been done by the Pandavas.

5. Having heard that Madhava was on his way he set out for the city of Dwaraka, with a retinue not large, and good horses which could be compared to the wind.

6. That very day had Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti, of the race of Pandu, arrived at the beautiful city of the Anartas.

7. The two sons of Kuru, foremost among men, having reached Dwaraka, saw Krishna asleep and went near him as he lay.

8. And as Govinda lay, Suyodhana entered and sat him down on the floor which he used as a seat near the head of Krishna

9. Then did enter the large-minded one, wearing a crown and stood with the hands clasped near the foot of Krishna.

10. The son of Vrishni, having awakened, first saw the one wearing a crown, and welcomed them and did them due honours.

11. The son of Madhu asked the cause of their coming and Duryodhana said as if in jest,

12. "It is befitting that you should lend me your help in this war, for your friendship with myself and that with Arjuna are equal.

13. And, O slayer of Madhu our relations with you are the same and this day I have come first to you.

14. From the time of our ancestors, good men have befriended him who has been the first to come; and you, O Janardana, are the best person in this world; therefore act after this good example which has always been followed."

Srikrishna said :—

15. I have not the slightest doubt that you came here first, but Dhananjaya, the son of Pritha has been, O king, first seen by me.

16. O Suyodhana, yourself having come first and he having been seen by me first, I shall help both of you.

17. But the holy books lay down that the younger persons should be aided first, therefore I should first assist Dhananjaya, the son of Pritha.

18. There is that large army of a hundred million of gopas who fight in battle, each of whom is capable of slaying me, and who are known as the Narayanas.

19. Let them, who are hard to vanquish in battle, be the army of one party of you and let myself who shall not fight, having put off my weapons, take the side of the other.

20. Of these two, O son of Pritha, choose any one after your liking, for under the law of custom you should have the right of choosing first."

Vaishampayana said:—

21. Dhananjaya the son of Kunti being thus spoken to by Krishna chose Keshava, who was not to fight in the battle,

22. (Who was) Narayana himself, the destroyer of those who were not his friends, who had volunteered a birth among men and who was superior to all the Kshatriyas, the gods and the Danavas.

23. And Duryodhana then chose the whole of that army. And O son of Bharata, having got thousands upon thousands of warriors,

24. And knowing (even) that Krishna was lost to him, he became mightily pleased; And O king, Duryodhana having taken that whole army of fearful strength came to the son of Rohini who was of great strength.

25. He submitted to him the whole cause of his coming, upon which the son of Sura said in reply to the son of Dhritarashtra.

26. "O you best among men, it is fitting that what was said by me at the time of the marriage, should be known to you.

27. O you son of Kuru, for your sake did I speak contradicting what Hrishikesha had said. O king! again and again did I point out that our relations with both of you were equal.

28. And what I said, Keshava did not accept. I cannot for a moment exist separated from Krishna.

29. I am no helper of either the son of Pritha or that of Duryodhana; such is the unalterable resolution I have come to after the opinion formed by Krishna.

30. You are born in the race of Bharata, honoured by all rulers of the earth; O you best among men, go and fight in strict accordant with the rules of honour and those of the military class."

31. Being thus addressed he embraced him who used the plough as a weapon and knowing that Krishna had gone over to the other side he regarded as though a victory had already been achieved in battle.

32. The son of Dhritarashtra, himself a king, then went to Kritavarma, and Kritavarma gave him an army counting an Akshauhini.

33. The son of Kuru, surrounded by all those troops, which were terrible looking, went forward with a light heart causing delight to his friends.

34. Duryodhana having departed; the creator of the world, Janardana, with yellow robes on, said to the wearer of the crown: "Knowing that I shall not take any part in the battle, why have you chosen me?"

35. Arjuna said: "There is no doubt that you can slay all of them. O foremost among men, I too, alone, am able to slay them all.

36. In this world you are an illustrious man and I shall attain to eminence similar to yours by killing them single-handed. I too am a seeker after fame and so will you be surrounded by me.

37. It has been my desire to have the office of the charioteer filled by you, and it is fitting that you should fulfil this desire which has been felt by me for a long time.

Vasudeva said:—

38. "It is fitting, O son of Pritha, that you measure yourself with me. I shall act as your charioteer, let your desire be fulfilled."

Vaishampayana said:—

39. Being thus rendered glad, the son of Pritha, in company with Krishna, and surrounded by the chiefs of the Dasharha race, came back to Yudhishthira."

Thus ends the seventh chapter, the setting out of Krishna in the Sainyodyoga of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER VIII.

(SAINYODYOGA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Shalya, having heard the news of hostility between the two parties, went to help the Pandavas, O king, surrounded by a large army and by his friends who were mighty in battle.

2. The encampment of his army occupied one half of a Yojana. That foremost among men was the lord of such a large army.

3-5. That man of great prowess and strength was, O king, the lord of an Akshauhini, and heroes—best among the Kshatriyas—with diverse armours, diverse ornaments and all riding diverse cars and animals, with diverse garlands, all putting on diverse dresses—the dresses and ornaments of their respective lands,—counted by hundreds and thousands—became the leaders of his army.

6. He went by slow marches to the place where the Pandavas were encamped, affording rest to his army, and as if causing pain to the beings and shaking the earth.

7. Duryodhana, having, O son of Bharata, heard that the great-minded one, mighty in battle, was coming, hastened towards him and welcomed him in person.

8. And for his accomodation and honour, Duryodhana had palaces erected in charming spots ornamented with gems and well decorated,

9. And sent there various artists for the amusement (of Shalya and his men) and provided there all sorts of eatables, drinks, meats, and garlands.

10. And he (provided) wells of various shapes calculated to increase the cheerfulness of the heart, and several sorts of streams, fountains and buildings.

11. Being welcomed and honoured by the agents of Duryodhana, as he arrived at these palaces in different countries, with the worship due to the gods,

12. He came to a palace, which would have been suitable even as the resting place for the gods; and being provided with all sorts of things and greeted with honours due to beings superior to man,

13. He thought too highly of himself and too little even of Purandara (Indra) and that, best among the Kshatriyas being pleased, asked the servants, saying:

14. "Where are the men of Yudhisthira who erected these palaces here? Bring them. In my opinion it is proper for those builders of palaces to be rewarded by me.

15. I shall reward them, may it so please the son of Kunti." They all then, surprised, informed Duryodhana of all this.

16. And when Shalya was very highly pleased and did not mind giving away even his life, Duryodhana, who had concealed himself there, appeared before his maternal uncle.

17. Seeing the king of Madra, he knew that all these attentions came from him and embracing Duryodhana said,—Accept what you desire.

18. Duryodhana said: "May thine word be true. Grant me an auspicious boon. It is fitting that you should be the leader of my army."

Vaishampayana said:—

19. Said Shalya "It is done. What else do you desire of me?" and the son of Gandhari kept on repeating "It is done."

Shalya said:—

20. "O Duryodhana, O you best among men, go to your own capital, I shall go to see that subduer of his enemies, Yudhisthira.

21. Having seen Yudhisthira, I shall come soon, O king. That best among men, the son of Pandu, must be seen by me."

Duryodhana said:—

22. "O king, O Ruler of the earth, come soon after seeing the son of Pandu. I depend on you. O best among kings, remember the boon you have granted me."

Shalya said:—

23. "Soon shall I return. (In the mean time) I wish you well; O king, go to your own capital." Then the two, Shalya and Duryodhana, embraced each other.

Vaishampayana said:—

24. And having thus done honour to Shalya, he came back to his own capital while Shalya went to the sons of Kunti to tell them of that act of Duryodhana's.

25. Having come to Upaplavya and entered the camp, Shalya saw all the sons of Pandu there.

26. And having come there, he, the long armed one accepted the customary water for washing his feet and other gifts including a cow.

27. And then that slayer of his enemies, the king of the Madras, having asked them about their health, embraced Yudhisthira, with great cheerfulness.

28. And having done the same to Bhima and Arjuna and both the twin brothers—the sons of his sister, Shalya, who had seated himself, said to the son of Pritha:

29. O best among kings, O son of Kuru, is it all right with you? O you victorious one! you have now passed the prescribed period of residence in the forest.

30. O king, great difficulties have been overcome by yourself residing in the forest, in the company, O chief of kings, of your brothers and this lady.

31. Residence unknown and unrecognized was another great difficulty overcome by you. O son of Bharata, naught but misery attends him who has lost a kingdom. Where is happiness for him?

32. After all this great trouble and misery brought on by the son of Dhritarastra, O king, you will get happiness after having slain your enemies, O great devotee.

33. The ways and habits of men are known to you, O great king, O lord of men and therefore, O son, never has the slightest avarice been present in you.

34. O son of Bharata, follow in the path of the great Rishi-king of old, and O my son Yudhisthira, be their equal in liberality, devotion and truth.

35. O Yudhisthira, forgiveness, power of self-control, truth, absence of desire for harm to anybody, and all other virtues, that are rare in this world, are present in you, O king.

36. You are mild, generous, religious, liberal, and attached to virtue. O king, all the virtues known among men are also known to you.

37. O son, everything connected with this world is known to you. O king, O you best among the race of Bharata, it is fortunate that this trouble is past.

38. It is fortunate that I see, O king O chief among the kings, O Lord, yourself, the treasury of virtues, and large-minded, come out of your difficulties."

Vaishampayana said :—

39. Then, O descendant of Bharata, did the king (Shalya) tell (the Pandavas) all about his meeting with Duryodhana, his promise and his boon.

Yudhisthira said :—

40. "O king, a good act has been done by you in that you have fulfilled a promise made when you were well pleased in the recesses of your heart.

41. But, O lord of earth, I wish you well. I want you to do one thing for me. O King, O you most honest one, though it is improper still must you do it.

42. O hero, listen to what I tell you, you are a great king equal to the son of Bama-deva in battle.

43. O you best among kings, when the two, Karna and Arjuna meet in two chariots (in battle) I have no doubt that the office of charioteer of Karna will be filled by you.

44. O King, if you wish well to me, Arjuna must be protected by you and you should do what kills the energy of the son of Suta, and what is calculated to bring him defeat. Though this is improper, yet must you do it, maternal uncle of mine.

Shalya said :—

45. "Hear me, O son of Pandu, I wish you well! O noble-minded one, what you are telling me is to kill the energy of the son of Suta, when I am with him.

46. I shall most certainly be his charioteer in the battle. He has always regarded me as the equal of the son of Vamadeva.

47. O you best among the race of Kuru, I shall most certainly, when with him who is desirous of battle, speak what will do him harm and go against him.

48. (I shall do this) so that his energy will be killed and his pride gone, O son of Pandu, and then it will be easy to kill him. I speak with all sincerity.

49. O son, I shall do what you have told me and I shall do any thing more can I which is for your good.

50. All the troubles you have encountered with Draupadi after the game of dice and the harsh words you have had, to listen to, through the son of Suta, and all the miseries endured, O illustrious one, through the Asura named Jata and Kichaka—all these unhappiness endured by Draupadi as (unhappiness was endured) by Damayanti—all this trouble, O hero, will give rise to happiness. Do not think that all this is through you, this is done by the Fate which has greater control over such matters.

53. O Yudhisthira, great minded persons, meet with difficulties. O Lord of the world, difficulties have been met with by the gods too.

54. We are told O king, O son of Bharata that the large minded Indra, the chief among the gods, had to endure great misery with his queen.

CHAPTER IX.

(SAINYODYOGA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. I want to hear how it was, O chief among kings, that the large minded Indra, with his queen met with grave difficulties.

Shalya said :—

2. O king, listen to this old story as related in ancient history, of how Indra with his queen met with difficulties, O son of Bharata.

3. There was a great devotee named Twastri who was the lord of all beings and the chief among gods. Out of pure wrath towards Indra, he created a son with three heads.

4. The place, occupied by Indra, was desired by this mysterious personage, who was as it were the image of the universe, and had three awful faces comparable to the sun, the moon, and fire.

5. With one mouth he read the Veda, with the second he drank wine and with the other he looked as if he would absorb the cardinal points.

6. He was a devotee, mild, having powers of self-control and engaged in religious worship and devotion. And O subduer of foes, the austerities practised by him could not be practised by others, for they were very hard and very difficult to be practised.

7. Shakra was depressed in spirits, at seeing the strength in devotion, and truthfulness of the one with unrivalled power, for fear lest he be the chief among gods.

8—9. O best among the race of Bharata, the skilful Indra thought of many ways by which the one with three heads, whose strength was ever increasing and who threatened to absorb the entire universe, could be made to engage himself in the enjoyment of sensual pleasures and not in that hard devotion.

10. He ordered fairies (to engage themselves) in decoying the son of Twastri, so that the three-headed one might, for certain, engage himself in the enjoyment of sensual pleasures saying them

11. "Be quick, go, and delay not in decoying him, (yourself) having beautiful hips, deck yourself in necklaces and beautiful pearls in such a way that his desires may be excited.

12. I wish you well, decoy him with all the gestures of lust marked with every sort of fascination and thus allay my fear.

13. O beautiful damsels, I feel restless in my heart. O ladies, destroy quickly this great fear of mine.

The Nymphs said :—

14. O Shakra, we shall try to decoy him so that, O you slayer of Vala, you may not experience any dread from him

15. The great devotee who now sits, as if scorching with his eyes, O lord, and whom we are going together to decoy. We shall try to get him under our control and thus destroy your fears."

Shalya said :—

16. Being commanded by Indra they went to the three-headed one and the lovely damsels tempted him there with various gestures of lust.

17. They displayed too the beauties of their person but the great devotee, though looking at them, did not at all enjoy the satisfaction (of looking at them).

18. Having brought his senses under his control, he was in point of gravity as the full ocean. The damsels too, having tried their best, came back to Shakra.

19. Then, with the palms of their hands clasped they all said to the chief among the gods: O Lord, He, whom it is very difficult to subdue, cannot be influenced away from his purpose.

20. O you with great parts, do what you should after this. The great-minded Shakra, having greeted the nymphs with due honours, sent them away.

21—22. O Yudhishthira, he thought of some means to slay him. And the chief among the gods who was valiant, famous as a gifted being of unfailing judgment and intelligent, fixed on a plan for slaying the three-headed one. (Thought he :) I shall this day hurl my thunderbolt on him, and he shall soon cease to exist.

23. A foe who has already grown up must not be made light of by even the powerful, a weak foe though he might be: deciding on this course of action laid down in the books, he firmly resolved on slaying him.

24. And Shakra, wrathful, flung his fearful and dread-inspiring thunderbolt, which could be compared to the fire, on the head of the three-headed one.

25. Being severely struck by the thunderbolt he fell down to the earth, like the loosened summit of a mountain.

26. Seeing him struck by the thunderbolt and lying like a mountain, the chief among the gods got no peace of mind, owing to his lustre which still retained its effulgence.

27. Though killed, his lustre was effulgent, and he seemed as if he were alive. It was strange that the heads of the slain one looked as if alive and for that reason fearful to behold. Shakra remained rapt in thought.

28. Then there came a wood cutter with an axe on his shoulder to that forest, O great king, where he was lying, felled down.

29. The Lord of Sachi, who still had fears, saw that wood cutter coming there by chance and the subduer of Paka soon said to him: quickly cut down the heads of this being; do what I tell you.

The wood cutter said :—

30. This man has large shoulders: the axe cannot cut down (the heads) nor shall I be able to do the deed which is regarded to be wrong by honest people.

Shakra said:—

31. You need not have any fears, do quickly what I tell you; through my favour shall your weapon be equal to the thunder-bolt.

The wood cutter said:—

32. I must know who you are and I want to hear why you have done this cruel deed to-day, Tell me the truth.

Indra said:—

33. I am Indra, the chief among the gods, let it be known to you O wood cutter. Do as I have told you. O wood cutter, do not ponder.

The wood cutter said:—

34. O Shakra, how is it that you are not ashamed at this cruel deed? Having killed this son of a Rishi, have you no fear of the sin of killing a Brahmana?

Shakra said:—

35. For the purification of my soul I shall thereafter practise some severe penance. He was my enemy, possessed of great strength and has been killed by my thunder-bolt.

36. To this day, O wood cutter, am I anxious and dread this. Quickly cut off his heads. I shall bestow a favour on you.

37. In sacrificial rites, men will give the heads of the beasts. This is the favour I grant you. Quickly do what I desire.

Shalya said:—

38. Having heard this, the wood cutter, after the speech of Indra, cut down the heads of the three-headed one with his axe.

39. The heads, being cut off, came out from them a good many birds of the Kapinjala, (doves) Tittira (sparrows) and Kalabinka (parrots) species.

40. From the mouth by which he used to read the Veda and drink Soma juice, came forth quickly birds of the Kapinjala species.

41. From the one by which, O king, he looked as if he would absorb (the cardinal points) came forth, O son of Pandu, birds of the Tittira species.

42. And from the mouth of the three-headed one which used to drink wine, came out birds of the Kalabinka species, and birds of prey, O best among the race of Bharata.

43. They having come out, Indra became tranquilized and went to heaven and the wood cutter too, well pleased, went home.

44. The chief among the gods, having killed his enemy, thought himself gratified. Twastri, the lord of all beings, having heard of the slaying of his son by Shakra, said these words with eyes red with wrath.

Twastri said:—

45. My son who was ever devoted to devotion, of a forgiving nature, endowed with self-control and who had brought his passions under his control, has been killed by you without any fault.

46. For this reason shall I create Vritra with a view to destroy Shakra. Let the worlds see my influence and power as also the great strength due to my devotion.

47. Let the chief of the gods also see it who is vile and of a vicious nature. Then the wrathful devotee of very great fame having performed his ablutions

48. And having made his offerings to fire, and having created the hero Vritra said: O you foe of Indra, grow up through the strength due to my devotions.

49. He grew up, and the height of his figure reached beyond the sky, and could be compared with the sun or fire. Like the sun that rises at the time of the annihilation of the universe, he said—What shall I do?

50. And the powerful one, being told to slay Shakra, went to the third heaven. And then there was a fierce battle between Vritra and Vasava.

51. O you the best among the race of Kuru! There was a hot contest between the two, both of whom were fired with wrath and then the hero Vritra caught hold of the chief among the gods who had performed a hundred sacrifices.

52. And opening his mouth the wrathful one threw him into his mouth. And Shakra being swallowed up by Vritra, the lords of the third heaven became very much terrified.

53—54. They highly powerful then created the Yawn which was to destroy Vritra and then the slayer of Vala contracted his limbs and came out of the open mouth of the yawning Vritra. Since that day has the yawn remained in the breath of men.

55. And seeing Shakra come out the gods all became joyful and then Vritra and Vasava again engaged themselves in fight.

56—57. O best among the race of Bharata, the fierce contest between the two, fired with ire, lasted for a long time, when in battle Vritra, possessed of power, got the victory through the strength due to the inner spirit of Twastri. Shakra turned his back and he turning his back the gods were very much depressed.

58. Being pierced with the spirit of Twastri they united with Shakra and all held a consultation with the Rishis, O son of Bharata.

59. Filled with dread they thought, O king, on what could best be done. Seated at the summit of Mandara, they, all desirous of the destruction of Vritra, went in imagination to Vishnu, who was never to be destroyed.

CHAPTER X.

Shakra said :—

1. The whole of this indestructible universe has been pervaded, O gods, by Vritra. There is nothing equal to opposing him.

2. I was before this capable of (doing this), but at present I am incapable. I wish you well. What can I do? I think he is hard to vanquish.

3. He is spirited, large minded, and of unparalleled prowess in battle and he will absorb all the three worlds with all their gods, asuras and men.

4. Therefore O ye denizens of the heaven, this is certain that by going to the abode of Vishnu and joining with that large-minded one and consulting with him we shall know the means of slaying the vicious one.

Shalya said :—

5. The gods being thus spoken to by Maghavan the group of Rishis placed themselves under the protection of the god Vishnu of great influence and competent to be a protector.

6. And they, distressed with the fear of Vritra, spoke thus to Vishnu the lord of all gods—In days of yore did you cover the three worlds with three steps,

7. And O Vishnu, robbed it of nectar and killed in battle all the Daityas and after slaying Vali the great Daitya appointed Shakra, as the lord of the gods.

8. You are the Supreme Lord of all the gods and the whole (of this world) is pervaded by you; you, O Lord, are the supreme Lord revered by all the worlds.

9. O You best among the immortals, be the means of salvation of the gods including Indra. O you slayer of Asuras, the entire world is pervaded by Vritra.

Vishnu said :—

10. Doing your good is my imperative duty; therefore am I speaking of the means by which he shall cease to exist.

11. In company with the Rishis and the Gandharvas you go to the place where that holder of the universal form is staying; make use of conciliatory policy towards him; then shall you win victory over him.

12. O gods, through my influence, victory will be on the side of Shakra. Being invisible shall I enter the thunder bolt—that excellent weapon of his.

13. O you best among the gods, go in company with the Rishis and the Gandharvas. Effect a truce without delay between Shakra and Vritra.

Shalya said :—

14. The Rishis and the dwellers, of the third heaven being thus spoken to by that god, went together, with Shakra at their head.

15. Then all those mighty ones came near him, through whose influence the ten cardinal points were on fire and being scorched.

16. Those gods, with Indra, then saw Vritra who seemed as if swallowing the three worlds and looking as the sun or the moon.

17. Then the Rishis came there and said these conciliatory words to Vritra. O you hard to conquer, this world is pervaded by your energy.

18. O you best of powerful beings, you will not be able to conquer Vasava and a very long period has elapsed since you commenced fighting.

19. All beings including the gods, the Asuras and the human beings, are enduring misery. Let there always exist, O Vritra, friendship between you and Shakra.

20. You will gain happiness and ever dwell in the regions of Shakra. Hearing these words of the Rishis, Vritra of great strength,

21—22. The Asura bowed unto all those Rishis with his head and said to them—O ye endowed with good qualities and O ye Gandharvas, what you all have said, I have listened to. O ye stainless beings, hear now what I say. How can there be peace between us two—myself and Shakra? How can there be friendship between two gods who are both powerful?

The Rishis said :—

23. The company of virtuous ones is desirable (even for a time); thereafter what is fated will come to pass. The opportunity of friendship with virtuous men should not be lost; therefore is the company of virtuous men desirable.

24. Wise men ever speak of firm friendship with virtuous men as wealth in times of pecuniary difficulties. The company of virtuous men is vast wealth indeed; therefore wise men should not injure virtuous ones.

25. Indra is honoured by virtuous men, and is the refuge of the large-minded. He is also truth speaking, blameless, understands virtue and has refined judgement.

26. Let there be peace, to eternity, with Indra; come to entertain faith in him; let not your opinion be otherwise.

Shalya said :—

27. The being with great lustre, having heard the speech of the great Rishis, said to them! O devotees, O lord, you are, of course, to be honoured by me.

28. O gods, if you do all that I am going to say then shall I do all that you have said to me, O foremost among the twice born.

29. Not by dry thing nor by a wet one; not by stone, nor by wood, nor by a weapon fit for use from a distance, nor by one fit for hand to hand fight, not during the day time nor during the night,

30. Shall I be capable of being slain, O chiefs among the Brahmanas, by Shakra, assisted by the gods. If you ordain this then shall there ever be peace with Shakra.

31. O best among the race of Bharata, the Rishis said—"very well" and Vritra too became pleased with having peace under these conditions.

32. Shakra too became delighted and became constantly engaged in the thought of finding out some means of killing Vritra.

33. The chief among the gods always remained anxious and on the look out for some loop-hole. He one day saw the great Asura at the sea coast.

34. It was evening, and the moment was awe-inspiring and the god thus thought of the boons granted by the large minded one (Vishnu).

35. This is evening, it is not in the sun; it is neither the night nor the day. And Vritra, the enemy who has robbed me of all, must be slain.

36. If I do not this day slay the great Asura, Vritra of great strength, and of a huge body by an artifice, it will not be well with me.

37. Thus thinking Shakra invoked Vishnu and then saw coming out of the sea, foam high as a mountain.

38. This is not wet nor dry nor is this a weapon. I shall fling this which will destroy Vritra in a moment.

39. Quickly did he fling the foam with the thunderbolt at Vritra and Vishnu having entered the foam destroyed Vritra.

40. And Vritra being slain, the cardinal points became divested of darkness, and a pleasant wind blew, and the beings of the earth rejoiced.

41. And then the gods along with the Gandharvas, Yakshas, Rakshashas, and Pannagas and the Rishis propitiated the great Indra with diverse hymns.

42. Being bowed down to by all beings, he encouraged all the beings in his turn. Slaying the enemy, the mind of Vasava became delighted with the gods.

43. The one knowing virtue worshipped the foremost in the three worlds, Vishnu, after the great hero and fierce god Vritra was slain.

44. Now, Shakra became overpowered by false-hood and exceedingly depressed in spirits and also overpowered by the sin of slaying the Brahmana (the three headed one.)

45. Staying at the end of the worlds, he became deprived of his senses and consciousness and the chief of the gods overpowered with the weight of his own sins could not be recognized.

46. He remained as if in disguise under the water restless as a serpent. And then the lord of the gods, struck with the fear of the sin of killing a Brahmana, was destroyed, so to say.

47. The earth became desolate and went to ruins and became treeless and the forests became dry. And the currents of the rivers became stopped and the lakes lost all their water.

48. And there came distress among the beings of the earth, owing to dearth of rain and the gods and the great Rishis remained struck with intense fear.

49. And the entire world oppressed with anarchy became overpowered with all sorts of disasters and the gods became frightened for no body would be their king.

50. And the divine saints in heaven also being deprived of the protection of the king of the gods became fearful. No body was inclined to be the king of the gods.

CHAPTER XI.

Shalya said:—

1. Then did all the gods and Yakshas with the Kinnaras say: Anoint this handsome Nahusha in the kingship of the gods.

2. He is powerful, enjoys fame and is ever virtuous. Going to him they said: O ruler of the earth be our king.

3. Thus, O king, did Nahusha, who wished their welfare, address the gods and the Rishis who were accompanied by our ancestors.

4. I am weak; it is not in my power to protect you. The powerful should make kings, (and) power ever graced Shakra.

5. All the gods and the foremost among the Rishis said to him: Endued with the virtue of devotion, protect our kingdom in heaven.

6. All of us doubtless have grave fears; be annointed our king, O foremost among monarchs, be the king of heaven.

7.—8. You will absorb the power, of the gods, the Danavas, the Yakshas. Rishis the Rakshasas, the Pitris, the Gandharvas, and all other beings within the range of your sight as soon as you see them. Setting virtue always above all other considerations be the lord of all worlds.

9. Protect also the Brahmarshis and the gods in heaven. And that chief among the kings being annointed the king in heaven, and placing virtue above everything else became the protector of the worlds.

10. Being granted a rare boon and obtaining the kingdom in heaven, he gave himself up to gratifying every wish of his, though before this he had ever been a virtuous being.

11. In all the gardens of the gods, and in the pleasure gardens, on the Kailasa and on the brow of the Himavat, on the Mandara and on the white mountains,

12. On the Salya, on the Mahendra, and on the Malaya in the seas and in the lakes surrounded by fairies and nymphs,

13. Nahusha, the king of the gods, spent his time in many sorts of sports and hearing many sorts of stories relating to the gods, which were sweet to listen to.

14.—15. (He spent his time also) with all sorts of musical instruments and sweet sounding songs. And Vishwvasu and Narada and Gandharvas and celestial nymphs and the six seasons personified, attended on him. Breezes, fragrant, cooling, and charming too blew on him.

16. The goddess, the dearly beloved Queen of Shakra, caught the gaze of the high-minded Nahusha, given thus to sporting.

17. Seeing her the evil minded one thus addressed his courtiers; why does not the goddess, the queen of Indra, attend on me,

18. As the lord of the gods and the worlds, I am Indra. Let Sachi come to my palace this day at once.

19. Hearing this speech of the evil minded one the goddess said to Vrihaspati:—Protect me from Nahusha O Brahmana. I throw myself entirely under your protection.

20. O Brahmana, do you speak of me as having all the auspicious marks on my person, as the consort of the king of the gods, and so exceedingly prosperous.

21. Before this have you spoken of me as being (ever) without widowhood, an only wife, and strictly chaste; let this speech of thine be made true.

22. O god, O lord, what you have said has never before proved false, therefore, O you foremost among the twice-born, let this said by you be true.

23. Then did Vrihaspati address the panic-stricken queen of Indra. What has been said by me, O goddess, will most certainly prove true.

24. You will soon see the king of the gods, Indra, come here. Nahusha need not be feared by you. I speak this truly.

25.—26. I shall without delay bring Indra near you. Nahusha heard that the queen of Indra had placed herself under the protection of Vrihaspati the son of Angirasa and the king became very angry.

Thus ends the eleventh chapter the fear of the queen of Indra in the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XII.

Shalya said:—

1. The gods and the foremost among the Rishis seeing Nahusha enraged said to the (now) terrible looking king of the gods.

2. O king of the gods, put aside this anger. At your anger the world, with its Asuras, and Gandharvas, and Kinnaras, and the great serpents, is stricken with panic.

3. O virtuous one, put aside this anger. Beings like you never get angry. That goddess is the wife of another. O lord of the gods, be propitious.

4. Turn back your mind from the wish of ravishing the wife of another. You are the king of the gods, we wish you well, protect your subjects by virtuous means.

5. Being thus addressed, he, struck with passion, listened not to those words. The protector of the gods then said to the gods regarding Indra.

6. Ahalya, the wife of a Rishi (herself) of good reputation, was ravished by Indra while her husband was alive. Why was he not then prevented by you.

7. In bygone days, many were the deeds of cruelty done by Indra, as also vicious deeds and deceitful ones. Why was he not prevented by you.

8. Let the goddess attend on me ; this will be of great benefit to her and it will also prove to be your means of safety.

The gods said :—

9. We shall bring here the wife of Indra as you wish, O lord of the heaven ; O hero, put aside this anger and be propitious, O lord of the gods.

Shalya said :—

10. Saying this, the gods accompanied by the Rishis, O son of Bharata, went to tell this unwelcome news to Vrihaspati and the wife of Indra.

11. And they said ; we are aware that the queen of Indra has placed herself under your protection at your abode, O chief among the Brahmanas, and that she has been accorded (your) protection, O chief among the Devarshis.

12. They, the gods with the Gandharvas and Rishis, pray you, O you of great lustre, to make over the Queen of Indra to Nahusha.

13. The king of the gods Nahusha of great lustre is superior to Indra. Let this lady with slender waist and bright complexion, choose him as her husband.

14. The goddess being thus spoken to, became depressed, and sobbed aloud with tears in her eyes and then crying said these words to Vrihaspati.

15. O you best among the Devarshis, I have no inclination for Nahusha ; I have thrown myself under your protection, O Brahmana, save me from this great calamity,

Vrihaspati said :—

16. It is settled that the queen of Indra, who has thrown herself under my protection, will not be turned out by me. I shall not turn out, O you who know what virtue is, the truthful and blameless.

17. I do not wish to do a wrong thing, especially as I am a Brahmana, who have heard what virtue is, and know the rules of virtue and am truthful.

18. I shall not do this ; go, you best among the gods ; listen to what has before been sung by Brahma, with regard to this matter, in days of old.

19. He that makes over a man, stricken with fear who has sought refuge with him, to the enemy, does not get protection himself when he desires it. His seed can not be sown at seed time nor does he get rain at the time for rains.

20. The gods do not favour the undertakings of him who makes over a man stricken with fear, who has sought refuge with him, to his enemy. The offering made by such a weak-hearted person is refused by the gods and he loses the kingdom of heaven, as if shorn of all power.

21. The gods with Indra will level his thunderbolt on him who makes over a man stricken with fear, who has sought refuge with him, to his enemy. And his children will die untimely deaths and his fathers ever engage themselves in quarrels.

22. Knowing it to be so, I shall not give up this Sachi, the queen of Indra, known in this world as the beloved queen of Shakra.

23. What will be of benefit to her will also be of benefit to me. Do that then, O Chief among the gods. I shall not give up Sachi.

Shalya said :—

24. Then the gods with the Gandharvas said to their preceptor ; O Vrihaspati, deliberate on what will be good policy.

Vrihaspati said :—

25. Let this auspicious goddess ask time of Nahusha ; this will be of benefit to herself and the same to us.

26. O God, Time is full of impediments. Time will lead time (i.e. we are in the dark as to what will happen hereafter). Nahusha is haughty and powerful alike by virtue of the boon granted him.

Shalya said :—

27. Being thus addressed by Vrihaspati the gods became well pleased and said ; O Brahmana, it is well said by you ; this will be of benefit to all the denizens of heaven.

28. O chief among the twice born, this is so. Let us propitiate this goddess. Then all the gods headed by Indra addressed these quiet words to the queen of Indra, through a desire to do good to the worlds.

The gods said :—

29. This entire world, with all its moveables and immoveables, is held dy you, you are an only wife and truthful ; go to Nahusha.

30. That doer of vicious deeds Nahusha, desirous of thee, O goddess, will soon be destroyed and Shakra will regain the lordship of the gods.

31. Making herself sure on this point, the queen of Indra went with bashful looks to Nahusha (now) fearful to look at, for the accomplishment of the object.

32. And Nahusha seeing her, possessed of youth and beauty, became pleased ; the consciousness of that vicious soul was stricken with passion.

CHAPTER. XIII.

Shalya said :—

1. Then did Nahusha, the king of the gods, seeing her, address her thus : "I am the Indra of the three worlds, O you of sweet smiles,

2. O you with slender waist, O you with bright complexion, choose me as your husband." The chaste goddess being thus spoken to by Nahusha

3. Literally trembled with fear as the plantain tree does during a storm and bowing her head to Brahma and clasping her hands together

4. Said to the (now) terrific looking king of the gods. "I want time to get information on certain points, O lord of the gods.

5. I do not know where Shakra now is, nor where he has gone to. If after trying to get information on these points, I do not get them, O Lord

6. Then shall I attend on you ; I speak sincerely." Being thus addressed by the queen of Indra, Nahusha became highly pleased.

Nahusha said :—

7. O you with beautiful thighs, let it be as you tell me here ; but remember your plighted word.

Shalya said :—

8. Then did the beautiful one, thus dismissed by Nahusha, came out, and the renowned one went to the abode of Vrihaspati.

9. Having heard her words, the gods with Agni at their head, began to deliberate earnestly on the means of attaining to Shakra's good, O best among kings.

10. Having met the god among the gods, the Lord Vishnu, the anxious ones, who wore adepts at speeches, thus addressed him.

11. Shakra, the lord of the gods, is overpowered by the crime of slaying a Brahmana. You, O Lord, O Lord of the gods, are our refuge, O you born before the universe.

12—13. You assumed the form of Vishnu for protecting all the beings. Vritra being slain through (the aid of) your strength. Vasava, the chief among all the gods, is overpowered by the sin of slaying a Brahmana. Indicate to us the means of his salvation. Vishnu, having heard this speech of the gods said :

14. "Let Shakra offer sacrifice to me, I shall purify the one with the thunderbolt. Having duly worshipped me, by the holy sacrifice of a horse, shall the chastiser of the Paka,

15. Regain the position of the king of the gods without any fear. And the evil-minded Nahusha will meet with destruction, as the effect of his own deeds.

16. For some time, O gods, must you be patient and watchful." Hearing these words of Vishnu which were true, auspicious, and like nectar

17. All the gods, with the preceptors and the Rishis, went to the spot where Shakra lay stricken with fear.

18. There did they perform the sacrifice of a horse on a large scale, capable of absolving one from the sin of having slain a Brahmana, for the absolution of the large minded Mahendra.

19. Then, O Yudhisthira, was the crime of slaying that Brahmana divided among the trees, the rivers and the mountains, and the world and the women.

20. (This sin) being thus divided among all beings and having left the lord of the gods; Vasava was cured of his disorder and getting rid of his sins, came to himself

21. From that place the slayer of Vala saw Nahusha, who was not afraid of him, and who absorbed the power of all beings and who could not be approached through the boon granted him.

22. Then the god, the husband of Sachi again melted himself into the air and invisible by all beings he remained waiting for a fitting opportunity.

23. Shakra having rendered himself invisible, Sachi, being stricken with grief and the goddess, exceedingly sad thus lamented for him : Alas Shakra,

24. If ever a gift has been made by me or an offering (made by me) or my superiors satisfied by me and if there is any truth in me, let me be with one husband only.

25. I bow to this holy, godly goddess Night who is now on the northern solistice ; let my wish be satisfied.

26. Then did she making her body and soul pure, offer due worship to the goddess Night and for the sake of her truth and chastity she had recourse to divination.

27. Show me the spot where stays he the king of the gods. Show me truth by means of truth. Thus did she ask of Upasruti.

CHAPTER XIV.

Shalya said :—

1. Then did the beautiful Upasruti appear before the chaste one. And seeing the goddess possessed of youth and beauty appear before her,

2. The Queen of Indra became well-pleased and having propitiated her, thus spoke—O you of a beautiful face, I want to know you : Tell me who you are.

Upasruti said :—

3. I am, O goddess, Upasruti, who have come to you. O you of noble mind, I have appeared in your sight through your truthfulness.

4. You are chaste, you observe all the rules of life, and you possess the power of self control. I shall show you the god Shakra the slayer of Vritra.

5. I wish you well, follow me soon, you shall see the best among the gods. Then did the goddess the queen of Indra, follow her who went in advance.

6. Having gone through many forests of the gods, and many mountains, and having crossed the Himavat, the northern side was reached by them.

7. And having crossed the sea which extended over many yoyanas they came to a large island which was covered by many trees and creepers.

8. They there saw a lake, suitable for the gods frequented by many birds and which extended over a hundred yoyanas in length and a similar space in breadth,

9. And saw there, O son of Bharata, thousands of beautiful lotuses of five colours, full blown, and around which the bees hummed.

10. Having penetrated into a particular lotus, and entered into its stalk, along with her (Sachi) they there saw the performer of a hundred sacrifices who had entered the stalk.

11. Seeing her lord staying there in a diminutive form, the goddess too assumed a diminutive form and so did Upasruti.

12. And the queen of Indra propitiated Indra by reciting the deeds done by him in olden days and the god Purandara, being thus propitiated, said to Sachi.

13. With what object have you come here and by what means came you to know that I was here. Then did she narrate the attempt of Nasusha.

14. Having obtained the lordship of the three worlds and so being vain of his strength and being haughty the evil minded one asked me to attend on him, O performer of a hundred sacrifices.

15. And the evil minded one has granted me time (to do his bidding). If you do not save me, O lord, he will bring me under his sway.

16. For this reason have I come to you so soon O Shakra, O you with long arms slay Nahusha of wicked purposes.

17. O you slayer of Daityas and Danavas, hide no longer your ownself. O lord, assume your own strength and rule the kingdom of the gods.

CHAPTER XV.

Shalya said :—

1. The god, being thus spoken to, thus addressed Sachi in reply: This is not the time for (showing) strength. Nahusha is stronger.

2. He has grown up to his present position by the virtue of the offerings made him by the Rishis. In this instance, I shall prescribe a politic course, and it is proper that it should be followed by you.

3. It should be done by you with secrecy and on no account should you give it out. O you of slender waist, go to Nahusha and speak thus to him.

4. "O lord of the universe, come near me riding a conveyance suitable for the gods and borne by Rishis. By thus showing yourself attached to me, shall I be pleased with you" speak thus to him.

5. Being thus spoken to by the king of the gods his queen of lotus-like eyes, replied "Be it so" and went to Nahusha.

6. Nahusha surprised at seeing her, spoke these words: Welcome to you, O you of beautiful hips, what shall I do, O you of lovely smiles?

7. Accept me devoted to you; O blessed one, what do you wish, O maiden of independent spirit? O blessed one, whatever can be done for you, I shall do, O you of slender waist.

8. You need not be shy; O you of slender waist, have confidence in me. I swear by truth, O goddess, I shall do your bidding.

The queen of Indra said :—

9. O lord of the world, I only want time—the favour that has already been accorded to me. After that you shall become my husband, O lord of the gods.

10. The subject that is in my mind is this; listen, O lord of the gods; I shall speak it to you, O king, fulfill my desire.

11. The boon, that I demand of you, has connection with your love. Indra had for his conveyance, horses, elephants, and a car.

12. I wish that you, O lord of the gods, should have a conveyance, the like of which was never seen before—which was never owned by Vishnu, nor by Rudra, nor by the Asuras and the Rakshasas.

13. O Lord, to see yourself being borne by the Rishis having good attributes, united together in a palankin, is my wish, O king.

14. You should not be (merely) equal to the Asuras or the gods. By your own strength do you absorb that of all beings the moment you set your eyes on them. No one can stand face to face with you, O you powerful being.

Shalya said :—

15. Nahusha, being thus spoken to, became well pleased and the king of the gods said these words to that blameless one.

Nahusha said :—

16. O you of bright complexion, the conveyance spoken of by you has never before been in existence.

17. I have taken a strong fancy to it O goddess. I am at your disposal, O lovely faced one. The one who makes the Rishis his bearers cannot be of little strength.

18. I am a devotee, strong, and lord of what has been, what is to be, and what is. At my being angry the world will be annihilated; every thing depends on me.

19. The gods, the Danavas, and the Gandharvas, the Kinnaras, the serpents and the Rakshasas, not all of these, not all the world even can stand against me when I am angry.

20. Whoever I see by my eyes, his strength do I absorb; therefore O goddess, shall I do your bidding—there is no doubt about it.

21. Seven Rishis shall bear me—Brahmarshis all; see, O you of bright complexion, my powers and influence,

Shalya said :—

22. Having thus said to that goddess and having dismissed that lovely faced one, he yoked, to his car, Rishis who used to observe all the rules of their class.

23. The habits of his life being unworthy of a Brahmana, having come to the possession of power, vain of his strength, willful, and of a vicious nature, he made the Rishis carry him.

24. Being dismissed by Nahusha, she said to Vrihaspati. "But little remains to fulfil in its entirety the boon granted by Nahusha.

25. Be quick in hunting out Indra and do me, who am devoted to you, a favour" and the god Vrihaspati said to her—"be it so."

26. The evil minded Nahusha need not be feared by you. He will not exist till eternity; indeed he is already gone.

27. He is regardless of virtue so to say, having employed the great Rishis as his bearers, O lovely lady; and I shall perform sacrifices for the destruction of this evil minded one.

28. I shall approach Shakra. You need not have any fears, I wish you well. Then having lighted up a fire he offered the best offerings in the prescribed form.

29. Vrihaspati of great strength, in order to get the king of the gods, having made offerings to Agni (the God of fire) said to him : O king search out Shakra.

30. From that place, the god(of fire) the consumer of offerings having himself assumed the wonderful form of a female vanished from sight.

31. Having searched in all countries and provinces, mountains and forest, the earth and the sky, with the speed of the mind, he in a moment came back to Vrihaspati.

The god of fire said :—

32. O Vrihaspati, nowhere, in this world do I see the king of the gods.

33. The waters (alone) remain(to be searched). I have never been able to enter the waters. I have no ingress there O Brahmana, what else shall I do for you.

34. The preceptor of the gods said to him ; O you of great lustre, enter the waters.

The god of fire said :—

I cannot enter the water ; there I am destroyed. I throw myself under your protection. O you of great lustre, I wish you well.

35. From the waters rose fire, from the Brahmana, the Kshatriya, and from stone, the iron. Its strength penetrates everywhere ; only in its birth-place is it powerless.

CHAPTER XVI.

Vrihaspati said :—

1. O Agni, you are within all beings and concealed there you act like a witness.

2. The poets sang of you as the one, and then again as the three. O you consumer of offerings, bereft of you this world is at once annihilated.

3. The Brahmanas, having bowed down to you, go away along with their wives and sons, to the eternal region, which has been won by the merit of their own deeds.

4. You are, O god of fire, the receiver of offering, and you are yourself the best offering. They worship you in a sacrificial ceremony by the best offerings.

5. O you receiver of offerings, having created the three worlds in due time you again in due time consume them in an enkindled form ; you are, O god of fire, the progenitor of the entire world and you again annihilate it.

6. Wise people called you, O Agni, the giver of water and lightning and flames coming out from you support all beings.

7. Water depends on you, everything and this entire world ; O you purifying element, there is not the least thing unknown to you in these three worlds.

8. Everything accepts that which comes from it, enter the waters without any fear. I shall make you strong by reciting eternal hymns relating to Brahma.

9. Thus propitiated, the bearer of offerings, the god, the best among poets, said to Vrihaspati, these good words indicating satisfaction. " I shall show you Shakra. I speak this truly.

Shalya said :—

10. Agni (the god of fire) thus having entered the waters including the seas, and the small lakes, came to the lake where Shakra lay in disguise.

11. And there searching among the lotuses, O you foremost in the race of Bharata, he saw at last the king of gods, in one of the stalks.

12. And then coming back quickly he gave that information to Vrihaspati, namely that the lord having assumed a diminutive form was lying within a lotus.

13. Vrihaspati, then having gone (there) along with the Devarshis and Gandharvas, propitiated the slayer of Vala by reciting his deeds of olden days.

14. O shakra, the great Asura, Namuchi of great power has been slain by you ; so are Samvara and Vala, both of great prowess.

15. O you performer of a hundred sacrifices, gain in strength, and slay all enemies ; rise up Shakra, and see the Devarshis come to you.

16. O Great Indra, having slain the Danavas, you have saved the worlds. O Lord, having got the foam of the waters and with the assistance of the strength of Vishnu, you have killed Vritra before this ; O you king of the gods, O you lord of the universe,

17. You are the Saviour of all beings and worthy of being propitiated by them. There is no being in this world equal to you. All the beings are supported by you, O Shakra, and you created the greatness of the gods.

18. O great Indra, rule over all three worlds, and grow in strength. Being thus propitiated he, by slow degrees, increased (in strength)

19. Having gained his own form he became endowed with strength and the god thus addressed his preceptor who was standing before him.

20. What is there still remaining to be done. The great Asura, the son of Twastri, has been killed and so has been Vritra of large stature who destroyed the three worlds.

Vrihaspati said:—

21. The human being Nahusha, through the influence of the Devarshis, having gained the kingdom of gods, is very much inflicting us.

Indra said:—

22. How did Nahusha obtain the kingdom of the gods, which is hard to gain; with what strength of devotion is he endowed, what is his power, O Vrihaspati.

Vrihaspati said:—

23. Yourself having left the celebrated position of Indra, the gods became anxious and wished for a Shakra; and at that time the gods, the Pitris, the Rishis and the chief among the Gandharvas all united together.

24. And going, O Sakra, to Nahusha they said; Be you our king, the protector of the world—Nahusha said to them: I am not capable (of being your king); infuse in me, strength with the virtue of devotion.

25. The gods being thus spoken to, infused strength into Nahusha (now) of great strength and he became the king; having got the kingdom of the three worlds, he has made the great Rishis his bearers and the wicked-minded one is now roaming about the worlds.

26. Never do you look at Nahusha who absorbs all energy and whose gaze is as very subtle as poison. The gods too, being very much afraid of Nahusha, do not look at him and roam about in concealment.

Shalya said:—

27. While Vrihaspati, that best among the race of Angira, was yet speaking, Kuvera, the ruler of the world and Yama, the son of Vivaswata, and the aged god Soma and Varuna came there.

28. They having come there spoke thus to the great Indra: 'it is lucky that the son of Twastri has been killed and Vritra; it is lucky that we see you, O Shakra, safe and sound and without any wound, with all your enemies slain.'

29. And he, the great Indra, with a glad heart having greeted the assembled rulers of the world each with suitable words, said to them, with a view to outwit Nahusha.

30. "Nahusha, the king of the gods is of a terrible form; therefore assistance to me must be rendered by you." They too said: "Nahusha is terrible-looking and we fear, O lord, his poisonous gaze.

31. If you overthrow the king Nahusha, then O Shakra, it is only fitting that we too shall be entitled to our share (of the glory)." Indra said: "you, O lord of waters, and Kuvera, and Yama be crowned king along with me.

32. Coming together, shall we this day, with the aid of the gods, win victory over our enemy, Nahusha, of terrific gaze. Then the god of fire said to Shakra: "give me a share, I shall render you assistance," and Indra said to him; "O God of fire: you too shall get a share; in large sacrificial ceremonies, there will be but one share for Indra and Agni."

Shalya said:—

33—34. Thus thinking, the god, the great Indra, the chastiser of the Paka, the giver of boons, with due deliberation, gave to Kuvera the lordship of all the Yakshas and treasures and to the son of Vivaswata that over the Pitris and to Varuna that over the waters.

Thus ends the sixteenth Chapter, Varuna and others' news to Indra in the Sainyodyoga of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XVII.

Shalya said:—

1. While the wise king of the gods was fixing on means of killing Nahusha, along with the ruler of the worlds and the gods,

2—3. The ascetic, who had the six attributes of a godly being, Agastya, appeared there, and having duly greeted the king of the gods, said:—It is fortunate that you are gaining in strength, having already killed, the great Asura who had assumed a universal form; it is fortunate, O Purandara that Nahusha is this day ousted from the kingdom of heaven ; it is fortunate, O slayer of Vala, that I see you with all your enemies, killed.

Indra said :—

4. Welcome to you, O great Rishi ; I am pleased at seeing you ; be so good as to accept from me water for washing your feet and your face and also the things suitable for your worship and a cow.

Shalya said :—

5. That best among the Rishis being duly worshipped and seated on a seat, the chief of the gods, well pleased, asked that best among the Brahmanas.

6. O you best among the twice born, having the six attributes, narrate how Nahusha of vicious purpose came to be ousted from heaven. I want to hear that.

Agastya said :—

7. Listen, O Shakra, to this story as to how the vicious-souled Nahusha, of bad habits, vain of his strength, has been ousted from heaven.

8—9. The Devarshis of great attributes and the Brahmarshis of spotless fame wearied with bearing Nahusha, the doer of vicious deeds, asked him (Nahusha), O best of victors, if the hymns prescribed to be chanted by Brahma, at the time of sprinkling the cows, were authentic.

10. And also if he believed in their authenticity. The idiot Nahusha, out of vanity, told them that it was not authentic.

The Rishis said :—

11. You are going along the path of vice ; you do not act virtuously. "That they are authentic" has before been said by our great Rishis.

Agastya said :—

12. Then, O Vasava, he began quarrelling with the Rishis and then the one, ruled by vice, touched my head with his feet.

13. By that act did the king lose his strength and became shorn of prosperity ; and then as he was agitated and oppressed with fear and had lost the power of speech, I said.

14—16. Since, O king, you call into question, the hymns authorized by our ancestors and chanted by Brahmarshis, and since you have touched me with your feet and since, O fool, you have your conveyance carried by Rishis equal to Brahma, and unapproachable, whom you have made your bearers, therefore be shorn of your power. O Vice, be destroyed, and turned out of heaven, go you to the earth where there is little virtue.

17. For ten thousand years, assuming the form of a large snake, shall you roam about, and at the completion of that period shall you again get into heaven.

18. The wicked-souled one was thus turned out of the kingdom of the gods, O you subduer of foes. It is lucky, O Shakra, that we are now on the ascendant and that thorn, of the Brahmanas, has been killed.

19. O you lord of Sachi, go you to heaven and rule over the world, after conquering your senses and subduing your enemies and being propitiated by the great Rishis.

Shalya said :—

20—21. Then the gods were highly pleased, along with the great Rishis and the Pitris and the Yakshas, and the Rakshashas and the Gandharvas and the celestial nymphs and all the fairies ; and all the tanks and the lakes and the mountains and the rivers rejoiced.

22. They all coming there said : it is fortunate, O slayer of enemies, that you are on the ascendant ; it is fortunate that the vicious Nahusha has been killed by the wise Agastya ; it is fortunate that that being of vicious habits has been turned into a snake in the earth.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Shalya said :—

1. Then Shakra being glorified by the Gandharvas and the celestial nymphs, ascended on the Airavata, the chief among elephants, which bore auspicious marks.

2. The god of fire, of very great strength and the great Rishi Vrihaspati, Yama, Varuna, and Kuvera, the god of wealth,

3. Surrounded by all these gods and by the Gandharvas and the celestial nymphs Shakra, the slayer of Vritra, and the lord of the three worlds, went round.

4. Being united with his queen the great Indra, the king of the gods, the performer of a hundred sacrifices, highly pleased ruled over the gods.

5. Then the god saw there Angira propitiating the king of the gods by chanting hymns from the Atharva Veda.

6. Then the god Indra became highly pleased and he granted a boon to Angirasa who was chanting the Atharva Yeda.

7. To this Veda, there will be given the name of Atharvangirasa ; this is an example ; and you will also get a share of the offerings in a sacrifice.

8. The god having thus greeted Angirasa, the king of the gods, the performer of a hundred sacrifices dismissed him, O great king.

9. Doing due honours to all, to the thirteen Rishis and those whose wealth consisted in devotion alone, and well pleased, Indra ruled over his subjects with virtue, O king.

10. Such was the trouble experienced by Indra in company with his queen ; he had also to remain unknown in exile through his wishing for the downfall of his enemies.

11. You should not, for this reason, mind the troubles that you experienced in the great forest in company with Draupadi, O chief among kings, and your noble minded brothers.

12. O chief among kings, O son of Bharata, you too will get your kingdom in the same way as Shakra got his by slaying Vritra, O you who cause rejoicing among the race of Kurus.

13. Nahusha, of evil habits, the enemy of Brahmanas, of vicious mind, was overthrown through the curse of Agastya and absolutely ruined for a long period.

14. So shall your evil minded foes, Karna, Duryodhana and others, O subduer of enemies, soon meet with ruin.

15. Then will you come into the possession of this world ending with the ocean, in company with your brothers, O hero, and this lady Draupadi.

16. This story of the victory of Shakra is of the same rank, as the Veda, with regard to its sanctity and it ought to be listened to by a king who is desirous of a victory and who has his army ready for battle.

17. Therefore do I make it listened to by you so that you may gain a victory, O best of victors. The great minded increase (in strength) by being glorified, O Yudhisthira.

18. O Yudhisthira, the destruction of large minded Kshatryas, through the crimes of Duryodhana and the strength of Bhima and Arjuna, is approaching.

19. He who constantly reads this story of the victory of Indra becomes free from (the effects of) his crimes, and goes to heaven and passes his life pleasantly in this world and in another.

20. He need not have any fear from his enemy and he will never become sonless. He will never meet with any danger and he will live a long life. Everywhere he will get victories and seldom defeat.

Vaishampayana said :—

21. The king being thus encouraged by Shalya, O you best of the race of Bharata, that chief among the supporters of virtue did due honours to Shalya.

22. And Yudhisthira, the son of Kunti, having heard the speech of Shalya, said these words in reply to the king of Madra of long arms.

23. The post of charioteer to Karna will be field by you no doubt and from that position shall you destroy the spirit of Karna by chanting the glories of Arjuna.

Shalya said :—

24. I shall do this, even as you dictate to me ; and whatever else that I am able to do I shall do for you.

Vaishampayana said :—

25. The ruler of Madra, Shalya, having bade farewell to the sons of Kunti, that beautiful man went with his army to Duryodhana, O subduer of foes.

Thus ends the eighteenth chapter the departure of Shalya in the Sainyodyoga of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XIX.

(SAINYODYOGA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Then did the hero Yuyudhana of the Satwata race, of great prowess, come to Yudhisthira with a large army containing all the four elements.

2. His warriors of great strength, came from many countries, and heroes, holding many suits of weapons, beautified the army.

3—4. That army was ever beautiful for it had in it, battle axes, missiles, spears, lances, mallets, clubs, staves, cords, stainless, swords, and daggers and arrows of various kinds all of the best sort,

5. The appearance of that army with those weapons was like the clouds with lightning.

6. And that army, numbering an Akshauhini, when it became incorporated with Yudhisthira's army, vanished as it were, O king, as does a small river when it falls into the sea.

7. And in the same way did Dhristaketu, who was powerful as the best of the Chedis come with an army, an Akshauhini in number, to the Pandavas, of immeasurable strength.

8. And Jayatsena of great strength, son of Jarasindhu, king of Magadha, came to the virtuous king with an army counting an Akshauhini.

9. In the same way, Pandya, O chief among kings, came to Yudhishthira surrounded by many warriors who had colonized along the sea.

10. And all his troops being assembled, the army with its fine dress and which was very strong became an object worth seeing, O chief among kings.

11. And the army of the king of Drupada, assembled from several countries, was graced by heroic men and also by his sons of wonderful valour.

12. In the same way did Virata, the king of the Matsya, the leader of an army come to the sons of Pandu, accompanied by a large body of soldiers, inhabiting hilly tracts.

13. And from several directions came for the noble minded sons of Pandu seven Akshauhini carrying flags of various sorts.

14. All of them were desirous of a fight with the sons of Kuru, and so caused the sons of Pandu to rejoice. In the same way increasing the delight of the son of Dhritarashtra,

15. The king Bhagadatta gave an army numbering an Askshauhini. And the army was filled with Chins and Kiratas as also with gold.

16. The invulnerable army looked beautiful like a forest of Karnikaras. In the same way, Bhurisravas and the hero Shalya, O son of Kuru,

17. Went to Duryodhana, each with an army counting an Akshauhini separately. Kritavarman, the son of Hridika in company with the Bhojas, the Andhas and the Kukuras,

18. Went to Duryodhana with an Askshauhini of troops; and his army, with those foremost among men, graced with garlands of wild flowers,

19. Looked charming as a forest run about by wild elephants. And others, the people of Sindhusou vira, under the leadership of Jayadratha,

20. And also other rulers of the earth, came as if shaking the mountains; and their large army looked beautiful at that time.

21—22. Like various sorts of clouds shaken by the winds. And Sandakshina, the ruler of Kamboja with the Yavanas and the Shakkas came to the son of Kuru, with an Akshauhini of troops. His army looked beautiful like locusts.

23—24. And having entered the Kaurava army it vanished at the time, so to say; and so did Nila, the resident of Mahismati, a king of great strength along with the residents of the southern countries with blue weapons. And so did the two kings of Avanti surrounded by large forces,

25. Each with an Akshauhini of troops came to Suyodhana, and the five rulers of the earth, the sons of the same mother, the best among men, the Kekaya princes,

26. Causing delight to the son of Kuru, came there with an Akshauhini. And from the large minded kings of other countries,

27. There came three other armies, O you foremost among the race of Bharata. In this way Duryodhana was surrounded by an army eleven Akshauhini strong.

28. All of them were desirous of a fight with the sons of Kunti and filled with banners of various sorts. In the city of Hastinapura, there was not space, 29—33. Even for the principal leaders of the king's own army, O son of Bharata; for this reason the country of the five rivers, Kritsna, Kurujangala, and the forest of Rohitaka, and the desert of Kevala, and Ahichhatra, and Kalkuta and the bank of the Ganges, O son of Bharata, and Varana and Vatadhana, and the mountains of Jamuna, all these extensive tracts containing large quantities of corn and wealth became exceedingly crowded with the army of the Kauravas. There the priest saw the army of this description—the priest who was sent by the king of Panchala to the Kauravas.

CHAPTER XX.

(SANJAYAYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The priest of Drupada, having arrived near the son of Kuru, was greeted by Dhritarashtra, Bhishma and Vidura.

2. Having asked him if everything went well with him and also made enquiries about his health in the midst of all the leaders of his army he said these words.

3. It is known to all, what the duty of a king is as it obtains since a long long period back, but though known, yet shall I speak, as a preface to my speech proper.

4. It is known that Dhritarastra and Pandu are the sons of one and their paternal kingdom must be shared by them equally—there is no doubt about it.

5. Those who are the sons of Dhritarastra have obtained the position of their father; why have not the sons of Pandu obtained the paternal kingdom?

6. It is known to you, how in former days, the sons of Pandu, did not obtain their ancestral wealth which was wrested from them by the son of Dhritarastra.

7. They sought (to remove them) by several means, calculated even to bring their lives to an end, but they have not yet reached the terminations of their lives, so they were unable to send them to the palace of the king of Death (Yama).

8. Then again, the kingdom gained by the noble-minded ones through their own strength was taken away from them by a trick by the mean sons of Dhritarastra united with the son of Suvala.

9. Even this act, undesirable as it was, was approved of by him and they lived for thirteen years in the great forest.

10. In the court too serious troubles were experienced by the heroes along with their wife and in the forest diverse troubles of great magnitude were met with by them.

11. And in the same way in the town of Virata, hard troubles were met with by the large minded ones as great pains are endured by wicked souls, when they transmigrate into other beings.

12. Forgetting all these troubles gone through by them in past times those foremost, among the race of Kuru, are desirous of peace with the son of Kuru.

13. Knowing their nature and the nature of Duryodhana, the well wishers (of the latter) should, properly speaking on this occasion, lead the son of Dhritarastra (to an amicable settlement).

14. These heroes do not (want to) wage war with the son of Kuru. The sons of Pandu do not want (to get back) their own by ruining the world.

15. The reason, which the son of Dhritarastra brings forward for war, can not be regarded as a reason for they are the stronger.

16. Seven Akshauhinis have been collected for the son of Dharma (Yudhishthira), they, all desirous of fighting with the sons of Kuru, are waiting for his permission.

17. There are others, best among men, who are, each of them, equal to a thousand Akshauhinis: for instance, the son of Satyaki, Bhimasena, and the twin brothers of very great strength.

18. On one side are united those eleven (Akshauhinis) and on the other, Dhananjaya of great strength and of many forms.

19. As Kiritin surpasses the entire army, so does Vasudeva of long arms and of great lustre.

20. What man will fight against an army superior in number, the prowess of Kiritin and the wisdom of Krishna.

21. Therefore do you, as dictated by virtue and as agreed to in the stipulation, give back that which should be returned. Don't you let go this opportunity.

Thus ends the twentieth chapter, the arrival of the priest in the Sanjayana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXI.

(SANJAYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having heard these words of his, Bhisma, of great lustre and old in wisdom, did him due honours and spoke these words to him as suited the occasion.

2. It is lucky that they all along with Damodara are doing well; it is lucky that they have secured aid and it is lucky that they are intent on acting virtuously.

3. And it is lucky that our cousins, the sons of Kuru, desire peace, it is lucky that the sons of Pandu are not desirous of war with their relations.

4. Truth has been spoken by you; it is so; no doubt your words are very sharp; in my opinion that is so because you are a Brahmana.

5. Kiritin the son of Pritha is strong, well coached in handling weapons and of mighty prowess; who is there to stand against Dhananjaya the son of Pandu?

6. These sons, of Pandu, have doubtless borne much troubles here and in the forest and rightly speaking they are doubtless entitled to the wealth of their fathers.

7. Even the holder of the thunderbolt himself (can not withstand him) how can others bearing the bow? He is capable of standing against the three worlds; thus in my opinion.

8. While Bhishma was speaking Karna, having interrupted his words in anger and insolence and looking at Duryodhana, said.

9. O Brahmana, what you say is not unknown in this world nor by any being; why do you repeat it again and again?

10. In days of old, Shakuni on behalf of Duryodhana defeated (Yudhisthira) at a game of dice and it was according to a stipulation that Yudhisthira the son of Pandu went to the forest.

11. He now, like a fool disregarding that stipulation, wants his paternal wealth depending on the armies supplied him by the Matsyas and by the king of Panchala.

12. O learned one, Duryodhana will not yield even one foot of ground through fear, but responding to the call of virtue he will yield even the entire world to his enemy.

13. If they want back the kingdom of their forefathers let them, as stipulated, reside in the forest to the end of the period (agreed on).

14. Then may they come to seek refuge with Duryodhana without any fear; let them not through folly adopt an unrighteous course.

15. If the sons of Pandu, bidding adieu to a righteous course, desire war, then will they, after coming face to face with these foremost among the race of Kurus, have occasion to remember my words.

Bhishma said:—

16. O son of Radha, why do you talk so much? it is fitting that you should remember his deeds; alone the son of Pritha vanquished in battle six charioters.

17. You have seen the deeds of him who had been victorious on many occasions; if we do not do what this Brahmana has said, most certainly shall we be killed by him.

Vaishampayana said:—

18. Then Dhritarashtra, having pleased Bhishma by approving of his words and having rebuked the son of Radha, said these words.

19. What Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, has said is calculated to promote our interests, and those of the entire world.

20. After mature deliberation, shall I send Sanjaya to the sons of Pritha, therefore do you go back at once this day to the sons of Pandu.

21. And the son of Kuru, having done him honours, sent him to the sons of Pandu, and having summoned Sanjaya to the council, said these words.

CHAPTER XXII.

Dhritarashtra said:—

1. It is said, O Sanjaya, that the sons of Pandu have reached Upaplavya; going out do you find out (if) this (is true), do due honours to the one who has created no enemies (Yudhisthira); it is fortunate that you are present here.

2. To all do you, O Sanjaya, communicate our well being. Having resided in the forest and met with troubles, they who are inclined to do good to others without deceit and honest still entertain friendly feelings towards us.

3. Never did I, O Sanjaya, observe any falsehood in the sons of Pandu. Having gained all their wealth through sheer strength of their own, have they made over the same to me.

4. Never did I observe any questionable act in them. Though I was always on the look-out, yet never did I find anything done by these sons of Pritha for which we could blame them. They always work for the sake of virtue and their own interests and never request others for their own well-being.

5. Having by their patience and wisdom subjugated heat, cold, hunger, thirst, sleep, laziness, anger, pleasure and folly, the sons of Pritha always try for virtue and their own interests.

6. On suitable occasions, do they give away wealth to their friends and friendship with them does not decrease through long residence together. The sons of Pritha honour others and promote their interests according to their deserts. They have not haters in the side of Ajmida,

7. Except the great weak-minded fool, Duryodhana and the still meaner Karna. These two alone are increasing the energy of these large-minded souls who do not desire for their own happiness.

8. Duryodhana who is strong in the beginning only and who is accustomed to every sort of indulgence thinks that he does well (increasing their energy). The boy thinks too that he is capable of robbing the living son of Pandu, of their share,

9. He who is followed by Arjuna, Kesava, Vrikodara, Satyaki, the two sons of Madri (Nakula and Sahadeva) and Srinjaya; it is best to give up his share before the war.

10. Savyasachin, holding the Gandiva bow, is alone capable of subjugating the earth from his chariot and in the same way is the noble-minded Keshava, accustomed to get victories and unapproachable, the ruler of the three worlds.

11. In all the worlds, he is the only worthy man. What man could stand against his flight of arrows which roar like the clouds and which fly with the swiftness of locusts.

12. Seated on one car, with the help of the Gandiva bow, Savyasachin, having subjugated the Kauravas of the North and the Northern country as well, took away their wealth and turned the people of Dravida into his soldier followers.

13. Savyasachin, with the help of the Gandiva bow, having subjugated the gods with Indra at their head, in the Khandava forest, made an offering to Agni, and thus enhanced the honour and renown of the sons of Pandu.

14. There is none equal to Bhima in wielding the mace, none too equal to him in riding elephants, and it is said that as a car-warrior he is not inferior to Arjuna and in strength of arms he has the prowess of ten thousand elephants.

15. Well-trained and strong, being rendered an enemy and inspired with wrath he would burn down the sons of Dhritarashtra. Being always very wrathful and strong he is incapable of being defeated even by Vasava (Indra) himself.

16. The two brothers, the sons of the king of Madri, of good heart, strong quick-handed and well trained by the sons of Falguna, will leave no vestige of the enemies as a pair of birds of prey destroy a flight of birds.

17. I regard this vast army of ours, as being not in existence, when it encounters them. Among them is the powerful Dhristyadumna who is regarded as one of the Pandavas.

18. I understand that the foremost, among the Somakas with his ministers, has devoted his soul to the cause of the sons of Pandu; who else can withstand him who has made no enemies (Yudhisthira) whose army is led by that best among the Vrishnis.

19. Virata, the lord of the people of Matsya, who is of mature age, who has lived with the Pandavas, and whose desires have been fulfilled by them, with his sons is there ever interested in the cause of the sons of Pandu and a staunch adherent of Yudhisthira.

20. And the five brothers, the eminent and mighty princes of Kekaya, have been deprived of their kingdom (by us) and they follow the sons of Pritha, desirous of the kingdom of the Kekayas and waiting for an opportunity of fighting (with us).

21. And all the heroes among the lords of the Earth have been brought together and are interested in the cause of the sons of Pandu. I hear that these heroes worthy of respect have become followers of the virtuous king out of love.

22. Heroes who live in the hills and in fortresses, who are of good lineage in the world, and aged and many Mlechas who are adepts in handling various weapons have been brought together and made interested in the cause of the sons of Pandu.

23. And king Pandya too, in battle an equal of Indra, who is noble-minded, a hero among men and of unequalled strength and energy, accompanied by many heroes, has come, espousing the cause of the sons of Pandu.

24. That Satyaki, who has learnt the use of arms from Drona, Arjuna, Vasudeva, Kripa and Bhima, and who is said to be the equal of the son of Krishna, Pradyumna, is enlisted in the cause of the sons of Pandu.

25. Formerly did assemble the kings of the Chedis and the Karushas with all their preparations and among them stood the king of Chedis, with his blazing beauty and scorching (sight) like the sun.

26. He was regarded as being incapable of being vanquished in battle and the foremost among all the users of the bow. Krishna at once killed him by force of his own strength and thus destroyed all the hopes of the Kshatryas.

27. In days of old did Krishna merely by looking at him (Sishupala) who was honoured by the kings, at whose head stood the king of the Karushas thereby increasing the fame and honour of the Pandavas.

28. Seeing that Keshava was incapable of being vanquished in his chariot drawn by white horses they fled leaving the ruler of the Chadis as small animals do at the sight of a lion.

29. He, who out of impudence, engaged in a fight in chariots with Vasudeva, was killed by Krishna like a karnikara tree uprooted by the wind.

30. Remembering what has been brought to my notice regarding the might of Keshava, and the deeds of Vishnu I got no peace of mind, O son of Gavalgani.

31. No enemy whatever can withstand them whose leader is that best of the Vrishnis. My heart trembles with fear at hearing that the two Krishnas are united together on one and the same chariot.

32. If the dull-headed one does not fight with these two then may my son fare well, otherwise will they burn up the Kurus as Indra and Vishnu did the army of the Daityas.

33. In my opinion Dhananjaya is equal to Shakra himself and the hero of the Vrishni race is Vishnu himself. The son of Kunti has his refuge in virtue, is brave and avoids shameful deeds and the son of Pandu has created no enemies.

34. He, who has been banished by Duryodhana, is not evil-minded otherwise being wrathful he would have consumed all the sons of Dhritarashtra. I do not fear Arjuna, Vasudeva or even Bhima or the twins as I, in the same measure, fear,

35. The wrath of the king, O Suta, when he is angry; having practised great austerities and Brahmacharyja vows his desire will be fulfilled.

36. Seeing his wrath and knowing that the cause is just, I am now very much afraid; therefore as an emissary from me do you quickly go to the encampment of the king of Pauchala on a swift-going car.

37. Repeatedly will you ask him who has created no enemies in affectionate terms about his health; and going, O son, near Janardana also, who is possessed of great qualities, heroic and noble-minded,

38. Will you ask about his welfare, on my behalf and say that Dhritarashtra is desirous of peace with the sons of Pandu. There is no request of his that the son of Kunti will not comply with, O Suta.

39. Krishna is as dear to them as their own selves and being wise he is ever engaged in their interest. Also of the assembled sons of Pandu, and the Srinjayas and Janardana, and Yuyudhana and Virata,

40. Will you enquire about their health on my behalf and in the same way of all the five sons of Draupadi. And whatever you think fit to be said to the foe, as occasion arises and also whatever you think to be conducive to the interests of the race of Bharata must you say, O Sanjaya, among those kings. And do not utter anything which may give cause for hostility.

Thus ends the twenty second chapter, the mission from Dhritarashtra in the Sanjayayana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXIII

(SANJAYAYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Sanjaya, having heard the words of king Dhritarashtra, went to Upaplavya to see the sons of Pandu of illimitable strength.

2. And having reached the presence of king Yudhishthira the son of Kunti, the son of Suta (caste) first made his obeisance and then said.

3. And Sanjaya the son of Gavalgana and the son of a Suta (caste) cheerfully said to him who had created no enemies. It is fortunate, O king, that I see you without disease, having friends, and equal to the great Indra.

4. The aged and wise king Dhritarashtra the son of Amvika, asks about your health. Is Bhima the foremost among the sons of Pandu well and is Dhananjaya so and are these two sons of the king of Madri,

5. How is the princess Krishna, the daughter of Drupada, who is truthful, wife of a hero, with her sons, that spirited lady for whose benefit you pray for (the accomplishment of your fondest wishes) O son of Bharata, O you of good desires?

Yudhishthira said :—

6. O son of Gavalgana, O Sanjaya, you are welcome. We are delighted at seeing you. In return I want to know about your health. I am well with my younger brothers O you learned man.

7. Having, after a long time, heard the news of the health of the aged king of the Kurus, O Suta, and having seen you, O Sanjaya, am I so pleased that I regard as having seen the king himself.

8. Our grandsire is aged, wise, great in wisdom, and endued with every virtue. Is this Bhishma, the son of Kuru, in health? Is he of the same habits, as in days of old?

9. Is the large-minded king Dhritarashtra, the son of Vichitravirya, well along with his sons. Is the great king Valhika, the son of Pratipa, well, O you learned son of Suta (caste).

10. Is Somadatta, well? How are Bhishmavira, Satyasandha, Shalya, Drona, and Kripa, the twice born with his sons, all endued with great qualities? How are these? Are they without illness?

11. All the foremost bowmen in the world have, O Sanjaya, sided with the Kurus and so have the foremost of all those who are endued with great wisdom and know all sciences and can wield the bow in the world.

12. Do these wielders of the bow get honours? Are they without disease in whose kingdom worth seeing lives the well-behaved son of Drona endued with great qualities?

13. Is the very wise prince Yuyutsu, the son of (Dhritarashtra by) the Vaisya lady in health? Is the minister Karna in health whose advice the dull-headed Suyodhana follows?

14. Are the aged ladies the mothers of the sons of Bharata and the slave-wives of the great one, O Suta, and his daughter-in-law, sons, sisters' sons and daughters' sons in peace?

15. Does the king grant suitable annuities to the Brahmanas as in former days? Have the sons of Dhritarashtra discontinued the annuities granted by me to the twice-born, O Sanjaya?

16. Does the king Dhritarashtra, with his sons, treat with contempt the Brahmanas when they commit breaches of law? Does he treat with lightness the provision for Brahmanas which is the road to heaven?

17. This light has been instituted by Providence for the good of beings in this world. If those dull-headed ones do not treat with forbearance their short-comings then will the sons of Kuru meet with ruin.

18. Does the king Dhritarashtra with his sons make provisions for his group of ministers. Are there no enemies in the disguise of well wishers combined for their ruin?

19. Do all those sons of Kuru talk of crimes committed by the sons of Pandu? Do Drona and hero Kripa with his sons speak of our crimes.

20. Do all the sons of Kuru speak of Dhritarashtra, with his sons as their king? Do they, when they see a band of highway-men assembled, remember the son of Pritha who was the leader in battle (Arjuna).

21. Do they remember, the arrows shot from the Gandiva bow by means of the string of the bow and the dexterity of the hands, the former shaking often and again and making a noise like the roaring of the clouds and flying swiftly,

22. I have not seen in this world any warrior who is superior to Arjuna or even equal to him, who, with one single effort, can send out sixty one whetted arrows with good feathers and with sharp edges.

23. Bhimasena is strong indeed with the mace in hand and makes a large number of enemies in an army tremble with fear as an elephant does in a place abounding with reeds. Do they remember him?

24. Sahadeva, the son of the king of Madri, conquered the combined Kalingas and Dantakura by (shooting arrows with) his right and left hands; do they remember this strong one?

25. In days of old was Nakula sent to conquer the Sivis and the Trigartas. This is within your knowledge. O Sanjaya, they subjugated the western countries. Do they remember these sons of the king of Madri.

26. The defeat that they met with in the forest named Dvaitavana when ill advised they went there and when Bhimasena and Arjuna faced these dull headed ones who were imprisoned by the enemy,

27. Where I protected Arjuna, in the rear and Bhimasena protecting the rear of the two sons of the king of Madri and where the wielder of the Gandiva bow issued out uninjured after rendering the enemy depressed do they remember?

28. It is not by a single good deed that we can be happy in this world, O Sanjaya, when with all our endeavours are we unable to win over the son of Dhritarashtra.

CHAPTER XXIV.

(SANJAYAYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. It is exactly as you, say, O son of Pandu. You enquire, dear sir, about the Kurus, and the foremost among them. Those whom you enquire about, O son of Pritha, vis the foremost among the race of Kuru, those wise ones are doing well.

2. Know then that the son of Dhritarashtra is surrounded by aged men and true and also by wicked men, O son of Pandu. To the enemy even would the son of Dhritarashtra give away, why then should he discontinue what is due to the Brahmanas?

3. The rule that obtains among you (Kshatriyas) vis. to harm those that do not injure you is a rule fit for butchers. It is not good, if Dhritarastra, with his sons like a bad man, speaks ill of you who follow good practices, they would be guilty of conspring against friends.

4. He does not approve of it (the injury done to you) ; he is very sorry for it and the old man on his own part repents for it. O you who have created no enemies, having consulted the Brahmanas he has come to know that conspiring against friends is the worst of all sins.

5. They remember, O god among men, your might in battle and remember also the one who always gets victories and is the leader in battles (Arjuna). They remember Bhimasena with the mace in his hand when there is the sound of conch shells and drums.

6. They remember too the two mighty sons of the king of Madri who, in battle, fell (the enemies) in all directions showering on the (hostile) army continuous flight of arrows and whom it is hard to cause to tremble in battle.

7. I think that we cannot know what is yet to befall a man—what futurity has in store for him. For this reason have you, O son of Pandu, though endued with all the virtuous, met with very hard troubles.

8. You will no doubt, by means of your wisdom, make up for all these, O you who have created no enemies. The sons of Pandu, all equal to Indra, will not leave virtue for the sake of pleasure.

9. You will, O you who have created no enemies, so make it up with your wisdom so that they all will obtain peace—the sons of Dhritarastra the sons of Pandu, the Srinjayayas and all the other kings who have assembled here.

10. Listen to what Dhritarashtra, who is equal to your father, has said, O you who have created no enemies, in consultation with his ministers and sons. O king attend to these words.

Thus ends the twenty-fourth Chapter, the speech of Sanjaya in the Sanjayayana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXV.

(SANJAYAYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said :—

1. Here are assembled the sons of Pandu, the Srinjayas, Janardana, Yuyudhana, Virata ; speak the words, you have been instructed to say by Dhritarastra, O son of Gavaigana, O son of Suta.

Sanjaya said :—

2. I make my obeisance to him who has created no enemies, to Vrikodara, Dhananjaya, and the two sons of the king of Madri and also the son of Sura, the son of Vasudeva, Yuyudhana, Chekitana and Virata.

3. And also to the aged lord of the people of Panchala, Dhristadyumna the son of Prishata and Jaynayasena. All of you listen to these words which I speak, being desirous of the welfare of the Kurus.

4. King Dhritarashtra had my car speedily got ready for he welcomed the chance of peace. Therefore may the king, with his brothers, sons, and friends, find these words acceptable to them. Let there be peace.

5. With all virtues are the sons of Pritha endued—with steadiness, with mildness and with frankness. They are born in a good family, the reverse of cruel, and generous, they avoid all deeds that one, should be ashamed of and know for certainty the nature of each deed.

6. A mean act does not befit you for you are noble-minded and have a terrible army. If you act mean, it will get undue preponderance as does a black spot on a white cloth.

7. An act which on the very face of it will cause destruction to all and which is sinful and leading to hell—who will do such an act consciously, an act which gives the same result in case of victory and defeat alike.

8. Blessed are they who promote the interests of their cousins. They are the sons, friends and well-wishers indeed (of the Kurus) who, in order that prosperity may ever attend the Kurus, would sacrifice their life which is of small value.

9. If after subjugating the Kurus, O you sons of Pritha, and defeating all, you destroy those who despise you, then the succeeding portion of your life will be equal to death, since what is life after killing all your cousins ?

10. Who is capable of withstanding you who are assisted by Keshava, Chekitana and Satyaki and protected by the arms of the son of Prishata even after getting Indra and all his divine followers on his side.

11. Who, on the other hand, can withstand with a view to conquer in battle, the Kurus, who are protected by Drona, Bhishma, Ashwathaman, Shalya, Kripa and others, and also protected by the son of Radha along with other kings.

12. Who is capable of slaying, without any loss to his own army, the large force of the royal son of Dhritarashtra? Therefore do I see not the slightest good in either victory or defeat.

13. Why should the sons of Pritha do an wicked act like mean people and those born in low families? Therefore having approached you, do I bow to the son of Vasudeva and the aged lord of the people of Panchala.

14. With hands clasped, do I throw myself under your protection so that it may go well with the Kurus and the Srinjayas. Why should not the son of Vasudeva and Dhananjaya act in the manner indicated by me?

15. If so requested they would give away their lives; why should not they do this which is, I say, O learned man, for the preservation of others.

Thus ends the twenty fifth Chapter, the speech of Sanjaya in the Sanjayayana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXVI.

(SANJAYAYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhishthira said:—

1. What words, of mine, O Sanjaya, have you heard meaning ever, that you fear war. The reverse of war, is better than war. Who having got that (peace) goes to war, O Suta?

2. If what a man desires in his heart is fulfilled, O Sanjaya, without doing anything then he will not do anything even if that be very much easier than war.

3. Wherefore should a man go to war; who is there cursed by the gods who would chose war? The sons of Pritha do acts which bring on happiness and at the same time are conducive to the well being of the world and not inferior to virtue (i.e. virtuous acts).

4. They are men desirous of only such happiness as has its source in virtue. He, who being desirous of happiness and of destroying misery, follows the pleasant dictates of his senses, adopts a way which leads to misery.

5. Seeking pleasure he pains his own body as fuel to a burning flame increases its force; and when a man has freed himself from this longing he does not bring misery on himself.

6. In the same way, by the satisfaction of our sensual desires we are not satiated but are like fire with clarified butter added on to it. Compare this great source of enjoyment of the king Dhritarashtra with ourselves.

7. Deserted by the goddess of fortune-people never win victory in battle; unfortunate people never hear the sound of music, unfortunate people never enjoy garlands and fragrance and unfortunate people (never enjoy) unguents.

8. Also, unfortunate people never get fine sheets to wear, (we are unfortunate) otherwise why should we have been exiled from the country of the Kurus. It must be so. The desires of an unwise man give trouble to his body as well as to his mind.

9. The king himself in trouble wants to get strength from others; this is hardly fair. As he sees himself surrounded (by friends) so let him see others surrounded (by friends).

10. A man having thrown burning fire, at midday, at the end of winter, on a thick wood of reeds, and which fire spreads with the wind, repents his act when he is desirous of escape.

11. Having got wealth why does the king Dhritarashtra now grieve for his lot O Sanjaya? Simply because he had accepted the secret advice of his dull-headed son of vicious soul and addicted to dishonest ways.

12. Suyodhana treated with contempt the words of Vidura, whom he regarded as his enemy though he was his friend and the king Dhritarashtra, desirous of meeting the wishes of his son, consciously deserted virtue.

13. The king Dhritarashtra, from a desire to please his son, remembered not that Vidura was a wise man among the Kurus, and wished for the well-being of the Kurus, of very great learning, adept at speech and well behaved.

14. He, (the son) though himself desirous of honour, seeks to deprive others of honour, is jealous, wrathful, goes beyond the limits of virtue for his own interests, haughty in speech, led by spite, has his soul full of sensual desires and is endued with a bad heart.

15. He leads a bad life, is deserted by the Goddess of Fortune, cherishes wrongs for a long time, conspires against friends and has a vicious mind. For meeting the wishes of such an one did king Dhritarashtra, with his eyes wide open, forsake virtue and pleasure.

16. At that time, O Sanjaya, when I was playing at dice did it occur to me that the destruction of the Kurus was come for Vidura speaking these wise words did not obtain praise from Dhritarashtra.

17. When they no longer followed the the instructions of Vidura, troubles overtook the Kurus, O Suta. So long as they followed his wisdom, did their kingdom prosper.

18. Hear now from me who are the ministers of the son of Dhritarashtra for the promotion of his interest, O Suta. They are Dhritarashtra, Shakuni and the son of Suta (Karna). O son of Gavalgani, look at his folly.

19. Therefore even when I consider, do I not see how it can go well with the Kurus and the Srinjayas, Dhritarashtra having usurped the wealth of others and the far seeing Vidura having been banished to a foreign country.

20. Dhritarashtra, with his son, hopes for an undisputed suzerainty over this world. Absolute peace therefore is unobtainable. Whatever wealth is under his possession he regards as belonging to himself.

21. Karna considers Arjuna capable of being vanquished when the latter takes up his weapons in battle. In former days there were many great battles. Why were they not benefitted by Karna.

22. Karna knows, so does Suyodhana, Drona knows so does our grandsire, and so do the other Kurus that there is no wielder of the bow superior to Arjuna.

23. All the Kurus, know and so do all the other kings that are assembled, how this kingdom came under the possession of Duryodhana, during the life-time of Arjuna, the subduer of foes.

24. With that precedent in their mind, the sons of Dhritarashtra think that they are capable of depriving the sons of Pandu of what is their own though they are aware, having been present there, of the deportment of Arjuna in a battle when the only weapon he had was a bow.

25. Not yet having heard the twang of the Gandiva when fully stretched out, the sons of Dhritarashtra are yet alive. So long as he does not see Bhimasena inspired with wrath, Suyodhana thinks that his object is gained.

26. Indra even would not be able to stand against him, for robbing us of our wealth, during the life time of Bhimasena and Dhananjaya, O Suta, and the patient Nakula and the hero Sahadeva.

27. The old king with his son, O Suta, still entertains the thought that the sons of Dhritarashtra will not be killed in battle consumed by the son of Pandu, O Sanjaya.

28. You know what troubles have overtaken us. For my respect for you, I would forgive them, (you know as well) that which has taken place between ourselves and the sons of Kuru and what our treatment towards the son of Dhritarashtra was at the time

29. Even let that treatment be the same, I shall make peace, as you ask me to do. Let Indraprastha be my kingdom. Let the foremost of the race of Bharata, give it back to me.

Thus ends the twenty sixth chapter the speech of Yudhishthira in the Sanjayayana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Sanjaya said :—

1. That you are attached to virtue, O Pandava, is known in this word and I see also that it is so, O son of Pritha. The life that is full of great deeds, also is unstable; considering this, you should not destroy (the Kurus),

2. If the sons of Kuru do not give back to you your share without war, O you who have created no enemies; but I consider that living as a beggar in the kingdoms of Andhaka and Vrishni is better than a kingdom (attained) by means of war.

3. Since a man's life lasts but for a short time, and is ever subject to sufferings and is unstable and since again it is not comparable to fame, therefore should you not do, O son of Pandu, a sinful art.

4. Desires adhere to a man and they are the source of all impediments to virtue, O king of men. A wise man, having killed them beforehand, gains unspeakable praise in the world.

5. Thirst for wealth is a bond in this world, O son of Pritha. Those, who desire it, go against virtue as it were. He who chooses virtue is wise. The man, who desires pleasure, becomes degraded for the sake of pleasure.

6. A man, who makes virtue his prime duty, gains great fame and shines like the sun; and the man, of vicious intellect, devoid of virtue, is ruined even if he obtains the earth.

7. The Vedas have been read by you; the hard austerities of Brahmacharyya have been practised by you and in sacrificial ceremonies the desires of Brahmanas have been fulfilled by you and with the other world before your mind, your soul has been devoted to happiness for a series of years.

8. He, who having devoted himself excessively to pleasures, does not do any deed leading to religious meditation, becomes extremely devoid of happiness after his wealth is gone and remains liable to be led by the force of his desires.

9. In the same way, the fool, who despising virtue and without practising religious meditation, gives himself up to vice, shows no regard (for the Supreme Being). The soul, after leaving the body and reaching the other world, comes to grief.

10. Here (i. e. in the other world) there is no absolute annihilation for either virtuous or for vicious deeds. The good and evil deeds go before and the agent only follows them.

11. Your deeds are famous, as the offerings of savoury and delicious victuals, rendered holy with the respect (with which they are offered), made to Brahmanas accompanied by gifts with perfect propriety, on the occasion of religious ceremonies.

12. During this life deeds are done, O son of Pritha, and after death, no act whatever is done. And virtuous deeds that are valuable in the next world, and so applauded by the great and the honest, have been done by you.

13. Death does away with decrepitude, fear, as also hunger and thirst, and all that is disagreeable to the mind. There is no duty there but delighting in one's senses.

14. Such is the fruit of our deeds, O king of men; therefore do not, in this world, carry the load of doing what is pleasing to the heart, O son of Pandu, do not (by your action) go for ever either to the region that is full of causes begetting wrath (hell) or to the one that abounds with causes begetting delight.

15. Having got to the end of your deeds, do not however, put truth, self-conduct, candour and humility. You may perform the Ashwamedha and Rajsuya sacrifices, but do not come again near the limits of sinful acts.

16. If now, actuated by malice, you sons of Pritha, do vicious deeds, you have, in vain, for a series of years, resided in in forests undergoing all sorts of troubles like virtue itself.

17. In vain did you also roam about in the forests, parting with this army, which was formerly subject to your control and also (parting with) these followers of yours, namely Janardana and the hero Yuyudhana,

18. And also (your followers) the king of the Matshya, Virata of the golden car with his son at the head of his soldiers. And the kings who were formerly vanquished by you, all have come over to your side.

19. With all these great resources, with great fame (which then attached to your name) and possessing an army at the head of which were the son of Vasudeva, and Arjuna, you might after having slain the most valorous among your despisers, in the field of battle, have destroyed the pride of the sons of Dhritarashtra.

20. Why after having increased the strength of your enemy and after weakening your own friends, and after having lived in exile in the forest for a series of years, are you now desirous of fighting, O son of Pandu, after the proper time.

21. An unwise man, O son of Pandu, or one that does not know virtue, may obtain prosperity by fighting or a wise man and virtuous, may lose his prosperity by not fighting.

22. Your instinct does not urge you to an unrighteous act, O son of Pritha, and never did you, out of wrath, do a sinful act. Tell me, therefore, what the reason is which makes you desirous of doing this sinful act, which is against the dictates of wisdom.

23. Wrath is a bitter remedy for evils, it causes malady in the head, destroys fame, and is a source of sinful acts. It ought to be controlled by a good man and those that do not control it are bad men. O great king, control your wrath. Incline to peace.

24. Who would desire wrath which leads to sin. Forbearance is good for you, not enjoyments where Bhishma and the son of Shantanu will be killed and Drona with his son slain.

25. Kripa, Shalya, the son of Somadatta, Vikarna, Vivinsati, Karna and Duryodhana—having killed all these, what sort of happiness is it that you will get after that, tell me, O son of Pritha.

26. Having gained even this Earth bounded by the sea, you will not get rid of decrepitude or death, desirable results or undesirable, happiness or misery. O king knowing this, do not wage war.

27. If you are desirous of doing this deed, attended with such results, simply because your advisers wish it, then abdicate everything to them and go away. You should not now forsake the path leading to the region of the gods,

Thus ends the twenty seventh Chapter, the speech of Sanjaya in the Sanjayayana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

(SANJAYAYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Yudhisthira said :—

1. Undoubtedly, O Sanjaya, it is as you say namely that virtuous acts are the best among deeds ; and knowing, O Sanjaya, whether it is virtue or vice that I follow should you blame me.

2. Where vice assumes the appearance of virtue and virtue appears completely as vice, and virtue appears in its own form wise men should distinguish it from virtue) by their intelligence.

3. A man should follow the profession of the order among which he is born, but similarly in times of distress these occupations which are fixed, follow the rule of virtue and vice. Hear now, O Sanjaya, what constitutes our profession in times of distress.

4. With his means of livelihood gone, a destitute man ought to desire for such means as may enable him to perform such duties as are laid down for him, O Sanjaya ; both the man whose means of livelihood is not gone and the one who is in distress, are culpable (if they act as if they are not what they are) O Sanjaya,

5. Since expiation has been prescribed by the creator, for those Brahmanas who without wishing for ruin to themselves (do actions sinful for them to do). With due regard to this fact, O Sanjaya, should you find fault with those whose means of livelihood is gone and those who are not in that position.

6. For the acquirement of the knowledge of our inner self and for bringing the mind under control is always prescribed accepting alms from good men. For those that are not Brahmanas and do not want to know about the inner self, the practices prescribed for their respective orders are considered to be the best.

7. That path has been followed by our fathers and grandfathers and also by others and all those who are wise adopt the same path. For this I do not consider that they were not orthodox.

8. What little wealth there is in this world, what in the possessions of the gods and what is beyond them, or the region of the Prajapatis, the heaven, or the region of Brahma, I do not desire even unrighteously, O Sanjaya.

9. Krishna, is the lord (as it were) of virtue, well versed in every science, politic, wise and has been attended by Brahmanas, and by him are instructed many kings of great prowess.

10. If I am to blame by not making peace and if I swerve from the duties of my order, let Keshava, the son of Vasudeva, of great fame, who desires the welfare of both parties, say.

11. This Shini, and the king of the Chedis, and the king of the Andhakas and of the Vrishnis, of the Bhojas, of the Kukuras and of the Srinjayas, all by following the counsels of the son of Vasudeva slay their enemies and thus please their friends.

12. The kings of Vrishni and Andhaka, and Ugrasena and others, led by Krishna, are all the equals of Indra and are spirited, attached to truth, of great prowess and happy.

13. The king, of Kashi having obtained Krishna, the giver of boons, as his brother, has attained to great prosperity ; on him the son of Vasudeva, showers blessings as the cloud on earthly beings at the close of summer.

14. Such is this learned Keshava. Know him to be aware of the ethics of actions. The good Krishna is moreover our friend and I shall not act against the advice of Keshava.

Thus ends the twenty eighth Chapter, the speech of Yudhisthira in the Sanjayayana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Vasudeva said :—

I desire, O Sanjaya, the continuance of the existence of the sons of Pandu—their prosperity and their good and in the same way, O Suta, do I desire the prosperity of king Dhritarastra who has many sons.

2. It has ever been my desire, O Sanjaya, to say to them "Be peaceful" nothing else. I hear that this is also the wish of the king (Dhritarastra) and I consider this to be equally to the good of the sons of Pandu.

3. Peace, of a rare sort, indeed, has been shown, O Sanjaya, by the son of Pandu, when Dhritarastra with his sons is avaricious ; why should the quarrel between these two parties rise to good proportions.

4—5. Ye do know, O Sanjaya, the nature of right or wrong better than myself or Yudhishthira; then for what reason, O Sanjaya, do you find fault with the son of Pandu, who is energetic, mindful of his own duties, whose duties towards his relations have been such as have been laid down from the days of yore. Why do you say that their goodness is vanished? With regard to the matter at present under discussion the opinions of the Brahmanas differ.

6. One school say that it is by work that we obtain salvation and again another school say that it is by putting aside work, and through knowledge, that we attain to salvation. It has been so laid down by the superior beings that a man, even knowing all the properties of good, will not be satisfied without eating.

7. That knowledge alone bears fruit, which does work, not others. In this world the result of action admits of ocular proof; one oppressed by thirst is satisfied by drinking water.

8. Therefore it has been ordained by the creator that through work results, O Sanjaya, work. Therefore the opinion that anything other than work is good, is nothing but the uttering of a fool and of a weak man.

9. Elsewhere (i.e. in the other world) the gods are resplendent through work, the wind blows through work. Causing day and night, through work, the sleepless sun rises every day.

10. The sleepless moon, too, goes through half months and months and certain peculiar positions of the moon (through work) and the sleepless fire enkindled (by work) burns, doing good to the creatures of the Earth.

11. The goddess Earth, sleepless, carries this great load through her strength and the sleepless rivers carry their waters with speed, satisfying the desire of all beings.

12. The sleepless one of mighty strength (Indra) showers rain, resounding every corner and the cardinal points; and desiring kingship among the gods he practised the austerities of a Brahmacharyya life, being sleepless.

13. Giving up pleasure and the satisfaction of his desires, the position of a chief was obtained by Shakra by means of work. He strictly observed truth, virtue, self-control, forbearance, impartiality and amiability.

14. Devoting himself to all these, Indra got the high position of the king of the gods. Vrihaspati too practised the austerities of a Brahmacharyya life, with his mind shut up from everything else, and controlling his self as usual.

15. Giving up pleasure, and controlling his senses he obtains glory from the gods and similarly like the planets and Rudra and Aditya and the Vasus in the heaven shines resplendent through works.

16. King Yama, the son of Visravana, Karna, the Gandharvas, the Yakshas and the celestial nymphs, O Suta, and the Rishis in the other world shine resplendent practising the austerities of a Brahmacharyya life and seeking the knowledge of self.

17. Knowing all these truths regarding this world and knowing the duties of the best among Brahmanas, and the Kshatriyas and the Vaisyas, why do you, who are wise, plead on behalf of the sons of Kurus.

18. Yudhishthira is ever attached to the study of the Vedas and know him also to be attached to Aswamedha and Rajsuya sacrificial ceremonies and again riding on cars and on horses and elephants; he also acts with the bow and weapons and puts on armour.

19. If the sons of Pritha can see some means, not involving the slaughter of the sons of Kuru, their virtue would be saved, and a virtuous deed would be done by them by forcing Bhimasena to adopt a more honourable course of life.

20. And if by the ordination of fate they should meet with death, while engaged in the work which their ancestors did, then too doing all that lies in their power towards the fulfilment of their duty their death would be praiseworthy.

21. If you approve of peace, I want to hear your answer to this question: Does the duty of kings lie in fighting or does it lie in not fighting.

22. Having considered the principle on which the four divisions were originally based and the duties of each, O Sanjaya, and having fully ascertained the proposed line of action of the Pandavas, praise or blame it, as you may think fit.

23. A Brahmana should be steady, perform sacrificial ceremonies, give alms and go to the principal places of pilgrimage; he should also teach and officiate as priest in the ceremonies performed by others who need his help and should accept donations from well-known persons.

24. In the same way, having protected his kingdom and his subjects, making donations to persons leading a holy life, and performing sacrificial ceremonies, and studied all the Vedas, and taken a wife (a Kshatriya) should become a house-holder continuing to do virtuous deeds.

25. The virtuous soul, doing virtuous deeds, roams at his will in the region of Brahma. A Vaisya should study and accumulate wealth by agriculture, keeping cattle, and commerce. He should observe these duties intently.

26. And pleasing the Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, of virtuous habits, he should become a house-holder, doing virtuous deeds. He should serve the Brahmanas and worship them; he should not study; sacrifice is forbidden to him; he should ever be wakeful and sleepless in doing good to beings; such are the duties of a Shudra as laid down in the ancient religious books.

27. The king, protecting all these intently and employing all these orders in their respective spheres, should himself be without any service, impartial to all his subjects and should never give himself to the promptings of his unholy desires.

28. If there is any body superior to him (the king) and known to be endued with all virtues, he should instruct his subjects to see him. A bad king will not however observe all this.

29. When he is desirous of obtaining the wealth of others, growing inhuman and gifted with strength and through the wrath of the creator,

30. There comes into being war, for which again was created armour, weapon and bow. For the purpose of slaying robbers were created armour, weapon and bow by Indra.

31. In such cases a virtuous deed is done by slaying such a robber and this weakness appears in a large measure in the sons of Kuru. They have been overpowered by a too slight knowledge of virtue and by non-observance of law and religion; O Sanjaya, this is not right.

32. The king Dhritarashtra with his sons all on a sudden robbed the sons of Pandu of their just inheritance and thus has set at naught the duties observed by kings from times immemorial. And all the Kurus follow him.

32. A thief, when he steals wealth unseen and when he steals it by force, in both these, O Sanjaya, he is to blame; what difference (redeeming feature) has the son of Dhritarashtra?

34. What he is desirous of following through anger is considered as virtuous by him through avarice. Then again the share of the sons of Pandu is fixed, why should that which is ours be taken away by others?

35. Under these circumstances, to be killed while fighting would be praiseworthy for us. Ancestral wealth is better than the kingdom of another. Lay these ancient principles before the sons of Kurus amidst the assembled chiefs,

36. The chiefs, that is to say, the fools that have been brought together by the sons of Dhritarashtra and are thus very near the kingdom of Death. Then again look at this sinful act, of the Kurus in the council hall.

37. The Kurus with Bhishma at their head stood by without interference while the Draupadi, the dearly beloved wife of the son of Pandu—that lady of fame and endued with good behaviour, stood weeping in the clutches of that slave of lust.

38. If at that time the sons of Kuru, who were assembled there, old and young, had prevented this, Dhritarashtra would have done what would have pleased me and such behaviour would also have been to the benefit of his sons.

39. Dushasana brought Krishna by force into the council chamber where there were her fathers-in-law at the time. Brought there she expected kind treatment, but she found there no protector save Vidura.

40. The kings, who were assembled there, could not say anything against such treatment, in the council hall, through idiocy; and there was only one Kshatriya, who from a sense of righteousness spoke words indicating virtue and calculated to secure the interest of Krishna, to the one of little intelligence. (Duryodhana).

41. You did not, then in the council hall, speak one word, but now you want to preach sense to the sons of Pandu. Krishna however accomplished something, in that council, which was right and hard to do.

42. By this (i.e., the deed of Krishna) she took the sons of Pandu out of their difficulty and herself out of hers, as a sailor takes (a ship) out of the sea waves. There, in that council hall, where was standing Krishna in the presence of her fathers in law, the son of Karna thus addressed her.

43. O daughter of Yajnasena, no other course is left open to you; be a slave in the house of the son of Dhritarashtra. Your husbands vanquished (at a game of dice) no longer are husbands for you, and O you of a romantic soul, choose some other husbands for yourself.

44. The (speech) frightful and sharp as it was, went deep into the heart cutting the very bones. This arrow, of words, proceeding from Karna, possessed the power of fire and is buried in the heart of the son of Phulguna.

45. Dushasana also spoke these harsh words when they were about to put on garments made of the skin of black deer. "All these eunuchs vanquished and ruined are going to hell for a long period."

46. The king of Gandhara, Shakuni, also thus spoke by way of jest to the son of Pritha (Yudhishthira) at the time of playing at dice: "Your younger brother being defeated, what else have you but Krishna, the daughter of Yaynasena. Stake her."

47. You know, O Sanjaya, all these objectionable words, that were said, at the game of dice. I want to go there myself to settle this.

48. If I can bring about peace without injury to the interests of the sons of Pandu a virtuous act shall have been done by me resulting in great good and at the same time I shall have freed the Kurus from the clutches of death.

49. I hope that the sons of Dhritarashtra will attend to me when I speak to them words of wisdom, based on the principles of virtue and humanity and that the Kurus will treat me when I go there, with respect.

50. If it is otherwise, you may be sure, that the sons of Dhritarashtra who are being consumed by their own vicious deeds, will be rendered devoid of all prosperity by Arjuna in his car and Bhima equipped for fight,

51. The son of Dhritarashtra spoke harsh and rude words to the sons of Pandu when they were defeated (at the game of dice). At the proper time Bhima, with the mace in his hand, will remind Duryodhana (of his language).

52. Suyodhana is a big tree, full of malice Karna the trunk, and Shakuni the branch. Dushasana presents its numerous fruits and flowers while the wise king Dhritarashtra is the root.

53. Yudhishthira is a big tree full of virtue, Arjuna the trunk and Bhimasena its branch. The two sons of Madri represent the numerous fruits and flowers while myself and the Supreme Being and the Brahmanas are the roots.

54. The king Dhritarashtra with his sons is the forest, and the sons of Pandu, O Sanjaya, the tigers. The forest with the tigers cannot be cut down nor the tigers in the forest destroyed.

55. The tiger without the forest (to protect it) is easily killed and so is the forest without tigers in it (to overawe people) easily cut down. The tiger therefore protects the forest and the forest the tiger.

56. The sons of Dhritarashtra are the creepers of virtue, while, O Sanjaya, the sons of Pandu are like Sala trees. The creeper cannot grow without the support of a big tree.

57. The sons of Pritha are ready to attend on Dhritarashtra; the subduers of foes are ready for fight. Let the king (Yudhishthira) do what Dhritarashtra is going to do.

58. The noble-minded and virtuous sons of Pandu, though ready and in a position to fight, are yet in peace. Tell them, O wise one all these things as they are.

The ends the twenty-ninth, chapter, Krishna's words in Sanjayayana of Udyogo Parva.

CHAPTER XXX.

(SNJAYAYANA PARVA—Continued.)

Sanjaya said:—

1. After bidding you adieu, O god among men, shall I go away O lord, O son of Pandu, may it be well with you. Has any objectionable language been uttered by me, in the heat of the moment.

2. After bidding adieu also to Janardana, Bhimasena, Arjuna, the two sons of Madri, Satyaki and Chakritana, shall I go away. May happiness and prosperity be yours. May the king look upon us with an eye of good will.

Yudhishthira said:—

3. Permitted by ourselves, go away O Sanjaya, May you fare well. Do not, O learned man, think ill of us. They and ourselves all know you to be a pure-souled man, in the midst of (their) court.

4. As an envoy sent (by them) O Sanjaya you have made yourself dear to us and you are of peaceful speech, well behaved, and satisfy every body. You are not ill disposed towards us and though spoken to harshly you are never angry.

5. You are not a speaker of cutting and rude words, nor of harsh or false words. We are aware that your words are based on the principles of virtue, pregnant with meaning and humane, O Suta.

6. You are our favourite; Vidura is the only other envoy that can come here. In former days you were often seen by us and you are our friend like Dhananjaya.

7. Departing from here, O Sanjaya, you should speedily wait on these Brahmanas, who are endued with the practice of pure energy, born in high family, and endued with all the virtues,

8. And those Brahmanas who are devoted to study, and devotees living on alms and those who always dwell in the forests. Greeting all these on my behalf, you should enquire the health of these old people and of others as well.

9. You should also meet the priest of Dhritarastra and all his preceptors, and Ritwikas and ask them about their health, O Suta,

10. And those, who though not of good blood, are aged, spirited, endued with behaviour and strength, who remember and expect us and practise the slightest virtue, according to their means.

11. Inform them of my good health and enquire of them about theirs, as also those who live in the kingdom carrying on the trades, and those who live in the kingdom maintaining it (by filling offices of the state).

12. Our preceptor Drona, who is well versed in the code of morality and who practised the Brahmacharya life wishing for a knowledge of the Vedas and who made the four padas (viz. mantra, upachara, prayoga and Sanhara) his weapon, should be pleased by you after being duly greeted.

13. You should also enquire about the health of Aswathama who is endued with the practice of studying and who has read the Vedas and also again has made the four Padas his weapon, and who is strong as the son of a Gandharva.

14. Going too to the residence of the son of Saradwata, of mighty prowess and the chief among those who have a knowledge of self, you should again and again greet him on my behalf and touch the feet of of Kripa, O Sanjaya, with your hands.

15. You should also, touching the feet of that chief among the Kurus, Bhishma in whom are centered heroism, humility, devotion, wisdom, good behaviour, great learning, goodness and prowess, submit my proposals to him.

16. Saluting the aged king too, who sees by the eyes of wisdom, is the leader of the Kurus, of great learning, who waits upon the old and wise, you should tell him that I am without any disease.

17. You should also enquire, about the health of Suyodhana, the eldest son of Dhritarastra, who is dull-headed, ignorant wicked and addicted to vice, and, by whom, O Sanjaya, all this world is being ruled over.

18. You should also enquire, about the health of his younger brother Dushasana, who is dull-headed, and of the same behaviour (as his elder brother) and who is a great bow man, and one of the best heroes among the Kurus.

19. The one who has no other wish except that there should be peace among the Bharata race,—the best among the Valhikas, a wise and honest man, should also be saluted by you.

20. In my opinion Somadatta too should be saluted by you who is endued with many good qualities, wise and merciful and who always subdues his anger towards the Kurus out of affection for them.

21. The most venerable among the Kurus is the son of Samadatta ; he is our brother, O Sanjaya, and my friend as well. He is a good Bowman and a car-warrior as well and with his councillors, worthy of the highest respect. You should enquire about his health.

22. Those others, who are high among the Kurus and young, and those who are as sons, grand-sons and brothers to us, should also be asked, O Suta, regarding their health, in terms which you consider suitable for each.

23. Those kings who have been brought together by the son of Dhritarashtra for fighting with the Pandavas, the Vasatis, the Salwakas, the Kekayas, the Ambarthan, and the chief among the Trigartas,

24. Those that have come from the East and the North, from the South and the west and all those heroes that have come from the hilly districts, you should ask O Suta, regarding their welfare ; (and specially) those among them that are human and endued with good behaviour.

25. Of those who ride on elephants and chariots, and horses, and those who fight on foot, of that assemblage of great and honourable men after informing my welfare, you should ask regarding their health collectively.

26. In the same way you should enquire about them that are the financial ministers of the king, and the door-keepers, and those that lead the army, and those that calculate the revenue and expenditure and the great men who ever think about the welfare of the kingdom.

27. You should also enquire about the health of the son of Dhritarastra by his Vaisya wife, who is the best among the Kurus, and one among them, not a fool, of great wisdom and endued with all virtues. By no means is he inclined to fight.

28. The one who has no rival in the tricks of dice, whose tricks cannot be detected, who plays dice, and who can handle the dice cleverly, who is hard to defeat in the game, viz. Chitrasena, should also be asked concerning his health.

29. The King of Gandhara, Shakuni, who comes from the hills, and who too is unrivalled in the tricks of the dice, and who contributes to the honour of the son Dhritarashtra, of false intelligence, should, O Suta, be asked concerning his health.

30. The hero, who above from his car, expects to defeat the sons of Pandu who are hard to vanquish, the one who is without a rival in befooling the fools (sons of Dhritarashtra) viz. (Karna) the son of Vikartana should also be asked concerning his health.

31. He who is devoted to our interests, who is our preceptor and lord, who is our father, mother and friend—Vidura of immeasurable wisdom and of good foresight—he who is our adviser, should also be asked concerning his health.

32. The aged ladies, and those among them who being endued with good qualities are regarded by us, O Sanjaya, as our—mothers, should be greeted when they are all together

33. "O you with living sons, do your sons treat you properly" saying this, O Sanjaya, afterwards tell them that he who has created no enemies is doing well with his sons.

34. Those who are like our wives, O Sanjaya, should all be asked regarding their health and address them thus: "Are your leading careful lives in your houses, well protected and with fragrant fame and unblameable conduct?"

35. O gentle ladies, is your treatment towards your fathers-in-law gentle and considerate? You should secure for yourself such behaviour as will make your husbands kind towards you."

36. Going to those who are like our daughters-in-law, endued with good qualities who have been brought there from good families, and with issues, tell them that Yudhisthira who is well disposed towards them sends his greetings.

37. The daughters of your house, O Sanjaya, should be embraced by you, and after asking them about their health on my behalf you should thus address them: O blessed ones, may your husbands be favourably disposed towards you, and may you be favourably disposed towards your husband.

38. You should also, enquire about the health of these ladies who wear ornaments and good cloths on their person, use perfumery, live without any fear, are made happy and in the enjoyment of comforts and whose looks are mild and speech is low.

39. The maid-servants and the male servants, and the many hunch-backed and lame men who have been sheltered by them too should after being informed of my welfare be asked regarding their health and spoken to in these terms:

40—41. Does the son of Dhritarashtra continue the stipend granted you in old, and does he allow you comforts. Those persons of defective limbs, idiots and dwarfs whom the humane Dhritarashtra supports and the many blind persons, and decrepit ones, and those who live by their hands (having no legs) that are there should be first told of my welfare and then asked about theirs.

42. Do not be sorry for this uncomfortable life; sins must surely have been committed by you in the life before; after destroying my enemies I shall support them with food and clothes and favour my friends.

43. Ask the king (Duryodhana) if the stipends made by me to Brahmanas are the same (as before); I shall see them properly rewarded and attain to their objects.

44. And those weak persons who have no body to protect them and those that are vainly striving to earn bread for themselves and also those that are ignorant and imbecile should also be asked, regarding their health on my behalf.

45. Those also, that have taken refuge with the sons of Dhritarashtra, coming from different directions, should be asked concerning their health.

46. In the same way all the ambassadors, of the king (Dhritarashtra) who have come there from all directions, should first be asked about their health and afterwards they should be told that I am doing well.

47. There is not in the world anything equal to the warriors that have been gained by the son of Dhritarashtra on his side. Virtue is even on my side and virtue is my great strength for the destruction of my enemies.

48—49. You should, O Sanjaya, make Suyodhana, the son of Dhritarashtra hear these words: The desire which is tormenting your heart, to rule the Kurus without any rival, has no justification for it. We shall do nothing that will not be agreeable to you. Either give me back the city of Indra, or fight, O you chief hero among the race of Bhatata.

Thus ends the thirtieth chapter, the words of Yudhisthira in the Sanjyayana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXXI.

(SANJAYAYANA PARVA)—

*Continued.Yudhisthira said:—

1. The creator has, under his control, the good and the bad, the young and the old the weak and the strong.

2. The supreme lord gives wisdom to the child and childishness to the wise, developing the seed in a being.

3. To him (Dhritarashtra) desirous of knowing our strength should you say how matters really stand, having cheerfully held a consultation with a view to knowing the true information.

4. O son of Gavalgani, going to the Kauravas, you should greet king Dhritarashtra of great strength and touching his feet ask him regarding his health.

5. And you shall say to him, who will be seated surrounded by the Kurus: The sons of Pandu are living happily solely through your prowess.

6. It was through your grace, O subduer of enemies, that they though mere boys obtained a kingdom. First establishing them in the kingdom, do not treat them with carelessness or they would be ruined.

7. All this kingdom is too much, O Sanjaya, for any body. You should say this speaking on our behalf: Sire, we shall live united; do not go into the clutches of despisers.

8. In the same way should you bow down your head, on my behalf, to the grandsire of the race of Bharata, Bhishma, the son of Shantanu.

8. After being greeted, our grandsire should thus be addressed: By you was the race, of Shantanu when about to be involved in ruin, was extricated.

10. You, who have done this, now do what according to your own opinion, O Grandsire, will enable your grandsons to live in peace and amity with each other.

11. In the same way should you thus speak to Vidura, the adviser of the Kurus "O you peaceful one, advise peace, O you well-wisher of Yudhisthira."

12. And then speak to the wrathful prince Duryodhana seated in the midst of the Kurus entreating him again and again.

13. "The insults you have offered to the blameless Krishna who had been brought to this council hall, we will quietly endure so that the Kurus may not be slaughtered.

13. The Pandavas will quietly bear similar insults offered before and after that though they are strong enough. All this the Kauravas know.

15. O amiable one, you sent us into exile with raiments made of deer skin on. This hardship shall we quietly bear so that the Kurus may not be slaughtered.

16. O Dushasana, it was at your bidding that Krishna was dragged here by the hair setting at naught the protest of Kunti. That too is forgiven by us.

17. But O represser of enemies, we want our due share; O best among men, turn away your avaricious inclination from what belongs to others.

18. By this means, O king, there shall be peace and good will among each other; give back to us, who are desirous of peace, even one province out of the kingdom.

19. Give us Krisasthala, Brikasthala, Makandi and Varunavata, with any other village for a fifth and let there be an end of our quarrel over this matter.

20. O Suyodhana, give but five villages to your five cousins and let there be peace among ourselves and our cousins, O Sanjaya of great wisdom.

21. Let brother follow brother and let father unite with son. Let the Panchals join the Kurus with a smiling face.

22. I desire that I shall see the Kauravas and the Panchalas, without any wounds and we shall all establish peace with cheerful hearts, O you best among the race of Bharata.

23. I am surely ready for peace and for war as well, O Sanjaya. For the acquirement of wealth, am I surely prepared for mild measures and harsh ones.

Thus ends the thirty first chapter, the words of Yudhisthira in the Sanjayayan of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXXII.

(SANJAYAYANA PARVA)—*contd.Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then did Sanjaya, permitted by the son of Pandu, depart, doing all the behests of the great-souled Dhritarashtra.

2. Having reached Hastinapura, he entered it quickly and standing at the gate (entrance of the) inner apartments of the palace said these words to the gate-keeper.

3. Tell Dhritarastra, O gate-keeper, that, I, Sanjaya, have returned from the presence of the sons of Pandu, delay not.

4. If he is awake, tell him this, O gate-keeper and make the ruler of the earth acquainted with (the news of) my entrance (into the city); I have business to submit to him. Hearing this, the gate-keeper went to the king.

The gate-keeper said :—

5. O you lord of the earth, I bow down to you. Sanjaya is come to your door, desirous of an audience. He is arrived here as an envoy from the presence of the sons of Pandu. Command, O king, as to what he should do.

Dhritarastra said :—

6. Inform him of my well-being. Let him enter. Welcome to Sanjaya. I am never unwilling to receive him, why does he, who can enter at any moment, stand at my door.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Then with the king's permission, the son of Suta having entered that large hall with clasped hands, approached the royal son Vichitraviryya, seated on the throne and protected by wise men, heroes and honourable men.

Sanjaya said :—

8. I am Sanjaya, I bow down to the lord of the earth. Setting out from here, I reached the sons of Pandu, O god among men. The spirited Yudhishthira having sent his greetings to you, afterwards asked me about your health.

9. And he gladly enquired about the health of your sons and asks you if you are pleased with your sons and son's sons, and friends and ministers and all those who live dependent on you.

Dhritarastra said :—

10. Blessing you, I say, O Sanjaya, is the son Pritha, he who creates no enemies, in happiness? Is that king of the Kauravas well with his sons, ministers and younger brothers.

Sanjaya said :—

11. With his ministers, the son of Pandu is in health; he desires that which was formerly his own,—he who acquires virtue and wealth, and commits no wrong deed, who is spirited, of great learning, of great fore-sight and of good behaviour.

12. With the sons of Pandu humanity is superior to virtue and in his opinion virtue is superior to the accumulation of wealth. He is inclined to the thought, O son of Bharata, that happiness and joy are essential to virtue.

13. Led by the will of God, a man acts like a wooden doll moved about by a thread. Seeing the sufferings of the son of Pandu I think that the ordinations of the gods have greater force than the exertions of man.

14. Seeing again your sinful deeds which will give rise to misery and which are eminently indescribable, (I am of opinion) that so long as a mighty foe waits for an opportunity, the other obtains praise.

15. The hero Yudhishthira, who has created no enemies, casting away all sins as a snake does its worn out slough, which cannot remain on it, shines resplendent having transferred (the effects of) his sins to you.

16. Reflect, O king, the suicidal (effects of your) acts which are the reverse of the acts of honourable men, and unproductive either of virtue or of wealth; you have obtained blame, O king, in this world and again will you get misery in another.

17. Now following the whims of your son, you expect to obtain the wealth which it is hard to gain; you want to enjoy without them to share it. This act has been loudly proclaimed to be vicious in this world, and this act is not worthy of you, O you foremost of the race of Bharata.

18. Those who are devoid of wisdom, who are born in low families, who are cruel, who cherish feelings of enmity for a long time and who are not steady in the acquisitions of a Kshatrya, who are devoid of heroism, and who are vicious—those who answer this description are overtaken by ruin.

19. It is through luck that one is born in a high family, is mighty, is renowned, is vastly learned, is happy in this life, tries to subdue his soul or supports virtue and vice which have a close connection between them.

22. The Kurus will prematurely cease to exist, if through your sins, he who has created no enemies wishes you misery. He will transfer (effect of) his sins to you and you will be blamed in the world.

20. Why should a man who is advised by the best of ministers, who is wise and who is master of actions producing virtue and interest in times of distress and who has not lost his senses—why should such a man do a cruel deed like a man who is devoid of all advice.

22. All these ministers of yours, ever devoted to work, wait together. It is through their firm determination (that they will not give back to the Pandavas their share of the kingdom) that the destruction of the Kurus will be accomplished.

23. What else is it but divine that the son of Pritha left this world to behold the other and was there honoured like one having the privilege of roaming about both the worlds. This is not the doing of a man. There is no doubt about it.

24. Seeing that the growth of these attributes (viz., heroism &c.) depended on action and that wealth and poverty were transient, king Vali, in his search about the cause of this, came to the conclusion that god and nothing else was the cause thereof.

25. The eye, the ear, the nose, the touch and the tongue, these are the sources of the knowledge of animals. These are gratified if thirst is destroyed; therefore should a man cheerfully bring these under control.

26. Others put it in a different way. (They say) that the desired effect must come out of one's acts when done properly. (Thus) the child is the outcome of the act of its father and mother and it grows by proper diet.

27. O king, man is subject to good and bad, happiness and misery, praise and censure. He wins praise when he does any good act and blame when he commits any wrong.

28. I blame you; for, the result of this struggle between the sons of Bharata will surely be the destruction of innumerable human lives and if peace be not concluded the Kurus will be consumed by Arjuna like a heap of dried grass by a blazing fire through your fault.

29. O Lord of men, you, alone of all the world having come under the influence of your head-strong son, regarded success as sure and did not prevent the dispute at the time of the game; now, see the result of this.

30. O king, O lord of men, you will not be able to retain this broad domain on account of your weakness, in listening to the counsels of false ministers and rejecting that of faithful advisers, O son of Kuru.

31. O best of men, being very much fatigued by the speedy motion of the car I solicit your permission to retire to rest; for in the morning the sons of Kuru assembled in the council chamber will listen to the message of him who has created no enemies.

Dhritarastra said :—

32. O son of Suta, being permitted by me go you to your house and retire to rest. In the morning will the sons of Kuru in the council chamber be hearers of the message of him who has created no enemies, alluded to by you.

Thus ends the thirty-second chapter, the words of Sanjaya to Dhritarastra, in the Sanjayayana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

PRAJAGARA PARVA.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. The Lord of the Earth Dhritarastra, of great wisdom, said to his attendant :—I desire to see Vidura. Bring him here without delay.

2. Being sent by Dhritarastra the messenger said to the Kshatriya : O you of great wisdom, my lord, the king, wants to see you.

3. Being thus addressed, Vidura, having come to the royal palace, said to the gate keeper : Announce me to Dhritarastra.

The gate keeper said :—

4. O chief among kings, Vidura, having come here at your command, desires to behold your feet. Command me what he is to do.

Dhritarastra said :—

5. Let the very wise Vidura endued with great foresight enter. I am always willing and prepared to see Vidura.

The gate keeper said :—

6. O Kshatri, enter the inner apartments of the wise king; the king told me that he was never unwilling to see you.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Then Vidura having entered the palace of Dhritarastra said with clasped hands to the lord of men who was absorbed in thought.

8. O you of great wisdom, I am Vidura, come here by your command, if there is anything to be done, here I am; command me.

Dhritarastra said :—

9. O Vidura, Sanjaya has arrived here and having found fault with me gone away; the message of Yudhishthira he will deliver in the council.

10. This day was I unable to know (the nature of) the message of the hero among the Kurus ; therefore is my body burning, which has caused sleeplessness.

11. What you consider good for a man who gets no sleep and whose body is burning, tell (me) you are versed in what is religious and what leads to profit.

12. Since Sanjaya has come back from the Pandavas, I have not my usual calmness of mind ; all my senses are in disorder ; I am thinking what he will say.

Vidura said :—

13. Sleeplessness overpowers one attacked by a stronger man, the weak, those who have failed to attain an end, those whose wealth has been stolen, those fired with desire and thieves.

14. I hope, O Lord of men, you have not been affected by any of these grave evils nor are you possessed by covetousness at other people's wealth.

Dhritarastra said :—

15. I desire to hear words from you that are at once moral in spirit and beneficial ; in this race of royal devotees ; you are the only one honoured by the wise.

Vidura said :—

16. Yudhishthira is a king graced with auspicious marks ; is fit to become the lord of the three worlds ; and though he ought to have been kept near you, he was exiled.

17. Though you are virtuous and know virtue, yet are you regarded as possessing qualities quite opposite to this owing to the loss of sight.

18. Owing to his inoffensiveness, kindness, virtue, love of truth and prowess, he bears in mind your supremacy and patiently endures many hardships.

19. Having conferred the lordship over the people on Duryodhana, the son of Suvala, Karna, and Dushasana, how can you desire for prosperity.

20. He is said to be a wise man, whom for a consciousness of the power of one's own self, exertion, forbearance and constancy in religion does not draw aside from the acquisition of the high ends in life.

21—22. He is said to be a wise man whom anger, exultation, pride, shame, stupefaction and vanity cannot draw aside from the acquisition of the high ends in life. Attachment to praiseworthy persons and objects and keeping away from those blameable, faith, and reverence are the signs of a wise man.

23. He is said to be a wise man whose proposed acts, and line of action agreed on are not known to others and known only after they have been put into execution.

24. He is called a wise man whose acts are not hampered by cold, heat, fear, lust prosperity or adversity.

25. He is called a wise man whose wisdom naturally follows both religion and profit and who chooses such course of life as is of use in both the worlds and not acts immediately resulting in pleasure.

26. Wise men exert to the best of their ability and also act to the best of their ability and they disregard nothing.

27. It is the wisdom of the foremost wise man to understand quickly, listen patiently and having understood the effects of action not to follow them from desire to get pleasure (but from judgment) and not to connect one's self with other peoples' affairs unsolicited.

28. Men with the wisdom of a wise man do not strive for the unattainable, do not grieve for what is lost and do not lose their senses in calamities.

29. He is said to be a wise man who exerts after having decided on a course of action, and who does not stop in the middle, who does not waste his time and who has his self under control.

30. Wise men rejoice in virtuous deeds and do those that tend to their prosperity and look not with contempt on what is good.

31. He is said to be a wise man who does not exult in honours to himself, and grieves not at insults, and who remains unagitated like a lake near the Ganga.

32. That man is said to be wise who is cognisant of the nature of all creatures (their ultimate destructibility), of the connections (causes and effects) of all acts and the means of human beings (employed in the attainment of their ends).

33. He is said to be a wise man who speaks boldly, can talk on diverse subjects, can argue well, has genius, and who can explain the meaning of what is written in books at once.

34. He gains the reputation of a wise man who regulates his studies by wisdom and whose wisdom follows the books, who is ever ready to respect those that are good.

35. Wise men call them fools, who though not learned are haughty, though poor are vain and who are desirous of attaining prosperity by wrong acts.

36. He is said to be a fool who neglecting his own interests looks after those of others, and who resorts to deceit for (serving) his friends.

37. He is said to be foolish-minded who desires what ought not to be desired and forsakes those that are fit to be desired and who treats stronger parties with contempt.

38. He is said to be foolish-minded who makes friends of those that are foes and who hates and slays those that are well-wishers and who commits wicked acts.

39. He is a fool who gives out his intended acts, who has doubts in every case, and who delays in doing things that ought to be done quickly.

40. He is said to be foolish-minded who does not give offerings to his ancestors, (Pitris), who does not worship gods, and who does not (manage to) get good-hearted friends.

41. That fool is the worst of men who enters unasked, speaks much unsolicited and has confidence in those that are untrustworthy.

42. That man is the worst of fools who throws the blame on others, though himself is to blame and who is angry though unable to do anything.

43. He is said to be foolish-headed in this world who is desirous of an object hard to gain without knowing his own strength, without employing adequate means for it, and the object if gained securing him neither merit in heaven nor profit in this world.

44. He is said to be foolish-minded who punishes, O king, him who deserves not punishment, who flatters big people without their knowledge, and who attends on misers.

45. He is said to be a wise man who, having acquired immense wealth, learning or power, conducts himself without any haughtiness.

46. Who is meaner than he who though possessed of riches eats, and wears pretty looking dresses alone without sharing them amongst his dependants.

47. One man does wicked deeds while the fruit is enjoyed by many; others enjoy while the doer alone is blamed.

48. Only one may or may not be killed by a bowman who has shot an arrow but when a wise man employs his wisdom (viciously) a kingdom may be destroyed along with the king.

49. Discriminating the two (right and wrong or the transient and the permanent effect of actions) by means of the one (intellect), bring under your control the three (friend, foe, and one who is indifferent in these respects, or desire, anger, and greed) by means of four (Conciliation, gift, dissension and punishment) and subjugating the five (senses) and knowing the six (treaty, war, hunger, thirst, calamity, imbecility, old age and death or desire anger, greed, &c) and keeping yourself away from the seven (women, dice, hunting, drink, harshness of speech severity of punishment and misuse of wealth) be happy.

50. Poison kills but one, and also one is slain by a weapon, while disagreement between ministers destroys a king with the kingdom and the subjects.

51. Alone one should not taste a delicious dish, alone one should not think of profitable undertakings, alone one should not go on a journey, and alone one should not be awake amidst those that are asleep.

52. The Being, who has no rival, whom you have not been able to comprehend, is Truth, and the Way to Heaven, like a boat in the ocean.

53. There is but one defect in persons of a forgiving disposition; since people consider this man of a foregoing nature to be weak.

54. This defect in such a man need not be made too much of; forgiveness is a great power. For the weak, as well as for the strong forgiveness is an ornament.

55. Forgiveness subdues (every thing) in the world. What is there that cannot be accomplished by forgiveness? What can a wicked man do to one who has the sword of pacification in his hand?

56. Fire, falling on ground devoid of vegetation, is extinguished of itself. The unforgiving poison defiles himself with grave defects.

57. Virtue is the only highest good, forgiveness the supreme peace, knowledge the deepest satisfaction and benevolence the one cause of happiness.

58. The earth devours these two, as a serpent destroys those living in holes viz., a king who is not a warrior and a Brahmana who has never been away from home (to holy places).

59. By doing two things a man can attain to renown in this world—by not indulging in harshness of speech and by disregarding the slightly his honor.

60. These two, O best of men, place confidence in others viz. the women who desire men (only because the latter are) desired by other women, and the men who worship another (only because the latter is worshipped by others.

61. These two are like sharp thorns consuming the body viz the man, who being poor, has desires and one, who though powerless, is yet wrathful.

62. These two cannot shine owing to the inconsistency of their acts with their station viz the householder who does not exert and the begger who is busy.

63. These two men, O king, are placed above heaven, viz the powerful man graced with forgiveness and the poor man with charity.

64. Of things earned by just means these two must be looked upon as abuses viz gifts to the unworthy and refusal to the worthy.

65. These two are fit to be thrown into the water with stones firmly bound to their necks viz the wealthy man who does not make gifts and the poor man who is a devotee.

66. These two, O best of men, pierce the orb of the sun viz an itinerant versed in yoga and one slain when engaged in battle.

67. Men are known to have three means (for attaining of their ends) O best the race of Bharatas ; they are known to people versed in the Vedas as the bad, the middling and the good.

68. Men too, O king, are of three denominations viz., the good, bad, middling ; they should therefore be employed in their respective avocations—in three sorts of work.

69. The three are without wealth, O king, viz., the wife, the slave and the son ; what ever they earn belongs to him to whom they belong.

70. Robbing other people of their wealth, outraging other people's wives, and forsaking a friend—these three sins are consuming.

71. These three are the ways to hell and destruction of self viz., desire, anger and greed ; therefore should these three be renounced.

72. These three viz., a follower, one who seeks your protection saying I am thine and one who has come to your house should never be forsaken, even in times of grave danger.

73. The grant of a boon, of a kingdom and the begetting of a son, O son of Bharata,—these three are equalled by the release of a foe from difficulty alone.

74. These four should be excluded from counsels even by a greatly powerful king —the learned men have said—men of little sense should not be consulted—nor men who make unnecessary delays, lazy men, and flatterers.

75. Let these four dwell at your house, O sire, who are a householder crowned with prosperity, viz., aged and worn out cousins, men of noble families, destitute friends, and childless sisters.

76. Four things, O great king, were declared to bear fruit instantaneously by Vrihaspati on being asked by the chief of the celestials ; they are these, listen to me :—

77. The resolve of the gods, the intellect of the wise, the humility of the accomplished and the destruction of wicked deeds.

78. Four things, calculated to remove fear, cause fear when improperly done—Agnihotra, the vow of silence, the vow of study and that of sacrificial ceremonies.

79. Five fires should be worshiped by a man with care viz., father, mother, Agni, self and spiritual guide, O best the race of Bharata.

80. By worshipping these five viz., the gods, the ancestors, men, beggars and gues a man obtains renown in this world.

81. These five follow you wherever you go viz., friends, foes, those that are neither, dependents nor those who ought to be supported by you.

82. Of the five senses in this world, if one has a hole, then from that hole gets out the wisdom of an intelligent man like water, from a pot.

83. These six defects should be shunned by a man in this world who desires for prosperity viz., sleep, drowsiness, fear, anger, laziness and procrastination.

84—85. These six should be avoided by a man like a broken boat in the sea ; a tutor that cannot interpret the meaning of the holy books, a priest that is not well read, a king that cannot protect a wife given to the use of disagreeable words, a cowherd that desires always for the village (and not the pasture) and a barber that desires for the wilderness.

86. The six qualities should never be renounced by a man viz., truth, charity, the reverse of laziness, benevolence, forgiveness and patience.

87. These six are destroyed through a moment's neglect viz., cows, service, agriculture, wife, book learning and the prosperity of a Sudra.

88—89. These six always cease to care those who have previously done them good viz., a learned pupil, the tutor, he who has got a wife, the mother, one whose desire has been satisfied, the woman, one whose wants have been removed, the giver, one who has crossed a river, the boat, and the diseased (who has been cured) and the physician.

90. Immunity from malady, unindebtedness, the reverse of exile, coming in contact with good men, confidence in one's own livelihood, and life without fear—these six, constitute the happiness of men, O king.

91. The curious, the malicious, the discontented, the wrathful, the ever suspicious and those living on other people's fortunes—these six are always miserable.

92. The attainment of prosperity being always healthy, a beloved wife of sweet speech, an obedient son, and knowledge tending to prosperity—these six constitute the happiness of men, O king.

93. He who attains lordship over the six (desire, anger, grief, stupifaction, pride and vanity) that master of the senses never commits sins—how can he be smitten by grief.

94—95. These six live on six (others) and not on a seventh viz., thieves live on the absent-minded, physicians on the diseased, women on those affected with desire, priests on them that perform sacrifices, kings on persons that quarrel and wise men on the ignorant.

96. Seven defects which are the sources of calamity should also be avoided by a king, since they always accomplish the destruction of even the firmly established king.

97. (They are) women, dice, game, drink, harshness of speech,—these five and the great severity of punishment and abuse of wealth.

98—100. Eight preliminary causes ruin a man; despising the Brahmanas, the struggle with the Brahmanas, the acquirement of a Brahmana's wealth, taking the life of Brahmana, rejoicing at reviling them, disapproval of praise to them, not remembering them on occasions of festivity, and finding fault with them when they ask for anything. These defects should a wise man understand and understanding them, should avoid.

101—103. These eight are the creams of rejoicing, O son of Bharata, and are obtained this world viz. union with friends, acquirement of immense wealth, embracing a son, intercourse in union, agreeable conversations at proper times, the advancement of the members of one's party, the attainment of desired results and honour and respect among men.

104. Eight qualities shed lustre on a man, viz wisdom, noble blood, Self-restraint, burning prowess, moderation of speech charity to the best of one's own power and gratitude. ●

105. This house has nine doors, three pillars and five witnesses presided over by the soul. That learned man who knows this is the best of the wise.

106—107. These ten know not what virtue is, O Dhritarastra, listen (as I name them, the intoxicated, the absent-minded, the insane, the weary, the angry, the hungry, the hasty, the covetous, the frightened, and lustful, these are the ten; therefore should a wise man shun the company of these all.

108. In this connection people cite the old story that is related about what passed between Sudhanwan and the chief of the Asuras for the sake of his (the latter's) son.

109. The king, who shuns desire and spite and distributes wealth among worthy parties, is discriminating, learned, active, and is regarded as an authority by all men.

110. One who knows how to make other people confident on him, who awards punishment after guilt has been established, knows its proper degree, and knows also forgiveness is attended with great prosperity.

111. He is a wise man, who does think lightly of the weak (foe), who proceeds with intelligence in respect to a foe waiting for an opportunity, who does not quarrel with the strong and who shows prowess only at the proper time.

112. That illustrious man, who does not grieve when a calamity is already on him, and who (then) exerts with his senses about him, and who also patiently bears calamities (when they are unavoidable), is a noble-minded one, and his opponents are always subdued.

113. He who never remains away from home for nothing, who does not mix with wicked people, never outrages another's wife, who is not arrogant, who does not steal, is not ungrateful and does not drink, is always happy.

114. He who never pursues the three objects (virtue, profit and desire) in a spirit of boastfulness, who when appealed declares the truth, who does not sow discussions even for friends and who though insulted is not angry is the reverse of a fool.

115. He, who is not malicious towards others, and who being weak does not quarrel, who does not speak haughtily and who always forgives quarrels, wins renown.

116. One, who is never haughty, who never speaks ill of others, praising himself and who in a moment of self forgetfulness never speaks harshly, is loved by all men.

117. One, who does not revive disputes that have been settled and who behaves not with too much arrogance, nor with excessive humility and who does not do a wrong deed, because he is in distress, is said to be a man of good behaviour by very good men.

118. One, who exults not in his own happiness nor is glad at another's distress and who does not repent after having given away, is said by good men to be of good conduct.

119. He, who desires knowledge of the the manners and customs of different countries and of the different languages and of the duties of the different casts, knows every thing, high and low ; wherever he goes, he attains to lordship over great men.

120. The wise man who keeps away pride, folly, impertinence, sinful deeds, disloyalty towards his sovereign, roguery enmity with many, speech with the drunk, the insane, and the wicked, is a chief among men.

121. Charity, worship of the gods, auspicious ceremonies and the several penances laid down by men—the gods exert themselves for the advancement of him who practises these daily.

122. One, who forms matrimonial relationship with a man in equal station and not with those who are below him, and who forms friendships with his equals, and converses and treats with them, who puts those that are graced with accomplishments before him—performs acts after the best policy.

123. One who eats with moderation after doing excessive work, who gives away, (even) to foes when asked, is never beside himself ; and evils always avoid him.

124. He, whose proposed acts and acts put into execution are seldom known to others and whose intentions are kept secret and put into practice suitably, does not fail in his objects even when trifling.

125. He, who is engaged in doing good to all creatures, who is attached to truth, not haughty, of a good mind and not a miser, is known very well among his cousins like a gem of the purest ray obtained from a good mine.

126. The man, who is ashamed of his faults unknown to others, is respected by all men, being of illimitable lustre, of an excellent mind ; and his mind is intent on his inner self, and his lustre shines like the sun.

127. The king Pandu, burning under the influence of a curse, begot in the woods, five sons each equal to Indra ; under your supervision did the boys grow up and were instructed and you have been rearing them up to now, O son of Amvika.

128. Giving back to them their rightful kingdom, O Sire, be happy with your sons and pass your time agreeably ; O Lord of man, then will you not be mistrusted by the gods, nor by the men.

Thus ends the thirty third chapter, code of morality of Vidura, in the Prajagara of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

PRAJAGARA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Tell me what you think ought to be done by a sleepless man and burning (with anxiety) ; you alone among us, are accomplished, both in the codes of morality and policy.

2. Tell me, O Vidura, as suits the occasion, after exercising your wisdom, all that you consider to be beneficial for Ajatasatru ; tell speak also what conduces to the good of the Kurus.

3. Committing sin, and looking back on my misdeeds, I ask you with anxious heart, O wise one, all that is in the mind of Ajatasatru.

Vidura said :—

4. Good or bad, agreeable or disagreeable should one speak out, though unasked, to one whose downfall he does not wish.

5. Therefore shall I say to you, O king, what is good for the Kurus, listen to me, (while I am) speaking words that are conducive to your interests and consistent with morality.

6. The misdeeds, that are attainable only by dishonest means, do not set your mind on, O Bharata.

7. If an object cannot be attained, O king, even with proper means, an intelligent man does not distress his mind about it.

8. The reasons of an act, and its result should be carefully considered before it is done without due deliberation.

9. A wise man does or does not do an act after reflecting on the reasons of an act and its results if done, as also the energy of his own self.

10. One (a king) who does not know the measure of his territory, population and punishment, cannot continue in (the enjoyment of) his kingdom.

11. He who knows these measures as prescribed (in books) is versed in the science of morality and earthly good and retains his kingdom.

12. One (a king) should not live a haughty life considering that he has already obtained a kingdom ; for haughtiness destroys kingly prosperity, as old age (destroys) good appearance.

13. A fish out of greediness does not think about the result of an action and swallows up the iron hook concealed in a dainty morsel.

14. One, who desires worldly prosperity, should swallow only that which can be swallowed and which, being swallowed, can be digested, and may contribute to benefit in the end.

15. He, who plucks unripe fruits from trees, does not get the juice out of it ; and moreover he destroys the seeds.

16. And he, who gets ripe fruit in the proper season, gets the juice of the fruit as well as other fruits reproduced from the seeds.

17. As the bees suck honey without injuring the flowers, so should wealth be taken from men (by kings) without injuring them.

18. Carefully plucking the flowers, one should not hurt the roots of the plants, like a maker of garlands in a garden and not like a seller of charcoal.

19. Having carefully considered what will befall me after doing an act or not doing it, a man should do things or not do them.

20. Acts should not be commenced, which can not be done for certain and which, if commenced, render the exertions of a man fruitless.

21. Whose favour is useless, and whose ire is impotent, the people do not wish that sort of man for a lord ; as a woman does not wish an impotent man to be her husband.

22. A wise man does not wait, but quickly commences doing such acts, as involve little labour but produce great results.

23. He (the king) who looks affectionately, as if drinking with his eyes, on all,—though only sitting without any exertion—can inspire affection in all his subjects.

24. If a tree is full of blossoms though the king looks affectionately on this let it not be fruitful ; and if it is fruitful let the tree be inaccessible ; and if the fruits are unripe let them appear as ripe. A king, who acts thus, is never weakened.

25. Society favours him, who pleases all in four ways viz., by the eyes, by the mind, by words, and by the act.

26. He, whom all creatures dread as deers fear the hunter, loses it in the end even after acquiring the earth (for his kingdom) having the sea round it.

27. He (the king), who is addicted to unfairness, destroys by his own acts the kingdom inherited from his father and grandfather ; even as the wind scatters away the clouds by touching them.

28. The earth full of wealth increases the worldly prosperity of the king who practises virtue, followed by good men from the ancient time.

29. Again, the territories, that of king who leaving virtue, practises unrighteousness, contract like a piece of leather thrown into the fire.

30. The care, that is bestowed on despoiling another of his kingdom, should be spent in protecting one's own kingdom.

31. By means of virtue should a kingdom be attained ; and by means of virtue should it be governed. The kingly prosperity, that has virtue for its basis, is never lost, nor it flies away.

32. Enlightenment should be sought for from every thing—even from the ravings of a lunatic, and the prattles of a child, as gold from stones.

33. A wise man should live, picking out good manners, good sayings and good deeds, even as one given up to the Sila mode of life picks grains of corn from the field.

34. Kine see by means of smell, Brahmanas see by means of the Vedas, kings see by means of scouts, and other people through eyes.

35. The cow that is difficult to milk gets great trouble ; but one that is easy to milk, O king, gets nothing.

36. That which bends without being heated is not heated at all ; the wood that bends of itself is never heated.

37. Following this example, a wise man should bend to one stronger than himself and he who bends before the stronger bows down to Indra himself.

38. Creatures depend on clouds ; kings have the counsellors for their friends ; husbands are the friends of women, and the Brahmanas have the Vedas for their friends.

39. Virtue is preserved by truthfulness ; learning is preserved by exercise ; beauty is preserved by toilet ; and noble birth is preserved by good manners.

40. Corn is preserved by measure ; exercise preserves steeds ; strict and constant supervision preserves horses ; and women is preserved by ragged garments.

41. It is my opinion that noble birth in one who is not of good behaviour does not mean virtue ; and that good manners in one born low should command respect.

42. He who is envious of other people's wealth, beauty, prowess, good birth, happiness, luck and reward, suffers a disease which has no cure.

43. He, by whom is feared the doing of improper acts, or the omission of proper acts, or the premature disclosure of his intentions, should not drink that which inebriates.

44. Pride of learning, pride of wealth, pride of connections—the pride in these the good people should restrain.

45. Bad people, asked by honest ones to do something for them, consider themselves as honest after doing very little of that, even though they are well-known to be dishonest.

46. The righteous are their own refuge, and that of other righteous men. The righteous, too, are the refuge of the unrighteous ; and the unrighteous are never the refuge of the righteous.

47. In (a debate in) an assembly, he who is well dressed, comes off victorious ; he who is owner of kine triumphs over the desire to eat sweets ; and the road is triumphed over by one who has conveyances ; and everything is subjugated by one of good behaviour.

48. Good manner is the prime thing in a man ; and he that has not got it in this life gains nothing by life, by wealth, or by friends.

49. O bull of the race of Bharata, flesh is the chief food of the rich, milk that of the middle classes and oil that of the poor.

50. The poor however ever take the most delicious food ; for hunger imparts sweetness of taste to it ; it (hunger) is ever rare among the opulent.

51. In this world, the opulent mostly have no capacity, for eating, while O Lord of the earth, pieces of wood are digested by the poor.

52. Loss of livelihood is feared by men of the lower classes ; death is feared by the middle classes and insult is greatly feared by good men.

53. The devils who are proud of their wealth are worse than those intoxicated with wine ; for he, who is intoxicated with the pride of wealth, is not brought to his senses unless he meet with the reverse.

54. This world is affected by the senses directed to their own objects without any control in the same way as stars (are affected by the planets).

55. In the life of one, who is subjugated by the five senses in their natural state ever impelling him towards action, calamities ever increase like the moon after the new moon.

56. He, who desires to bring his advisers under control without controlling himself, who desires to control his enemies without controlling his advisers, at last yields, deprived of strength.

57. He, therefore, who brings himself first under control thinking that his senses are his prime enemies, in the end subjugates as a matter of certainty, his advisers and his enemies.

58. Great prosperity comes up on him who has controlled his senses, or subjugated himself, and who can hold the rod (of punishment) against all offenders without partiality, and who acts with circumspection and who is patient.

59. The body of a man, O king, is like the car ; the soul, the driver ; and the senses, the horses. Drawn by those excellent steeds when well trained, he that is wise and patient performs the journey in peace.

60. These (the senses) when untrained lead one to destruction ; in the same way the untrained horses lead the unskillful drivers (to destruction.)

61. The inexperienced man, who wants to select evil from good and good from evil with the aid of his senses which he has not mastered, considers great misery to be happiness.

62. He, who having forsaken both virtue and worldly gains, follows the lead of his senses, very soon comes to lose prosperity, life, wealth and wife.

63. The lord of riches, who is a slave of his senses, loses his riches through his want of control over the senses.

64. A man should try to see and know himself by mastering his mind, intelligence and senses ; for, he himself is his own friend, and himself is his own enemy.

65. He, by whom self has been subjugated by self, and has himself for his friend ; for himself is ever his friend and himself is ever his enemy.

66. In the same way, as a big fish breaks through a net of thin chords, so, O king, desire and anger cast wisdom in the shade.

67. He, who having paid due regard to virtue and worldly gains seeks the acquirement of success, gets what he wants and ever is in happiness.

68. He, who without subjugating the five enemies within that have their origin in the mind, desires to subdue other enemies, is vanquished by these enemies.

69. Instances are seen in which noble-hearted kings, out of lust of territory, are destroyed by their own acts solely through the want of control over their senses.

70. Equal punishment overtakes the sinless with the sinful, when these two constantly associate; even as the wet fuel burns with the dry. Therefore friendship should not be established with the sinful.

71. Misery overtakes the man, who does not subdue his five soaring foes out of ignorance which have five different objects.

72. Guilelessness, simplicity, sanctity, contentment, sweetness of speech, self-control, truthfulness and steadiness are never the attributes of the wicked.

73. Spiritual knowledge, steadiness, patience, constancy in virtue, secret counsels and charity—these are not to be found in men of the lower classes, O descendant of Bharata.

74. The ignorant seek to injure the wise by malice and back-biting; and the speaker takes upon himself the load of his (wise man's) sins, which he (the wise man) casts off by forgiving the ignorant.

75. Malice is the strength of the unrighteous; the penal code is the strength of the kings; ministration to the sick is the strength of women; and forgiveness is the strength of the virtuous.

76. The control over speech, O lord of men, is thought to be most difficult; and it is not possible to speak much full of meaning in an entertaining way.

77. Words spoken sweetly bring on several of the blessings; and the same (words) spoken harshly, O king, generate evils.

78. A forest, pierced by arrows or cut down by scythes, grows again; but the heart pierced with words, harsh and rude, never recovers.

79. Arrows and darts can be extracted from the body; but the darts of words cannot be extracted from the depth of the heart.

80. Arrows of words are shot from the mouth, wounded by which one grieves night and day; for they touch the innermost recesses of the hearts of others? Therefore a wise man should not fling them on others.

81. That man, to whom defeat has been sent by the gods, has his senses lost; and, therefore, he does stoop to mean acts.

82. On the intellect becoming dim, and on the approach of ruin, wrong, in the disguise of right, does not remove from the mind.

83. The same dim intellect has now overpowered your son, O bull of the Bharata race; you do not clearly see it owing to your enmity against the Pandavas.

84. A king with auspicious marks, and the ruler of the three worlds,—Yudhishthira waits on thy commands, O Dhritarastra; let him be the ruler of the earth.

85—86. Endued with good qualities, he is, to the exclusion of all your sons, the foremost among your heirs; he is endued with energy and wisdom and versed both in the codes of morality and earthly good. Out of kindness and simplicity that chief among virtuous men has patiently borne many a trouble in order to uphold your story.

Thus ends the thirty-fourth chapter, the principles of morality explained by Vidura, in the Prajagara of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXXV.

(PRAJAGARA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. O you of great wisdom, repeat these sayings, that are consistent with morality and worldly benefit. What you say is most interesting; my desire for hearing them has not been satisfied.

Vidura said :—

2. Bathing in all the holy places and kindness to all beings—both these are equal. Perhaps kindness is better.

3. O Lord, always show kindness to your sons; and thus you will attain to heaven after having gained great fame in this world.

4. As long as a man's deeds are spoken of in this world, so long, O foremost among men, he is glorious in heaven.

5. As an instance of this is cited the old story about the conversation between Virochana and Sudhanwan, suitors of Keshini's hand.

6. A maiden named Keshini, of peerless beauty, O king, with the desire of a good husband, resolved to choose one in a Sway-amvara.

7. Then Virochana, a son of Diti, came there with the desire of winning her. Then did Keshini address that chief among the Daitays thus :

Keshini said :—

8. Are the Brahmanas superior, or are the sons of Diti superior, O Virochana? Why should not Sudhanwan sit on the sofa?

Virochana said :—

9. We, the descendants of Prajapati, O Keshini, are the best among creatures. This world is ours. Who are the gods, and who are the twice-born persons?

Keshini said :—

10. Even in this very pavilion shall we wait, O Virochana. Sudhanwan will come in the morning to-morrow; I shall see both of you together.

Virochana said :—

11. O gentle maiden, I shall do as you say, O timid one; you will see in the morning myself and Sudhanwan together.

Vidura said :—

12. The night had passed away and the solar disc had appeared, there came to that country, O best of kings, Sudhanwan, where, O Lord, Virochana was staying with Keshini.

13. Sudhanwan came to the son of Prahada and Keshini; the latter, O best among the race of Bharata, having observed the approach of a Brahmana, rose up; and gave him water to wash his feet, and the Arghya (mark of respect).

Sudhanwan said :—

14. (When asked by Virochana to sit on the sofa he occupied) O son of Prahada, how can I touch that excellent gold seat occupied by you? I shall then come down to the same level with yourself. I shall not sit with you.

Virochana said :—

15. You are fit for (sitting on) a plank, a skin, or a mat. O Sudhanwan, you are not fit for a seat equal to mine.

Sudhanwan said :—

16. Father and son, two Brahmanas, two Kshatriyas, two old men, and two Sudras can sit together. Excepting these, no others can sit together.

17. Your father used to respect me and occupy a seat lower than mine. You are a child bred in luxury at home; and do not know anything.

Virochana said :—

18. The gold, kine, horses and all other wealth that we Asuras have—staking all these, O Sudhanwan, let us ask this question to them that know.

Sudhanwan said :—

19. O Virochana, let alone your gold, kine and horses. Let us stake our very lives, and ask them the question that are able to answer.

Virochana said :—

20. Where shall we go after staking our lives. I shall not stand before any of the gods and never before any among men.

Sudhanwan said :—

21. We shall go to your father after staking our lives. Prahada will not tell a lie even for the sake of his son.

Vidura said :—

22. In this way having laid wagers, Virochana and Sudhanwan, enraged at each other, then went to the place where Prahada was staying.

Prahada said :—

23. These two now appear, who have never before been together, like two enraged serpents coming by the same road.

24. Is it that friendship has now been established between you, among whom these was no friendship before? O Virochana, I ask you why this friendship with Sudhanwan.

Virochana said :—

25. There is no friendship between myself and Sudhanwan. (the Truth is that) we have wagered our lives. O sire, I shall ask you a question; do not answer it untruly.

Prahada said :—

26. Let water, honey, and curds be brought for Sudhanwan. O Brahmana, you ought to be respected by me. A white and healthy cow is ready for you.

Sudhanwan said :—

27. Water, honey, and curds have been presented to me on the way. O Prahada, I ask you a question; answer truly what I ask you. Are the Brahmanas superior or is Virochana superior?

Prahada said :—

28. I have got only one son; and you ere a Brahmana present here in person. How can one, situated as I am, answer the question, which is a matter of dispute between yourselves.

Sudhanwan said :—

29. Keep your cow and whatever wealth you hold dear for yourself ; but, O wise man, you should speak the truth in a matter, on which we two are disputing.

Prahrada said :—

30. Who does not answer, truly or falsely ; I ask you, Sudhanwan, where does that wrong user of his tongue live ?

Sudhanwan said :—

31. One who makes a wrong use of his tongue lives passing his nights like a woman having her husband sleeping in the arms of a co-wife or like one who has been defeated at a game at dice or like one whose body is burning with troubles.

32. The man, who in giving evidence tells lies, stays starving at the outer gates, shut out from the city ; and he always sees his enemies.

33. A lie for the sake of an animal means the degradation from heaven of five of one's ancestors ; one for the sake of a cow means the downfall of ten ; one for the sake of a horse means the downfall of a hundred ; while one for the sake of a man means the casting away of a thousand.

34. A lie for the sake of gold means the destruction of one's race born and unborn ; and one for the sake of land means the ruin of everything. Therefore do not tell lies for the sake of land.

Prahrada said :—

35. Superior to me is Angirasa ; and superior to you is Sudhanwan, O Virochana. His mother, too, is superior to (your) mother. Therefore you have been vanquished by him.

36. O Virochana, this Sudhanwan is now the lord of your life. O Sudhanwan, I desire it (the life) to be restored by you to Virochana.

Sudhanwan said :—

37. Since you have chosen virtue and have not I spoken an untruth from temptation ; therefore I give back your dear son his life, O Prahrada.

38. This son of thine, Virochana, who is given to you by me, O Prahrada, should wash my feet before the maiden.

Vidura said :—

39. Therefore, O chief among kings, you should not speak an untruth for the sake of land. Do not ruin yourself with your sons and ministers by refraining from speaking the truth.

40. The gods do not look after men with club in hands, like the herdsmen. To those they want to protect, they give intelligence.

41. In proportion as a man is inclined towards virtue, his wishes meet with success—there is no doubt about it.

42. The Vedas do not rescue one who is deceitful and lives by deceit from sins. Indeed, the Vedas, when the end approaches, forsake him, as the full-fledge birds forsake their nests.

43. Drinking quarrels, enmity with many, separating husband from wife (by sowing dissensions), family quarrels, disloyalty to the king, causing quarrels between husbands and wife ought, it is said, to be avoided, as well as the sinful ways of life.

44. A palmist, a merchant who has formerly been a thief, a cunning Fowler, a medical man, an enemy, a friend, and one who is of bad habits—these seven should not be cited as witnesses.

45. An Agnihotra ceremony performed out of vanity, silence, study out of vanity and pride based upon haughtiness,—these four though not fearful of themselves, become fearful when performed unduly.

46—48. An incendiary, one who imprisons other persons, a pander, a wineseller, a manufacturer of arrows, an astrologer, one who injures friends, one who violates other's wives, one who causes miscarriage, one who violates the wife of his elders and superiors, a twice-born who drinks wine, one who uses excessively harsh words, one who opens up old hostilities, an atheist, one who speaks ill of the Vedas, one addicted to taking bribes, one whose holy-thread ceremony has not been performed even though the time has come, one who secretly poisons cattle, and one who injures a person who says "protect me"—all these are on the same level with those who slay Brahmanas.

49. Gold is known by fire, one of good birth by his behaviour, an honest man by his conduct, a hero in times of panic, a patient man during the time of poverty, and friends and enemies during the seasons of difficulties and dangers.

50. Old age destroys beauty ; patience hope, death, life ; envy, virtue ; passion, prosperity; association with the vulgar, good manners; lust, modesty; and vanity, everything.

51. Prosperity has for its source good deeds; it increases owing to activity, and takes root owing to skill, and continues its existence owing to self-control.

52. Eight qualities glorify a man, viz., wisdom, good birth, self-restraint, learning, strength, littleness of speech, gift to the best of his power and gratitude.

53. But, O dear, one thing alone can make all these great qualities come together. When a king honours a man, all the qualities shed lustre on him.

54. These eight, O king, in this world of human beings, are considered as the marks of heaven. Of these, four are the attributes of the good; and the honest men follow the other four.

55. Sacrificial ceremonies, gifts, study, and devotion,—these four are followed by the good. Self-control, truth, kindness, and humanity—these four are also the attributes of the good.

56. Sacrificial ceremonies, study, gift, devotion, truth, forgiveness, mercy, and contentment—these are the eight ways to virtue, according to the Smṛiti.

57. The first four of these may be followed from motives of vanity; but the last four do not exist in those that are not great.

58. That one is not an assembly where there are no old men. Those are not old men who do not speak of virtue. That is not virtue where truth does not exist; and that is not truth where deceit pervades.

59. Truth, beauty, learning, knowledge, good birth, good manners, strength, wealth, heroism, and ability to talk on diverse topics,—these ten have their origin in heaven.

60. A man, who is notoriously sinful by doing sinful acts, gets evil fruits; and one, who is reputed to be virtuous by doing virtuous acts, gains great happiness.

61. There should a man firmly resolve not to do sinful acts. The sinful acts being committed again and again destroy wisdom.

62. The man who has lost his wisdom constantly commits sin. The virtuous acts being done again and again increase wisdom.

63. An old man and wise always does virtuous acts. By doing virtuous acts he gains a good reputation and goes to a holy place (hereafter). Therefore should a man intently practise virtue.

64. A man that is envious, one that gravely injures another, one who is cruel, one who is always making enemies of others, and one who is deceitful by committing sins, soon meets with grave difficulties.

65. He that is not envious, and he who is wise by always doing graceful acts, never meets with any grave difficulties; and shines with lustre everywhere.

66. He that assimilates the wisdom of the wise is himself wise; and he who is wise by doing acts, both virtuous and conducive to worldly benefits, succeeds in gaining happiness.

67. That act should be done by one during the day, which will enable him to live in comfort during the night; and that should be done in eight months which will enable one to live in comfort throughout the year.

68. That act should be done during the early years of life, which will enable one to live in comfort during the old age. That act should be done in this life which will enable one to live in happiness after death.

69. People speak well of that food which has been digested. They speak well of the wife whose youth has passed away, and of that hero who has come off victorious in the battle, and of that ascetic who has gone over to the other side (of life).

70. The hole, that one seeks to stop by wealth acquired by foul means, remains uncovered; and others come into existence in other places.

71. The preceptor is the controller of those who have their souls under restraint; the king is the controller of those who have bad souls; and Yama, the son of Vivaswata, is the controller of those who sin in secret.

72. The greatness of Rishis, of rivers, of the banks of rivers, and of the noble-minded can not be conceived, as also the wickedness of a woman.

73. One attached to the worship of the twice-born, one that makes gifts, one who behaves generously towards his cousins and the Kshatriya of good manners, rules the earth for ever.

74. These three, viz., the brave, the wise, and these who know how to protect others, pluck flowers of gold from the earth.

75. Acts performed by means of the intellect are the best; those performed by the arms come next; O Bharata, those by the thighs are bad; while those performed by carrying loads are the worst.

76. Having entrusted your kingdom to Duryodhana, Shakuni, and the fool Dushasana and Karṇa, how can you hope for prosperity?

77. The Pandavas who are possessed of every virtue, O best among the race of Bharata, depend on you as their father. Do you also depend upon them as your sons.

Thus ends the thirty-fifth chapter, the moral lessons as explained by Vidura, in the Projagara of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

(PROJAGARA PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. In this connection is quoted the old story of the conversation between the son of Atri and the Saddhyas as heard by us.

2. While the great Rishi of rigid vows was wandering as a mendicant, the deities called Saddhyas, in days of old, asked him of great wisdom.

The Saddhyas said :—

3. We are the deities called Saddhyas. O great Rishi, seeing you, we are unable to guess who you are; but it seems to us that you are possessed of self-control, and thorough acquaintance with the holy books. It is, therefore, most proper that you should discourse to us in the magnanimous words full of wisdom.

The mendicant Rishi said :—

4. O immortals, it has been heard by me that tranquility, self-control and the observance of true religion practised until all the knots of one's heart be loosened bring for the agreeable and disagreeable to the level of one's own self.

5. The man who is reviling should not be reviled; for, the pain that is felt by him who endures (the revilings) patiently consumes the reviler and draws away and assimilates the effect of his good deeds.

6. Do not revile others, nor insult them. Do not quarrel with friends, nor associate with the vulgar. Do not be vain, nor of bad manners; and avoid words that are harsh and those that proceed from passion.

7. Harsh words burn the very vitals, bones, heart and the life of men. Therefore he that has virtue for his refuge should always avoid harsh and angry words.

8. The luckless man who pierce the hearts of others by thorns of harsh words touching their vitals bears on his face the misery and death of all men.

9. A wise man pierced by sharp arrows of words from another, and blazing like the fire or the sun should, though wounded and burning with extreme pain, bear all with patience, remembering that the effects of the slanderer's good deeds become his own.

10. According as a man serves a saint, or as he is wicked, or virtuous, or a thief, so he becomes endued with the habits of his associates; even as a cloth comes to be of the same colour with the die in which it is soaked

11. The gods court the company of one who when reviled does not return nor induces others to return, and who when struck does not strike in return or make others strike, and who does not wish to injure his assailant.

12. Not to speak at all is better than speaking. Secondly, if you have to speak, tell the truth. Thirdly, if you have to speak the truth, speak what is agreeable; and fourthly, if you have to speak what is agreeable, speak what is conducive to morality.

13. A man becomes like him with whom he associates, or him whom he serves, or him like whom he seeks to be.

14. Those things one keeps himself away from; then he is freed from everything; and the slightest misery vanishes away.

15. (Such a man) does vanquish others nor is vanquished by them; he never appears as other's enemy, nor their assailant; his mind remains calm at praise or blame; and he is unmoved by praise or blame.

16. He desires prosperity for all, and does not set his heart on their adversity. He is truthful, mild, and can keep himself under control. And also he is the best of men.

17. He who does not seek to solace another by telling untruth, and who having promised performs, and who knows the weakness of others, is a man of the middling type.

18. Hard to get under control, unable to wear a soft look, owing to rage, when wounded by arms, ungrateful, and incapable of being anybody's friend—these are the signs of an inferior man in this world.

19. He, who does not appreciate benefits coming from others, and who drives away all his friends, is an inferior man.

20. He who desires prosperity for himself should serve good men, and, on suitable occasions, men of the middling type; but he should never serve people of the inferior type.

21. An unrighteous man obtains wealth by force, by incessant efforts, by intelligence and by prowess; but he does not win fame, properly so called, nor the wealth (virtues) of those born in high families.

Dhritarastra said :—

22. The gods prefer those born of high families ; and so also those who equally recognise virtue and worldly good, and those that are deeply learned. I ask you, O Vidura, this question—"Who are those born in high families?"

Vidura said :—

23. Devotion, self-control, knowledge in the Vedas, sacrificial ceremonies, marriages in proper form, and incessant gift of food—the families, in which these seven practices exist in proper forms, are considered to be high.

24. Those, who do not deviate from the right path, whose forefathers are never pained (at their wrong doings), who practise virtue with cheerfulness of heart, who desire the increase of pure fame of their families, who avoid untruths, come from high families.

25. By the non-performance of sacrifices and by the performance of impure marriages, by the leaving off of the study of the Vedas, high families become degenerated, as also by insults to the Brahmanas.

26. By speaking ill of the Brahmanas, and by insulting them, O Bharata, the high families become degenerated, as also by the misappropriation of what has been entrusted to them.

27. Families, even possessing cows, members and wealth, are not reckoned among families, who are of bad manners.

28. Families, that are not of bad manners, though possessing but little wealth, are reckoned among families ; and they win great fame.

29. Good manners should be preserved with care for wealth comes and it goes. Those who are weak in wealth, are not poor ; but those who are weak in good manners are considered to be so.

30. Families well possessed of knowledge, horses and other animals and agricultural produce are not worth regarding, if they are wanting in good manners.

31. Let none in our family be a creator of enemies ; let none be a minister to the king ; none, a thief stealing other's property ; none, an enemy of his well-wisher ; none, deceitful ; none be addicted to falsehood ; and none eat before making offerings to his ancestors, gods, or guests.

32. None in our family who kills the Brahmanas, none in our family who injures the Brahmanas, and none in our family who impedes agriculture, should associate with us.

33. A straw seat, room to sit in, water, and sweet words—these are never wanting in the house of the good.

34. These things, O king, the wise and virtuous men attached to the performance of pious acts ever keep ready for offering with reverence to their guests.

35. As the Syandana tree, though thin, O king, can still bear weights which other large trees can not ; so persons of high families can bear the load of mental anxiety, which others can not.

36. He whose anger inspires fear or he who must be waited upon with fear is not a friend ; but the friend whom one can trust as a father is a true friend. Other kinds of friendship are merely contracted in name.

37. That friend who, though not related in any way, yet acts as a friend ; and he is a true friend, a refuge and a protector.

38. The making of friends by that man is not certain, who is of an unsteady mind, or who does not serve old men, or who is not constant in his opinions, or who is of a fickle disposition.

39. Prosperity forsakes those who are of unsteady minds, those who have no souls, and those who are under the control of their senses ; even as the swan forsakes the dried up lakes.

40. To be angry all on a sudden, and to be generous without cause are the signs of unrighteous men like clouds that are inconstant.

41. The dead bodies of those, who, served and benefited by friends, show them ingratitude, are eaten up with disgust even by the birds of prey.

42. Poor or rich, one should serve his friends. Unasked to do some service, a friend can not make known the sincerity or incincerity of his heart.

43. Sorrow destroys beauty. Sorrow destroys strength. Sorrow destroys knowledge ; and sorrow brings on disease.

44. Though one's object is not gained, yet the body is consumed by grief, which makes one's enemies glad ; therefore do not give way to grief.

45. A man again and again both dies and is born ; a man again and again withers and grows ; a man again and again asks and is asked ; and a man again and again laments and is lamented for.

46. Happiness and misery, prosperity and adversity, gain and loss, death and life come to all by turn ; therefore he that is wise should not be glad nor sorry.

47. The six senses are not constant. The understanding flows out in proportion to their strength, even as water flows out of a full pot through its holes.

Dhritarastra said:—

48. The king (Yudhishthira), who resembles the flame of fire, and who has been played false by me, will put an end to the life of my wicked sons in battle.

49. Everything seems to be a source of anxiety. Hence my mind is constantly filled with anxiety. O you of great intelligence, speak to me what is calculated to remove my anxiety.

Vidura said:—

50. In nothing but knowledge and devotion, in nothing but the control of senses, in nothing else but the perfect abandonment of avarice, do I see your good.

51. Knowledge removes fear, and greatness is attained by devotion; and by serving one's elders and by application both knowledge and happiness are secured.

52. Those, desirous of attaining salvation without securing the merit obtainable by gifts, and by the study of the Vedas, roam in this world liberated from anger and jealousy.

53. At the end of a good course of study, or at the end of a battle well fought, or at the end of asceticism well performed, does happiness increase.

54. Those who are not in good terms with their blood relations get no sleep, though lying on beds well prepared; nor do they, O king, obtain pleasure from women or from the laudatory songs of professional eulogists.

55. Those who are not in good terms with their blood relations cannot practise virtue; nor can they enjoy happiness in this world; nor they can win fame; nor do they derive pleasure from peace.

56. They are not pleased with what is spoken for their benefit; they cannot get what they do not possess; nor they can retain what they have. O chief among men, there is no other end of those that are not in good terms with their blood relations save destruction.

57. Milk is possible in cows, devotion is possible in the Brahmanas; unsteadiness is possible among women; and cause of fear may be expected from blood relations.

58. Several thin threads of the same length collected together can bear the weight of the shuttle-cock constantly passing over them easily owing to their numerical strength.

59. Separated pieces of burning wood produce only smoke; but united they blaze. The same is the case, O Dhritarastra, with blood relations.

60. Those who are harsh towards the Brahmanas, women, blood relations, and cows fall, O Dhritarastra, like ripe fruits from their stalks.

61. A large tree standing by itself, though strong and firm, can in a moment be brought down with its trunk by a strong wind.

62. But those trees that grow close together firmly can bear the force of stronger winds owing to their mutual support.

63. In the same way people consider a man, who is alone though endowed with many virtues, capable of being vanquished, like a tree standing alone by the wind.

64. Owing to mutual assistance and mutual support, blood relations grow like lotus stalks in a lake.

65. The Brahmanas, cows, blood relations, infants and women must not be killed, as also those whose food we have eaten, and who have come under our protection.

66. In a man no quality can develop, O king, without wealth; but you can gain your object owing to immunity from disease. Those that are suffering from diseases are like the dead.

67. Anger is a drink which the unrighteous cannot swallow. It brings on pain in the end, which is bitter, pungent and hot. It ought to be swallowed up by the good. You, great king, swallow it and be pacified.

68. They that are affected with disease do not appreciate enjoyments; nor do they gain any pleasure from wealth. Those that are affected with disease and so filled with sorrow do not know what enjoyment, proceeding from wealth, is.

69. I told you before, O king, when I saw Draupadi won at dice—'Stop, Duryodhana; for they that are wise avoid excess at play'. You did not act accordingly.

70. That is not strength which is opposed to softness. That policy should be pursued which is fraught with virtue. The policy having crookedness at its basis is soon destroyed; but the prosperity derived from a policy, at once strong and soft, descend to one's sons and grandsons.

71. Let the sons of Dhritarastra, therefore, make friends of the sons of Pandu; and let the sons of Pandu make friends with your sons; let the Kurus and Pandus live having the same friends and foes, O king, being happy and prosperous.

72. You are now the refuge of the sons of Kuru. The race of Kuru, O Ajamida, is dependent on you. O dear, preserve your fame and protect the sons of Pritha who are mere boys, and who are afflicted with the troubles of exile.

73. O descendant of Kuru, make peace with the sons of Pandu ; let not your enemies pry into your internal relations ; they are all attached to truth. O god among men, O king among men, make Duryodhana renounce his ways.

Thus ends the thirty-sixth chapter, morality explained by Vidura, in the Prajagara of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

(PRAJAGARA PARVA)—Continued.

Vidura said :—

1. O chief among kings, Manu, the descendant of the self-created Being, has spoken of the following seventeen kinds of men as those who strike the air with fists, O son of Vichitravirya ;

2. (Or as) those who seek to bend the bow of Indra, composed of vapour, and to touch the rays of the sun, which cannot be touched.

3. (The seventeen kinds of men are)—he who seeks to control one incapable of being brought under control ; he who is satisfied with trifling gains ; he who serves his enemies ; he who controls women ; he who asks favours that ought not to be asked ; he who boasts, having done very little good ;

4. He who, well born, does improper acts ; he who though weak is always struggling with one who is powerful ; he who talks to one listening with disgust ; he who desires what ought not to be desired, O chief among men ;

5. He who being a father-in-law cracks jokes with his daughter-in-law ; he whose fears being dispelled by his daughter-in-law desires to be respected ; he who sows his own seeds in the ground of another ; and he who speaks very ill of his wife ;

6. He who having obtained a favour from another says he does not remember it ; he who having promised something makes empty boasts when asked to perform it ; he who seeks to prove the honesty of a dishonest person—the servitors of Yama drag these down to hell, with noose in hand.

7. It is a good policy to behave towards one in the same way he behaves towards another. One who behaves deceitfully should be served deceitfully ; and one who behaves honestly should be served with honesty.

8. Old age destroys beauty ; patience, hope ; death, life ; the practice of virtue ; worldly pleasures ; desire, shame ; good behaviour, companionship with the wicked ; anger, prosperity ; and pride, everything.

Dhritrashtra said :—

9. In all the Vedas, man is said to have a life of one hundred years. For what reason then do not all men attain to that age ?

Vidura said :—

10—11. Too much pride, too much of speaking, the reverse of restraint, O king, and anger, quarrel with relations, and enmity with friends—these six are like swords that cut off the period of life given to men. These kill men and not death. Good betide thy sons (after renouncing these).

12—13. He who commits adultery with those who place trust in him, and who does the same with the wife of his elder, that twice-born who becomes the husband of a Sudra woman, who is given to drinking, O Bharata, who commands the twice-born or takes away their livings, who becomes their master, and who kills him who demands his protection—these are like those who kill the Brahmanas. After coming in contact with one of these, expiation should be performed, which the Srutis declare.

14. The wise man, who is skillful in speech, knows the code of morality. He eats last (i.e. after having made due offerings to the gods and Pitris). He is not envious ; he does not injure others ; he is skillful, grateful, truthful and humble. He attains heaven.

15. Persons speaking agreeably can readily be met with, O king ; but not so the man who speaks disagreeably.

16. He, who having an eye on virtue and disregarding what is agreeable or disagreeable to his lord says what is disagreeable but beneficial, is a real help to his king.

17. A man should be sacrificed for the sake of a family ; a family should be sacrificed for the sake of a village ; a village for a kingdom ; and the whole world for the soul.

18. To ward off difficulties one should possess wealth ; by wealth one should protect his wife ; and one's own self should ever be protected by wife and wealth.

19. Gambling, from the early ages has been seen to be the cause of enmity among men ; therefore it should not be resorted to even in jests by the wise.

20. It was said by me at the time of the play, O king, that this was not proper ; but, O son of Pratipa, this speech was disagreeable to you even as medicine to a sick man, O son of Vichitravirya.

21. By the help of these sons of Dhritarastra who are like crows you desire to subdue the Pandavas who are as peacocks with variegated plumage. Forsaking the lions you are protecting the jackals. When the time comes, you will repent for it.

22. That master, O sire, who does not often get angry with his servants, that are devoted to him, and bent on furthering his interests, commands confidence from his servants, who do not forsake him in times of danger.

23. Seek not to become the possessor of another's kingdom or wealth by stopping the pay of your servants. Even the affectionate ministers, defrauded and deprived of their enjoyments, turn against their master and leave him.

24. Having first reflected on what things are to be done, and fixing allowances to suit income and expenditure, one should make suitable alliances. Alliances accomplish what is most difficult.

25. He, who after knowing the intentions of his lord, does all acts with promptitude and who though honorable and devoted to his master says what is conducive to his interests and knows his own strength, is to be regarded as his (the lord's) own self.

26. The servant, who ordered pays no attention to the order, and who enjoined uses arguments against the order through pride of wisdom, and who speaks ill of his master, should be got rid of quickly.

27. Wanting in pride, able, quick in doing things, kind, strong, incorruptible, free from disease and pleasant of speech—one with these eight qualities should, it is said, be sent as a messenger

28. A man should not, out of confidence, go to the house of an untrustworthy person in the evening. He should not hide himself in the yard of another's house at night, nor desire a woman sued by a king.

29. One should not go against the opinions of him who keeps low company and who seeks counsel from all he comes in contact with ; nor should one say " I do not believe you ; " but, he should dismiss him on some pretence.

30. A king who has too much of the sense of delicacy, a woman of loose character, the servant of a king, a son, a brother, a widow with a child, one who is employed in the army to get a living, and one who has suffered loss of wealth—these should avoid transactions of lending and borrowing.

31. Eight qualities make a man shine—viz., wisdom, high birth, learning, self-control, prowess, littleness of speech, charity to the best of his power and gratitude.

32. These eight great qualities, O sire, have their source in one only when a king favours him ; that incident brings on and keeps together all these qualities.

33. Those who bathe get these eight qualities, viz., strength, beauty, voice, ability to pronounce all the letters correctly, delicacy of touch, fineness of scent, purity, prosperity, delicacy of limbs and beautiful women.

34. The following six qualities adorn him who eats moderately, viz., immunity from disease long life, strength, happiness, the possession of children who are healthy, and freedom from accusation of gluttony.

35. One who does improper acts, one who eats excessively, one who is hated by men, one who is very deceitful, one who is cruel, one who does not know the suitability of time and place, one who dresses indecently—these six should not be allowed a shelter in one's house.

36. A miser, one who speaks with malice, one who is not learned, one inhabiting the woods, one who is cunning, one who does not respect another that is generally respected, one who is cruel, one who has the habit of making enemy of others, one who is ungrateful—these should not be asked for favours even by a man in distress.

37. One who always acts against his interests, one who always makes blunders, one who always speaks falsehood, one not firm in his devotion, one wanting in affection, and one who thinks himself able to perform all tasks—these six worst classes of men should never be served.

38. (The gaining of) an object depends on (the nature of) the objects (sought to be gained by them). These two depend on each other ; and success cannot be gained in the absence of either.

39. After begetting sons and making them independent by providing for them, and after giving away all the unmarried daughters to suitable bridegrooms, one should dwell in the wood like a Muni.

40. What conduces to the good of all creatures, and is the cause of happiness to one's self should be done for the sake of God. This is the root of success of all purposes of man.

41. Intelligence, energy, prowess, strength, promptitude and perseverance—why should one having these fear for a living?

42. Look at the disasters following a quarrel with the Pandavas, which would make the gods with Sakra sad. These are enmity with those who are like your sons, a life of continual anxiety, the destruction of fame (of the family) and joy to the enemies.

43. O thou equal to Indra, the wrath of Brima, and of yourself, and of Drona and of king Yudhishthira will consume this world like a big comet falling on the earth obliquely.

44. Your hundred sons, and Karna, and the five Pandavas can rule the whole world bounded by the seas.

45. The sons of Dhritarastra, O king, constitute the forest and in my opinion the Pandavas are the tigers. Do not cut down that forest with the tigers, and do not let the tigers be driven away from the forest and be killed.

46. There cannot be a forest without tigers; and there cannot live tigers without a forest. The forest is protected by the tigers; and the tigers are protected by the forest.

47. Evil-minded persons do not seek to know the good qualities of men; so much so they desire to know their defects.

48. One who desires the complete accomplishment of his objects should practise virtue from the beginning the gaining of an object is impossible without virtue as the obtaining of nectar is impossible except from heaven.

49. All this, whether natural or artificial, is known by him whose soul has been separated from evils and fixed on good things.

50. He, who pursues virtue, worldly good, and desire at suitable periods, gets a combination of virtue, worldly good and desire both here and elsewhere.

51. He who restrains the force arising from anger and joy is, O king, the winner of prosperity; and he who does not lose his sense in calamities also attains prosperity.

52. Men have always five sorts of strength, listen to me, O king. What is called strength of arms is said to be the worst.

53. The attainment of ministers, good betide you, is said to be the second sort of strength. The wise have declared that the obtainment of wealth is the third sort of strength.

54. What strength is acquired from one's father and grandfather, the strength of birth, the holy books declare, is the fourth sort of strength.

55. That by which all these are collected, O Bharata, the strength which is superior to all sorts of strength, is said to be the strength of intellect.

56. After provoking the hostility of a man who is capable of doing great injury to another, one should not console himself by saying "I am at a distance."

57. Women, kings, serpents, one's own lord, enemies, enjoyments, and period of life—for what wise man it is proper to put any reliance on these?

58. For one who is hit by the arrow of wisdom, neither the physicians nor medicines are of any effect. Again for such a person, the mantras of the Homa, the auspicious ceremonies, the hymns of the Atharva Veda and the antidotes of poison are of no use.

59. A serpent, the fire, a lion, and a cousin, O Bharata, are not to be disregarded by a man. All of them are really possessed of great power.

60. The energy of fire is great in this world. It lurks and hides itself in the wood and yet does not consume the wood, till it is put ablaze by others.

61. That thing (fire) when produced by friction of different pieces of wood burns by its excessive energy those woods, and the forest along with other things.

62. In the same way, those born in high families have energy like that of fire. Of a forgiving nature, they betray no symptoms of wrath and remain still like fire in the woods.

63. You, with your sons, have the property of creepers; while, in my opinion, the sons of Pandu are like the Sala trees. But creepers do not grow without the support of a large tree.

64. O king, your son is a forest. O son of Ambika, O sire, know that the Pandavas are the trees in that forest. Deserted by the lions, the forest will be destroyed; and the lions also will be destroyed without the forest.

Thus ends the thirty-seventh chapter, the principles of morality explained by Vidura, in the Pradjagara of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

(PRAJAGARA PARVA)—Continued.

Vidura said:—

1. The heart of a young man soars high, when an old man comes (to his house). He gets it back after rising up and according him a suitable welcome.

2. A wise man should give good guest a seat, bring water and have his feet washed off. And he should ask him about his welfare and speak of his own matters; then again, he should offer him food after consideration (as to what food is best suitable.)

3. He,—whose water, honey, curds, and kine, one versed in the Mantras (Brahmana) does not accept either owing to fear (on the part of the Brahmana) or to unwillingness and miserliness (on the part of the host)—lives in vain; which the wise have declared.

4. A physician, a manufacturer of arrows, one who has given up the vow of Brahmacharya before the proper time, a thief, a crooked-minded man, a drunkard Brahmana, one who kills the child in the womb, one who lives by serving in the army, and a seller of holy books are exceedingly dear as guests, though they may be unworthy of the offer of water.

5. Salt, cooked-food, curds, milk, boney, oil, clarified butter, sesame, flesh, fruits, and roots, herbs and vegetables, red cloths, all sorts of perfumery, and molasses must not be sold (by a Brahmana).

6. He who does not yield to wrath, who values equally a piece of earth with stone or gold, who is not touched by grief who is indifferent to friendship or enmity, who cares not for praise or blame, and who avoids what is agreeable and disagreeable like one who has renounced the world, is a Bhikshuka.

7. The ascetic, who lives on rice growing wild and roots and vegetables, who has his soul under control, who is ever careful if his fire (that it may not be extinguished), who living in the forest is not indifferent to his guests, is considered to be holy and the foremost of his brotherhood.

8. After doing harm to an intelligent man, one should not console himself by saying that he is at a distance. The intelligent man who has been injured has long arms to return the injury.

9. One must not trust another who should not be trusted, nor put too much trust on one worthy of trust. The calamity born of such trust cuts down even the very roots,

10. One should live without showing envy, protect his wife, divide everything properly and suitably, be of sweet speech, and be mild and sweet in his address to his wife, and yet be not her slave.

11. Worthy of worship, highly blessed, virtuous, forming the light of their homes—such are the wives, who are the visible embodiments of household felicity. It is therefore, that they should be specially protected.

12. The supervision of the inner apartments should be entrusted to one's father, (that of) the kitchen should be entrusted to his mother, (that of) the cows should be entrusted to some body considered equal to himself; but the supervision of agriculture should be attended to by himself.

13. The guests who carry on commerce should be waited on by servants; but the quests of the twice-born caste by one's sons. Out of water has arisen fire; and out of Brahma, the Kshatriya; and out of stone, iron.

14. The force of these extend to everything; but it is neutralised of what it is born. Those good people who are born in high families have always a spirit similar to fire.

15—16. Those born in high families are endued with a forgiving nature; and stay like fire in the wood without showing any outward symptoms. The king, whose intentions cannot be known by outsiders and even by his own officers, and who has his eyes everywhere, enjoys long prosperity. One should not speak of what he wants to do, nor show what he has already done.

17. Let not the intention, to do acts to be done either for virtue, worldly good or gratifying desires, be made known to others. Having ascended the top of a mountain, or the roof of a palace,

18. Or proceeding to a forest shorn of grass, one should think of his purposes. One who is not a friend, O Bharata, should not be made aware of important secrets;

19. Nor a friend who is not learned, nor a learned friend who has not his mind under control. A king should not appoint any body his own counsellor without a trial.

20—21. On the minister depend the desire for wealth (of the king) and the carrying out of his intentions. He, whose followers know all acts only after they are done or acts done for the sake of virtue, worldly good, or gratification of desire, is the chief among kings, O king. The success of that king, whose intentions are not known is undoubted.

22. He who does uncommendable acts out of ignorance loses even his life, owing to the unexpected consequences of his acts.

23. The doing of acts that are commendable leads to happiness ; the omission to do these acts causes injury afterwards, which is my opinion.

24. As a Brahmana, without studying the Vedas, is unfit to officiate at a Sraddha, so one who has not heard of the six means (for protecting a kingdom) is not fit to hear of the purposes (of a king).

25. One, who knows about the increase, decrease, and surplus of revenue in the kingdom, who knows the six means and himself, one whose conduct is never spoken ill of, has the world under his subjection.

26. He, whose wrath and joy are un-failing (to produce some results), who himself supervises over what is to be done, who has his treasury under his own control, has the world under his subjection.

27. The lord of the earth should be satisfied with the name he earns and the umbrella (held over his head as a sign of royalty), and should divide the wealth among his servants and not be the sole possessor of everything.

28. A Brahmana knows a Brahmana in the same way as the husband knows the wife. A king knows his minister ; and a monarch knows a monarch.

29. An enemy who deserves death should not be set at liberty when under control. When one is weak, an enemy should be flattered though deserving of death ; but he should be killed on the acquirement of strength. When not killed, dangers arise from him soon.

30. The resentment against the gods, the king, the Brahmanas should ever be suppressed with an effort ; as also that against old men, children and helpless persons.

31. A wise man should avoid unprofitable quarrels, to which fools alone are parties. By this one gains fame in this world, and avoids misery.

32. Him whose favour is without consequence and whose wrath does no harm the people do not desire to have for a lord ; even as women do not want to have an impotent man to be their husband.

33. Intelligence is not for the acquirement of wealth ; and laziness is not the cause of adversity. The wise man knows the history of the different conditions of man ; but others do not.

34. Fools have ever made light of those who are learned, old in age, old in intelligence, superior in wealth and in birth, O Bharata.

35. Misery soon comes on him who leads a vicious life, who is wanting in wisdom, who is envious and sinful, and who is wicked in speech and given to anger.

36. Absence of deceitfulness, gift, observance of the respect due to others, subjugate all creature ; so does well conducted speech.

37. He, who has no deceit in him, who is skillful, grateful, intelligent and simple-minded, gets friends even if his treasury has been drained off.

28. Wisdom, calmness of mind, self-control, holiness, the reverse of harshness in speech and the intention never to injure one's friends—these seven are to prosperity, even as fuel to the fire.

39. Who does not give to others their dues, who is of a vicious soul and ungrateful, and who has no sense of shame—such a wretch should, O king, be avoided in this world.

40. He cannot sleep at night in peace, like one having a serpent in the room ; who, being a guilty person himself, provokes other people against one who is innocent.

41. Persons, who when tainted with a vice are capable of injuring others by depriving them of their possessions and removing the means of their livelihood, should ever be propitiated like the gods with promptitude.

42. Those objects which depend for their obtainment on women, men whose mind has been distracted, men who have fallen from their original state of purity, and those that depend on the vicious, are all doubtful of fulfilment.

43. Where a woman, or where a child, or where a wicked man is the guide, there, O king, persons (who make them guides) are as helpless as a stone in a river, which sinks.

44. Those that are capable of grasping the general principle of things, though they may be ignorant of details, are learned men. This is my opinion, O Bharata ; for details are small matters.

45. The man, whom deceitful persons praise, whom spies praise, and whom immoral women praise, does not live (long).

46. Having abandoned those mighty bowmen, the Pandavas of unlimited prowess, you have, O Bharata, entrusted a great lordship on Duryodhana.

47. You shall soon see him fallen from that lordship, even as foolish Vali, who was proud of his power fallen from the three worlds.

Thus ends the thirty-eighth chapter, the principles of morality as explained by Vidura, in the Prajagara of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

(PRAJAGARA PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Man is not the creator of his happiness or misery like a wooden doll moved by a thread. He has been made subject to the Fates by Providence. Therefore speak on ; I am patiently hearing you.

Vidura said :—

2. Even Vrihaspati by speaking when suitable time has not come gets a charge of ignorance and insult, O Bharata.

3. By gift (a man) becomes agreeable ; another by sweet speech ; a third by the strength of incantations and drugs ; but he that is (naturally) agreeable is (always) agreeable.

4. He that is despised is not honest, nor intelligent, nor wise (to the man who despises him). To him that is beloved are attributed all good acts and to him that is despised all bad ones.

5. I told you, as soon as he was born. O king, abandon this one son, Duryodhana. By his abandonment (you will see) the proper development of your hundred sons ; and by not abandoning him, there will be the destruction of your hundred sons.

6. That gain should not be highly thought of, which brings on a little loss ; and that loss should be considered a great one, which brings on a little gain.

7. That, O great king, is not loss which brings on gain ; but that should be regarded as loss which being gained causes much loss.

8. Some become eminent through their good qualities ; others through their wealth. Avoid, O Dhritarastra, those who are superior in wealth, but devoid of good qualities.

Dhritarastra said :—

9. All that you say is agreed on by the wise, and is calculated to do good to me ; but I can not abandon my son. Victory comes where there is righteousness.

Vidura said :—

10. He that is exceedingly good, and is endued with humility does not neglect even the slightest suffering of any creature (without an attempt at alleviating them).

11. Those that are ever engaged in speaking ill of others ever engage themselves in quarrels which give pain to others with great care.

12. Those whose very sight is vicious and association with whom is attended with great fear—there is great harm in giving them wealth, and also there is great fear in accepting wealth from them.

13. Those whose habit is to cause disagreements, those who are covetous, shameless, and vicious are well known as unrighteous. The association with them should be avoided.

14. Those men who are endued with similar other great vices should be avoided. In the absence of (the cause of) friendship, the good feeling towards the low is destroyed ;

15. As also the results of connection, and the happiness derived from it. They (the low-minded) then try to speak ill (of their late friend) and injure him.

16. Even when slightly injured, they out of the want of self-control get no peace of mind. Companionship of one's self with such low-minded and heartless individuals should not be effected.

17—18. A wise man examining carefully by his intelligence avoids from a distance (such persons). He who assists the poor and helpless cousins obtains an increase of children and animals and unending prosperity. Cousins should be assisted by those who desire their own happiness.

19. Therefore do you that, O chief among kings, which will effect an increase of thy family ; by doing good to your relatives, O monarch, you will meet with prosperity.

20. Cousins, though devoid of good qualities, should be protected, O foremost of the Bharata race. Should they not be protected, who are endued with good qualities, and desirous of your favours ?

21. Do you favour the heroic Pandavas, O Lord of the universe. Give them some few villages for their living, O Lord.

22. By doing this, you will obtain fame in this world, O ruler of men. O sire, your sons should be controlled by you who are old.

23. What I speak is for your good ; know me to be your well-wisher ; a man who desires happiness should not quarrel with the cousins. Happiness should be injured along with one's cousins, O best of the Bharata race.

24. To eat together, to talk together, and to love one another—these are what should be done among cousins—and quarrels—never.

25. In this world cousins come to the rescue, and cousins sink (cousins); those who lead virtuous lives are rescued and those that lead vicious lives sink.

26. O chief among kings, you act like one leading virtuous life, towards the Pandavas. O you giver of honours, surrounded by them you will be unconquerable by your enemies.

27. If, having come face to face with a cousin who is prosperous, one shrinks like a deer in the presence of a man armed with arrows; then the cousin gets transferred on his own shoulders the sins of his less prosperous cousin.

28. Afterwards, O chief among men, you will have repentance at hearing of the death of the Pandavas or of your sons. Think of this.

29. That act which is sure to be repented for when a man enters the Vale of Death should never be done from the very beginning in this life.

30. It is not true that any other man except Bhargava has done a sinful act but a conception of the probable effects of an action is present in the mind of every intelligent person.

31. If this wrong has been done towards them by Duryodhana in the first instance, it is your duty, being the foremost of his race, to undo it.

32. You, having reinstated them in their position, will be freed from all your sins in this world, and, O chief among men, you will be worshipped by all intelligent men.

33. He, who engages in acts after thinking of their effects as prophesied by wise men for the good of mankind, ever remains famous.

34. The lessons taught even by skillful men is not perfect; for the moral sought to be conveyed by them is not understood, and, if understood, is not carried into practice.

35. That wise man, who does not do acts which result in sin, grows (in prosperity); but the man of slow intelligence who continues in his sinful course commenced before,

36. Falls into a deep mire which he can not cross. A wise man should have an eye on the following six means of secrets being divulged.

37—39. He who desires wealth and children should ever keep himself away from these: vanity, dream, knowledge that spies have been set on, one's demeanour which depends on his thoughts, excessive trust on wicked ministers and incompetent ambassadors. He who being fully aware of these six doors (through which secrets ooze out), O king, keeps them always closed and engages in the attainment of the three kinds of objects (virtue, worldly good and desire), triumph over his enemies. Without a knowledge of the holy books, and without proper reverence to old people,

40. Virtue and profit cannot be known even by one equal (intelligent) to Vrihaspati; A thing is lost when it falls into the ocean. So an advice is lost when it is not listened to.

41. The holy books are lost on those who have no souls of their own (have no control over them); and an offering of clarified butter is lost when poured on what is not fire (i. e. when the fire has been extinguished and ashes only remain). Having examined by his intelligence, and searched by his understanding,

42. And having heard the opinions of other men seen and known the life of the man, a wise man forms friendship with wise men. Humility removes bad repute, and prowess puts an end to adversity.

43. Forgiveness ever destroys anger; good behaviour neutralises the effects of evil omens in the appearance of a man. By means of one's dress, sphere of action, house, behaviour,

44. Should a man's lineage be judged about, O king, and also by his food and dress. There is no struggling with a desire when it comes on.

45. Even in men who have attained salvation—not to speak of those who are slaves to their desires. One who worships the wise is learned, virtuous and of a mild look,

46. And, has friends, is one, who of agreeable speech, has a good heart, should be protected. He, who whether comes of a high or a low family, does not transgress the honour due to others,

47. Who leans to virtue, who is graced with humility, who has a sense of modesty, is better than a hundred men coming of high families. When the heart of one agrees with that of another, then the secret pursuits of the former are the same as those of the latter.

48. And the learning of the former is the same as that of the latter, the friendship between the two persons never wears out. One who has a wicked soul, one whose understanding has not been cultivated,

49. Should be shunned by an intelligent man like a well covered over with grass growing over it; friendship with them does not last. With those that are proud, ignorant, fierce and rash

50. Wise men should never contract friendship, nor with them who have fallen from the path of virtue. The man who is grateful, virtuous, truthful, the reverse of mean, has firm devotion,

51. And has his senses under control, and attaches himself to what ought to be attached to should be desired for a friend. The renouncement of the objects of the senses is worse than death difficult of practices.

52. On the other hand, leaving them to be too much exercised would ruin the gods even; humility, kindness to all creatures, forgiveness and patience

53. Conduce to life, the wise men have said; as also a constant respect for friends. He who desires again to accomplish, by virtuous means, an object that has once been frustrated,

54. And is in his right senses,—the determination of that man is firm. The man who knows what remedy ought to be applied in future, who has a firm determination on present matters,

55. And who knows (in the beginning) how acts done in the past would end, accomplishes all his objects. That which a man follows in deed, thought, or speech,

56. Draws him away to itself; therefore a virtuous policy should be followed. Efforts for the attainment of one's holy objects, knowledge of the holy books, energy, simple-mindedness,—

57. These bring on prosperity; so do constant meetings with the good. Perseverance is the root of prosperity, and of gain and of happiness.

58. That man who pursues his object with perseverance, and who is not annoyed at the long time a thing takes to accomplish, that man is really great and gets unending happiness. It is my opinion that there is no better means of bringing on prosperity,

59. Than for a really strong man to exercise forgiveness at all times and at all places. The weak should forgive every body and the strong should forgive for the sake of virtue;

60. He to whom the attainment and the non-attainment of an object is the same is ever forgiving.

61. That happiness which when pursued does not injure the virtue or the worldly profit of a man should be enjoyed one so may desire but he should not act like a fool (by giving himself up entirely to enjoyment).

62. In those that are overpowered by grief, in those that are too much attached to anything, in those that deny the existence of God, and in those that are lazy, prosperity does not reside nor in those who have no control over their souls, and who are devoid of all enthusiasm.

63. Persons of bad intelligence oppress people endued with humility and modesty by reason of that humility, thinking them to be weak.

64. To those who are honest in the extreme, who give away in large measures, who are too heroic, who are of too firm determination, and who are vain of their wisdom, prosperity never comes out of fear.

65. Nor (does prosperity reside) in persons endued with every virtue, nor in those having none; she (prosperity) does not desire a strong combination of good qualities.

66. Prosperity resides in some one (without any fixed rule) like a mad cow. The result of (the study of) the Vedas is the performance of the Homa; the result of a knowledge of the holy books is good manners and good conduct.

67. The fruits of a woman are the pleasures of co-habitation and offspring; and the consequences of wealth are the pleasure of gift and enjoyment. He who performs ceremonies for his good in the other world with wealth got by foul means

68. Does not get the usual fruits of such ceremonies after death owing to the foul means by which the wealth was got. In deserts, forests and fortresses, in difficulties and calamities

69. Or when weapons are raised (by others to strike him) he who has a strong mind has no fear. Energy, self-control, skillfulness, steadiness, patience,

70. And the act of beginning a thing after mature thought—know these to be the roots of prosperity. Devotion is the strength of asceticism; the Vedas are the strength of those that know what is in them.

71. Injury is the strength of those that are vicious; forgiveness is the strength of those that are endued with good qualities. These eight do not lead to the non-observance of a vow—water, roots, fruits, milk,

72. Clarified butter, acts done at the desire of a Brahmana, or the commands of an elder, and medicine. That should not be done to others which is against the interests of one's self.

73. This is virtue, put tersely ; there are other sorts of virtue, but it is not compulsory that they (the better) should be acted up to. Anger should be subjugated by the reverse of anger ; and virtuous man should be subjugated by virtue.

74. By gifts should a miser be subjugated, by truth one addicted to untruth should be won. A woman, a cunning and deceitful person, one that is lazy, one that is fierce, one that is wrathful, one that is vain of his own power,

75. A thief, one that is ungrateful should never be trusted ; nor should an atheist. He who has the habit of doing due honours to his elders, and who always attends to the wishes of old persons,

76. Gets an increase of these four, viz.—good name, life, fame and strength. The prosperity which can be attained by excessive toil, or by the non-observance of the principles of honesty,

77. Or by bowing to an enemy—do not set your heart on these. One who is ignorant ought to be pitied ; and intercourse that does not produce offspring ought to be pitied.

78. The subjects of a king who go without food are to be pitied ; and anarchy in a kingdom ought to be regretted. The roads are the sources of pain and weakness to those beings who have bodies ; and water is the source of pain and weakness to the mountains.

79. Non-enjoyment is the source of pain to women ; and harshness in speech is the source of pain to the mind. Not taking the name even, is the worst thing for the Vedas ; not observing religious observances, the worst act of the Brahmanas ;

80. The Valhikas (a race of people, morally dead) are the worst inhabitants of the globe. Falsehood is the worst thing in a man. Curiosity is the worst thing in a chaste woman ; and exile from home is the worst thing for all women.

81. The worst part of gold is silver ; tin is the worst part of silver ; lead should be known as the worst part of tin ; and dust is the worst part of lead.

82. The inclination to sleep can not be got over by lying down ; women cannot be won by desire ; fire can not be put out by fuel ; and wine can not be conquered by drinking.

83. He, whose friends have been won by gifts, whose enemies vanquished in battle, whose wife won over by food and drink, has his life crowned with success.

84. Life is real to those who have thousands (of anything or every thing) ; life is also real to those (in a small measure) who have hundreds. O Dhritarashtra, renounce this (excessive) desire ; there is none who cannot live by some means or other.

85. All the gains, gold, animals, and women that are in this world are not sufficient even for one man. Seeing all this a wise man does not grieve (for possession of everything).

86. O king, again do I ask you to behave equally well with all your sons ; let there be equality between your own sons and the sons of Pandu.

Thus ends the thirty-ninth chapter, the speech of Vidura, in the Prajagara of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XL.

(PRAJAGARA PARVA)—continued.

Vidura said :—

1. The good man who, respected by the virtuous, is engaged in the attainment of his objects without going beyond his limits, soon gains fame, for good beings when gratified with a good man give him happiness.

2. He who forsakes, without any inducement, a grand object which is fraught with unrighteousness, lies in happiness free from misery like a snake casting off the worn out slough.

3. A victory gained by untruth, a deceit that reaches (in its injurious effects) a king, and the expression of false intentions before an elder are each equal to (the sin of) slaying a Brahmana.

4. A monopoly of jealousy, death, and vanity conduce to the destruction of prosperity. The want of proper attention to the elder, haste and boastfulness are the three enemies of knowledge.

5. Laziness, inattention and confusion of the brains, unsteadiness, clubbing together, haughtiness, variety and covetousness.

6. These seven are ever the defects in those that are striving for knowledge, is my opinion ; where is knowledge in those that care for pleasures and there is pleasure for those that care for knowledge. Knowledge should renounce pleasure.

7. One who cares for pleasures should renounce knowledge ; and one that cares for knowledge should renounce pleasures. Fire is never satiated with fuels ; the great ocean, with rivers ; death, with all the creatures ; and a pretty woman, with men.

8. Hope kills patience ; death kills development ; anger kills prosperity ; miserliness kills fame ; want of proper tending kills animals ; and, O king, one single wrathful Brahmana destroys a kingdom.

9. Goats, white metal, silver, honey, that which draws away (poison), birds, Brahmanas having a knowledge of the holy books, old cousins, persons of good birth but poor—let these ever stay in thy house.

10. Goat, bull, sandal, flute, mirror, honey, clarified butter, iron, copper utensil, conchshells, pieces of stone (images of Vishnu) with gold within and Rochana (a pigment prepared from the urine and dung of cow)

11. Are always to be kept in a blessed house—Manu has said—for the proper worship of the gods, the Brahmanas, and guests, O Bharata.

12. I now speak of another sacred lesson, O sire, superior in sacredness to all these—fraught with a large meaning. Virtue should not be forsaken out of desire, fear, temptation, nor for the sake of life itself.

13. Virtue is stable ; happiness and misery are unstable ; life is stable but its ever recurring phases unstable ; forsaking the unstable ; keep yourself attached to the stable and be satisfied, for satisfaction is superior to all other acquirements.

14. Behold rulers of men endued with great strength, and great lustre. After having ruled the land abounding in wealth and corn, they have forsaken their kingdoms and great sources of enjoyments and have been subject to the God of death.

15. Men after having taken away a dead son tended with greatest care, O king, set out from their own houses ; and with the hair hanging loose they mourn for him piteously and then throw him into the funeral pyre like a piece of wood.

16. The corn and wealth of the dead are enjoyed by others ; and the elements of the body are eaten up by fire and birds. Surrounded by these two only, viz., virtue and sin, does a man go to the other world.

17. After leaving behind the body, do the cousins, friends and sons return as birds do trees devoid of blossoms and fruits.

18. Deeds done by his own self follow a man thrown into the funeral pyre ; therefore should a man carefully and in slow degrees pick up the fruits of virtue.

19. Elsewhere, above this world and also below, there is the greatest darkness. In these regions, know, O king, that the senses are totally stupified ; may such places be not thine.

20. After listening to these words of mine, if you can follow them in their entirety, you will get great fame in this world of living beings and you will never meet with fear here in this world or elsewhere.

21. The soul is as the river, O Bharata, having several holy spots ; truth is as its waters ; self-control, its banks ; and kindness, its waves ; the man of virtuous acts purifies himself by a bath therein ; the soul is pure and the absence of desire is a virtue.

22. Making a boat of your self-control in the river (of life which has the five senses for its water and desire and anger its monsters, cross over (i. e. get rid of) the waves of repeated births.

23. He who after doing due honours to such of his friends as are old in wisdom, old in virtue, old in knowledge and old in age asks them regarding what ought to be done and what ought not to be done is seldom deceived.

24. By patience should lust and greediness be restrained ; by the ages should the hands and feet be controlled, the eyes and ears by the mind ; and the mind and speech by one's actions.

25. The Brahmana, ever attached to the performance of his ablutions, ever having the holy thread on his body, ever studying (the Vedas), who avoids food touched or offered by a person who has lost his caste, who always speaks the truth, and fulfills his duties towards his elders, never falls down from the region of Brahma.

26. After having studied the Vedas, poured offerings on fire, performed sacrificial ceremonies, protected subjects, made his inner self blessed by drawing his weapons for the protection of cows and Brahmanas, and being killed in battle, a Kshatriya goes to heaven.

27. A Sudra, after worshipping in due order Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaishyas ; and a Vaishya, having completed his study and distributed his wealth among Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and among his dependants and after having smelt the sacred smokes purified by the three sorts of fire, enjoy heavenly bliss after death.

28. These having been satisfied, they become devoid of sins by burning them and casting off their body enjoy heavenly bliss.

29. Such are the duties of the four orders told to you. Listen to the reason of my describing them. The son of Pandu (Yudhisthira) is falling from the duties of a Kshatriya; O king, you place him in a position to discharge the duties of a king.

Dhritarastra said:—

30. It is even as you have been instructing me constantly; my inclination, too, turns towards peace, of which you speak to me.

31. My inclination though made to turn towards the Pandavas constantly turns away in a contrary direction by coming in contact with Duryodhana.

32. Destiny cannot be transgressed by any created beings. I consider that destiny alone is certain; human exertion is vain.

Thus ends the fortieth chapter, morality as taught by Vidura, in the Prajagara of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XLI.

(SANAT-SUJAT PARVA)—

Dhritarastra said:—

1. If there is anything you have left unsaid, O Vidura, speak to me who am listening to you. You are speaking of interesting things.

Vidura said:—

2. O Dhritarastra, the ancient and eternal Rishi Sanat-Sujata, who lived a life of perpetual celibacy, said that there was no death, O Bharata.

3. That chief among intelligent beings will speak to you, O great king, on the subjects thought of by you, whether you have made them known or kept them locked up in your heart.

Dhritarastra said:—

4. Do you not know what that eternal being will say to me? You, O Vidura, speak (about these things) if your mind has that limit of wisdom.

Vidura said:—

5. I am born among the Sudra class; for that reason, I do not dare say anything more (than what I have already said); the knowledge of that celebrate being, however, is considered by me as eternal.

6. He, born in the Brahmaṇa class, even when speaking of highly mysterious affairs, will not incur the blame of the gods; therefore I am speaking thus to you.

Dhritarastra said:—

7. Tell me, O Vidura, how I can with this body of mine meet with that ancient and eternal being in this world.

Vaishampayana said:—

8. Then did Vidura think of that Rishi of rigid austerities; he, too, becoming aware of that thought showed himself then, O Bharata.

9. Vidura, too, received him by the rites prescribed by custom; and Vidura addressed him when he (the latter) was seated at his ease and taking rest.

10. O Lord, there is certainly a doubt in the mind of Dhritarastra, which can not be removed by me; therefore it is fitting that you should speak to him (and remove the doubt).

11—12. Hearing which (your speech) this chief among men will be past all misery; so that gain and the reverse of gain, what is agreeable and disagreeable, old age and death, fear and jealousy, hunger and thirst, pride and prosperity, disinclination for women, sleep, desire, anger, loss and gain may be borne by him (with ease).

Thus ends the forty-first chapter, the parley between Vidura and Dhritarastra in the Sanat-Sujata of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XLII.

(SANAT-SUJATA PARVA)—continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then the high-souled and wise king Dhritarastra, after having supported the speech made by Vidura, questioned Sanat-Sujata in private, desirous of obtaining the highest knowledge.

Dhritarastra said:—

2. O Sanat-Sujata, I hear that in your opinion, death does not exist. The gods and the Asura however practised austere asceticism for the sake of immortality, Which of these is true?

Sanat-Sujata said:—

3. You have asked how death is avoided by certain actions and how it does not exist at all. Listen to me, discoursing on this ; and do not be moved by doubts for this (inconsistency).

4. Both of these (statements) are true ; know what is the great death in the opinion of the wise. Ignorance is death. In the same way, I say that there is no death where there is no ignorance.

5. From ignorance do the Asuras become subject (to death) ; and from the reverse of ignorance do they attain to the conditions of Brahma. Death does not destroy animals like a tiger ; its shape cannot be known.

6. Current opinion is that Yama is one sort of Death ; the wearing out of the soul is said to be another sort ; the pursuit of Brahma or self-knowledge is immortality. The god (Yama) rules the region of the Pitris, conferring blessings on the honest and curses on the dishonest.

7. At his command there is death in the form of Anger, Ignorance, and Covetousness among men ; out of vanity they follow unrighteous paths ; and none of them attains self-knowledge.

8. They stripped of intellect and being subject to vanity and being dead in this world fall into hell repeatedly and to hell they go accompanied by their senses. This sort of death also is known by the name of "death".

9. Those, however, who have faith in the fruits of actions, when the time for the fruits comes, go to heaven, without meeting with Death (i. e. they simply transfer their souls elsewhere. Creatures having bodies, however), owing to their incapacity to understand Brahma, and owing to their being wedded to earthly enjoyments have to come to this world again and again, in all directions (i. e. sometimes they are born in the same position as before, at other times they are born higher or lower according to the effects of their work).

10. Man has a natural inclination towards objects that are unreal ; and this inclination causes the senses to be led into very grave errors. The inner soul, directed towards objects that are unreal, and remembering only the objects in which it was employed, worships only the enjoyments, by which it is surrounded.

11. The remembrance of earthly enjoyments is the first cause of death to men ; afterwards come desire (to have those enjoyments) and anger (at the failure to have enjoyments from some cause or other). These (i. e. the remembrance of enjoyments, desire and anger) cause death to be met with by boys (men of little sense) ; but those that have succeeded in controlling their souls cross over death unharmed by means of their self-restraint.

12. He who has succeeded in controlling his soul, having an eye on himself kills (keeps away from) his soaring desires regarding them as not worth having by means of his self-knowledge. The (real) Death assuming the form of death (as known to the people in general) cannot destroy that learned man who controls his desires in this way.

13. A man who follows his desires is destroyed soon after the desires (are destroyed). The man, however, who can control his desires can keep away from woes in whatever form they come.

14. Desire appears to be ignorance, darkness and hell of all creatures (for when they follow desire, they lose all control over their senses). Persons following desire run on like intoxicated men towards the drains and holes of this life.

15. What can death do in this world to a person, whose habits of life are not led by desire. Death is to him like a tiger made of straw. Therefore, for the destruction of the cause of the life (existence) of desire, (which means ignorance) every wish is to be disregarded ; and the slightest one is not to be given a place in the mind even.

16. That inner soul exists in your body, wedded to wrath and desire as it is like death ; and knowing that death is generated in this way, the person who puts his faith in knowledge is not afraid of death. Death itself is destroyed when it comes under the influence of knowledge, even as earthly beings are destroyed when they come under the influence of death.

Dhritarastra said :—

17. The blessed regions, highly sacred and eternal, to which, it is said, the twice-born can go by the performance of sacrificial ceremonies, are declared by the Vedas to offer emancipation to mortals. Having got this knowledge why should not learned man engage in acts in this world.

Sanat-Sujata said :—

18. He that is not learned goes there, (to those blessed regions) by this means (performance of sacrificial ceremonies) and the Vedas say that in those regions are to be attained the true objects of life. He that has renounced all desires gains emancipation at once ; but he who confuses the material body with the soul,—if he can renounce desire,—obtains emancipation ; but if emancipation is sought without the renunciation of desires, then must one proceed step by step along the path, killing it (the path) by itself (i. e. when a particular grade has been attained, the path already crossed over must be killed; or the chances of his retracing the steps being once more degraded must be removed).

Dhritarastra said:—

19. Who is he that induces action into the Ancient Being without birth? If it is He who has pervaded every thing, what can be His action or His happiness? O learned Being, speak to me about all this truly.

Sanat-Sujata said:—

20. There is great inconsistency in the complete identification of things that are essentially different. Creatures come into existence by the union of the Supreme Soul with certain conditions of time, place, etc., that have no beginning. The fact of such being the case in no way lessens the importance or supremacy of Him (the Unborn and Ancient one) in the slightest degree. Men, too, come into existence by the union of Him that has no beginning (with certain conditions of time, place, &c).

21. The Supreme Being by his constant transformation creates this universe; the Vedas make it plain that the Supreme Being possesses the power (of constant transformation) and that He is the cause of transformation in this world.

Dhritarastra said:—

22. Some there are in this world who practise virtue and some that do not practise virtue but renounce all sorts of actions. (Regarding the former I ask) Is virtue destroyed by unrighteousness or does righteousness destroy virtue?

Sanat-Sujata said:—

23. The fruits of virtue and also those of the other (complete inaction)—both of these are of use in that respect (for obtaining emancipation).

24. Both are of use in obtaining emancipation. The wise man, however, is successful (in obtaining it) by means of knowledge. In other case, the man, who ascribes an undue importance to the body, acquires the merit of his actions (and hence also emancipation); but having obtained emancipation falls therefrom.

25. Having acquired both (i. e. the fruits of virtue and vice) which have an end (men of action attain heaven or hell for a limited time only), men of action again come into this world and become attached to actions by reason of their previous virtue or vice. A wise man neutralises the effects of his sinful acts by his virtues. Virtue is strong and hence his emancipation.

Dhritarastra said:—

26. Those ancient and sacred regions of this universe are said to be accessible to the twice-born by their own virtuous acts—speak of them according to their degree (of sacredness). Speak also of other (sinless) regions. O learned one, I do not desire to know (the merit) of actions.

Sanat-Sujata said:—

27. These Brahmanas, who are proud of their austerities like powerful men of strength, on their exit from the world shine in the eternal regions.

28. Those who are proud of their virtuous acts acquire the merit of having performed sacrificial ceremonies—such blessed persons freed from this world go to heaven, the abode of the gods.

29. Due performance of these (sacrificial ceremonies) again is said to be compulsory by some persons having a knowledge of the Vedas; but such persons should not be thought very highly of; for, though seeking the truth of inner self, they put undue importance to external forms.

30. Whenever (in whatever family) food and drink fit for a Brahmana abound like grass and reeds in the spots, there should (a Yogi) go for his living and not pain himself (by hunger and thirst).

31. In a place where there is fear of great danger for not proclaiming one's superiority, he who does not do so (speak out his superiority) is worthier than the other (who does).

32. He who is not pained by another proclaiming his (the latter) true worth and who eats his food after offering it to the gods—the food offered by such a man is approved by the righteous.

33. As dogs eat up their own vomit to their constant injury, so they who proclaim their own worth eat up their own vomit.

34. That man is to be regarded as a Brahmana whose religious practices remain ever unknown even to the members of his family among whom he lives—wise men also know him to be a Brahmana.

35. What other Brahmana is worthy to know the supreme soul, that has no form, is without change, is alone, and is devoid of all sorts of duality. By the performance of such practices, the supreme soul resides in a Kshatriya too and is seen by him.

36. He who considers that heaven is attainable by actions alone and so employs himself in action,—what sin is not committed by that thief who robs the soul (of its true attributes) ?

37. He who never exerts himself, never accepts gifts from others, who is respected quiet, who though well versed (in the holy books) does not seem to be well versed, is a Brahmana—a wise man knowing Brahman or the Supreme soul.

38. Those, who are but poor in what is regarded as wealth by ordinary men, are yet rich in heavenly wealth and in devotion, and become hard to vanquish, and without fear reside, and they become equal to Brahma for their learning.

39. That man, who in this world having performed all sorts of sacrifices comes to know the gods, can not be equal to one knowing Brahma ; for he (the former) has to exert himself.

40. He, who is honoured (by the gods) without any action, is honoured (like one knowing the true nature of the inner self). If honoured (by others than gods) a man should not think himself really honoured ; and he should not be sorry at others not honouring him.

41. People follow their natural inclinations in the same way as they close or open their eyelids ; and the man that is respected should consider that it is the learned only in this world that respect others.

42. Those wretches again in this world who are adepts at unrighteousness and at deceit do not respect those that are worthy of respect. On the contrary, they insult those who ought to be respected.

43. The esteem of the world, and the vow of silence (holy asceticism) can never dwell together. Know that this (world) is for those who want esteem, and the other for those that have observed the vow of silence.

44. In this world, respect resides in worldly prosperity, though it is an impediment to virtue. Heavenly prosperity is not attainable by one that is devoid of (true) wisdom, O Kshatriya.

45. Virtuous men speak of several doors in this world to heavenly prosperity, which are difficult of being properly watched. The doors are truthfulness, kindness, modesty, self-control and knowledge which are antidotes of ignorance.

Thus ends the forty-second chapter, the speech of Sanat-Sujata, in the Sanat-Sujata of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XLIII.

(SANAT-SUJATA PARVA)—*contd.Dhritarastra said :—

1. What purpose does the practice of asceticism serve? Which is better—the practice of asceticism or the vow of silence? Speak to me, O learned one, the real nature of asceticism. Can a learned person attain to the state of the Supreme Being by the vow of silence? How in this world O Muni, is asceticism practised?

Sanat-Sujata said :—

2. Since not even a knowledge of the Vedas, applied with all possible concentration of the mind, penetrates into the Supreme Soul ; therefore is it (the Supreme Soul) called Mauna (asceticism) from which is derived the Vedas, and which, on account of its being pregnant with the knowledge of the Vedas, reigns supreme, O king.

Dhritarastra said :—

3. He who is conversant with the Rig and Yajur Vedas and also with the Sain Veda,—is such a man, having committed sins, guilty thereof?

Sanat-Sujata said :—

4. I speak no falsehood to you when I declare that neither the Sama nor the Yajus nor the Rig Vedas do rescue a man, who has no control over his senses, from his sin.

5. The hymns of the Veda do not rescue from sin the cheat that lives by deception. Like a bird which has got feathers forsaking its nest, the hymns forsake such a man when his end comes.

Dhritarastra said :—

6. If the Vedas, without the aid of virtue, are not competent to rescue (men from sins), O you, who have control over your senses, then whence is this false and old idea of the Brahmanas (that a knowledge of the Vedas rescues a man from sins)?

Sanat-Sujata said :—

7. This universe shines (has come into existence) from the Supreme Soul, and is distinct from the latter in name, form &c. The Vedas, too, pointing this out declare that the universe is distinct (from Supreme Soul).

8. Sacrificial ceremonies and asceticism are prescribed for that object (i.e. for attaining to the Supreme Soul). By means of these two does a man of learning acquire virtue? Destroying sins by virtuous deeds, he afterwards has his soul illuminated with knowledge.

9. A learned man by his knowledge, attains to the Supreme Soul; an unwise man desiring the fruits of the four-fold objects of humanity in general, having taken with him the effects of acts done here, enjoys them in the other world, and (when the enjoyment is over) comes back again to bridge along the same path.

10. The fruits of asceticism in this world are enjoyed in the other (by those who have not brought their souls under their control); but to those blessed persons engaged in austerities these regions yield fruits.

Dhritarastra said:—

11. How can asceticism which is ever the same be successful now and unsuccessful at another time. O Sanat-Sujata, tell us this that we two may know it.

Sanat-Sujata said:—

12. Asceticism unstained by faults (desire, insufficient concentration, &c.) alone leads to emancipation; this (asceticism) is successful; other sorts of devotion are unsuccessful.

13. What you ask me, O Kshatriya, have all their bases on asceticism; by means of asceticism do learned men know the Supreme Soul and win immortality.

Dhritarastra said:—

14. Speak about asceticism stained by faults; I have heard all about that unstained by faults, by which, O Sanat-Sujata, I have come to know of an ancient mystery.

Sanat-Sujata said:—

15. Stained asceticism is that which has for its faults the twelve (vices) with anger at the beginning as also the thirteen descriptions of wickedness, O king. The twelve virtues having righteousness at the beginning which are known to the twice-born are also included in the code of the Pitris.

16. Anger, desire, covetousness, ignorance of right and wrong, discontentment, unkindness, jealousy, vanity, grief, love, of pleasure, envy, and a tendency to speak ill of others are the faults of men, and these twelve ought ever to be avoided by human beings.

17. Each of these by itself can bring about the ruin of mankind, O bull among men; opportunity is awaited by these (vices) like deer by a hunter.

18. Speaking ill of others and well of themselves, adopting every means to enjoy the wives of others, vanity, anger, fickleness, and not protecting proper persons—these vices wretches of wicked soul commit and do not fear the gravest dangers in this world and in the other.

19. He who considers enjoyment to be a grand aim of life, he who is vain, he who repents after making a gift, he who is a miser, he who oppresses others, he who is pleased at the misery of others, and he who hates his wife—these seven are extremely wicked.

20. Righteousness, truthfulness, self-control, asceticism, delight at other's happiness, modesty, forgiveness, reverse of malice, performance of sacrificial ceremonies, gifts, patience, learning, and vows—these twelve are the attributes of a Brahmana.

21. He who excels in these twelve is capable over the whole of this earth and he who is graced with these, too, or even one of these should be regarded as having gained his object.

22. Self-control, renunciation, and true knowledge—in these is centred immortality. Those Brahmanas that have great minds are of opinion that truth underlies all these virtues.

23—25. Self-control has for its elements eighteen virtues, the non-observance through laziness of acts prescribed in the Vedas, untruthfulness, malice, desire, wealth, love of pleasure, anger, grief, thirst, avarice, deceitfulness, delight at the pain of others, envy, repentance, aversion from virtues and noble acts, forgetfulness, speaking ill of others and well of self—he who is freed from these vices is said to possess self-control by good people.

26. The eighteen vices constitute mada, renouncement is of six kinds, the Smritis call the reverse of these six sorts of renouncement as mada.

27. The six kinds of renunciation are all good, the third is hard to practise; but by means of that relief is obtained from sorrow, besides that one being achieved, one gets over all difficulties.

28. The six kinds of renunciation are all good, (they are) not delighting at the acquirement of prosperity; the second is the performance of sacrificial ceremonies and pious acts (renouncement of the reverse of these).

29. (Renouncement of desire is known in the Smritis, as the third, O Chief among kings. He who has not this third sort of renouncement is not fit to come under the above description, which the Smritis declare

30. (The third sort is) that which abandons enjoyments without enjoying them and not that which abandons them after enjoying them to the heart's content.

31. (He who speaks of the fourth sort) one should not be sorry at the failure of an action, nor allow himself to be afflicted by the failure, even if he possesses all the virtues and the means (of achieving the act).

32. Or on a disagreeable thing taking place, he does not feel pain. (The fifth sort is now treated of) one should never ask for a son or a wife or any other favour.

33. (Sixth sort) that a gift should be made to one asking for it ; by this happiness can always be attained. By these means can one gain a true knowledge of self and the last one is made up of eight qualities.

34. These are truth, meditation, a conception of the distinctness of subject and object, capability of arriving at conclusions, renunciation of the world, the habit of never taking what belongs to another, asceticism and non-acceptance of gifts.

35. Such are said to be the vices of mada, and these vices should always be avoided. The same should be done of the aversion of renunciation, and ignorance of self. A true knowledge of self, again, has eight virtues.

36. Ignorance of self has eight vices. These vices should be avoided. He who has attained freedom from the five senses, and from desire, O Bharata, and from all concern for the past and future becomes happy.

37. Let your soul be attached to truth, O chief among kings ; on truth is founded the universe. Self-control, true knowledge and renunciation are said to be based on truth ; on truth is centred immortality.

38. Being devoid of all vices, devotion and asceticism should be practised here. It has been prescribed by God that truth shall constitute the vow of the righteous.

39. Asceticism devoid of these vices and graced with these virtues becomes eminently successful in achieving prosperity.

40. What you ask me, O chief among kings, I have told you in brief—a subject sacred and sin-destroying and capable of rescuing people from birth, death, and decrepitude.

Dhritarastra said :—

41. By the fifth Veda, called Akshyana, it is declared that the Supreme Soul is identical with the universe ; but there are some that recognize only four Vedas, and others only three.

42. Some again recognize only two Vedas and others only one ; while another class recognize only the Supreme Being. Of these, whom am I to regard as really possessing a knowledge of the Supreme Being.

Sanat-Sujata said :—

43. From ignorance of the one that ought to be known, have several Vedas been conceived. There is but one truth, O chief among kings. Who is there, who has attained to that truth ?

44. Not knowing such a one that ought to be known, a man thinks "I am wise" and from hope of gaining happiness employs himself in gifts, study and the performance of sacrifices.

45. The purposes of those that have deviated from truth are in accordance with their condition, and, so relying on the truth of the Vedas, perform sacrificial ceremonies.

46. Some (perform sacrifices) by (concentration of) the mind, some by speech (recitation of hymns) ; and some by acts (the real ceremonies) ; but the man who is destined to attain to the true object, gets a true knowledge of self through the proper means.

47. When a man's purposes have failed through a defect in his heart, he should not make vows of silence, called the Dikshita-brata. This name comes from a root (Diksh), which signifies the observance of vows. Truth is the only object of the good.

48. The fruits of knowledge are immediate that of asceticism remote. A twice-born who has read much should only be known as a well-read man.

49. Therefore, O Kshatriya, that one can know the Supreme Soul by mere reading. He, who does not fall away from truth, should be known by thee as one who has attained a knowledge of the Supreme Being.

50. "Verses" is the name given, O Kshatriya, to what was recited by Atharvan in ancient days, in company with other great Rishis. Those who have read the Vedas and yet do not know the Being that ought to be known are not to be regarded as conversant with those verses.

51. The verses, O chief among the best beings, independently become the means of obtaining Truth. They are not conversant with (the spirit of) the verses, who perform sacrifices after study of the Vedas and do not know the Supreme Being.

52. There are some who do not know the Vedas and some that know them, O king.

He, who (merely) knows the Veda, does not know the knowable Being; but he who stands on truth knows knowable Being.

53. Among the faculties of the mind there is none which can help us in obtaining a true knowledge of self. There is none, again, who by means of the mind alone can acquire a knowledge of the knowable Being. He who knows what self is knows what self is not. He who stands on Truth knows the Supreme Soul.

54. He who knows the proofs knows also that which is sought to be proved; but the true essence and nature thereof neither the Vedas, nor those conversant with the Vedas know. Still those twice-born that are conversant with the Vedas know the knowable Being by means of the Vedas.

55. As a twig obtained from a big tree is used in pointing out the new moon; so are the Vedas used in pointing out the truth and other attributes of the Supreme Soul.

56. I consider him to be a Brahmana, who knowing the Supreme Soul can expound (the rules of life) and explain the doubts of all, himself having all doubts removed from his mind.

57. No clue can be found of the soul in the West, nor in the East, nor in the South, nor in the North, nor in the intermediate directions—in fact in no direction.

58. Very rarely can a clue be found of the soul by one who regards the earthly body as identical with the soul. The man of devotion perceives the Lord who is not even conceivable by the Vedas.

59. Bringing all your senses under control, and without any exertion of your mind (in other direction), seek to know that Brahma who, you have heard, resides in your inner soul.

60. That man is not a devotee who observes the vow of silence, nor he who lives in the woods; but that one is said to be a true devotee who knows his own nature.

61. That man is said to be a grammarian who can trace each word to its root and explain it. Similarly that man is a true grammarian who can trace each object to its root (Brahma or the Supreme Soul).

62. A man, who sees all the worlds before his eyes, sees everything and that learned Brahmana who is established on truth knows everything.

63. A Kshatriya, too, who practises such virtues beholds the Supreme Soul and can do the same by performing all the acts prescribed in the Vedas. Knowing this I tell you.

Thus ends the forty-third chapter, the speech as delivered by Sanat-Sujata, in the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XLIV.

(SANAT-SUJATA PARVA)—contd.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. O Sanat-Sujata, what you have been saying regarding the attainment of emancipation and the origin of the universe is the best (discourse I have heard). Speak to me such words, (treating of subjects) rarely to be attained by men of desire, O you who have observed celibacy!

Sanat-Sujata said:—

2. This supreme soul regarding which you ask me with such exaltation cannot be attained by him who is in a hurry. When the mind (desire) has been lost in the intellect (i.e. when intellect has gained a control over desire), the mind of man becomes indifferent to worldly things and this state is attainable only by asceticism.

Dhritarastra said:—

3. The true knowledge, that you are speaking of attainable by hard asceticism, is unborn in the mind and needs not any efforts for its manifestation and is manifested during the seeking of Brahma. How then can that immortality which is connected with a knowledge of the Supreme soul be obtained?

Sanat-Sujata said:—

4. This true knowledge that is unborn is said to be undeveloped and is developed by asceticism. On obtaining the true knowledge, men leave this world. True knowledge is ever present in the old and eminent preceptors.

Dhritarastra said:—

5. That knowledge is capable of being gained by asceticism without difficulty. What sort of asceticism must be that? O Brahma, speak to me that.

Sanat-Sujata said:—

6. Those who having entered into the dwelling of a preceptor and residing therein serve them and practise asceticism become Brahma himself, as it were; and casting off their bodies are united with Him.

7. Those who are in this world desirous of obtaining emancipation, subdue their desires. Those virtuous men get their souls explorated from their body like a blade of grass from a marshy plot of ground.

8. The father and the mother, O Bharata, these two create the body; but the state gained from the instructions of the preceptor is sacred, free from death and without old age.

9. He (the preceptor) who discounting on the Supreme Soul frees a man from untruth and distributes nectar should be regarded as father and mother. No injury should ever be done to him, knowing what he does.

10. A disciple should every day pay due respects to his preceptor and engage himself in study with a pure mind and concentrated attention. He should not be annoyed (at the humble and menial services he is called upon to perform) and not feel wrathful. This is the first step of asceticism.

11. He who gains knowledge (of his duties) by observing the duties of other disciples is said to observe the first step of the vow of asceticism.

12. What is agreeable to a preceptor should be done at the expense of life and wealth, by the mind, by actions, or by speech. Doing this is said to be the second step.

13. A similar behaviour like that towards a preceptor should be adopted towards the preceptor's wife and the same should be done to his son. Doing this is said to be the second step.

14. Fully appreciating what has been done to one's self by his preceptor and knowing the object thereof, a disciple should with exaltation in his heart think—I have been developed by him. This is the third step of asceticism.

15. A wise man should not remove himself (from the preceptor's abode) without requesting the preceptor; nor should he even speak or think "I do this" (i.e. I make this gift). This is the fourth step of asceticism.

16. A man obtains the object of the first step of asceticism by the aid of time (i.e. in due course), the second step by contact with the preceptor, the third by the energy of his own intellect, and the next by discussion with others.

17. The effects of the practice of asceticism, which is made up of twelve constituent elements including righteousness and the effects of Angas and Valam (particular forms of asceticism) are said to be obtained by contact with the preceptor and by an earnest desire to know the Supreme Soul.

18. While in the position of a disciple, whatever wealth is earned should be given to the preceptor. It is by this means that he (the preceptor) earns his honest livelihood graced with many virtues. Such should also be the conduct of the preceptor's son.

19. With this rule of life one prospers in every way and obtains many sons and fame; to such a man, wealth is poured from all sides, and to that place many people come for practising asceticism.

20. By means of such asceticism, the gods attained their divine character and the wise Rishis of heavenly qualities attained to the regions of Brahma.

21. By this also did the beauty of the Gandharvas and Apsaras spring up; by such asceticism does the sun rise to make the day.

22. These (i. e. Gandharvas, &c.) on completion of their asceticism by this means attained to the state of the seekers of the Rasaveda (a fabulous gem supposed to grant every desire of the possessor) through the obtainment of the object of their desire.

23. He, who attached to austerities has recourse to asceticism and thereby purifies his body, comes to the condition of a child (free from passions, &c., characteristic of the old men) and that learned man in the end conquers death.

24. By pure work men obtain the perishable worlds, O Kshatriya: but that learned man, by means of his knowledge, obtains emancipation. There is no other path to emancipation.

Dhritarastra said:—

25. Of what form is the Supreme Soul, which is immortal and omnipresent and which the learned man sees in this world. Does he shine as white, red, black, blue or purple?

Sanat-Sujata said:—

26. (The Supreme Soul) may appear as white, red, black, brown or like the sun; but its like is not to be met with in the earth, the sky, nor in the water of the sea.

27. It cannot be found among the stars, nor is it shut up in the lightning, and its form cannot be seen among the clouds, nor in the air, nor among the gods, nor in the moon, nor in the sun,

28. Nor in the Rich, nor in the Fajus, nor in the Atharva, nor in the sacred Sama (Vedas). It is certain, O king, that it cannot be seen in the Rathanlara, nor in the Varhadatra, nor in the great vows.

29. Incapable of being reached by our ignorance, even the king of Death, at the time of his end, is lost in it. Its form cannot be gazed at ; it is like the edge of a razor and its form is like that of a high mountain.

30. It is the foundation of everything ; it is nectar ; it is the universe ; it is vast, and delightful. From it are born all creatures and there do they come to their end.

31. Having no duality, it is manifest in the form of the universe. Poets speak of it as having no change but in the language and form used for its description. That on which all this world stands—those who know this become immortal.

Thus ends the forty-fourth chapter, in the Sanat-Sujata of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XLV.

(SANAT-SUJATA PARVA)

—Continued.

Sanat-Sujata said :—

1. Grief, anger, avarice, desire, vanity, idleness, malice, stupidity, love of gain, affection, jealousy and evil speech,—

2. These twelve are great evils leading to the destruction of the life of man. Each of this, O chief among kings, awaits (opportunity for getting into its clutches) mankind. Man affected with them loses his senses and does sinful acts.

3. He who loves pleasure ; he who is haughty ; he who is harsh of speech ; he who talks too much ; he who nurses and feeds anger in the heart and he who speaks ill of others—these six sorts of men of wicked disposition, having even gained their objects, do not treat others with politeness.

4. He who is too much attached to enjoyment, he who boasts after giving away, he who speaks evil, he who is a miser, he who is (mentally) weak, he who praises himself too much, and he who hates his wife—these seven are ever spoken of as vicious wretches.

5. Righteousness, truth, asceticism, self-control, contentment, modesty, patience, unselfishness, gifts, acquaintance with the holy books, wisdom, forgiveness—are the twelve great vows of a Brahmana.

6. He, who does not deviate from these twelve, can rule even the whole of this earth. He who is graced with these two, or even one, does not regard anything as solely his own.

7. Self-control, renunciation, and true knowledge—on these depends immortality.

These are the attributes of those learned Brahmanas, who regard Brahma as the Prime Being.

8. True or false, speaking ill of others, is not proper for a Brahmana. People who do this have hell for their abode.

9. Mada has eighteen vices which have not before been described. (They are) hatred towards men, acting against the interests of others, speaking ill of others who do not deserve it, untruthfulness,

10. Desire, anger, excessive reliance on others, blaming others, calumny, waste of wealth, quarrels, imprudence, oppression on living beings,

11. Envy, ignorance, excessive speech, loss of the senses, and the desire to harm others. Therefore should a wise man never yield to Mada. It is ever reprehensible.

12. In friendship, it should be known, are six virtues ; they (friends) are delighted in (their friend's) prosperity and pained in their adversity ; if a man asks for anything that ought not to be asked for, it is at once given.

13. One (a friend) who is of pure mind when asked, gives away every blessing that he enjoys—his wealth, his son, himself, his wife even. A friend should not reside in the house of him whom he has given away everything but should live on what is earned by himself alone.

14. The godly man of possessions, and virtues, who wants to be thus endowed with virtue, should turn away his five senses from their five objects.

15. Such acquirement of noble qualities constitutes asceticism. Those who practise these with patience attain to emancipation.

16. Owing to having understood the nature of truth to which are directed all sacrifices, a certain class of men perform sacrifices by the mind (meditation), another by words (recitation of hymns) and another by actions.

17. In a man, who knows Brahma through his attributes, resides truth ; in one who knows him as himself (i. e. does not regard him as the sum total of certain attributes) it resides more completely. Hear me now on some other subjects.

18. This grand system of philosophy should be taught to those who desire to obtain Brahma ; all other systems, are mere tissues of words, which wise men declare. On this philosophy all this universe stands and those who know it become immortal.

19. By means of deeds well done, O king, one cannot obtain Truth ; whether he offers libations on the homa fire or performs sacrificial ceremonies; the man of childlike simplicity does not obtain immortality. O king, nor does he obtain satisfaction in the end.

20. Bringing all the senses under control and alone one should seek Brahma; he should not work even by the mind and while so employed one should avoid joy and anger at praise and blame.

21. Living a life according to this and doing one by one all that is prescribed in the Vedas, O Kshatriya, does a man learn and see Brahma, O learned one, I tell you this.

Thus ends the forty-fifth chapter, an honest speech, in the Sanat-Sujata of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XLVI.

(SANAT-SUJATA PARVA.)—

Continued.

Sanat-Sujata said :—

1. That which is the seed (of the universe) blazes with great effulgence and is of great fame. The gods worship him; from him shines the sun; the ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

2. By reason of the seed is Brahma the Lord; by means of the seed does he develop. That seed communicates heat and light to light-giving bodies and not getting heat from any other body; yet it is a source of terror to luminous bodies. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

3. From Brahma spring up the five subtle elements (Mahabhut) which again give birth to the five gross elements which make up the human body; the heart that is in it contains both the gods (the creature-soul and the supreme soul). Ever-wakeful, this son of the sun upholds both the earth and the sky. Ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

4. The seed supports the two gods (the creature-soul and the supreme soul), the earth and the heaven, the cardinal points of the earth and the universe. From that spring up the cardinal point and the latter, and from that the vast oceans have originated. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

5. Attached to the wheels to the car (representing the acts of past lives) of human body which is uncertain, but the acts of which are ever present; a man of true knowledge is led by the steeds of the senses towards the regions that have no birth and the Being present there. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is immortal.

6. Its form is not similar to that of any other being; no body ever sees it with his eyes; that wise man who knows it by the mind or the heart becomes immortal. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is immortal.

7. Drinking of the lake (of life) guarded by the gods, and bearing twelve fruits and beholding many a dear object in its middle, man disports in the waters, that lake has its origin in the seed. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is immortal.

8. The being who, like a bee sucking honey only for half the month, enjoys only one-half of the fruits of his actions and has to come back to the world to enjoy the other half, and is present in all creatures ordains sacrifices. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is immortal.

9. Originally without plumes (i. e. conditions) he comes to possess plumes (becomes vested with conditions) in a large tree of golden foliage, representing a world transitory and ephemeral, and flies away in different directions (i. e. is reborn among several orders of men). The Sloka simply means that the supreme soul when vested with conditions becomes the creature-soul. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

10. From that which is complete (Brahma) has the complete universe sprung; and from that which is complete have also the conditions which are complete sprung and when those which are full (conditions) are separated from that which is full (Brahma) the true full remains. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is eternal.

11. It is from that, that the air has come, and towards that again it ever goes; it is from that, that Agni (consumer) and Soma (consumed) have originated and on them depends the entire living world.

12. It should be known that everything has its origin in that; we can not describe that; the ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

13. The vital air called Apana is lost in the air called Prana which again is lost in the mind. The last again is lost in the intellect which again is lost in the supreme being. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

14. Like a swan walking out of water the eternal one (as embodied in a man) endued with four legs (respectively called waking dreaming, sleeping and) turiya hides one of the legs (turiya, which can be perceived alone by ascetics, all other men perceiving the other three); he who sees this hidden leg for the purpose of grinding the other three, regards death and emancipation as the same. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

15. The being who is the inner soul is of the size of the thumb, by being joined with the human body ever moves. Fools alone do not perceive Him manifest within everything, who is the Lord, who is worthy of being worshipped, who is capable of anything and the Prime Being. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

16. It is seen equally among men who have obtained true knowledge and those that have not. It is present equally in men that have obtained immortality and others (i. e. those who have not) but the emancipated ones obtain honey flowing in a thick stream. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

17. To a man of true knowledge, both the worlds are accessible and though they may not have performed the Agnihotra ceremony, yet do they obtain the fruits thereof. Do you not proclaim your deficiency in matters spiritual. True knowledge is another name of the inner soul which those who have self-control gain. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

18. Of this description is that illustrious Being in whom is lost all living creatures. He who knows that sacred being does not envy the attainment of objects of others in this world, (he himself having attained to emancipation). Ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

19. He that flies away with thousands of thousands of wings outstretched must come back to the central spirit within the body. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

20. His form cannot be seen by the eye; those that follow pure lives see them. He who seeks the general good of man in his mind, who does not grieve and who can renounce the world becomes immortal. Ascetics perceive the Lord who is Eternal.

21. Some men conceal their habits which are different from their teachings from others, as serpents conceal themselves in their holes. Men who are ignorant are deceived by them, who following the right path deceive their victims into ruin. Ascetics perceive that Lord who is immortal.

22. I am beyond the reach of earthly evils; whence can then death and life come to me? nor am I desirous of emancipation for truth and untruth, good and evil—all rest in the Supreme Being. (Thus does the emanipated soul think within himself). Ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

23. Acts, virtuous or sinful, cannot touch the man who has obtained true knowledge. This inequality is observed only by ordinary men. The man who has seen the Supreme Being is immortal. Being possessed of this knowledge, one should attain to that sweetness (Brahma). The ascetics perceive that Being who is Eternal.

24. The heart of such a man is not grieved at calumny, nor the want of study of the holy books, nor the non-performance of sacrificial ceremonies; by a knowledge of the supreme Being those who are given to asceticism soon obtain true wisdom. The ascetics perceive that Lord who is Eternal.

25. The man who thus perceives soul in all creatures—why should he grieve after this perception? Grief comes to those who are employed in other occupations.

26. As one can do as well with a well as with a large tank, so one who knows the supreme soul can do as well with his own knowledge as with the entire Veda.

27. Of the measure of the thumb, that illustrious Being, though dwelling in the heart, cannot be seen by the eye. Though without birth, he moves about in full consciousness, day and night. He that knows him becomes wise and full of joy.

28. According to the Smritis, I am the mother, the father, and again I am the son—I am the soul of everything, past and present.

29. I am the old grandfather, father and son; O Bharata, you depend on my soul; O Bharata, yet you are not mine.

30. The soul is my place, and the soul is my birth—I am both the warp and the woof; I am established on that which is indestructible. Though without birth, I roam about in full consciousness, day and night; knowing me wise men become satisfied.

31. The supreme soul is subtler than the subtle, of a noble mind, and is present in all creatures. He is known as the universal father, dwelling in the heart of every creature,

CHAPTER XLVII.
(YANASANDHI PARVA).

Vaishampayana said :—

1. In this way discoursing with Sanat-Sujata and the wise Vidura, the king passed that night.

2. That night having passed away, all the kings entered the Council Chamber with glad hearts with the desire of seeing the Suta.

3. Desirous of hearing the message of those sons of Pritha, full of virtue and worldly benefit, all with Dhritarastra at their head went to the blessed Council Chamber.

4. Of a bright white and large area and adorned with a golden floor it was beautiful as the moon and wet with sandal water.

5. It was covered over with handsome seats made of gold and of wood and of marble and of ivory, having excellent covers.

6. Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Shalya, Kritabarman, Joyadratha, Aswathama, Vikarna, Somadatta, Valhika,

7. Vidura of great wisdom, and Yuyutsu of great prowess, all these heroes and rulers of the earth, O bull among the race of Bharata,

8. Keeping Dhritarastra in the front entered that blessed Council Chamber, as also did Dusasana, Chitrasena, Sakuni and Souvala.

9. Durmukha, Dusaha, Karna, Uluka, Vivinsati having placed Duryodhana, the wrathful king of the Kurus, in the front,

10. Entered that Council, O king, like the gods forming the train of Sakra. At the time, O king, filled with those heroes, having arms like iron maces,

11. That Council Chamber, O king, appeared like a den filled with lion. All those mighty bowmen of great prowess having entered the hall,

12. Those of the effulgence of the sun seated themselves on the variegated seats. And to all those kings, seated on their seats, O Bharata,

13. The gate keeper (thus) submitted for their information, the presence of the Suta's son: Here comes he with his car who was sent to the sons of Pandu.

14. Our messenger has returned speedily by the aid of horses of Sindhu species, which are good carriers of loads. Coming to that place quickly and dismounting from the chariot the one having earrings entered the Council Chamber full of great-souled rulers of the earth.

Sanjaya said :—

15. Having gone to the Pandavas, I am returned ; know you this, O sons of Kuru. The Pandus salute all the sons of Kurus, each according to his age.

16. They pay their respects to the old and present suitable greetings to those of their age and also to those their youngers. In fact, the sons of Pritha present suitable greetings to all according to their respective ages.

17. What I, instructed by Dhritarastra before, having gone there from hence said to the sons of Pandu, listen to that, O rulers.

Thus ends the forty-seventh chapter, Sanjaya sent in message, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. I ask you, O Sanjaya, in the midst of these kings, what words the noble minded Dhananjaya of pure habits, the leader in battles, the destroyer of the lives of men of vicious habits, said.

Sanjaya said :—

2. Let Duryodhana listen to this speech which was made by Arjuna, who was eager to fight, with the permission of Yudhisthira and in the hearing of Keshava.

3. Without the slightest fear, and conscious of the strength of his arms, in the presence of Vasudeva, the wise one spoke to me. Kiritin, eager to fight, said to me : "Tell the son of Dhritarastra in the midst of the Kurus."

4. "And in the hearing of the son of Suta of wicked soul, of disagreeable speech, O Suta, who is ever desirous of a fight with me, and who is of stupid intellect and of extreme ignorance and whose time is come.

5. "And also in the hearing of those kings who have been assembled to fight the Pandavas, the entire collection of words used by me ; let that king with his ministers hear what I say."

6. As all the gods hear what is said by the chief of the deities, with the thunderbolt in his hands, so did the Pandavas and the Srinjaya listen to the able speech made by Kiritin.

7. Thus spoke Arjuna eager for fight armed with the Gandiva-bow and with his lotus eyes looking red: If the son of Dhritarastra does not surrender the kingdom of Yudhisthira, the king of Ajmida ;

8. Then there are surely some acts done before (by them), the fruits of which have not been obtained by the son of Dhritarastra of wicked souls for which battle is desired with Bhimasena and Arjuna and the same with the two sons of Ashwin and Vamdeva,

9. And with the son of Sini and with Dhristadyumna of sure arms and with Shikhandin and with Yudhisthira who is equal to Indra and who can consume the Earth and the Heaven by the strength of his asceticism.

10. If war with them is thought of by the son of Dhritarastra, then are all the subjects of the Pandavas gained. Therefore do not propose peace for gaining the end of the Pandavas; let there be war if you please.

11. The bed of woe in which the son of Pandu attached to virtuous habits lay, exiled in the woods—let the son of Dhritarastra when dead in the field obtain a bed of greater and endless woe.

12. The son of Dhritarastra of wicked soul, and of unrighteous conduct could never conquer the son of Kuru and Pandu (at the game of dice) by means of modesty, knowledge, asceticism, self-control, heroism, or by strength accompanied with righteousness.

13. Graced with meekness and benevolence, with asceticism and self-control, and with might attended with virtue, speaking the truth, (Yudhisthira), a prey to deception, has borne great sufferings.

14. When the eldest son of Pandu, who has brought his soul under control, will direct his wrath nursed during a series of years towards the Kurus, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

15. As blazing fire, raging in all directions, burns up and withers dry grass during summer, so will the army of the son of Dhritarastra be withered by the mere glance of Yudhisthira fired by wrath.

16. When the son of Dhritarastra sees Bhimasena, riding his car with mace in his hand, and vomiting the poison of his wrath,—that wrathful Pandava of terrible strength, then will he repent for the war.

17. When that exceedingly vain one beholds Bhimasena clad in iron, fighting in the front ranks of his army, incapable of being grazed at even by his own men, killing the heroes of other side and sending them to the abode of the God of death, then will these words be remembered by him.

18. When the son of Dhritarastra sees elephants felled to the ground by Bhimasena looking like the summits of mountains with their pierced pot-like heads pouring blood like pots pouring water, then will he repent for the war.

19. When like a huge lion falling upon battle, with a mace in hand, Bhimasena like a slayer of terrible appearance approaches the son of Dhritarastra, then will that son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

20. When that one who is without fear even in great dangers, and skilled in the use of weapons, and the slayer of the enemies' armies, riding on his beautiful car works havoc with his mace among the numerous cars and foot-soldiers ;

21. Fastening quickly the elephants by nooses, when he fells down the army of the son of Dhritarastra like a sturdy man cutting down a forest with an axe, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

22. When like a village containing several huts of straw burnt up by fire, he sees the army of the son of Dhritarastra consumed or when he sees his vast hosts of armies scattered like ripe corns struck by lightning,

23. With their heroic leaders killed and his soldiers struck with fear flying with their backs towards the field and their vast army dispersed, consumed as it were by the fire of the arms of Bhimasena, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

24. When Nakula, the chief among car-warriors, of great skill in the use of weapons skillfully shoots hundreds of arrows, and kill the car-warriors of the other side, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent of the war.

25. Accustomed to comforts, Nakula for a long time slept on an uncomfortable bed in the woods; and when like an angry snake he will vomit poison, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

26. Desperate of their lives the rulers of the earth, directed to fight by the king of Dharma (virtue), O Suta, riding on white cars will work havoc among the (enemies') army. Seeing that, the son of Dhritarastra will afterwards repent.

27. When the sons of Kuru see the five heroes, children in years but old in acts, desperate of their lives, working havoc among the sons of Kuru; then will the sons of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

28. When Sahadeva, mounted on a car with well trained horses, proceeding in the wished-for direction, having noiseless wheels and adorned with golden stars, will fell down the heads of kings with innumerable arrows,

29. Seeing that warrior skilled in the use of weapons, mounted on a car, present in the battle field bent on working havoc and filling soldiers in all directions, the son of Dhritarastra will repent for the war.

30. When Sahadeva who is modest, skillful in battle, truthful, of great strength and graced with all virtues, active, capable of speedily doing things, meets the son of Gandhara in terrible battle and fells down his men,

31. When he sees the sons of Draupadi, the mighty heroes, skillful in the use of weapons and having a knowledge of fighting on cars, darting at the enemies like serpents of quick poison, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

32. When Abhimanya, the slayer of heroes on the other side, shoots arrows on the enemies as the clouds pour water—when he, skilled in the weapons like Krishna, overpowers the enemies, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

33. When he sees the son of Subhadra, who though a child is not a child in heroism is like Indra and is skilful in the use of weapons falling on the men of the enemies like death itself; then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

34. When the young Prabhradakas having great activity, skilled in battle, and having the might equal to that of lions, fell down the sons of Dhritarasta along with their armies; then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

35. When he sees those veterans in war, Virata and Drupada, mighty car-warriors, each present in his own post separately attack the sons of Dhritarastra with their armies; then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

36. When Drupada, skilled in the use of weapons, from the car cuts down the heads of young warriors in battle; and when, wrathful, he shoots arrows from his bow; then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

37. When Virata, the slayer of heroes in the other side, penetrates into the ranks of the enemy and works havoc among them with the aid of the Matsyas of cool courage, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

38. When he sees the eldest son of Virata, the king of the Matsyas of cool courage, clad in iron, in his chariot in the front ranks of his army on the side of the Pandavas, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

39. The virtuous son of Shantanu, that hero among the sons of Kuru, being killed in battle by Shikhandin, then our enemies will undoubtedly perish. I speak this truly.

40. When cutting down the car-warriors, Shikhandin, on a car well protected goes forth to meet Bhishma levelling to the dust the host of cars by his celestial horses, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

41. When he sees, seated in the front ranks of the Srinjayas, effulgent in his splendour, Dhristadyumna, whom the wise Drona initiated into the mysteries of the use of weapons; then will the son of Dhritarastra repent.

42. When that leader of armies, of immeasurable strength, working havoc among the armies of the sons of Dhritarastra by his arrows, goes forth to encounter Drona and the enemy in battle; then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

43. No foe can withstand them who have for their leader, the lion of the Vrishni race, that chief of the Somaka tribe, who is modest, wise, powerful, independent, blessed with prosperity.

44. Tell this also (to Duryodhana): Do not desire (the kingdom), we have chosen Satyaki, the guard of Sini for our leader; he is unequalled in battle in this world, a car-warrior of dauntless and powerful might and skilled in the use of weapons,

45. Of broad chest and long arms, the slayer of enemies unequalled in battle, and acquainted with the best of weapons, the grandson of Sini well versed in the use of weapons, a mighty car-warrior who knows no fear has a bow measuring four cubits.

46. When the ruler of the Sinis, the slayer of foes directed by me, will shower volleys of arrows on the enemy, as the clouds do (the rain), and completely cover them, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

47. When that one with long arms and of firm grasp on the bow makes up his mind for fight; then will the foes before the battle act like cattle who have got scent of a lion.

48. He, of long arms of firm grasp on the bow and of a large mind, can pierce the mountain and destroy the whole world. Acquainted with the use of weapons, skillful, and of an agile hand, he shines like the sun in the sky.

49. The lion of the Vrishni race, that descendant of Jadu of superior training, has many delicate and wonderful weapons. Satyaki has competent knowledge of the use of excellent arms; and he is endued with all the good qualities that are said to be good.

50. When he sees the golden car of Satyaki, the descendant of Madnu with four white horses; then will that foolish son of Dhritarastra with a soul addicted to vices repent for the war.

51. When also he sees my terrible car, guided by Keshava, shining with gold and precious stones, with white horses and with a banner having the figure of a monkey; then will that vicious-souled fool repent.

52—53. When that fool hears the fierce twanging sound produced by the contact of the leather covering fingers with the string of the bow, resembling the roaring of thunder and the great battle field covered with smoke, by my Gandiva bow; then will the foolish son of Dhritarastra of weak intellect repent on seeing himself helpless, his soldiers destroyed in the darkness produced by the raining of arrows like herds of cows, before the actual fighting commences.

54—55. When he sees the terrible host of arrows, with sharp edges having beautiful feathers and able to penetrate into the vitals shot from the string of the Gandiva-bow, like terrible flashes of lightning proceeding from clouds, killing thousands of the host of enemies and devouring innumerable horses and elephants clad in mail; then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

56. When the fool sees the arrows shot from the bows of our enemies being struck by my arrows twined back or cut off being pierced obliquely by my shafts; then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

57. When the arrows shot by me cut off the five figures of young men on the other side as birds pluck off fruits from the top of trees then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

58. When he sees excellent warriors falling dead from their chariots, and huge elephants struck by my arrows in the field, then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

59. When he sees the (other) sons of Dhritarastra before even reaching within the range of the enemy's weapons fall down dead without even doing anything in the field; then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

60. When I shall fell down by pouring down burning arrows the enemies and their hosts of infantry and car-warriors in all directions like death with his mouth open; then will that man of weak intellect repent for the war.

61. When he sees his own army covered by the dust of my chariot going in all sides, cut down by my Gandiva and rendered senseless; then will that man of weak intellect repent.

62—63. When Duryodhana sees all his soldiers overpowered and running away all sides with their bodies cut open, senseless, and his horses, commanders rulers killed, his army thirsty, struck with fear, crying petiously for help, dead and dying, with their animals rendered faint and hair, bones, and heads strewn about as if they were really the work of the Lord of creatures; then will that man of weak intellect repent.

64. When he sees in the chariot, the Gandiva bow, Vasudeva, the heavenly conch Panchajanya, my horses, the two arrow-holders which are never emptied, Devadatta and myself; then will the son of Dhritarastra repent for the war.

65. When I shall burn the sons of Kuru like the god of fire burning at the time of bringing in this world a Yoga, at the end of another a large number of wicked souls, then will Dhritarastra with his sons repent for the war.

66. The son of Dhritarastra, wrathful and of wicked heart, having lost his property along with his brothers, his soldiers and his dependants, at the end of the period of pride, trembling will afterwards repent.

67. One day before this when I had finished my prayers a certain Brahmana said to me, after my getting up from the water, these pleasing words: A difficult task will have to be performed by you, O son of Pritha, O Sabyasachin, you will have to fight with your enemies.

68. Either Indra on his steed, thunderbolt in his hand will go before you in battle, killing your enemies or mounted on a chariot with Sugriva (name of horse) and other steeds Krishna, the son of Vasudeva will protect you from behind.

69. In this war, have I preferred the help of Vasudeva to Indra with the thunderbolt in his hand. That Krishna has come over to my side for the purpose of slaying these wicked men. This I consider has been ordained by the gods.

70. That man whose victory is merely desired by Krishna, even if the latter does not fight, is sure to triumph over all enemies though they be the gods themselves with Indra. If they are men, there is no anxiety.

71. That man is desirous of crossing the ocean of vast expanse and unfathomable waters, with his two arms, who is desirous of vanquishing in fight the exceedingly heroic Krishna, the son of Vasudeva, of great prowess.

72. He, who desires to pierce by the palm of his hand the high white mountain of huge dimensions; has his hand with his nails only wasted away; and absolutely no harm is done to the mountain.

73. He, who aspires to vanquish the son of Vasudeva after encountering him in battle, would rob the gods of nectar by force, and with his two hands would put out a blazing fire and stop the Sun and the Moon in their course.

74. That Krishna, who alone in his chariot having encountered in battle vanquished the army of the king of the Bhojas, married Rukmini of great fame and effulgence; in her was born the high-souled Pradyumna.

75. This favourite of the gods, who had speedily vanquished the Gandharas and conquered all the sons of Nagnajita by sheer force; liberated the imprisoned Sudarsana of great power.

76. He by striking his breast slew the king of Pandya and vanquished the Kalingas in battle; burnt by him the city of Baranasi for a series of years remained without a lord.

77. He was challenged by the king of Nishadas, named Ekalavya, who was incapable of being vanquished by others; but he being struck with force by Krishna lay dead smashed on the hillock like Jambha.

78. Then did he, having Valadeva as his co-adjutor, fell down the extremely wicked son of Valadeva who was seated in court amidst the Vrishnis and Andhakas, and then bestowed the kingdom on Ugrasena.

79. He fought with the terrible king Shalva, the lord of Saubha, without being beside himself (through fear) in consequence of his power of producing effect; and near the gate of Saubha caught hold of Shataghni with his hand; what being on this earth can withstand him in fight?

80. There was fastness of the Asuras, terrible and impenetrable, named Pragyotisha. There Naraka, son of the Earth, of great strength stole the beautiful earrings of Aditi bedecked with gems, and kept them.

81. The very gods with Indra who gathered together fearless of death for fight could not fight with him; and seeing the prowess and strength and the irresistible weapons of Krishna,

82. And knowing his nature, they employed Krishna for slaying that wicked being. And Basudeva undertook (endued with all kinds of prosperity), the accomplishment of that difficult task.

83. Having slain six thousand near the city of Nirmochana, and having broken sharpened arrows suddenly coming on him, having killed Mura and also having killed crowds of Rakshashas, that hero went into the city of Nirmochana.

84. There did take place a battle between him (Naraka) possessed of great strength and this Vishnu also endued with great strength. And he lay killed by Krishna like a Karnikara tree uprooted by a gale.

85. Having killed Naraka, the son of the earth, and Mura and taking back that pair of earrings bedecked with gems, the learned one endued with prosperity and fame and of unparalleled prowess came back.

86. To him the gods seeing the terrible tasks done in that battle granted boons there, saying: "When you are fighting, you will not have fatigue and there shall be no impediment in your way either in the sky or below the waters;

87. Nor shall arms stick on your body. Krishna, too, at this considered himself gratified. Such are ever the virtues of the son of Vasudeva of immeasurable fame and great strength.

88. The son of Dhritarastra aspires to vanquish this Vishnu, who cannot be withstood in fight and who is of endless strength; and that one of wicked soul is ever trying to imprison him. This Krishna however endures even this for our sake.

89. He, however, who desires to get our Krishna on his side after creating disunion between us will know how far he can take away the affection of Krishna for us, after going to the field of battle.

90. Having paid due respects to the son of Shantanu, and also the king Drona with his son, and also to the son of Sharadwata, and being desirous of getting back the kingdom, shall I oppose them in battle.

91. That man of wicked intelligence fights with the Pandavas. I shall regard this death as being justly got. Conquered by deceit at the game of dice by those inhuman ones, we ourselves, the sons of a king, for twelve long years

92. Had to reside in the forest encountering all sorts of troubles and difficulties, and one year in disguise. During the life time of these Pandavas how shall the sons of Dhritarastra rejoice possessed of a royal status.

93. If they conquer us engaged in fight being aided by the gods headed by the great Indra, then will the practice of vice be better than that of virtue and there will surely be no use of behaving honestly.

94. If the effects of a man's actions redound on him ; and if we be superior to him, as I think we are, I hope that with the son of Vasudeva as my co-adjutor, I shall kill Duryodhana with all his assistants.

95. This act, O chief of men, (sending us into exile and themselves possessing our kingdom) can not but be wicked ; and all our good deeds cannot be totally devoid of good fruits. Having considered this as well as that (I think that) the defeat of the son of Dhritarashtra is certain.

96. You will yourselves be witnesses, O son of Kuru, to (the events) I prophesy ; the sons of Dhritarashtra will cease to exist, if they fight. If they do not fight, then they may live ; but in a fight with us, none of them will be alive.

97. Having killed the sons of Dhritarashtra along with Karna, I shall take the whole of the kingdom from the sons of Kuru. (In the mean time) do whatever work you may have, and enjoy yourselves and your wives and every thing sweet.

98. Even among ourselves there are Brahmanas, old, well versed in the knowledge of the holy books, of good conduct, of noble birth, acquainted with the events of the year and certain of their interpretation of the motion of the planets,

99. Capable of explaining the mysteries of the gods, and of answering questions regarding coming events, understanding the signs of the zodiac, prophesying the great overthrow of the Kurus and the Srinjayas and the triumph of the Pandavas.

100. Owing to this, he who has created no enemies considers his objects attained by reason of the overthrow of his enemies. Janardana, too, the lion among the race of the Vrishnis, who has a knowledge of what is to come in the future, undoubtedly sees all this.

101. I, too, who have not lost my senses see all these events of the future by my foresight. My power of vision (into the future) acquired a long time ago does not pain me. I see clearly that the sons of Dhritarashtra fighting shall cease to exist.

102. Without any touch, my Gandiva bow yawns. Though my bow remains untouched, yet the string shakes. My arrows, too, coming near the mouth of my arrowholder try to fly away every moment.

103. The polished sword comes out of the scabbard, as a snake does out of its own worn outskin ; and near my banners are heard terrific words like these : 'O Kiritin, when will your chariot be yoked ?'

104. At night crowds of jackals make their rejoicing ; and from the sky do Rakshasas come down as also the deer and jackals, peacocks and crows, and vultures and cranes and wolves.

105. Also birds, having golden feathers, come down, and having seen my chariot with white steeds follow it. I alone unaided can send to the regions of death all the rulers and warriors by showering my arrows.

106. I shall fling the great weapons, called Sthunra, Karna, Pashupata and Brahma, all of which Sakra gave me, in different directions ; as fire in the hot season burns up a forest.

107. Bringing all my powers and by the aid of my work of destruction, shall I fling these weapons and leave no trace of those that come to the field ; and then shall I obtain rest. Such a state of rest is excellent. This is my determination. Tell them this, O son of Gavalgani.

108. Those who are victors in battle even with the entire body of gods headed by Indra, O Suta—the son of Dhritarashtra thinks that in a battle with them, he will be the victor. Look at his folly.

109. The aged Bhisma, the son of Shantanu, Kripa, Drona with his son and the wise Vidura—what all these say, let that be. May all the sons of Kuru attain to old age.

Thus ends the forty-eighth chapter, the speech of Arjuna, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XLIX.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. In the midst of all those kings, O Bharata, Bhima, the son of Shantanu, spoke these words to Duryodhana :

2. (Once on a time) Vrihaspati along with Shakra went to Brhama, as also did the Maruta with Indra, and the Vasus with Agni.

3. The Adityas, the Sadhyas, the seven heavenly Rishis, the Vishwvasu, the Gandharvas and beautiful cluster of the Apsaras,

4. Having saluted to that old grandsire of the universe, approached him and the dwellers of heaven sat round that lord of the universe.

5. As if attracting unto themselves by their own energy the intellects and energies of them all, the two ancient Rishis, Nara and Narayana, departed.

6. Vrihaspati too asked Brahma "who are these two, who, O grandsire, without worshipping you, go away. Tell us that."

Brahma said :—

7. These two ascetics blazing, as it were, with beauty, and illuminating the earth and heaven and possessed of great energy went away.

8. They are Nara and Narayana who have just come from the earth and are at present staying in these regions. With the fruits of their own asceticism they are resplendant and are possessed of great energy and prowess.

9. These two by their acts ever bring rejoicing to the worlds; they worshipped by the gods and the Gandharvas live for the destruction of the Asuras.

10. Shakra having heard this went to the place where these two were practising their devotions, in company with all that host of gods with Vrihaspati going in front of them.

11. At the time, among the dwellers of the heaven there was a great panic owing to a battle between the gods and the Asuras, and they (the gods) asked a boon of the noble-souled Nara and Narayana.

12. Those two then said "Choose (the boon)," O best of the race of Bharata. Shakra then said to those two—"make us invincible".

13. Then did the two tell Shakra,—“we shall do what you wish.” Then aided by them Shakra triumphed over the Daityas and the Danavas.

14. That excellent among the ascetics, Nara, having killed the enemies in the battle for Indra; (killed) hundreds and thousands of Poulomas and Kalakanjas.

15. Seated on a revolving car, this Arjuna, by means of a broad-headed arrow, cut down the head of Jambha, who had opened his mouth to swallow him.

16. He penetrated into Hiranyapura, on the other side of the sea, after vanquishing in battle sixty thousands of Nivatakavachas.

17. This Arjuna, the conqueror of hostile cities, of long arms gratified the god of fire by conquering the gods with Indra.

18. In the same way Narayana has in this world killed innumerable other (Asuras); such are these two of great prowess that are seen to be united together,

19. The son of Vamdeva, and Arjuna, the two great heroic car-warriors that have now allied together are the two ancient gods, Nara and Narayana. Such is the general belief.

20. Incapable of being vanquished by men in this world and by the gods and Asuras with Indra, this Krishna is Narayana and this son of Falguni, Nara, which the holy books declare. Narayana and Nara are of the same essence split up into two.

21. These two by their acts attain to several eternal and inexhaustible regions and are born in those places again and again in times of war.

22. Therefore is war their duty. This what Narada conversant with the Vedas has said to the race of the Vrishnis.

23. When you will see Keshava with the conch, the disc and the mace in his hand, and Arjuna with that terrific-looking bow taking up weapons—

24. The two eternal and noble-souled Krishnas seated on the same chariot, O Duryodhana, O dear, then will you remember my words.

25. Otherwise why should the sons of Kuru have come to this state. Your intellect, O dear, has fallen off from both virtue and worldly profit.

26. If you do not accept my advice; then you will hear of the slaying of numerous men of your army; my advice is listened to by all the sons of Kuru.

27. The advice of the three persons you alone listen to, O bull among the race of Bharata,—viz Karna, who was cursed by Rama,

28. The son of Suta, a low born fellow, Shakuni, the son of Suvala, and your little minded vicious brother Dusasana.

Karna said :—

29. It is not proper for you, O grandfather, to say to me the words you have spoken. I observe the rules of the Kshatriya caste and am not fallen from my own virtue.

30. What vice is there in one for which you revile me so; the son of Dhritarashtra knows that there is no sin in me.

31. I have never been without the slightest injury towards the son of Dhritarashtra, and I shall kill all the sons of Pandu, engaged in battle.

32. How can these that are honest be reconciled with those that were formerly their enemies. The interest of king Dhritarashtra is ever looked after by me, and the same of Duryodhana; he is now established in the kingdom.

Vaishampayana said :—

33. Bhima, the son of Shantanu, having heard the words of Karna, again addressing the great king Dhritarastra, said these words:

34. Though he ever says "I shall be the slayer of the son of Pandu", yet he is not even one sixteenth part of these large-hearted sons of Pandu.

35. The great calamity, that is about to come on your sons of wicked souls, know that it is the work of this son of Suta of wicked mind.

36. Your son Suyodhana of weak intellect depending on him for support has insulted those heroic sons of godly men, the subduer of their foes.

37. What difficult task is there that has before been accomplished by him which is equal to what has been done by each of the sons of Pandu in days gone by,

38. Having seen in the city of Virata his dear brother killed by Dhananjaya who evinced a great deal of prowess, what did he do at that time.

39. When Dhananyaya rushing against all the Kurus and smashing them dispossessed them of their clothes, what did he then do.

40. When your son was being taken as a captive towards the Ghoshajatra by the Gandharvas, where was then the son of Suta, who is now roaring like a bull.

41. Even in that case it was Bhima and the large minded Partha, who aided by the twins vanquished those Gandharvas.

42. These are the many unfounded statements that he makes; for he is boastful and regards not either morality or worldly profit. May good betide you.

43. The son of Bharadwaja of large mind having heard the words of Bhishma spoke thus to Dhritarastra, among the assembled kings after duly saluting him.

44. What the chief among the race of Bharata, Bhishma, has said—do that, O protector of men. It is not proper that you should do what they that covet desire and wealth tell you to do.

45. Before the battle, I think that peace with the Pandavas seems to be the best. What has been prophesied by Arjuna and submitted to us by Sanjaya,

46. Will all be done by the son of Pandu, I know. In the three worlds there is no wielder of the bow equal to him.

47. Minding not however the speeches of Drona and Bhishma, which were good advices, the king asked Sanjaya about the sons of Pandu.

48. From that time did all the Kurus despair of their lives, when the king did not give a proper reply to the speeches of Bhishma and Drona.

Thus ends the forty-ninth chapter in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER L.

(YANASINDHI PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. What did the son of Dharma, the king of the Pandavas, say after hearing that several armies had collected here for our help.

2. What preparations are Yudhisthira, who is ready for war, making? Who among his sons and brothers are looking up to his face desirous of receiving his orders?

3. Who among them again dissuades him from war, saying—"Be peaceful"—him who knows the nature of virtue and who practises virtue and who has been moved to wrath by the wrong done by the wicked ones (my sons).

Sanjaya said :—

4. All the Panchalas, along with the Pandavas, are looking up to the face of the king Yudhisthira and he, good betide you, rules over them all.

5. Hosts of cars belonging to the Panchalas are coming separately and inspire joy into the heart of Yudhisthira, the son of Kunti.

6. The Panchalas like a cluster of rays gladden the heart of the son of Kunti, who is of effulgent prowess, like the sun rising making the sky look cheerful.

7. Down to the very herdsmen who look after cattle and sheep, the tribes of Panchalas, Kekaya, and Matsyas gladden the heart of Yudhisthira, the Pandu king.

8. The daughters of Brahmanas and of chieftains and of the Vaisyas, while playing, come to Partha to see him clad in a coat of mail.

Dhritarastra said :—

9. O Sanjaya, tell us about those with whose aid that Pandu king will fight, viz., the army of Dhristadyumna and of the Somakas.

Vaishampayana said :—

10. The son of Gavalgani, being thus questioned in that council of the assembly of Kurus, and having drawn long sighs, again and again became thoughtful for a moment.

11. Without any reason, as if by the hand of the gods, the Suta suddenly fell down. Then in that assembly of kings, in that council chamber, Vidura said loudly ;

12. This Sanjaya, O great king, has fallen down senseless ; and he can not utter one word bereft of his wisdom.

Dhritarastra said :—

13. Sanjaya, seeing these mighty car-warriors, the sons of Kunti, has certainly got his mind excited owing to those tigers among men.

Vaishampayana said :—

14. Sanjaya having regained consciousness and being comforted addressed these words to the great king, Dhritarastra, amidst that assemblage of Kurus in that hall.

Sanjaya said :—

15. I have seen, O chief among kings, those mighty car-warriors, the sons of Kunti, grown lean through the restraint in which they lived in the court of the Matsya king.

16. Hear, O great king, aided by whom the Pandavas will fight. There will he fight between yourselves and them, aided by the hero Dhristadyumna.

17. That man of virtuous soul who, through wealth and fear, avarice or wealth, or for the sake of argument never falls from truth.

18. Who is an authority, O great king, in religious matters, and who is the chief among men attached to virtue, who has created no enemies, aided by him the Pandavas will fight with you.

19. Whose equal in strength of arms there is none in this world ; that wielder of the bow who subdued all protectors of the earth and who subjugated in battle the people of Kashi, Anga, and Magadha and also the Kalingas.

20. With that Bhimasena the Pandavas will fight with you ;—and through whose prowess the four Pandavas came down.

21. After issuing from the house of lac, Vrikodara, the son of Kunti, who became the means of their rescue from Hidimba, the man eater,

22. That son of Kunti, Vrikodara, who became the means of rescue at the time when Sindhuraja was gratifying his lust on the daughter of Yajnasena ;

23. Aided by him who liberated all the assembled Pandavas when they were burning at the conflagration of Varanavata they will fight against you.

24. Aided by him whom to gratify Krishna (Draupadi) killed the Krodhabasas after penetrating into the terrific mountain Gandhamadana.

25. By him whose substantial arms the strength of ten thousand elephants has been given—by the aid of such Brahma will the Pandavas fight with you.

26. That hero who, in days of old, for the satisfaction of the god of fire, aided by Krishna, conquered Purandara (Indra) fighting,

27. He who passed by his fight that god among gods, the lord of Uma—that Mahadeva himself, with the trident in his hand, that lord of the mountains,

28. That wielder of the bow, who subjugated all the rulers of the earth by the aid of that Bijoya will the Pandavas fight.

29. He, who subjugated the western country inhabited by hordes of Mlechhas,—that warrior Nakula of wonderful weapons is present in their camp.

30. With that beautiful hero, that excellent wielder of thy bow, the son of Madra, O Kurus, will the sons of Pandu fight.

31. He whose might is equalled by only four men in this world, Ashwathaman, Dhristaketu, Rukmi and Pradyumna ;

32. With that Sahadeva, with that hero among men, and with that joy-giver to Madri, O king, will you have a great fight.

33. The chaste woman, the daughter of the king of Kasi, who practised austere asceticism, who was desirous of the destructions of Bhishma even after death (i. e. in another birth) O bull of the race of Bharata,

34. Was born as the daughter of the king of Panchala, and by the hand of the gods she became a male afterwards ; that one, O tiger among men, who knows the virtues and vices of female-males,

35. Who fought with the Kalingas, that prince of Panchala, hard to vanquish in battle—with that Shikhandin skillful in the use of weapons will they fight with you, the Kurus.

36. She who was turned into a male through a desire for the death of Bhishma, with that terrific Bowman will the Pandavas fight.

37. With those five Kekya princes, brothers to one another and mighty bow-men, with these herce; with the coats of arms on will they fight with you.

38. With that herce among the race of the Vrihnis, of long arms, of great activity in the use of weapons, possessed of true strength, with that Suyodhana will you have to fight.

39. He who has been the protector of the great-souled Pandavas for a time, with that Virata will you meet in battle.

40. He who is the Lord of Kasi, the car-warrior who is the king of Baranasi, has become their warrior, with him they will fight with you.

41. With the children hard to vanquish, the sons of Draupadi of noble souls, who are like snakes, will the Pandavas fight.

42. He who is like Krishna in strength and like Yudhisthira in self-control, with that Abhimanya will the Pandavas fight.

43. Dhristaketu of great fame, who is of unparalleled strength, who wrathful in battle is hard to vanquish, that son of Sisupala, a great car-warrior,

44. With him, the king of the Chedis who has come and joined the Pandavas with an Akshauhini, will the Pandavas fight.

45. He who is the refuge of the Pandavas as Vasava is of the gods, with that Vamdeva will the Pandavas fight.

46. So also will the brother of the king of the Chedis, Sharava, O bull of the race of Bharata who is accompanied by Karakara—with these two will the Pandavas fight.

47. The son of Jarasandha, Sahadeva, and Sayatsena, both of whom are unrivalled heroes in battle, are present in the cause of the Pandavas.

48. Drupada too of great prowess and surrounded by a large force has sacrificed his interests for the Pandava's cause and desirous of fighting is present.

49. These and many others come from the countries in the East and the North—depending on hundreds of them the king Dharma is prepared for battle.

Thus ends the fiftieth chapter, the speech of Sanjaya, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LI.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. All these who have been enumerated by you are of great energy and courage; but Bhima alone is equal to all of them combined.

2. From Bhimasena wrathful I have very great fear like that of a large deer from an enraged tiger.

3. I am awake during entire nights breathing large and hot sighs, being afraid of Vrikodara, O dear, as any other animal fears a lion.

4. In this entire army do I not see one who can withstand in battle this one of long arms and having strength like that of Shakra.

5. That son of Kunti and Pandu when wrathful is an implacable enemy; and he smiles not even in jest, and is mad with rage, looks at things askance and is of loud voice,

9. Possessed of great force, and of great energy, possessed of long arms and of great strength will put an end to the existence of any wicked sons in battle.

7. Vrikodara, that bull in the race of Kuru, wielding the mace slay them struck by a heavy calamity in battle like the god of death with his staff in his hand.

8. That terrible steel mace with eight-sides and ornamented with gold I now see in my mind like the staff of Brahma uplifted.

9. As a fully grown up lion roams among a herd of deer, so will Bhima roam among my army.

10. Towards all my sons he alone (of all his brothers) showed his cruel strength. A voracious eater, and endued with great strength, even in his childhood was he inimical (to my sons).

11. My heart quakes that Duryodhana and other sons of mine even when fighting with him in their childhood were smashed as by elephants.

12. Oppressed by his strength my sons have ever been; and that Bhima of terrible prowess is the cause of this rupture.

13. Devouring my army composed of men, elephants, and horses, do I see Bhima in the front senseless with wrath,

14. In arms equal to Drona and Arjuna and in speed having the force of wind, in wrath equal to Maheshwara himself, who will kill Bhima in battle—

15. O Sanjaya, that hero, the wrathful Bhimasena; tell me that; it is a great gain I consider, that by that slayer of enemies

16. My sons were not all killed—by that one of independent mind by whom Jakhas of terrible strength and the Rakshashas were killed in days of old.

17. How can a man withstand the force of him in battle. He was not under my control even in his childhood, O Sanjaya.

18. How can that son of Pandu do so now having been wronged by my wicked sons. Cruel and wrathful, he could not bend even when broken. Looking at things askance, with his eyebrows contracted, how can Vrikodara be peaceful.

19. A hero of exceedingly white complexion and tall like the palm tree, Bhimasena measures a Pradesha (the span of a thumb) more than Arjuna.

20. Surpassing in speed the horses, in strength the elephants, the second son of Pandu who is of great strength has sweet eyes

21. The Pandava in form and power just as I heard from the lips of Vyasa in days gone by ;

22. Easily by means of his mace, the chariots, the elephants, men and horses he will kill in battle,—that terrible being when wrathful, that man of cruel purposes,

23. That wrathful Bhima, who is ever furious—that chief among the smiters has by acting against my wishes, O dear, before been insulted by me.

24. That mace which has no curves, which is made of steel, which is of bulk, of beautiful sides, adorned with gold, which is capable of killing a hundred, and when flung producing a terrible sound—how will my sons bear ?

25. That inaccessible ocean, which has no shore, which is unfathomable and which has currents in the shape of Bhima, those wicked ones are desirous of crossing over,

26. Those children thinking themselves to be wise do not listen to my words, even if I cry out. Seeing the honey (formerly collected on mountain tops) they do not care for the heavy fall.

27. Those who encounter in battle that death in human shape have their dooms settled by the father of the universe, like those of large deers encountering lions,

28. How shall my sons bear, O dear, the mace when flung at them—the mace which is four cubits long, having six sides of illimitable powers of destruction, and terrible to touch.

29. Whirling the mace and piercing the heads of elephants, licking the corners of his lips and giving out (terrific) breaths every moment,

30. Making terrific noises in return of those of falling elephants and rushing with loud roars against elephants coming against him,

31. Having penetrated into the place where the chariots stand, when he kills the heroes after taking aim against them, will one of my soldiers escape from him who is blazing like fire ?

32. Grinding the four elements of my army and cutting his passage out through it, as if dancing with the mace in his hand, he will show (to people) the scene which takes place at the end of a Yuga (universal destruction).

33. Like an elephant mad with rage, breaking trees with flowers, Vrikodara will crush the army of my sons in battle.

34. Rendering the chariots devoid of men, drivers, horses and banners and giving trouble to the warriors fighting from cars and elephants, the tiger among men,

35. Like the force of the currents of the Ganga uprooting various sorts of trees, will vanquish in battle the army of my sons, O Sanjaya.

36. My sons with their servants and subordinate chiefs, O Sanjaya, troubled with the fear of Bhimasena will certainly fly in different directions,

37. (That Bhimasena) by whom, aided by the son of Vasudeva, the king Jarasandha of great prowess was killed after his inner apartments being entered in the days of old.

38. The goddess Earth was brought under control by the wise Jarasandha and that mighty Lord of Magadha, who subjugated her and oppressed her people.

39. That the Kurus through the prowess of Bhima and the Andhakas and the Vrishnis, and through their diplomacy, were not brought under subjection by them, which was only due to the gods.

40. The son of Pandu, the hero of long arms, having approached him without any arms, killed him. What can be more (wonderful) than this ?

41. Like a venomous snake having accumulated its poison for a long time, he (Bhima) will fling his strength on my sons in the field of battle, O Sanjaya.

42. Like that chief among the gods, great Indra with his thunderbolt (killing) the Danavas, Bhimasena with mace in his hand will kill my sons.

43. I see (in my mind) Vrikodara having eyes of the colour of copper, incapable of being opposed or prevented and having fearful force of strength falling on (my sons).

44. Who can stay in front of that man fighting with his two arms without mace or bow and without being on his car.

45. Bhishma, this regenerate Drona, Kripa, and also the son of Sharadwata—all these know as much as I do the prowess of that wise one.

46. Conversant with the habits of life of the virtuous, and desirous of death in battle, those bulls among men in our party will stand in front of the army.

47. Destiny is always powerful specially in a man though I see them (the Pandavas) victorious, yet I do not dissuade my sons.

48. They (the warriors of our party), desirous of going along the eternal, noble and heavenly path, will part with their lives in fierce battle thus keeping thy earthly fame unsullied.

49. As these are, O dear, to my sons, so are they to the Pandavas (in ties of blood and affection). They (the Pandavas) are grandsous of Bhishma and disciples of Drona and Kripa.

50. The protection that we have afforded to the three-aged ones, the little we have given them, and the little good we have done to them, they will compensate us for that in return owing to their noble nature.

51. That death of a Kshatriya is said to be a peaceful and commendable one, which is met with in battle when one takes up arms desirous of observing Kshatriya practices.

52. I grieve however for all those who will fight with the son of Pandu; the calamity prophesied by Vidura is now come.

53. I consider, O Sanjaya, that knowledge cannot destroy woe; in fact, it is excessive distress that kills knowledge.

54. Even the Rishis who are emancipated and who merely look on this crowd of men become happy at prosperity and agrieved at adversity.

55. Why then should I not be affected by grief. When I am attached to my sons, my kindom, my wife, my grandsons, my friends and a thousand other objects.

56. I have grave doubts that I shall have any prosperity in the future; thinking thus I see (in my mind) the destruction of the Kurus.

57. The great calamity of the Kurus beginning with the game at dice now stands out in bold relief; this wicked act has been done by that fool desiring for prosperity out of avarice.

58. I consider this to be the work of Eternal Time. I am not able to fly from it like the iron ring attached to the wheel.

59. What shall I do? how shall I do it and where shall I go, O Sanjaya? These foolish Kurus will be destroyed being subject to the effects of time.

60. I shall be helpless, O dear, on my hundred sons being killed and shall hear the loud lamentation of women. How shall death touch me?

61. As in the hot season a fire ignited and urged by wind burns up dry grass, so will the son of Pandu, having mace in hand along with Arjuna, be the slayer of my party.

Thus ends the fifty-first chapter, the repentance of Dhritarashtra, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LII.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarashtra said:—

1. He, from whom we have never heard an untruthful word, he who has Dhananjaya to fight for him can possess himself the three worlds.

2. I do not see any one equal in battle to the one who has the Gandiva bow, who seated on a car could oppose him, though I think about it day and night.

3. There is no equal in battle of the wielder of the Gandiva bow shooting winged arrows, Nalikas (muskets) and arrows penetrating into the heart.

4. If the two heroes, these bulls among men, Drona and Karna, skillful in the use of weapons, the chief among those having strength and unconquerable in battle, oppose him;

5. There may be great doubts among other men, but (I am afraid) victory will not be mine. Karma is careless and compassionate and the preceptor is old in age and is beside the preceptor (of the Pandavas).

6. Partha of firm grasp on the bow however is able, mighty and has conquered fatigue; there will be terrible fight between them, but both sides will remain undefeated.

7. All of these are heroes knowing the use of weapons and all of them have gained great fame, they may forego even the lordship over all the gods but not victory (in this battle).

8. The two (Drona and Karna) or the son of Falguna being killed, there will certainly be peace; but there is none who can kill Arjuna, nor one who can conquer him.

9. How can his wrath that has arisen against those foolish ones be pacified; there are others knowing the use of weapons, who conquer (others) and (sometimes) are conquered (by those).

10. But the rumour is that Falguna (when fighting) has but one result—victory; thirty three years ago (he) having invited the god of fire gratified him.

11. Having first vanquished the gods; no man ever heard of his defeat anywhere. He who has for his charioteer in battle Hrishikesha is equal to him in character.

12. He has victory certain, O dear, as the victory of Indra. The two Krishnas on one car, and the stringed Gandiva bow, 13. These three forces have come together, I hear; there is no similar bow, nor a warrior of that stamp, nor a charioteer of that character.

14. Those fools under the control of Duryodhana do not know this. The thunderbolt falling on the head ablaze leaves some remnants undestroyed, O Sanjaya;

15. But the shafts shot by Kiritin leaves no remnant, O dear. I see now (in my mind) Dhananjaya shining forth by working havoc;

16. And by his shower of arrows separating heads from the bodies. (I see) also his strength in the shape of arrows blazing in all directions,

17. And coming out of the Gandiva bow and burning up the four elements of the army of my sons. (I see) also that struck with fear from the sound of Savyasachin's chariot

18. My army consisting of numerous forces are flying away in all directions. As a great fire raging in all directions burns up withered grass urged by the wind, so will the great fire (in the shape of Arjuna's weapons) consume my army.

19. When Kiritin, incapable of being withstood, opposing them (my men) in battle will shoot destructive showers of arrows upon them, it will be like the king of death directed by the all-destroying Father.

20. When I shall see and hear innumerable kinds of evil omens in the camp of the Kurus, and around them and before the battle, then will destruction come to the race of Bharata.

CHAPTER LIII.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. As the sons of Pandu are all powerful and desirous of victory, so are their followers who are self-sacrificing and have set their mind on victory.

2. You have related to me about those mighty foes of mine—of the kings of the Panchalas, Kekayas, Matsyas, Magadhas.

3. Even that mighty one who by his mere wish could bring under control these worlds with Indra, that creator of the world, Krishna, has set his mind on the victory of the Pandavas.

4. Satyaki very quickly obtained all knowledge (of the use of arms) from Arjuna and the son of Shini will stand on the field of battle and shoot arrows as (men) sow the seeds.

5. Dhristadyumna, the king of Panchalas, of cruel deeds and a mighty car-warrior, and well acquainted with the use of superior weapons, too, will fight with my army.

6. From the wrath of Yudhishthira and from the prowess of Arjuna and from the twins and also from Bhimasena, do I derive great fear, O dear.

7. On a superhuman net (of arrows) being spread over my army, they will not be able to get out of it; therefore do I weep, O Sanjaya.

8. Beautiful, independent, endued with prosperity and with the force of Brahma, intelligent, of great wisdom, and of virtuous soul, is that son of Pandu (Yudhishthira).

9. With friends and counsellors and surrounded by men prepared for battle, and also by brothers, fathers-in-law who are all excellent heroes and eminent car-warriors,

10. The son of Pandu, that tiger among men, is also graced with patience, secrecy, humanity, benevolence, modesty, truth, and prowess.

11. Versed in the knowledge of holy books, having self-control, attending to the old, is that one who has subdued his senses and is possessed of every virtue, and he is like a blazing fire.

12. What fool, about to die, and who has lost his consciousness is there who will fall into the unextinguishable fire of the Pandavas ablaze like a moth.

13. That king resembling a fire of high and long flames has been treated deceitfully by me and he will, in battle, put an end to the existence of all my sons of weak intellect.

14. I consider that it is best not to fight with them ; ye, Kurus, follow that (my opinion). If you wage war, destruction will surely overtake the race which will be extinct.

15. This appears to me very clear and by acting in accordance with it my mind will obtain peace. If you consider that peace with them is desirable, then we shall try for peace.

16. Yudhisthira will never adopt an attitude of indifference towards ourselves, when distressed ; he blames me by ascribing unrighteousness, thinking me to be the cause (of the war).

Thus ends the fifty-third chapter, the speech of Dhritarashtra, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LIV.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. It is, O great king, as you say, O Bharata. The destruction of the Kshatriyas by war with the Gandiva bow seems apparent.

2. I do not know how it is that you, who are ever wise and know about the attributes of Savyasachin, allow yourself to be controlled by your sons.

3. This is not the time, O great king, (to give way to grief) ; for you have repeatedly wronged them. By you in the beginning were the Parthas exiled, O bull among the race of Bharata.

4. A father is the best friend, and he should guide well those who are his own selves. Their welfare should be sought after carefully ; but he, who overlooks this duty, cannot be called a superior.

5. Hearing of the defeat (at the game), like a boy you laughed out, O great king, saying—"this is gained, this is won".

6. Formerly you neglected the Parthas, who were being addressed in harsh words thinking that the kingdom had been acquired (by your sons). You did not then foresee this fall.

7. The country of the Kurus, with Jangala, O great king, is your ancestral kingdom ; but you have possessed yourself the entire kingdom subjugated by the heroes.

8. The kingdom acquired by their arms and prowess was made over to you by the Parthas, and you think,—“it has been acquired by me,” O best of kings.

9. Your sons, O best of kings, overpowered by the king of the Gandharvas, and thus sinking as it were in a shoreless ocean, were brought back by Partha.

10. Like a boy, too, did you repeatedly laugh at the defeat (of the Pandavas) at dice and also when they were wandering about being exiled.

11. At the shower, by Arjuna, of a great many sharp edged arrows, even the oceans dry up, not to speak of those things, that owe their origin to flesh.

12. Among the shooters of arrows, the son of Falguna is the chief ; among the bows the Gandiva is the best ; Kesava is the chief of all creatures ; and the Sudarsana, among weapons.

13. Of all things having banners the one shining with the banner and having the device of an ape (is the foremost). The car, having all these and having many white horses in battle,

14. Will overthrow us, O king, like the uplifted wheel of Death. To-day, the entire earth is his, O king, O bull of the race of Bharata.

15. He who has the two warriors, Bhima, and Arjuna, on his side, O best of kings, is the king seeing your army nearly killed by Bhima.

16. The Kauravas, headed by Duryodhana, will be destroyed, struck by the terror of Bhima and Arjuna ; and victory will not be gained, O Lord,

17. By your son, O great king, or by the kings who are his followers. The king of the Matsyas does not pay you homage now ; nor does the Panchala with the Kekayas ;

18. Nor do the Shalwas and the Surasenas. All disregard you. All of them have gone over to the side of Partha, well knowing the heroism of that wise one.

19—20. Out of regard for him, they are ever against your sons. He who troubles the sons of Pandu endued with virtue and undeserving of injury by unworthy actions, and he who despises them even now,—that evil-minded man, along with his followers, should be checked by all means.

21. It is not proper, O great king, that you should grieve for your sons. At the time of the game at dice, all this was predicted by me, as also by the wise Vidura.

22. All these lamentations of yours for the sons of Pandu, O Bharata, as if you had no hand in the matter, are all useless, O chief among kings.

Thus ends the fifty-fourth chapter, the speech of Sanjaya, in the Yanasandhi, of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LV.

Duryodhana said :—

1. There is nothing to fear, O great king ; nor should you grieve for us. We are capable, O king, of winning victory over our battle, O king.

2. When the slayer of Madhu came to the sons of Pritha wandering in exile in the forest with a large army capable of subjugating the kingdom of the enemies,

3. And when Kekaya, Dhristaketu, Dhristadyumna of the race of Prishata, and many other kings followed them to the sons of Pritha,

4. And when not far from Indra Prastha there assembled together the car-warriors, and having joined together, they blamed you along with the Kurus,

5. And when they, with Krishna at their head, paid homage to Yudhishthira, who was wearing deer skin, O Bharata,

6. And when the rulers of men spoke of giving back the duties of a king (to Yudhishthira), and they longed to bring about the overthrow of yourself with all your followers,

7. Then were Bhisma, Drona and Kripa thus addressed by me, who heard this, through fear of the ruin of our cousins, O king :

8. That the sons of Pandu will abide by the terms agreed to, is my opinion ; our destruction does the son of Vasudeva desire.

9. That with the exception of Vidura, will you be slain, is my opinion ; and Dhritarastra, who knows the nature of virtue—that best one among the Kurus cannot possibly be slain.

10. O dear, having effected our extinction, Janardana desires to bestow on Yudhishthira the entire kingdom of the Kurus.

11. When the time comes, what should we do ? Surrender or fly or shall we fight against the enemies and give up (all hopes of) our lives.

12. In a fight against them, defeat shall surely be ours ; all the rulers are on the side of Yudhishthira.

13. On their being dispossessed of their kingdom, our friends are angry with us ; and we are reviled by all the kings and by all our kinsmen.

14. There is no objection to our surrender ; for men on our position seek peace from a long time ; but I grieve for my father, that lord of men, who has his wisdom only for his eyes,

15. And who may for my doings be beset with troubles and endless woes. The enemies were opposed by your sons simply for our good ; which is known to you before, O best among men.

16. The sons of Pandu, these mighty car-warriors, will have their revenge for their wrongs by the extinction of the race of the king Dhritarastra with that of his ministers.

17. Then did Drona and Bhima and Kripa and the son of Drona thus speak, O Bharata, thinking me to be in the midst of great anxiety and with the senses tortured.

18. The enemies ready to fight need not be feared, O subduer of foes ; for the foes when in the battle field are incapable of conquering us.

19. Each one of us by himself can conquer all the rulers of the earth. Let them come ; we shall curb their pride by sharp arrows,

20. In days of old, all the rulers of the earth were conquered by the single Bhima seated on the single-car, extremely wrathful on the death of his father.

21. That best one among the race of the Kurus, wrathful, killed many among them (enemies) ; then they out of fear sought the protection of this Devavrata.

22. That Bhisma is well capable to fight along with us and to conquer the enemies ; therefore, O bull among the race of Bharata, let your fears be dispelled.

23. Such was the determination, at that time, of these ones of immeasurable prowess. In days of old the earth was under the possession of the enemies.

24. Now they are not capable of again conquering us ; the Pandavas are now shorn of their wings and devoid of strength.

25. The earth, too, O bull among the race of Bharata, is now under our subjection and the rulers of the earth assembled are of the same mind with me in happiness or misery.

26. O subduer of foes, for my sake, the rulers of the earth, can enter into fire or even the ocean ; know this, O you best among the race of Kurus.

27. In this case they laugh at you, who are grieved and like one insane, and giving vent to many sorts of lamentations, struck with fear by the descriptions of the enemies.

28. Each of these kings by himself are capable of opposing the Pandavas. Every one considers himself all in all. Let the fear which has come on you be dispelled.

29. To conquer my entire army, Basava even is not able; this army, which is endless, can not be annihilated even by Brahma, who is born of himself.

30. That Yudhishthira foregoing his claims to the entire kingdom begs only five villages; he is afraid of my army and my prowess, O Lord.

31. The impression you have of the might of Vrikodara, the son of Kunti, has no foundation; you do not know my prowess, O Bharata.

32. My equal in a fight with the mace, there is none in the world; there has been none my equal, nor will there be any.

33. Suffering a lot of troubles, and employing myself earnestly to my task, have I lived at the abode of my preceptor and learnt my lessons; therefore have I not the slightest fear from Bhima, nor from any other.

34. In a fight with the mace there is none equal to Duryodhana—this is sure; for he used to live with Sankarshana (his preceptor), good betide thee.

35. In a fight I am Sankarshana's equal and in strength there is none my equal in the world; Bhima will not be able to bear the blows of my mace in battle.

36. Being enraged, the one blow that I shall deal Bhima, O king, will strike him severely and speedily send him to the palace of death.

37. I am desirous, O king, to see Vrikodara with the mace in his hand; this has been prayed for by me for a long time,—this has ever been the desire of my heart.

38. Struck by me with the mace, Vrikodara, the son of Pritha, will fall lifeless on the ground with his body smashed.

39. Struck by a blow from my mace, even the Himavat mountain can be split up into a hundred thousand pieces.

40. It is very well known to both Vasudeva and Arjuna that it is certain that in a fight with the mace there is none equal to Duryodhana.

41. There let your fear proceeding from Vrikodara be dispelled; for I shall kill this one. Do not, O king, yield to grief.

42. He being slain by me, many car-warriors, endued with similar qualities, speedily throw down Arjuna, O bull among the race of Bharata.

43. Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Drona's son, and Bhurisaba, Shalya, the king of the Pragyotish and Jayadratha, the king of the Sindhus,—

44. Each one of these by himself is competent to kill the Pandavas, O Bharata, Acting together they will in an instant bring them to the abode of death.

45. There is no reason why the entire army of the kings on one side is incapable of conquering the single Dhananjaya. Covered by arrows shot by Bhishma a hundred times,

46. And by Drona, his son and Kripa, this son of Pritha will go to the region of the dead. Born of Ganga, our grandfather, too, is superior to the son of Shantanu, O Bharata.

47. Like a Brahmarshi (a devotee of the first rank and order) he was born among men and is hard to be vanquished even by the gods. There is no slayer of Bhishma, O king.

48. This boon was granted by his father who was gratified: 'You will not die without your own desire. Drona was born of the Brahmarshi Bharadwaja in a water pot.

49. From Drona was born his son, well acquainted with the use of arms. This Kripa, too, is the foremost among the preceptors and was born of the great Rishi Gautama.

50. This one, endued with prosperity and born in a clump of heath, is incapable of being killed, such is my impression. Then, too, the father, mother and maternal uncle of Ashwathaman did not take their birth in a woman's womb.

51. That hero, too, is on my side. All these, O great king, are car-warriors equal to the gods themselves.

52. They are capable even of giving trouble to Shakra himself in battle. Arjuna is not capable even of gazing at any of them by himself;

53. And these tigers among men united together will kill Dhananjaya. Bhishma, Drona and Kripa together are equal to Karna,—such is my opinion.

54. He has been told by Rama: you are equal to me, O Bharata. Two beautiful and blessed ear-rings Karna had from his very birth.

55. These two were asked by the great Indra himself for the sake of Sachi, O subduer of foes, in exchange, O great king of greatly terrific strength and infallible.

56. How can Dhananjaya escape (after a struggle with) from him who is thus protected; therefore is my victory certain, O king, as a fruit comes within the grasp of my two hands.

57. Our defeat and the success of enemies, too, are proclaimed in the world. In one day this Bhishma kills ten thousand (enemies), O Bharata.

58. The mighty bowmen, Drona, his son, and Kripa, are equal to him (in this respect). Then, too, the ranks of the Sansaptaka Kshatriyas, O subduer of foes,—

59. These determined on the destruction of Savyasachin have made this resolution in their mind : 'Either we shall kill Arjuna, or that one having the figure of a monkey on his flag will kill us.'

60. Such are the kings (on my side) ; why do you all on a sudden express fear for the enemies. Bhimasena being slain, what other warriors will fight, O Bharata.

61. If you know any among the enemies (who will) thus tell me of him, O subduer of enemies. The five brothers along with Dhristadyumna and Satyaki—

62. These seven warriors whom you consider to be the best among the enemies and the accomplished warriors on our side are Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, and others,

63. The son of Drona, Karna, Somadatta, Valhika, Shalya the king of the Pragjyotish, the two kings of Avanti and Jayadratha,

64. And Dussasana, Durmukha, Dussaha, O lord of the world, Srutayudhi, Chitrasena, Purumitra, Vivansati,

65. Shala, Bhurisravas, and Vikarna, thy sons. These two can never be equal. Ten and one Akshauhini have been brought together by me, O king.

66. That of the enemies is less, it is only seven ; why thus should defeat be mine ; an army less by a third should be fought with, said Vrihaspati. My army, O king, exceeds that of the enemy by a third.

67. Then again do I see the enemy without any accomplishment, O Bharata ; while ours, many accomplishments.

68. O lord, knowing well all this—the superiority of my army, O Bharata ; and the inferior number of the Pandavas,—it is not proper that you should lose your senses.

69. Having thus addressed, he asked again of Sanjaya, O Bharata, desirous of knowing more of the enemies thinking that the proper time has come.

Thus ends the fifty-fifth chapter, the speech of Duryodhana, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LVI.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—Continued,

Duryodhana said :—

1. Having obtained an army of seven Akshauhini, what does Yudhishthira, the son of Kunti, desirous of war, do along with the other kings.

Sanjaya said :—

2. Yudhishthira, desirous of war, is extremely cheerful ; and the two, Bhimasena and Arjuna, are not otherwise. The twins too, are not afraid.

3. The son of Kunti, roamed about in his heavenly car in all directions. Bibhatsu, yoked the horses to it to test the efficacy of the Mantras (obtained by him).

4. I beheld him, with his coat of mail on, like clouds with lightning. After thinking for a short time he addressed me thus with a light heart.

5. See these signs of prophecy ; we will conquer, O Sanjaya, what Bibhatsu told me. I also saw the truth of this.

Duryodhana said :—

6. You are pleased at praising those sons of Pritha, who were defeated at the game at dice. Tell me now what sort of horses are attached to the car of Arjuna, and what sort of banners.

Sanjaya said :—

7. Tashtri or Bhaumana and Dhatri, aided by Shakra thought out, O lord of the world, diverse forms ;

8. And those forms they included in the banner by the help of divine illusion—these forms, large and small, of heavenly origin and of great value.

9. At the request of Bhimasena, Hanumat, the son of the god of wind, will place his own figure on that banner.

10. Such is the illusion produced by Bhaumana, that the banner occupies the space of one Yojana in all directions, both perpendicularly and obliquely ; and though surrounded by trees its progress cannot be obstructed.

11. The banner designed by Bhaumana and its form appear as of diverse sorts like the diverse colours of Shakra's bow, which appears in the sky ; but nobody knows what it is made of.

12. As smoke mixed with fire mounts the sky appearing beautiful and holding its many colours, so the flag manufactured by Bhaumana has no weight and knows no impediment.

13. And to that (car) are yoked many excellent celestial horses, white in colour, presented by Chitraratha, and with the speed of wind. There is nothing in the world, or in the sky, or in the heavens, O king, which impedes their progress—not all things combined in this world. Their number of hundred would ever remain constant however often they may be slain. Such was the effect of a boon granted in ancient days.

14. In the same way, in the car of the king (Yudhisthira) are yoked large horses of the colour of ivory and of a strength similar to the king. The horses attached to Bhimasena's car are of the speed of wind, having the splendour of Rishis.

15. Horses of black bodies, with backs of variegated colour, like the Tittira bird, presented by his brother Falguna out of dearness, and possessed of better limbs than those of his heroic brother (Falguna,) bear Sahadeva cheerfully.

16. Horses superior of their race presented by the great Indra, and equal in speed to the wind, strong and speedy, bear the hero Nakula, the son of Madri, of Ajmida's race; even as they bear Indra himself, the enemy of Vritra.

17. Excellent horses of large size, of the same age as these, and of equal strength, of many colours, and great activity, presented by the gods, bear the princes, the sons of Subhadra and Draupadi.

Thus ends the fifty-sixth chapter, the speech of Sanjaya, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LVII.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. Whom have you, O Sanjaya, seen there coming out of love, and who will fight with the army of my sons on behalf of the sons of Pandu?

Sanjaya said:—

2. The chief of the Andhakas and Vrishnis,—Krishna have I seen come there; as also Chekitana, Yuyodhana and Satyaki.

3. The two famous and great car-warriors, proud among men, each with a separate Akshauhini of soldiers, have gone to the side of the Pandavas.

4. And the king of the Panchalas Drupada, surrounded by his ten heroic sons, of whom Satyajita is the best known, headed by Dhristadyumna, with an Akshauhini.

5. And protected by Shikhandien has joined them after well protecting the limbs of his soldiers, enhancing the honour of the Pandavas.

6. Virata, too, with his two sons Sankha and Uttara, and with the heroes S ryadatta and others headed by Madiraksha,

7. And with his brother, and sons, surrounded by an Akshauhini of troops, has joined the son of Pritha.

8. The king of Magadha, the son of Jarasandha, too, and Dhristaketu, the king of the Chedis—these two have come separately, each surrounded by an Akshauhini.

9. The five brothers of Kekaya, all having red flags, surrounded by an Akshauhini, have joined the sons of Pandu.

10. These parties and of their respective numbers have I seen come there, who will fight with the army of Dhritarastra, on behalf of the sons of Pandu.

11. He, who is acquainted with the human system of fight, is celestial, and is followed by the Gandharvas and by the Asuras—that great car-warrior, Dhristadyumna, is at the head of that army.

12. Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, O king, has been reserved as the share of Shikhandin. Virata will help him (the latter) along with the soldiers from Matsya.

13. The ruler of the Madras, endued with strength, has been reserved as the share of the eldest son of Pandu, through somebody in their party said that he was of opinion that the two did match very well.

14. Duryodhana with his son, and his hundred brothers, and the soldiers coming from the eastern and southern countries have fallen to the share of Bhimasena.

15. Arjuna has for his share Karna the son of Vikartana, Ashwathaman, Vikarna, and the king of Sindhu Jayadratha.

16. Whoever there is in this world who boasts that he is invincible. Arjuna, the son Pritha, has accepted all of them also as his share.

17. The great bowmen, the five Kakeya princes, brothers to one another, taking the Kakeya warriors (on the Kurus side) for his share, will fight in the battle.

18. In their share have also fallen the Malavas, the Shalwakas, and the two foremost of the Trigartas, who have resolved to win or to die.

19. In the same way all the sons of Duryodhana and Dusasana have been accepted by the son of Subhadra as his share, as also the king Vrihadvala,

20. The mighty bowmen, the sons of Draupadi, having their flag ornamented with gold, with Dhristadyumna at their head, will fight with Drona, O Bharata.

21. Chekitana desires to fight with Somadatta in single combat, each seated on his own car; and Yuyudhana is desirous of fighting against Krilavarma of the Bhoja tribe.

22. The son of Madri, the hero Sahadeva, who makes loud roars in battle, has accepted as his own share your brother the son of Suvala.

23. Uluka, the deceitful one, and hordes of Saraswata tribes have been accepted by Nakula, the son of Madrivati; as his own share.

24. The other rulers, too, O king, who will fight in the battle, have been assigned to the share of some one on their side by the sons of Pandu.

25. In this way has this army been divided into batches. Do whatever is to be done by you, along with your son, speedily.

Dhritarastra said :—

26. All my foolish sons, those addicted to the wicked dice who have taken it in their hand to fight with the powerful Bhima, have ceased to exist already.

27. The kings and the rulers, too, all consecrated by the king of death himself shall enter the Gandiva bow as moths fall on fire.

28. I see in my mind my army already routed by these large minded ones, whom I converted into enemies, who will follow them to battle, who have been routed by the Pandavas in fight.

29. All of them are extremely good warriors, heroes, famous and powerful and having might like that of the sun or fire, and victorious in battle.

30. Those whose leader is Yudhishthira, and whose protector is the slayer of Madhu, and whose warriors are the heroic sons of Pandu, Savyasachin and Vrikodara,

31. And Nakula, Sahadeva, Dhristadyumna, the son of Prishata, Satyki, Drupada, with his brother,

32. And the king of the Panchalas, endued with excellent prowess, and the invincible Yudhamanyu, and Shikhandin and Kshatradeva, and Utra the son of Virata,

33. And the Kashis, the Chedis, the Matsyas and all the Srinjayas, the son of Virata, Babhru, the Panchalas and the Prabhadrakas.

34. From these even Indra himself cannot wrest this Earth, if they are not so willing—the heroes, who are cool and composed in battle and who are capable even of breaking the mountains,

35. My wicked son desires to fight, O Sanjaya—these endued with all the virtues and endued with superhuman strength, disregard me who am loudly protesting.

Duryodhana said :—

36. Both the parties are of the same race and both roam about on the earth; why then do you regard victory as coming solely to the Pandavas.

37. Our grandfather Bhisma, Drona, Kripa, and Karna hard to be vanquished, Jayadratha, Somadatta, and Ashwathama,—

38. Indra even, united with the gods, is incapable of defeating these great bowmen endued with great energy in battle. How can the Pandavas do it, O sire.

39. All the rulers of the earth, too, leading honourable lives, the heroes capable of wielding weapons can for my sake, O sire, oppose the Pandavas,

40. These Pandavas are not even able to gaze on my soldiers. I am sufficiently powerful to challenge the Pandus with their sons to fight.

41. Those rulers of the earth, who wish me well, O Bharata, will get hold of them as deers are caught by means of a trap.

42. By means of our large number of cars and our net of arrows, the Panchalas along with the Pandavas will be vanquished;

Dhritarastra said :—

43. My son raves like a maniac, O Sanjaya; he is not capable of defeating in battle Yudhishthira the king of Dharma.

44. Bhisma knows the truth of the sons of Pandu, and their sons of great fame, and prowess, conversant with the code of morality and having large minds.

45. Since he does not desire fight with those ones of great soul; but, O Sanjaya, tell me again of their doings.

46. Who among them are endued with activity and who are inciting the Pandavas. These great bowmen are like those pouring clarified butter on fire.

Sanjaya said :—

47. Dhritarastra is ever inciting them, O Bharata, saying,—“Fight and do not fear a fight, O you best among the race of Bharata.

48. "The few rulers of the earth, who are surrounded by the sons of Dhritarastra, will engage in fierce fight with marks of numberless weapons on their bodies.

49. "All these wrathful kings who have assembled on the other side, with their friends and followers, I alone will capture like a big fish, seizing small ones from the water.

50. Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna, the son of Drona, Shalya and Suyodhana—these I will oppose like the shore, resisting the flow of the swelling waters."

51. King Yudhishthira of a virtuous soul said to him who was thus speaking: "The Panchalas along with the Pandavas all depend on your wisdom and prowess.

52. Rescue us from this fight; I am aware that you, O you with long arms, are established on the virtue of a Kshatriya.

53. Alone you are quite capable of effecting the overthrow of the Kauravas. To meet the Kauravas, desirous of war and standing in front of us,—

54. What ever will be decided on by you will conduce to our good, O subduer of foes. Why those fly from the field of battle out of the original army and are at our mercy.

55. The hero, who after showing forth his strength himself helps such men (those flying, referred to in the last Sloka), is worth purchasing for a thousand. Such is the opinion of those who are conversant with the code of morality.

56. O you bull among men, you are just such a hero, brave and powerful. There is no doubt that in battle you are the rescuer of those struck with fear.

57. The son of Kunti, Yudhishthira, of virtuous soul having said this, Dhristadyumna without the least fear said these words to me: : O Suta, all the men that have come to fight for Duryodhana,—

58. Tell them and the Kurus who have descended from the Pratipas with the Valhikas, son of Sharadwata and Drona with his son, as also Jayadratha with his son,

59. And Dusasana, and Vikarna, and also the king Duryodhana and Bhima—go to them and tell them—go just now, without delay.

60. Yudhishthira should be approached by an honourable man,—let not Arjuna, protected by the gods, kill you—and the king of virtue—the son of Pandu—that hero among men should be forthwith asked to accept the kingdom surrendered to him.

61. There is no warrior in this world as the son of Pandu, Savyasachin of true strength.

62. By the gods themselves is the heavenly car of the wielder of the Gandiva bow protected; he cannot be defeated by men; do not think in mind even of a fight with him.

Thus ends the fifty-seventh chapter in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LVIII.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. The son of Pandu, from his youth, has the prowess of a Kshatriya and leads the life of a Brahmachari. Those fools desire to fight with him, though I am lamenting.

2. O Duryodhana, O you best among the race of Bharata, turn your mind away from fight; war is not desirable under all conditions, O you subduer of enemies.

3. One half of the earth is sufficient for the livelihood of yourself and your ministers. Give back to the sons of Pandu their dues, O you subduer of enemies.

4. All the Kurus think this to be in accordance with virtue that you should conclude peace with the high-souled sons of Pandu.

5. Think well, O son, of the elements of your own army; it has been collected for your own death; you do not accept this out of folly.

6. I do not wish war; nor is Valhika desirous of it; nor is Bhishma; nor is Drona, nor is Ashwathama; nor is Sanjaya.

7. Nor Somadatta, nor Shala, nor Kripa desire war; nor does Satyabrata, nor Purumitra, nor Jaya, nor Bhurisrabas.

8. Those on whom depend the Kurus, when troubled by the enemy not rejoice at the prospect of war; O dear, may you accept that.

9. You do not act in this way of your own will; but Karna leads you to it and Dusasana and the wicked souled Shakuni and the son of Suvala (lead you).

Duryodhana said :—

10. I do not depend on Drona or Ashwathama or Sanjaya, or Bhishma, or Kamboja, or Kripa, or Valhika.

11. Or Satyabrata, or Purumitra, or Bhurisrabas, nor do I challenge them to fight, depending on others.

12. O Sire, I and Karna will perform the sacrifice of war after preparing ourselves, making Yudhishthira the beast for sacrifice.

13. In the ceremony my car will be the substitute for the platform ; my scimitar, the ladle ; my mace, the large ladle ; and my coat of mail, the witnesses ; my horses will answer the purpose of the four priests ; my hafts will stand for the Kusha grass ; and my fame, for the clarified butter.

14. Having performed, O king, this sacrifice in the field of battle ; in honour of the God of death, by ourselves, and having won a victory and slain our enemies, we shall come back surrounded by a halo of glory.

15. Myself, O Sire, Karna, and my brother Dusasana,—these three of us will kill the sons of Pandu in battle.

16. Either I shall rule this earth, having slain the sons of Pandu ; or the sons of Pandu will enjoy sovereignty over this earth after having slain me.

17. I can sacrifice my life, my kingdom, my wealth, my everything, O king ; but I can not live in peace with the sons of Pandu, O you of unfading renown.

18. That extent of land which is pierced by the extremity of a sharp needle, O venerable Sire, I shall not surrender to the sons of Pandu.

Dhritarastra said :—

19. I grieve for you all, O rulers, who are following that fool to the abode of the king of death ; but Duryodhana is cast off by me for ever.

20. Like tigers in a herd of deers these foremost of strikers—those Pandavas assembled together will kill the principal warriors in battle.

21. The army of the Bharatas appears to me as already fallen down like a woman troubled and afflicted, and struck by one, of the long arms.

22. Increasing in strength, what was already full, vis., Yudhishthira's army the son of Shini will stand on the field shooting arrows as one sows the seeds.

23. In front of the fighting soldiers Bhimasena will stand and all will be shatered behind him as behind a strong wall, fearlessly.

24. When you will see your elephants, big as mountains, felled down by Bhima with their tusks broken, and with blood flowing resembling a broken pot (with water flowing).

25. Beholding them in the field of battle like mountains seperated and struck with fear by coming in contact with Bhima, then will you remember my words.

26. Beholding your army composed of hariots, horses and elephants burnt up as it were by Bhimasena like the path followed by a fire, will you remember my words.

27. A heavy calamity will you meet, if you do not conclude peace with the Pandavas. Killed by Bhimasena with his mace, will you ever remain in peace.

28. When you will see the army of the Kurus, felled down by Bhima like a large forest torn off, then will you remember my words.

Vaishampayana said :—

29. Having said this to all those rulers of the earth, the king, O great king, addressing Sanjaya asked him.

Thus ends the fifty-eighth chapter, the speech of Dhritarastra, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LIX.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—Continued.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. What the two great-souled ones, the son of Vasudeva and Dhananjaya, said ? Tell me that, O exceedingly wise one. I shall hear your words.

Sanjaya said :—

2. Listen, O king, how the two, Krishna and Dhananjaya, were seen by me and what the two heroes said. I shall tell you, O Bharata.

3. Looking towards my toes and with my hands clasped together and thinking of holy things in my mind, did I enter the inner apartments to meet with those gods among men.

4. Neither Abhimanya nor the twins can go to the place where the two Krishnas and Krishna (Draupadi) and the lady Satyabhama reside.

5. The two were there, cheerful with a drink of the Mddhri wine ; and both had their bodies smeared with Sandal ; and both also were dressed in excellent attires and wore beautiful ornaments.

6. The two subduer of enemies were seated there on a spacious seat of gold decked with many precious stones and covered with many sorts of carpets.

7. On the lap of Arjuna were the feet of Keshava and those of the noble-minded Arjuna rested on Krishna and Satyabhama.

8. A seat made of gold did the son of Pritha point out to me ; after touching which with my hands, I took my seat on the ground.

9. Two longitudinal lines on the soles of the son of Pritha, the auspicious marks, did I see on his taking away his feet from the seat.

10. Having seen the two young men of black complexion and large stature rising like the trunks of Shala trees, seated on the same seat, a great fear seized me.

11. They were like Indra and Vishnu seated together. That one of foolish intellect does not understand that owing to his belief in the power of Drona and Bhishma and owing to

12. The wishes of him who had under his command these two—the desires of the king of virtue were bound to bear fruit—such was my belief at the time.

13. Entertained with food and drink, and having my wishes (of beholding the two) gratified, I placed my clasped hands on my head and conveyed to them your message.

14. With his hands, having auspicious signs and marks made by friction with the bow and string, the son of Pritha removing the feet of Keshava asked him to give a suitable reply.

15. Then did Krishna of prowess similar to Indra's and adorned with all sorts of ornaments and rising like the banner of Indra speak addressing me :

16. The words of that foremost of the speakers were mild, charming and conciliatory but were awful and calculated to cause fear in the sons of Dhritarastra.

17. I then heard the words of that one who is fit to speak, which were rhythmical and calculated to lead to the good of all, though heart-rending in the end.

The son of Vasudeva said:—

18. O Sanjaya, speak these words to the intelligent Dhritarastra in the hearing of the foremost of Kurus, Bhishma and Drona.

19. Before repeating our answer, O Suta, convey our respects to our elders in age, and then asking about the health of our youngers,

20. Perform many sorts of sacrificial ceremonies and make many presents to the Brahmanas and make merry with your sons and wives ; for a heavy calamity is come on you.

21. Distribute wealth among proper recipients ; get desirable sons and serve those that are dear to you by doing them good ; for the king is anxious for victory.

22. That old debt has not yet been wiped off from my mind (for I have not paid it),—that is the invocation of me living at a distance by Krishna saying "Govinda".

23. Him whose weapon is the invincible Gandiva bow, full of energy, and him who has me for his second—of such Savyasachin have you made enemy.

24. Who would like to challenge the son of Pritha, having me for his second, unless his time were come, even if he were Purandara himself ?

25. He who defeats Arjuna in battle bears the earth in his two arms ; and when wrathful, he could burn up all creatures and could make the gods fall off from heaven.

26. Among the gods, the Asuras, and the human beings and among Yashas, Gandharvas and Bhogis do I not see him, who could stand against (Arjuna), the son of Pandu, in battle.

27. The greatly wonderful event, which is heard to have taken place in the city of Virata of a fight of one against many, is a sufficient proof of this.

28. When in the city of Virata you fled in all directions, dispersed by the son of Pandu alone—that is sufficient proof of this.

29. Strength, heroism, prowess, agility, lightness of hand, untiring energy and patience are centred in the son of Pritha, and are not present anywhere else.

30. Thus spoke Hrishikesha cheering the spirits of the son of Pritha by his voice, and roaring like the instrument which chastised Paka (thunder) in the sky during the rainy season.

31. Having heard the words of Keshava, Kiritin of white steeds,—Arjuna spoke significant words calculated to make the hairs erect.

Thus ends the fifty-ninth chapter, the speech of Krishna, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LX.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Hearing the words of Sanjaya, then that lord of men having eyes of wisdom then commenced to count the merits and defects of that speech.

2. And having skillfully counted the merits and defects as far as lay in his power that wise and intelligent king of men, desirous of victory for his sons,

3. And having ascertained the strength and weakness of both parties by suitable means, commenced counting the army of each.

4. And having concluded that the Pandavas had strength and prowess, both human and divine, on their side, and that the Kurus were weaker in strength, he said to Duryodhana !

5. O Duryodhana, this thought never leaves my mind ; it is very true that I see with my own eyes and do not infer it from my imagination.

6. All creatures have excessive affection for their offsprings ; and they also do what is agreeable to the latter to the best of their power, and also what leads to their good.

7. The same is also seen in benefactors generally. Good men always have a great inclination to repay the great good done them, and to do what is highly agreeable to their benefactors.

8. Agni, recollecting the doings of Arjuna at Khandava, will help him and Bhima in this encounter between the Kurus and the Pandavas.

9. Out of affection for those born of them Dharma and many other dwellers of the heaven will, when invoked, come on the side of the Pandavas.

10. Desirous of protecting them from the fear of Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, and others, they will be filled with wrath equal to the thunderbolt (in its effects).

11. The sons of Pritha, those heroic tigers among men, capable of using the weapons, united with the gods, will be incapable of being even gazed at by a human being.

12. He who has the excellent and invincible Gandiva bow and two inexhaustible arrow holders of heavenly make and always filled with shafts,

12. He who has the figure of a monkey on his heavenly banner which can proceed as smoothly as a column of smoke and whose car has no equal in the earth, bounded by the four seas,

14. And the sound of which is heard by men, similar to the roaring of a large mass of clouds and which, like death itself, frightens the enemy.

15. He who is known in this world as of superhuman strength, and he who is known by the rulers of the earth as the victor over the gods even in battle,

16. He, who unnoticed by others takes up five hundred arrows and but in a moment shoots them and makes them fall at a distance,

17. He, who is said by Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, and the son of Drona, and by Shalya the king of Madras, and by all disinterested persons,

18. To be invincible by superhuman rulers of the earth when standing on the field of battle, as a tiger among car-warriors and a subduer of enemies,

19. He at one effort shoots five hundred arrows and in strength of arms is equal to Kartavirya.

20. In this great battle do I see that great Bowman Arjuna equal in might to Indra united with Upendra working havoc.

21. Thinking this day and night, O Bharata, am I sleepless and unhappy through anxiety for the good of the Kurus.

22. A great cause of the destruction of the Kurus is now come. If there is no other means of an end to this quarrel, than peace,

23. Peace seems desirable to me and not war with the sons of Pritha. I have ever been of opinion that the Pandavas are possessed of greater strength than the Kurus.

Thus ends the sixtieth chapter, the speech of Dhritarastra, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXI.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Having heard these words of his father, the extremely passionate son of Dhritarastra became highly enraged and again said this :

2. You think that the sons of Pritha having the gods for their assistants are incapable of being withstood ; let this fear of yours be dispelled, O you best among kings.

3. From an absence of desire, and of hatred, and of avarice and of anxiety and for their indifference to worldly property, did the gods obtain their godships.

4. Such was the tale told to us in days of yore by the great devotees Dwaipayana, Vyasa, Narayana, and Rama the son of Jamadagna.

5. Never like men do the gods engage themselves in the work out of desire, wrath, avarice, hatred, O bull among the race of Bharata.

6. If Agni (god of fire), or Vayu (god of wind), or Dharma (god of Virtue), or Indra, or Aswina had ever engaged in work out of desire, then the sons of Partha could not have met with unhappiness.

7. Therefore should anxiety never be indulged in by you, for the gods incline towards objects worthy of them, O Bharata.

8. If however out of contact with desire, envy or avarice is observed in the action of gods; then owing to their own ruling it cannot prevail.

9. Incantations being repeated by me, fire will that moment be extinguished, even if, desirous of burning up all the worlds, it blazes occupying all directions.

10. The divine energy with which the denizens of heaven are endued is great; but mine, too, is without parallel and so greater than that of the gods; know this, O Bharata.

11. In the very sight of the world can I reunite, O king, by my incantations, the Earth divided into two or the peaks of heavens (divided into two).

12—13. I can at any time before the sight of the entire world put down a roaring downfall of stones or a strong gale produced from the destruction of animate and inanimate things, and mobile and immobile beings out of compassion for them.

14. Cars and infantry can go over waters solidified by me. I am the only director of the affairs of the gods and Asuras.

15. To whatever country I go with my Akshauhini on any purpose, there my horses move in whatever directions I desire.

16. In my territories there are no terrible snakes, and frightful beasts do not injure men who are protected by my incantations:

17. To the residents in my territories the clouds shower rains at their (the residents') will (i. e. showers rains in quantities and at times desired by them). My subjects are attached to virtue; and in my territories the calamities of cultivation do not exist.

18. The Asuras, the wind, the fire, the slayer of Vritra with the Marutas and Virtue himself would not dare protect them whom I hate.

19. If these had been capable of rescuing my enemies by their might; then the sons of Pritha would not have met with trouble for thirteen years.

20. Neither the gods and Gandharvas, nor the Asuras and the Rakshashas are capable of rescuing my enemies—I am telling the truth.

21. Whatever happiness or misery I chose to assign to my friends or foes, I have never before been disappointed in.

22. It will be as I say, O you subduer of enemies, never before have my words been false; and I have been known as the one of truthful speech.

23. The world is a witness to this greatness of mine, the fame of which has been heard by them. All this has been spoken for consoling you and not by way of self-praise, O king.

24. I have never, O king, praised myself before; for he who praises himself acts meanly.

25. You will be the hearer of the defeat by me of the Pandavas and the Matsyas, and the Panchalas with the Kekayas, and Satyaki and the son of Vasudeva.

26. I am of superior intelligence, of superior might, and of superior prowess. My knowledge is superior, and so my application and concentration are superior to theirs.

27. Asuras on falling into the sea are annihilated in every way; so will the Pandavas with others be annihilated on meeting

28. What is known as to the use of weapons to our grandfather, Drona, Kripa, Shalya and Shala, is all present in me.

29. Saying this that subduer of enemies desirous of war knowing that the proper time had come again asked Sanjaya about their doings.

Thus ends the sixty-first chapter, the speech of Duryodhana in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXII.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—Continued,

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Disregarding Dhritarastra, the son of Pritha and Vichitravirya who was to ask something, Karna, encouraging that assemblage of Kauravas, said these words to the son of Dhritarastra:

2. When aware of the false pretence on which in the days of yore I obtained the Brama-weapon from Rama, he said to me: "At the time of death, all remembrance of this weapon will leave you."

3. Even for such a great offence I was only cursed by that Rishi my preceptor—that great Rishi of great energy, who is capable even of burning up the earth along with the seas.

4. —He was gratified with me by my acceptable services and by my own bravery; that weapon is still with me and I have still sometime to live ; therefore am I capable (of winning a victory). I take this on myself.

5. In a moment, the favour of that Rishi having been obtained, and after having killed the Panchalas, the Karushas, and the Matsyas, and the sons Pritha with their sons and grandsons, shall I present you with worlds subdued by my weapon.

6. Let your grandfather stay near you and also Drona and also those foremost among the rulers of men. Going there with the chief warriors of my army, shall I kill the sons of Pritha. I take this on myself.

7. Bhishma thus addressed to him who was speaking in this strain : What do you say, O you whose intelligent has been dimmed at the near approach of death ? Do you, O Karna, not know that on the death of the chiefs, the sons of Dhritarashtra will be slain.

8. The burning of Khandava, which was done by Krishna with Dhananjaya as his second,—hearing of that deed your mind should be restrained along with that of your friends.

9. The weapon which that foremost of the gods, that great-souled and prosperous Mahendra, gave you will be, as you will see, broken and turned into ashes, when struck by the disc of Keshava.

10. That arrow having its extremity like the mouth of a serpent which is shinning in your belt and which you ever worship with the best of garlands will, when struck with the cluster of arrows by the sons of Pandu, go to ruin with you, O Karna.

11. The son of Vasudeva, the slayer of Vana, and Bhumi's son (Naraka or Hell) who has in furious battles killed many enemies like you and superior to you, protects Kiritin.

Karna said :—

12. Undoubtedly the Lord of the Vrishnis is, as you say ; and what is more, he is greater than that ; the grandfather has said some harsh things ; let him hear the effects of that.

13. I shall lay down my arms and the grandfather will see me in court only and not in battle. Yourself being quiet, all the rulers of the earth in the world will see my prowess.

Vaishampayana said :—

14. So saying, the great Bowman leaving the court went to his own house and Bhishma, amidst those Kurus, said to Duryodhana in a laughing tone.

15. The son of the Suta is a man who keeps his promise ; how will he discharge his responsibility ? (Now that he is gone) behold the terrible havoc committed by Bhimasena who arraying his hosts splits up the heads of the soldiers.

16. The kings of Avanti and Kalinga, Jayadratha, Chedidhwaja, and Valhika standing by as witnesses to the scene, I shall again and again kill thousands and tens of thousands of the enemies' soldiers (such was his resolve, how will he act up to it) ?

17. At the very moment when he cheated the weapon out of the blameless and holy Rama, by saying that he was a Brahmana, were the virtue and asceticism of that vile wretch, the son of Vikartana, lost.

18. Karna having thrown away his weapons and Bhishma having addressed these words, O chief among kings, the son of Vichitravirya, Duryodhana, of mean intellect said to the son of Santhanu.

Thus ends the sixty-second chapter, the speech of Karna, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXIII.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—continued.

Duryodhana said :—

1. Why do you consider victory to be the sole monopoly of the sons of Pritha who are similar to men and had their births similar to those of all men.

2. We and they too are equal in heroism and in prowess, are similar in age, in intelligence and in knowledge of the holy books.

3. In weapons, in the science of fighting, in agility and in skill, all are of the same species ; all had our birth in human beings.

4. O grandfather, how then do you know victory to go to the sons of Pritha ? I do not depend on Drona, nor on Kripa, nor on the son of Valhika,

5. Nor on the other kings. Myself, Karna the son of Vikartana and my brother Dusasana by our prowess will win.

6. We shall kill the five sons of Pandu in battle by means of sharp-edged arrows ; then, O king, with a great sacrificial ceremony with large present of many sorts

7. Shall we worship the Brahmanas and with cows and heroes and wealth. When like deers dragged by a net or men unable to swim by water shall our soldiers by means of their arms in the battle

8. Drag the enemies and when they (the enemies) see the vast crowds of chariots, and elephants, then will the sons of Pandu leave off their pride and not they alone but Keshava also.

Vidura said :—

9. Old persons who are unfailing in their predictions say that in this world self-control is excellent ; especially in a Brahmana is it an eternal and necessary virtue.

10. He gets success, forgiveness and the fruits of his gifts whose self-control pursues the path of gifts, asceticism, knowledge and study.

11. Self-control increases energy ; self-control is excellent and holy. Absolved from his sins and having his energy increased (by self-control) a man obtains great results.

12. Those who are devoid of self-control are ever feared by creatures as Rakshashas, for whose check Khatriyas were created by Him who is born of Himself.

13. For all the four stages of life, self-control is a very good vow ; I speak of the characteristics of him whose life is one of self-control.

14. They are forgiveness, wisdom, benevolence, equality, regard for all virtues, truth, guilelessness, subjugation of the senses, patience, mildness, modesty and steadiness,

15—16. The reverse of miserliness, mildness, contentment, and reverence. Desire, avarice, vanity, envy, sleep, farenness of speech, self-love, jealousy, and grief—these are not yielded to by those who have self-control. Simplicity, honesty and purity of mind are the characteristics of a man of self-control.

17. One not given to avarice, who is desirous to obtain little, who is indifferent to objects of desire, and who is grave as the sea, is known as the man of self-restraint.

18. That wise man who is of good habits in life of a blameless disposition is satisfied with his soul and knows his own nature, and after commanding respect in this world he is well provided for after death.

19. He that has no fear from other creatures and from whom other creatures have no fear, is a man of ripe wisdom and is known as the best of human beings.

20. People are not made unhappy by him who makes all creatures his friends and seeks their good ; he is calm and grave as the ocean and is pleased (with every thing) owing to his wisdom.

21. Those who have self-control are of peaceful habits and rejoice, regulating their life by the example of deeds done in olden times and deeds in the present by the honest.

22. Or living in this world, and renouncing all work, the man of self-control, pleased with all by his wisdom, roams about in the world, waiting for death and annihilating into Brahma.

23. As the passage of birds soaring in the sky cannot be observed, so also the path of that sage who is contented in consequence of his wisdom is not observed.

24. He who desirous of emancipation leaves his home has in heaven bright regions assigned to him for ever.

Thus ends the sixty-third chapter, speech of Vidura, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXIV.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—continued.

Vidura said :—

1. For the capture of birds did a certain fowler set his net in this world. O Sire, so we have heard from old men.

2. There were two birds, companions to each other, captured in that net and they both went up into the air with that net.

3. The fowler seeing them fly up in the air without losing his senses followed them in the direction they took.

4. A certain Rishi living in a hermitage, who had finished his daily worship I saw that fowler following the birds, still in the hope of getting hold of the birds.

5. Then did the anchorite address, O Kauravya, that denizen of the earth following the wanderers of the sky in this couplet.

6. O Slayer of animals, it seems to me wonderfully strange that you who move by your feet in this earth are following wanderers of the sky.

The fowler said :—

7. These two united are taking that one net of mine but they will come under my control where they will quarrel.

Vidura said :—

8. The two birds who were doomed to death quarrelled ; and having quarrelled the two fools fell to the earth.

9. The slayer of animals then approaching those two fighting with each other, subject to the trap of death, without their knowledge caught hold of them.

10. In the same way those cousins who quarrel in matters of wealth are brought under the control of enemies like the birds owing to their quarrel.

11. Dining in one another's company and conversing among one another, enquiring about one another's health and living together—these are the duties of cousins, and quarrel is never.

12. Those who in proper season serve the old men out of pure motives, become invincible like a forest protected by lions.

13. Those, who attaining to prosperity behave like the mean-minded contribute to the prosperity of their despisers, O you bull among the race of Bharata.

14. Cousins, O you bull among the race of Bharata, smoke when quarrelling, and blaze up when united like charcoals.

15. I shall speak of something else, which was seen by me in a mountain and bearing that too, O son of Kuru, do whatever is good.

16. We went to the Northern mountains accompanied by hunters and godlike Brahmanas fond of conversations or incantations and medicines.

17. The Gandhamadana Mountain was like a grove (owing to trees growing on it) in every way. It was shining, as it were, with cluster of medicinal plants and inhabited by ascetics and the Gandharvas.

18. There we all saw some honey of a yellow colour inside a pot placed at a very high point of the mountain.

19. This was guarded by snakes—the favorite drink of Kuvera, as it was, drinking which even an earthly man gets immortality.

20. Those without eyes get eyes; and the old become young. There was the honey described by the Brahmanas conversant with incantations.

21. Then did the hunters, seeing that, strive to obtain it, O king, and were destroyed in that frightful mountain cavern full of snakes.

22. Thus does this son of yours desire to be the one supreme individual in this world; out of loss of his senses, does he see only the honey and not the fall.

23. Duryodhana is desirous of a fight with Savyasachin; but I do not see in him the strength or energy necessary for that purpose.

24. —That Savyasachin, who alone in his car has brought the earth under his control and who inspired dread into Bhishma, Drona and others accompanied by their hosts.

25. They were routed at the city of Virata—see what occurred there. That hero looking at your face and waiting to see your movements will forgive you still.

26. Drupada, the king of the Matsyas, and Dhananjaya, fired with wrath, will leave no trace (of your army) like a conflagration urged on by the wind.

27. O Dhritarastra, take the king Yudhishthira on your lap; for by a struggle between you two none can get an absolute victory.

Thus ends the sixty-fourth chapter, the speech of Vidura in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXV.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. O Duryodhana, think well on what I am telling you, my dear son. You think the wrong way to be the right one like an inexperienced wayfarer.

2. The energy of the five sons of Pandu, which you are desirous of eclipsing, is like the energy of the five elements in their subtle state supporting the universe.

3. Yudhishthira, the son of Kunti, is established on sound and strict virtue in this world. You are not fit to vanquish him without losing your life.

4. Bhimasena too whose equal there is none in strength—you are roaring at that one who is equal to Yama himself in battle.

5. The foremost of the wielder of weapons, that Meru among the mountains,—what intelligent man would fight with that wielder of the Gandiva bow.

6. What man is there in this world whom Dhristadyumna cannot vanquish, shooting arrows among the enemy like the king of the gods hurling his thunderbolt.

7. Satyaki, too, that one hard to be vanquished, who is respected among the Andhakas and the Vrishnis, will destroy your host; for he is ever attached to what is good for the Pandavas.

8. Then again, he who in measure of strength surpasses the three worlds—what intelligent man would fight with that Krishna, whose eyes are like lotuses,

9. Krishna considers his wives, cousins and his friends, his soul and the earth on one side equal to Dhananjaya on the other.

10. The son of Vasudeva too who is relied on by the son of Pandu, is hard to be vanquished and the army in which Keshava takes part is invincible even by the whole world.

11. Abide then, my dear, by what your friends who tell you to do only what is conducive to your interests say. Accept the old Bhishma, the son of Shanthanu, and your grandfather as your guides.

12. Listen therefore to what these seekers of good to the Kurus—Drona, Kripa, Vikarna and the great king Valhika—say and to myself as well.

13. These stand in the same relation to you as I myself and it is proper that you should regard them in the same light. All of them know what virtue is, and have the same degree of affection for you, O Bharata.

14. Your host headed by your brothers fled from that city of Virata leaving the king to surrender.

15. This tall story that we hear of what occurred in that city—the struggle between one and many is sufficient proof (of what I say regarding their superiority).

16. Such was the feat of Arjuna single; what will they all united not do? Treat them as your own brothers and give them their rights.

CHAPTER LXVI.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The very wise Dhritarastra of great prosperity having thus addressed Suyodhana again asked of Sanjaya:

2. Tell me, O Sanjaya, the remaining part, after the speech of Vasudeva—viz. what Arjuna said to you. I have great curiosity for it.

Sanjaya said:—

3. Having heard the speech of Vasudeva, Dhananjaya the son of Kunti, and hard to be vanquished said at the proper time within the hearing of Vasudeva.

4. Our grand-father, the son of Santhanu, and Dhritarastra too, O Sanjaya, and Drona and Kripa and Karna, and the Valhika,

5. And the son of Drona and Somadatta, and Shakuni, and the son of Suvata; and Dusasana and Shala and Purumitra and Vivasti,

6. And Vikarna and Chitrasena and the ruler of the earth Jayatsena, and the two chiefs of Avanti, Vindu and Anuvindu, and the Kowrava Durmukha,

7. And the king of Sindhu, and Dusaha and Bhurisarvas and the king Bhagadatta, and the ruler of the earth Jarasandha,

8. And the other rulers of the earth, who have assembled to fight on that side in the interests of the sons of Kuru, are about to die. They have been brought together by the son of Dhritarastra as offerings for the blazing fire of the sons of Pandu.

9. The assembled ones are to be asked in my name about their health each in terms suitable to his rank and the proper greetings are to be presented. Tell this, O Sanjaya, in the midst of those kings to the foremost of sinners, Suyodhana.

10. Make that wrathful prince of wicked intellect,—that covetous son of Dhritarastra of vicious soul hear all these words of mine, O Sanjaya, in the midst of all his ministers and parties.

11. Saying this by way of an introduction, Dhananjaya the wise son of Pritha then looking at the son of Vasudeva with distended eyes with red corners, spoke these words consistent with both righteousness and morality to me.

12. You have heard the measured speech of the high-souled hero of Madhu's race. You are to say the same thing to all the assembled rulers of the earth as my words.

13. Let them act in such a way that offerings may not have to be made to the smoky fire of arrows in the great sacrificial ceremony with the rattles of the car-wheels as substituting for incantations and the bow-string which will neutralise the effects of their arms, as that for the fadle.

14. If you do not return to Yudhisthira, the slayer of his enemies, his own share which he desires; then shall I conduct you with your horses, footsoldiers, and elephants to the inauspicious regions of departed spirits by my sharp arrows.

15. Then quickly bidding farewell to Dhananjaya and the One with four arms and bowing down to them, have I come here with speed to tell you this great news, O you of the lustre of immortals.

Thus ends the sixty-sixth chapter, the speech of Sanjaya, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXVII.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—*continued.Vaishampayana said :—

1. On Duryodhana ; the son of Dhritarastra, not minding this speech much, and all the others remaining dumb those bulls among men rose up (and departed).

2. After all the kings of the earth have stood up, the great king (Dhritarastra) began to enquire of Sanjaya in secret,

3. The resolves of his own party and of his enemies and Pandavas, after the one who was subject to wishes of his son had wished them (the kings) success.

Dhritarastra said :—

4. O son of Gavalgani, tell one of the little superiority that exists in our own army. You know the affairs of the Pandavas fully, in what points they are superior and in what inferior.

5. You know the points of superiority of these two armies. You know every thing and can foresee them. You are well conversant with what is conducive to righteousness and worldly profit. You, who are such, O Sanjaya, asked by me, tell me which of the parties, in the event of war between them, will cease to exist.

Sanjaya said :—

6. I shall not tell you any thing in secret, for then ill felling against me may enter within you, O king. Have our sire of great vows, and queen Gandhari brought here, O Ajamida.

7. They will be able to remove any ill-feeling, O chief among men, (you may harbour against me), acquainted as they are with virtue and skilled as they are in foresight. In their presence shall I tell you every thing about the purposes determined on by Keshava and the son of Pritha.

Vaishampayana said :—

8. Gandhari and Vyasa were brought there by him, who was then spoken to. Conducted by Vidura, they quickly entered the Council Chamber.

9. And knowing that intention of Sanjaya and of his son, the exceedingly wise Krishna Dwaipayana after coming there said :

Vyasa said :—

10. To Dhritarastra, who is asking, O Sanjaya, tell everything that he wants to know. Tell everything to him about the son of Vasudeva and Arjuna, as you know them.

Thus ends the sixty-seventh chapter in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—*contd.Sanjaya said :—

1. Arjuna and the son of Vasudeva, the two very adorable wielders of the bow, born in a region other than their own out of their own will, are equal to each other in every detail of their nature.

2. That disc of the son of Vasudeva exists, as if in illusion, O lord ; for though five cubits in diameter it can be hurled by that intelligent being in any form he likes.

3. (That disc) is the destroyer of the Kurus and therefore dear to the Pandavas. Shining with effulgence, it is the best measure for forming an idea of their points of strength and weakness.

4. That descendant of Madhu, of great strength, as if in play, conquered Naraka, Shamvara, Kansa and the king of the Chedis in terrific battle.

5. That foremost among men, of a superior soul, can by mere force of his will bring under control the earth, the sky and the heavens.

6. Again and again, have you, O king, asked me about the Pandavas with a view to know their strength and the points of their superiority and inferiority. Listen to that from me in brief :

7. If the entire world be placed on one side and Janardana on the other ; then will the entire world be surpassed by Janardana in point of strength.

8. The entire world is not able to reduce Janardana to ashes ; (while Janardana can reduce the world into ashes). Where there is truth, where there is righteousness, where there is modesty, and where there is humanity ;

9. There is Govinda. Where there is Krishna ; there is victory. The earth, the sky, and the heavens

10—11. Are guided by Janardana, that foremost among men, who is, as it were, the soul of all creatures, as if in play. He, making the Pandavas his instruments, desires to consume your foolish sons, who are attached to vice, steeping the world in illusion.

12. The wheel of time, the wheel of the world, and the wheel of the Yuga (i. e. the wheel of work leading to births and rebirths) does that prosperous Being ever cause to revolve by the application of his soul.

13. That prosperous Being alone is lord over Time, Death, and over all mobile and immobile beings. I tell you the truth.

14. Though lording over the entire world, Hari, that great anchorite, has recourse to work, as a cultivator tills the soil.

15. By such illusion does Keshava deceive the world; but those men that have understood him are not deceived.

Thus ends the sixty-eighth chapter in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXIX.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. How have you come to know, Madhava, the great lord of all the worlds; and how is it that I do not know him? Tell me that, O Sanjaya.

Sanjaya said :—

2. Listen, O king; you have no knowledge and my knowledge has not diminished (since my last birth). You, being without knowledge and steeped in ignorance, do not know Keshava.

3. By my knowledge, O dear, I do know the slayer of Madhu to be the combination of the three (the cause, the subtle, and the gross), that he is the creator of all—though himself created by none, and that he is the God by Whom all creatures are created and to Whom they are all lost in the end.

Dhritarastra said :—

4. O son of Gavalgani, what is the extent of the belief you ever have in Janardana, by which you know Janardana, who is the union of the three.

Sanjaya said :—

5. I do not care much for illusion (worldly matters); nor do I practise useless things (religious ceremonies in form without faith in the Supreme Being). Good betide you! With the aid of faith derived from purity of mind, do I know Janardana from the holy books.

Dhritarastra said :—

6. O Duryodhana, have recourse to Hrishikesha or Janardana. Sanjaya, my dear, ever seeks our interests; do you therefore seek refuge under Keshava.

Duryodhana said :—

7. If the son of Devaki, that divine Being, destroys the worlds, having recourse to the co-operation of Arjuna; even then shall I not seek refuge under Keshava.

Dhritarastra said :—

8. O Gandhari, this wicked-minded son of yours would precipitate himself in misery. This evil-souled one, of an envious disposition, and vain, he would not listen to the advice of his elders.

Gandhari said :—

9. O you desiring supremacy, O you of wicked soul, who do not listen to the advice of your elders, and who do not pay regard to your father and myself, after losing your position during your life time.

10. And enhancing the joy of wicked-hearted person as also my grief, when you will be slain by Bhimasena, you will remember the words of your father.

Vyasa said :—

11. You are, O king, dear to Krishna, O Dhritarastra; listen to me; since Sanjaya has acted as your ambassador, he will do what is conducive to your interests.

12. This man knows the ancient and blessed Being Hrishikesha. Listening to him with earnestness, you will be free from even the greatest dangers.

13. O son of Vichitravirya, men are surrounded with joy and wrath, and so they are entangled in several sorts of trap. Those, who are not satisfied with their own wealth, and those fools who act by desire,

14. Again and again come under the influence of the god of death in consequence of their own acts like those of blind eyes (falling again and again into pits) when led by the blind.

15. That one is the only path by which the wise man goes (with a view to attain Brahma) and by aiming at that path a superior man overcomes death and attains the object of his ambition.

Dhritarastra said :—

16. Let me know, O Sanjaya, of that path, devoid of fears, going by which I shall obtain Hrishikesha and eternal salvation.

Sanjaya said :—

17. A man who has not his soul under control can not know Janardana, who has his soul under control. The performance of sacrifices and other ceremonies, without being accompanied by a control of the senses, is not the proper way to go by for a man.

18. The renunciation of the objects of our desire, due to an excitement of the senses, arises from true knowledge. True knowledge and benevolence have their origin in wisdom—there is no doubt about it.

19. Therefore, O king, employ yourself in the controlling of your senses with wakefulness ; and let not your intellect take the wrong course and keep it aloof from everything save the true path.

20. The control of the senses is known by Brahmanas to be certainly the true wisdom ; and true wisdom is the path along which an intelligent man goes.

21. Keshava is unattainable, O king, by men who have not controlled their senses. One who has his soul under control is pleased with true knowledge, gained by devotion and intimate knowledge of the holy books.

Thus ends the sixty-ninth chapter, the speech of Sanjaya, in the Yanasandhi of Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXX.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—contd.

Dhritarastra said :—

1. Repeat to me, who am asking, all that you have said regarding the lotus-eyed (Krishna), so that by knowing the meaning of his names and his actions I may attain to that best among male beings.

Sanjaya said :—

2. The blessed list of names of the son of Vasudeva has been heard by me, from which it seems, so far as I can judge, that Keshava is immeasurable.

3. From his covering all creatures with illusion, from his being the support of the world, and from his being of divine origin, he is known as Vasudeva. He is called Vishnu, owing to the fact of his pervading everything.

4. From his practice of asceticism, from the application of his energy to the supreme truth and from his asceticism know him to be Madhava, O Bharata ; and from his having within himself the essence of every thing and from the fact of his killing Madhu, he is called Madhusudana.

5. Krishi is a word denotes existence ; and na denotes eternal tranquility. From the combination of these two states is Vishnu, orn of the Sattwata race, called Krishna.

6. Pundarika means the eternal regions ; and aksha ever means that which has no waste. From a combination of these two states is he called Pundarikaksha ; and from his causing fear in wicked beings is he Janardana.

7. Since he is never dissociated from Sattwa, and since also Sattwa is never dissociated from him ; therefore is he called Sattwata. Owing to (the knowledge of) the Vedas being the eyes by which he is seen and the Vedas being the eyes through which he sees, he is called Brishava (Vedas) and ikshana (eyes).

8. Not being born in the usual way, that conqueror of armies is called Aja ; and from his being conspicuous among the gods and from his self-control is the Lord called Damodara.

9. From the combination of the words, eternal happiness (hrisika) and the attributes of divinity (isha) is he called Hrishiksha. He is known as Mahavahu in the Smritis, as by his two arms he supports the earth and the sky.

10. Since he never falls down ; nor he is wasted away ; therefore he is called Adhokshaja ; and he is known as Narayana in the Smritis, as he is the refuge of human beings.

11. From his creating and preserving beings (Puru), and from destroying them (Sa) is he called Purushathama, as also from his being the creator of causes and effects which are also lost in him in the end.

12. Owing to his constant knowledge of everything is he called Sarva. Krishna is established on truth and truth is established on him.

13. The name of Govinda is truth ; because he is Truth of truths. Owing to his strength he is called Vishnu ; and owing to his victory over the gods he is called Jishnu.

14. Owing to his eternity is he called Ananta ; and Govinda, owing to his control over the senses. He can make the unreal appear as the real, by which he deceives all creatures.

15. The divine slayer of Madhu, who has these qualities and who ever is attached to virtue, that being with long arms, who undergoes no waste, will come here to see that there is no unnecessary slaughter.

Thus ends the seventieth chapter, the speech of Sanjaya, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXI.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—*Continued.Dhritarastra said :—

1. I envy those who have eyes, O Sanjaya, and who will see before them the son of Vasudeva with his body shining with great lustre in the cardinal points of the earth and in the points between them,

2. And uttering blessed words which ought to be listened to with all respect by the Bharatas,—words that are for the good of the Sanjayas, unexceptionable words that ought to be accepted by those praying for prosperity and incapable of being acted up to by those who are about to meet their end.

3. Who (Krishna) is ever full of energy, eternal and the one hero in the world ; who is the leader of the Yadavas and the bull among them ; who is the slayer of his enemies and the cause of terror among them and the destroyer of the fame of his foes.

4. The sons of Kuru, assembled together, will see that worshipful slayer of his foes, of high soul, that foremost among the Vrishnis, speaking words full of benevolence and thus winning over my party.

5. With that ascetic who is eternal and who has the knowledge of self, the ocean of words easily obtainable by anchorites—with that Arishta bird with beautiful wings, that destroyer of creatures, that refuge of the universe,

6. That being with a thousand heads, that ancient Being who has neither beginning, nor end, nor middle, whose fame has no end who is the cause of the universal seed, who is without birth, who is eternity itself, shall I take refuge.

7. I shall take refuge under the creator of the three worlds, the creator of the gods, Asuras, Nagas, and Rakshasas, the chief among the rulers of men and learned men, and that younger brother of Indra.

Thus ends the seventy-first chapter, in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXII.

(YANASANDHI PARVA)—*continued.Janamejaya said :—

1. On the good Sanjaya returning to the Kurus, what did my old grandfathers, the sons of Pandu, do. All this, O foremost among the twice-born, I do want to hear. Tell me.

Vaishampayana said :—

2. On the return of Sanjaya, Yudhishthira, the king of virtue, said to the scion of the Dasharha race (Krishna)—that bull among all the Sattwatas :

3. This is the time arrived for friends (to show that they are so), O you devoted to the interests of your friends. Any other save yourself I do not see, who could get us through this difficulty.

4. Depending on you, Madhava, we have without fear asked back our share (of the kingdom) from the son of Dhritarastra and all his followers, who are filled with vain pride.

5. As you get through the Vrishnis out of all difficulties, O chastiser of foes ; so are the Pandavas, the proper party, to be protected by you. Get them through this great difficulty.

The blessed Krishna of divine attributes said :—

6. Here am I, O you with long arms. Speak what you want to say. I shall do all that you will ask me to do, O Bharata.

Yudhishthira said :—

7. You have heard what Dhritarastra with his son intends to do. It is, O Krishna, exactly as Sanjaya told me.

8. Such are the intentions of Dhritarastra ; for Sanjaya knows the heart, and is as his very soul, so to say. As an ambassador is instructed, so does he speak ; and if he speaks otherwise he should be killed.

9. Without restoring to us our kingdom he wants peace with us ; and the covetous man behaves by his sinful heart without impartiality towards those whose interests should be looked after by him equally.

10. For twelve years have the forests been inhabited by us ; and at the command of Dhritarastra have we lived in disguise for another year ;

11. So that Dhritarastra might abide by those pledges of ours, O lord ; the Brahmanas, O Krishna, in our company know that we did not break our pledges.

12. The avaricious king Dhritarastra does not follow the path of virtue of his class ; and out of affection for his son and with a desire to please him he follows the course marked out by that fool.

13. The king, listening to the advice of Suyodhana, O Janardana, behaves deceitfully towards us out of avarice, and out of a desire to promote his own interests.

14. What is more regrettable than this that I am unable to be of any good to my mother, or to my friends, O Janardana.

15. Five villages were only asked by me, who have the Kasis, the Chedis, the Panchalas and the Matsyas for my supporters, and your exalted self for my lord.

16. (The villages were) Avisthala, Vrikasthala, Makandi, Varanabata, and any other, O Govinda, for the last or the fifth.

17. Give us, O Sire, (so we said) five villages or towns where we may reside united together; for we do not desire the destruction of the Bharatas.

18. Not this even does the wicked-souled son of Dhritarastra grant, thinking the proprietary rights of the entire earth to be vested in him. What is there more regrettable than this?

19. The avarice of a man born in a noble family yet desiring to possess himself the wealth of others nullifies his wisdom; and the wisdom being destroyed, the sense of shame does nowhere exist.

20. Sense of shame being lost, desire of virtue is weakened; and the destruction of virtue causes the decline of prosperity. Prosperity being lost, the man meets with death; for poverty is death to a man.

21. From a man stricken with property do cousins, friends and Brahmanas turn away; as from a tree without flowers and fruits the winged creatures turn away.

22. This I regard as death to me, O Sire; since from me the cousins turn away as from a fallen creature, or as breath forsakes an animal that is dead.

23. Shamvara was of opinion that there was no condition of life which could be more woeful than that, in which a man cannot see what his food is to be to-morrow.

24. Wealth is said to be the best virtue. Everything is established on wealth; and wealthy men are living in this world and men without wealth are dead.

25. Those, who by force of their physical strength, deprive a man of his wealth, destroy the virtue, profit and pleasure of that man.

26. Having reached this condition (i. e. poverty) one class of men prefer death; another retire to villages (from cities); a third to the wilderness; while the fourth rove about with a view to meet speedy death.

27. One class of men become insane; another go under the control of their enemies; and a third become slaves for the sake of getting the wealth of others.

28. Poverty is a more potent evil to a man than death; for it destroys his prosperity. Wealth is the source of a man's virtue as well as his pleasure.

29. The natural death of a man is like the ever recurring point of the wheel of this world. It is the unavoidable path of all creatures and none can avoid it.

30. A man without wealth from his very birth does not suffer so much, O Krishna, as one who after the possession of great prosperity and a life of great happiness is deprived of it.

31. The man steeped in gigantic difficulties by his own shortcomings blames the gods with Indra and rarely himself.

32. His intimacy with all the holy books cannot procure him a mitigation of his sufferings. Sometimes he feels wrathful towards his servants; and afterwards he envies his friends.

33. Ever subject to outbursts of passion, he sometimes loses his senses and getting himself under the control of his folly he attaches himself to the performance of evil deeds.

34. From his evil deeds spring confusion of castes; and a mixing up of castes is the way to hell, for it is the very culminating point of sinful deeds.

35. If he does not awake, he goes to hell O Krishna; wisdom alone is his awakening; the eyes of wisdom alone can rescue him.

36. A man on obtaining the gift of wisdom follows the holy books. Observance of what is enjoined in the holy books is the best virtue, and modesty is the beautiful accompaniment of such a life.

37. A man endued with a sense of shame despises sins, and his prosperity ever increases. When he becomes endued with prosperity, then he is a man.

38. That calm soul, ever engaged in the practice of virtue and ever attached to action after mature thought, never turns his mind towards vice, nor ever turns to sin.

39. The one without a sense of shame is neither a woman nor a man. He has no claims upon virtue; he is as a Sudra.

40. The man endued with a sense of shame pleases the gods, the Pitris and his own self; and by this does he obtain immortality which is the goal of men attached to virtuous acts.

41. All this has been seen by you in me, O slayer of Madhu,—namely, how I have lived these years, deprived of our kingdom.

42. There is no need for us to abandon that prosperity. In this case the death of ourselves, struggling to obtain back our prosperity, would be better.

43. With regard to that our intention the first thing is to enjoy that prosperity,— themselves and ourselves united in peace and with the same interests, O Madhava.

44. It is the greatest of all vicious deeds for us to prosper after this destruction—that we should obtain the kingdoms after slaying the sons of Kuru.

45. Those that are not related to us, O Krishna, those dishonourable foes—the refrainment of slaying them too is our duty. What then is our duty towards those who are so closely related to us.

46. We have many cousins ; and our elders are our supporters (on both sides). Their destruction is extremely vicious. What then is the good in engaging in battle ?

47. These practices of the Kshatriyas are sinful ; but, alas, we are born in Kshatriya families and whether such practices are virtuous or the reverse ; any other course of life would not be right !

48. A Sudra serves (the other classes) ; a Vaisya lives by trade and commerce ; we live by massacre ; and the wooden plate (profession of begging) has been selected by the Brahmanas.

49. A Kshatriya kills another Kshatriya ; a fish lives on another fish ; a dog kills another dog. See how each follows his rule of life, O you of the Dasharha race.

50. In battle, O Krishna, Kali is ever present ; in a battle lives are lost ; but, in spite of fixed policy applied to fighting, success and defeat

51. Are not dependent on the will (of the combatants) ; as life and death are independent of the will of creatures. Untill the right time happiness cannot be attained, nor misery, O you best of the Jadu race.

52. One man kills many ; and many also united kill one. A coward kills a real hero, known to fame, a renowned warrior.

53. Both parties cannot live to behold victory nor can both parties live to see defeat but the waste and the loss may be seen to be on both sides. To a man attempting to fly there come both loss (of life) and expense.

54. In all cases fight is an evil. Who that strikes is not struck in return ? But victory and defeat, O Hrishikesha, are of the same moment to one that is killed.

55. Defeat is not very much better than death I think ; he on whose side victory is declared, O Krishna, also has surely to meet with a loss.

56. At least the men on the other side kill some one who is dear ; and a man, thus rendered weak, O adorable one, and not seeing his sons and brothers,

57. Lives on, O Krishna, as if in unconsciousness and his purposes are foiled at every step. Those who are modest, prudent, honourable, kind and wise,

58. Are killed in battle ; while a wicked avoids defeat. Even after killing the enemy we become a prey to repentance, O Janardana.

59. In the end the result is that a survivor gives a lot of troubles and in the end collecting an army puts an end to what remains.

60. One makes attempts at putting an end to everything through a desire to settle the dispute. Victory gives birth to enmity ; and that which has met with defeat lives in misery

61. A man peacefully enjoys lives in the case of leaving aside all thoughts of victory and defeat ; but a man who has created an enemy ever sleeps in misery.

62. Without calmness in his mind as if he lives in a house infested by snakes. He who puts an end to everything (of the enemy in battle) gets no fame.

63. And he gets the reverse of fame from all beings throughout his life. Enmity though kept alive for a long time is never brought to an end.

64. There should be no story-teller (to remind him of his wrongs) so long as there is a man alive in the enemy's family. Enmity is never turned into peace by enmity, O Keshava ;

65. But it increases as fire fed by clarified butter. There is no exception to this ; and peace is ever only obtainable by total annihilation.

66. Defects may always be found on either side, by which advantage is sought to be obtained. Manly strength is ever the source of pain in the innermost heart of a man ; and peace is attainable only by leaving aside war, or by death.

67. By putting an end to the enemy to the roots, O slayer of Madhu, we can attain to our object ; but it is most cruel.

68. The peace that we can obtain by foregoing our claim to the kingdom is in effect the same thing as the total extinction of ourselves and the enemy, or the uncertainty of victory.

69. We do not wish to give up that (kingdom) ; nor do you wish death of our family ; and in such a case that peace which we can obtain through bending ourselves to the will of the other side is preferable.

70. When all the attempts of those, who are trying to obtain the kingdom by all means without war, fail ; then war is proper for them and not a show of weakness,

71. On the event of these (attempts at obtaining the desired object without war), the results that follow are terrible. All these have been observed by wise men in a war between dogs.

72. First there comes the wagging of tails, then the bark, then the replying back, then the turning of one round the other, then the show of teeth, then the roaring and then comes the commencement of the fight.

73. In the fight the one, who is stronger, O Krishna, gains the victory and eats the other's flesh. Such is the case with men; there is no difference whatever.

74. It should always be the duty of a strong man not to crush hostility with the weak; and the weak should be deferential to the strong.

75. It is proper that the father, the king, and the aged should be treated always with respect; therefore is Dhritarastra the object of our worship and respect, O Janardana.

76. The feeling of affection for his son is stronger in Dhritarastra, O Madhava. Subject to the will of his son, he will laugh away our respectful submission.

77. What then do you think, O Krishna, to be suitable to the occasion. By what means shall I not deviate from virtue and from worldly good, O Madhava

78. In such a difficulty whom other, O slayer of Madhu, but yourself is it proper for us to consult, O best among men.

79. Who is there, O Krishna, who is so dear a friend to ourselves, who desires our welfare so much, who knows so well the course of all acts, and who is so well acquainted with the results of everything.

Vaishampayana said:—

80. Thus addressed, Janardana said to the king of virtue in reply. For the good cause of both to you shall I go to the encampment of the Kurus.

81. If I succeed in ensuring peace there without a sacrifice of our interests, then will an act of great virtue and of large fruits be done by me, O king.

82. Then shall I free the band of the fated Kurus and Pandavas from the trap of death, as also this earth and all the sons of Dhritarastra.

Yudhisthira said —

83. It is not my wish, O Krishna, that you should go to the Kurus. For Suyodhana, though spoken in a most friendly manner and for his own good, will not listen to your words.

84. It is not proper for you, O Krishna, to go into the midst of that assembly of Kshatriya rulers of the earth, who follow the lead of Duryodhana.

85. The gain of our object will not make us cheerful and what happiness shall we obtain from godship or the lordship over the immortals, if any ill happens to you.

The blessed God said:—

86. I know the vicious nature, O great king, of that son of Dhritarastra; but (by doing as I say) shall we not be spoken ill of in all these worlds in the universe.

87. All the rulers of the earth united together are not powerful enough to stand before me in battle when I am angry, like all other animals before a lion.

88. If they offer insult to me desiring for their good, I shall consume all the Kurus—such is my intention.

89. O son of Pritha, my going there shall not be without results. There will be some gain in going there,—at least we shall not be blamed by others.

Yudhisthira said:—

90. As you please, O Krishna. May all that is good come out of it. Go to the sons of Kuru. May I see you return with your object gained and in health.

91. Going to the Kurus, establish such peace among the sons of Bharata, O Lord, that we may live with all of them with cheerful minds and in contentment.

92. You are my brother and you are my friend dear to me as Bibhatsa. Relying on your friendship we are not at all anxious. May all that is good attend you, who are going for our interests.

93. You know us and you know our enemy; you know what is conducive to our interests and you know what to say. Suyodhana should be addressed in such a way as will be for our benefit.

94. Even if words that are beneficial (to both parties) do not strictly conform to virtue (e.g. peace even by our getting only five villages, which is a sin) or whatever they are (e.g. even if I am to play at a game of dice again) should be spoken by you, O Keshava.

Thus ends the seventy-second chapter in the Yanasandhi of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

(VANASANDHI PARVA)—Continued.

The blessed God said :—

1. The words of Sanjaya have been listened to by me as also thy words. I know all their intentions and also those of yours.

2. Your intentions are established on virtue ; while their purposes are based on malice. What is gained by not having recourse to war, is much in your estimate.

3. A life-long practice of Brahmacharya vow is not the proper course of life for a Kshatriya, O lord of the universe. All the householders have said that a Kshatriya should not gain his livelihood by begging.

4. Victory or death has been originally fixed by the Father of the universe. The proper course of life for a Kshatriya is this (war) and it is not proper to show a humiliating spirit in this course.

5. Earning one's livelihood is not possible by a policy based on a humiliating spirit, O Yudhishthira ; show your strength, O you with long arms, and conquer your enemies, O you chastiser of your enemies.

6. The exceedingly avaricious son of Dhritarastra, has, O chastiser of your enemies, lived for too long a time united with other, enjoying their affection, and their friendship and supported by them.

7. The peace of the Kurus with you is therefore not expedient or desirable (they think), O lord of the universe. They think themselves strong having on their side Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, and others.

8. So long as you treat these, O king, with kindness, they will deprive you of your kingdom, O you chastiser of your foes.

9. Not out of kindness, nor out of cowardice, and not even from a desire to gain virtue or profit will the son of Dhritarastra do as you wish, O you chastiser of your foes.

10. This is an example of the feeling they bear you, O son of Pandu. They are not even sorry for making you wear the Kanpinas (a strip of cloth—a sign of a mendicant) and undergoing all these hardships.

11—13. When before the very eyes of the grandfather (Bhishma), Drona, the wise Vidura and the Brahmanas, holy men, and the entire city and before all the chiefs among the Kurus, he, O king, by means of deceit, defeated you at a game of dice—you who are attached to the habit of making gifts, who are of virtuous habits and life, and of austere vows—he was not ashamed of his cruel act.

14. With one who is of such habits of life, do not, O king, contract a friendship ; they are fit to be killed by any man ; then why not by you, O Bharata.

15. With improper speeches against you did they boast rejoicingly with their brothers, at yourself and your youngers.

16. He said : Now have the sons of Pandu nothing to call their own in this world. Their very names and the name of their family even no longer exist.

17. As great time rolls on, they will meet with defeat. Your subjects no longer yours will now adhere to me.

18. By the vicious and exceedingly wicked-souled Dusasana, while the game of dice was yet going on, was the lady Draupadi like one having none to protect her

19. Dragged by the hair weeping in the assembly of kings in the council ; and in the very presence of Bhishma and Drona they called her cow again and again.

20. All your brothers of terrible strength dissuaded by you and tied by the trap of virtue did absolutely nothing at this.

21. He pronounced these cruel words and others and he expressed pleasure among his cousins at your being exiled into the forest.

22. Those who were assembled there, seeing you without any fault at the time sat in the council weeping with choked voices.

23. Those kings along with the Brahmanas did not praise him for this ; and all the courtiers there spoke ill of Duryodhana.

24. Blame to one born in a high family is death itself, O you chastiser of your foes. Worthless life with blame attached is death many times over, O king.

25. Since that time is he dead, when he was without shame, though blamed by all the kings on earth, O great king.

26. He whose character is of this description can be killed with very little effort like a tree with all its roots cut asunder and standing only on its principal root.

27. Like a serpent is that dishonorable and wicked-souled wretch fit to be slain by everyone. Kill him therefore, O you slayer of your foes ; and do not hesitate, O king.

28. It is proper by all means, and my wish, too, that you should pay proper respects to him who is like a father to you, as also to Bhishma.

29. I, too, going there, shall remove the doubts of all men, who are of one opinion and now of another regarding Duryodhana, O king.

30. In the midst of the kings shall I describe all your good qualities among men, as also defects.

31. Hearing me, speak beneficial words conducive to both virtue and worldly good. All the rulers of the earth, the lords of the different provinces,

32. Will know you to be virtuous souled and truthful of speech and will know how avariciously inclined he is.

33. I shall speak of his defects before both people of towns and villages, before both old and young and before all the members of the four orders assembled there.

34. You will not be called sinful there; for you ask peace and the rulers of the earth will blame the Kurus and Dhritarastra.

35. When he is forsaken by men, what shall there be left to be done, and Duryodhana is killed; do whatever remains to be accomplished.

36. Going to all the Kurus, I shall seek to effect peace without any sacrifice of your interests; and shall observe their intentions.

37. Having observed and made out the intentions of the sons of Kuru and their preparations for war I shall come back to make victory yours, O Bharata.

38. I anticipate war with the enemy by all means. It seems to me that all the signs indicate the same.

39. The birds and beasts are making loud sounds; and the best of elephants and horses assume terrible appearances at the approach of night. Fire too assumes many terrific looking colours.

40. If the cause of waste among men and the world generally were not near at hand, these omens indicating evils would never have been here. Keeping ready for use their arms, machines, helmets, cars, elephants and horses,

41. Let all your soldiers be prepared for battle; and let them be careful about their horses, elephants, and chariots. O chief of men, collect together all that ought to be kept ready for the battle.

42. Duryodhana, O lord of men, will not be able to return you any portion of your prosperous territories which were yours in days of old and which he stole from you at a game of dice.

Thus ends the seventy third chapter, the speech of Krishna, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—*contd.Bhima said :—

1. In such a way that there may be peace among the Kurus, O slayer of Madhu, should you speak. Do not frighten them with the prospect of war.

2. Resentful, wrathful, not accepting what is for his good and of a vain disposition, Duryodhana should not be spoken to in harsh terms. He should be treated with courtesy.

3. He is by nature of a wicked disposition and has a heart equal to that of the robbers; he is vain with the sense of possession of prosperity and an enemy of the Pandavas.

4. He is without foresight and cruel; and he has the habit of finding fault with others; and he is of crooked prowess, of malice which lasts for a long time and does not permit himself to be led by others, of a wicked soul and fond of deceit.

5. Even if he dies he would not tender his submission, nor give up or alter his own opinions. Peace with such an one, O Krishna, I consider to be difficult of effecting.

6. He does not listen to even the words of his well-wishers, destitute of virtue, fond of falsehood and always goes against the advice and intentions of his well-wishers.

7. Depending on his own natural wickedness and subject to the impulse of wrath, he, as if by nature, acts sinfully like a serpent hid among the grass.

8. The extent and numbers of the army of Duryodhana are all known to you, as also the nature of his conduct; and his habits of life and the measure of his strength and prowess.

9. In days of old the Kurus along with their sons were cheerful at heart and so were we, rejoicing with our kinsmen like the younger brothers of Indra himself.

10. Owing to the spite of Duryodhana, the Bharatas, O slayer of Madhu, will be burnt up like the forest by fire at the close of winter.

11. These eighteen kings are well known, O destroyer of Madhu, who annihilated their cousins, friends and well-wishers.

12. As when Dharma reached the end of his time, Kali was born resplendent with energy in the prosperous race of Asuras;

13. So were born Udabarta among Haihaayas, Janamejaya among the Nipas,

Vahula among the Talajanghas, and the proud Vasu among the Krimis,

14. And Ajavinda among the Suviras, Rushadhika among the Surashtras, Arkaja among the Vahlis, Dhautamulaka among the Chinas,

15. Hayagriva among the Videhas, Varayu among the Mahanjasas, Vahu among the Sundaravansas, Pururava among the Diptakshas,

16. Sahaja among the Chedis and Matsyas, Brishadhwaja among the Praviras, Dharana among the Chandravatsas, Vighanau among the Mukutas,

17. And Shama among the Nandivegas. These wicked beings in each family were born, O Krishna, at the end of each Yuga for the destruction of their own family.

18. So has this Duryodhana been born at the end of this Yuga in our family—that of the Kurus—that wicked individual, the vilest and most despicable of his race, for the extinction of his race.

19. There should he be spoken slowly and mildly in words conducive to our interests and to virtue and worldly good and going fully into the subject, so as to attract his heart towards us and not in harsh words, O you of terrific strength.

20. We would rather, O Krishna, follow the lead of Duryodhana and be under his control; but let not the Bharatas be destroyed.

21. O Son of Vasudeva, act in such a way that we may live as strangers to the Kurus; but let not the sin of annihilating men touch the Kurus.

22. Our grandfather and those courtiers, who are aged, O Krishna, should be spoken to. Let there be brotherly feelings among the brothers and peace to the son of Dhritarastra.

23. I say this; and the king approves of this. Arjuna is never for war; there is great kindness in Arjuna.

Thus ends the seventy-fourth chapter, the speech of Bhima, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—contd.

Vaishmpayana said :—

The long-armed Keshava heard with a glad heart these words fraught with mildness from Bhima.

2. Being of opinion that such words from Bhima were as unusual as lightness of a mountain or coldness in fire, the younger brother of Rama, born in the race of Shura, and wielding the Sharnga bow,

3. Then encouraged Vrikodara with his words like wind encouraging flames, and said to Bhima, who was seated and who was overwhelmed with his kindness.

The blessed God said :—

4. O Bhimasena, at other times you approving of war rejoiced at the prospect of killing the crooked-minded sons of Dhritarastra, who oppress others.

5. You do not sleep but are awake with your face bent downwards, O you chastiser of your enemies; and you always speak terrible and wrathful words inclined towards war.

6. With your own wrath, your breath is hot like fire and, O Bhima, your mind is not calm like fire with smoke.

7. Alone and by yourself you sigh in a corner like one labouring under a load; and those not aware of the cause thereof consider you to be insane.

8. Like an elephant breaking into pieces the uprooted trees which he has himself felled down and beating the earth with its feet, you too run about drawing sighs.

9. Here you are not pleased with the company of men, but spend your time, O son of Pandu, in solitude; and nothing else ever delights you by day and by night.

10. Sometimes you laugh aloud all on a sudden; and sometimes you sit weeping in a secluded spot; and sometimes again you are seated for a long time with your head between your two knees and with your eyes closed.

11. Other times with your eye-brows contracted and your lips firmly pressed against each other, you gaze at objects before you for a long time. All this is the work of wrath.

12. As surely the sun is seen in the east rising and blazing forth his radiance, and as surely that body of light afterwards sets after revolving round Meru;

13. So truly shall I kill the wrathful Duryodhana with a blow of this mace. I speak this truly and there will be no swerving from this oath of mine.

14. With this oath at one time did you handle the mace in the midst of your brothers. At this time however the inclinations of you, O chastiser of your enemies, who are such; point towards peace.

15. Alas ! at the approach of the time for fight the hearts of those who are inclined towards war will be swerved away ; since fear penetrates you.

16. Alas, O son of Pritha, you see in your mind's eye the omens unfavourable to you, whether you are asleep or awake. Therefore do you desire peace !

17. Alas, you do not evince any manliness in you like an eunuch. You are overpowered by extreme fear ; and therefore is your mind swerving from the right path.

18. Your heart shakes with fear ; your mind is filled with despair ; and your thighs tremble ; and therefore do you desire peace.

19. O son of Pritha, the hearts of earthly men are inconstant and susceptible of change like a young Salmali tree moved by the force of wind.

20. This perverted intention of yours is as unusual as the human faculties in a cow. The minds of the (other) sons of Pandu will sink (in an ocean of despair) like those without a raft (and yet struggling in the waters).

21. It is to me as great a wonder as the lifting up of a mountain that you should speak words in this strain so unlike Bhimasena.

22. Looking back on your own deeds and the family in which you are born, O Bharata, rise up and do not yeild to grief. O hero, be calm.

23. This dullness which you evince is not fit for you ; for a Kshatriya does not keep that which he does not win by force of his own might.

Thus ends the twenty-fifth chapter, the speech of Krishna, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

(GHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Thus spoken by the son of Basudeva, the one who was ever wrathful and who was accustomed to return insults immediately woke up like a good horse and instantly said in reply :

Bhimasena said :—

2. You regard me, who desire to act in a certain way, in a different light, O Acchyuta. I am in an exceedingly cheerful state of mind at the prospect of war. I am of true prowess.

3. You know the truth of this, O you of the Dasarha race, owing to your living for a long time with me ; or it is possible that you do not know me like one swimming in a lake not knowing its depth.

4. For this reason you find fault with me in words that I do not deserve. Who, knowing me to be Bhimasena,

5. Would dare speak in such unbecoming language as you have deemed fit to address me ? Therefore, O you delighter of the Vrishni race, I tell you these words

6. Regarding the manly strength of myself and the might, which are not equalled by my enemies. At all times this is a dishonorable act for a man to praise himself.

7. Yet being pierced with excessive blame, I speak out of my own strength. Look at these two, O Krishna—the earth and the heaven, from which have proceeded all creatures,

8. Which are immovable, immense, and without end and which are, as it were, the mothers of all beings. If these two, out of anger, suddenly come against each other like two mountains,

9. Then I could by my two arms keep them apart with all their mobile and immobile beings. Behold the distance between the two arms, which coming together are like a great circle.

10. I do not see the man who can free himself after once getting within them. The Himavat, the ocean and the wielder of the thunder-bolt, and the grinder of Vala himself—

11. These three together cannot by their joint strength rescue a man in my power. All the Kshatriyas, who are fit for battle, and who oppose the Pandavas,—

12. I shall fell them down to the earth and trample them with the soles of my feet. You, O Acchyuta, are not unfamiliar with my strength,

13. And the manner in which after conquering the kings, brought them under subjection. If it is a fact that you do not know my strength, which is like the resplendent sun,

14. You will know then me in the fierce turmoil of battle, O Janardana. You cause me pain by your harsh words like the pain felt in opening a long standing boil.

15. Know me to be possessed of greater strength than what I have described of my own will. On the day in which the fierce battle begins, you will see me.

16. And you will see the elephants, car-warriors and horse-soldiers struck down by me ; and you will see me moved by rage killing men, who are as bulls among the Kshatriyas.

17. You will see and the world will see me cutting down the foremost warriors. The marrow of my bones is not wasted away ; nor does my mind shake with fear.}

18. I have no fear from all the worlds moved with wrath against me.

19. But I am evincing these good wishes only out of mercy, O destroyer of Madhu. I can bear all sorts of troubles, if the Bharatas are not annihilated.

Thus ends the seventy-sixth chapter, the speech of Bhima, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

The blessed God said :—

1. Desiring to know your intentions, I said this out of affection and not out of a desire to find fault with you, nor out of a desire to show my learning, not from anger, nor from a desire of saying something.

2. I know the greatness of your soul ; and I know what strength you possess ; and I know also your deeds ; and I do not find fault with you.

3. What good you yourself consider possible to do to the Pandavas, I consider it possible for you to do a thousand times of that.

4. You, along with your friend and well-wishers, are just what you ought to be, being born in such a family worshipped by all the kings.

5. O Vrikodara, those men, who enquire after the certainty of the consequence of virtue and vice in the next world in a spirit of doubt or about any matter regarding god or man, can never arrive at the right conclusion.

6. The same thing which is the cause of the attainment of the object of man is (sometimes) also the cause of his ruin. The effect of human acts therefore is doubtful.

7. The acts recommended to be followed by wise men competent to foresee the evil effects of actions have consequences other than those foreseen, like the winds from heaven (the direction taken by which no one can predict).

8. The acts performed by a man well advised, well controlled, and done in a way not injurious to any body has contrary effect by the dispensations of Providence.

9. Then, again, the dispensation of the gods, that are not the results of any particular actions, are neutralised by the actions of men ; as for instance, cold, heat and rain, and hunger and thirst, O Bharata.

10. Over and above the actions that a man is destined to perform, he can do away with others as well at his will ; which the Shastras testify ;

11. Since, O son of Pandu, there is no other way for man than action. A man should engage in acts with this knowledge ; and the result will be brought about by both preordainment and action.

12. He who engages in action with this knowledge is not annoyed at failure ; nor is he elated with success.

13. In this sense, O Bhimasena, did I speak ; and I did not mean that in a battle with the enemy ; success would be absolutely theirs.

14. I am speaking all this to you ; as when a man's intellect is confused, he should not be wholly devoid of cheerfulness, nor yield wholly to sadness or dullness.

15. At the dawn of day, going near Dhritarastra, O son of Pandu, shall I try to effect peace without a sacrifice of your interests.

16. If they consent to peace, then unending fame will be mine ; while your desires will be fulfilled and advantage will accrue to them.

17. If however they stick to their resolve and not listen to my advice, in that case there will be a terrible war among the sons of Kuru.

18. In this battle, O Bhimasena, the responsibility of guiding the car of war rests on you ; while Arjuna will draw the car, on which will be seated other persons.

19. The war taking place, I shall drive Vibhatsu's car ; for such is the desire of Dhananjaya and not because I myself am desirous of fight.

20. Therefore did I, fearful of the direction your inclination might follow from your words which were like those of an eunuch, rekindle your energy, O Vrikodara.

Thus ends the seventy-seventh chapter, the speech of Krishna, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.
(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—
Continued.

Arjuna said :—

1. By Yudhishthira has been uttered all that ought to be spoken, O Janardana; but hearing your words, O chastiser of foes, it seems to me

2. That you do not consider peace to be easily obtainable in this instance, O Lord, owing either to avarice on the part of Dhritarastra, or to the weakness of ourselves.

3. You consider, too, that human strength (alone) is without avail, and that human desires are fruitless save when attended with action.

4. These words spoken by you may or may not be true; but there is nothing which ought to be regarded as incapable of attainment.

5. You consider peace to be improbable owing to our weakness; but they are doing deeds, which do not seem to bear fruits.

6. Done in a proper way, however, our object may be successful, O lord; therefore, O Krishna, act in such a way that there may be peace with the enemy.

7. You are the best well-wisher of ourselves—of both the Kurus and the Pandavas; as the hero Prajapati was of the Suras and the Asuras.

8. Do, therefore, that which is conducive to the interests of both the Kurus and the Pandavas. I think that the accomplishment of what is for our good is not difficult for you; and this is a work which is the proper thing for you to do, O Janardana.

9. You will accomplish this, as soon as you go there, O Janardana; and, O hero, if any other treatment of that evil-souled one is derived by you; it will be as you wish—whether it is to be peace with them or not—or whatever is desired by you.

10. O Krishna, whatever you desire after mature deliberation will be accepted by us with due respect. Is not death proper for that evil-minded one, as well as for his friends and sons?

11. By whom was seen the beauty of prosperity established on the son of Dharma; and who on seeing that had no righteous means, (of winning the kingdom) O slayer of Madhu.

12. They robbed us (of our kingdom) by the cruel and sinful means of a deceitful game at dice. Where is the wielder of the bow, who though born in a Kshatriya family

13. When challenged (for battle) turns back even when death stares on him? Seeing ourselves defeated by deceit and while wandering in the woods,

14. Did I think that Suyodhana ought to be slain by me when I came out of the forest, O you of the Vrishni race; but what you desire to do on behalf of your friends is not strange, O Krishna,

15. Though how that is capable of accomplishment by mildness or by other means (I do not see).

16. If you consider their immediate destruction better, do that instantly for there is nothing to be considered about in this matter.

17. You know, how by that evil-minded one Draupadi was troubled and annoyed in the midst of the Council and that act of his was borne with difficulty.

18. That he should treat the Pandavas justly, O Madhava, does not seem possible to me. Good counsel to him will give the same result as seed thrown on barren lands.

19. Therefore what you consider proper and beneficial for Kurus—What ought to be done next by us—do immediately.

Thus ends the seventy-eighth chapter, the speech of Arjuna, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

(BHAGYVAT-YANA PARVA)—
Continued.

The blessed God said :—

1. O you of long arms, it will be as you say, O Pandava. I shall accomplish what would be for the well being of the Pandavas and for the Kurus.

2. Everything about these two acts (peace and war) is within my power. Land is moistened and purified (i. e. all weeds are rooted out of it) by action.

3. But without rain, O son of Kunti, it cannot be made to yield crops.—In that case (i. e. if there is no rain) it is said that irrigation, which can be done by men, ought to be resorted to.

4. But there even (e. i. even in artificial irrigation) you will surely behold draught brought on by divine agency (if He so wills it). Knowing this to be the case, the great-souled ones of old

5. Have said that human affairs are accomplished both by divine providence and by exertion on the part of man. This shall do only that which is capable of being done by human beings.

6. What can be done only by divine agency can never be done by me. That wicked-minded one acts without any regard to righteousness or to the world.

7. And he does not regret for doing that sort of acts ; and his inclinations which are so vicious are supported by his advisers.

8. (Who are) Shakuna, the son of Suta (Karna) and his brother Dusasana ? He will not effect peace by giving up (any portion of) the kingdom.

9. Without the slaying of Suyodhana, and his kinsmen, O son of Pritha, he does not desire to give up (the kingdom)—not even by our surrendering to him, O virtuous king. That evil-minded one will not give you the kingdom by your asking for it.

10. I think that Yudhisthira's message ought to be conveyed to him ; what is necessary and proper has already been said by the virtuous king, O Bharata.

11. The one who is such vicious inclinations will not do even that in its entirety, O son of Kuru ; and he, refusing compliance with that will deserve death in this world.

12. (In that case) he would deserve death at my hands and at the hands of the entire world. By him you all in your youth were ever persecuted.

13. (And since) your kingdom has been wrested by means of deceit by that evil-souled one, who would not obtain peace at seeing prosperity in Yudhisthira.

14. I, too, O son of Pritha, was sought to be withdrawn from your side by that vicious one ; but that evil counsel of his was not accepted by me.

15. You, too, know, O you of long arms, his dearly cherished intentions and purposes ; and that the good of the king of virtue is ever desired to be accomplished by me.

16. Knowing then his purposes and my dearly cherished intentions, why do you, O Arjuna, seem to be afraid of me, as if you did not know them.

17. The one prime object, that has been ordained in Heaven, is known to you. How then can your advice of peace with the enemy be followed ?

18. Whatever is capable of being done by me—by speech or by deed, O Pandava, shall be done by me, O son of Pritha ; but do not expect peace with the enemy ;

19. Why was not this very peace, which is so beneficial, proposed by Bhishma and humbly besought by him at the time of attacking the cattle of Virata, which is now a year since, concluded ?

20. At that moment have they been vanquished, when their defeat has been determined on by you. Suyodhana is not satisfied at the prospect of parting with a small part of his kingdom for even a very brief period.

21. The instructions of the king of virtue will always be attended to by me ; and the wicked acts of that evil-souled one will have again to be considered by me.

Thus ends the seventy-ninth chapter, the speech of Krishna, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXX.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—contd.

Nakula said :—

1. Words of different degrees of worth have been said by the just king, O Madhava, who knows what righteousness is and who is benevolent ; and they have all been heard by you.

2. Bhimasena, having ascertained the wishes of the king, has dwelt on peace as well as on his own strength of arms, O Madhava.

3. In the same way what has been said by Falguna has been heard by you ; and your own opinions, O hero, have been expressed by you.

4. Shutting your mind to all this, and hearing what the intentions of the enemy are, do that what you consider to be opportune, O foremost among men.

5. Different concussions are arrived at in different matters, O Keshava ; but with a view to success, O chastiser of your enemies, a thing ought to be done by man at the right moment.

6. An object, settled on in a particular way, again becomes different, when the conditions are changed ; therefore man cannot stick to the same opinions in this world, O you foremost among men.

7. While residing in the wood, we were of a different inclination ; and while in concealment we came to be of other inclination. But now when we are out of concealment, when we can expose ourselves to the view of others, our inclinations are again changed.

8. O you of the Vrishni race, the love of kingdom, which now exists among us, did not exist to the same degree when we wandered in the woods.

9. Hearing that, we are returned from our exile in the woods, O hero. These seven Akshauhinis have gathered round us through your grace, O Janardana.

10. What man is there who, seeing these tigers among men of inconceivable strength and prowess, and ready for battle with all their arms, will not be struck with fear?

11. Therefore do you in the midst of the Kurus speak words fraught with mildness, so that the foolish Suyodhana may not be struck with fear; and then (when these have failed) use threats.

12. Yudhisthira, Bhimasena, Bibhatsu, Aparajita, Sahadeva, myself, Rama, and yourself, O Keshava,

13. Satyaki, Virat of great strength with his son, Drupada with his minister, and Dhristadyumna, O Madhava,

14. The king of Kashi of great strength, and Dhristaketu, the lord of the Chedis—what earthly mortal is there of flesh and blood, who will fight against these in battle.

15. Therefore you will, the moment you go there, accomplish without doubt the only object desired by the virtuous king, O you of long arms.

16. Vidura, Bhishma and Drona with Vahlika are capable of understanding yourself and of speaking words of wisdom which are beneficial at the same time.

17. And they too will lead Dhritarastra, the lord of men, and that Suyodhana of wicked nature with his ministers to do as you bid.

18. When you, O Janardana, speak and Vidura hears on subjects conducive to their interests; what subject is there in the world which you cannot turn smooth and clear.

Thus ends the eightieth chapter, the speech of Nakula, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—contd.

Sahadeva said:—

1. All this which has been said by the king is eternal virtue; but you, O chastiser of foes, should act in that way by which there shall be war.

2. If even the sons of Kuru desire peace with the sons of Pandu, still do you provoke war with them, O you of the Dasarha race.

2. Having seen the princess of Panchala come in the assembly, O Krishna, annoyed in that fashion, how can my wrath towards Suyodhana be appeased without killing him?

4. If Bhima and Arjuna, O Krishna, and the virtuous king are virtuous, then I leading the path of virtue desire to fight with him in battle.

Satyaki said:—

6. Sahadeva of large mind has spoken the truth, O you of long arms. His wrath and mine will be appeased only by killing Duryodhana.

6. Do you not know that you, too, seeing the Pandavas clad in rags and deer skin in the forest, felt very sorry, and your wrath was kindled

7. Therefore what the heroic son of Madri terrific in battle has said is the opinion of all the soldiers, O you foremost of men.

Vaishampayana said:—

8. While Suyodhana of large mind was yet speaking such words, a terrible roar like that of a lion came from all the soldiers assembled there.

9. And all the heroes accepted and honoured these words of his in every way saying—Well done, well done; and the soldiers desirous of battle expressed their joy.

Thus ends the eighty-first chapter, the speech of Sahadeva and Satyaki in the Bhagavat-Yana in the Udyoga-Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA.—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1—2. Hearing the king's words which were beneficial as well as conducive to morality and worldly good, Krishna, the daughter of king Drupada, of long and very black tresses, afflicted with grief, said to the scion of the Dasarha race, who was seated there, after having given due respects to Sahadeva and the great warrior Satyaki.

3. Seeing Bhimasena inclined towards peace, that intelligent lady with a sense of her wrongs said these words with tears in her eyes:

4. O you of long arms, this is known to you. O slayer of Madhu, how the Pandavas were deprived of all happiness through deceit

5. By the son of Dhritarastra with his ministers, O Janardana ; and what message was conveyed through Sanjaya in private by the king

6. Yudhisthira. That too is known to you, O you of the Dasarha race, and by you has been heard all what Sanjaya said.

7. O you of great lustre, (this was the message) give us, O sire, five villages namely, Aberthala, Vrikasthala, Makundi, Varanabata,

8. And any one for the last or the fifth, O you of long arms. In these terms was Duryodhana to be addressed, and his friends too, O Keshava.

9. Suyodhana—though he heard these words of Yudhisthira endued with prosperity and desirous of peace—did not act up to them, O you of the Dasarha race.

10. If, O Krishna, Suyodhana desires peace without returning the kingdom ; then it is by no means proper that you should go there.

11. O you of long arms, the Pandavas supported by the Srinjayas will be able to fight with the terrible army of Dhritarastra excited with rage.

12. Not by peaceful means, nor by surrender can our object be gained from them ; therefore, O destroyer of Madhu, mercy ought not to be shown to them by you.

13. Those enemies, who do not assume an attitude of peace by words of humility or by surrender, ought to be visited with punishment by him who cares to preserve his life.

14. Therefore should heavy punishment fall on them from yourself, O Acchyuta of long arms, supported by the Pandavas and the Srinjayas.

15. This would be just the thing for the son of Pritha to do ; and will also redound to your glory ; and the accomplishment will be, O Krishna, the source of happiness to the entire Kshatriya race.

16. A Kshatriya who is avaricious ought to be killed by a Kshatriya who is desirous of proving true to his our religion ; and even if the covetous man is not a Kshatriya he ought to be slain.

17. An exception should be made, O Sire, in the case of a Brahmana, though he be addicted to all sorts of vices ; for a Brahmana is the preceptor of all the other classes, and he is allowed precedence in everything.

18. The sin, that accrues from killing from one that ought not to be killed, is the same as that which accrues him not slaying one that deserves death. Such has been the instructions of those conversant with the rules of virtue.

19. Do that, O Krishna, so that this sin may not touch you along with the Pandavas, O you of the Dasarha race, and the Srinjayas and their armies.

20. Out of excessive confidence on you, O Janardana, that I repeat what has been already repeated again and again. What woman is there in this world equal to me ?

21. The daughter of king Drupada born of the sacrificial altar, sister of Dhristadyumna, and your dear friend, O Krishna.—

22. I have become a member of the Ajamida race ; and and the daughter-in-law of the high-souled Pandu, and the chief queen of the sons of Pandu, who in splendour are equal to five Indras.

23. By the five heroes are born of me five sons, great car-warriors, who morally bear the same relation with you, O Krishna, as Abhimanyu.

24. When I, who am such, coming to the Council Chamber was caught hold of by the extremity of my hairs and annoyed within the range of vision of the Pandu's sons and during your life time, O Keshava.

25. During the life time of the Pandus, the Panchalas, and the Vrishnis I was treated like a maid-servant, and made to stand in the Council Chamber of those incarnations of vice.

26. The sons of Pandu, gazing at me, without any wrath and without any efforts to extricate me, O Govinda, were thought of by me,—saying "Save me."

27. On this the prosperous king (Dhritarastra), my father-in-law, said these words : Chose a boon, O princess of Panchala ; in my opinion you are the proper recipient of a boon."

28. "Let the Pandavas be liberated with their chariots and soldiers"—was the boon I asked for ; and at my solicitation were they liberated and sent to exile in the forest, O Keshava.

29. You, O Janardana, are very well aware of such-like troubles ; and save us, O you with eyes like lotus, along with my husbands, kinsmen and friends.

30. I am, morally speaking, O Krishna, the daughter-in-law of both Bhishma and Dhritarastra ; and yet I, who am such, was made a slave by force.

31. Shame to the skill in archery of the son of Pritha and shame to the strength of Bhimasena !—that Duryodhana, O Krishna, should be alive for one single moment.

32. If I am fit to be favoured by you, if there is mercy in you for me ; then direct all your wrath on the sons of Dhritarastra.

Vaishampayana said :—

33—35. Saying this, pretty Krishna —having lotus-like eyes, of a black colour and the gait of an elephant, and possessed of beautiful hips, taking hold of her beautiful ringlets with curls at their ends, and of a deep blue colour, perfumed with all sorts of scents, with all the auspicious marks, and very soft though bound up in a braid by her left hand, —approached the lotus-eyed Krishna ; and with eyes full of tears said these words.

36. O you with lotus-like eyes, desirous of peace with the enemy, you should remember in all your acts that these (tresses) were seized by the hands of Dusasana.

37. If Bhima and Arjuna, O Krishna, are so mean as to desire peace, then my old father will fight along with his sons who are great car-warriors.

38. And my five sons, too, O slayer of Madhu, of great heroism, having placed Abhimanyu in the front will fight the Kurus.

39. If I do not see the dark-coloured hand of Dusasana torn off from his body and reduced to powder, then what peace shall there be in my heart ?

40. Thirteen years have elapsed, during which I was waiting, entertaining in my heart feelings of revenge which were like blazing fire.

41. My heart, O Bhima, is rent asunder, pierced by darts of sharp words, as it were, at the thought that the long-armed one (Bhima) has an eye on morality.

42. Saying this with voice choked with tears, Krishna of distended eyes began to weep aloud in convulsive sobs and with her eyes full of tears.

43. And the lady with beautiful hips began to shower from her eyes extremely hot tears, which flowed down her round bosom.

44. Keshava with long arms then spoke these words with a view to comfort her— Before long will you see, O Krishna, the ladies of Bharata's household weeping.

45. O timid one, they will weep as you now do, having their kinsmen and friends killed. Already, O lady, are those with whom you are angry deprived of their friends and of their strength.

46. I shall accomplish this with Bhima, Arjuna and the twins, supported by Yudhishthira, through the ordainment of the gods

47. If the sons of Dhritarastra, whose time is now arrived, do not hear my advice ; then they will sleep dead on the bare earth, and be food for dogs and jackals.

48. The Himavat mountains could move ; the earth could be split up into a hundred pieces ; and the heavenly regions with stars might fall ; but my words would not be vain.

49. I tell you truly, O Krishna, stop your tears. You will ever (in future) see your husbands endued with prosperity and with all their enemies killed.

Thus ends the eighty-second chapter, the speech of Krishna, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

(BHAGABAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Arjuna said :—

1. You are now the best friend of the Kurus. Being related to both parties by thick ties, you are now their friend.

2. O Keshava, you are competent to bring about what is good both for the Pandavas and the son of Dhritarastra ; and therefore it is proper that you should bring about peace between them.

3. Having set out from here, O you with eyes like lotus, being free from wrath to Suyodhana, with the objects of peace, speak to our brothers what should be spoken, O you slayer of enemies.

4. If the boy does not accept your beneficial words conducive both to morality and worldly good, and calculated to assure their weal ; then shall he be subject to his fate.

The blessed God said :—

5. I shall go to king Dhritarastra with the desire of doing what is righteous and what is for our good and for the benefit of the Kurus.

Vaishampayana said :—

6. The night having passed away and the sun having risen spotless, as it were, and on the setting in of the moment, called Maitri, while the rays of the sun were still mild.

7. In the month of Kaumuda (Kartika) under the constellation of Revati after the passing away of Autumn, and in the dewy season and at a time when the earth had an abundance of crops on it, that foremost of men of prowess

8. (Janardana) listening to auspicious and holy sounding words which were true at the same time, recited by the Brahmanas, like Vasava hearing the prayers of the Rishis, and

9. Having performed the customary rites of the morning and after a bath and wearing holy ornaments, worshipped the sun and the fire.

10. Having touched the tail of a bull and having paid due respect to the Brahmanas, and going round the fire and looking an auspicious object placed before him,

11. Janardana addressed Satyaki, the grandson of Cini, who was seated near, after knowing the exact wishes of the Pandava (Yudhisthira), saying—

12. 'Make ready my car along with my conch, discus, and mace and my arrows, and arrow-holders and all sorts of offensive and defensive weapons ;

13. For Duryodhana is wicked-souled, and so are Karna and the son of Suvala. Even by a strong man an enemy should not be made light of, though be he weak.

14. Knowing his wishes, the attendants of Keshava, the wielder of the mace and the discus, employed themselves in yoking the car.

15. The car was shining and effulgent like the fire appearing before the dissolution of the world, and quick of speed like the wind, and ornamented with two wheels which were shining like the sun and the moon.

16. (And it was ornamented) with figures of half moons, and moons, and of fishes, animals, and birds and with various kinds of flowers and with all sorts of precious stones all over.

17. It was beautiful to look at, being large and effulgent like the morning sun, and having its several parts ornamented with gems and gold and furnished with nice flags and banners.

18. Ornamented with beautiful objects, and covered over with tiger skins, it was incapable of being opposed, the destroyer of the fame of enemies and the cause of enhancement of the joys of the Yadu race.

19. They yoked to it the horses Shawja, Sugriva, Maghapushpa and Valahaka, after they had been bathed and attired in all their harness.

20. And, as if enhancing the glory of Krishna, the chariot with flag was perched on with a loud noise by the chief of the featherly creation.

21. Shaurin then ascended the chariot, which moved along at the will of the rider, which was high as the peak of the Meru, and which rattled as the roar of the clouds or the sound of the kettle-drums.

22. Then having caused Satyaki to mount on it, that best of male beings set out filling the earth and the sky with the rattle of the wheels of the chariot.

23. And in a moment the sky became cloudless ; and favourable winds blew ; and the whether became calm and serene.

24. Auspicious animals and birds going round the car became the followers of Vasudeva in his journey.

25. The birds of the crane, peacock and goose species followed the slayer of Madhu with sounds signifying the attainment of the object for which the journey was undertaken.

26. The fire, too, on which had been offered Homa libations accompanied by incantations, became bright and smokeless inclining towards the right.

27. Vasistha and Vamadeva, Bherudyumna, Gya, Kratha, Shukra, Narada, and Valmika, Maruta, Kushala and Vhrigu,

28. And other Brahmarshis and the gods united together and stood to the right of Krishna, who contributed to the happiness of the Yadus and was the younger brother of Vasava.

29. In this way worshipped by this blessed group of great Rishis endued with great qualities, Krishna set out for the encampment of the Kurus.

30. Yudhisthira, the son of Kunti, Bhimasena and Arjuna and the two descendants of Pandu—the two sons of Madri followed him as he proceeded along.

31. The powerful Chekitana, and Dhristaketu, the lord of the Chedis, Drupada, Kashi and the great car-warrior Shikhandi,

32. And Dhristadyumna and Virata in company with his sons, the Kekaya princes—all Kshatriyas followed the bull of the Kshatriya race to attain his object.

33. And the just king Yudhisthira, endued with lustre, having followed Govinda to some distance, said these words in the midst of those kings.

34. He, who from desire or anger, fear or object of gaining his ends, never does an unjust act ; and he who is of a calm intellect and not given to avarice,

35. Who knows what virtue is, who is wise and endued with intelligence, who is cognisant of the inner working of the hearts of all beings, who is the lord of all creatures and the eternal god of the gods—

36. The son of Kunti embracing this being, endued with all the virtues and having the mark of the auspicious whirl on his person, began to address thus :

Yudisthira said :—

37. The lady, who had reared us from our infancy, with whom fasts and devotion are habits, and who is ever attached to propitiatory rites and ceremonies,

38. Who is attached to the worship of the Gods and the guest and the due service of her elders, who is fond of her sons, and bearing great affection for them, and who, O Janardana, are dear to us,

39. Who has saved us from the wickedness of Suyodhana, O grinder of enemies, like a boat (saving the ship wrecked) from the great and terrific death in the sea,

40. And by whom troubles have often been encountered, O Madhava, for our sake, though she herself is not desiring it, should be interrogated regarding her welfare.

41. Having saluted her first, embrace this lady and comfort her, who is filled with grief for her sons by talking again and again of the Pandavas ;

42. Ever since her wedding has she, O chastiser of foes, encountered troubles and griefs due to her fathers-in-law, though she has not deserved these.

43. Will there ever come a time, O Krishna, when at the end of all my troubles, I shall give my troubled mother happiness, O chastiser of foes.

44. When we were about to go into exile, she followed us in distress out of fondness for her children crying aloud ; but we went to the forest leaving her behind.

45. One does not necessarily die of grief and if she is alive, O Keshava, hospitably entertained by the Anartas though in extreme distress on account of her sons and others

46. Then, O Krishna, having greeted her on my behalf, O Lord, and also Dhritarastra and the kings on the side of the Kurus, and those who are my seniors in age,

47. And Blisma, and Drona and Kripa, and the great king Valhika, and the son of Drona, and Somadatta and all the Bharatas,

48. And the exceedingly wise Vidura, the adviser of the Kurus, O slayer of Madhu,—that man of illimitable knowledge and conversant with the rules of morality should be embraced by you.

49. Yudisthira, having thus addressed Keshava in the midst of those kings, returned at the bidding of Krishna, after going round him.

50. Bibhatsu, too, as he proceeded along, said to his friend, that bull among men, that slayer of heroes on the enemy's side, that scion of the Dasarha race who has never been defeated.

51. O Lord, O Govinda, it is known among all the kings that it has already been decided in our consultation to demand the return of one half of the kingdom.

52. And if they give us that for the sake of honesty without insult to us and with due respect to yourself, then, O you with long arms, they would do what is desired by me and themselves escape a great evil.

53. But if the son of Dhritarastra, who is not cognisant of the proper way of executing acts, does otherwise, I shall surely bring on the annihilation of the Kshatriyas, O Janardana.

54. The son of Pandu (Arjuna) having thus addressed, Vrikodara became greatly pleased; and every moment out of rage, the Pandava's frames shook ;

55. And while trembling, the son of Kunti sent forth loud shouts hearing the words of Dhananjaya ; and his mind was exceedingly filled with delight.

56. Hearing that shout of his, the bowmen trembled (with fear) ; and the animals in the army passed urine and dung.

57. Having thus addressed Keshava, and thus given out his resolve, he (Arjuna) returned at his bidding after first going round Janardana.

58. And all these kings having returned Janardana made good progress in his journey, light of heart, drawn by Saivya and Sugriva.

59. These horses of Vasudeva, led by Daruka, (went on) as if kissing the roads and swallowing the sky.

60. Keshava of long arms saw on the road, standing on either side, several Rishis effulgent with the Brahmic lustre ; and Janardana, too, quickly alighting from his chariot paid them due respects.

61. As he worshipped them, he addressed to each in suitable terms, enquiring of them if all went on well in the worlds and if piety was well established there,

62. And also if the three orders acted in obedience to the Brahmanas. Having paid them due honors, the slayer of Madhu said to them.

63. What is the object of you, prosperous ones ? Where are you going ? What are you, prosperous beings, going to do ?

What shall I do for you ?

64. With what object have you, prosperous ones, come down to the face of the earth? The son of Jamadagni said coming near that slayer of Madhu.

65. (After) the friend of the lord of the gods and the Asuras had embraced Govinda and said : " The divine Rishis and vastly learned Brahmanas of a pious life,

66. And Rishis of royal descent, O you of the Dasarha race, as also venerable devotees, who were witnesses, O you exceedingly wise Being, to the ancient feats of the, gods and the Asuras,

67. Are desirous of seeing all the Kshatrya rulers of the earth and the courtiers and the kings assembled together from all sides, as also yourself, the true Janardana.

68. We are going, O Keshava, to behold this grand sight worthy of being seen ; and we desire to hear, O Madhava, words conducive to morality and worldly profit,

69. Which will be addressed by you to the Kurus in the midst of the kings, O you chastiser of foes. Bhisma, Drona and others as also the greatly intelligent Vidura,

70. And yourself, O you tiger among the race of the Yadus, will be assembled together in the Council Chamber ; and your divine words and theirs too, O Madhava,

71. We desire to hear, O Govinda, and words of truth and of benefit. You now know our purpose, O you of long arms ; and you will again see us.

72. O hero, we will see you come to the Council safely and seated on a divine seat, endued with strength and prowess.

Thus ends the eighty-third chapter, the embassy of the God, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Ten mighty car-warriors capable of vanquishing heroes on the enemy's side with arms in their hands followed the son of Devaki of long arms as he proceeded along.

2. A thousand foot-soldiers and a thousand horsemen too (followed him) O chastiser of foes ; as also hundreds of others carrying sufficient provision and other things.

Janamejaya said :—

3. How did the great souled scion of the Dasarha race, the slayer of Madhu, go on his journey ; and what were the omens observed when that one of great prowess was journeying ?

Vaishampayana said :—

4. Listen from me to all those omens that were observed when the large-souled one commenced the journey. Some of them were earthly, and some heavenly.

5. In the cloudless sky lightnings were heard with loud roars ; while behind him clouds poured down showers of rain.

6. The seven large rivers with the Sindhu, flowing to the east, turned their courses in the contrary direction. The cardinal points were reversed, as it were ; and nothing could be distinguished.

7. The fires were ablaze, O king, and the earth shook ; and wells and water pots shot forth water by hundreds and flowed out.

8. The whole of this world was enveloped with darkness ; and neither the cardinal nor subsidiary points of the earth could be known on account of the dust that was raised,

9. There were loud roars, though no body could be seen in this earth ; and in all countries, O king, there occurred the same strange things.

10. A gale from the south-west devastated the city of Hastinapura, uprooting clusters of trees ; and there were loud sounds in the sky.

11. But wherever, O Bharata, the scion of the Vrishni race went on his way ; there were favourable winds and everything went right.

12. There was a down-fall of flowers including large numbers of lotuses. The roads became plain and divested of prickly grass and thorns.

13. Wherever he went, the giver of wealth was praised by the Brahmanas by thousands by laudatory words ; and they served him with curds, honey, clarified butter and riches.

14. Women coming out on the highways threw on the great-souled one attached to the good of all creatures wild flowers of great fragrance.

15. He then came to Shalibhavana, an enchanting spot filled with all sorts of crops, a place that was at once delicious and sacred, O bull of the Bharata race,

16. After having seen many animals, and beautiful villages enchanting the heart and after traversing diverse cities and kingdoms.

17. Ever of cheerful hearts, of good minds, and well protected by the Bharatas, and therefore not caring for the designs of the enemies, and incognisant of all sorts of calamities,

18. The people and the inhabitants of the city of Upaplavya, coming out of the city, stood on the roads desirous of beholding Vishvaksena.

19. And they too worshipped the worshipful guest, who had come to their country—the lord who had arrived there as ablazing fire.

20. Keshava, the slayer of heroes on the enemy's side, having come near Vrickasthala, the sky was reddened by the rays shot by the sun.

21. Quickly getting down from his chariot, and having undergone the purificatory rites according to the usual custom, and ordering for his chariot to be unyoked, he sat down for the customary evening duties.

22. Daruka, too, having unyoked the horses, and after having tended them according to the science of the management of horses, and taking down all the trappings, set them completely free.

23. All this being done, the slayer of Madhu said: 'With a view to the attainment of Yudhisthira's object must we pass the night here.

24. The men, knowing that intention of his in a moment, prepared a lodging; and collected together suitable food and drink.

25. The chief Brahmanas, that were in that village, O ruler of men, that were of noble ways of life, of good birth, modest, and given to the observance of the Vedic rules, and

26. Having come near the great-souled Hrishikesha, the chastiser of foes, honored him with suitable blessings and auspicious speeches.

27. Having done honours to the scion of the Dasarha race, who was honored in all the worlds, they placed at the disposal of the great-souled one their houses filled with wealth.

28. The Lord, saying to them "you have done your part" and paying them due homage and coming to their houses, again came back to his own encampment with their company.

29. Keshava, feeding the Brahmanas there to their satisfaction, and having himself eaten in the company of all of them, spent the night there in happiness.

Thus ends the eighty-fourth chapter, the embassy of Krishna, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

*Continued.Vaishampayana said :—

1. In the mean time, having come to know of the departure of the slayer of Madhu (from the Pandava camp) through his spies, Dhritarastra said to Bhishma of long arms after paying him due honours;

2. And also to Drona and Sanjaya, and the greatly intelligent Vidura with his hairs standing up, and also to Duryodhana and his ministers.

3. O descendant of Kuru, I hear a strange thing—an exceedingly curious one. Women and children and old men are talking about it in every household.

4. Some are discussing the subject out of good motives; while others are doing it, united together or separately; and the discussion is going on within the houses, as also in open spots.

5. The powerful scion of Dasarha race is coming here for the sake of the Pandavas; and that slayer of Madhu is by all means the object of our respect and regard.

6. On him depends the course of the world. He is the lord of all creatures; and in that scion of Madhu's race are centred patience, prowess, wisdom, and energy.

7. That chief among men ought to be respected by the good; for he is the eternal virtue. For the sake of happiness is he worshipped. If he is not paid due regard, misery ensues.

8. If that chastiser of foes of the Dasarha race is satisfied with due reception; then shall we obtain the fulfillment of all our wishes from Krishna in the midst of all the kings.

9. O chastiser of foes, prepare for his worship from this moment, and erect pavilions on the way filled with all necessary articles;

10. So that the one of long arms may be gratified with you. Do that, O son of Gandhari. What do you think, O Bhishma?

11. Then Bhishma and others all approving of those words of his said to Dhritarastra, the ruler of men :—This is excellent.

12. King Duryodhana, then ascertaining that desire of theirs began to order the selection of sites for the erection of enchanting pavilions.

13. Then in all places, and in the most enchanting sites there were erected many pavilions (at proper intervals) adorned with all sorts of gems and precious stones.

14—15. The king then sent there beautiful seats endued with various good qualities, girls, scents, ornaments, fine cloths, eatables and drinks of excellent qualities, garlands and perfumes of several kinds.

16. Especially for his residence in the town of Vrikasthala the Kuru-king erected an enchanting palace adorned with many gems and precious stones.

17. Having done all this, which could be done only by gods and by men of super-human qualifications, king Duryodhana informed Dhritarastra of what he had done.

18. That scion of the Dasharha race, Keshava, however, came to that encampment of the Kurus without even casting his eyes on all those pavilions and diverse sorts of gems and precious stones.

Thus ends the eighty-fifth chapter, the embassy of Krishna, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Dhritarastra said:—

1. O Kshatriya (Vidura), Janardana has set out from Upaplavya. He is now staying at Vrikasthala; and will come here in the morning.

2. Janardana is the ruler of the Ahukas, the foremost of the scions of the Satwata race, is large-minded, of great prowess, and of great energy.

3. Madhava, too, is the lord and protector of the rising and prosperous kingdom of the Vrishnis; and that divine being is the great grandfather of the three worlds.

4. The Vrishnis and the Andhakas of honest minds honour his wisdom; as the Adityas, the Vasus and the Rudras do the intelligence of Vrihaspati.

5. That large-souled scion of the Dasharha race shall I worship in your immediate presence. O you conversant with virtue, listen to me speaking of that worship.

6. I shall present to him sixteen golden chariots, each drawn by excellent horses of the same colour bred of the Vahli species and all well equipped.

7. O son of Kuru, I shall also present him eight elephants capable of working havoc among the enemy, whose juice shall be ever flowing from their temples and whose tusks shall be equal to ploughs, each with eight human attendants.

8. A hundred of maid servants beautiful and without issue, and of beauty of gold, shall I give to him; and the same number of man-servants.

9. Blankets pleasant to touch and procured from hilly tracts shall I give to him eighteen thousand in number.

10. Thousands of deer skins produced in the country of China shall I give to him, and whatever else may be fitting gifts to Keshava.

11. I shall give him this pure and very bright gem that shines day and night; for Keshava is the proper recipient of these.

12. This chariot drawn by excellent horses that traverses fourteen Yoyonas in a single day—that too shall I give him.

13. I shall present to him eight times the eatables that all his attendants and animals in the army may consume.

14. All my sons and grandsons with the exception of Duryodhana will go forward, mounted on chariots and with ornaments on to receive the scion of the Dasharha race.

15. Blessed damsels, the foremost among dancing girls, by thousands with ornaments on will go out on foot to receive Keshava of large parts.

16. The beautiful girls, that will go out from this town to see Janardana, will go without their veils drawn.

17. Let my subjects in this town, including women, men, and children, behold the large-souled slayer of Madhu like the rising sun.

18. Let all the points of the earth be filled with large flags and banners, and let the roads through which he will pass be drenched with water so as to remove the dust.

19. The house of Dusasana is better than that of Duryodhana. Let that be now furnished and well cleansed quickly.

20. This one (the abode of Dusasana) is graced with many palaces beautiful to look at; and it is comfortable, enchanting and rich during every season of the year.

21. All my wealth and that of Duryodhana are in this house. Whatever is fitting for the scion of the Vrishni race should be given to him without doubt.

Thus ends the eighty-sixth chapter, the speech of Dhritarastra, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)

—Continued.

Vidura said :—

1. O king, you are thought very well of in the three worlds, indeed as the best of men. You are beloved by the world and respected as well, O Bharata.

2. Having reached the setting part of your life, whatever you say under these circumstances can never be against the holy books, nor against the dictates of reason; for your mind is calm, as you are aged.

3. The subjects are confident that virtue resides in you, O king, permanently even as marks on the stone, or as rays in the sun and waves in the sea.

4. O ruler of the earth every one is ever beloved in this world owing to your large number of good qualities. Take pains always, therefore, with your friends in the preservation of your noble traits.

5. Be simple-minded. Do not out of childishness destroy, O king, your sons and grandsons and good and dearly beloved friends.

6. What you desire to present your guest Krishna with is much; but the scion of the Dasharha race deserves all this and much more, or indeed the whole earth.

7. For the sake of virtue or for desire of pleasing him however you do not give all this to Krishna; and I speak truly that you do this for the gain of yourself.

8. It is true that this proceeds out of deception and insincerity and therefore it is exceedingly improper. I know your secret intentions, O king, from your outward acts.

9. The five Pandavas, O king, desire only five villages. If you do not give them those they will not conclude peace.

10. You desire to win over the son of Vrisnis to your own side by wealth; and by this means you want to create gulf between himself and the Pandavas.

11. He cannot, however, be separated from Dhananjaya by wealth, or by exertions, nor by speaking all about the Pandavas. I tell this to you in all sincerity.

12. I know the noble-mindedness of Krishna, and I know his firm devotion, and I know that Dhananjaya is inseparable from him even as life itself.

13. On anything else besides a pot full water and water for washing his feet and interrogations on his health he will not even cast his eyes.

14. Show him, however, that hospitality which is acceptable to that large-souled one deserving of honour. O king, that Janardana is the proper party for showing honour to.

15. Keshava comes here expecting to do good to the Kurus. Do that, O king, by which that object may be gained.

16. The scion of the Dasharha race desires peace for yourself and for Duryodhana and for the Pandavas as well, O chief among kings; do you, therefore, what he says.

17. O king you are the father and they are your sons. You are aged and others are children. Act therefore as befits a father and let them act as your children.

Thus ends the eighty-seventh chapter, the speech of Vidura, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Duryodhana said :—

1. What Vidura has said regarding Krishna has been truly spoken; for Janardana is firmly attached to the sons of Pritha and inseparable from them.

2. The diverse kinds of wealth therefore that is proposed to be bestowed on Janardana for his honour, O chief among kings, should on no account be given.

3. Though Keshava is worthy of all that, yet place and time render it inexpedient; for he will come to think on receiving our worship, O king, that we are honouring him out of fear.

4. O Lord of the world, what would conduce to the disgrace of the Kshatriya race should not be done by a wise man. Such is my decided opinion.

5. Krishna of big eyes is most worthy of worship in this world by all the three worlds. This fact is always present in my mind.

6. But circumstances are such, my lord, that nothing should be given him. War having been decided on will not turn into peace by delaying the former.

Vaishampayana said :—

7. Bhishma, the grandfather of the Kurus, having heard these words of his said these words to the royal son of Vichitravirjya.

8. Janardana will not get angry, whether he is properly received or not. He cannot be insulted; for Keshava is not capable of being so.

9. Whatever act, O you with long arms, is fructified in his mind's eye cannot be prevented by any man by every mean in his power.

10. What that being with long arms says, should be done without hesitation. Effect peace quickly with the Pandavas through the instrumentality of Vasudeva.

11. Janardana, inclined to virtue, will surely say what is conducive to morality as well as worldly profit; and he should be spoken to in agreeable words by yourself along with your friends.

Duryodhana said:—

12. Since, O king, there is no likelihood of my being the sole enjoyer of royalty, and since, O grandsire, I cannot share it for life with them.

13. Listen to this great deed which I have fixed in my mind. I shall make Janardana—the refuge of the Pandavas,—the captive.

14. On his imprisonment, the Vrishnis and the Pandavas, in fact the whole world, will be at my disposal. Krishna, too, will be here to-morrow morning.

15. Some means for executing this in such a way that Janardana may not at all anticipate it; and so that we may not fall into any danger,—should be told me by you.

Vaishampayana said:—

16. Hearing these words of terrible import, namely of making Krishna a captive, Dhritarastra with his ministers became oppressed with pain.

17. Dhritarastra then said these words to Duryodhana—do not say so, O you protector of men. This is against eternal virtue.

18. Hrishikesha is an ambassador; and in relation he is dear to ourselves. He has done no wrong to the Kurus. How then is it proper that he should be made a captive?

Bhisma said:—

19. This wicked son of yours, O Dhritarastra, is on the verge of eternity. He selects the evil and not what is good, though begged by persons who wish well to him.

20. Instead of listening to the advice of your well wishers, you too follow him, who is established on this unrighteous path and whose surroundings are sinful.

21. This son of Dhritarastra of exceedingly wicked purposes, along with his advisers, will cease to exist in a moment when he comes against Krishna, who can do a work without the least trouble.

22. I dare not listen to any words of this man of wicked purpose, who has abandoned virtue and who is cruel and sinful.

23. Having said this, the foremost of aged men among the Bharata Bhishma of true prowess got up and went away from that place, fired with great rage.

Thus ends the eighty-eighth chapter, the speech of Duryodhana and others, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Having got up (from the bed) in the morning, Krishna attended to the daily rites; and with the permission of the Brahmanas went towards the city.

2. All those residents of Vrikasthala returned after duly informing the greatly powerful one, who was departing (for the city).

3. The son of Dhritarastra with the exception of Duryodhana, Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and others, beautifully attired went forth to (receive) him who was coming towards them.

4. Crowds of the townsmen, O king, desirous of having a look of Hrishikesha, were there in diverse sorts of conveyances; while there were others on foot.

5. He (Krishna) too having met with Bhishma who does acts without any efforts, and Drona and the sons of Dhritarastra on the way, went to the town surrounded by them.

6. For paying honour to Krishna the city was well ornamented and the public roads were decked with diverse sorts of gems and precious stones.

7. There was none who stayed within the house, O king, on that occasion. O bull among the race of Bharata—no woman, no aged, no child was indoors out of a desire to have a gaze on Vasudeva.

8. On the public road the people with their heads bowing down on the earth were praising him in verses at that time, O great king, when Hrishikesha entered the city.

9. The spacious mansions, filled with the ladies of rank, seemed to tremble under their weight to fall over upon the ground.

10. The steeds of Vasudeva, though swift in speed lost their motion, in the public road covered over by human beings.

11. That lotus-eyed grinder of foes entered the gray-coloured abode of Dhritarastra graced with many palaces.

12. After traversing through the apartments of the royal abode, Keshava, the subduer of foes, came to the royal son of Vichitraviryya.

13. On the scion of the Dasharha race approaching towards him, the high-famed ruler of men, who had eyes of wisdom, along with Drona and Bhishma stood up ;

14. So also Kripa, Somadatta and the great king Valhika stood up from their respective seats for worshipping Janardana.

15. Then having come to the king Dhritarastra of renown, the scion of the Vrishni race honoured him along with Bhishma with suitable words and without delay.

16. Madhava, the slayer of Madhu, having done honour to them according to the usual custom, exchanged words with other kings according to their age.

17. Janardana then addressed Valhika and the famous Drona with his son, and Kripa and Somadatta.

18. There in that place was a large seat made of gold, of beautiful workmanship and ornamented with jewels, on which Achyuta took his seat at the request of Dhritarastra.

19. They, headed by Dhritarastra, duly offered to Janardana, as was the custom, a cow, honey, curds and water.

20. The rites of hospitality being finished, Govinda stayed there (for a short time) surrounded by the Kurus, jesting with them and exchanging words of courtesy according to his relationship.

21. He, the subduer of his enemies, being worshipped and honoured by Dhritarastra of great fame, issued out with the permission of the king.

22. Madhava, having exchanged greetings with the Kurus suitably in their assembly, went to the enchanting abode of Vidura.

23. Vidura approached and worshipped Janardana of the Dasharha race, and presented him every auspicious and desirable offering.

24. He said : 'The joy I feel at the sight of yourself, who have come here, O you with lotus eyes, what is the use of describing ? For, you are the infer soul of all corporeal beings.'

25. Vidura, conversant with all the virtues, having finished the rites of hospitality to Govinda, asked the slayer of Madhu about the welfare of the sons of Pandu.

26—27. That scion of the Dasharha race who sees every thing as plainly as what he sees before his eyes, told every thing in detail about the doings of the Pandavas to Khattwa. Vidura was the best among the honest and learned men, and he also was the dear friend and well-wisher (of the Pandavas), he was wise, honest, and a man of principle, virtuous and learned in worldly profit, and he felt no malice (for the Pandavas).

Thus ends the eighty-ninth chapter, the embassy of Krishna, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XC.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. After his visit to Vidura, Janardana, the subduer of enemies, went in the afternoon to Pritha, his mother's sister.

2. Seeing Krishna approaching and effulgent like the radiant sun, Pritha clasped his neck with her arms, and poured forth her loud lamentations, remembering her sons.

3. Seeing Govinda after a long time, that scion of the Vrishni race, companion of her sons, endued with prowess, Pritha shed tears.

4. She said to Krishna—the best of warriors who had seated himself after receiving the rites of hospitality—with her face dried up with woe and in a voice choked up with tears.

5. 'Those, who ever since their childhood are attached to the service of their elders, those who are well-wishers of one another, those who are endued with humility, and those who are of similar hearts, were deprived of their kingdom by deceit and sent into exile, though they were desirous of remaining in the society of men ;

6. They, who have brought under control wrath and joy, who are devoted to the Brahmanas, who are speakers of truth,—those sons of mine abandoning their dear enjoyments and leaving behind them myself weeping for them,

7. Have gone to the forest, rending the very bottom of my heart. These large-souled sons of Pandu undeserving of these miseries—how did they, O Keshava,

8. Live in that great forest, O child, abounding, as it was, in lions, tigers and elephants. Losing their father in their boyhood, they were even reared and brought up by myself.

9. Without seeing their parents, how did they live in the great forest? By the sounds of conches and drums and the music of flutes

10. Were the Pandavas awakened from their sleep ever since their infancy, O Keshava; who, again, were by the roar of elephants and neighing of horses

11. And by the rattles of the wheels of the chariots awakened from sleep at home—also by the sound of conches and cymbals accompanied with the music of flutes and lyres;

12. And whose praises were sung by the twice-born at the break of day in high sounding songs; and who worshipped the deserving Brahmanas with the raiments, gems and jewels;

13. Who, worthy of respect, themselves were blessed and done homage to by the large-souled Brahmanas by laudatory hymns, and worshipped as well.

14. How could they, lying on soft blankets and skin of the Ranku deer in the best parts of the palace, be awakened by hearing the loud roar of animals in the great forest?

15. It does not seem possible to me that they obtained sleep, though they did not at all deserve this, O Janardana those who by the sound of cymbals and drums and the conches and flutes,

16. And by the sweet music of songs by woman, O slayer of Madhu, were awakened and praised by the prisoners and professional bards—how could they

17. In the great forest be awakened at the roar of animals? The one endowed with modesty, truth, patience, self-control, and kindness to animals,

18—19. And who bringing his desire and malice under control walks on the path followed by the good—he who was capable of bearing the heavy burden of the ancient sages of royal descent—namely Amvarisha, Mandhata, Yayati, Nahusha, Bharata, Dilipa, Sivi, the son of Ushanara;

20. He who followed good habits of life, and conversant with virtue, of true prowess—

he who endued with all the virtuous uses—the king of all the three worlds—viz, the virtuous-souled Ajatashatru of a pious complexion and having a complexion like that of gold,

21. Chief among the Kurus and among all in respect of virtue and those who shape their habits of life to the ways indicated in the holy books, who is of handsome appearance, and of long arms,—how is that Yudhisthira, O Krishna?

22. He who is of as great strength as ten thousand elephants and of speed equal to the wind, that is, one of great prowess and ever wrathful among the sons of Pandu, who ever does good to his dear brothers;

23. Who slew Kichaka with his cousins, O slayer of Madhu, and Krodhabasa, and of Hidimba and of Vaka;

24. Who is in strength equal to Sakra, and in prowess equal to the god of wind, who is in wrath equal to the great Siva, namely Bhima, foremost among smiters,—

25. That chastiser of foes, that wrathful son of Pandu, who controlling his rage and strength and wrath, stays with his soul under restraint, under the rule of his brother,

26. That great-souled one, that man of energy, that foremost among men, that one of immeasurable prowess, that Bhima in appearance, too, is terrible looking (i.e. justifies his name), O Janardana.

27. Tell me, O scion of the Vrishni race, how Vrikodara is doing now—the one having mace-like arms, that mighty second son of Pandu.

28. That two armed Arjuna, O Krishna, who is ever proud of being superior to that Arjuna of ancient days, who had a thousand arms,

29. Who with one of his arms darts with violence five hundred arrows, that son of Pandu, who in the use of arrows is equal to the royal son of Kartavirjya,

30. Equal in energy to Aditya, in self-control equal to a great Rishi, in forbearance equal to the Earth and in prowess equal to the great Indra,—

31. That strength by which all kings, the descendants of Kuru, have acquired this large territory of great effulgence;

32. Whose strength of arms all the sons of Pandu respect,—that son of Pandu, foremost among all the car-warriors, of true prowess;

33. Going to whose front no one returns with his life,—he, O Achyuta, who is accustomed to victories over all creatures and himself being invincible;

34. Who is the refuge of the Pandus and even of the gods—be your brother and your friend—how is he at present, that Dhananjaya ?

35. The one who is kind to all creatures, endued with modesty and having a large knowledge of the nature and use of weapons, mild, delicate, virtuous and beloved by me ;

36. That great bow-man and hero Sahadeva, that ornament of assemblies, that youth, O Krishna, who is skillful at both religious deeds and profitable from an earthly point of view, and properly waiting on his brothers.

37. Those large-souled brothers of Sahadeva, O Krishna, ever respect the habits of life of Sahadeva, who follows a good course of life—

38. Tell me, O scion of the Vrishni race, of that son of Madri, of that heroic and veteran warrior, Sahadeva, the chief of warriors, who used to wait on me ;

39. That heroic and delicate youth, that son of Pandu, well worth a gaze, is the life itself to all his brothers, though he has a different body.

40. My son, that great bow-man, Nakula of great prowess, that veteran warrior, brought up in luxury, is he well—O Krishna ?

41. Shall I behold again this Nakula, O you with long arms, that great car-warrior, brought up in luxury, deserving of every happiness and undeserving of all woe.

42. Separated from Nakula even for the shortest period of time, taken up by a wink, I obtained no peace of mind, O hero, behold me that I am still alive.

43. O Janardana, Draupadi is dearer to me than all my sons. She comes of a noble family, endued with beauty and endowed with all virtues.

44. That speaker of truth preferred the company of her husbands to that of her sons, and leaving behind her dear sons, she follows the sons of Pandu.

45. O Achyuta, how is the all blessed queen Draupadi of illustrious birth well gratified with the fulfilment of all her desires ?

46. Draupadi has a bad lot, though she has five husbands,—all heroes like the fire, all smiters of foes, and all great bowmen.

47. O chastiser of foes, the one whom I have not seen for these fourteen years,—that Draupadi, truthful of speech, is anxious for her children.

48. It seems that a man does not surely get happiness as the result of his virtuous acts, for Draupadi, though of virtuous habits of life, does not get unending happiness.

49. When I remember Krishna dragged to the Assembly-Hall, Vibhatsu, Yudhis-thira, Bhimasena and also the twin brothers, Nakula and Sahadeva cease to be dear to me.

50. Nothing ever before gave me greater pain than the dragging of Draupadi in her season to her fathers-in-law.

51. She was dragged there by that dishonourable wretch, from motives of wrath and covetousness ; and all the Kurus gazed on her brought to the Assembly-Hall in a single raiment.

52. There were at the time Dhritarashtra, the great king Valhika, Kripa, Somadatta and the Kurus who were pained at it.

53. Of all the people present in that assembly I honour that Khattwa (Vidura) most ; for a man becomes honourable by his habits and not by his wealth, nor by his knowledge.

54. O Krishna, the virtues of that high-souled Khattwa of great and deep wisdom are like an ornament of the whole world.

Vaishampayana said :—

55. That lady oppressed with sorrow, and yet cheerful seeing Govinda come, began to describe all the diverse griefs she had suffered.

She said :—

56. O chastiser of foes, could game at dice and the slaying of deers practised by these bad kings in the days of old be pleasant to them ?

57. The degree, to which this fact pains me, namely the dragging of Krishna to the Assembly-Hall in the presence of the Kurus and insulted by the sons of Dhritarashtra, is not equalled by death itself.

58. O chastiser of foes, the exile (of my sons) out of city and their wanderings and several other griefs have I experienced, O Janardana.

59. O Madhava, O chastiser of foes, living in concealment, and the deprivation of my boys, could not be so painful to me in the company of my sons ?

60. It is fourteen years now since they were exiled by Duryodhana ; and happiness should be ours, if misery puts an end to the fruits of vice.

61. I never treated the sons of Dhritarashtra in a different way from that in which I treated the sons of Pandu ; and by virtue of this truth shall I see, O Krishna, yourself along with the Pândavas after you have slain your enemies invested with prosperity, come out safe from this impending war.

62. All of them having such like qualities are incapable of being defeated by the enemies. But my father is to blame (for all this grief) and not myself, nor Suyodhana.

63. By him I was given away to Kuntibhoja like wealth given away by a rich man. While yet a girl playing with a ball in my hand, your grand-father

64. Gave me away to his friend, the large-souled Kuntibhoja; such a one was myself, and abandoned by my father and my father-in-law. O chastiser of foes, meeting with great troubles, O Krishna, what is the use of my life?

65. At the birth of Savyasachi, a voice told me in the room in which I was confined: 'Your son will be the conqueror of the world and his fame will reach the very heaven.

66. Slaughtering the Kurus in a great battle and obtaining the kingdom, Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti, along with his brothers, will perform three grand sacrificial rites.'

67. I do not doubt the eventual justification of that foreboding. I bow to Dharma and to the creator, and to Krishna who is ever great. Creatures are supported by Dharma (Virtue).

68. If Dharma (Virtue) exists in this world, O scion of the Vrishni race, thus you too will be what the voice announced, O Krishna; and you will accomplish all that.

69. O Madhava, neither widowhood, nor the loss of wealth, nor even this dispute has pained me so much as my separation from my sons.

70. I, who do not see the wielder of the Gandiva bow, that foremost of all that wield weapons, Dhananjaya—what peace can I (my heart) know, not having seen Yudhisthira for these fourteen years?

71. Nor have I seen Dhananjaya, O Govinda, the twins, Nakula and Sahadeva, and also that Vrikodara; people perform the Sradha (obsequies) of absent people under the impression that they are dead.

72. Virtually they are dead to me, and I am the same to them, O Janardana, O Madhava, say this to the virtuous-souled king Yudhisthira.

73. Your virtue is becoming less and less O son; act in such a way that this may not be; fie to them, O Vasudeva, that live under the protection of others.

74. To a mode of life attended with meanness death even is superior. Say also to Dhananjaya and Vrikodara who are constantly on the alert.

75. This is the time come for the purpose, for which a Kshatriya woman brings forth a son, if you let the occasion, which is now come, slip without doing anything;

76. You will be doing what is cruel and mean, though you are respected by the world; and if you are ever contemptible, I shall abandon and disown you for ever.

77. When the suitable moment arrives, life even should be laid down. The two sons of Madri who are ever attached to virtuous deeds should be spoken to.

78. Chose these comforts and luxuries, which are attainable by a display of your prowess, rather than even life itself; since objects attained by prowess alone are ever pleasing to those who live the life of Kshatriyas;

79. And ever gladden the hearts of men, O you best among men. Having gone there speak to him who is the foremost among all wielders of weapons,

80. Namely the hero Arjuna, the son of Pandu. Follow the path pointed out by Draupadi. It is known to you that when they (Bhima and Arjuna) are enraged they are as Death himself.

81. And (when such is the case) Bhima and Arjuna can bring the very gods to the end of their life. This insult, namely that Krishna was dragged to the Assembly-Hall, was offered to them;

82. And Dusasana and Karna spoke harsh and insulting words. Duryodhana has insulted the spirited Bhimasena

83. In the presence of the chiefs among the Kurus he will see what the consequences of that will be. Vrikodara having once been made an enemy cannot make peace.

84. The feelings of revenge in Bhima too will not calm down in a short time until that grinder of enemies does make an end of them.

85. The loss of kingdom is not a source of trouble, not even the defeat at the game of dice; nor even the exile of my sons was so much the cause of my affliction;

86. As that youthful Krishna, clothed in a single raiment brought into the Assembly Hall and that she was made to listen to harsh and insulting words, what can be more painful than that.

87. Krishna, though her husbands were living, was at that time without the protection of a lord—that lady of beautiful hips with the modesty proper to a lady and ever attached to the virtue of a Kshatriya princess.

88. Having yourself, O slayer of Madhu, as the protector of myself with my sons, and as also that foremost of powerful men, Rama and that great car-warrior Pradyumna ;

89. And having the invincible Bhima and Vijaya who never turn back from the field alive, that I should suffer this sort of grief, O best among men !

Vaishampayana said :—

90. Shauri, the friend of the Parthas, then comforted his paternal aunt Pritha who was lamenting being filled with grief on account of her sons.

Vasudeva said :—

91. O aunt, what woman is there in this world who is like you ? The daughter of king Sura, you are now (by marriage) a member of the Ajamira race.

92. Born in a noble family (and married to another equally noble family,) you are (like a lotus) transplanted from one lake into another ; you are the all-auspicious queen, and much respected and beloved by your husband.

93. Yourself the wife of a hero, you have produced heroes ; you are endued with all the virtues ; it is fitting, of great wisdom as you are, that you should bear patiently happiness and misery like the Parthas.

94. Sleep, laziness, anger, joy, hunger and thirst, the Parthas having brought all these under control are ever attached to the enjoyment of happiness attainable by heroes only.

95. The Parthas ever desirous of enjoyment of heroes' life forego mean happinesses ; those men of great energy and great prowess were not content with a little.

96. Those who are wise enjoy or suffer the extremes of whatever is enjoyable or sufferable. But persons attached to mean happiness chose an indifferent state of dullness ;

97. The former delight in the acutest sufferings or highest enjoyments ; they do not like a middle course. They consider the extreme to be happiness, while that which lies between, is held by them to be misery.

98. The sons of Pandu along with Krishna send their greetings to you ; and having submitted to your notice that they are in health, asked about your welfare.

99. You will soon see the sons of Pandu without any illness, and all their objects gained, the lords of all the world, with their enemies killed and themselves surrounded by prosperity.

100. Kunti who was filled with grief for her sons, thus comforted, said again to Janardana after driving away the gloom of her mind due to ignorance.

101. Kunti said : 'Whatever, O you with long arms, is beneficial in your opinion, O slayer of Madhu, and whatever you think right to be done, O Krishna, should be done.

102. O chastiser of enemies let these be done without transgressing virtue and without the practice of deceit ; I know, O Krishna, the power of your truth and your birth.

103. And I know the wisdom and prowess you apply to the accomplishment of your decisions in any matter regarding your friends. In our family you are virtue, you are truth and you are the great devotee.

104. You are the saviour, you are the great Brahma, everything depends on you ; what you have said must come to pass for truth itself depends on you.'

Vaishampayana said :—

105. Govinda of long arms bidding adieu to her and also going round her, went towards the residence of Duryodhana.

Thus ends the ninetieth chapter, the conversation between Kunti and Krishna, in Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XCI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Bidding adieu to Pritha and also going round her, Govinda or Shauri, the chastiser of enemies, went to the residence of Duryodhana.

2. Janardana entered the house which was furnished very sumptuously and was like the mansion of Purandara, furnished with diverse kinds of seats.

3—4. Traversing three divisions of that mansion, without a word of challenge from the gate-keepers, that one of great fame, came to a palace, effulgent with marks of prosperity and having the appearance of a mass of clouds, high as the peak of a mountain. There surrounded by a thousand Kuru kings,

5. The son of Dhritarastra of long arms, he saw seated on a seat, and he also saw,

Dusasana, Karna, Sakuni and the son of Suvala.

6. He saw them on a seat near Duryodhana. The scion of the Dasharha race, having appeared, the son of Dhritarastra of great fame

7. Rose up along with his advisers, honouring the slayer of Madhu; Keshava having saluted the son of Dhritarastra along with his ministers;

8. And having also saluted the kings that were there according to their ages, the scion of the Vrishni race (Achyuta) seated himself on a seat which was there, made of gold and beautiful looking,

9—10. And ornamented with diverse gems and overlaid with a carpet. The Kuru king then presented a cow, honey, curds and water and placed at his disposal his palaces in the kingdom; and then to Govinda seated there like the radiant Sun,

11. All the people present including the Kuru kings, made worship. Then the king Duryodhana, that foremost of victors, the scion of Vrishni race

12. Invited to dinner; but Keshava did not accept the invitation; then Duryodhana said to Krishna in that assembly of the Kurus,

13. In an humble voice but with evil intention concealed in his heart, and looking at Karna. 'For what reason the eatables, drinks, garment and beds,

14. Which have been provided for you, do you not accept. O Janardana, devoted to the good of both parties in the impending struggle as you are, you ought to keep to both sides;

15. O Madhava, you have besides, closer relationship with Dhritarastra; you O Govinda, know what is righteous and what is conducive to worldly profit in the true sense and in all their bearings.

16. O wielder of the discus and the mace, I want to hear the reason of this (action of yours).'

Vaishampayana said:—

17. That Govinda of a great mind being then addressed, said in reply, speaking like the roaring of a cloud, at the proper time raising his long arm.

18. The one with eyes like the leaves of a lotus said to the king these excellent words giving the reasons—words that were not too low, distinct, correctly pronounced, and without any confusion.

19. 'Those messengers only, who have gained their objects take their food and accept worship; and you, O Bliarata, after gratifying me in my wish, may entertain me along with my followers.'

20. The son of Dhritarastra, being thus spoken to, said in reply to Janardana: 'It is not befitting that your exalted self should behave in this unjust way.

21. Whether your objects are gratified or not gratified, we, O slayer of Madhu, were bent on entertaining you but could not. O you of the Dasharha race,

22. We do not however see any reason (for your action) in this matter, O slayer of Madhu, namely your non-acceptance of the entertainments provided for you, O best among men.

23. We have no enmity with your exalted self, O Govinda, nor strife; therefore shall it seem to you, on mature thought that it is not proper for you to have spoken thus.'

Vaishampayana said:—

24. Janardana thus spoken to, said by way of reply to the son of Dhritarastra, after that scion of the Dasharha race had gazed on him along with his ministers, laughing as it were.

25. 'I never abandon virtue from motives of desire, or from wrath, or from hate or from the object of gaining my objects or for the sake of argument, or from covetousness.

26. One should eat (others') food when there is love (between them), or again it should be taken when one is in distress; O king, neither do you please me, nor am I in distress.

27. For no reason do you, O king, bear malice, even since their birth, to the Pandavas who are your loving followers and brothers and in whom there are developed all the virtues.

28. This malice towards the sons of Pritha, for no reason, is not fitting. The sons of Pandu stand on virtue and who is there that can blame them and in what way?

29. He who bears them malice, bears me malice; he that follows them, follows me, know that I am merged in the Pandavas.

30. He who following the dictates of impulse or wrath, owing to a confusion of the intellects, wants to act against the interests of

31. A deserving man and bears him malice, has been called the vilest of men; and he who desires to see a cousin endued with blessed virtue with eyes of lust or ignorance,

32—33. Is a slave to his soul and a slave to his wrath ; prosperity does not remain with him for any length of time. On the other hand, he, who, by good services, wins over those who are endued with virtues and accomplishments, though they are not dear to his heart ever become renowned.

34. All these eatables, defiled by wickedness, cannot be taken by me—I am of opinion, that eatables provided to me by Khattwa alone, Vidura should be eaten by me.

35. The one of long arms, thus speaking to the wrathful Duryodhana, then came away from the white mansion of the son of Dhritarastra.

36. And the large minded Vamadeva of long arms, coming out went to the residence of the great-souled Vidura.

37. There came to him the Kurus, Drona Kripa, Bhishma, Vahlka while the one with long arms was staying in the house of Vidura.

38. Those Kurus said to the heroic Madhava, the slayer of Madhu, 'You scion of the Vrishni race, we place at your disposal our abodes ornamented with gems.'

39. The slayer of Madhu, of great energy said to those descendants of Kuru, 'All of you may go away ; by these offers have you honoured me.'

40. The Kurus having departed, the Khattwa Vidura paid due honours to the scion of the Dasharha race who had never met with a defeat and then made special endeavours to meet all his wishes.

41. Then the Khattwa collected large quantities of clean and delicious foods and drinks for the great-souled Keshava.

42. The slayer of Madhu having gratified the Brahmanas first,—he gave first to Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas, some of that food with wealth.

43. There along with his followers, like Vasava in the midst of the Marutas, he took his clean and delicious eatables provided by Vidura.

Thus ends the ninety-first chapter, the conversation between Krishna and Duryodhana, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XCII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

*Continued.Vaishampayana said:—

1. During the night Vidura said to him after he had taken his food and refreshed himself : 'O Keshava, this coming of yours is not an act well thought of.

2. O Janardana that fool transgresses both worldly profit and virtue, besides he is wrathful, destroyer of other people's honour, though he is himself desirous for obtaining it, and is incapable of being controlled by aged people.

3. The wicked-souled fool, the son of Dhritarastra, goes against the rules laid down in our books of religion ; being overtaken by fate he is incapable of being led by his superiors and is a fool.

4. His soul follows the beat of his desire and in his own opinion he is a wise man ; an enemy to his own friends and suspicious in all matters ; doing nothing himself, yet not grateful (for things done for him), he has abandoned virtue and is fond of untruth.

5. He is a fool with his understanding uncultivated, the slave of his senses, following the lead of his desires and hesitates to do a thing which ought to be done.

6. He is possessed with these and many other vices ; out of vanity he will not accept your advice though that is distinctly for his good.

7. He has too great a confidence on Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna, the son of Drona, and Jayadratha, and therefore he does not think of peace.

8. It is the conviction of the sons of Dhritarastra and of Karna, O Janardana, that the sons of Pritha are not capable of even gazing at an army under the leadership of Bhishma and Drona.

9. That boy, who is not shrewd having brought together a large army from this earth, regards himself as having already gained his object, O slayer of Madhu.

10. It is the conviction of the son of Dhritarastra of mean intelligence, that Karna alone is capable of defeating the enemy, and he will not agree to peace.

11. Actuated by brotherly feelings as you are attempting to establish peace between the two parties and are seeking the good of the sons of Dhritarastra, O Keshava

12. It has been decided among themselves that they would not give back their just dues to the sons of Pandu ; and advice to them would be useless.

13. In cases where good and bad advices are of equal effect, O slayer of Madhu, a wise man does not talk like a singer among the deaf.

14. Among those fools who do not know anything and who entertain no reverence for others, O Madhava, do not speak any word as a twice-born would do among the Chandalas.

15. This child (in wisdom) who is such—this fool will not do what you say, and your words spoken to him will go in vain.

16. The idea does not please me, O Krishna, of your going in the midst of all those of wicked heart seated together.

17. The idea does not please me, O Krishna, that you should utter words among those men, of mean intelligence, vicious and of wicked hearts, of whom there are many.

18. Owing to their never having respected the aged and to vanity and folly incident to their age and to wrath they will not accept what is for their good.

19. He has at his command a strong force and if you speak to him, O Madhava, he will not act according to your advice, for he entertains suspicions against you.

20. All the sons of Dhritarastra have come to the conclusion that they are now invincible in battle even with Indra himself along with the gods ;

21. Among those who are thus endued, and who follow the impulse of desire and anger, your words though able in themselves will be of no use.

22. Standing in the midst of his ranks of elephants and his army composed of chariots and cavalry, that fool of dull intelligence, Duryodhana, thinks himself past the reach of any fear and that he has gained his object having conquered this earth.

23. The son of Dhritarastra aspires to an extensive empire in this earth without any rival. Peace with him therefore can not be obtained. The wealth (and kingdom) which is now at his command he regards as unalienably his and his alone.

24. This earth, having its allotted time, ever is on the eve of ruin ; it seems only for the sake of Duryodhana, for all the Pandavas and all the soldiers including the kings and rulers of the earth have assembled together, desirous of war.

25. All these (kings) too have before this been made enemies of by yourself ; for you have, O Krishna, dispossessed these kings of their wealth ; out of fear of you these heroes have come under the protection of the sons of Dhritarastra and joined Karna.

26. All those soldiers, united with Duryodhana and regardless of self are delighted at (the prospect of) fighting with the Pandavas and, O you heroic scion of the Dasarha race, it is not my opinion that you should enter in their midst.

27. Among those men, your enemies any in number, of wicked hearts seated together how will you go, O grinder of your enemies.

28. O you of long arms, in every way are you hard to be vanquished even by the gods and, O slayer of your enemies, I know your wisdom, manliness and your importance.

29. What have I to bear to the sons of Pandu, I bear to you in a greater degree, O Madhava, and I speak from motives of love, reverence and friendship.

30. What is the use of describing the pleasure I feel, owing to my seeing you ; for you are the universal soul of all embodied creatures.

Thus ends the ninety-second chapter, the conversation between Krishna and Vidura in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XCIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—contd.

The blessed God said :—

1. You have spoken as a greatly wise man should—you have spoken as a sharp man should, even as should be spoken by a friend like you to a friend like me.

2. This has the merit of being conversant with morality and worldly good and truth to that degree which is proper for you ; the words which have been spoken by you are like the advice of a father or a mother.

3. What you have told me is true and worthy of being followed and is even what I have described it to be ; listen with attention to the reason of my coming here, O Vidura.

4. The wickedness of soul of the sons of Dhritarastra and the hostility of the Kshatriyas—knowing full well, all this, O Khattwa have I now come to the sons of Kuru.

5. He that will relieve this earth of her burden consisting of horses, chariots, elephants, he that will liberate her from curse of Death will earn great religious merit.

6. Attempting with all his might to do a virtuous act, if a man does not accomplish it, he gets the religious merit of having done the act. About that I have no doubt.

7. Thinking of a sinful act in his mind, if a man does not accomplish it, he does not get the consequences of that act. Utter those that are conversant with religion.

8. Therefore shall I with all sincerity try to establish peace, O Khattwa among the Kurus and the Srinjayas, for they will meet with ruins in the case of war.

9. This exceedingly grave calamity has its rise in the Kurus; for it has been brought about by Karna and Duryodhana. All these are but their followers.

10. He, who does not seek to serve a friend suffering from a calamity by trying to the best of his abilities, is said to be a cruel man by the wise.

11. A friend should be turned back from improper act even by seizing his hair. That being so, how can a man be blamed, if he strives with all his might.

12. It is proper therefore, O Vidura, for the son of Dhritarastra along with his ministers to accept my blessed advice capable of doing good and consistent with morality and worldly profit.

13. With all sincerity shall I strive for the good of the sons of Dhritarastra and of the Pandavas, and indeed of the Kshatriya race of the world.

14. If Duryodhana suspects me, striving for his good as I do, I shall at least be satisfied with myself in my heart and I shall be discharging the debt (I owe them as a friend).

15. In a dispute between cousins, the friend who does not serve them as a mediator with all his might, is not said to be a friend at all by wise men.

16. In order that unrighteous, foolish and unfriendly people may not call me that Krishna though competent did not dissuade the Kurus and Pandavas inspired with rage against each other;

17. And for being of service to both the parties have I come here. And having made attempts in that direction I shall escape blame of men.

18. If after listening to my beneficial advice, they do not accept it, the fool will feel the consequence of his luck.

19. If without sacrificing the interests of the Pandavas I can bring about their peace with the Kurus, then I shall have done a meritorious act, O great-souled one; and the Kurus shall have been liberated from the shackles of death.

20. If the son of Dhritarastra think well of the wise words spoken by me—words having their source in virtue, and words leading to earthly good and words leading to the reverse of malice,—for bringing about peace—then the Kurus too will worship and honour me.

21. Otherwise I tell you that not even all the rulers of the earth united together are capable of standing in my front like other animals before an enraged lion.

Vaishampayana said:—

22. Having said these words that foremost of the Vrishnis and cause of the happiness of the Yadus, then laid down on his bed pleasant to the touch.

Thus ends the ninety-third chapter, the conversation between Krishna and Vidura, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XCIV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The two wise men talking together in this way spent that night which was beautiful and lit by stars.

2—3. That night passed away against the wishes of Krishna and Vidura, who was listening to the discourses on diverse subjects, conducive to religious merit and earthly profit and conveyed in rhythmical language from Krishna, and of Krishna of immeasurable prowess listening to similar discourse from high-souled Vidura.

4. Then (at the break of day) many professional bards and singers having a good voice awakened Krishna with the sound of conches and cymbals.

5. Janardana, that scion of the Dasharha race, that best among the Satwatas, then performed all the necessary rites of the morning.

6. Having performed his ablutions, having repeated the usual incantations to the god of fire, and having donned his attire and ornaments, Madhava worshipped the rising sun.

7. Duryodhana and Shakuni the son of Suvala coming to Krishna, that scion of the Dasharha race, and who had never met with a defeat, while he was yet performing his morning devotions, said to him:

8. "King Dhritarastra is come to the Assembly-Hall, and so have the other

Kurus headed by Bhishma and all the rulers of the earth.

9. O Govinda, they are waiting for you like the gods in heaven waiting for Sakra." Govinda welcomed them by courteous words.

10. When the spotless sun progressed a little further in his diurnal journey, Janardana, the chastiser of foes, gave to the Brahmanas gold, cloths, cattle and horses.

11. Thus Krishna having distributed many gems and precious stones, his charioteer approached that unvanquished hero of the Dasharha race, who was seated, and paid his respects to him.

12. Then Daruka soon came back with the large and shining car furnished with tinkling bells, and yoked to excellent horses.

13. That one of large mind, understanding that the celestial car ornamented with all sorts of gems and precious stones, and whose wheels rattled as loudly as masses of thick clouds, had arrived

14. Made tour round the fire and also round the Brahmanas. And putting on the Kaustuva gem which was shining with excellent beauty,

15. And surrounded by the Kurus, and protected by the Vrishnis, Krishna or Shauri the centre of delight of all the Yadavas, mounted on his car.

16. After that scion of the Dasharha race had mounted the car, Vidura, conversant with all virtues, superior to all living creatures and foremost among all wise men,

17. Duryodhana and Shakuni the son of Suvala on a second car followed this chastiser of enemies, Krishna.

18. Satyaki and Kritabarma, as also other warriors of the Vrishni race followed behind, some on elephants, some on horses and others on chariots.

19. The chariots of these men, O king, adorned with excellent gold and yoked to good horses and producing diverse sounds as they proceeded on, looked very beautiful.

20. The wise Krishna, blazing with beauty, in fit time, came up on a high way well swept and whose dust had been cleared away, and which was fit to be used even by the Rishis of royal descent.

21. The scion of Dasharha race having set out, there was one continual music of cymbals. The conches began to be played, also all the other instruments that were there.

22. A large number of young men of the strength of lions, heroic chastisers of foes in the world surrounding the car of Shatri, followed him.

23. And there were others by thousands, who in diverse and strange attires holding swords, lances and axes followed Krishna.

24. There were five hundred elephants, and chariots by thousands, that came up behind the heroic scion of the Dasharha race, who had never sustained a defeat.

25. O chastiser of enemies, the city of the Kurus was filled by old and young men including women, who were desirous of seeing Janardana advancing on a car.

26. Many were the houses that were tottering under the load of women, who were in the terraces and balconies.

27. He proceeded slowly along gazing in all directions, worshipped by the Kurus; and listening to sweet speeches and returning suitable greetings.

28. The followers of Keshava having arrived at the Assembly-Hall filled all directions with the sound of conches and cymbals

29. The entire assembly of those kings of immeasurable energy began to shake with delight with the desire of seeing Krishna come.

30. Then those rulers of men became rejoiced at the inference that he was near, which they drew on account of their hearing the rattles of his chariot, which was like the roar of clouds charged with rain.

31. Shauri, the best among the entire Satwata race, coming to the gate of the Assembly-Hall, got down from the car which was like the peak of the Kailasha mountain.

32. He then entered the Hall, which was like the abode of the great Indra, and was blazing as it were with the beauty of energy, and which looked like a mass of newly formed clouds.

33. Getting hold of the hand of Vidura and that of Satyaki (on either side) the one of great fame (entered the Assembly-Hall) eclipsing the Kurus (planets) in splendour like the sun.

34. In front of Vasudeva were the two, Karna and Duryodhana; while behind him sat the Vrishnis and Kritavarma.

35. Bhishma, Drona and others following the example of Dhritarastra rose up from their seats with the object of honouring Janardana.

36. That scion of the Dasharha race approaching the lord of men having eyes of wisdom along with Drona and Bhishma and others all of great fame rose up from their seats.

37. The great king Dhritarastra, the lord of men, having got up, those thousands of kings all rose up also.

38. A seat respectable in every way and adorned with gold was placed there under instructions from Dhritarastra.

39. With a smiling face, did the virtuous-souled Madhava greet the king, Bhishma and Drona, as also other kings according to their respective age.

40. Then all the kings and rulers of the earth and all the Kurus worshipped Keshava or Janardana who had come into the Assembly-Hall.

41. That chastiser of foes, the scion of the Dasharha race, while staying there, beheld in the heaven the Rishis who had attained to the better world. And seeing the Rishis under the leadership of Narada,

42. The scion of the Dasharha race said to Bhishma the son of Santanu slowly, "To see this earthly assembly have the Rishis come, O ruler of men.

43. Invite them with plenty of seats, and welcome them; for they remaining unseated, who is capable of taking his seat?

44. Arrange therefore immediately for the worship of these Munis who have conquered their souls." The son of Santanu seeing the Rishis come at the very gates of the Assembly-Hall,

45. Quickly commanded the attendants to get seats soon for them and they brought many spacious and beautiful seats

46. Embroidered with gold and set with gems. After they had accepted due worship and seated themselves, O Bharata,

47. Krishna took his seat; so did all the kings, in their respective seats. Dushasana offered to Satyaki an excellent seat.

48. Vibhingsati gave a beautiful golden seat to Kritavarma and not far from Krishna. Karna and Duryodhana,

49. The two men of large souls and wrathful sat on one and the same seat. The king of the Gandharas Sakuni, surrounded by the Gandhara chiefs,

50. With his son sat on one seat, O lord of the world. The great Vidura sat on a holy seat covered with a white deer skin, and decked with gems.

51. That one of great intelligence sat contiguous to the seat of Shauri. All those kings, having for a long time looked at the scion of the Dasharha race,

52. Were not gratified with gazing on Janardana as if drinking nectar. Janardana was attired in a yellow robe and looked like the Atasi flower.

53. He sat in the midst of that Assembly like a dark gem placed on gold.

54. They all were silent while Govinda was thinking within himself and no man there made the slightest utterance.

Thus ends the ninety-fourth chapter Krishna's presence in the Assembly-Hall in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XCV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. All of them having taken their seats and perfect stillness having prevailed among the kings, Krishna who had an excellent set of teeth and had the voice of a drum began to speak.

2. Like the roar of clouds at the close of summer, Madhava, looking on Dhritarastra, spoke so that the assembly could hear;—

3. "Between the Kurus and Pandavas there may be peace, O Bharata, without the slaying of heroes (on either side)—to effect this have I come.

4. O king, I have nothing else to say—every thing that ought to be known in this world is known to you, O chastiser of foes.

5. O ruler of the earth, this dynasty (of yours) is the best among these of all kings; it is noted for its knowledge of the scriptures as also for its good ways of life, and it is endued with all the virtues.

6. Kindness, pain at the sight of other's pains, desire to remedy evils and humanity, O Bharata, as also sincerity, forgiveness, and truth, are specially in the nature of the Kurus.

7. Belonging to this noble family which is such, O king, no one should do what is improper, and especially an improper act is to be deplored when you are the cause of it.

8. You, O best of Kuru race, being the foremost among them, bear the load of the Kurus when they behave, O Sire, deceitfully towards others or to members of their own family, when the deceit is actually done in act or when it is conceived.

9. Those sons of yours, O Kauravya, headed by Duryodhana, are acting impiously setting aside all considerations of morality and earthly good.

10. Those wicked ones, whose self-respect is gone, and whose hearts have been perverted by avarice, (are acting unfairly) towards their own chief friends—O best of men.

11. This exceedingly grave disaster has its rise among the Kurus and if regarded with indifference, it will destroy the whole earth, O Kauravya.

12. If you desire so, O Bharata, this can be averted; in this instance peace is not hard to secure; such is my opinion, O best of the Bharatas.

13. Peace depends on you, O king, and on myself as well, O lord of the universe, O Kauravya, set right your sons and I shall set the enemies (Pandavas) right.

14. Your commands, O chief among kings, should be followed by your sons with their followers; and it will conduce exceedingly to their own good to act according to your orders.

15. It will conduce to your good, O king and also to the good of the Pandavas, for you try to establish peace, desirous of ruling as you are.

16. Act for yourself after a consideration of the consequences, O lord of the universe, and let the Bharatas be your allies O lord of men.

17. Protected by the Pandavas, O king, establish morality and earthly good. O lord of men, by every exertion in your power, allies such as they, cannot be secured.

18. The great-souled sons of Pandu protecting you, even Indra with the gods cannot withstand you; how can earthly kings do it?

19.—21. Against the side taken up by Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna, Vibhingsati, Ashwathama, Vikarna, Somadatta, Vahlka the king of the Sindhus and the lord of the Kalingas, the chief of the Kambojas, Suda-kshina, Yudhishthira, Bhimasena, Savyasachi and the twins, and Satyaki of great energy and the great car-warrior Yuyutsu—who is there of such misdirected energy to fight, O you the best among the Bharatas.

22. The lordship over the world and the quality of being invincible by your foes, will you attain, O you slayer of enemies, when united with the Kurus and the Pandavas?

23. The rulers of the earth, of the same position as yourself, O lord of the earth, and kings of better position even will seek to establish peace with you and with one another if you are so united.

24. You will be able to live in happiness being protected on all sides by your sons and grandsons, your fathers and brothers, and friends.

25. Keeping their interests well before you, and treating them well, as in days gone by will you enjoy this entire earth, O lord of the earth.

26. United with these, and with all the Pandavas, O Bharata, will you win victories over other enemies; this is all to your own advantage.

27. Territories acquired by them will you enjoy, O chastiser of enemies, if you are allied to your sons, kinsmen and counselors, O lord of men.

28. In the case of a fight, O great king, you will see a great loss and in loss to both parties what meritorious deed do you see?

29. The Pandavas being killed in battle or your own sons of great strength, describe O great king the feelings that you will experience, O best of the Bharatas.

30. They are heroes who have mastered the use of weapons and all of them are desirous of war—these sons of Pandu and of yourself; save them from a great calamity.

31. You will not see all the Kurus, nor all the Pandavas, in the event of a battle, the heroes on both sides being weakened in number and in strength, and car-warriors slain by car-warriors.

32. The kings have assembled here, O best of kings; they will destroy these creatures, being influenced by wrath.

33. Rescue, O king, the world; do not destroy these creatures; yourself regaining your natural disposition all this will end, O delighter of the Kuru race.

34. Coming from noble families, liberal and generous, endued with modesty, honourable, pious they are related to one another by blood, O king. Save them from a grave calamity.

35. These protectors of the earth meeting one another in a spirit of peace, and having dined and drank together, let them return to their respective homes.

36. With good robes on, with wreaths on and doing courtesies to one another, O best of the Bharata race; and with their wrath and enmity against one another plucked out (from their hearts), O chastiser of your foes.

37. Let the feelings of affection that you had for the Pandavas, return to you at the expiration of this age; and let them be the same to you; act in this way, O best of the Bharata race.

38. As boys they lost their father, and were reared and brought up by you; protect them in a way that would be in accordance with justice as you would do your sons, O best of the Bharata race.

39. By you they ought to be protected and especially when in distress. Let not your sense of virtue and appreciation of worldly good be lost, O best of the Bharata race.

40. The Pandvas, O king, having saluted and propitiated you, have sent you this message. 'At your command have we with our followers suffered misery.

41. These twelve years have been spent by us in exile in the forest and the thirteenth year have we spent in each other's company in disguise.

42. Truly believing that our father would not break that pledge of his towards us, did we not break, O sire, our own. The Brahmanas who accompanied us know this.

43. Therefore do you abide by your pledge, as we have done ours, O best of the Bharata race; having long suffered grave troubles, O king, we desire to get the share of our own kingdom.

44. Knowing the principles of virtue and worldly good, it is your duty to save us; seeing that you are our elder, have we patiently suffered troubles.

45. Therefore do you act towards us as our father and mother; and treat us, O Bharata, according to the excellent principles that ought to be adopted by an elder.

46. We act towards you in that way (the way in which youngsters should behave towards their elders); you also act towards us in the same way (the way in which elders should behave towards their youngsters). If we follow the wrong way, then should we be set right by our father.

47. Set us in the proper path and follow yourself the excellent path of virtue.' And your sons, O best of the Bharata race, have sent this message to this assembly of kings.

48. In an assembly conversant with the rules of virtue, nothing improper should happen (but in one) in which vice prevails over virtue or falsehood over truth.

49. If this happens with the knowledge of the members thereof, they are themselves slain; when virtue, pierced by vice, makes an appeal to an assembly,

50. And the shaft (of vice) is not taken out, the members thereof are themselves pierced by it. In fact virtue kills them like a river destroying the trees growing upon its banks.

51. Those who are adopting a calm attitude and are silently waiting for virtue to assert itself, have said what is righteous, true and just, O best of the Bharata race.

52. What else are you capable of saying to them than giving back their kingdom? Let the protectors of the earth who are assembled in this council, speak.

53. If I am speaking the truth, keeping in tact virtue and morality, then liberate these Kshatriyas from the shackles of death, O foremost among men.

54. Be peaceful, O you foremost of the Bharata race and do not give in to anger. Having given back to those Pandavas, their due shares of the ancestral kingdom

55. Enjoy the blessings of life, O chastiser of foes, along with your sons under the attainment of your objects. You know that Yudhishthira follows the course of virtue always

56. As also (you know) his treatment towards yourself and your sons, O ruler of men. He was burnt and he was exiled but again he has come back to your protection.

57. He was exiled to Indraprastha by yourself with your sons and while staying there he brought under his sway all the rulers of the earth.

58. And yet he remained under your protection and never disregarded you; such a man as he, was recently, sought to be robbed by the son of Suvala,

59. Of his kingdom, wealth and coin by means of a great deceit. He, even when he was brought to that condition, namely when Krishna was dragged to the Assembly-Hall,

60. Yudhishthira of immeasurable soul did not swerve from Kshatriya's duty. I too desire your good and theirs, O Bharata.

61. Do not, O king, destroy these beings of the birth for the sake of vice, and earthly good for the sake of happiness thinking evil to be good and good to be evil for yourself.

62. Restrain your sons, O lord of the universe, who are too much attached to avarice. The sons of Pritha live to serve you and to fight for you, O chastiser of foes; whatever course, O king, appears better, follow, O chastiser of foes."

Vaishampayana said:—

63. All the rulers of the earth, agreeing as they did in their minds with these words, could not venture to say any thing there in the presence (of Duryodhana).

Thus ends the ninety-fifth chapter, the speech of Krishna, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXVI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. These words having been uttered by the high-souled Keshava, all the courtiers sat stupified with their hairs standing on their end.

2. No man ventured to say anything in reply and all the rulers of the earth began to think in their own minds.

3. Silence having thus prevailed in the midst of those kings, the son of Jamadagni, spoke these words in the assembly of the Kurus.

4. "To these truthful words of mine, illustrated by an example, listen without entertaining any doubt or suspicion and hearing that, accept the moral if you think my story good.

5. In days of old, there was a king named Dambhodbhava who had brought under his sway the entire world and enjoyed the fruits of the whole world in their entirety; such has been heard by us.

6. Every day at the end of night, that great and heroic car-warrior, rising up, used to ask the Brahmanas and Kshatriyas.

7. 'Is there any body who is more accomplished or even equal to myself in battle, be he a Sudra, a Vaishya, a Kshatriya or a Brahmana?'

8. Saying thus he would wander over the earth intoxicated with great vanity and without thinking of anything else.

9. Several Brahmanas, of really noble souls, acquainted with the Vedas, and having nothing to fear, forbade the king who was boasting too often.

10. Even when forbidden, that vile man used to ask the same thing to the twice-born. Some Brahmanas then thus spoke to him who was too much puffed up with vanity and intoxicated with prosperity.

11. Those twice born devotees, of large souls and acquainted with the cases cited in the Vedas, excited by wrath, said to that king.

12. 'There are two persons who are the best among men and who have achieved many victories in battle; you are by no means equal to them, O king.'

13. The king thus spoken to, asked these Brahmanas again and again, 'Where are these two heroes? Where are they born? What works have they achieved and who are they?'

The Brahmanas said:—

14. We have heard that those two are the devotees Nara and Narayana who have taken their birth in the human world. O ruler of the earth, fight with them.

15. We hear that both of them, Nara and Narayana of large souls, are practising severe austerities in some hidden regions in the Gandhamadana (mountain).

Rama said:—

16. The king, having collected a large army consisting of six divisions betook himself to the regions where these two who had never sustained a defeat were, being unable to remain unconcerned at their reputation.

17. He, going to the rightful and unapproachable Gandhamadana, hunted for the two devotees and at last met them who had taken refuge in the wilderness.

18. Seeing them, the best among men, emaciated with hunger and thirst, with their veins visible and afflicted with cold, wind and with the rays of the sun,

19. He approached them and touching their feet asked them about their welfare. They received him with roots and fruits and with the offer of a seat and water.

20—21. They asked the king 'What can we do for you?' Then he repeated to them from the very beginning the fact—'The earth has been conquered by my arms and all my enemies have been killed.

22. With the desire of fighting with you, have I come to this mountain; give me this hospitality, the desire which I have entertained for a long time.'

Nara and Narayana said:—

23. This retreat, O best among kings, is beyond the reach of wrath and avarice, there is no warfare in this retreat. Where are weapons to be got from? Desire war elsewhere—there are many Kshatriyas on the face of the earth.

Rama said:—

24. Though spoken to in this way, he repeated his request and the ascetics, O Bharata, again and again comforted him and pardoned him (for his importunities).

25. Dambhodbhava, desirous of battle, however summoned these two devotees to fight again and again. Then Nara taking up a handful of blades of grass said :—

26. 'Come and fight, O you Kshatriya, desirous of fight as you are; take up all your arms and prepare your army.

27. I shall destroy your thirst for war from this moment forward.'

Dambhodbhava said :—

If, O devotee, you think this weapon fit to be used against me and mine, I shall fight with you though you use that weapon. I am come here for fight.

Rama said :—

29. Saying these, Dambhodbhava with his army, desirous of killing that devotee, covered all sides with a downpour of arrows.

30. The Rishi, by means of the same blades of grass, neutralized the terrible arrows capable of rending asunder the body of the enemies.

31. Then the one, who had never sustained a defeat, shot terrible weapons in the shape of blades of grass, which were incapable of being withstood and a strange effect they had.

32. The eyes, ears and noses of his soldiers were cut off by the Muni who could not possibly miss his aim, by these blades of grass through his illusive energy.

33. Then seeing the sky rendered white with blades of grass, the king fell at Nara's feet and exclaimed : 'May good betide me.'

34. Nara, who is the proper refuge of those that deserve and desire protection, said to him :—'O king, be virtuous-souled, and act up to the instructions of the Brahmanas and do not again behave in this way.

35. A conqueror of cities, in the possession of his enemies, performing the duties of a Kshatriya, should not, O king, be such even in his intentions, O best of the rulers of men.

36. Subject to the influence of vanity never insult any body in any way, who he be, your inferior or your superior; such a conduct, O king, would not be proper for you. Acquiring wisdom, being beyond the reach of covetousness, without vanity, acquiring mastery over self,

37. Restraining your desires, endued with forgiveness, humility and being peaceful protect your subjects, O ruler of the earth, and do not again insult any body without knowing his strength and weakness.

38. May good betide you; with our permission depart and never again act in this way; in obedience to our command, enquire of the Brahmanas about their welfare and what is for your good.'

39. Then the king, bowing to the feet of the two great-souled beings, returned to his own capital and thenceforward acted most righteously.

40. The deed, which was achieved by Nara in days of old, was very great indeed. Narayana was still greater in regard to many virtues.

41. For that reason so long as weapons are not joined to that foremost of bows—the Gandiva, putting aside your vanity go you, O king, to Dhananjaya.

42. Kakudika, Shuka, Naka, Akshisantarjana, Santana, Nartana, Ghora and Asyamodaka, these eight,

43. Pierced by these all men go to the regions of death and the same is the case when they are influenced by desire, wrath, covetousness, vanity, insolence, pride,

44. Malice and selfishness. The eight weapons are represented by these vices respectively and men, struck with them, move about intoxicated, taking leave of their senses and with their minds bewildered.

45. When pierced by them, men sleep, move about here and there, pass excreta and urine and always weep and laugh.

46. Arjuna, whose friend is Narayana, the creator of the entire world and its lord, and conversant with the nature of all acts, is hard to withstand in battle.

47. O Bharata, who can dare defeat in the three worlds, the heroic Jishnu, having the emblem of a monkey on his banner and none equal to him in battle?

48. Innumerable are the virtues of the son of Pritha; Janardana excels him however. You know very well Dhananjaya the son of Kunti.

49. Nara and Narayana, as these two were, so are Arjuna and Keshava; know this, O great king, that those two best among men are heroes.

50. If you know it to be so and do not suspect or mistrust me then adopting a virtuous resolution effect peace with the Pandavas,

51. And if you think that a rupture with them is not beneficial to you, be peaceful, O foremost among the race of Bharata, and do not set your heart on battle.

52. Your family, O foremost of the Kuru race, is well thought of in this world; let it continue to be so, may good betide you, think of what is good for you.

Thus ends the ninety-sixth chapter, the story of Dambhodbhava, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XCVII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Hearing the words of the son of Jamadagni, the illustrious Rishi Kanwa addressed these words to Duryodhana in the assembly of the Kurus.

Kanwa said :—

2. Brahma, the grand-father of this world, is eternal and undecaying; of the same nature are the two divine Rishis, Nara and Narayana.

3. Among all sons of Aditi, Vishnu alone is eternal, invincible, undecaying and the divine Lord existing for ever.

4. The others namely the moon, the sun, the earth, the water, the air, the fire, and also the sky, the planets and the stars have their end in a cause.

5. They, at the final dissolution of the universe, will themselves cease to exist, leaving behind the three worlds and all will be created again and again.

6. Others there are that die in a short time, namely human beings, animals, birds, and creatures having their birth among other living beings.

7. The kings, enjoying great prosperity up to the end of their lives, are born anew to enjoy the effects of their good and bad deeds.

8. Therefore it is proper for your exalted self to effect peace with Yudhisthira. Let the Pandavas and the Kurus rule the universe.

9. "I am strong"—it should not be thought thus, O Suyodhana, for some parties are seen who are stronger than those regarded to be the strongest, O best among men.

10. Among the really strong, physical strength does not count, O son of Kuru, and all the sons of Pandu, who are endued with the strength of the gods, are strong.

11. In this connection is cited the old story of Matali who was desirous of giving away his daughter in marriage and was searching for a bridegroom.

12. Such is the story: The king of the three worlds had a driver by the name of Matali. In his family there was born only one daughter who had a great reputation for beauty in this world.

13. She, having celestial beauty, was well known by the name of Gunakeshi and she greatly excelled all women in beauty, physical development and symmetry.

14. Matali, along with his wife knowing that the time for giving her away in marriage has arrived, became sorrowful, O king, thinking what to do in the future.

Matali thought :—

15. Alas! the advent of daughters in the family of men who are of good traditions and known for their greatness and are famous and endued with humility, is attended with bad consequences.

16. The family of the mother, the family of the father, and the family to which she is given away in marriage—these three families among good people are affected by a daughter.

17. By my human eyes have I searched the two worlds—those of the celestials and human beings and there is no suitable husband for my daughter that pleases me.

Kanwa said :—

18. Among the gods, among those born in the Daitya race, among the Gandharvas and among human beings there was none who pleased him enough to be made the husband of his daughter. The same was the case with the numerous Rishis.

19. Having consulted with his wife, Sudharma, at night (one day), Matali made up his mind to enter the world of the Nagas.

Matali said :—

20. Among gods and men I do not find a suitable husband for Gunakeshi in point of beauty. There must be some one so suitable among the Nagas.

21. Thus thinking he bade adieu to Sudharma; and, going round his superiors, and having smelt the head of his daughter entered the nether regions.

Thus ends the ninety-seventh chapter, the search of Matali, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XCVIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Kanwa said :—

1. While Matali was proceeding on his way he came across the great Rishi Narada who was proceeding, of his own will, to see Varuna.

Narada said :—

2. Where are you about to go? Is it, O charioteer, on your own account or by the command of Shatakrtu (Indra)?

Kanwa said :—

3. Matali, being thus asked by Narada, who was going on the same road, told Narada all about his business and how it had happened (that he was going there).

4. Then the Muni said to him, "We both shall go together." To see the god of the waters I too come down from heaven.

5. While showing you the nether regions of the earth, I shall describe to you everything; and after a search there we shall select some bridegroom, O Matali.

6. Then going down to the nether region, the two, Matali and Narada of large souls, paid their respects to the ruler of the world, the lord of the waters.

7. There that Narada received greetings suitable for a divine Rishi and Matali received what is generally offered to the great Indra.

8. These two, with their minds pleased, and having a business in hand, submitted everything to their host and with the permission of Varuna roamed about in the world of the Nagas.

9. Narada, who knew everything about all the creatures living in the nether regions, described them in detail to his companion.

Narada said :—

10. Varuna, surrounded by his sons and grandsons, has been seen by you O Suta. Behold now the territories of the lord of the waters which are excellent in every respect and full of riches.

11. This one is the son, of great wisdom, of Varuna the lord of the seas; he is specially famous for his holiness, his conduct and his ways of life.

12. This is his dear son, Pushkara of eyes like lotus leaves. He is endued with beauty, is worth looking at and has been selected by the daughter of Soma as her husband.

13. She (the daughter of Soma) is known as Jyotsnakali who has been said to be second Lakshmi or Sri in point of beauty; and she, it is within our recollection, had chosen the eldest son of Aditi as her husband (before this).

14. Behold this mansion of Varuna which is made entirely of gold, and attaining to which the gods have obtained their godship O you friend of the lord of the gods.

15. These weapons of all kinds, which are now visible and which are blazing, were once in the possession of the Daityas, whose territories have now been wrested from them (by Varuna), O Matali.

16. These undergo no waste, O Matali, and return to the hand of those who hurl them after striking the enemy. Obtained as they are by the gods who have won victories over the Daityas, they can be used only by men of great mental energy.

17. Here many species of Rakshasas and Daityas, O Matali, possessed of celestial weapons lived before, O Matali, which is now inhabited by the gods.

18. There are the fire of blazing flame which is burning in the lake of Varuna, and the discus of Vishnu surrounded by the fire and smoke.

19. This is the bow, full of knots, which was created for the destruction of the world; it is ever looked after by the gods and from this the name of the Gandiva bow is derived.

20. This bow, at the approach of the proper time of action, is endued as it is with the strength of a hundred thousand bows, inspired with still greater strength.

21. It brings under subjugation those kings who are friendly to the Rakshasas, though they are incapable of being reduced to that condition. This terrible weapon was created first by the Brahmana who created in speech the Vedas.

22. This weapon, in its work among the kings, has been pronounced to be the great by Sakra, and the son of the lord of the waters holds this weapon of great energy.

23. This thing, placed in the umbrella-room, is the umbrella of the lord of the waters and always showers cold water like the clouds.

24. The water, falling from this umbrella, is pure as the moon and yet is surrounded by such darkness that it cannot be grasped by the sight.

25. In these regions, O Matali, there are many things to be seen, but owing to the pressing demands of your business we shall go away from here without delay.

Thus ends the ninety-eighth chapter, the search of bridegroom by Matali, in the Bhagabat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER XCIX.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—*contd.Narada said:—

1. This city, situated in the very heart of the region of the Nagas, is known as Patalam, inhabited by the Daityas and Danavas.

2. The few creatures of the earth, who are brought here by the current of the water, when entering the region give out loud shrieks being struck with fear.

3. In these regions, the fire, called Asura-fire, which is fed by water, continually blazes forth. Held in great respect, it regards itself as confined (by the gods).

4. Here the gods, who had slain their enemies, having drunk the nectar kept the residue there. It is from here proceed the growth and decline of the moon, which we see.

5. Here the son of Aditi, with his head like that of the horse, on every festive occasion, rises up, making the world, called Suvarna, filled with the sound of Vedic hymns and mantras.

6. Since all those objects, having the form of water, fall on it; therefore is this excellent region known by the name of Patalam.

7. Airavata, taking up cold water from here for the good of the world, gives them to the clouds, and the great Indra showers this water as rain.

8. Here aquatic animals of many species and shapes and fishes of different sorts, such as Timi and others, live, subsisting on a drink from the water which is like the beams of the moon.

9. Some beings, living in this nether world, the Patalam, pierced by the rays of the sun, are dead in the day time, O Duta, and are revived again at night.

10. For the moon, rising in these regions every night, by her beams which are her arms as it were, brings nectar in contact with them; and from that are the creatures revived.

11. Here are imprisoned these wicked and unrighteous sons of Diti afflicted with misfortune. They live here being dispossessed of their prosperity by Vasava.

12. Here the great Lord of all creatures, by name Bhutpati, practised austere asceticism for the good of all creatures.

13. Here live the great Rishis—those Brahmanas attached to the vow, called Go, who have been emaciated with the recitation of the Vedas, and who abandoning the pleasures of this life have secured heaven.

14. He, who ever sleeps at any place he likes, who lives on with what others give him and puts clothes on what others place before him, is safe to be attached to the Go vows in this world.

15. Here in the race of Supratika are born those best among elephants, namely Airavana, the king among elephants, Kumuda, Vamana, and Anjana

16. See if in these regions there is any bridegroom who pleases you by his accomplishments. If so, I shall, after respectfully going to him, solicit him to accept your daughter, O Matali.

17. This one, placed here in these waters, is an egg, which is shining as it were with beauty. From the very creation of this universe it is here; and it neither moves away, nor is hatched.

18. I have never heard of its species or birth spoken of. No body knows any one as its father or mother.

19. From this, at the time of the dissolution of the universe, springs up a fire, which consumes, O Matali, the three entire worlds with all their mobile and immobile creatures.

20. Matali too having heard what Narada said, answered;—"None in these regions pleases me. Let me go elsewhere without delay."

Thus ends the ninety-ninth chapter, the search of a bridegroom by Matali, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER C.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—*Contd.Narada said:—

1. This excellent and spacious city is known by the name of Hiranyapura. It is the city of the Daityas and the Danavas, who practise a hundred different illusions.

2. It having been built with no little care by the divine architect (Viswakarma), and planned by Maya (Danava) was placed in these nether regions—the Patalam.

3. Here the Danavas, endued with great spirit and energy, practising a thousand kind of different illusions, inhabit. They were, in the days of old, heroes who had received the grant of boons.

4. By Shakra, by Yama, or by Varuna or by any body else they were incapable of being brought under subjugation; as also by the Lord of wealth (Kuvera).

5. The Asuras, known as Kalakhanjas who have their origin in the feet of Vishnu, and the Rakshasas, known as Yatudhanas who have their origin in the feet of Brahma,

6. Gifted with teeth, and of fearful impetus, and endued with strength equal to the force of the wind, and with the horoism of illusion, live here, O Matali.

7. The Danavas named Nivatkvachas, who are hard to be vanquished in battle (also live here.) You know how Shakra is not able to cope with them.

8. Yourself and your son Gomukha, O Matali, and the king of the gods, the lord of Sachi, with his son, have been repulsed by them.

9. See these mansions, O Matali, made of gold and silver and embroidered with suitable workmanship filled up according to their scientific principles.

10. Decorated with Vaidurya-gems and with corals, and with the species of white marble, called Arka, and with the shining gems, called Vajrasara,

11. They shine as if made of bricks, and set with Padmaraga gems; and they look as if made of stones or of wood.

12. They are lustrous like the rays of the sun; and are blazing like the fire and set with cluster of gems and precious stones; they are high and stand close to one another.

13. All these are incapable of being described with reference to their beauty, or with reference to the materials they are made of. They are erected with many advantages and comforts; and they have answered these objects very well. They are of a large size.

14. Look at the sporting grounds of the Daityas; and look at the resting places and beds, as also these vessels and seats set with gems, and of great value.

15. Look at these walls which are like masses of clouds; and these fountains of water and also the trees producing flowers and fruits at their will, which can also be removed from one place to another at their pleasure.

16. See, O Matali, in these regions if there is a bridegroom who is to your liking, or else we shall go to another direction of this earth.

17. Matali then said to him who spoke thus—"O celestial Rishi, I can not do what would not be to the liking of the dwellers of the heaven

18. The gods and the Danavas, though brothers, are in open enmity with each other and how can I approve of an alliance with the enemies.

19. It is better that we should go elsewhere. It is not proper that we should seek among the Danavas. I know your nature, and know that you desire to sow discord."

Thus ends the hundredth chapter, the search of a bridegroom by Matali, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER C I.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Narada said:—

1. This region belongs to the birds of excellent feathers which subsist on snakes. They feel no fatigue in showing their strength in travelling or in carrying loads.

2. This species, O Suta, proceed from the six sons of Vainateya (Gadura)—Sumukha, Suraman, Sunetra, Suverchas.

3. And from the king of birds, Surucha, and from Suvala; O Matali, they have multiplied from the race of Vinata.

4. Hundreds and thousands of birds, all of noble blood, have founded dynasties by means of begetting children in the race of Kashyapa.

5. All these are endued with prosperity; and all have the mark of Srivatsa (an auspicious mark); and all of them, desirous of prosperity, are endued with strength.

6. By their habits of life they are Kshatriyas; but as they live on snakes, they are without humanity; and owing to their constant warfare with their kinsmen they never attain to the region of Brahma.

7. I shall describe their names according to their rank; hear, O Matali. This race is much thought of in consequence of the favor which Vishnu shows to it.

8. Vishnu is their god; and their object of worship, Vishnu, is ever in their heart; and Vishnu is ever their refuge.

9. Suvarnachuda, Nagashi, Daruna, Chandatundaka, Anila, Anala, Vaishalaksha, and Kundali,

10. Pankajit, Vajraviskambha, Vainateya, Vamanas, Vatavega, Dishachakshu, Niimisha and Animisha,

11. Trirava, Saptarava, Valmiki and Dipaka, Daityadwipa, Saridwipa, Sarasa, and Padmaketana

12. Sumukha, Chitraketu, Chitravara, Anagha, Meshahrita, Kumada, Daksha, Sarpanta, and Somabhojana,

13. Gurubhara, Kapota, Suryanetra, Chirantaka, Vishnudharma, Kumara, Parivarha and Hari,

14. Suswara, Madhuparka, Hemavarna, Malaya, Matarishwa, Nishakara and Divakara,

15. These descendants of Garuda, spoken of by me, inhabit a single province; and only these beings are foremost in fame and renown.

16. If nobody, in these regions, is to your liking, O Matali, then come, we shall go elsewhere, and lead you to that country where you will get a bridegroom.

Thus ends the one hundred and first chapter, the search of a bridegroom by Matali, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Narad asaid:—

1. The name of this (region) is Rashatala which is the seventh region in the nether regions of the earth, where lives Surabhi, the mother of cows, who was born out of nectar.

2. She always distils milk which is produced from the essence of earthly things—which is of the one taste, having nothing superior to it, constituted of the essence of the six different tastes.

3. Surabhi, having no defect, herself rose from the mouth of the Grandfather, who satiated with nectar, was in days of old, vomiting the essence of all things.

4. One stream, even of whose milk, having fallen on the face of the earth made a lake which is called the excellent and holy sea-milk.

5. The limit of the sea is surrounded by foam which looks like flowers and here live those best among Munis—the drinkers of foam,—drinking it.

6. They are known as drinkers of foam, O Matali, who practise austere asceticism and of whom the gods are afraid.

7. She has got four calves, O Matali which are in the several cardinal points for they bear the load of these points.

8. The child of Surabhi, named Surupa supports the eastern point and the one named Hansika supports another point—the south.

9. The western point, under the protection of Varuna, is supported by Subhadra who is ever of a great nature and of a universal form.

10. The cow, named Sarvakamadugha, supports another point, O Matali, which is the direction in which virtue rules and so named after Kuvera the God of wealth.

11. The gods united with the Asuras, having churned the water of the ocean, mixed with milk, making the Mandara (mountain) their churning rod,

12. Extracted the Varuni wine, Lakshmi (the goddess of beauty and wealth) and nectar, O Matali and also the best of horses, Uchchaisrava, and that gem Kaus-tabha.

13. Surabhi yields milk that is Sudha to those that live on Sudha and Swadha to those who subsist on Swadha and Amrita to those who feed on Amrita.

14. The song, that was sung here in days of old by the inhabitants of Rashatala, is still heard to be sung in this world by wise men.

15. "Neither in the region of the Nagas, nor in Swarga, nor in Vimana, nor in Tri-pistapa (all names for heaven) is residence so happy as in the nether regions."

Thus ends the one hundred and second chapter, the search of bridegroom by Matali, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Narada said:—

1. This city is named Bhogavati, ruled by Vasuki, which is similar to the city of the king of the gods—Amaravati.

2. This one staying here is Sessa—the Naga, by whom is ever upheld the earth with all her greatness by force of his austerities which is the best in this world.

3. His body is of the size of the Shweta-chala or white mountain, and decked with diverse sorts of ornaments and holding a thousand heads with tongues like blazing fire. His strength and prowess are great.

4. Here live, passed the reach of pain, the sons of Surasa,—Nagas, of many species and sizes and with diverse sorts of ornaments,

5. And having the mark of gem, Swastika, circles and Kamandaties—all of them, each with the strength of a thousand, are by nature fierce.

6. Some of them are thousand headed, some have five hundred faces, some, again, have a hundred heads and some three.

7. Some have twice five heads, some have seven faces, and all of them are addicted to great pleasures and have huge bodies resembling the mountains of this earth.

8. There are many thousands and millions and hundreds of millions of unaccountable Nagas, listen to me as I say the few names of the foremost among them of a single race.

9. They are Vasuki, Takshaka, Karkotaka, Dhananjaya, Kalia, and the two, Kamvala and Ashwatara,

10. Bahyakunda, Mani, Apurana, Khaga, Vamana, Elapatra, Kukura, Kukuna,

11. Aryaka, Nandaka, Potaka, Kailasaka, Pinjaraka, and the Naga Airavata,

12. Sumanmukha, Dadhimukha, Shankha, Nanda, Upanandaka, Apta, Kotaraka, Shikhi, and Nisthuraka,

13. Tittiri, Hastibhadra, Kumuda, Malyapindaka, the two Padmas, Pundarika, Pushpa, Mudgaraparnaka,

14. Karavira, Pitharaka, Sambhritta, Vritta, Pludara, Vilapatra, Mushikada, Sirishaka,

15. Dilipa, Shankhashirsha, Jyotishka, Aparajita, Kauravya, Dhritarastra, Kuhara, Krishaka,

16. Virajas, Duharana, Suvahu, Mukhara, Jaya, Vadhira, Andha, Vishundi, Virasa and Surasa.

17. These and many others are known to be the sons of Kashyapa, O Matali; see if in this region any bridegroom is to your liking.

Kanwa said :—

18. While Narada was speaking, Matali had been gazing steadfastly; and he asked Narada being highly pleased.

19. "This one standing before Arjyaka of the Kauravya race—this effulgent being worthy to look at—whose race does he delight?

20. Who is his father, and who is his mother and what race does he come from? Of what race does he stand like the flagstaff?

21. By his intelligence, patience, beauty and age is my heart attracted, O divine Rishi. He will make the best husband for Gunakeshi.

Kanwa said :—

22. Seeing Matali, of a cheerful mind owing to his seeing Sumukha, Narada informed him the greatness, the birth and the works of that youth.

23. "Born in the race of Airavata, he is the chief of the Nagas, named Sumukha, the grandson of Arjyaka, and on his mother's side he is the grandson of Vamana.

24. His father is the Naga, named Chitkura, O Matali, and quite recently he was killed by the son of Vinata."

25. Then did Matali, being light of heart, speak to Narada these words: 'O Sire, this best of the Naga race is my selected son-in-law.

26. Accomplish this; take some pains, for I am pleased with him—O Muni, take some pains to bestow on this Naga my beloved daughter."

Thus ends the one hundred and third chapter, the search of a bridegroom by Matali, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CIV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Narada said :—

1. This is the charioteer, named Matali, the dear friend of Shakra, pious, of good behaviour, possessed of good qualities, energetic, mighty and strong, O Arjyaka.

2. He is the friend of Shakra, as also his minister and his charioteer and in successive battles has it been found that there is little difference between him and Vasava in point of strength.

3. He drives, by his will force alone, the excellent car ever accustomed to victory in wars between the gods and Asuras, yoked to a thousand steeds.

4. Vasava gains victories in the sky by means of the horses trained by him and the vanquisher of Vala smotes those who had previously been smitten by him.

5. He has got a daughter of beautiful hips and unequalled in this world for beauty, devoted to truth, well-bred and possessed of accomplishments, known by the name of Gunakeshi.

6. For her sake, he is searching carefully in the three worlds including the region of the gods, O illustrious one; and he selects Sumukha, your grandson, as the husband of his daughter.

7. If this suits you, O best of the serpents, then without delay, O Arjyaka, make the necessary arrangement for the acceptance of his daughter.

8. As Lakshmi in the family of Vishnu, Swaha in that of Agni, may the slender-waist Gunakeshi be the same to your family.

9. Therefore do you accept for your grandson Gunakeshi, who equals, in point of beauty, Sachi, the queen of Vasava.

10. Though he is without a father, yet for his accomplishments do we select him, and for the great respect in which yourself and the Airavata race generally are held.

11. Coming here attracted by the accomplishments, good manners, purity of life, and self-control of Sumukha, he is himself ready to offer his daughter.

12. And it is proper that you should greet Matali with due honours. He (Arjyaka) too being sorry and delighted at the same time said to Narada,

13. At his grandson being elected (for marriage) and at the death of his son. Arjyaka said:—"How can I desire, O Rishi, Gunakeshi for my daughter-in-law?

14. These words of yours, O great Rishi, are not approved of by me. The cause is not want of respect for you; for who would not desire a connection with the friend of Shakra?

15. But, O great Mani, we hesitate owing to the unstable character of the cause; the author of his being, my son of great lustre,

16. Has been eaten up by the son of Vinata and for that reason we are struck with grief; and when the son of Vinata was going away he again said:—"After a month I shall eat the other one (of this race)—Sumukha."

17. It will surely happen: so for I know his determination and for this reason is my cheerfulness lost by the words of Suparna (Garuda)."

Karwa said:—

18. Matali then said to him:—"In this connection, a plan has been found by me; Sumukha born of your son is selected as my son-in-law,

19. Let this Naga therefore, accompanied by myself and Narada, and going to the lord of the gods, the protector of the three worlds, see Vasava.

20. O best of your race, I shall try to foil the intentions of Suparna and as a last resource shall ascertain Sumukha's length of life.

21. Let Sumukha, along with myself, proceed to the lord of the gods for the attainment of this object and may you fare well, O serpent."

22. Then all of them, endued with great energy taking Sumukha along with them, proceeded and saw the king of gods, Shakra of great effulgence seated.

23. There in his company was the four armed Vishnu and there did Narada tell them all about Matali.

Vaishampayana said:—

24. Then did Vishnu thus speak to Purandara, the lord of the universe: 'Give unto him nectar and thus make him equal to the immortals.

25. Let Matali, Narada and Sumukha O Vasava, obtain through your pleasure (the fulfilment of) their desires which they cherish.'

26. Then Purandara, considering the strength of the son of Vinata, said to Vishnu these words: 'Let it be given by your exalted self.'

Vishnu said:—

27. You are the ruler of all the worlds and of mobile beings as also of those that are immobile; what is given by you, who would dare offend, O lord.

28. Then did Shakra give to the serpent an excellent lease of life, but the slayer of Vala and Vritra did not make him drink nectar.

29. Having obtained the (desired) boon Sumukha became possessed of a really pretty face and having taken wife, went, according to his desire, towards his home.

30. Narada and Arjyaka being pleased at their success went away after worshipping the king of the gods endued with great lustre.

Thus ends the one hundred and fourth chapter, the search of a bridegroom by Matali, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Kanwa said :—

1. In the meantime Garuda endued with great might, heard what had happened, namely the bestowal of a long life on the Naga by Shakra, O Bharata.

2. And Suparna, the wanderer of the sky, obstructing the three worlds as it were by the heavy wind caused by his wings and being very angry, came to Vasava.

Garuda said :—

3. O lord, for what shortcoming on my part have you forbidden me my subsistence—having granted me a boon of your own accord you have again withheld it.

4. Since the very creation of all creatures my food has been settled by the Supreme Being, the lord of all creatures, and for what reason have you interfered with it.

5. This great Naga had been chosen by me (for my food) and the limit of his time had been fixed by me and on him was I to have subsisted, O lord, as also my numerous progeny.

6. I dare not now kill another of the species, which is used such (i.e., on whom you have granted a boon); you play as you like, of your own will, O king of the gods.

7. Reduced to this state I shall lose my life as also will the members of my family and these that are attendants at my house. Be gratified Vasava.

8. O slayer of Vala and Vritra, this indeed do I deserve not; though lord of the three worlds I have been reduced to the state of a servant of another.

9. O lord of the celestials, whilst you suppress me, I find no cause for going to Vishnu; O Vasava, you are the eternal sovereign of the three worlds.

10. I too have daughter of Daksha for my mother and Kashyapa also for my father, and I too can venture to bear easily the weight of the three worlds.

11. My great strength too is unendurable by all creatures, and by me too have been done great deeds in the war with the sons of Diti.

12. Srutasri and Srutasena, Vivaswata Rochanamukha and Prsruta and Kalka Aksha, these sons of Diti have by me been slain.

13. Stationing myself on the flag I fear your younger brother and attend on him; therefore do you disregard me.

14. What other being can bear that load? What other being is stronger? Though thus qualified, I yet bear your younger brother with his friends.

15. Since however disregarding me, O Vishnu, as for yourself, you have interfered with my subsistence, you have made me lose my respect, as your brother has done.

16. Among those endued with might and prowess that are begotten in the race of Aditi—you are the strongest in might.

17. I bear you who are such on one portion of my wings without experiencing any fatigue. Think, O dear Sir, well as to who is the stronger.

Kanwa said :—

18. The wielder of the discus, having heard the words marked with vanity of the wanderer of the sky, which were at the same time indicative of peril, said to Tarkshya, who was annoyed, annoying him the more.

19. "O Garuda, you consider yourself strong, though you are very weak. It is not right that you should thus speak in flattering terms of yourself in my presence, O you born of an egg.

20. The three worlds, even when united together are incapable of bearing the load of my body; I myself bear the weight of myself and also uphold you.

21. To prove your words, bear the weight of my right arm and if you can carry it then what you say will have some reason in it."

22. Then did that prosperous being place his arm on his shoulder. He fell down struck by the lord stupified and deprived of his senses.

23. The weight, that was in the earth united with the mountains, was in one branch of the body (of Vishnu).

24. The one, who was by far the stronger did not press him (Garuda) with any force and thus was he alive for Achyuta did not want to kill him.

25. Writhing under that heavy load that wanderer of the sky gasped for breath, was stupified, lost his senses, and his energies were all dried up and he was stripped off his feathers.

26. Then the bird, the son of Vinata, bowed with his head to Vishnu and feebly said to him these words, being stupified, and rendered helpless and regretting his folly.

27. "O lord, what is the wonder that I should be crushed down to the earth by the arm which belongs to a body which is like the essence of the universe.

28. It is proper, O lord, that you should forgive me who am rendered helpless, who am of mean intelligence, intoxicated with the vanity of might, and who am but a bird bearing a flag.

29. O god, O lord, your strength was not known to me and for that reason did I think myself possessed of heroism not equalled by others."

30. Then was the god pleased with Garuda and he said to the bird out of affection—"Do not act so again."

31. With the toe of his feet he threw Sumukha on the breast of Garuda and from that time forward O chief of kings, Garuda lives (in friendship) with that serpent.

32. In this way was the haughty Garuda the son of Vinata, and of great renown, cured of his vanity, being overpowered by the might of Vishnu.

Kanwa said:—

33. In the same way, O son of Gandhari, you too, so long as you do not come face to face in battle with those heroes, the sons of Pandu, will be living.

34. Who is there foremost among opponents, Vayu, and possessed of great strength, Dhananjaya the son of Shakra in battle.

35. Vishnu, Vayu, Shakra, both the Aswinis—all these are you capable of gazing at?

36. Fight would therefore effect peace, O son of a ruler of men, by means of Vasudeva; it is proper that you should save your family.

37. This Narada, of great asceticism, saw all this with his own eyes and this Krishna held the mace and discus of that great-souled Vishnu.

Vaishampayana said:—

38. Duryodhana, having heard all this, breathing hard with his eye-brows contracted and gazing on the son of Radha, laughed aloud at that time.

39. Without regarding those words of the Rishi Kanwa, the one, of evil intellect, said these words slapping his thighs which were of the size of those of an elephant.

40. "Since I have been created by god, I am what he has made me; what will happen must happen and so must my course be shaped. O great Rishi, I shall act in that way; what can these useless discussions do?

Thus ends the one hundred and fifth chapter, the search of a bridegroom by Matali, in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CVI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Janamejaya said:—

1. Being from his very birth attached to evil and tempted by covetousness for the wealth of others, addicted to wicked habits and bent upon bringing about his own death,

2. The cause of the misery of his kinsmen, the cause of heightening the grief of his friends, the cause of giving pain to his well-wishers and the cause of the increase of the joy of his enemies,

3. For what reason did not his friends dissuade him who was wending the wrong course and why did not the friend Krishna or the grandfather do it out of friendship or affection?

Vaishampayana said:—

4. Words were spoken by Krishna and at could be said and words spoken by Narada.

the persons who listen to well-wishers, and rare are good counsels; where there could advise well there is need of it).

6. I see, that the advice of your friends ought to be listened to by you, O you the delighter of the race of Kurus, your obstinacy ought not to be persevered in, for it is a great evil.

7. In this connection is related the old story in which out of obstinacy Galava met with defeat.

8. In days of old, with a view to try Viswamitra who was practising asceticism, Dharma came to him in person in the disguise of the divinely prosperous Rishi Vasistha.

9. Having assumed the appearance of one of the seven Rishis, O Bharata, he came to the hermitage of the son of Kushika as if hungry, with the desire of satisfying his hunger.

10. Vishwamitra, with great respect, employed himself in preparing Charu (rice boiled in milk and honey) and in his anxiety to prepare that excellent repast he could not attend to him in other respects.

11. When he had taken the food offered by other devotees, Vishwamitra too came there taking his food which was very hot.

12. "I have taken my food ; you stay here for the present" saying this the divinely prosperous one went away and then did Vishwamitra, of great effulgence, O king, stand there.

13. Out of reverence, taking the food on his head and holding the same by his hands the devotee, of austere asceticism, stood there in the hermitage like a post, and subsisting on air.

14. In attending on him the Muni Galava took pains out of respect, reverence, affection and the desire to do what was pleasing to Vishwamitra.

15. Then on the completion of a hundred years Dharma came there again to the son of Kushika, assuming the appearance of Vasistha with the desire of eating.

16. He saw his food held on his head by the wise and great Rishi Vishwamitra who stood there subsisting on air.

17. And Dharma then accepting the food which was hot and newly cooked and eating it said : "I am pleased, O regenerate Rishi" and went away.

18. He then became divested of the condition of a Kshatriya and reached that of a Brahmana, and Vishwamitra became pleased at those words of Dharma.

19. And Vishwamitra, being pleased with the attention, and devotion of his disciple, the ascetic Galava, said thus :

20. "With my permission, child, go away wherever you wish, O Galava." Being thus addressed, Galava, the best of Munis, said this in reply,

21. In words which were sweet and pleasing to Vishwamitra endued with great effulgence : "What gift (Dakshina) shall I give to your exalted self for your favour as my preceptor ?

22. Every religious act becomes successful only when it is accompanied by a gift, O you the giver of honours, and then the giver of these gifts obtains salvation.

23. Gifts are the fruits of acts (enjoyed) in heaven and are therefore said to be the peace. What shall I procure for my spiritual guide let my lord command."

24. The Rishi Vishwamitra, divinely prosperous, knowing that he had been conquered by his attentions (and nothing else) said to him :—"Go, go" and sought to send his attendant away by that means.

25. The attendant, being spoken to by Vishwamitra saying again and again 'go, go,' said by way of reply "What shall I give you."

26. Vishwamitra, a little angry at the excessive obstinacy of the devotee Galava, said this to him :

27. "Give me eight hundred horses, white as the rays of the moon and each having one ear black. Go, O Galava, without delay."

Thus ends the one hundred and sixth chapter, the story of Galava in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva,

CHAPTER CVII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Cont.

Narada said :—

1. Being thus commanded by the intelligent Vishwamitra Galava could not sit, nor sleep nor could he take his meals.

2. His body was reduced to a skeleton and became pale being subject to grief and a prey to excessive anxiety and burning with dissatisfaction. Galava, being very sorry, thus began to lament, O Suyodhana.

3. Where can I get well-to-do friends ? Where can I have wealth from ? Where are my savings ? Eight hundred horses white as the moon where can I get ?

4. How can I get satisfaction from eating ? How can I get satisfaction from happiness ? My happiness derived from life itself is broken up. What is the use of my living on ?

5. Having gone to the other side of the sea or going to the most distant part of the world, I shall cast off my life. What is the use of my living on ?

6. What happiness can there be without hard exertion for him who is poor, unsuccessful, deprived of all the sweets of life and saddled with debts ?

7. Having enjoyed the wealth of my friends having given him to understand that I shall return it to him, I am unable to make a return for his kindness and so death is preferable to life for me.

8. The religious merit of a man bears no fruit, who having promised to do an act fails to perform it and is thus sullied with falsehood.

9. A man addicted to falsehood can never get beauty, a man addicted to falsehood can not get children, a man addicted to false-hood can not get power, how can he then expect to obtain bliss?

10. Where is fame for an ungrateful person? Where is there a proper place for an ungrateful person? An ungrateful person is unworthy of respect and there is no emancipation for an ungrateful person.

11. The wretch who is without wealth is dead as it were; and how can such a wretch support his relatives; the wretch certainly meets with ruin for he is unable to return the favours he receives.

12. I am such a wretch, an ungrateful man, without wealth, and addicted to falsehood,—who, having my wishes gratified by my spiritual guide, am unable to act up to his orders.

13. I, who am such, shall cast off this life after having made an attempt which cannot be exceeded (by other attempts in point of earnestness). Never before has anything been asked by me from the gods.

14. All the gods regard me for this in sacrificial rites; and I shall go to Vishnu the friend of wise men, the god, who is the lord of the three worlds—to Krishna who is the best refuge for those that need refuge,

15. From whom flow all the enjoyments that are enjoyed by the gods and Asuras; with my head bent down I desire to see Krishna—the devotee who is without end,

16. He having thus said, his friend Garuda, the son of Vinata, came into his view who being pleased, said to him with a desire to do him good.

17. Your exalted self is my friend. A friend in prosperity should try to accomplish the wishes of his friends.

18. O twice-born one, the prosperity I possess has its rise in the younger brother of Vasava; I have already spoken to him about your wishes and he has granted my wishes (to do you good).

19. Such being the case, wherever you want to go, I will take you without any trouble to your-self, to the countries on the other side of the sea or to the remotest corner of the earth, come, O Galava, without delay.

Thus ends the hundred and seventh chapter, the story of Galava in Bhagavat-Yana of Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CVIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Suparna said:—

1. I have been instructed by the god who is the source of all knowledge (to take you where you wish to be taken); tell me—which direction shall I first go, to show you.

2. The east or the south or the western point, or the northern, O you foremost among the twice-born, where shall I go, O Galava,

3. Where the sun which lights all the worlds first rises and where in the evening the Saddhas practise asceticism,

4. Where was first born the intelligence, by which is pervaded this earth and where the two eyes of Dharma are set in order to guide the universe,

5. In which point offers of clarified butter were first made which afterwards flowed in all directions; this, O foremost among the twice-born is the gate of day and time.

6. Here in days of old the female children of Daksha brought forth their children—the direction in which those born of Kashyapa grew up.

7. Here is the source of the prosperity of the gods, where Sakra was appointed in the kingship of the immortals—where even the gods, O regenerate Rishi, practised asceticism.

8. For this, O Brahmana, this direction is called east (Purva) for in the days of yore it was overspread by the gods.

9. Therefore it is said to be in the possession of the oldest inhabitants; in the east, were done all the acts by the gods who were desirous of obtaining happiness.

10. Here were the Vedas chanted first by the prosperous Being, the Creator of the universe; in this direction out of the mouth of the sun is said to be born the goddess Savitri among the chanters of the Vedas.

11. Here were given Surya the hymn of the Yayurveda, O best among the twice-born and here was drunk the Soma juice, previously sanctified by a blessing, by the gods in sacrificial ceremonies.

12. Here were sacrificial fires gratified by offerings of objects of the same origin and class (milk and clarified butter) and here did Varuna attain to his prosperity resorting to the region of the Patala.

13. Here, in days of old, O best among the twice born, took place the birth, attainment to fame and death of the ancient Rishi Vasistha.

14. Here was first created the Om (the magical beginning of every Mantra) in all its ten times ten branches ; and here did the smoke-eating ascetics eat the smoke issuing from sacrificial fire.

15. Here were massacred many boars and other animals by Shakra to be used as offerings for sacrificial ceremonies dedicated to the gods.

16. Here does the sun rise and slay in his rage all ungrateful men and Asuras.

17. This is the gate of the three worlds and of heaven and happiness ; this direction is the eastern quarter and we shall enter it if you like.

18. My duty is to do what you wish, for I am ready to carry out your orders ; speak, O Galava, and I shall go ; listen to me about another cardinal point.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighth chapter, the search of the region in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CIX.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Suparna said :—

1. This direction, in days of old, was given away by Vivasvat after the performance of a sacrifice according to the usual custom as a final present (Dakshina) to his spiritual guide ; so this direction is called south (Dakshina).

2. In this direction do the Pitris of the three worlds live and it is said, O twice-born one, that this is the residence of those gods that subsist on smoke.

3. In this part of the universe the gods along with the Pitris ever reside, who are worshipped in sacrifices in the world and get equal share with the Pitris.

4. This direction is said to be the second gate to virtue, O twice-born one, and here does the king of death, with a sure hand, calculate the life allotted to men, in Trutis and Lavas (periods of time).

5. Here do the divine Rishis and the Rishis of the world of the Pitris as also Rishis of royal descent all reside, always being beyond the reach of pain.

6. Here are virtue and truth, here the acts of men bear fruit and this is the refuge, O foremost among the twice born, of the acts of those that are dead.

7. This is that direction, O foremost among the twice born, where every body must go ; and as all of them are surrounded by the darkness of ignorance they cannot come here with perfect happiness.

8. Here are many thousands of Rakshas, O best among the twice-born, who have been created to stand in the way of men coming to these regions, and who can be perceived by those who have not brought their souls under control.

9. Here in the secluded spots of the Mandara mountains, and in the residences of regenerate Rishis the Gandharvas chant songs stealing away the head and the heart, O twice-born one.

10. The Daitya Raivata, having heard the hymns of the Samaveda chanted here, abandoned wife, friends, and kingdoms and went into the forest.

11. Here by the son of Savarni and that of Yavakrita was fixed a limit, O Brahmana, which Surya does not pass beyond.

12. Here by the great-souled son of Pulastya Ravana, the king of Rakshas who practised austerities, was solicited immortality of the gods.

13. Here by his habits of life did Vritra (the Asura) incur the hostility of Shakra and here do the lives of all beings come and again dissolve into their five elements.

14. Here men, the doers of wicked acts, cannot go, O Galava and here is the river Vaitarani surrounded by people who cannot obtain salvation and cross it.

15. Here do men come and attain to a termination of their happiness and misery, and coming here does the maker of day (the sun) pour water having a nice taste.

16. And having gone again to the cardinal point, pervaded by Vasistha he lets fall dew ; and here did I, in days of old being hungry and thinking about how to satisfy it,

17. See fighting with each other, a large elephant and a big tortoise. Here was born from the sun the great Rishi named Chakradhanu,

18. Who was afterwards known as the god Kapila by whom were afflicted the sons of Sagara ; and here did the class of Brahmanas known as Shivas, well versed in the Vedas, meet with success.

19. And having studied all the Vedas, they obtained endless salvation ; here is the city named Bhogavati ruled by Vasuki,

20. And by the Naga, Takshaka and also by Airavata ; and here at the time of their journey men meet with a great gloom,

21. Which is impregnable even by Bhaskara (the sun himself) or by fire. Even this is your way, O Galava, worthy of attention, tell me if you want to go in this direction ; listen now to the description of another direction, the west.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninth chapter, the story of Garuda in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CX.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Suparna said :—

1. This direction is the favourite one of king Varuna, the lord of the seas. In fact this has been the region of the birth of the king of the waters and even the region of his influence.

2. Here does the sun abandon his rays himself last of all (Paschata) in the day ; this is known as the western direction, O best among the twice born.

3. For ruling over aquatic animals and for the protection of the waters, the illustrious and divine sage Kashyapa appointed Varuna.

4. Here having drunk all the six juices of Varuna, the moon, the destroyer of darkness, becomes new again in the very beginning of the light half of the month.

5. Here were the Daityas vanquished by Vayu and then confined by him ; and O twice-born one, they slept here (the sleep that knows no waking) breathing hard and afflicted by a high wind.

6. Here does the mountain named Asta receive the sun as if in love owing to which the evening twilight vanishes away in the west.

7. From here at the end of the day do the night and sleep come and spread themselves as it were to steal away half the life of living creatures.

8. In this quarter seeing the goddess Diti, who bore a child, asleep, Shakra cut up the foetus from which were born the group of Maruts.

9. In this direction the base of the Himavat mountain is extended to the eternal Mandara and no one can reach the end of this mountain even in a thousand years.

10. In this direction coming to the shore of the sea having golden mountains and golden lotuses, does Suravi yield her milk.

11. Here in the midst of this ocean is seen the headless trunk of Swarabhanu, (Rahu) who is like the sun himself, bent on swallowing the sun and the moon.

12. Here is heard the loud sound of chanting (the Vedas) by Suvarnashiras who is ever youthful, and who is immeasurable and invincible in energy.

13. Here the daughter of Harimedhas named Dhvajabati remained fixed to the sky by the command of the sun who said—Remain here, remain here.

14. Here wind and fire and water and earth, O Galava, remain dispossessed of the power of giving pain at their contact, day and night.

15. From this place forward the sun has recourse to a straight path and here do all the luminous bodies enter the sphere of Aditi (the solar sphere).

16. Having journeyed for twenty eight nights in company with the sun they come out again from the solar sphere, being united with the moon.

17. Here in this direction lie the sources of rivers from which again rise the seas, and here in the region of Varuna are the waters of all the three worlds.

18. Here is the residence of Ananta, the king of snakes and here is the place of Vishnu, who has no beginning nor end, and than whom nothing is better.

19. Here is also the residence of Pavana (wind) the friend of Anala (fire) and here is the residence of the great Rishi Kashyapa, the son of Maricha.

20. This western direction is described to you in the course of my description of the cardinal points ; speak, O Galava, O best among the twice-born, in which direction you will go.

Thus ends the one hundred and tenth Chapter, Garuda's words in the Bhagavat-yana Parva of the Udyoga parva.

CHAPTER CXI

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Suparna said :—

1. Since a man is absolved from his sins in this quarter and since he attains salvation here, it is called North (Uttara), O twice-born one, from its power of absolution (uttarana).

2. And since the north, which is the region of gold (and other treasures) stretches between the west and the east therefore is it called the central region.

3. In this region, the north, which is the best, O best among the twice-born, none that is not tranquil, none that has not brought his soul under control and none that is vicious, lives.

4. Here lives Narayana, the ever victorious Krishna, that best among men in the hermitage of Badari and so does Brahma.

5. Here on the breast of the Himavat mountain even lives Maheshwara who is endued with effulgence like that of the fire which blazes at the termination of each Yuga, like Purusha in company with Prakriti.

9. He is invisible by the group of Munis as also by the gods along with Vasava and by the Gandharvas and Yakshas who have attained salvation, indeed by all save by Nara and Narayana.

7. Here lives the eternal Vishnu of a thousand eyes, a thousand feet and a thousand heads who appears one with the aid of illusion.

8. Here was the moon entrusted with the kingship over regenerate persons and here Mahadeva let fall the Ganga, which descended from the sky,

9. After receiving her on his head, to the world of men, O you best among those that know Brahma; here was asceticism practised by the goddess (Uma) with the desire of getting Maheshwara for her husband.

10. Here were born Kama (the god of love) Roshā (the ire of Shiva), the Kailasa mountain as also Uma; and here, O Galava, over the Rakshasas, and Yakshas, and Gandharvas,

11. Was the giver of wealth (Kuvera) annointed king in the Kailasha; here is situate the pleasure-garden of Kuvera—the enchanting Chaitraratha and here is situate the hermitage of the class of Rishis known as Vaikshanas.

12. Here are situate the Mandakini (River) and the Mandara (mountain) O best among the twice-born, and here is the wood named Sungandhanika which is guarded by Rakshasas.

13. Here are plains covered with green grass and groups of plantain trees and the celestial trees, the Sautanakas and in this quarter the Siddhas, who have ever their passions under control and who always roam about at their pleasure,

14. Have their abodes resembling the heaven and replete with all objects of enjoyment; and here live the seven Rishis and also the Goddess Arundhati.

15. Here is the place of Swati (a constellation) and this region is thus known to be its rising place and in this quarter in the vicinity of the sacrificial fire lives the grand-sire.

16. Here do all luminous bodies including the Sun and the Moon ever revolve and here is the great gate of the Ganga, O best among the twice-born, guarded by

17. The Great-souled Munis named Dhamas, the speakers of truth; no body knows their shape in size nor the nature of their austerities.

18. The thousand vessels for distributing food and the dishes they created at their will, are not visible to the naked eye, O Galava; the man, who enters into regions beyond that limit,

19. Vanishes from sight, O Galava, O foremost among the twice born; never has this limit before been crossed by any body else, O best among the twice-born,

20. Excepting the god Narayana and the ever victorious and endless Nara, otherwise called Jishnu; here is the region of Ailavila (Kuvera) known as Kailasha.

21. Here were born the ten Apsaras known as Bidyutprabha and here Vishnu-pada (a rock having the imprint of Vishnu's feet) was created by Vishnu who was roaming about

22. In the three worlds, while he was in the northern region; O best among the twice born, here was sacrificial ceremony performed by the king Marut,

23. At Ushirvija, O regenerate Rishi, where is situated the lake Jambunada; here, were presented to the view of Jinuta, the Regenerate Rishi,

24. The sacred mines of pure gold contained in the Himavat mountains, and that large amount of wealth, was given away to the assembled Brahmanas—

25. With the request that the same might be called after his own name; hence that wealth is called Jaimuta. Here every day, the supporters of the cardinal points, those best among the twice-born, in the morning and evening,

26. Loudly ask: Who has business here? and what is that O Galava; thus, O foremost among the twice-born, this cardinal point—the north, is superior in other good qualities.

27. It is known as Uttara (North) for it is the best for all sorts of work and this region, O friend, has been described to you with minute details.

28. So indeed have been all the four, one by one; to which of them do you desire to go; I am ready, O foremost among the twice-born, to show you all of them as also the entire world, O Brahmana; therefore O twice-born one, do you get up on me.

Thus ends the one hundred and eleventh chapter, the search of a bridegroom by Matsya in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva

CHAPTER CXII

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Galava said :—

1. O Garuda, O enemy of the chief among serpents, O Suparna, O son of Vinata, O Tarkshya, take me to the east, where are pointed the two eyes of Dharma.

2. Go to this eastern quarter which you have described first of all and which you have described as lying in the vicinity of virtue.

3. Here, you have said, truth and virtue reside. I desire to see those gods, O you the younger brother of Aruna.

Narada said :—

4. The son of Vinata said to the twice-born one :—get you up on me and then the Muni Galava rode on Garuda.

5. I come to see your beauty, O you devourer of snakes, while you are flying along, like that of the sun in the first part of the day, of the sun of a thousand rays.

9. Your course, O wanderer in the sky, I see followed by trees which have been uprooted by the wind caused by the flapping of your wings.

7. O you wanderer of sky, you shine as if dragging by the wind, caused by the flapping of wings, the earth bounded by the seas and the forests with its mountains, woods and gardens.

8. The water, along with its fishes, snakes and crocodiles, seems to rise up continually to the sky by the great wind caused by your wings.

9. The fishes, and Timis and Timingalas possessed of similar faces and snakes possessed of faces like those of human beings are, I see, crushed, as it were, by the wind.

10. I am rendered deaf by hearing the loud roar of the great sea; I cannot see nor can hear; indeed I even forget the object of this journey.

11. You please go a little slowly, remembering that you may be responsible for slay-ing a Brahmana; the sun is invisible, my friend, and the cardinal point, as also the sky, O you wanderer of heavens.

12. I see a gloom around me, but your body I cannot see, and O you born of an egg, your two eyes appear to me like two bright gems.

18. I do not see your body nor mine own and at every step do I see fire coming from your body.

14. Extinguish at once this fire and let your eyes again be brought to their normal state and, O son of Vinata, slacken the great speed you are using in your journey.

15. I have no need whatever of this journey, O you who subsist on snakes; return, O you of great attributes, for I can not bear this speed of yours.

16. I have promised to present to my preceptor eight hundred horses, white as the rays of moon and having one ear black.

17. To redeem my pledge I see no means, O you born of an egg; the only way I can see therefore is to cast off my own life.

18. I do not possess wealth; nor have I any friend possessed of wealth and even with great wealth this object of mine cannot be gained.

Narada said :—

19. Then to Galava, who was lamenting in this way and uttering many sorrowful things, the son of Vinata, while still proceeding along, said in reply laughing:

20. You do not seem to be a very wise man, O regenerate Rishi, since you desire to cast off your life; death cannot be met at one's own pleasure for death is God himself.

21. Why have not I been informed (of your purpose) before; there is every good means by which you will gain your object.

22. This is the mountain named Rishava on the limits of the sea; rest yourself here; after making our repast here we shall return, O Galava.

Thus ends the one hundred and twelfth Chapter, the story of Galava in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Narada said :—

1. Then having alighted on the peak of the Rishava mountain, the two saw there a Brahmani named Sandili, endued with asceticism.

2. Suparna having done her honours, and Galava having worshipped her they were pointed to a seat by her after the usual welcome.

3. Both, of them, having partaken of the cooked food offered by her after having dedicated the same to the gods with the usual Mantra, were refreshed and both of them slept on the ground and in a moment lost their senses.

4. After a moment Suparna awoke with the desire of departing and the wanderer of the sky saw himself deprived of his wings.

5. The ranger of the sky became like a lump of flesh with a mouth and feet and Galava seeing him in that condition asked him with a heavy heart.

6. "What is this condition you find yourself in, as a result of your coming here, for what length of time shall we have to live here.

7. Is it that in your mind you have entertained a thought which is evil and against the dictates of virtue; this is the result of no small wickedness on your part.

8. Suparna then said to the regenerate one:—O twice born one, the thought has indeed been entertained by me of carrying away this lady who has been endued with asceticism from this place to where the lord of all creatures is,

9. Where resides the lord Mahadeva, where resides the eternal Vishnu and where there are virtue and sacrificial ceremonies, so that she might live there.

10. I now pray this goddess for my own good with my head bowed down: "I have harboured this thought in my mind and have come to grief in consequence thereof.

11. Out of great respect (for you) did I entertain the thought and whether I did right or wrong, it is fitting that out of your own generosity and noble mindedness you should forgive me."

12. She, thus spoken to, was gratified with the chief of birds and the best among the twice-born and said "Do not fear, O Suparna, become possessed of beautiful wings and leave aside your fears.

13. I have been insulted by your child and I do not forgive insults; that perpetrator of wicked deeds, who would insult me, would quickly be turned out of all reigns of bliss.

14. Devoid as I am of all inauspicious signs, and who am blameless, I have obtained excellent asceticism by following the rules of good conduct.

15. Good conduct produces virtue, good conduct produces wealth and it is from good conduct that a man attains to prosperity; and good conduct nullifies all inauspicious signs.

16. Do you now, O lord of the rangers of the firmament, go wherever you like; no woman should henceforth be found fault with by you even when she ought to be blamed.

17. You will be endued with strength and prowess as before;" then did his two wings grow up and they were even stronger than before.

18. Being commanded by Sandili he then went away where he wanted to go (with Galava on his back) but did not come across horses of that description.

19. Vishwamitra, while standing on the path, saw Galava and that foremost among speakers said in the presence of the son of Vinata.

20. "The wealth that you, of your own accord, promised me, O twice-born one, should be given to me; the time to receive the fruit of that promise has come, you can do as you like.

21. As I have waited all this time, so shall I wait for some time more, and O regenerate being, look out for that means by which you may be successful."

22. Suparna then said to Galava who was struck with great sorrow, "What Vishwamitra said to you before, he has repeated in my presence.

23. Therefore do you come, O foremost among the twice-born, we shall consult together O Galava; without giving to your preceptor the whole of the wealth promised by you, you cannot even sit down."

Thus ends the hundred and thirteenth chapter, the story of Galava in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva,

CHAPTER CXIV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Narada said:—

1. Then did Suparna, the foremost among those possessed of wings, say to the grieving Galava: "Created by Fire in the Earth and reared up by wind, wealth is called Hiranya for the earth itself is named Hiranmaya.

2. Since it supports and maintains the (creatures of the) earth, therefore is it called wealth (Dhana); and the wealth is in the three worlds from time immemorial for meeting this purpose.

3. On a Friday when either of the two constellations is ascendant, Agni, creating wealth by dint of his will, confers it upon mankind for multiplying the possessions of the giver of riches (Kuvera).

4. That wealth is guarded by the Ajai-kapaths and the Ahibrudhnas as also by the giver of wealth (Kuvera): such being the case, O best among the twice-born, it is very difficult to get that wealth.

5. Except by wealth there exists no possibility of your getting the horses.

6. Such being the case do you ask some king born in some family of royal Rishis who can make us successful without oppressing his subjects.

7. There is a king born in the dynasty of the moon, who is my friend and we shall approach him for he has great wealth in this world.

8. He is the royal Rishi named Yayati, son of Nahusha, who is of truly great strength, and he will himself give (what we want, when he is asked by you and (your suit is) recommended by me.

9. His wealth is as great as that of the lord of riches and O learned man, repay your debt by accepting this large wealth as present.

10. Thus conversing and thus thinking on what could be done they came to the palace of Yayati, the lord of men.

11. Having accepted the usual warm welcome and arghya and water for washing the feet etc. they were asked the reason of their coming and the son of Vinata thus explained the reasons:

12. O you born in the race of Nahusha, this is my friend Galava, the ocean of austerities who became the pupil of Vishwamitra for many tens of thousands of years, O ruler of men.

13. This twice born one, then being commanded to go away by Vishwamitra, with a view to give him a present said to him; O lord, the time has come when I should make some final present to my spiritual guide.

14. Knowing that his means were small he did not ask for anything but being addressed again and again, was thus commanded: You, who have said this, make me this present.

15. Give me eight hundred horses white as the rays of the moon, of good birth and black of one ear.

16. Make this present to your spiritual guide if you think fit, O Galava. Thus did the great ascetic Vishwamitra address him in anger.

17. This best among the twice born, is for this reason, being consumed by heavy grief being unable to redeem his pledge and therefore he has come under your protection.

18. Having accepted from you alone, O you best among men and thus being beyond the reach of sorrow after fulfilling his pledge to his spiritual guide, he will practise great asceticism.

19. With a portion of the fruit of his austerities will you also be rewarded for with his own devotion will he enrich you, O royal Rishi, who are rich in earthly treasures.

20. As many hairs as there are in the bodies of horses, O lord of men, so many horses will you obtain in this world, O lord of the earth.

21. He is a fit party to receive gifts and you too are a fit party to make presents, and the present that you now make to him will be like milk kept in deposit in a conch shell (available at any moment).

Thus ends the one hundred and fourteenth chapter, the story of Galava, in the Bhagavalyana of the Udyog Parva.

CHAPTER XCI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Narada said :—

1. Being thus addressed by Suparna in excellent words conducive to his benefit and thinking calmly on these words and considering them again and again,

2. The performer of a thousand sacrifices and the lord who, in gifts, was the prince of givers, Yayati, the ruler of all the Kasis said these words,

3. With his eye on his dear friend Tarkshya, as also on the best among the twice-born, Galava, and considering the alms asked for by a devotee as described to him as a highly praiseworthy example,

4. And especially considering that they had come to him passing over the kings born in the solar race.

5. 'To-day is my birth blessed and my race absolved from sins; to-day is this country, over which I rule, freed from sins by you, O Tarkshya, who are sinless.

6. O friend, I want to tell you however that I am not the same wealthy man that you knew me to be in days of old. O friend, my wealth has been diminished.

7—8. But at the same time I am unable to make your coming here useless, O wanderer of the heavens; nor do I dare frustrate the hopes entertained by the regenerate Rishi; I shall therefore give that which will accomplish this purposes of his.

9. A man, who having come to another with a hope and returns with that hope frustrated, consumes the entire race; and O son of Vinata, it is said that nothing is more

10. Culpable than the saying of a man, in this world "I have not got it" to a man who comes to him entertaining a hope in him. The man, who is unsuccessful in his suit and whose hopes are frustrated,

11. Slays the sons and grandsons of the man who does not do him good. Therefore this daughter of mine, who will be perpetuator of four races,

12. This one resembling the daughter of a god and the promoter of every virtue and who is ever solicited by the gods, human beings and Asuras, O Galava,

13. For her beauty do you accept. Rulers of men will surley give you even their kingdom as her dowery,

14. Not to speak of twice four hundred horses each with a black ear; therefore do you accept this daughter of mine, Madhavi.

15. The only boon that I ask for, O lord, is that I may have a grandson by her." Having taken that girl with them Galava with the bird,

16. And saying "we shall see you again" went away. Saying:—"The means for obtaining the horses has now been gained," the one born of an egg too

17. Went away, after asking for the permission of Galava, to his own place. And the king of birds having gone away Galava along with that maiden,

18. Began to think about the king who could offer suitable dowery for her and in his mind decided to go to that best among the kings—Haryyashwa, of the race of Ikshaku.

19. He ruled over Ayodhya, was endued with great prowess and had an army with four divisions and had also in his possession enough of treasures and coins, who was dear to his subjects and and to whom the twice born were also dear,

20. Who desirous of the peace of his subjects was practising excellent austerities. The regenerate Rishi Galava, having approached him, Haryyashwa, said to him :

21. "This girl in my possession, O chief among kings, increases a race by bringing forth children, O Haryyashwa; accept her by offering a dowery.

22. I shall describe to you what dowery, to offer and hearing that you decide it."

Thus ends the one hundred and fifteenth chapter, the story of Galava in the Bhagavatiana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXVI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Narada said:—

1. The king Haryyashwa, the best among rulers of men, having thought in his mind for a long time, said after having drawn a long and hot sigh about the birth of a son.

2. "Those six limbs that ought to be elevated are elevated (in this girl) and the seven ought to be slender are so; the three that ought to be deep are deep and the five that ought to be red are red.

3. She is fit to be looked at by many gods, Asuras and men and by many Gandharvas and she is endued with many auspicious signs and capable of bringing forth many children.

4. I am competent to beget on her a son who will be an emperor; speak about the dowery, O foremost among the twice born, having paid due regard to the state of my wealth.

Galava said:—

5. Give me eight hundred horses, white as the moon, born in this country, and with plump bodies, each having one ear black.

6. Then will this blessed maiden, with large eyes, be the mother of your children as the fire stick is the mother of fire.

Narada said:—

7. The king Haryyashwa, that royal sage, hearing these words, senseless with passion, said sorrowfully to that best among the Rishis.

8. "The kind of horses that you require, two hundred only I have got; hundreds of other breeds of horses, all worthy of sacrifice, are roaming about (in my kingdom)

9. Such being the case, I shall beget but one child on this damsel, O Galava ; kindly act up to this request of mine."

10. Hearing these words, the damsel said to Galava :—"A boon has been granted to me by a certain being conversant with Brahma,

11. That after giving birth to each child I shall again be a virgin ; therefore do you offer me to this king accepting these best of horses.

12. By going to four kings in succession you will get the full complement of eight hundred (horses) and I too shall have four sons.

13. Give me up therefore in order that you may be able to redeem the pledge made to your spiritual guide ; so do I think with my humble wisdom and you can do as you like."

14. The Muni Galava, being thus addressed by that girl, then said these words to the lord of the earth, Haryyashwa.

15. "Accept this maiden, O Haryyashwa, O foremost among men, by the offer of a fourth part of her dowery and beget on her but one child."

16. He, having accepted that girl and having pleased Galava, got the wished for son at the proper time and place.

17. The prince was thereafter named Vasumanas who in wealth was richest and lived to be a king as wealthy as one of the Vasus himself and a giver of wealth.

18. In proper time, the wise Galava again presented himself there and having approached Haryyashwa said to him whose desire had been satisfied.

19. "O ruler of men, you have begotten this son, a boy similar to the sun in effulgence and it is time for me to go to another ruler of men to ask for alms."

20. Haryyashwa, who was ever ready to abide by his words and who made manliness the basis of his action, gave back Madhavi as he could not procure all the horses himself.

21. Madhavi, too abandoning that effulgent royal prosperity, became a maiden again of her own will and followed Galava.

22. "Let the horses remain with you for the present" so said the twice-born one and went, in company with the maiden, to Divodasa, the ruler of men.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixteenth Chapter in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXVII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Galava said :—

1. This lord, the king of the Kasis, is a ruler of the earth endued with great prowess, and this ruler of men is a descendant of Bhimasena and is known as Divodasa.

2. There shall I go, gentle lady ; follow me with slow steps and grieve not, for that ruler of men is virtuous, and ever attached to self-control and truth.

Narada said :—

3. The aseetic, coming to him, was received with becoming honours and Galava urged that king to beget children.

Divodasa said :—

4. I have heard of all this already ; what is the necessity of repeating all this in detail. As soon as I heard of this, O best among the twice-born, this object (children) was desired for by me.

5. This too is a mark of great respect for me that passing by many rulers of men you have come to me and without doubt this will be (i. e. your wishes shall be gratified.)

6. But in the matter of horses, my wealth is exactly like his (Haryyashwa) O Galava ; and I too shall beget only one ruler of the earth on this girl.

Narada said :—

7. The foremost among the twice born, saying, be it so, gave that damsel to the ruler of earth and the king too accepted that girl after suitable ceremonies.

8. The royal Rishi than sported with her as Ravi (the son) with Prabhavati, as Agni (fire) with Swaha, and as Vasava (Indra) with Sachi ;

9. And as Chandra (moon) with Rohini and as Yama (the god of death) with Urmila ; as Varuna (the lord of the waters) with Gauri, and as Kuvera (the lord of wealth) with Raddhi ;

10. As Narayana with Lakshmi and as Udadhi (the ocean) with Jahnvi, as Rudra with Rudrani and as the grandsire with the goddess (Saraswati) ;

11. As the son of Vasistha with Adrishanli and Vasistha with Akshamala ; as Chyavana with Sukanya and as Pulastya with Sandhya ;

12. As Agastya with the princess of Vidarbha, as Satyavan with Savitri, as Bhriugu with Puloma, as Kashyapa with Aditi ;

13. As Jamadagni, the son of Richika with Renuka as the son of Kushika (Vishwamitra) with the princess, Hemavatsi, as Vrihashpati with Tara and Shukra with Shataparva;

14. As Bhumipati with Bhumi, as Pururavas with Urvasi, as Richika with Satyabati, and as Manu with Saraswati;

15. As Dushmanta with Shakuntala, as the eternal Dharma with Dhriti, as Nala with Damayanti, and as Narada with Satyavati;

16. As Jaratkaru with Jaratkaru, as Pulastya with Pratichya, as Urnayas with Menaka and as Tambura with Rambha;

17. As Vasuki with Shatashirsha and as Dhananjaya with Kumari,

18. As Rama with the princess of Videha and as Janardana with Rukmini. Then to the king of the earth, Divodasa, sporting with her,

19. Madhavi did bear a son named Prartardana; and then to Divodasa came the great Rishi Galava.

20. When the proper time came, he said these words:—"Return me my maiden but let the horses remain with you for the present,

21. As just now I shall go from here to another king of the earth for her dowery;" the virtuous souled Divodasa in proper time gave back that damsel to Galava for that ruler of the earth was established in truth.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventeenth Chapter, the story of Galava in the Bhagavat-Yana, of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXVIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—contd.

Narada said :—

1. In that way having abandoned that prosperity, the renowned lady Madhavi once more becoming a maiden and according to her promise followed the regenerate Rishi Galava.

2. Galava, whose mind was centred in the accomplishment of his own purpose, after due deliberation, went to the city of the Bhojas to see the ruler of men, the son of Ushinara.

3. And going to that ruler of men endued with true prowess he said:—"This damsel will bear you two sons who will be kings of the earth,

4. By this means, you will gain your object after death, as also in this world, having begotten two sons, O ruler of men, equal in effulgence to the moon and the sun.

5. The dowery is, O you conversant with all virtue, that you should give me four hundred horses like the rays of the moon and having one ear black.

6. For the sake of my spiritual guide that do I make these efforts for the horses and it is not for myself; if you are prepared to act thus, O great king, do what I have said without any reflection or hesitation.

7. You are without children, O royal Rishi; beget then two sons, O ruler of the earth, and by means of these rafts in the shape of sons do you obtain salvation for yourself and for your ancestors.

8. A man, enjoying the fruit of begetting a son, O royal Rishi, never falls down from heaven and never goes to the terrific hell where goes he who has no child."

9. Having heard all this and many other things said by Galava the ruler of men Ushinara gave him this answer.

10. "I have heard what you say and know what you intend to say, O Galava; but O Brahman, the lord has all the power in such matters for my heart inclines to do what you say.

11. But two hundred only of horses of this breed I have; of other sorts thousands are roving about in my territories.

12. I too shall beget only one son on her, O Galava, and, O twice born one I shall go along the course followed by others in this matter.

13. In the matter of dowery too, I shall act like them, O best among the twice born; my wealth is the property of my subjects and not for my own enjoyment.

14. The king, who out of desire, spends the wealth of others, is never connected with virtue, O virtuous souled one, nor with renown.

15. Therefore shall I accept (the maiden); you please give her to me so that a son may be born to me in the womb of her who bears god-like children."

16. The best among the twice-born, Galava then worshipped the king of men, who spoke in that strain many other things by bestowing upon him that maiden.

17. And having given her to Ushinara, Galava went to the forest and he (Ushinara) sported in her company like a virtuous man enjoying his prosperity,

18. In caverns of mountains, and near the sources of rivers, in buildings with windows, and in secluded chambers;

19. In variegated gardens, and in forests and pleasure gardens, in beautiful palaces and on tops of houses.

20. Then was born to him in due time a son who was a boy similar in effulgence to the sun; he lived to be an excellent ruler of the earth known by the name Shivi.

21. The twice born Galava having then presented himself to him and having taken back the maiden went away and saw the son of Vinata,

Thus ends the one hundred and eighteenth Chapter, the story of Galava in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXIX,

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Narada said:—

1. The son of Vinata, seeing Galava, said to him thus laughing:—"It is by good luck that I see you successful here, O twice-born one".

2. Galava too, hearing those words spoken by the son of Vinata, informed him that a fourth part of the work yet remained to be done.

3. Suparna, the foremost among speakers then said to Galava:—"No pains should be taken by you for this for you will not get it.

4. In days of old, in Kanyakubja, Richika chose the damsel Satyabati, the daughter of Gadhi, for his wife and he was thus spoken to by Gadhi.

5. You give me a thousand horses white as the moon and black of one ear.

6. Richika too saying "very-well" went to the abode of Varuna and from there obtaining the horses from the Ashwatirtha gave them to the ruler of the earth.

7. They were presented to the twice-born one by king Pundarika who performed a sacrificial ceremony; and of them, (the horses) the rulers of the earth (to whom you have applied) obtained two hundred each by purchase from the Brahmanas at the time.

8. The other four hundred, O best among the the twice-born while being led across (the Vitasta river) were robbed by the river.

9. Such being the case, you will not be able to obtain what is unobtainable by all means; present, therefore, this damsel as a substitute for the two hundred horses to him,

10. Namely, Vishwamitra, O virtuous souled one, along with the six hundred horses; then will you be beyond the reach of grief and your desire will be successful, O best among the twice born."

11. Galava then saying to him "very well" along with Suparna, taking the horses and the maiden with him, went to Vishwamitra and said.

12. "Of the horses asked for by you there are six hundred here and this damsel is a substitute for the other two hundred. Let these be accepted by you.

13. On her by Rishis of royal descent three virtuous sons have been begotten; you too beget the fourth who will be the best among mankind.

14. Then will you get the full complement of eight hundred horses asked for by you and I too, after having paid off my debt, shall perform asceticism as I please.

15. Vishwamitra, seeing Galava along with the bird and also that girl with beautiful hips, said these words.

16. "Why was not this girl presented to me beforehand, O Galava? Then would all the four sons have been mine, every one of whom would have perpetuated a dynasty.

17. I shall accept this girl from you to beget on her one son and let the horses having been taken to my hermitage roam about at their will in all directions.

18. Vishwamitra, of great effulgence, then roaming and sporting with her, Madhavi brought forth a male child named Ashtaka.

19. At the moment he was born, the great Muni Vishwamitra instructed him in both virtue and worldly good and presented to him those horses.

20. Then did Ashtaka go to the city which was like the city of the moon and the son of Kushika (Vishwamitra) too went to the woods after having returned the damsel to his disciple.

21. Galava too, along with Suparna, was light of heart having succeeded in making the final present he had promised, and said this to the girl.

22. "By you has been brought forth a son who is the foremost among the givers of wealth, a second one who is a great hero, another who is ever attached to virtue and truth and the fourth who is a great performer of sacrificial ceremonies.

23. Therefore do you come, O you of beautiful hips, your father has obtained salvation by your sons and also the four kings (their fathers) and so also have been I, O you of slender waist."

24. Galava, then having permitted Suparna who subsists on serpents to go away and returning the damsel to his father, went to the forest.

Thus ends the one hundred and nineteenth chapter, the story of Galava in the Bhagavatya of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXX.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued,

Narada said :—

1. The king (Yayati) too, being desirous of giving her (Madhavi) a husband by Swayamvara, went to the hermitage at the confluence of the Ganga and Yamuna,

2. Making Madhavi seated on a chariot with garlands and flowers on her person; Puru and Yadu too followed their sister to the hermitage.

3. There, in that hermitage, came together Nagas, Yakshas, and human beings, Gandharvas, animals and birds and dwellers of mountains, woods and forests.

4. There was also a concourse of the kings of many countries and the forest, that surrounded the hermitage, was filled with Rishis equal (in asceticism) to Brahma himself.

5. The lady, of good complexion, being directed to choose a husband, passed over all these husbands and selected the forest as her husband.

6. Getting down from the chariot, the damsel saluted her friends and having gone to the sacred forest, the lady born of Yayati, practised austerities,

7. By observing fasts and different sorts of religious rites, as also ceremonies. She reduced her body and adopted the life of a deer.

8. Subsisting on sweet and green grass resembling the blades of the Vaiduryya gem and which were both sweet and bitter,

9. And drinking the best of holy waters of sacred fountains which was sweet, pure and cool,

10. And roaming in thick forests from which the kings of animals (lions) and tigers had been exiled and in deserts which had no conflagration in them,

11. In company with deer and adopting their mode of life she earned much religious merit, by practising Brahmacharyya.

12. Yayati, too following the mode of life of the kings before him, lived for a thousand years and then paid the debt of nature.

13. The two best among men Puru and Yadu perpetuating the family were established (as king) in this world and the son of Nahusha in the next.

14. O monarch, dwelling in heaven Yayati, resembling a great Rishi, enjoyed the choicest blessings of heaven.

15. After many thousands of years had elapsed in great happiness and while seated among royal Rishis of great lustre and renown,

16. Yayati, with his senses stupefied and his intellect beside himself, insulted all the human beings and the gods and the body of Rishis.

17. Then did the god Shakra, the slayer of Vala, perceived his folly and all those royal Rishis said—fie, fie.

18. And seeing the son of Nahusha, enquiries were made, who is he, what king's son is he, and how did he come to heaven?

19. By which deeds did he obtain salvation? In what forest did he practise asceticism? How is he known in heaven and by whom, is he so known?

20. The dwellers of heaven made such enquiries about the king among themselves pointing to Yayati, the ruler of men.

21. The hundreds of the cherioteers of heaven and hundreds of the gate keepers of heaven and the persons who had the seats of heaven in their charge being asked about the matter, said—we do not know.

22. None of them was then in proper senses and did not know that ruler of men, and speedily was that ruler of men shorn of his heavenly effulgence.

Thus ends the one hundred and twentieth chapter, in the Bhagavatya of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Narada said :—

1. Being thus turned out from his place (in heaven) and deprived of his seat there, his heart trembling and consumed by the fire of grief,

2. With his garlands rendered pale, his senses taking leave of him, deprived of his crown and other ornaments, with his head reeling and his entire body relaxed and robbed of his robes and ornaments,

3. Incapable of being known, and now seeing and again not seeing those gods he fell down to the earth below with his mind in despair and his intellect a blank.

4. "What inauspicious and sinful thought was entertained by me in my my mind, in consequence of which I have been turned out from my place in heaven?" Thus did the king think within himself.

5. All the kings who were there (in heaven) as also those who had obtained salvation and the Apasaras laughed at Yayati being hurled down from heaven and falling down, having no support to cling to.

6. Then did some officers whose duty it was to hurl down men, whose religious merit had been rewarded by a sufficiently long term of residence in heaven, coming there said to Yayati, "O king, by command of the king among the gods,

7. You are exceedingly intoxicated with vanity and there is no body you have not insulted and owing to this vanity you are no longer fit for heaven, O you born of a king.

8. No one knows you here too, therefore down you and fall down." "I shall fall among the good" the son of Nahusha said these words three times.

9. While falling that foremost of those who had attained salvation thought of the course of his fall (and the place he he should fall on in the end.)

10. At this time he saw four kings and fell among them. They were Pratardana, Vasumanas, Sivi the son of Ushinara and Ashtaka,

11. Who were gratifying the lord of the gods by the performance of the sacrificial ceremony known as Vajapeya. And the smoke proceeding from that sacrificial ceremony had gone to the very gates of heaven.

12. Yayati fell towards the earth smelling that river of smoke which connected as it were the earth with the heaven.

13. The lord, of the earth following the course of that smoke which was moving like the Ganga in heaven, came among those foremost of the performers of sacrifices who were his own relatives;

14. Among those who were like the supporters of the earth; among those four who were as lions among kings and like the great fire in sacrificial ceremonies the king Yayati fell.

15. The Royal Rishi Yayati, after all his religious merit had been spent up, fell among them; all the rulers of the earth said to him who was effulgent with beauty: "Who are you? With whom are you related, and from what town and country are you?"

16. Are you a Yaksha or a god, a Gandharva or a Rakshasa, for you have not the appearance of a human being; and what is the object desired for by you?"

Yayati said:—

17. I am the royal Rishi Yayati and the religious merit acquired by me being spent up I have been turned out from heaven; and wishing in my mind that I should fall among the good, I have fallen among you.

The kings said:—

18. May what was desired for by you be successful; accept the religious merit of these sacrificial ceremonies performed by all of us.

Yayati said:—

19. I am not a Brahmana and therefore cannot accept wealth (of any sort) from others, and my heart is not inclined to destroy the religious merit of others.

Narada said:—

20. At this time, seeing Madhavi leading the life of a deer and wandering about, those kings bowing to her said:

21. "What is the reason of your coming here, what orders of yours shall we obey? Being your sons, O devotee, we are ready to be commanded by you."

22. Madhavi, hearing that speech of theirs with great delight, came to her father and bowed to Yayati.

23. And having touched those sons of hers on their head the anchorite said these words: "These are your grandsons, O chief among kings—my sons—they are not unconnected with you.

24. These will save you—such an example has been seen in days of old—I am your daughter, Madhavi, who, O king, have adopted the life of a deer.

25. By me too has religious merit been acquired; accept half of that, for, O king, all human beings enjoy the wealth earned by their children.

26. Therefore was it that you, O lord of the earth, wished me to be the mother of sons;" then did all those rulers of the earth lowering their heads,

27. Bowed down and said the same thing to their maternal grand father, filling the earth with loud and sweet sounds the like of which there was none.

28. The rulers of men thus saved their grand-father who had been turned out from heaven; just then, Galava, coming there, said to the ruler of the earth, "Ascend you heaven by virtue of a eighth part of my austerities."

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty first chapter the turning out from heaven of Yayati, in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Narada said :—

1. The moment he was recognized by those good men, those foremost among human beings, that ruler of men went up again without touching the surface of the earth, and Yayati being freed from all his troubles again got his place in heaven.

2. Bedecked with heavenly garlands, clothed in heavenly raiment and putting on heavenly ornaments and with heavenly perfumes and endued with heavenly qualities he did not even touch the earth with his feet.

3. Then did Vasumanas, renowned in this world as the foremost among givers, first uttering these words in a loud voice said to the king.

4. "The merit that I have earned in this world by my conduct towards all the castes, which can not be found fault with, that too I give you and may you earn that.

5. The merit that is earned by one who is attached to liberality and the merit that is earned by one who exercises forgiveness and the merit that I have earned by my sacrificial ceremonies—may you earn all that."

6. Then did that foremost among the Kshatriyas, Pratardana too, ever attached to virtue and given to war, said :

7. "The fame that I have gained in this world, and which is due to my being born in the Kshatriya order, the merit earned by me for being called a hero—is all yours."

8. The wise Sivi, the son of Ushinara, then said in a sweet voice: Since, to children, or women, as also to those who might be cracked jokes with,

9. To those who are in danger, to those engaged in a game of dice, as also to those who are suffering from grief and calamities

I have never before said a falsehood, by virtue of that truth, wander about in heaven.

10. I can abandon my life, my kingdom as also all luxuries and objects of desire but not truth, by that do you wander about in heaven.

11. The truth by which Dharma, the truth by which Agni and the truth by which the performer of a hundred sacrifices has been gratified by me—by virtue of that truth wander about in heaven.

12. And the royal Rishi Ashtaka too, the son of Madhavi, by the son of Kushika, conversant with virtue, addressing the son of Nahusha who had performed many hundreds of sacrifices, said :

13. "O Lord, the sacrificial rites Pundarika, Gosava and Vajapeya have been performed by me by hundreds; get you the merits of these.

14. I have not considered gems nor wealth, nor any sort of riches too much for the performance of my sacrifices (that is I have not spared them); by virtue of that truth, do you wander about in heaven."

15. As one by one his grandsons addressed that ruler of men, so by degrees the king went up to the heaven leaving below the earth.

16. By this means did all those kings by their good deeds easily save Yayati, who had been turned out from heaven, at that time.

17. The four grandsons, born in four royal families, and each the perpetuator of a race, sent back by their own virtue, by the sacrificial rites performed by them and gifts made by them, their wise grandfather to heaven.

The kings said :—

18. O king, we are your grandsons endued with kingly virtues and with all virtues and accomplishments; ascend heaven, O ruler of men.

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty second chapter, the getting up to heaven of Yayati in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Narada said :—

1. Being thus made to ascend heaven by those pious rulers of the earth, who were greatly given to liberality, Yayati was established in heaven after taking leave of his grandsons.

2. (He went up to heaven) amidst the downpour of a shower of sweet scented flowers and fanned by a holy wind, whose very smell indicated its holiness.

3. Reaching then the eternal regions earned for him by his grand sons by the fruit of their own deeds, he became effulgent with excellent beauty.

4. He was gladly received in heaven with songs and dances by groups of Gandharvas and Apsaras and with the sound of cymbals.

5. He was also duly gratified by various classes of celestial Rishis, royal Rishis and Charanas and honoured by an excellent Arghya and otherwise pleased by the gods.

6. The grandfather then said to him who had earned the merit of ascending heaven as if trying to please him who had obtained gratification and tranquility of mind with his words.

7. The four Padas (the full amount) of virtue had been earned by you by your worldly deeds and these regions were yours for an endless period and your renown in heaven too was eternal.

8. But that merit, O royal Rishi, you nullified again, for by your vanity were the minds of all the denizens of heaven clouded.

9. In consequence of this they did not recognize you and being thus rendered unknown (to them) you were hurled down and you have come here again, your grandsons saving you out of affection for you.

10. Earned by your own deeds you have now come to a place which is stable, eternal sacred, excellent and surely indestructible.

Yayati said :—

11. O you endued with divine prosperity, I have a certain doubt which it is proper for you to remove ; it is not proper that I should ask any body else, O grandfather of the universe.

12. Great was the merit earned by me by protecting my subjects and increasing the human stock for a great many thousands of years and by many sacrificial rites and pieties.

13. How could that all be spent up in a very short time in consequence of which I was hurled down ; O you endued with divine prosperity, you know that the eternal regions were built for me and how and why were all these destroyed, O you of great effulgence ?

The grandsire said :—

14. The merit, earned by you by protecting your subjects and increasing the human stock for a great many thousands of years and the performance of many sacrificial rites and making many gifts,

15. Was destroyed by this defect owing to which you were hurled down : O chief among kings, owing to your vanity you cared very little and held in contempt the denizens of heaven.

16. In the case of a man affected by vanity, O royal Rishi, or by envy or by force or by wickedness, or by deceit, these regions can not be eternal.

17. By you, O king, are not to be disregarded or insulted those that are superior or those that are inferior or those that are indifferent ; salvation cannot be attained by one who is consumed by vanity.

18. Those men, who will converse on this story of your fall and reascension, will attain salvation though affected by sins ; there is no doubt of it.

Narada said :—

19. By Yayati was such a distress met with in days of old for his vanity and by Galava owing to an excessive measure of obstinacy, O lord of the world.

20. The advice of your well wishers should be listened to by you, for your friends wish you well ; obstinacy should not be resorted for it gives rise to ruin.

21. Therefore, do you also, O son of Gandhari, abandon vanity and wrath ; O hero, make peace with the sons of Pandu and abandon wrath, O ruler of the earth.

22. O ruler of the earth, that which one gives, or does, or the asceticism one practises or the sacrifices one makes can never be destroyed nor do they suffer deterioration in quality and the fruits are enjoyed by no body save the doer.

23. By understanding this great story than which nothing is better, and which is approved of by those who are well read in holy books and those who are past the operations of desire and wrath, a man obtains in this world a knowledge of (virtue, worldly good and desire) and gets the sovereignty of this world.

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty-third chapter, the ascension to heaven of Yayati in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIV.

BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. O you endued with divine prosperity, it is as you say O Narada, and I too wish the same thing, but O you endued with heavenly prosperity, I am not the master.

Vaishampayana said :—

2. Saying this the descendant of Kurus said to Krishna :—“ O Keshava, you have said to me what leads to (the attainment of) heaven, to the benefit of the world and which is virtuous and just.

3—4. But I am not my own master, O you of long arms; O best of men, try to persuade, O Krishna, my wicked son Duryodhana, who disregards injunctions of the scriptures who never does what is pleasing to me and never listens to good words.

5. The son of Gandhari (does not listen to the advice of) the wise Vidura, O Hrishikesha, as also to that of other friends and of such well wishers as Bhishma and others.

6. Therefore do yourself instruct the ruler of men, Duryodhana, of wicked soul, crooked, of evil intellect, of sinful heart and senseless.

7. Then will a very great duty of a friend have been done by you, O Janardana.” Then did the son of Vrishni addressing the wrathful Duryodhana,

8. Say these sweet words, conversant as he was with all virtues and worldly profit: “O Duryodhana, listen to this speech of mine, O you best among the Kurus,

9. Especially for the benefit of yourself and of your followers, O Bharata. Born as you are in a family of very wise men, it is indeed proper that you should do this honorable act.

10. You are endued with learning and with good habits of life. Whereas these that are born in low families are wicked-souled, inhuman and shameless.

11. These latter alone act in the way that you are contemplating; in this world the inclination of honest men seems to lie towards virtue and worldly profit.

12. And the inclination of bad men seems to lie towards the opposite direction, O best among the Bharatas, this contemplated action of yours seems to lie in this opposite direction.

13. In this case, the obstinacy shown by you is vicious, frightful and greatly destructive of life; it will lead to your harm, it is without reason, and is unworthy of being pursued by you long, O Bharata.

14. Abandoning what is injurious to yourself you should do what is for your benefit and that of your brothers, followers and friends, O you chastiser of your foes.

15. You will escape the blame of an act which is opposed to virtue and which will lead to notoriety. With the sons of Pandu who are wise, heroic, of great energy, of noble souls and very much conversant with our holy books,

16. O foremost among men, make peace—it is beneficial to the wise Dhritarashtra and also pleasing to him,

17. As also to your grandfather and Drona and Vidura of great intelligence and to Kripa and Somadatta and to the wise Valhika,

18. And to Ashwathaman, and Vikarna, and Sanjaya and Vivinsati and very much so to your cousins and also to your friends, O chastiser of foes.

19. In peace, there will be your benefit, my dear friend, as also that of the entire world; be endued with modesty, for you are born in a noble family, and be learned and human; therefore, my dear friend, do you follow the commands of your father and mother, O best among the Bharatas.

20. People consider that to be conducive to his good which a father commands, O Bharata, and a good man, when meeting with a danger, remembers all the commands of his father.

21. Peace, my dear friend, with the sons of Pandu is pleasing to your father and O you foremost among the Kurus, may it prove pleasing to yourself along with your advisers.

22. That man, who hearing the advice of his friends, does not act according to it, in the end is consumed like one who has eaten the Kimpaka fruit.

23. He, who out of folly, does not act according to the advice, than which nothing is more beneficial, is visited by the effects of procrastination, does not gain his object and is afterwards struck with remorse.

24. He, who having heard that, than which nothing is more beneficial, acts up to it abandoning his own opinions, gets happiness in this world.

25. He, who does not act up to the advice of one who desires his good thinking it to be against his interests and listens to what is really so (against his interests), comes under the power of his enemies.

26. The friends of him, who disregarding the opinions of the honest, follows that of dishonest men, soon grieve at his distress,

27. He, who abandoning his principal advisers, acts according to the injunctions of inferior ones, meets with grave dangers and does not come out of them safe.

28. He, who acts according to the advice of dishonest men, who behaves falsely and does not listen to the advice of good friends and prefers others to those who are his own, is cast off by the earth, O Bharata.

29. Yourself, being opposed to those heroes, desire to be saved by those who are strangers to you, and who are dishonest, incompetent and fools, O best among the Bharatas.

30. What man, besides yourself in this world, abandoning kinsmen who are mighty ear-warriors and each equal to Shakra himself, expects safety with the help of others.

31. Ever since their birth, have the sons of Kunti been persecuted by you but those virtuous-souled sons of Pandu are not vindictive at your conduct.

32. O friend, ever since their birth the sons of Pandu have been treated with deception but those renowned men, O you of long arms, have treated you generously.

33. By you too should they be treated in the same way, O you best among the race of Bharata; do not show anger towards your own kinsmen.

34. The energy of wise men follows all the the three objects (virtue, profit and desire) O best among the race of Bharata and in the event of it being impossible to follow all the three objects people choose virtue and profit.

35. If these three are to be pursued separately a wise man chooses virtue; an indifferent man (i.e. neither wise nor a fool) chooses worldly good, while a boy chooses desire.

36. The fool, who out of avarice and desire for sexual pleasure, abandons virtue and desires to gain his desire and profit by improper means, is ruined.

37. The man, who is desirous of gaining the object of desire or worldly profit, must first of all practise virtue; desire or profit is seldom detached from virtue.

38. It is said that virtue is the means of gaining the three objects, O lord of the universe; and he, who is desirous of getting them by this means, increases in prosperity as fire in a heap of dry grass.

39. You however, my dear friend, desire to get by improper means a greatly extensive kingdom well known among all the kings.

40. He, who behaves deceitfully towards those following the right path, O king, cuts himself down as the forest by an axe; one does not cut off the intellect of another whose defeat he does not desire.

41. For one, whose intellect has been clouded, cannot direct his attention to what is conducive to his good. One who keeps his soul under proper control does not think lightly of anything in the three worlds, O Bharata,

42. Not even an ordinary creature—not to speak of those foremost among men, those sons of Pandu; a man, who is under the influence of wrath, can not discern anything.

43. All rank growth must be cut off; O Bharata, look at the proofs; peace with the sons of Pandu is more to your interest than union with wicked people.

44. Living in peace with them you will succeed in all your objects enjoying the territories built up by the sons of Pandu, O best among kings.

45. Keeping the sons of Pandu behind you, you repose your hopes for safety on other sources, namely on Dusasana, Durosua, Karna and the son of Suvala.

46. Reposing your kingly prosperity on them you wish for prosperity, O Bharata; but these friends of yours have not sufficient knowledge of virtue and worldly profit.

47. They are not competent too in prowess or in strength, to be a match against the sons of Pandu; nor are all these kings united with you competent,

48. To look at the face of Bhimasena when exercised by anger in battle field. This entire assembled army of the earth is at your elbow.

49. This Bhishma, Drona, as also this Karna, Kripa as also Bhurisravas, Ashwathama, the son of Somadatta and Jayadratha,

50. All these are incapable of fighting against Dhananjaya. This Arjuna is invincible in battle by all the Gods and Asuras and by all human beings and Gandharvas. Do not fix your mind on battle.

51. Do you see any man in this entire army who, having met Arjuna face to face in battle, has returned home safe?

52. Of what advantage will a massacre of men be to you, O best among the Bharatas. Show me the man who will defeat the one whose defeat will mean victory to you,

53. Him who vanquished the gods along with the Gandharvas and Yakshas, and Asuras and Serpents in Khandava Prastha—who will fight against that son of Pandavas ?

54. In the same way in the city of Virata is heard a very strange tale in the fight of one against many; that is a sufficient proof.

55. Do you wish to defeat that unconquerable, irrepressible and undeteriorating Jishnu, the heroic Arjuna when enraged in battle, by whom in an encounter even Mahadeva was gratified ?

56. Who can wish to defeat him having me as his help when he goes to the battle field like Indra (himself) ?

57. He, who would defeat Arjuna in battle, could bear the earth with his arms and being excited with wrath could burn up all earthly creatures, and could hurl down the gods from heaven.

58. Look at your sons and at your brothers and at your kinsmen and other relations; let them not be destroyed by an act done by you, O you best among the race of Bharata.

59. Let not this race of Kurus be exterminated and let not yourself be spoken of as the destroyer of the race and be of great notoriety, O lord of men.

60. Those mighty car warriors will establish yourself as the viceroy and your father Dhritarashtra, the lord of men, as the emperor.

61. Do you not, my dear friend, disregard this prosperity which has appeared in the horizon and is about to come to you; having given half to the sons of Pritha attain to great prosperity.

62. Having effected peace with the sons of Pandu and listening to the advice of your friends and living in peace with your friends will you ever attain to blessing.

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty-fourth chapter, the speech of Krishna, in the Bhagavatiana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXV.

BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA—

Continued

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then did the son of Shantanu, Bhishma, say to the wrathful Duryodhana, hearing the words of Keshava, O you best among the Bharatas.

2. "By Krishna has been spoken the words of a friend wishing for peace; listen to that, my dear son, and do not follow the lead of vindictiveness.

3. By not acting up to the words of the great-souled Keshava, will you not be able to obtain prosperity nor happiness nor your good.

4. The one of long arms, Keshava, has told you, my dear son, what will lead to virtue and to the obtainment of earthly good; and may you obtain that object, O king; do not destroy these living creatures.

5. Do not by your wicked deeds cause to break down this blazing prosperity of the Bharatas, among all kings while Dhritarashtra is alive.

6. Yourself with your ministers and with your sons, brothers and friends will be deprived of lives by your waywardness and obstinacy.

7. By acting against the beneficial advice leading to the obtainment of earthly benefit of Keshava as also of your father and the wise Vidura, O foremost among the Bharatas,

8. Do not bring about the extermination of your race; do not act like a wicked man of evil intellect and do not follow a wrong course. Do not drown your father and your mother in a sea of grief."

9. Then did Drona say these words to Duryodhana there who was under the influence of wrath and breathing hard again and again.

10. "Keshava said words to you which are pregnant with virtue and profit, my dear son; so did Bhima, the son of Shantanu, O ruler of men, accept them.

11. The two are wise, have intelligence, have their souls under control, know what leads to virtue and to worldly good and they are vastly learned; they have told you beneficial words; O ruler of men, accept them.

12. Follow, O greatly wise man, what the two, Krishna and Bhishma have said; do not from perverted understanding insult Madhava, O chastiser of foes.

13. Those, who are now encouraging and supporting you, will hardly do any thing when the time comes; and they rather will throw the (act of bearing) hostilities on the shoulders of others.

14. Do not slay all these living creatures as also your sons and brothers; the side on which Vasudeva and Arjuna are, know as unconquerable and invincible.

15. This is truly the opinion of your friend Krishna, and if you do not accept that, my dear son, you will grieve for it in the end, O Bharata.

16. Arjuna is still mightier than what the son of Jamadagni has described him to be ; Krishna, the son of Devaki, is hard to vanquish even by gods ; O best among the Bharatas, what is the use of telling you what is conducive to your happiness and ought therefore to be desired for by you.

17. All this is described to you ; do as you like ; I do not wish to address you more, O best among the Bharatas.

Vaishampayana said :—

18. At the end of that speech did Kshattri Vidura also speak words looking at the wrathful son of Dhritarastra, Duryodhana

19. 'Duryodhana, I do not grieve for you, O best among the Bharatas ; I grieve for these two old people namely your father and Gandhari (your mother).

20. Having yourself of wicked heart as their protector, they will wander about without any one (in a short time) with their friends slain and with ministers killed, like those born of eggs deprived of their wings.

21. Grieving, they will wander about as beggars on the earth, having begotten such a wicked and vicious man, the exterminator of his race.'

22. Then the king Dhritarastra said to Duryodhana who was seated along with his brothers and surrounded by other kings,

23. "O Duryodhana, listen to this advice given by the great-sould Shouri ; accept his words which are true, most beneficial, and conducive to our salvation.

24. By the help of him, namely of Krishna of unblameable acts, we, of all other kings, shall obtain all desirable objects

25. Being well united with Keshava, my dear son, go to Yudhisthira and make arrangements for a ceremony for the good of the Bharatas (the Pandavas and Kurus united together).

26. By the help of Vasudeva, make peace (with the Pandavas) ; I think the proper time has now arrived ; O Duryodhana, do not disobey me.

27. If you abandon peace which is begged from you for the accomplishment of your own good, then will victory never be yours."

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty-fifth chapter, in the Bhagvat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXVI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Hearing the words of Dhritarashtra the two, sympathising with Dhritarashtra said, words to Duryodhana who did not act according to the instructions of his elders.

2. So long as the two Krishnas are not clad in coats of mail, so long as the Gandiva bow is lying still, so long as Dhaumya the priest of the Pandavas does not make offerings to the fire of war, and thereby burns up the strength of their enemy,

3. So long as Yudhisthira who is endued with modesty and a great bow-man does not look on your army with wrath, let hostilities cease.

4. So long as the son of Pritha, the great Bowman Bhimasena is not seen to take up his position in the division of his own army, let hostilities cease.

5. Let there be peace with Pandavas so long as Bhimasena, with the mace in his hands, does not come this way vanquishing his opponents.

6. So long as he does not cut off the heads of warriors fighting on elephants and make them by his hero killing mace roll like the fruits of the palmyra,

7. Which are ripening on their proper time having come, let hostilities cease. So long as Nakula and Sahadeva and Dhristadyumna, the son of Prishatha,

8. And Virata and Sikhandi and the son of Sishupala clad in their coats of mail, do not penetrate into your army like crocodiles in the great sea,

9—10. Showering arrows, as they are masters in weapons, let hostilities cease. So long as in the delicate bodies of the rulers of the earth terrible arrows with wings do not fall, let hostilities cease. So long as on the breasts of those warriors smeared with sandal and other sweet scented unguents and bedecked with golden garlands and gems, do not fall the dreadful weapons of iron and steel shot by mighty bowmen,

11. Masters in the use of weapons who can shoot from a long distance and with good aim, let hostilities cease.

12. Let the virtuous king Yudhisthira, that best of kings take you by the hand while you are saluting him with your head bowed down.

13. Let that one who has performed many sacrifices comfort you, by placing his right arm, marked with the sign of a banner and hook on your shoulders.

14. Let him put his hands with fingers bedecked with gems and the palm red, on your back while you are seated.

15. Let him, whose shoulders are broad as the trunk of Shala trees, Vrikodara, of long arms, embrace you and with good will greet you for the sake of peace, O best among the Bharatas.

16. Being saluted by the three, Arjuna and the twins, you smell their head and converse in terms of peace, O ruler of the earth.

17. Let all these rulers of men shed tears of joy at beholding yourself united in peace with your brothers who are heroes.

18. Proclaim it in the several capitals and among all the rulers of the earth ; enjoy the sovereignty of the earth like brothers and be freed from all troubles.

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty sixth chapter, the speech of Bhishma and Drona in the Bhagavatyaana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXVII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Duryyodhana, hearing in the assembly of the Kurus those words which he little liked, said in reply to Vasudeva of long arms and of great renown.

2. "It is proper, that you should speak to me in this way after due consideration ; but you speak, finding fault with me especially.

3. Why do you, O slayer of Madhu, speak in terms of praise of the sons of Pritha and why are you ever finding fault with me without due consideration of the strength and weakness of our cause ?

4. You and Kshattri and the king, and the preceptor and the grandfather all find fault with me and not with any other king of the earth.

5. But in this matter I do not find any unworthy conduct of myself but still all of you including the king hate me.

6. I have not committed the slightest fault, O chastiser of foes, nor do I see any after a most minute and searching examination, O Keshava.

7. O slayer of Madhu, the Pandavas were defeated at a game of dice in which they engaged of their own will and their kingdom was won by Shakuni ; what fault is there on my part in this matter ?

8. Indeed, O slayer of Madhu, I ordered at the time for the return of the wealth which the Pandavas had lost in that case.

9. It is not our fault that defeated at another game of dice—those invincible sons of Pritha—those foremost among victors were thus exiled into the forest.

10. By the imputation of what fault do they regard ourselves as their enemies—O Krishna ? The Pandavas are weak and incapable but they yet cheerily treat us as their enemies.

11. What has been done by us to them and for what injury again do those sons of Pandu united with this Srinjayas, try to slay the sons of Dhritarastra ?

12. We will not, fearing harsh deeds or words, bow down out of fear even to the performer of a hundred sacrifices (Indra).

13. I do not see any body, O Krishna, following the duties of a Kshatriya who would aspire to defeat us in battle, O chastiser of foes.

14. Bhishma, Kripa and Drona, along with Karna, O slayer of Madhu, are incapable of being vanquished even by the gods, how can they be so by the sons of Pandu ?

15. If following the duties laid down by my religion, O Madhava, I fall down dead in the field killed by arms in the proper time, it will lead me to heaven.

16. The principal duty of ours, Kshatriyas, O Janardana, is that we should lie down on a bed of arrows in the battle field.

17. If we lie down like heroes in the battle without bowing before the enemies, then it is no matter for regret, O Madhava.

18. Who is there, who born in a noble family and abiding by the rules of the Kshatriya class, seeing that his life is in danger would bow before any body ?

19. Keeping one's self erect one should not bow down, for energy or exertion itself is manliness ; he may even break at his weak points but on no account should he bow before any body.

20. This saying of Matanga is followed by those that desire their own good ; men like me bow only to Brahmanas for the sake of virtue.

21. Without paying regard to any body else, throughout his life he should act thus ; this is the duty of the Kshatriyas in my opinion and such has ever been my conduct.

22. The share of the kingdom that was given them in early days will not be regained by them during my life time, O Keshava.

23. O Janardana, so long as the position of a king is held by Dhritarastra we shall live as his dependants with swords laid aside, Madhava ; this kingdom which ought not to have been given away was given away when I depended on others ;

24. Out of ignorance or fear when I was a child, O Janardana ; it is not now to be regained by the sons of Pandu, O delighter of the Virshnis.

25. So long as this is held by myself of long arms, O Keshava, I shall not leave aside for the Pandavas, that piece of land even which is pierced by the point of a sharp needle.

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty seventh chapter, the speech of Duryyodhana in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXVIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA) Cont.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Then reflecting, did the scion of the Dasharha race, speak these words to Duryyodhana in that assembly of the Kurus.

2. "To get the sleep of a hero is your desire and it will be fulfilled ; wait for a short time with your ministers and there will be a great massacre.

3. O fool, you think that there is nothing blameable in your conduct towards the Pandavas ; all the kings here know this.

4. Being jealous of the prosperity of the great souled sons of Pandu you arranged for a game at dice in consultation with the son to Suvala, O Bharata.

5. How could your cousins, my dear fellow, who are worthy in every respect and of honest turns of mind and virtuous, unite themselves with this deceitful one ?

6. O greatly wise man, dice destroys the intelligence of the honest and in the dishonest it gives rise to disputes and other troubles.

7. By you and your wicked followers was planned this terrible calamity by means of dice without consulting with those who are of good habits of life.

8. Who else save yourself could treat the wife of your brother in that way and after bringing Draupadi to that council hall and using insulting words as you did ?

9. She is of noble birth, of good behaviour and dearer to them than even their lives ; and that queen of the sons of Pandu was thus insulted by you.

10. All the Kurus know how in the assembly those chastisers of foes, the sons of Kunti, were on the eve of their exile, addressed by Dusasana.

11. What good man would treat in this unbecoming way his own near kinsmen of good habits of life, who are not covetous and who always practise virtues.

12. Speeches befitting only the cruel and dishonorable men, were used by Karna and Dusasana as also by yourself.

13. You took very great pains to burn them up when boys along with their mother at Varanavata but that attempt of yours was not successful.

14. At that time did the sons of Pandu live for a long time in disguise in company with their mother in the house of a Brahmana Ekachakra.

15. By poison, by snake, and by rope, in fact by every means was the destruction of the sons of Pandu attempted by you but that attempt of yours was not successful.

16. Such was ever your inclination and treachous treatment towards the sons of Pandu ; how have you not then offended the great-souled Pandavas ?

17. If you do not give them their paternal share when they ask for it, you shall, O wicked one, have to give it when you will be overthrown, deprived of your prosperity.

18. Having done many wicked deeds like a cruel man towards them and behaved like a dishonourable man, you now try to look different.

19. By your mother and by your father as also by Bhishma, Drona and Vidura have you been told again and again to make peace but, O ruler of the earth, you do not make peace.

20. In peace is your great gain, O ruler of the earth, in fact that of both parties, but it does not seem pleasing to you owing to no other cause save the scarcity of your intelligence.

21. By going against the advice of your well-wishers, will you not attain to your highest good ; for what is about to be done by you is not virtuous and will not lead you to fame.

Vaishampayana said :—

22. The scion of the Dasharha race having thus spoken to the wrathful Duryyodhana, Dusasana said these words in the assembly of the Kurus.

23. "If you do not make peace, O king, of your own free will with the sons of Pandu, the Kauravas will make you over to the son of Kunti bound hand and foot.

24. The son of Vikartana, yourself and myself, these three, O best among the sons of Manu, your father and Bhishma and Drona will make over to the sons of Pandu.

Vaishampayana said :—

25. Suyodhana, the son of Dhritarastra, hearing those words of his brother was very angry and got up from his seat breathing like a huge serpent.

26. Vidura, Dhritarastra, the great king Valhika, and Kripa, and Somadatta, Bhishma, Drona and Janardana,

27. Disregarding all these that shameless one of wicked intellect, like a dishonourable man, vain and yet not commanding respect and given to insulting those who ought to be respected, went out of the court.

28. His brothers, having seen him, that best among those born of Manu, go out, followed him along with the ministers and the entire body of the kings.

29. Seeing Duryodhana rise up in that council and go away accompanied by his brothers, Bhishma the son of Shantanu said,

30. "He who inclines towards wrath abandoning virtue and worldly profit, is soon rejoiced over by wicked men in his troubles.

31. This wicked prince, the son of Dhritarastra, who does not know the proper means of suitable ends and is vain of the kingdom, is come under the influence of wrath and avarice.

32. I think that the time for the end of all Kshatriyas is come, O Janardana, for all the rulers of the earth along with the ministers have followed him out of folly."

33. That heroic scion of the Dasharha race, with eyes like the petals of the lotus, hearing the words of Bhishma, said to all of them headed by Bhishma and Drona.

34. "This is the great defect of all the elders among the Kurus that they do not with force obstruct this wicked king in the enjoyment of prosperity.

35. O chastiser of foes, I therefore consider that that the time has come for you to act; O sinless men, listen to that by doing which you will obtain benefit.

36. What I shall tell you is clearly for your benefit, if in consequence of its being favourable to you it is approved by you, O Bharatas.

37. During the life time of the old king of Bhoja, his son, of wicked behaviour and a slave to his passions, having usurped the throne of his father subjected himself to death.

38. Kansa, the son of Ugrasena, being forsaken by his own friends, was killed by me in a great battle from a desire to do good to my kinsmen.

39. Ugrasena, the son of Ahuka, being duly honoured by ourselves with our kinsmen, was annointed king and he extended the territories of the kingdom of Bhoja.

40. Abandoning the one, namely Kansa, for the sake of the whole race, did all the Yadavas, Andhakas and Vrishnis attain to happiness, O Bharata.

41. Paramesthi, the lord of all creatures said, O king, when the gods and the Asuras were prepared for battle and were under arms.

42. When the world was divided into two parties and was about to be ruined, O Bharata—that god endued with divine prosperity, the creator and the protector of the world said :—

43. "In a fight with the Daityas, the Danavas, and the Asuras will be defeated, and the Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras and the denizens of heaven will be victorious.

44. The gods, the Asuras, the human beings, the Gandharvas and the Rakshasas will, in this battle in their rage, kill one another."

45. Thus thinking Paramesthi, the lord of all creatures, said to Dharma—"Binding these Daityas and Danavas make them over to Varuna."

46. Dharma being thus spoken to, by the command of Paramesthi binding the Daityas and the Danavas, made them all over to Varuna.

47. Having bound them with the aids of Dharma as also by his own power, the lord of the waters, Varuna keeps the Danavas ever in the sea.

48. In the same way, binding Duryodhana, Karna and Sakuni as also Dusasana make them over to the Pandavas.

49. One man should be sacrificed for the benefit of a race; a race should be sacrificed for the good a town; a town should be sacrificed for the good of the community; and for the sake of the soul should even the earth be sacrificed.

50. O king, having bound Duryodhana make peace with the sons of Pandu. By so doing will the Kshatriyas not be exterminated, O foremost among the Kshatriyas.

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty eighth chapter, the speech of Sri-Krishna in the Bhagavad-gana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXIX.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

*Continued.Vaishampayana said :—

1. Hearing these words of Krishnai Dhritarashtra, the lord of men, said in haste to Vidura conversant with all virtues.

2. "Go my dear friend, to the exceedingly wise Gandhari endued with great foresight; get her here; joining with her shall I persuade that one of evil intellect.

3. If she can lead that wicked souled one of vicious heart, to peace then shall we be able to act up to the words of Krishna, our well-wisher.

4. She might show the right path to him overpowered by avarice, by speaking in favour of that one of wicked intellect and having vicious men for his help, for making peace.

5. If she can thwart this dire and frightful calamity brought about by Duryyodhana then shall we attain happiness and remain happy for ever."

6. Hearing the words of the king Vidura brought, by command of Dhritarashtra, Gandhari endued with great foresight.

Dhritarashtra said :—

7. O Gandhari, this is your wicked-souled son who never obeys my commands owing to his avarice for prosperity; he will lose prosperity as also his life.

8. That wicked-souled one like, an unmannerly man and without showing any respect for others, accompanied by those vicious companions, went out of the council hall and the fool did not pay any attention to the advice of his well-wishers.

Vaishampayana said :—

9. That princess, of great renown Gandhari having heard the words of her husband, said these words desiring the greatest good of her son.

Gandhari said :—

10. Quickly summon your son, who is afflicted with a passion for kingdom; a kingdom cannot be maintained by an unrighteous person who seeks neither virtue nor worldly good.

11. But notwithstanding all this, Duryyodhana, having no humility in him, has obtained what is unobtainable by all means and you, O Dhritarashtra, are very much blameable for this, for you are fond of your son.

12. You, who know that he is of a sinful nature, follow his wisdom, and he too supported by you is fully under the influence of desire and wrath and a slave of lust.

13. He is now incapable of being swerved from his purpose by force, O king; entrusting the kingdom to that ignorant fool of wicked soul,

14. And having wicked ministers and moved by avarice, you are reaping the fruits O Dhritarashtra; why do you, O lord of the earth, look on this dispute with your own kinsmen with indifference? Your enemies will rejoice at this dispute with your own kinsmen.

15. A difficulty which can be averted, O great king, by means of concillation in gift, who would care to use violence in?

Vaishampayana said :—

16. By command of Dhritarashtra as also at the request of the mother the Kshatri again had the wrathful Duryyodhana brought there.

17. He, being desirous of hearing what his mother had to say, again entered the council chambers with his eyes red as copper in rage, and breathing (heavily) like a serpent.

18. Seeing her son who was following the wrong course enter, Gandhari with a view to peace, spoke these words finding fault with him.

19. O Duryyodhana, my dear son, listen to these words of mine which will conduce to the benefit of yourself along with your followers, which will bring on happiness and which is easy for you to listen.

20. Duryyodhana, what your father, that best among the Bharatas, as also Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and the Kshatri have told you is the advice of your well wishers; follow that.

21. It is my fond and earnest wish as also that of your well wishers Bhishma, your father and others, the chief of whom is Drona, that you should make peace.

22. O you of great wisdom, a kingdom cannot be maintained by following the bent of your desires alone, nor can it be earned, protected or enjoyed (by that means), O best of the Bharatas,

23. Nor can one, who has not controlled his senses, enjoy a kingdom for a long while; one, who has controlled his senses and has intelligence, can alone protect a kingdom.

24. Desire and wrath snatch away a man from earthly good; after subjugating these two enemies does a king conquer the earth.

25. The sovereignty enjoyed by a ruler of men is a great thing; a kingdom can easily be wished for by those that are of wicked souls but it cannot be suitably protected by them.

26. One, who aspires to great things, must lead his senses to virtue and profit; by having the senses under control, intelligence increases as fire when it has fuel added on to it.

27. These, when not kept under proper control, are sufficiently powerful to kill a man like untrained horses not properly managed which can kill an incompetent driver on the road.

28. He, who without conquering self, wants to conquer his ministers, or he, who without conquering his ministers wants to conquer his enemies, is soon brought under subjection by others.

29. He who conquers his own self first, thinking that to be an enemy, and and then desires to conquer his ministers and his enemies has his desires fulfilled.

30. To one who has his senses under control, to one who has gained mastery over his enemies, to one who holds the rod (of punishment) on offenders and to one who does a thing after mature consideration, does prosperity offer great adoration.

31. Like two small fishes, caught in a net with small holes, are desire and wrath which exist in a body, deprived of their existence by wisdom.

32. Desire and wrath when increased are the things owing to which the gods shut up the doors of heaven to a man who has gained mastery over worldly propensities and otherwise is qualified to enter heaven.

33. The protector of the earth, who knows how to gain complete ascendancy over desire, wrath, avarice, pride and vanity, subjugates the entire world.

34. The rulers of men, desirous of obtaining worldly good, virtue and the defeat of his enemies, should constantly employ themselves in controlling their senses.

35. He who behaves falsely, being subject to desire or to wrath, towards himself or to others, has got no body to help him.

36. Having joined those ones endued with great wisdom, those heroes who are chastisers of their enemies, those Pandavas, you will enjoy along with them this earth in happiness, my dear son.

37. What Bhishma, the son of Shantanu and the great car-warrior Drona have told you, namely that Krishna and Arjuna are invincible is true indeed.

38. Seek the refuge of that one of long arms, Krishna who does everything without exertions; if Keshava is gratified, it will conduce to the happiness of both the sides.

39. That man, who does not follow the instructions of well-wishers who desire his good and who are wise and learned, is the delight of his enemies.

40. My dear son, from a fight there will result no good; and how can there be virtue or worldly benefit? and how can there be happiness. Even victory is not stable; do not therefore set your mind on war.

41. O you of great wisdom, by Bhishma, by your father and by Valhika were the sons of Pandu given their share of the kingdom out of fear for a dispute, O chastiser of foes.

42. The fruits of this bestowal you now see—you enjoy this entire earth, subjected by those heroes, with all your thorns and barriers removed.

43. Give to the sons of Pandu their due share, O chastiser of foes, if you desire to enjoy the earth with your ministers; make over to them one half of this kingdom.

44. One half of this earth is sufficient for the livelihood of yourself and your ministers; by following the advice of your well-wishers you will earn renown, O Bharata.

45. By a struggle with the sons of Pandu who are endued with prosperity, who have intelligence and who have mastered their senses, you will be deprived of great happiness, my dear son.

46. Removing the wrath of your well-wishers, rule over your kingdom duly after having given back to the sons of Pandu their own share, O best among the Bharatas.

47. The troubles that they have suffered for the last thirteen years are enough; O you of great wisdom, control the feelings you entertain, which are fed by wrath and desire.

48. You desire to possess yourself of the wealth of the sons of Pritha but you are not competent to do it, nor is the son of the Suta, nor your brother Dushasana of firm wrath,

49. Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Karna, Bhimasena, Dhananjaya and Dhristadyumna being fired with wrath, all creatures will surely cease to exist.

50. Being subject to the influence of wrath, do not, my dear son, slay the Kurus; let not this entire earth be massacred on account of your doings.

51. The thought, that you entertain, O king, that Bhishma, Drona, Kripa and others will fight for you, with all their might, will not be realized now.

52. These, who know their own selves, have equal affection for the Pandavas and yourselves, while virtue is more on their side; besides whichever side wins, the kingdom will be the same to them.

53. If for the fear of losing the maintenance they get from the king, they can think lightly of their very lives, they will yet not be able to see the king Yudhishthira with (angry) eyes.

54. By avarice men are not seen to earn prosperity in this world; therefore do you my dear son, quench this avarice of yours, O best among the Bharatas.

Thus ends the one hundred and twenty-ninth chapter, the speech of Gandhari, in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXX.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Treating with contempt those words spoken by his mother which were pregnant with good sense, the one, of unsubdued soul, again went to his own place fired with wrath.

2. Then having issued out of the assembly-hall did that son of Kuru consult with the son of Suvala, king Sakuni experienced in the game of dice.

3. Such was the resolution of the four, namely Duryodhana, Karna, Shakuni, the son of Suvala and Dusasana.

4. "Janardana, who does everything speedily, wants to capture us first in consultation with Dhritarastra and the royal-son of Shantanu.

5. But we shall capture that best among men, Hrishikesha, by force like Indra seizing the son of Virochana (Vali).

6. Hearing that the scion of the Vrishni race has been captured, the sons of Pandu will lose heart and will become deprived of their energy like serpents whose fangs have been broken.

7. This one of long arms is the refuge and protection of all; and this best among the Satwatas, this giver of boons being captured,

8. All the sons of Panu along with the Somakas will be deprived of their energy; therefore now and here should we capture this Keshava of quick action,

9. In the face of the ravings of Dhritarastra, and then fight the enemies." This wicked intention of those wicked-souled wretches,

10. The wise Satyaki, who could understand the signs, quickly came to know of; and in consequence of that knowledge he came out with the son of Hridika (Kritavarman).

11. And he said to Kritavarman:—"Quickly prepare the army for action and with the divisions thereof ready for action and clad in armours, wait at the gate of the council chamber.

12. In the meantime, I shall communicate all this to Krishna who performs action without exertion. Then that hero, having entered the council chamber like a lion entering the caverns of a mountain,

13. Communicated that intention (of those Kurus) to the great souled Keshava and then to Dhritarastra and then to Vidura also.

14. They heard this proposal of theirs with laughter and ridicule for this (proposed) deed was against virtue, worldly benefit and desire as also against the principles of an honest man.

15. (Satyaki continued). "In this instance the fools seek to do an act which is by no means capable of being performed; these fools of wicked souls are united together to pick a quarrel.

16. Being overpowered by desire and wrath and being subjected to the influence of anger and avarice, these men, of mean heart, seek to slay the one with lotus eyes,

17. As children and idiots attempt to seize blazing fire by means of their cloths". Hearing those words of Satyaki Vidura, endowed with great foresight,

18. Said to Dhritarastra of long arms in that assembly of the Kurus:—"O king, the time of all of your sons is come, O chastiser of foes.

19. They are prepared to do an act which is incapable of being done, and which, if done, would be discreditable; having overpowered and vanquished this one with lotus eyes,

20. They desire to capture along with the younger brother of Vasava—this best among men, who is incapable of being vanquished, and in fact hard to stand against.

21. Having stood against him they will cease to exist as worms in contact with fire. This Janardana, desiring the good of all when fighting,

22. And rendered angry, will send them to the abode of Yama like a lion routing a herd of elephants ; but this mighty blameable act of wickedness will never be perpetrated.

23. Achyuta, the best among men, never swerves from the path of rectitude." Vidura having said this, Keshava said these words,

24. Looking on Dhritarastra and in the hearing of his well-wishers :—"O king, if, being angry they can by their might capture me,

25. Let them do it, for I know, O ruler of the earth, the might of these and I can venture to cure all of them of their anger.

26 But I shall never do an act which is blameable and wicked ; these sons of yours will lose their own wealth by coveting the wealth of the Pandavas.

27. Since they desire to act so wickedly Yudhisthira has all the greater chances of success ; for I can at this very moment, capture these and those that follow them,

28. O king, and make ever to the son of Pritha which will not be a hard thing to do ; but I am not inclined to do such a blameable deed, O Bharata.

29. What this Duryodhana, O king, wishes to do in your presence, in consequence of wrath and sinful heart, O great king, let him do.

30. I too allow all your sons, O ruler of men." Hearing this Dhritarastra said to Vidura:—"Bring that wicked Suyodhana covetous of the kingdom soon,

31. Along with his friends, with his ministers, with his brothers and with his followers. I shall see again if I can get him along the right path."

32. Then did Khattri again cause Duryodhana to enter the council chamber, unwilling as he was along with his brothers, and surrounded by the kings.

33. Then did the king Dhritarastra say to Duryodhana and Karna and Dusasana and the kings who surrounded them.

34. "O you of inhuman conduct, of exceeding sinfulness, having for your supporters only men of small deeds, united with wicked men, you want to perpetrate a wicked deed,

35. This intended act of yours is incapable of being performed, tending to infamy and disapproved by the honest in fact this is a thing which a fool and the cause of infamy to the race like you would attempt.

36. This one with lotus eyes, who can not be vanquished, in fact who is hard to stand against, you want to capture, being united with your wicked supporters.

37. Him who cannot be forcibly seized even by the gods under the leadership of Vasava, you want to capture like a child desiring to grasp the moon.

38. You do not know that Keshava is incapable of being fought with in battle by the gods, the human beings, the Gandharvas, the Asuras and the Nagas.

39. Keshava is hard to capture by force even as air is incapable of being captured by living beings, as moon is incapable of being grasped by living beings and as the earth held on the head."

40. This being said by Dhritarastra the Kshatri Vidura too said, with his eyes on the wrathful son of Dhritarastra, Duryodhana.

Vidura said :—

41. "O Duryodhana, listen now to these words of mine : At the gates of Saubha did the chief of monkeys, Dwivida by name, covered Keshava with a heavy down pour of stones.

42. Being desirous of capturing Madhava by force, he made every effort to do it but he could not capture him and you want to capture him by force.

43. Naraka, along with all the Danavas, could not capture Shouri who had gone to Pragjotisha and you want to capture him by force.

44. Slaying in battle Naraka who had lived for many thousands of years he brought away his thousand daughters and married them with the usual rites.

45. In the city of Nirmochana sixty thousand great Asuras could not capture him with their nooses and you want to capture him by force.

46. When he was but a child, Putana and Shakuni were slain by him and the Govardhana mountain was held up by him for the protection of the cows, O best among the Bharatas.

47. Arishta and Dhenuka as also Chakura of great strength and Aswaraja and Kansa who were leading sinful lives were slain by him.

48. Jarasandha, and Vakra and Sisupala of great heroism and Vana were slain by him in battle as also several other kings.

49. The king Varuna too was defeated as also fire of immeasurable energy and even the lord of Sachi himself was overpowered when robbing the Parijat flower.

50. White lying asleep on the all spreading ocean by him were Madhu and Kaitabha slain and in another birth was Hayagriva slain.

51. He is the doer of everything but himself is not created and he is the cause of all power. This Shauri can perform without any effort whatever he wishes

52. You do not know and fully understand this Achyuta, this Govinda of fierce prowess; he is endued with unblamable energy like an angry serpent.

53. In your attempt to vanquish Krishna of long arms and of unwearied actions you will with your ministers be reduced to the condition of worms perishing by meeting with fire.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirtieth chapter, the speech of Vidura in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. This being said by Vidura, Kashava the killer of his crowds of enemies, endued with prowess, said to Duryodhana, the son of Dhritarashtra.

2. "O Suyodhana, since you think me to be alone out of your folly, you want to effect my capture by overpowering me, O you of very little intellect.

3. Here are all the Pandavas as also all the Andhakas and the Vrishnis; here are the Adityas, the Rudras and the Vasus along with the great Rishis."

4. Saying this Keshava, the slayer of the heroes of his enemies, laughed aloud and at his laughter the body of the great souled one became like lightning.

5. And from his body issued forth gods of the measure of the thumb but having the rays of fire and Brahma was found to be on his brow and Rudra on his breast.

6. The supporters of the universe were seated on his arms, and from his mouth sprang up fire. The Adityas and the Sadhyas, the Vasus and the Aswinas

7. The Maruts along with Indra as also the gods of the universe of the same form, as also Yakshas, Gandharvas and Rakshashas

8. Issued out thence. In the same way from his two eyes sprang up Sankarsana and Dhananjaya. In his right stood Arjuna the Bowman and in his left stood Rama with the plough.

9. Behind him were Bhima and Yudhis-thira as also the two sons of Madri and still behind them were the Andhakas and the Vrishnis headed by Pradyumna.

10. In front of Krishna were the other chiefs with their great arms upraised. The conch, the dice, the mace, the Shakti, the bow Sharnaga, the plough, the Nandaka,

11. Were seen upraised and all other arms of offence blazing in all directions in the hands of Krishna.

12. From his two eyes and from his two ears and his nose issued forth continually the great Rudra himself in the shape of sparks of fires accompanied with smoke.

13. From the pores of his skin issued in the same way something like the rays of the sun; seeing that frightful appearance of the great-souled Keshava,

14. The kings, with their hearts, struck with fear, shut their eyes with the exception of Drona, Bhishma and Vidura of great intelligence,

15. And Sanjaya of great power. And those Rishis whose only wealth consisted in devotion for the lord Janardana, gave them celestial sight.

16. Seeing that great wonderful appearance of Madhava in the inside of the Assembly-hall celestial drums were sounded and there was a downpour of flowers.

Dhritarashtra said :—

17. "You are the doer of good to the entire world, O you of lotus eyes, therefore it is proper that you should bless me, O you foremost among the Yadavas.

18. O lord, I again pray for the restoration of my eyes, for I want to see you and I desire not to see anything else."

19. Then did Janardana of long arms say to Dhritarashtra :— "O delighter of the Kurus, let your eyes, with which you can not see, have sight restored to them.

20. And wonder it was, O great king that Dhritarashtra got his eyes which he gained in consequence of his desire to behold the universal form of Vasudeva.

21. The rulers of men, struck with wonder at the restoration eyesight to the sitting Dhritarashtra, propitiated the slayer of Madhu.

22. And the whole earth moved together and the waters of the sea were agitated and the rulers of the earth were struck with great wonder, O best among the Bharatas.

23. Then did that best among men, that chastiser of foes, cast off that form which was his own, that celestial form and wonderful, which was diverse looking and was endued with prosperity.

24. Then taking Satyaki by his hand and also the son of Hridika the slayer of Madhu went out, with the permission of those Rishis.

25. Then did those Rishis, Narada and others vanished from sight, lost in the confusion, which followed that.

26. Seeing him go out, the sons of Kuru along with the other kings, followed that best among men like the gods following the performer of a hundred sacrifices.

27. Shauri, of immeasurable soul, however without thinking of that entire assembly of kings (that followed him), went out like fire accompanied with smoke.

28. With his white chariot and large, furnished with tinkling balls and ornamented with gold, with wheels clattering like the roaring of clouds,

29. Which was also covered with white tiger skins, and to which were yoked his excellent horses, among which was Saidya, he saw Daruka.

30. He saw also the great car-warrior Kritavarman, the son of Hridika, the respected hero of the Vrishnis seated on the chariot.

31. The great king Dhritarashtra again said to Shauri, that chastiser of foes, who was about to depart on the chariot which was ready before him.

32. "The influence I wield over my sons you have seen, O Janardana; you have been a witness to that; nothing has happened behind your back, O chastiser of foes.

33. Desirous of the peace of Kurus, I have lost my respect; O Keshava, knowing these circumstances it is not proper that you should suspect me.

34. I have no wicked intention against the sons of Pandu, O Keshava; for the words I said to Suyodhana are known to you.

35. All the Kurus know, as also these kings, these rulers of the earth, that I have attempted to bring about peace with all earnestness, O Madhava.

Vaishampayana said:—

36. Then did Janardana of long arms say to Dhritarashtra and to Drona, and to Duryodhana's grand-father Bhishma, and to the Kshatri, and to Valhika and to Kripa.

37. "Your exalted selves are witnesses to what transpired in the assembly of the Kurus; how today that fool, like an uneducated and unmannerly fellow, got up from his seat.

38. And how the ruler of the earth Dhritarashtra says that he is powerless in the matter; with the permission of you all I shall now go to Yudhishthira.

39. Those mighty bowmen, those heroes, those foremost among the Bharatas followed that best of men, Shauri who was departing in his chariot after taking leave of them.

40. Those heroes were Bhishma, Drona, Kripa, Kshatri, Dhritarashtra, Valhika, Ashwathama, Vikarna and the great car-warrior Yuyutshu.

41. Then in that white chariot and large, furnished with tinkling bells he went to the sister of his father, the Kurus looking at him.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-first chapter, the exhibition of the universal form in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then having entered her abode and saluted her feet he described in brief to her what had happened in that assembly of the Kurus.

Vasudeva said:—

2. Many sorts of speech were made, all of them being acceptable and consistent with reason, by myself and the Rishis but he did not accept these.

3. All these, the followers of Suyodhana, have reached the end of their time and with your permission I should soon get the Pandavas.

4. What should be said by me to those sons of Pandu, by your command, tell me, O you of great wisdom; I desire to hear your words.

Kunti said:—

5. O Keshava, tell that virtuous-souled king Yudhishthira;—"Virtue is fast leaving your; do not act vainly, my dear son.

6. Like an ignorant student of the Veda, O king, understanding the literal meaning but not catching the spirit you have been rendered ignorant of the laws of worldly good and like a fool you have been lost; the literal meaning of the Vedas being too much impressed on you, your intellect follows only virtue.

7. Consider your own duties for which you were created by him who is born of himself; the Kshatriya has been created from the arms and by the exercise of his arms must he live.

8. For all hard deeds and for the protection of subjects he has been created; hear in this connection an example which has been heard by me from old people.

9. To Muchukanda, the royal Rishi Vaisravana, being gratified, gave this earth but he did not accept it.

He said:—

10. I desire to get a kingdom, which shall have been earned by the prowess of my arms; then was Vaisravana still more gratified and was struck with wonder.

11. Then after that did the king Muchukanda rule over this earth which he earned by the prowess of his arms following closely the duties of a Kshatriya.

12. The one-fourth of the entire virtue earned by subjects well protected by the king in this world goes to the king, O Bharata.

13. And if the king practises virtue he resembles the god even and if he practises vice he goes to hell.

14. The penal code enforced by Lord in a proper way makes the four orders lead lives in their own proper spheres and makes the king himself earn virtue, desire and salvation.

15. If the king properly follows the penal code in its entirety then the best of age called Krita Yuga reigns.

16. O king, do not linger in doubt as to whether the age that reigns is the cause of the particular nature of the king or whether it is the king that rules that is the cause of the prevalence of a particular period. The king is the cause of the age.

17. The king is the creator or maker of the Krita Yuga, as also of the Treta and Dwapara and the king becomes the cause as well of the fourth Yuga.

18. Owing to causing the Krita Yuga to prevail, a king enjoys exceedingly the fruits of heaven and owing to causing the Treta yuga he enjoys moderately the fruits of heaven.

19. Owing to causing the Dwapara yuga to prevail he has also a due share of these fruits but owing to causing the Kali Yuga to prevail, the king attains excessive misery.

20. Then that doer of wicked deeds resides, in hell for eternity; the earth is affected by the sins of the king while he too is affected by the earth's sins.

21. Duly following the examples of your father and grandfather, observe the duty of a king—this is not the life of a royal Rishi in which you desire to live.

22. He, that is affected by weakness of mind or heart and follows the path of compassion, does not gain any portion of the fruits due to the protection of subjects.

23. Pandu, nor myself, nor your grandfather blessed you then formerly for that you should follow the course you are adopting.

24. The performance of sacrificial rites, liberality, devotion, heroism, the protection of subjects and children, greatness, might and energy, were ever expected of you by me.

25. Swadha, and swaha as also the blessings of a long life, wealth, sons are ever given by gods and men, when duly gratified.

26. The parents, and even the gods always expect liberality, study, sacrificial rites and the protection of subjects, of their sons.

27. Whether this be virtue or not, you are to practise them in consequence of this your birth; but my children, though wise and born in a high family, are without the means of earning their living and in fact they are persecuted by others.

28. Who earns greater virtue than he who is a hero and the foremost among the gift makers, coming in contact with whom hungry beings of the earth have their hunger satisfied?

29. Some by means of gifts, others by means of force, a third by means of truth, should be attached to his own side by a virtuous man who has obtained a kingdom.

30. A Brahmana should live on alms, a Kshatriya should protect his subjects, a Vaishya should acquire wealth and a Sudra should serve all these other orders.

31. The life of a begger is not suited to you, nor does agriculture seem fit; you are Kshatriya, the saviour of the oppressed and should live by the prowess of your arms.

32. O you of long arms, earn again your paternal wealth which is lost, by means of conciliation, dispute, gifts, punishment, or by diplomacy.

33. What can be more sorrowful than this—that I, deprived of friends and supporters, should live on the food of others, having given birth to you, O delighter of friends.

34. Fight following the duties of kings and do not sink your grandfathers in infamy; do not obtain a sinful end along with your younger brothers with the effect of your virtuous deeds being wrested away.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty second chapter, the speech of Kunti, in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd).

Kunti said :—

1. In this connection is cited the old story of the conversation between Vidula and her son, O chastiser of foes.

2. It is proper that you should tell (Yudhisthira) the words of that story or anything better than that. There was a lady born in a noble family who had great renown and was wrathful.

3. She was attached to the duties of a Kshatriya princess and her name was Vidula, She possessed great foresight and had senses under control; her name was known to all kings and she was very learned for hearing speeches of eminent men.

4. The princess Vidula thus censured her own son who, being defeated by the king of the Sindhus, was lying down with a sorrowful heart.

Vidula said :—

5. I have begotten a son who does not delight me but on the other hand increases the joys of our enemies. By me nor by your father have you been begotten. Where have you come from?

6. Being the reverse of wrathful you cannot be reckoned among men and your features possess no signs of prowess. Throughout your life you are in despair; for your sake, and your own welfare, bear the burden of life manfully.

7. Do not think lightly of your own soul and do not let it be satisfied with a little; having set your mind on very great desirable objects, be not afraid and abandon your misgivings.

8 Rise, O coward, do not remain inactive in this way being defeated, thereby increasing the joys of our enemies, affording cause for grief to your friends and regardless of everything.

9 Bad (small) rivers are filled with a handful water and mice are satisfied with little and a coward is ever well satisfied, for a little satisfies him.

10 Rather die in the act of rooting out the fangs of a snake than roam about like a dog and exercise your prowess even at the risk of life.

11 Or be on the look out for the holes of your enemies like a hawk roaming about in the sky or you show your prowess and and fight without any doubts in your mind.

12 Why are you lying down like a dead body being struck with thunder? Rise, O coward, and do not lie down defeated by your enemies.

13 Do not vanish away into darkness so miserably; let yourself be heard about by your deeds; do not stand in the second rank, nor in the third nor in the last but stand proudly first.

14 Blaze up even for a moment like a piece of Tinduka wood and do not like the fire of husk smoke away fireless out of your desire of life.

15 A momentary blaze is better than smoking for a long time; let not there be born in a royal house a prince who is too harsh or who is too soft-minded.

16 Doing the deed of men and achieving every feat that is really great in a field of battle a man satisfied the duties of his order and has no reason to find fault with himself.

17 A wise man grieves not whether he is successful or not in his object; on the contrary he commences what ought to be done under the altered circumstances without caring for his life.

18 Show forth your own power or meet with your sure end only playing at your back (making it a secondary consideration) why do you live my son?

19 The fruits of the sacrificial rites performed by you, O coward, and all your renown are all destroyed; the roots of your enjoyment are all cut up; for what reason do you live on?

20. When about to fall down (in wrestling) an enemy should be held by the thigh and made to fall down also even when cut up to the roots, one should not grieve.

21. Remembering the exertion made by horses of good breed in moving heavy weight know what in your own manliness lies and bring together all you sense of honour and energy.

22. Raise up the race that has been sunk in infamy by your own doings. The man, whose great and wonderful feats men do not talk about,

23. Goes only to increase the common herd; he is neither a woman nor a man; he whose fame is not spoken about in gifts, devotion and truth

24. And in learning and attainment of wealth is but the excretion of his mother. Whereas learning, devotion, in prosperity or prowess

25. The man who surpasses another or in deeds is a man indeed. It is not proper that you should adopt a life which is idle and wretched,

26. Compassionate leading to infamy and miserable which is suitable only for a coward; in such a case enemies rejoice over such a weak man.

27. Held in contempt and destitute of seats and robes; they express surprise and gratification at small earnings, are mean, have no courage and are low.

28. Friends derive no happiness from gaining such a friend; being exiled from a kingdom we shall die destitute of the means of earning our livelihood,

29. Deprived of all desires and enjoyments, turned out from our place and having nothing at all. Misbehaving among a race of honest men and the destroyer of the fame of his race and family

30. Kali himself in the shape of yourself, my son Sanjaya, has been brought forth, by me who has no wealth in him no energy, no prowess, and is the delighter of his enemies.

31. Let no woman bring forth such a son; do not smoke away but blaze up and exercising your prowess slay your enemies.

32. Blaze over the heads of enemies for a moment or even for a small bit of time; those are indeed men who are wrathful and who exercise no forgiveness.

33. One, destitute of wrath and given to the exercise of forgiveness, is neither a woman nor a man; satisfaction destroys prosperity so does softness of heart.

34. And so do these two namely want of exertion and fear; one without exertion never attains to greatness; free your soul, by your own exertions of these defects which lead to ruin.

35. Making your heart one of steel, hunt for the recovery of your lost wealth; one is called a man (Purusha) for he vanquishes the enemy (Param).

36. He is said to bear the false name (of purusha) who leads in this world the life of a woman. A hero of mighty strength and acting like a powerful lion, 37—38. May be subject to the influence of his fate but even in such a case his subjects rejoice; for he who leaving his own happiness hunts for the prosperity (of his kingdom) very soon contributes to the rejoicing of his ministers.

The son said :—

39. If you do not behold me, what is this entire earth to you; what will your ornaments do for you; and what is the use of enjoyments and what even of life itself.

The mother said :—

40. The world which is (reserved) for the poor and miserable, may our enemies attain to; and may our well-wishers roam about in the earth which is (reserved) for respected souls.

41. Do not follow the life of those who are devoid of attendants, who subsist on the food given by others (by way of charity); who are miserable and who are devoid of strength and prowess.

42. May the Brahmanas and your well-wishers, my son, live depend on you as living creatures depend on the clouds (rain) and as the gods depend on the performer of a hundred sacrifices.

43. The man, depending on whom all living creatures depend, O Sanjaya as (birds) on a tree with ripe fruits, has his life rendered useful.

44. The hero, by whose prowess his friends attain to happiness like the gods attaining to happiness through Shakra has his life blessed.

45. That son of Manu, who lives on the strength of his arms, gets renown in this world and a blissful one here after.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirtythird chapter, the injunctions of Vidura to his son in Bhagavatyaana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXIV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

*Continued.Vidula said :—

1. If under these circumstances you desire to abandon manliness, you will soon be following the path followed by the mean and the low.

2. That Kshatriya, who being desirous of life, does not exercise his energy and power to the best of his ability, is said to be like a thief.

3. Like medicine to one at the point of death these words which are conducive to your interest and are otherwise well suited, do not act in your mind.

4. The men, under the King of the Sindhus, are not contented and those fools are, owing to their own weakness, waiting for some calamity to their master, on which they will effect their deliverance.

5. Having collected their forces one by one, his enemies will join you at seeing your prowess.

6. Having united yourself with them wander about in the caverns and fastnesses of the mountains and in proper time he will meet with calamities for he is neither without old age nor is immortal.

7. By name you are Sanjaya but I do not see jaya (victory) in you; follow the meaning of your name and do not make it false.

8. A very wise man, possessing great foresight, said to you while you were a child: "After meeting with great difficulties, he will again meet with prosperity."

9. Remembering these words I expect your victory, therefore do I speak this to you, my dear son, and am telling you this again and again.

10. He, in the success of whose object others become interested, is sure to have his object crowned with success if he follows it according to the ordinary rules of prudence.

11. "Whether there be increase or decrease I will fight," O Sanjaya, engage in fight with this thought and do not turn back.

12. There is no condition more frightful than this, said Shamvara, namely that in which the food for today and that for the morrow are not seen.

13. He said that this was a greater trouble than the death of one's husband and sons; what is called poverty is another form of death.

14. I am born in a great family and have come from a lake to a lake; I am the mistress over many persons, endued with all blessings and very much esteemed by my husband.

15. My group of friends saw me in days of old amongst friends, with a cheerful heart, decked with costly garlands and ornaments, with my body well washed, and attired in good clothes.

16. When you will see myself and your wife very weak (owing to the want of nourishment) then of what use will life be to you, O Sanjaya?

17. Seeing our servants who used to attend on us doing menial offices, our preceptors, and our priests go away leaving us, what is the good of life to you?

18. If I do not now see you following such duties as you observed in days gone by which were laudable and conducive to your renown what peace of mind can I get?

19. If I have to say. "No" to a Brahmana (asking for a favour) it will rend my heart. Neither myself nor my husband ever said "No" to a Brahmana.

20. We are the proper refuge of others but never depended on others ourselves. Such being the case, if I now have to live as a dependant on another, I shall sacrifice my life.

21. Be the means of our crossing that which cannot be crossed and be our boat where there is no boat. Make room for us where there is at present no room and revive us that are dead.

22. All your enemies are capable of being opposed by you; if not, it is not proper that you should live on. You are now following a course of life which is fit only for eunuchs.

23. Cast off this wicked and despicable life which you are leading with a troubled soul and depressed heart. By slaying only one enemy does a hero gain renown.

24. Indra became the great Indra only by slaying Vritra and obtained the lordship over the gods and the celestial cup for drinking wine and became the lord of the worlds.

25. Making his name heard in the battle, and summoning the enemies clad in coats of mail to fight, killing the foremost of the hostile army or illustrious men,

26. When a hero obtains great renown in fair fight then do his enemies feel pain and bow down to him.

27. Men, who are cowards being beside themselves, contribute by giving their own wealth to the fulfilment of every desire of the hero experienced in battle and who does not fight for selfish consideration.

28. Even when the kingdom is in a terrible danger or the life even doubtful, the good men do not desist without making an end of his enemy who is within his grasp.

29. A kingdom is like the gate of heaven or like nectar itself and thinking that the heaven is shut against you and that you can get into it through one door, fall like a fire-brand among the enemies.

30. Defeat your enemies in battle; O king, and follow the duties of your own order, and do not in this way, look dejected, O you enhancer of the fears of your enemies.

31. Let me not in sorrow see you surrounded by our party grieving and the enemies rejoicing.

32. Rejoice in the company of the daughters of heroes and make yourself amiable by the possessions of wealth as in days gone by and do not let yourself be under the rule of the daughters of the Saindhavas.

33. A young man, endued with beauty, with learning and possessing powerful friends, should do only what is conducive to renown and heard and talked about in the world.

34. If in the matter of hearing burdens he acts like a vicious bull, I think this to be death itself. If I see you hereafter speaking well of the enemy,

35. Or wandering about behind him, what peace can my heart have. No one born in this race goes behind another for support.

36. O my dear son, it is not proper that you should live on being the subject of another. I know what the eternal essence of the heart of a Kshatriya is

37. As described by our forefathers and by men before them, as also by men after them and after them again; it is highly praise worthy since it has been ordained by the lord of creatures himself.

38. The Kshatriya, who is born in this world knowing the duties of a Kshatriya, does not bow down to any one from fear or from consideration of his livelihood.

39. He should stand erect and never bend down for energy is manliness. One may break down at his knots (weak points) but he should not bend down.

40. That great-minded man, the Kshatriya should move about like an infuriated elephant and he should ever bow down to Brahmanas for virtue, O Sanjaya.

41 Ruling over all the other orders and slaying all evil doers he should live through out his life, whether he be with support or without it.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty fourth chapter, in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd

The son said :—

1. Your heart is made of steel shaped into that form, O my mother, who have no pity or compassion in you, who are wrathful and who are of the wisdom of a soldier.

2. Fie on the custom of the Kshatriyas since you, being my own mother, urge me to go to battle as if I were a stranger and you the mother of another.

3. Such cruel words are spoken by you to your only son; if you cease to see me of what good is even the entire earth to you?

4. What is the use of ornaments? What of enjoyments and what even of life especially when you are deprived of the company of myself, your dear son.

The mother said :—

5. All the doings, of those who are wise, are for the attainment of either virtue or worldly profit or both; and with my eye to these two alone have I thus urged you, O Sanjaya.

6. This is the time now for showing your prowess; and this suitable time having now arrived, if you do not resort to the proper action,

7. You will be showing a degree of compassion inconsistent with your birth; and if I do not speak out of affection, O Sanjaya, to you who are already contaminated by infamy,

8. Then that affection would be called an ass' for her young one; it would besides be false and unreasonable; abandon the path trodden by the ignorant and held in contempt by the good.

9. Great is the ignorance in this world in which all living creatures have taken refuge; if your habits of life be praiseworthy, then will you win my esteem by that means,

10. Namely, if you are endued with the accomplishments of virtue and seek worldly profit, certainly not by any other means—but by following the path trodden by the gods and men and by the honest.

11. He who is pleased with such a son or a grandson not endued with humility, not given to exerting for himself, rebellious and bad-hearted ;

12. And he who is pleased with a son who does not do what ought to be done and does only such acts as are unrighteous, has the object of his begetting children rendered unsuccessful.

13. The wretch does not attain to happiness in this world nor in the other, O Sanjaya ; a Kshatriya has been created for fighting in this world and for gaining victories.

14. Whether he is victorious or is slain he attains to the world of Indra. And that happiness does not exist in heaven or in the sacred region of Indra ;

15. Namely the happiness to which a Kshatriya attains by bringing his friends under his influence (according to some readings it would be by subjugating his enemies). A spirited man, who has been defeated many times, should live on with the hope of vanquishing his enemy and consumed by wrath,

16. He should either abandon self or vanquish his enemy ; how can there be peace in any other way save this.

17. In this world a wise man regards little as undesirable ; the man to whom little is sufficient soon becomes weary of that little (and wishes for more).

18. A man does not attain to happiness who has not got what he desires ; and in fact he certainly feels his want as does the Ganga on losing herself in the ocean.

The son said :—

19. You should not speak in this strain, O mother, especially to your son ; exercise your compassion only in this case like a silent and dumb woman.

The mother said :—

20. It is indeed a matter of great pleasure to me that you understand what I say. You urge me in my duty and therefore should I urge you all the more in yours.

21. When you have slain all the Saindhavas and are thus victorious and beyond all your troubles, I shall honour you.

The son said :—

22. Having no wealth, having no friends, how can I gain success and victory. Knowing these circumstances I have thus dealt harshly with myself.

23. I am without exertion in recovering the kingdom as a sinful man makes no attempt to get into heaven. Such being the case, do you see any way to my fighting with the enemy.

24. Speak to me who are asking you in detail of that, O you of ripe and practical wisdom—I shall perform in a suitable manner all that you command me.

The mother said :—

25. O son, your mind should not be insulted by anticipations of failure. Objects unattained at first are gained subsequently and other objects attained at first are lost afterwards.

26. An object should not be pursued in wrath or with folly ; my dear son, there is always uncertainty in the results of all actions. To those who know that the result is uncertain objects are sometimes successful and sometimes not.

27. To those who do not make any attempt success does not come in the absence of exertion ; there is only result of actions.

28. To those who make attempts there are two results, namely success or failure. He, to whom is known from the very first the uncertainty of the result of all actions,

29. Fails to obtain success and prosperity ; O you who have been born of the soul of a ruler of men, in every act should one engage himself with energy and wakefulness

30. Resolving within himself—This must be—and ever without any depression of heart. One who placing auspicious signs before him and in company with the Brahmanas and the gods (engages in action),

31. To that wise king does prosperity soon come, my dear son. The goddess of prosperity and grace comes to him like the sun coming to the east.

32. I see, you have shown yourself fit to appreciate many examples, expedients and words given vent to excite your energy—now show your manliness.

33. It is proper that you should attain to your desired object which is indeed desired by every man. Those who entertain angry feelings against your enemy, those who covet his prosperity, those who have been weakened by him or have been eclipsed by him or insulted by him,

34. Those who look on him with contempt and all others against him, do you bring together, and with their help will you be able to break the thick ranks of your enemy,

35. Like a tempest of great force scattering the clouds. Make payments to them (your allies) before such payments are due, use your energy, and speak to them mildly.

36. Then will they do what is desirable to you and will surely stand before you (to take on themselves the charge of the battle).

37. As soon as the enemy knows that you have grown careless of life, he will begin to fear you as a snake entering his house.

38. Knowing him to be powerful if one (his enemy) does not subjugate him, he should at least conciliate him by friendliness and the like.

39. Attaining to prosperity by these friendly means, there occurs an increase in wealth. Friends seek the refuge of the wealthy and worship him.

40. And again friends abandon him who is deprived of his wealth and they even view with suspicion and contempt such a man.

41. He, who making an ally of his enemy, lives confidently, cannot be possibly expected to regain his kingdom.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty fifth chapter, in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXVI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

The mother said :—

1. By a king should fear never be entertained in whatever calamity he may fall; even if his heart should rend with fear he should not show that he had been struck with fear,

2. Seeing a king struck with fear, all are struck with fear—the entire kingdom, the army, the ministers and the earth are divided into factions.

3. One party takes the side of the enemy, another abandons the king, a third again rejoices namely those who have been treated insultingly.

4. He, who is a sincere well wisher, alone remains attached to his side like a cow which wishes to free her calf which has been tied up, but is unable to do it.

5. They grieve for their lord who is grieving as they would grieve for friends plunged into distress. You have got many friends as true as you could wish whom you had done honours before,

6. Who feel for your lost kingdom and who desire to have on themselves a portion of your troubles. Do not give way to fear; let not your friends abandon you, as they will do if you are struck with fear.

7. Desiring to know your might, manliness and intelligence, has all this been said by me as also for supporting your failing courage, sustaining your hope and for enhancing your energy.

8. If you are confident that I have spoken the truth, then rise up, O Sanjaya, tranquilizing your mind with a view to gain victory.

9. We have got a large treasury unknown to you. I know that and no body else and I shall place it at your command.

10. You have got many sincere well-wishers, O Sanjaya, who are heroes, competent equally to endure happiness and misery and who would not turn back from the field.

11. Such are the fitting allies of a man seeking his welfare and desirous of attaining what he wants and are also good councillors, O chastiser of your foes.

Kunti said :—

12. Hearing this her speech pregnant with sense and consisting of weighty letters and words, the despair that had overtaken him, feeble-minded as he was, immediately vanished.

The son said :—

13. I shall rescue my kingdom that is sunk in water or die in the attempt—I, who have for my guide yourself who have a great knowledge of the future.

14. I remained silent while hearing your words with the desire of hearing more from you and only spoke a few words by way of reply.

15. Like one unsatiated with nectar I am not satiated with hearing your words. Having gained friends in my distress behold I rise up for subjugating my enemies and gaining victories over them.

Kunti said :—

16. Like a horse of good breed he became excited, being struck with these arrows in the shape of words and performed all that his mother had instructed him to do.

17. A minister should make a king, who is depressed with despair being troubled by his enemies, hear of this story than which nothing is better in increasing energy and infusing fierce might.

18. This story which is called Jaya (victory) should be heard by one who is desirous of victory; and hearing it one conquers the world speedily and vanquishes his enemies.

19. This story makes a woman bring forth a son and a heroic, son; a pregnant woman hearing it repeated many times certainly brings forth a hero,

20. Who is a hero in knowledge, a hero in devotion, a hero in liberality, a performer of austerities blazing with Brahmic prosperity and honoured in speeches of the honest,

21. Endued with fame, endued with might, of great attributes, a great warrior, endued with wisdom, incapable of being vanquished, winner of victories, but himself sustaining no defeat;

22. Subjugator of the disreputable, a protector of those that practise virtues; such a son of true prowess does a Kshatriya lady bring forth.

Thus ends one hundred and thirty sixth chapter, the instructions of Vidula to her son, in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga-Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXVII,

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd

Kunti said:—

1. O Keshava, speak this to Arjuna "At the time of your birth when I was seated in the lying-in-room in the asylum surrounded by females,

2. There was heard a voice in the sky which seemed to be celestial and which pleased the heart; it said: O Kunti, this son of yours will be equal to him of a thousand eyes.

3. He will conquer in fight all the Kurus assembled together and with Bhimasena as his second will grind his enemies.

4. Your son will be the subjugator of the world and his fame will touch the heavens; having slain the Kurus in battle with the assistance of Vasudeva,

5. He will regain the paternal share of the kingdom which shall have been lost; and along with his brothers this one endued with prosperity will perform three sacrificial ceremonies.

6. You know how devoted to truth is Vibhatsu, how mighty is Savyasachin of unimpairing glory and how hard it is to resist him.

7. Let it therefore be, O scion of the Dasarha race, as that voice said; if there is virtue then, O scion of the Vrishhi race, will it be true.

8. You too, O Krishna, will do all that has been said by that voice, I do not doubt the truth of what the voice has said.

9. I bow down to the great Dharma for it is Dharma that sustains the living creatures. Speak this to Dhananjaya; and Vrikodara who is ever ready for action should also thus be spoken to:—

10. The object for which a Kshatriya lady brings forth a child is come; best of men do not grieve when they meet with an enemy.

11. It is known to you what the bent of Bhima's mind is; he is not to be calmed down till he has not made an end of his enemies, O you chastiser of foes.

12. O Madhava, O Krishna, tell that blessed lady of renown—the daughter-in-law of the great souled Pandu, who is especially conversant with all virtues.

13. O you endued with great qualities, O you born in a high family, O you of renown, the conduct you adopt towards my sons is befitting for and worthy of yourself.

14. The two sons of Madri, both of whom observe the duties of a Kshatriya, should also be thus spoken to:—Enjoyment earned by the exercise of prowess should be preferred to life itself.

15. Objects gained by the exercise of prowess always please the heart of a man following the duties of a Kshatriya.

16. Engaged in your own duties before your very presence the princess of Panchala following every virtue was spoken to harshly—it is not proper for you to forgive that insult.

17. The loss of the kingdom was not so painful to me on the defeat at dice nor even the exile of my sons was so painful to me,

18. As the weeping of the noble lady Krishna in the assembly at that time who was made to hear very harsh words; this was the source of a pain greater to me than all this.

19. Krishna, of beautiful hips, endued with all the virtues of a female, who ever followed the virtues of a Kshatriya lady, got at the time no protection of her lords though she had so many protectors.

20. O you of long arms,—speak to him who is the foremost of all wielders of arms,—to Arjuna, that best among men :—"Follow the path indicated by Draupadi."

21. It is known to you that the two, Bhima and Arjuna when excited with wrath would even lead the very gods to obtain eternal salvation.

22. The insult that was offered to Krishna, when she was made to enter the council hall and the harsh and frightful words that Dusasana addressed to her, were also insulting to them,

23. Offered within the range of the sight of the heroes among the Kurus. Remember that and ask about the health of the Pandavas and of Krishna with her sons.

24. And tell them, Janardana, that I am very well indeed. Go on your auspicious errand and protect my sons.

Vaishampayana said :—

25. Krishna, with long arms, then having saluted her and having gone round her, departed from there with the gait of a sportive lion.

26. Then he sent away those best among the Kuru race Bhishma and others and getting up on the chariot he departed with Satyaki.

27. The scion of the Dasarha race having departed, the Kurus assembled together and conversed on the greatly wonderful thing which had happened in connection with Krishna.

28. The entire earth, having been deprived of senses, has been brought under the influence of death. In consequence of folly this has already ceased to exist—so did they say.

29. Having gone out of the town that best among men departed and began to consult Karna for some time.

30. And having dismissed the son of Radha, that delighter of all the Yadavas soon urged his horses to great speed.

31. The horses being urged by Daruka went along with the speed of a wink, drinking as it were the sky.

32. Having traversed a long way speedily like quick-coursing hawks the horses reached Upaplavya, bearing the wielders of the Sranga bow.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-seventh chapter the speech of Kunti in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXVIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA) Cont.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Hearing the words of Kunti the great car-warriors Bhishma and Drona, said these words to Duryodhana who had grown unaccustomed to obey their orders.

2. It has been heard by you, O foremost of men, what inciting words Kunti has said to Krishna, than which nothing is more excellent and which lead to virtue.

3. The sons of Kunti will do that with the approval of Vasudeva and they will not be pacified without the kingdom, O son of Kuru.

4. The sons of Pritha had been persecuted by you in the Assembly-hall, but being bound by the ties of virtue they overlooked all that at the time.

5. Having however now obtained the master of all weapons, Arjuna, and Bhima of fast determination and the Gandiva bow and the two quivers and the chariot and flag

6. And Nakula and Sahadeva, both endued with might and energy and Vasudeva as his allies, Yudhishthira will not forgive anything.

7. You are an witness, O you of long arms, how before this in the city of Virata, all of us were vanquished in battle by the wise son of Pritha.

8. Those Danavas of fierce deeds called Nivatakavachas were consumed by him, who has the emblem of monkeys on his banner, in battle with a number of fierce weapons.

9. Karna and all of your councillors and yourself clad in coats of mail and seated on a chariot were liberated (from the grasp of the Gandharvas) on your expedition against cattle which is a sufficient proof. O foremost among the Bharatas, make peace along with your brothers with the sons of Pandu.

10. Save this entire earth which has come under the very jaws of death. Your elder brother is of virtuous habits of life, affectionate, sweet of speech and wise.

11. Seek you therefore the protection of that foremost of men abandoning these sinful intentions. If by the son of Pandu, you are seen to have laid aside your bow,

12. And with the wrinkles of rage smoothed down, and looking happy as if endued with prosperity then will the peace of our race have been effected. Having gone to him with your ministers and embracing that son of a ruler of men, 13—14. Salute that king as you used to do before, O chastiser of foes ; and let the elder brother of Bhima, Yudhisthira, the son of Kunti hold you when saluting, by his two hands out of affection.

14—15. Let also that one, possessed of the shoulders of a lion and round thighs and arms and of long arms, namely Bhima, the foremost among smiters, with his arms embrace you.

15—16. Let also the son of Kunti, Partha or Dhananjaya of eyes like the leaves of the lotus, with a neck like the conch and of curling hairs, also respectfully salute you.

17. Let the two sons of Ashwini also those foremost among men, who are of unrivalled beauty in this world—let them also offer you worship out of love, as to their elder brother.

18. Let also these rulers among men with the scion of the Dasharha race shed tears of joy (at the union); having abandoned your vanity, O ruler of the earth, be united with your brothers.

19. Rule this earth united together with your brothers and let the rulers of men return to their kingdoms after embracing one another (in a friendly way)

20. War is not necessary, O chief among kings ; listen to the dissuasions of your well wishers ; sure destruction stares the Kshatriyas in the face in case of fight.

21. The stars and planets are against us ; animals and birds of ill omen as also many sorts of disturbances portending the massacre of the Kshatriyas are seen.

22. Especially are these omens seen in our encampment. Burning meteors again are coming in the way of your army.

23. Our soldiers are cheerless and weeping as it were, O lord of the universe and vultures are constantly wheeling around our army.

24. The town has lost its old appearance as also the palace of the king ; jackals too with constant howls are prowling about in every direction which is blazing.

25. Listen therefore to the advice of your father and of your mother as also of ourselves for we desire your well being. At your discretion, O you of long arms, lies peace or war.

26. If you do not follow the advice of your well wishers you will come to grief having seen your army afflicted by the arrows of the son of Pritha,

27. As also by the loud and frequent roars of Bhima in battle.

28. Hearing also the twang of the Gandiva bow you will remember our words and if all this is not followed by you, what we say will come to pass.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-eighth chapter, the speech of Bhishma, in the Bhagavat Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXXIX.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Duryodhana, being thus addressed, seemed absorbed in thoughts, with his face hanging down and casting oblique glances ; he began to contract the space between the two eye-brows and said not a word.

2. Seeing him absent-minded those two best among men glancing at each other again said the following words.

Bhishma said :—

3 That we shall have to fight against the son of Pritha who is devoted to the service of his elders, without jealousy, conversant with Brahma and a speaker of truth—what can be more painful than this.

Drona said :—

4. My affection for Dhananjaya is greater than what I bear to my son Ashwathama ; and the one, having the figure of a monkey on his banner, too has great respect and deference for me, O king.

5. With him who is dear to me than my son namely Dhananjaya, shall I have to fight in observing the duties of a Kshatriya. Fie on the profession of a Kshatriya.

6. He who is equalled by no Bowman in this earth—it is through my grace and favour, is superior to other wielders of the bow.

7. One who injures the interests of friends, who is of a wicked habit, an atheist, crooked and a deceitful man, does not get worship among the honest as an ignorant man coming to a sacrificial ceremony.

8. A wicked-souled man inclines to wicked deeds though dissuaded from them and a virtuous-souled man, though urged to vice, desires to do good deeds.

9. These sons of Pandu, though treacherously dealt with by you, now desire only what is good for you who cherish wicked intentions, O you best among the Bharatas, for your own injury.

10. You have been spoken to by the oldest among the Kurus, and by myself and by Vidura as also by Vasudeva but you do not accept what is beneficial to you.

11. "I have got an army" with this thought you desire to overcome the Pandavas as the current of the Ganga flows into the ocean, full of sharks, alligators and crocodiles during the rainy season.

12. Putting on as it were cast off clothes you have taken on yourself the cast off prosperity of Yudhisthira and think it to be your own. The son of Pritha in company with Draupadi and surrounded by his brothers,

13. Though he is staying in the forest who is there enjoying a kingdom though that can vanquish? Under whose command there are all the Yaksha kings as if his servants or slaves,

14. That virtuous king shone resplendent even when in the abode of that Ailavila; going to the abode of Kuvera he obtained gems and wealth therefrom.

15. The Pandavas are prepared to attack your prosperous territories wishing the kingdom for themselves. Gifts have been made, the holy books studied, and Brahmanas gratified with wealth by us two.

16. The length our life too has fairly run out; know also that our work is done. But yourself abandoning happiness, kingdom, friends and wealth,

17. And fighting with the sons of Pandu will fall into a great trouble. Whose victory is prayed for by that speaker of truth Draupadi,

18. That lady devoted to austere asceticism—how can you defeat that son of Pandu.

19. Him whose adviser is Janardana, whose brother is Dhananjaya, the foremost among all wielders of weapon—how will you defeat that son of Pandu.

20. Him on whose side Brahmanas, endued with wisdom and who have controlled their senses, have declared themselves, how can you defeat that son of Pandu, that hero of rigid austerities.

21. I tell you again, according to the policy that ought to be adopted by a well-wisher who wishes the prosperity of a friend sunk into an ocean of distress,

22. That there is no necessity to fight with these heroes; make peace for the sake of prosperity of the Kurus; do not invite along with your sons and ministers and your army, defeat.

Thus ends the one hundred and thirty-ninth chapter in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXL.

BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Dhritarashtra said:—

1. Surrounded by princes and by dependants, O Sanjaya, did Madhusudana (Krishna) go away making Karna ascend his chariot.

2. What did that one of immensurable soul, that slayer of heroes on the enemy's side, say to the son of Radha? What comforting words did Govinda say to the son of Suta?

3. Speaking with the roar of cloud during the rains, what Krishna told Karna, in words sharp or mild, tell me, O Sanjaya.

Sanjaya said:—

4. In due order those words which were sharp and mild, sweet, leading to virtue, truthful and conducive to benefit,

5. And acceptable to the heart, which the slayer of Madhu, that one of immeasurable soul said to the son of Radha—hear from me, O Bharata.

Vasudeva said:—

6. Many Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas have been worshipped by you, O son of Radha and they have also been asked about truth by you with your mind attentive and free from jealousy.

7. You, O Karna, know the eternal instruction of the Vedas, and you are fully conversant with all the subtleties of the books.

8. The two classes of sons called Karna and Sahodha, which are begotten on a girl (before her marriage) have for their father, the man married by their mother—so it is said by people conversant with holy books.

9. You, O Karna, are born in that way and you are therefore morally the son of Pandu; and according to the rulings of the holy books, come and be a king.

10. On your father's side are the sons of Pritha and on your mother's side are the Yrishnis; and know that these two races to belong to your own side, O best among men.

11. Let the sons of Pandu, my dear friend, know you, accompanying me from here, to be the son of Kunti born before Yudhishthira,

12. The king and princes, assembled on the side of the Pandavas, will accept your feet as also all the Andhakas and the Vrishnis.

13. The five Pandava brothers will accept your feet, as also the five sons of Draupadi as also the son of Subhadra who has never sustained a defeat.

14. Golden water pots as also silver and earthen ones (filled with water) and medicinal herbs and all sorts of seeds and jems,

15. Let the wives of kings and daughters of kings bring for your annointment (in the kingship). During the sixth period Draupadi too will come to you as to a husband.

16. Let that best among the twice born, Dhaumya who has controlled his soul, pour libations on the fire and let also the twice born conversant with all the four Vedas annoint you today.

17. Let the family priest of the Pandavas ever engaged in the performance of Brahmic rites as also the brothers, the five sons of Pandu, these foremost among men,

18. As also the five sons of Draupadi and the princes of Panchala and Chedi and myself also annoint you as king in the lordship of the universe.

19. Let also king Yudhishthira, the son of Dharma be your heir-apparent; having taken the white chamara let that virtuous souled one, of restrained senses,

20. Yudhishthira, the son of Kunti, drive in the chariot behind you. Let also the son of Kunti, Bhimasena of great strength,

21. Hold over your head the big white umbrella; and your chariot so ringing with a hundred tinkling bells and covered with tiger skins,

22. Having been yoked with white horses will be driven by Arjuna; Abhimanyu too ever remain near you.

Nakula and Sahadeva, and the five of Draupadi, the princes of Panchala, the great car-warrior Shikhandin will follow you.

I too shall follow you as also all the Andhakas and the Vrishnis and the members of the Dasarha race as also of the Draupadi race will be among the members of your family, O lord of the universe.

Enjoy the kingdom, O you of long life, in company with your brothers, the five sons of Pandu ever practising devotion and dharma and the several sorts of auspicious ceremonies.

26. Let also the people of Dravida and Kuntala and the Andharas and Talcharas, Chuchupas and Venupas precede you.

27. Let professional bards and singers also sing your praise in various songs and let the Pandavas proclaim the victory of the Vasusenans.

28. Surrounded by the sons of Pritha as the moon is by the stars, rule over this kingdom, O son of Kunti and delight the heart of Kunti.

29. Let your friends rejoice and in the same way let your enemies feel pained; let there be today brotherly feelings with your brothers, the sons of Pandu.

Thus ends the one hundred and fortieth chapter, the speech of Krishna in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXLI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd

Karna said :—

1. Undoubtedly, O Keshava, you have spoken those words out of good will, love and friendship, O best of the Vrishni race as also from the desire of my benefit.

2. I too know all this, namely that morally speaking I am the son of Pandu owing to the rulings laid down in the holy books, as you say and think, O Krishna.

3. Before her wedding (with Pandu) did she (Kunti) bear me in her womb owing to her intercourse with the sun and at his command again she abandoned me as soon as I was born.

4. O Krishna, in this way was I born and I am therefore morally the son of Pandu. I was however left destitute by Kunti who thought not of my welfare.

5. As soon as Adhiratha saw me who was just born, he took me to his house and out of affection for me presented me to Radha, O slayer of Madhu.

6. Out of affection for me, Radha too got milk in her bosom and she held my urine and excreta, O Madhava.

7. How can one, like myself ever engaged in hearing the injunctions of the holy books and conversant with virtue, neglect her Pinda (offerings for the soul of the departed).

8. Therefore does Adhiratha the Suta look upon me as his son and I too, out of love, ever consider him to be my father.

9. He had the necessary ceremonies, during childhood, enjoined by the holy books, performed, O Madhava, in a suitable manner out of paternal love, O Janarddana.

10. He had me named as Vasusena by the twice born ; on attaining my youth too did I marry wives according to his choice.

11. On them have been begotten sons and grandsons by me, O Janardana, and on them has the affection of my heart been fastened, O Krishna.

12. Not for the sake of this entire earth nor for heaps of gold, nor for pleasure, nor owing to fear can I venture to break off those ties.

13. In the family of Dhritarashtra, O Krishna, owing to my being under the protection of Duryodhana, has sovereignty been enjoyed by me for thirteen years without any thorn.

14. Many sacrifices have been performed by me in company with Sutas and all my connections and marriage, have been formed with the Suts.

15. Getting me on his side too, O Krishna, has the preparation of the weapons been made by Duryodhana and O you scion of the Vrishni race, also of the war with the Pandavas.

16. Therefore have I, O Achyuta, in a single fight between two car warriors in the ensuing battle, been selected as the best opponent and match of Savyasachi.

17. From a fear of being slain, from a fear of being captured or from covetousness even, O Janardana, I do not dare behave treacherously to the intelligent son of Dhritarashtra.

18. If I do not fight with Savyasachi now in a single fight, then will infamy be mine, O Hrishiksha, and of the son of Pritha, in fact of both.

19. Doubtless, O you slayer of Madhu, you are speaking for my own good and the Pandavas too will obey all your instructions ; there is no doubt about it.

20. But you should not give out this conversation between ourselves, O slayer of Madhu, for I think that this alone leads to good in this instance, O delighter of all Yadavas.

21. If that king, virtuous-souled and controller of his senses as he is, knows me to be the eldest son of Kunti, then he will not accept the kingdom.

22. And even if I get this large and prosperous kingdom, I shall offer it to Duryodhana alone, O slayer of Madhu, O chastiser of foes.

23. May the virtuous-souled king Yudhishthira, whose guide is Hrishiksha and who has Dhananjaya for his warrior, live for ever.

24. Let the earth and kingdom be his who has on his side the great car-warrior Bhima, and Nakula and Sahadeva, and the five sons of Draupadi, O Madhava,

25. And Dhristadyumna, and the princes of Panchala and the great car-warriors Satyaki, Uttamanjus, Yudhumanyu and the virtuous prince of Somakas,

26. And the princes of the Chedis and Chekitana and Shikhandi who has never sustained a defeat and the princes of Kekaya, brothers to one another, of the colour of Indragopa insects ;

27. And the great minded Kuntibhoja, the maternal uncle of Bhimasena, possessed of horses of the colours of the rainbow and the great car-warrior Shyenasit, Shukha the king of Virata and yourself like an ocean of resources, O Janardana.

28. O Krishna, this assembly of Kshatriyas is great indeed ; this blazing kingdom known among all kings is already won (by Yudhishthira).

29. O you scion of the Vrishni race, there will be a sacrificial ceremony of weapons performed by the son of Dhritarashtra and in that sacrifice (the supervisor of the ceremonies) will be yourself, O Janardana.

30. O Krishna, when the sacrifice is performed, you will also be the Adhwaryu ; and in this Vibhatsu, that hero who has the figure of a monkey on his banner, clad in a coat of mail will be the Hotri (the guide in giving offerings).

31. The Gandiva bow will be the sacrificial ladle and the might of men will constitute the clarified butter to be poured as libation on the fire. The weapons Aindra, Pashupata, Brahma, and Sthunakarna, O Madhava, used by Savyasachi will be the incantations (Mantras) in the sacrifice.

32. Equal to his father or even superior to him in prowess the son of Subhadra will be the Vedic hymn recited there.

33. The repeater (Udgatri) of those incantations again will be Bhima, who will also be the Prastori (the preparer), that foremost of men, that destroyer of the elephants in the army, making loud roars in battle.

34. And the virtuous souled king Yudhishthira, engaged in making Yapa and Homa, will perform the office of a Brahmana in the sacrificial rite.

35. The sounds of conch shells, of tabors and drums and the roars of lions will announce the hour of dinner in that sacrifice.

36. Nakula and Sahadeva, the two sons of Madri endued with fame—these two heroes of great strength will be duly the sacrificers of animals in that sacrifice.

37. Furnished with flagstaves of various colours, spotless rows of carriage, O Govinda, will be the Yupas (staff for fastening sacrificial animals) in this sacrifice, at the end of the principal ceremony, O Janardana.

38. Karnir (arrows with barbs) Nalikas (a rude sort of muskets) Narachas (daggers fastened to sticks) and arrows like the teeth of calves and Tamaras will be the spoons and vessels for the Soma juice; while bows will be substitutes for Pavitrus (Kusha leaves for sprinkling clarified butter).

39. The swords will be substitutes for the Kapalas and the heads of soldiers killed in the field will be those for Purodashas; the bloods of warrior will be the clarified butter, O Krishna in that sacrificial ceremony.

40. The lances will be the substitutes for Paridhas (vessels for depositing the offerings) and the maces will be those for Saktis (the-wood work for protecting the offerings), the part of assisting priests will be performed by the disciples of Drona and Kripa and Saradwata.

41. The arrows, let loose by the wielder of the Gandiva bow and shot also by car-warriors urged by Drona and his son will act for ladders in their sacrifice.

42. Satyaki will do the duties of the chief assistant to the head priest; the son of Dhritarastra will be the performer and his large army will take the place of his wife.

43. Ghatatkacha, of great strength, will be the slayer of the sacrificial animals at the commencement of this sacrificial rite at an advanced hour of the night, O you of long arms.

44. The Dakshina (final gifts to the priest) of that sacrifice will be Dhristadyumna of great energy, for, O Krishna, he was born out of fire in a sacrifice having for its mouth the rites celebrated with Mantras.

45. What harsh words, I said to the sons of Pandu, O Krishna, were for the gratification of the son of Dhritarastra and I am now struck with remorse for that misdeed.

46. When you will see me, O Krishna, slain by Savyasachi, then will the Purnaschiti (the second part of the ceremonies) commence, O Janardana.

47. When the sons of Pandu will drink the blood of Dussashana repeatedly making loud roars, then will the drinking of the Soma juice of the sacrifice have been finished.

48. When Drona and Bhishma will be overthrown by the two princes of Panchala, then will the ceremonies connected with the sacrifice of the son of Dhritarastra be brought to an end, O Janardana.

49. When Bhimasena of great strength will be the slayer of Duryodhana then will the ceremonies be finished.

50. When the daughter-in-law and the grand daughter-in-law (wives of grandsons) of Dhritarashtra will assemble together being deprived of their protectors, their sons and their husbands, O Keshava,

51. Weeping loudly with Gandhari in the field of battle frequented by dogs and vultures and other carnivorous animals then will the final bath in connection with the sacrifice have taken place, O Janardana.

52. Do not let those best of the Kshatriyas, who are old in learning and old in age meet with an useless death on account of your doings, O slayer of Madhu.

53. The entire race of Kshatriyas will meet with death by weapons in Kuruskhetra, the holiest spot in all the three worlds, O Keshava

54. O you of lotus-eyes, manage things in such a way in this case that we may gain our end—that united together the Kshatriyas go to heaven, O you of the Vrishni race.

55. So long as mountains and lakes will exist, O Janardana, so long will the fame of this event last—that is for ever.

56. The Brahmanas will tell the world of the great battle of Mahabharata. The wealth of Kshatriyas, O you of the Vrishni race, is what they win in the field of battle.

57. Bring here the son of Kunti for me to fight, O Keshava, for ever keeping this conversation secret, O chastiser of foes.

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-first chapter the words of Karna in the Bhagvat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXLII.

(BHVGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Sanjaya said—

1. Keshava, that slayer of heroes of the enemies, hearing the words of Karna said these words laughingly.

2. "Desire you not then to gain this kingdom by the means I have indicated, O Karna? Desire you not to rule this earth given by me to you.

had nothing better than it, were seen by me with a white umbrella over their heads and with white robes on.

41. These three were seen also with white head gears among the army of the son of Dhritarashtra; know their names, O Keshava.

42. They were Ashwathama, Kripa and Kritavarman of the Sattwata race; all other kings of the earth were seen with blood coloured head dresses, O Madhava.

43. Ascending camels the ten great car-warriors, Bhishma and Drona along with myself, O you of long arms, and also with the son of Dhritarashtra, O lord,

44. Were going towards the direction ruled by Agastya, O Janardana, and in a short time we reached the abode of Yama.

45. Myself and all those other kings making this assembly of Kshatriyas shall enter the Gandiva fire—in this I have no doubt.

Krishna said:—

46. This world will truly come to an end, since my words, O Karna, do not seem acceptable to you.

47. When the destruction of all creatures, my dear friend, is at hand, that which is wrong is not removed from the heart, having the appearance of right.

Karna said:—

48. If I am alive, O Krishna, I shall see you after this great battle, destructive of Kshatriya heroes, which is come on us, O you of long arms.

49. Else there will be a meeting between us surely in heaven. I now see that I shall meet you, there only, O sinless one.

Sanjaya said:—

50. Saying this Karna, having closely embraced Krishna, and been dismissed by Keshava, dismounted from the chariot.

51. Then having seated himself on his own car bedecked with gold he returned in company with his own followers, with a sad heart.

52. Then did Keshava along with Satyaki proceed with greater speed saying again and again to his driver 'go-go.'

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-third chapter in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXLIV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued.)

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The object of Krishna having proved unsuccessful and he having left the Kurus, the Kshatri having approached Pritha said to her slowly and sadly,

2. "O you whose children are alive, you know that I am ever inclined to the reverse of war but though I am crying myself hoarse, Suyodhana does not act up to my words.

3. The king (Yudhisthira) has on his side the kings of the Chedis, the Panchalas, and the Kekayas and Bhima and Arjuna and Krishna and Yuyudhana and the twins.

4. Yudhisthira is staying at Upaplavya like Dharma himself and desires the good will of his kinsmen as the weak desire the good will of the strong.

5. This king Dhritarashtra too, old in years, does not make peace, and follows the wrong path being intoxicated with the pride of sons.

6. The dispute in this instance has its rise in the wicked intelligence of Jayadratha, Karna, and Dussashana, as also of the son of Suvala.

7. These, who act with unrighteousness towards him who is righteous, have the fruit of such act of theirs.

8. Who is there who would not grieve at the prostitution of virtue by the Kurus? When Keshava goes without having established peace the sons of Pandu will make preparation for war.

9. Thereupon the misdeeds of the Kurus will be the cause of a massacre of heroes; thinking of such things, I do not get sleep during day nor during night."

10. Kunti too, hearing these words of his, which were spoken with the desire of benefit, began to sigh, being struck with sorrow and became depressed in mind also.

11. "Fie on this interest" which is the cause of a great massacre of kinsmen—in this war those that are friends will meet with defeat.

12. The sons of Pandu, the Chedis, the Panchalas and the Yadavas, united together will fight with the Bharatas; what can be a greater cause of sorrow than this?

13. Behold, there is certainly demerit in war, as defeat in it; the death of a man who is without wealth is better for him but the loss of kinsmen is no victory.

14. Thinking this, sorrow comes to my heart; the grand-father, Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, the preceptor who is the foremost among soldiers,

15. And Karna also being united with the party of the son of Dhritarashtra it enhances my fear. The preceptor Drona will by no means fight willingly with his disciple.

16. Why should not also the grand-father show sympathy to the son of Pandu. This one man only therefore (namely Karna) follows the delusion of the wicked-souled son of Dhritarashtra of vain foresight.

17. The wretch also ever hates the sons of Pandu. He is obstinate in working for their injury, besides he is very powerful.

18. Karna is ever against the sons of Pandu, and this fact now is burning me up; and I to-day expect (by the course I take) to incline the heart of Karna towards the sons of Pandu.

19. For I shall today approach him with a view to please him and tell him everything as it actually happened. The divinely holy Durvasa, being gratified by me, granted me a boon,

20. Empowering me to invoke any body with the help of certain incantations (mantras) when I was residing in my father's place, namely in the inner apartments of the king Kuntibhoja.

21. With diverse thoughts and fearing in my heart and reflecting on the strength or weakness of the incantation as also of the efficacy of the Brahmana's boon,

22. And owing to my nature as a woman, especially owing to being a child I thought again and again, at the time being carefully guarded over by my nurse and surrounded by my companions,

23. How I could avoid all blame and save the reputation of my father and how I could myself be visited with good fortune without being a sinner in any way.

24. And thinking of that Brahmana and bowing to him in my mind out of curiosity and behaving as a child at the time I came in contact with the god Suryya though yet an unmarried girl.

25. Why should not he therefore, whom I bore in my womb when an unmarried girl, act according to my words leading to benefit and at the same time accomplish the good of his brothers?"

26. Kunti, thus thinking on an excellent course of action, went towards the Bhagirathi for the attainment of her objects,

27. Then on the banks of the Ganga did Pritha hear the sound of chanting the Vedas made by her son who had great kindness in him and who was attached to truth.

28. She waited behind Karna, who with arms upraised had his face turned to the east, till the end of the devotions of that devotee.

29. She the wife of the Kauravya and the daughter of the Vrishni race waited troubled by the rays of the sun behind the clothes of Karna, becoming pale like a garland of lotuses.

30. That one, who used to say his prayers regularly, having been engaged in devotion till his back became heated with the rays of the sun, then turned and seeing Kunti he did honour her by saluting her and folding his hands before her.

31. As was the custom that best among men, the son of Vikartana, endued with great energy and pride, that foremost of all virtuous persons, with surprise, said to Kunti.

Thus ends the one hundred and fortyi fourth chapter, the meeting between Kunt and Karna in the Bhagavat-Yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXLV.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Karna said :—

1. I am Karna, the son of Radha and the son of Adhiratha and I salute you. Why are you come here? Tell me what I shall do for you.

Kunti said :—

2. You are the son of Kunti and not the son of Radha; nor is Adhiratha your father; you are not born in the race of Suta; know this word of mine to be true.

3. You were begotten on me when I was an unmarried girl and you were the first held in my womb; you were born in the palace of Kuntiraja, my dear son.

4. The god Tapanā or Virochana (Suryya) whose duty it is to make everything visible, begot you on me, O Karna, O you foremost of wielders of weapons.

5. O my son, you, who are hard to conquer, were brought forth in my father's place by me, and you then wore earrings, and were clad in coats of mail, like a divine being endued with great beauty.

6. You, who are such, are now, without recognising your brothers owing to ignorance (of the true story), serving the sons of Dhritarashtra; it is not proper and especially for you, my son.

7. It is certainly the duty of men inclined to virtue, my son, to gratify one's father and mother who alone can view things in their proper light.

8. Snatching from the son of Dhritarashtra, the royal dignity of Yudhishthira, which was originally earned by Arjuna but has now been usurped from them by dishonest persons out of avarice, you enjoy it yourself.

9. Let the Kurus see today the union between Karna and Arjuna and seeing the establishment of brotherly feelings between them let dishonest men bow down.

10. Karna and Arjuna being united like Rama and Janardana what is there which can not be performed by you in the world?

11. O Karna, you will surely shine surrounded by your five brothers like Brhma surrounded by the gods seated on the dais on the occasion of a great sacrificial ceremony.

12. Endued with all accomplishments you are the eldest among all my best relatives; do not use again the term "the son of a Suta" for you are the son of Pritha, endued with prowess.

Thus ends the one hundred and forty fifth Chapter, the meeting between Kunti and Karna in the Bhagvatyana of the Udyaga Parva.

CHAPTER CXLVI.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then did Karna hear an affectionate voice issue from the solar disc from afar, spoken with the affection of a father by Surya himself.

2. O Karna, Pritha has spoken the truth; act according to the advice of your mother; then will you get benefit, O best among men, namely by acting in that way in every detail.

Vaishampayana said:—

3. Being thus spoken to by his mother, and by his father Bhanu himself, the resolve, formed by Karna who was ever devoted to truth, did not undergo any change.

Karna said:—

4. O Kshatriya lady, I do not respect the words spoken by you, namely the way to virtue lies in my case to do what you urge me to do.

5. The behaviour that you adopted towards me was a greatly sinful one, and (owing to that) I have sustained what is tantamount to the destruction of fame and renown.

6. Myself being born of a Kshatriya I did not obtain rites of a Kshatriya (for my birth); it was all on account of your doings; what enemy can possibly do me a greater injury?

7. Without showing any mercy to me when it ought to have been shown, you now come to me, deprived of my due rites, when an opportunity arises for you, to urge me.

8. My good was never sought for by you as a mother and you now come to address me desiring the good of yourself,

9. Who am not afraid of Dhananjaya united with Krishna; and who would not consider me to be struck with fear if I go over to the side of the sons of the Pritha.

10. Unknown as a brother before, and known to be so on the eve of battle, if I go over to the side of the sons of Pandu who will call me a Kshatriya?

11. All my desires were granted and worshipped by them; I was happy and comfortable; how can I make that worship of the sons of Dhritarashtra vain?

12. They, who having declared hostilities with others, ever seek to please me and ever bow down before me as the Vasus bow down to Vasava,

13. They, think that with my help they can withstand their enemies—how can I act against their cherished desire.

14. Making me as their boat, they desire to cross the sea of war, which is broad and expansive; how can I abandon them that are desirous of crossing that which can not be crossed.

15. This is the time come for those who have earned their living from the son of Dhritarashtra, (to show their fidelity) and I should engage in that even at the risk of my life.

16. Those wretches who, well cared for and well-supported, at the approach of the time when something should be done in return for these acts of kindness, act in an ungraceful manner,

17. Untrue to the bread of their lord, as they are, these faithless sarvants of their kings have neither this world nor the next for their good.

18. On the side of the sons of Dhritarashtra, shall I fight with your sons with all my might and prowess; I do not speak untruly to you.

19. At the same time however showing due kindness and observing proper duties which ought to be observed by good men, I shall not act up to your words now as they are beneficial.

20. But at the same time this appeal to me by you shall not be entirely useless. I shall not kill such of your sons as are capable of being withstood and killed by me, in the battle.

21. There are Yudhishthira, Bhima, and the twins, in fact every one save Arjuna; Arjuna alone in the army of Yudhishthira is worthy to fight with me.

22. Having killed Arjuna I shall achieve a reputation for great prowess; or being myself killed by Savyasachin I shall be endued with renown.

23. O lady of renown, your five sons will not decrease; either you will be with Karna and not Arjuna or if I am slain, you will be with Arjuna (and without Karna)."

24. Hearing these words of Karna Kunti trembled with sorrow and said to his son after embracing him who being possessed of fortitude trembled not.

25. "What you say may happen; the Kurus will meet with destruction, O Karna, destiny is the most powerful.

26. By you has the pledge of safety been given to four of your brothers, O grinder of foes; remember the boon therefore which you have granted when weapons are being shot in the battle."

27. Pritha at last said to Karna: "May you be blessed and may all be well with you" and Karna too saying the same thing to her, the two went in separate directions.

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-sixth chapter, the meeting between Karna and Kunti in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXLVII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The chastiser of foes having come to Upaplavya from Hastinapura, Keshava told all about what had happened to the sons of Pandu.

2. Consulting together for a long time and holding repeated conferences Shauri went to his own place for rest.

3. Then after sending all the rulers of men headed by king Virata, the five Pandava brothers, when the sun had set,

4. Having said their evening prayers began to think of him (Krishna) with their minds fixed on him, and getting Krishna of the Dasharha race, they again held a consultation.

Yudhishthira said:—

5. Having gone to Nagapura what did you, O you of lotus eyes, say to him who is born of Dhritarashtra in the council? It is proper that you should tell us that.

Vasudeva said:—

6. Going to Nagapura I said to him who is born of Dhritarashtra words which are true, opportune and conducive to his interests but he of wicked mind did not accept them.

Yudhishthira said:—

7. To the one who is following the wrong course, namely the wrathful Duryodhana what did the oldest among the Kurus, our grandfather, say, O Hrishikesha?

8. What did the preceptor, endued with noble attributes, the son of Bharadwaja, what did his father and mother—our Dhritarashtra and Gandhari say?

9. What did our uncle Kshatti, that foremost among those conversant with virtue, who is stricken with grief for his sons (at our exile) say to him who is born of Dhritarashtra?

10. What also did all those rulers of men who were seated in the council say? You tell us, O Janardana, exactly how they happened.

11. You have already told us all the words spoken by the principal members of the Kuru race in the assembly of the Kurus to the son of Dhritarashtra,

12. Who is overpowered by lust and avarice, who is a fool and who is vain of his wisdom; but as they are not fit, they do not yet retain a place in my mind.

13. Their words, O Govinda, do I desire to hear O lord, and act in such a way that time may not be lost, my dear friend; you are our refuge, O Krishna, you are lord, and you are our preceptor.

Vasudeva said :—

14. Hear, O king, the words that were said by me to the king Suyodhana in the midst of the kings in that council ; listen to them, O chief among kings.

15. The one born of Dhritarashtra however laughed at them ; and then Bhishma, being excited with wrath, said these words.

16. "O Duryodhana, listen to these words, which I say for the benefit of my race and hearing that, O best among kings, effect the benefit of your race.

17. My father, my dear son, was Shantanu, well known in this world, O king. I was his only son at first—of that best among those who had sons.

18. A desire rose in his mind :—"How shall I have a second son, for wise men speak of one son as no son at all.

19. Let my family be not extinct ; how can my fame spread ?" I coming to know of this desire of his got Kali as my step-mother.

20. My hard determination, for the sake of my father and for the sake of my race, of never being a king and of never throwing down vital fluid by the regular passage, is well known to you ; observing these vows I am now living in joy.

21. In her was born my younger brother endued with prosperity, of long arms and the supporter of the Kuru race, the virtuous-souled Vichitraviryya, O ruler of this earth.

22. My father having gone to heaven I placed that Vchitraviryya at the head of my own kingdom and myself became a subordinate to him.

23. I found out suitable wives for him, O chief among kings, after conquering an assemblage of the rulers of the earth ; you have heard of all that many times.

24. Then did I engage myself in a single combat with Rama and he fled away from the city from fear of Rama.

25. He was soon attacked with phtysis for being too much attached to his wives, and in that kingdom without a king the lord of the gods did not pour rain."

The subjects said :—

26. All the subjects are weakened, you be our king for our good and put an end to this draught and other calamities ; and it will be well with you, O son of Shantanu, O perpetuator of your race.

27. All your subjects are being very much troubled by severe diseases and O son of Ganga, it is proper that you should save the few that are alive.

28. Put an end to these calamities, O hero, and rule over your subjects with justice ; yourself being alive let not this kingdom meet with destruction.

Bhishma said :—

29. My heart remained unmoved at that grief of the subjects remembering that the observance of a vow is the duty of a good man. Then did my citizens, O great king, and my mother, the blessed Kali,

30. My servants, my priests, my preceptors and other Brahmanas well versed in holy books said to me, being struck with great sorrow :—"Yourself be the king.

31. The kingdom protected by Pratipa is being ruined, though it can claim you as its ruler ; therefore do you, for the good of ourselves, be the king, O you of great intelligence."

32. Being thus spoken to and having joined my hands and being very much struck with sorrow I represented to them the vow I was observing for the respect of my father.

33. Namely that I would not throw my seminal fluid through the regular passage and that I would not be a king for the sake of my race ; I said this again and again, and requested them not to yoke me to the kingdom especially for their good.

34. Then clasping my hands I gratified my mother by saying thus : "O mother, I shall not, being begotten by Shantanu and being a supporter of the Kuru family,

35. Be false to my determination ;" O king, I said this again and again and also said—"It was especially for your sake that I made that determination.

36. I am now your slave, waiting to be commanded by you, O you who are very affectionate to your children." Having thus respectfully addressed my mother and my subjects,

37. I begged the great Muni Vyasa, along with my mother, O great king, after having gratified that Rishi, with the wives of my brother,

38. To beget children, and O great king he too complied with our request and then did he beget children, O you best among the Bharatas.

39. Being blind and therefore deprived of the usual rites, your father could not be a king and the great-souled Pandu, well known in this world, became the king.

40. Himself being a king these sons of his must get a share of their paternal wealth ; do not, my dear son, quarrel over the matter but give to them half of the kingdom.

41. When I am alive what other man can rule over this kingdom ? Do not treat slightly my words for we ever wish peace.

42. There is no difference between my treatment to you and that to them, O ruler of the earth ; and the same is the opinion of your father, of Gandhari, as also of Vidura.

43. The words of the aged should be listened to ; and do not treat slightly these words of mine for otherwise will you destroy all that you have, as also this earth."

Thus ends the hundred and forty-seventh, chapter the speech of Krishna, in the Bhagavatyaana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXLVIII.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vasudeva said:—

1. Bhishma having spoken thus, Drona, who was competent to speak, spoke these words to Duryodhana in the midst of those rulers of men. May it be well with you.

Drona said:—

2. As Shantanu, the son of Pratipa, ever acted with the interests of his race at heart and as Bhishma, who had taken a divine vow, ever acted with the interests of his race at heart,

3. So did that ruler of men Pandu, attached to truth, who had his senses under control—that virtuous-souled king of the Kurus who ever made and observed good vows and was interested in everything good.

4. To his elder brother the wise Dhritarashtra, that perpetuator of the Kuru race gave the kingdom as also to his younger brother Vidura.

5. Then having established him (Dhritarashtra) who never strayed away from the right path on the throne, that ruler of men (Pandus) son of the Kuru race went to woods with his two wives.

6. Vidura then taking up an humble position in the kingdom humbly served the king like a slave fanning him with the branch of a young tree, O best among men.

7. Then did all the subjects, my dear son, duly acknowledg the sovereignty of their king in a suitable manner as they had done that of Pandu, the ruler of men.

8. Having made over the kingdom to Dhritarashtra and Vidura Pandu, that conqueror of the cities of his enemies, wandered over the earth.

9. The one, ever devoted to truth namely Vidura, took charge of treasury, gifts and presents and the supervision over the subordinates and the feeding of all.

10. Bhishma, of great energy, that conqueror of the cities of his enemies, looked over the making of war and peace with kings and of giving or withholding presents to them.

11. That ruler of men, Dhritarashtra of great strength, while on the throne, was ever followed by the great souled Vidura.

12. How do you, born in his family, dare bringing about a dissension between the members of the same family ? Having been united with your brothers, enjoy objects of enjoyment, O lord of men.

13. I do not say all this from weakness or cowardice or for the attainment of any particular selfish object of mine. I desire to earn my living from Bhishma and not from what you can give me, O best among kings.

14. I do not desire, O lord of men, to earn the means of living from you. Do that which Bhishma told you to do and Drona is ever on the side to which Bhishma inclines.

15. Give to the sons of Pandu half of the kingdom, O grinder of your enemies ; the office of a preceptor has been filled by me equally for both yourself and them, my dear son,

16. What Ashwathaman is to me, so is he with white horses (Arjuna) ; what is the necessity of talking much ; where there is virtue there is victory.

Vasudeva said:—

17. Words like these having been spoken by Drona of immeasurable energy, Vidura, ever devoted to truth, then said these words turning towards his father's uncle and looking at him.

Vidura said:—

18. O you of divine vows, listen to these words spoken by me ; this race of Kurus made extinct by you, had again been saved from extermination.

19. Therefore do you not treat slightly the words spoken by me who am lamenting.

Who is this one named Duryodhana in this race but a stain,

20. Whose inclination overpowered by avarice you follow? He leads a dishonest life, is ungrateful and deprived of his senses by avarice.

21. He does not obey the commands of his father who follows the path of virtue and worldly benefit. Duryodhana will bring on the destruction of the Kurus by his acts.

22. Do that, O great king, which will not bring on their extermination. Myself and Dhritarashtra, you before, O lord of the earth,

23. Brought into being as a painter does a picture. Do not act like the lord of creatures, who having created living beings again destroys them.

24. Do not look with indifference on this impending massacre of your race; ruin being now near at hand, your intellect is lost to you.

25. Go to the woods in company with myself and Dhritarashtra, or binding down the very wretched-intentioned son of Dhritarashtra, whose wisdom is lost,

26. Rule over this kingdom now, protected and supported by the sons of Pandu. O best among kings, rest satisfied that a great massacre is near at hand,

27. Of the sons of Pandu, the Kurus, and of kings of immeasurable energy." Saying this Vidura stopped with his heart sad. And thinking of the situation he began to sigh again and again.

28. Then did the daughter of king Suvala, afraid of the extinction of her race, said out of anger these words which were virtuous and conducive to the benefit of her inhuman and wicked-souled son Duryodhana in the midst of these kings.

19. "Let these rulers of the earth, who have entered this royal council as also these regenerate Rishis and all others in this council, hear what I am going to say about the sin committed by yourself, O wretch and your ministers and followers.

30. The kingdom is obtainable by us in a certain fixed order; this has been the custom with our race, but you, O you of sinful intellect and of very inhuman deeds, desire unjustly to ruin the kingdom of the Kurus.

31. The wise Dhritarashtra is now established on the throne and under him as a subordinate is Vidura of great foresight; superseding these two how can you, O Duryodhana, desire the kingdom out of folly?

32. The king himself and Vidura of great soul, are, so long as Bhishma is alive, but his subordinates; in fact owing to his being conversant with virtue, the one born of the river (Ganga), that foremost of kings does not desire the kingship.

33. This kingdom, incapable of being subjugated, belongs to Pandu and now his sons are lords over it and none (else). This entire kingdom, coming from their father, goes to the sons of Pandu, and to their sons and grandsons.

34. What, that foremost among the Kurus, that great-souled one of divine vows, ever attached to truth, endued with intelligence, says, should in its entirety, be done by us, for the sake of our kingdom, and the duties of our order.

35. Let this ruler of men as also Vidura by the command of the one of great vows speak the same thing; that is an act that should be done by our well wishers who should place virtue above all consideration.

36. Let the son of Dharma Yudhishthira rule over the kingdom of the Kurus, obtained justly, led by Dhritarashtra and placing the son of Shantanu at the helm of affairs"

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-eighth chapter, the speech of Krishna, in the Bhagavatiana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXLIX.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vasudeva said:—

1. Words like these having been spoken by Gandhari that lord of men, Dhritarashtra said these words to Duryodhana in the midst of the kings, O lord of men.

2. "O Duryodhana, listen to what I am going to say, my dear son, and act according to that if you entertain respect for your father. It will be well with you.

3. That lord of creatures, Soma was the first who begot the race of Kurus, and sixth in descent from Soma was Yayati the son of Nahusa.

4. He had five sons, the best among royal sages and of them Yadu of great energy was the first, and was the lord.

5. Younger than he was Puru and he was our ancestor; he was brought forth by Sharmistha, the daughter of Vaishamparvan.

6. Yadu, O foremost among the Bharatas, was the son of Devayani, and was therefore the grandson of Shukra, the wise Rishi of immeasurable energy.

7. The ancestor of the Yadavas, endued with strength and prowess as he was, being full of pride and vanity and wicked intelligence, insulted the Kshatriyas.

8. He did not act up to the instructions of his father being stupified by the pride of his strength ; and having never sustained a defeat he insulted his father and his brothers.

9. In the four quarters of the globe, Yadu was the strongest man and having brought all the rulers of men under subjection he lived in the city called after the elephant.

10. His father, Yayati, born of Nahusha being very much angry with him, cursed his son, O son of Gandhari and exiled him from the kingdom.

11. These brothers of his also who followed the lead of the elder brother vain of his strength, Yajati also cursed. Having cursed these sons of his that best among the rulers of men,

12. Then did place his second son Puru, who remained devoted to him, on the throne which indeed was suitable.

13. Thus can even the eldest son be superseded and deprived of the kingdom ; and even a younger son can get the kingdom for his attentions to the aged.

14. Thus also the grandfather of my father, conversant with all virtues, Pratipa the ruler of the universe and known in the three worlds,

15. That lion among the rulers of the earth while ruling his kingdom virtuously had born to him three sons of renown and having the attributes of the gods.

16. Of them Devapi was the foremost (eldest) and then came Valhika ; and the third Shantanu ; that wise man was my grandfather.

17. Depavi, that best among kings though endued with great energy, had a defect in his skin ; but he was a virtuous man, a speaker of truth and ever devoted to attending on his father.

18. Devapi was honoured by all the subjects and citizens and respected by the good and he was loved by all—the old and the young.

19. He was benevolent, attached to truth and devoted to the good of all creatures and ever obeyed the command of his father as also of the Brahmanas.

20. He was the dear brother of Vallika and also of the great souled Shantanu ; in fact among all those great-souled men excellent brotherly feelings existed.

21. In course of time, that old king, the best among rulers of men, had all arrangements made for the installation according to the holy books (of his son).

22. That lord had all auspicious arrangements made, but the Brahmanas and the old men amongst the citizens with the subjects of the province,

23. All dissuaded him from installing Devapi ; and that ruler of men, having heard of the exclusion of his elder son from the installation, had his voice choked with tears and became sorrowful for his son.

24. " Though he was benevolent, conversant with virtue, attached to truth, and loved by his subjects yet he had a defect in his skin.

25. The gods do not approve of that ruler of men who has a defect in his limbs." So saying those foremost among the twice born dissuaded that foremost among the rulers of men.

26. Devapi, too who was defective of one limb, seeing, that ruler of men with his heart pained and struck with grief for son, dissuaded from carrying out his intentions, went to the woods.

27. Valhika, too giving up his kingdom, established himself in the family of his maternal uncle, and abandoning his father and brother he obtained a very wealthy kingdom.

28. Being commanded by Valhika, Shantanu, well known in this world, on the retirement of his father, became, O king, the king in that kingdom.

29. In the same way, myself though the eldest, was excluded from the kingdom owing to the defect in my limbs, O Bharata, in favour of Pandu, endued with good understanding, after due reflection.

30. That ruler of men Pandu too obtained the kingdom though he was younger and at his death this kingdom, O chastiser of foes, belongs to his sons.

31. Myself having never participated in the kingdom, how do you desire it, being the son of one who was never a king. You are not a king, and yet you desire to take another's property.

32. Yudhishthira is the son of a king and has a great soul ; and this kingdom justly goes to him. He being endued with great attributes is the lord of the Kuru race as also the ruler of the kingdom.

33. He is attached to truth and is never beside his senses ; he follows the teachings of the holy books and does good to his friends; he is an honest man and is dear to his subjects; he feels for his well-wishers, has his senses under control and is the lord of honest men.

34. Forgiveness, patience, self restraint sincerity, devotion to truth, a good appreciation of the holy books, benevolence, love to creature and ability to rule justly, all these attributes of a king are in Yudhishthira.

35. You, on the other hand, are the son of one who has never been a king; you lead the life of a dishonorable man, you are covetous, ever have wicked intentions towards your friends; O you not endued with humility, how under these circumstances can you take this kingdom which belongs to others and which comes to the successors according to a certain order.

36. With your folly removed, give over one half of the kingdom with its animals and royal garments; and the remainder will be enough for your own living and that of your younger brothers.

Thus ends the one hundred and forty-ninth chapter in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CL.

(BHAGAVAT-YANA PARVA)—Contd.

Vasudeva said.—

1. Though thus spoken to by Bhishma and Drona and Vidura and Gandhari and Dhritarashtra, the fool was yet not brought to his senses.

2. On the other hand that fool, with his eyes red with anger, disregarding them all, went away; and after him the kings who had abandoned all hopes of life followed.

3. The king also again and again said to these rulers of men who had lost their senses: "Go to the Kurukshetra, to-day is the constellation Pushya on the ascendant.

4. Then did those rulers of the earth along with their army set out, having made Bhishma their commandar. They looked cheerful as if urged by death himself.

5. Eleven Akshauhinis have assembled for the Kurus and in the foremost ranks of those is shining Bhishma who has a flagstaff as high as a palm tree.

6. Do that, O lord, which is suitable in this crisis, and under the present circumstances. The words that had been said by Bhishma, those by Drona and by Vidura,

7. And by Gandhari and by Dhritarashtra in my presence, O Bharata, in fact every thing that took place in the assembly of the Kurus, I have told you, O king.

8. All the means commencing with conciliation have been employed by me, desirous of bringing on brotherly feelings among you, so that there might not be a dispute and a destruction of the human race.

9. When I saw that conciliation was not acceptable, I employed "disunion" (i. e. I sought to effect my purpose by creating disunion among his warriors) and I described your deeds, ordinary and superhuman.

10. When I saw that Suyodhana did not accept my words of conciliation, I had all the rulers of the earth brought before me and tried to create disunion among them.

11. O lord, strange, fierce and hard manifestations beyond human capabilities were shown by me, O Bharata.

12. Finding fault with these and holding up Suyodhana to ridicule, describing him as a straw again and again I tried to frighten the son of Radha and the son of Suvala.

13. Then again finding fault with the match at dice of the sons of Dhritarashtra I tried to create disunion among those rulers of the earth by means of eloquence and by intrigues.

14. Then again did I speak of conciliation and then of gifts so that there might not be any disunion in the race of the Kurus and our object be accomplished.

15. I said:—"Those heroes, the sons of Pandu, will remain dependant on Dhritarashtra, Bhishma and Vidura as their subordinates, abandoning their pride.

16. Let the kingdom be given to you and let them not be lords of the kingdom. What the king (Dhritarashtra) and the son of Ganga and Vidura said is beneficial to you.

17. Let the entire kingdom be yours but give up only five villages; for surely they ought to be supported by your father, O best of kings."

18. Even thus spoken to the wicked-souled one did not give up any share and I can only see the fourth means (punishment) for these wicked-souled ones and nothing else.

19. The lords of men have set out for Kurukshetra—only to meet with destruction; I have now told you what happened in the assembly of the Kurus.

20. They will not give up the kingdom without war, O son of Pandu. All of them being the cause of a universal massacre, are coming within the very pale of death.

Thus ends one hundred and fiftieth chapter, the speech of Krishna in the Bhagavat-yana of the Udyoga-Parva.

CHAPTER CLI.

(SAINYA NIRYANA PARVA).

Vaishampayana said:—

1. The virtuous-souled king Yudhis-thira the just, having heard these words of Janardana, said to his brothers in the presence of Keshava.

2. "You have heard what happened in that assemblage of the Kurus and you have also understood what words Keshava has said.

3. Therefore do you, O best among men, make a division of my army; these are the seven Akshauhinis who have assembled for my victory.

4. Listen to the names of those renowned men who are to be their respective commanders, Drupada, Virata, Dhristadyamna and Shikhandin,

5. Satyaki, Chekitana and Bhimasena endued with strength, these heroes who are prepared to sacrifice their lives will be the commanders of my army.

6. All of them are conversant with the Vedas, and all those heroes have made and observed excellent vows; all of them know very well the science of war and are endued with modesty and know diplomacy.

7. All of them besides can fight with all weapons and are skilful in the use of arrows and other weapons. He who will command these seven divisions must have a knowledge of all the divisions of the army.

8. He must besides withstand the flame of his arrows similar to those of fire. Speak out, O Sahadeva, O delighter of the Kuru race, your own opinion as to who has these qualifications, O best among men, and who is competent to be our general?

Sahadeva said:—

9. Bound to us by a tie and having the same cause for sorrow as ourselves, the ruler of the earth, endued with prowess, the one conversant with virtue taking refuge with whom we seek to gain our share,

10. That mighty king of the Matsyas, Virata, a master in the use of weapons and hard to vanquish in battle, will withstand in battle Bhishma and those mighty car-warriors.

Vaishampayana said:—

11. These words being spoken by Sahadeva, Nakula who was eloquent, said these words.

12. "In age, in a knowledge of the holy books, in patience, in nobility of birth and in high connections, he, who is respectable, who is well versed in all the holy books and sciences,

13. He who learnt the handling of weapons from Bharadwaja, he who is hard to vanquish and ever devoted to truth, who ever challenges Drona as also Bhishma endued with great strength,

14. He who is enviable in the races of the rulers of the earth, the foremost of all leaders of armies and who surrounded by sons and grandsons is like a tree with a hundred branches,

15. The lord of the earth who in company with his wife practised hard austerities for destroying Drona, that hero who adorns an assembly,

16. That best among the rulers of the earth who ever supports us as a father, our father-in-law Drupada, should stand at the head of our army,

17. He will be able to withstand both Drona and Bhishma. Such has been my opinion; that king is familiar with the use of celestial weapons and the king is the friend of Angiras."

18. The two sons of Madri having spoken out their own opinions, that delighter of the Kuru race, Savyasachin, the son of Vasava, equal to Vasava himself, said these words.

19. "He, who by the virtue of his austerity and by his gratification of the Rishis, that celestial being of long arms came out, looking like fire,

20. Armed with bows and swords, clad in armours and ascending a chariot drawn by celestial horses of superior breed, from the hole of the sacrificial fire.

21. That man endued with strength, whose chariot rattle is like the roar of the large masses of clouds, that hero, who, endued with the strength of lions, is capable of slaying a lion;

22. That one of great effulgence and strength who has the heart of a lion, the arms of a lion, the chest of a lion, the roars of a lion as also the shoulders of a lion,

23. That man who has beautiful eye-rows, beautiful teeth, beautiful cheeks, beautiful arms, beautiful face, beautiful thighs, large and broad eyes, beautiful feet and beautiful frame of body,

24. Who can not be pierced by any weapon, like an infuriated elephant—this one, a speaker of truth, and a restrainer of his senses, was born for slaying Drona.

25. I think that this Dhristadyumna will be able to withstand the arrows of Bhishma, which strike with the force the thunderbolt and which look like blazing serpents,

26. Which in force are equal to the messengers of Yama and in causing havoc are like fire and which falling as they do with the heaviness of the thunderbolt could be borne only by Rama.

27. That man I do not see who can withstand that one of great vows (Bhishma) save and except Dhristadyumna, O king; and such is my opinion.

28. In my opinion this warrior, who is like the chief elephant of a herd, and endued with prosperity, lightness of hand, clad in a coat of mail that cannot be pierced, well-versed in the use of all weapons, should be my commander.

Bhimasena said :—

29. That Shikhandin, the son of Drupada who is born for the destruction (of Bhishma) as it is used to be said, O chief among kings, by the assembled Siddhas and Rishis,

30. Whose form in the midst of the fight, while displaying celestial weapons, people will see to be like that of the great-souled Rama (should be the commander).

31. I do not see that man who could in battle subjugate Shikhandin while under arms, O king, and seated on his chariot clad in mail.

32. In hand to hand single combat, no one save Shikhandin could slay that hero, Bhishma, of great vows and it is my opinion that he should be our general.

Yudhisthira said :—

33. The truth or untruth, the strength and weakness of the entire world, my dear, brothers and the minds of these, the great souled Keshva knows.

34. He, whom Krishna, of the Dasharha race, will name, should be my general whether he is a master in the use of weapons or otherwise or whether he is old or young.

35. He, my dear brothers, is the root of our victory or our defeat and on him depend our lives, our kingdom, our success, our want, our happiness and our misery.

36. He is the lord and he is the ordainer and on him depends success and let him, who is named by Krishna of the Dasharha race, be the leader of my forces.

37. Let the foremost of speakers speak, for it is now almost night; having selected our general, under the guidance of Krishna,

38. We shall at the end of this night march to the field of battle after having worshipped our weapons and duly performed all the auspicious ceremonies.

Vaishampayana said :—

39. Hearing those words of the wise and virtuous king, the one of lotus eyes said looking on Dhananjaya.

40. "In my opinion too, O great king, these powerful warriors who have been named by you, should be the leaders of your army.

41. All of them are competent to withstand your enemies and they will beget fear in even Indra in the great war,

42. What to speak of those sons of Dhritarashtra of wicked heart who are acting from covetousness. By me too, O you of long arms, has been taken great pains for your benefit in the forth-coming great war.

43. With that view, I have taken great pains so that there might be peace, O Bharata, and we have thus paid off the debt we owed to virtue and can besides not be blamed by fault-finding persons.

44. That boy thinks himself wise and a master in the use of weapons; and though the son of Dhritarashtra considers himself strong yet in reality he is weak.

45. Array your troops for battle for in my opinion it is possible to slay them. The son of Dhritarashtra will not be able to continue in their present attitude after seeing Dhananjaya,

46. As also when he sees Bhimasena excited with anger, and the twins who are like Yama himself and the wrathful Dhristadyumna having Yujudhana for his second,

47. And Abhimanyu and the sons of Draupadi and Virata and Drupada and other chiefs of men of fierce strength, each the commander of an Akshouhini.

48. Our army has great strength and is besides hard to vanquish and is hard to withstand and I think that in the battle will slay the army of the son of Dhritarashtra—there is no doubt about it. O chastiser of foes, I consider that Dhristadyumna should be our general.

Vaishampayana said :—

49. Krishna having said this all those best among men were highly rejoiced and there was a great shout sent up by these whose minds had been made cheerful.

50. There was a speedy moving about among the soldiers all crying "Drawup" and there was everywhere the roar of elephants, the neighing of horses and the clatter of the wheels of the chariots.

51. There was everywhere a loud uproar caused by the sounds of conches and of drums, and the assembling of that army caused a din like that of the sea in a tempest.

52. The army, composed of chariots, infantry and cavalry, with the soldiers running about summoning one another and buckling on their armour,

53. And the Pandavas moving about, looked like the Ganga troubled by great waves and full to the brim. The army seemed to be hard to vanquish.

54. In front of the army were Bhimasena and the two sons of Madri clad in coats of mail,

55. And the son of Subhadra and the (five) sons of Draupadi and Dhristadyumna, the son of Parshata race, the Prabhadrakas and the Panchalas under the leadership of Bhimasena.

56. The sound proceeding from these was like the roar of the sea on the day of the new moon ; and the shouts, sent by the cheerful soldiers proceeding along, touched the very heavens as it were.

57. The cheerful soldiers, clad in coats of mail, were capable of piercing the hostile armies and in the midst of those went Yudhisthira the son of Kunti,

58. With carts and transport cars, and all descriptions of vehicles, the treasury, weapons and machines and physicians and surgeons,

59. The few invalids that there were in the army and all those that were weak and powerless—taking all these the king went with those that served him as attendants.

60. The truthful princess of Panchali, the daughter of Drupada in company with other ladies and surrounded by servant and maids remained at Upaplavya.

61. Those delighters of the Pandu race set out with a large army after having made due arrangements for guarding over their wealth and having erected a surrounding wall at a short distance and soldiers being placed at regular intervals.

62. They proceeded distributing cows and gold and surrounded by Brahmanas ; O king, they proceeded, hymns being sung in their praise, on chariots ornamented with gems and precious stones.

63. The Kekaya princes and Dhristaketu the son of the prince of the Kashis, Srenimat, Vasudana, and Shikhandin who had never met with defeat,

64. With cheerful hearts, clad in coats of mail, well-armed, and with their persons well ornamented, all followed surrounding the king Yudhisthira.

65. In the rear were, Virata and the son of Yajnasena of the Somaka race, Susharman and Kuntibhoja and the sons of Dhristadyumna,

66. Forty thousand chariots, five times that number of horses, ten times that number of foot soldiers, and sixty thousand elephants.

67. Anadhristi and Chekitana, Dhristaketu and Satyaki all went surrounding the king as also Vasudeva and Dhananjaya.

68. And having reached Kurukshetra with their army ready for action, those smiters, the Pandavas, looked like bulls wandering about with loud roars.

69. And reaching Kurukshetra those chastiser of foes blew their conches and in the same way did Vasudeva and Dhananjaya also blow their conches.

70. All the soldiers of the army became cheerful in every way at hearing the sound of the Panchajanya conch which was similar to the roaring of thunder.

71. Sounds of conches and drums mixed with the leonine roars of those soldiers endued with activity resounded in the earth and the sky and the seas also.

Thus ends the one hundred and first chapter, the entrance into Kurukshetra in Sainya Nirvana of the Udyoga-Parva.

CHAPTER CLII.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. Then in a part of the field which was level, shady and where there was plenty of fodders and fuel the king Yudhisthira had his army encamped.

2. Avoiding cremation grounds, other sacred places and houses consecrated to the gods, and the hermitages of the great Rishis and also other holy places,

3. Yudhishthira, the son of Kunti, of great intelligence, ordered his army to be encamped, in a part of the field which was delightful and grassy and which was open.

4. Then his army, which was weary and tired, having rested, again set out surrounded by hundreds and thousands of rulers of the earth.

5. Routing hundreds of groups of soldiers of the son of Dhritarashtra Keshava wandered about in company with the son of Pritha.

6. Dhrishtadyumna, the son of the Prishata race, and the car-warrior Satyaki endued with prowess, otherwise called Vuyudhana, had the land of encampment measured.

7. Reaching, in the field of Kurakshetra the holy lake Hiranvati which was a place of hermitage, the water of which was pure and the bed free from stones and mire,

8. Keshava had a trench dug there, O Bharata and for the protection thereof posted a body of soldiers with instructions to them.

9. The rules, that were in force in connection with the encampment of the great souled Pandavas, were ordered also to be followed by Keshava in regard to the encampment of other chiefs of men.

10. There were plenty of tents, by hundreds and thousands, hard to be captured and provided with abundance of foods, eatables, solid food, drink and fuels.

11. Separate tents of great value were fixed there on the face of the earth, one for each; and they looked like so many palaces, O chief among kings.

12. And there were engaged many skilful workmen and experienced, to whom were given regular salaries, as also physicians, familiar with the science, furnished with all the necessary articles and ingredients of their respective professions.

13. Bowstrings, bows, coats of mail, and weapons as also honey and clarified butter, water, pounded lac, in heaps resembling hills,

14. And plenty of water and fodder for cattle and chaff and fire, the king Yudhishthira placed in each tent.

15. Large machines, long shafts, to maras, and battle-axes, bows, coats of mail, breast-plates and quivers were also there.

16. Elephants having coats of steel with prickles thereon and huge as mountain, were seen there, each capable of fighting with a hundred thousand warriors.

17. Knowing that the sons of Pandu were encamped there, O Bharata, his friends came from their respective countries along with their own forces and armies.

18. By them had been observed Brahmacharyya vows, drunk the Soma juice; and liberal presents had also been made by them to the Brahmanas in sacrifices; these kings came for ensuring victory to the sons of Pandu.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-second chapter, the preparation of tents &c., in the Sainya Nirvana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLIII.

(SAINYA NIRYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Janamejaya said:—

1. Hearing that Yudhishthira with his army was advancing with the desire of fighting and has already reached Kurukshetra and was protected by Vasudeva,

2. And by Virata and Drupada along with their sons, and by the Kekayas and Vrishnis and surrounded by the rulers of the earth by hundreds,

3. Protected by mighty carwarriors as the great Indra by the Adityas—what did the king Duryodhana do?

4. I desire to hear this in detail, O you of great wisdom—what happened at Kurujangala on that terrible occasion.

5. These assembled together would strike terror into the hearts of the gods even with Indra—namely the son of Pandu Vasudeva, Virata and Drupada,

6. Dhrishtadyumna, the princes of Panchala and the great car-warriors Shikhandi and the powerful Yudhamanyu hard to withstand even by the gods.

7. This I desire to hear in detail, O you whose only wealth is devotion, namely the the movements respectively of the Kurus and the Pandavas.

Vaishampayana said:—

8. The scion of the Dasarha race having gone away, the king Duryodhana then said thus to Karna, Dusasana and Shakuni.

9. "With his object unsuccessful has the one whom the senses cannot know (Krishna) gone back to the son of Pritha and being filled with malice he will surely excite them (against us)—there is no doubt of it.

10. It is the desire of Vasudeva that there should be war between the sons of Pandu and myself; and Bhimasena and Arjuna ever follow the opinions of that scion of the Dhisharha race.

11. Yudhishthira who has no enemies, too is greatly under the influence of Bhimasena—besides he had been persecuted by me before along with all his brothers.

12. Virata and Drupada too entertain feelings of enmity towards me; and those two leaders of armies too are under the influence of Vasudeva.

13. Therefore will there be a fierce war which will make one's hair stand on end; therefore do you make all preparations of war very carefully.

14. Let the rulers of the earth fix their tents in Kurukshetra—tents which are spacious and large, and incapable being captured by enemies.

15. Let them be fixed by hundreds and thousands near a place abounding in water and fuel and in such a place that the way leading to it for supplying rations may not be cut off at the sweet will of the foe.

16. Let them be full of diverse kinds of weapons, flags and banners and let the roads leading to it out of the town be made level and cleared.

17. Proclaim without delay that we march forth tomorrow and they too saying "very-well" obeyed these instructions on the day after.

18. Then did those rulers of the earth hearing those commands of the king become cheerful and made the necessary arrangements for the residence of the allies.

19. Being excited with wrath (towards the Pandavas) they rose up from their seats of great value and began slowly to rub their arms which had the circumference, of maces.

20. And which were blazing with golden ornaments and ornamented with sandal paste; and they began to put on their head gears by the help of their lotus like hands as also their lower and upper garments in all parts body.

21. The foremost among the car-warriors looked to the equipment of the cars, while those who were experts about horses looked to the harnessing of the steeds, and those who knew all about elephants began to get ready the elephants for war.

22. All those warriors then began to take up diverse sorts of coats of mail, many armours which were made of gold and all sorts of weapon in all directions.

23. The soldiers of the infantry began to take up different sorts of weapons and to protect their bodies by various sorts of armours made of gold.

24. Then did that army, of the son of Dhritarastra made up of cheerful men, look like a festive city, O Bharata.

25. The crowd of human beings looked like the water of the sea, the cars, horses, and elephants like the fishes, the sound of conches and the beat of drums were its roar and the collection of treasures was the gems.

26. The diverse sorts of ornaments were the lesser waves, the bright and spotless weapons the foam, the clusters, of houses in the city were like the mountains on the sea shore and the groups of chariots were the large lakes on the bed of the sea.

27. In short, O king, was that great sea of the Kuru king brightened by the moon of warriors and it really then looked like the great sea at the rise of the moon.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-third chapter the equipment of Duryodhana's army in the Sainya Nirvana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLIV.

(SAINYA NIRVANA PARVA).—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Yudhishthira, remembering these words of Vasudeva again asked the scion of the Vrishni race as to how that fool could say it.

2. "Under the present circumstances which have developed before us, what should we do, O you who never go away from the right path; and by shaping our course in what way shall we not fall off from the duties of our class.

3. O Vasudeva, you know the minds of Duryodhana, Karna, Shakuni and the son of Suvala as also of myself along with my brothers.

4. The words of Vidura have been heard by you as also those of Bhisma, as also the entire wisdom of the greatly wise Kunti, as embodied in her words.

5. Reviewing in your mind all this and reflecting again and again, speak unhesitatingly what our capabilities are, O you of along arms."

6. Hearing these words of the virtuous king consistent with both virtue and worldly profit, Krishna said these words with the voice resembling the roar of clouds and beat of drums.

Krishna said :—

7. The words that you have said are consistent with virtue and profit and are indeed to your benefit but then these do not seem acceptable to the son of Kuru, with whom ignorance has now become wisdom.

8. That man of bad intellect does not even listen to the words of Bhima nor to those of Vidura nor even the words spoken by me—he disobeys all.

9. He does not seek virtue, nor does he seek renown,—under the protection of Karna, that evil souled one considers everything as conquered.

10. Suyodhana even ordered for my capture ; but that evil-souled one of sinful determination did not succeed in his desire.

11. In that case neither Bhishma nor Droṇa said anything—in fact all follow him more or less save Vidura, O you who never swerve from your duties.

12. Shakuni, the son of Suvala, Karna and Dusasana—all these fools, spoke of you in a way you did not deserve, to that wrathful one.

13. What is the use of my repeating everything that the son of Kuru said ; in brief that evil-souled one does not hold the opinion, you deserve, of yourself.

14. Not even in all these rulers of the earth who constitute your army combined is there the same wickedness and the want of righteousness as is rooted in him.

15. We do not desire peace with the sons of Kuru, at the sacrifice of our own interest and therefore war is what we should follow.

Vaishampayana said :—

16. Hearing those words spoken by Vasudeva all the kings looked on the face of the king Yudhishthira, without saying anything, O Bharata.

17. Yudhishthira too having divined the intentions of those kings ordered for the arraying of the troops along with Bhima and Arjuna and the twins.

18. Then was there a din in the army of the Pandavas, and on the order of the arraying troops being given the soldiers became cheerful.

19. The virtuous king Yudhishthira, now seeing that a slaughter of innocent men was unavoidable, began to sigh repeatedly and said these words to Bhimasena and Vijaya.

20. "The very thing to avoid which (a war) I went to exile in the forest and experienced other troubles—that very calamity now overtakes us as if with a set purpose.

21. The object, for which we took so much care, leaves as for our wishing it ; and without our wishing for it has the mighty Kali come.

22. How shall we fight with these who cannot be slain and who lead honorable lives and how can we expect victory by slaying aged men our elders ?"

23. Savyasachin, that chastiser of foes, hearing these words of the virtuous king, repeated before him the words said by Vasudeva (in this connection).

24. (He said addressing Yudhishthira), you have, O king, understood the words spoken by Kunti and Vidura in their entirety as repeated before you by the son of Devaki.

25. I firmly adhere to the opinion that they will not say what is unrighteous, not is it proper, O son of Kunti, that we should turn back without enjoying war."

26. Vasudeva too hearing those words of Savyasachin, said laughingly to the son of Pritha (Arjuna) "It is as you have said."

27. Then did those sons of Pandu make up their minds for war, O great king, and passed the night with their soldiers without any mental agitation.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-fourth chapter the conversation between Yudhishthira and Arjuna, in the Sainya Nirvana of the Udyoga-Parva.

CHAPTER CLV.

(SAINYA NIRYANA PARVA).—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1. The night having passed away, king Duryodhana then made the usual divisions of his army which consisted of ten and one Akshauhinis, O Bharata.

2. He divided his men, elephants, chariots and horses into superior, inferior and indifferent ; and then that ruler of men distributed them in his army.

3. Furnished with all the requirements of a large army, namely with materials for repairs of chariots, with quivers to be carried on chariots, with tiger skins to cover the chariots, with large sticks fixed to spear blades for throwing with the hand, with quivers suitable to be carried on horses and elephants, with Shaktis, (a sort of long handled weapon) with arrow-holders suitable for the infantry and with heavy sticks,

4. With flags and banners, with huge arrows, and bows and bowstrings and diverse suites of ropes, with nooses and lashes;

5. With plain pointed sticks, oil, molasses and sand (to be thrown heated at the enemy) pots full of poisonous snakes, with pounded lac and other inflammable articles;

6. With barbed weapons, with skins furnished with bells and all sorts of weapons and instruments for throwing hot molasses water and sand, with maces making a peculiar sound, with syringes for throwing hot liquids;

7. With staffs having thorns or barbs fixed to them, weapons for throwing poison, and ploughs, as also devices for hurling javelins;

8. With battle axes, forked lances, sharp spikes, iron gloves with barbs and chariots covered by tiger skins and skins of leopards;

9. With forged pieces of wood, with excellent horses, with diverse weapons of offence and defence, with felling axes and spades and with oil-clothes, and clarified butter.

10. Glittering with robes embroidered with gold and decked with diverse gems and consisting of beautiful warriors, the army of Duryodhana blazed forth like fire.

11. Heroes clad in coats of mail and masters in the use of weapons and of good parentage, competent judges of the breed of horses, were appointed to be charioteers.

12. The chariots had on them all sorts of drugs and weapons, were drawn by horses having bells and pearls on their necks and had also flags and standards attached. They had also on their turrets ornaments and shields, swords, Pattisas and other weapons.

13. All the chariots were drawn by four horses each, all of whom again were the best of their species; each of them was furnished with a hundred bows and all sorts of defensive weapons.

14. Each of them had one driver for the horses in front and one again for each of the horses at the sides and those men were the foremost among car-warriors and also familiar with horse driving.

15. Each was protected as a city should be and was therefore hard to be captured by the enemies; thousands of those decked with gold were posted in all directions.

16. As the chariots had bells and wreaths of pearls and other ornaments so had the elephants and on the back of each were mounted seven men making the animals look like hills decked with jewels.

17. These seven were made up of two men holding hooks for driving the elephants, two again who were excellent bowmen, two who could fight well with swords, O king, and one was armed with a lance and a trident.

18. That army of the great-souled Kurus, O king, was full of infuriated animals and was furnished with all necessary weapons and treasuries.

19. It was also made up of tens of thousands of horse soldiers clad in mail, with ornaments on and holding up flags.

20. All the horses numbering many hundreds and thousands were kept under proper control and were free from the habit of scratching the ground with the fore feet.

21. There were also in that army, hundreds of thousands of infantry decked with gold, clad in diverse sorts of arm and of diverse temper.

22. For every chariot there were ten elephants, for every elephants ten horses, for every horse ten men for the proper protection.

23. There was also another reserve army in which for every chariot there were five elephants, for every elephant one hundred horses, and for every horse seven men.

24. A sena consisted of five hundred elephants, and the same number of elephants (with infantry and cavalry); ten Senas made a Pritana and ten Pritanas a Vahini

25. Sena, Vahini, Pritana, Dhwajini and Bhuhini, Akshauhini, Chamu, and Varuthini mean however the same thing in common usage.

26. In this way was the army of the intelligent Kaurava arrayed by him; there were seven and eleven Akshauhini of troops altogether.

27. The army of the Pandavas consisted of seven Akshauhini, while that of the Kauravas consisted of ten and one Akshauhini.

28. Of men five times fifty constitute a Patti and three Pattis make a Senamukha which is also called a Gulma. Three Gulmas make a Gana, and there were tens of thousands of Ganas in the army of Duryodhana, each competent to fight and each a smiter.

29. The king Duryodhana, of long arms selecting men who were wise and also heroes, made them leaders of his army.

30. Having those best among men the leaders of his Akshauhini brought before them with suitable honour he spoke to them separately,

31. Kripa, Drona, Shalya, Saindhava, Jayadratta, Sudakshina, and Kambhoja, and Kritavarman,

32. The son of Drona, Bhurisravas, Shakuni, the son of Suvala and Valhika endued with great strength. ✽

33. All of these, O Bharata, he used to bring before him daily for consultation and looked to them himself and offered them due honour.

34. These men being thus treated with respect, and those foot soldiers who constituted the army of the king Duryodhana became desirous of doing what was beneficial to that king.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-fifth chapter, divisions of Duryodhana's army in the Sainya Nirvana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLVI.

(SAINYA NIRYANA PARVA)—Cond.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then did the son of Dhritarastra, with clasped hands, along with all these rulers of the earth, say these words to Bhishma, the son of Santanu.

2. "Without a (suitable) leader of the army even a large army is broken up when engaged in battle like a swarm of ants.

3. The opinions of two seldom agree besides the leaders of hosts are jealous of one another regarding their own prowess.

4. It is heard, O you of great wisdom, that all the Brahmanas having assembled together, hoisted up their flag of Kusha and and proclaimed war with the Haihayas of immeasurable energy.

5. They were joined. O grandfather, by the Vaisyas and Sudras. There were thus on one side three orders and those best among the Khatriyas on the other.

6. The three orders broke up again and again in the battle that followed and the Kshatriyas were victorious over that large army though they were alone,

7. Then did these best among the twice-born asked the Kshatriya the cause of this and O grandfather, and those men conversant with virtue told them the truth.

8. "In battle we listen to the commands of any one person who is the wisest among us, but you are separated and follow your individual whims,

9. Then did those best among the Brahmanas make one among the twice-born the leader of their army, who was skilful in diplomacy and then did they win a victory ever the Kshatriyas.

10. In the same way those, who appoint a skilful hero who has the good of his party at heart as the leader of the army, vanquish their enemies in battle.

11. You are equal to Ushanas himself and over wish me well and follow a righteous course from which you never fall off. Therefore do you become a general.

12. You are as the sun is among the luminous bodies, the moon among deciduous herbs, Kuvera among the Yakshas, Vasava among the gods,

13. Meru among the mountains, Suparna among the birds, Kumara among the gods, Indra among the Vasus.

14. Protected by you we will be as the gods protected by Shakra and we shall surely be invincible even by the denizens of heaven.

15. You march in our front as the son of Agni (Kumara) among the gods and we shall follow you like calves following a cow.

Bhishma said:—

16. It is as you say, O Bharata, O you of long arms but as you are to me so are the Pandavas.

17. And it is also my duty to look after their welfare, O ruler of men; but I shall fight on your behalf since I have promised it.

18. I do not see any soldier equal to me in this world save that best among men Dhananjaya, the son of Kunti.

19. He (Arjuna) is a man of great wisdom and knows the use of celestial weapons and many other weapons but that son of Pandu will never encounter me in open fight.

20. I, in a moment, shall make this world destitute of men, gods, Asuras and Rakshasas by the strength of my weapons

21. But these sons of Pandu ought not to be slain by me, O ruler of men; therefore shall I slay ten thousand warriors every day.

22. In this way, shall I bring on their end O delighter of the Kuru race, if indeed they do not kill me before I have time to carry out my desire in the battle.

23. But there is another condition on which I shall be the leader of your army; that desire which I have in my heart it is proper that you should hear of.

24. Either let Karna fight first or myself, O lord of the earth. The son of the Suta always compares his prowess in battle with mine.

Karna said :—

25. So long as the son of Ganga is alive I shall never fight, O king; when Bhishma is slain, I shall fight with him who wields the Gandiva bow.

Vaishampayana said :—

26. Then did the son of Dhritarashtra make Bhishma, who had made liberal gifts, the commander of his army, and he too being duly installed blazed forth.

27. Drums and conches were then sounded by hundreds and thousands by eager musicians by command of the king.

28. There were also roars like those of lions and several other sorts of roars among the army; and though there were no clouds in the sky there was a down pour of blood which made the ground full of mire.

29. There were also earthquakes and whirl-winds and roars made by elephants which succeeded in casting a shade on the minds of all warriors.

30. There were also incorporeal voices and meteors shot forth from the heavens and jackals began to make frightful howls and the cardinal points seemed ablaze.

31. When the king installed the son of Ganga in the generalship these frightful sights appeared in hundreds, O ruler of men.

32. Then having appointed, Bhishma the grinder of the enemy's hosts, as the general and having made liberal presents of cows and gold to the foremost among the twice born,

33. He marched forth with the blessings of those Brahmanas glorifying him, surrounded by his army placing Bhishma at the head of his host and accompanied by his brothers.

34. And with a large army he went to Kurukshetra.

35. The son of Kuru having traversed Kurukshetra in company with Karna placed his camps in a plain, O ruler of men,

36. In a part which was also charming and without sands and abounded, fuels and fodder. The encampment then shone forth as the city of Hastina.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-sixth Chapter, the appointment of Bhishma to the generalship in the Sainya Nirvana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLVII.

(SAINYA NIRYANA PARVA).—Contd

Janamejaya said :—

1. The great-souled Bhishma, the foremost among all wielders of weapons, the grandfather of the Bharatas, the flag as it were of all the rulers of the earth,

2. In intelligence equal to Vrihaspati, in power equal to the earth, in gravity equal to the sea, in calmness equal to the Himavat,

3. In generosity equal to the lord of all creatures, in effulgence equal to the sun, and in destroying the enemies by downpours of arrows equal to great Indra,

4. Was employed for life as the chief priest of that sacrifice of battle, which was fierce and hair-stirring. Healing this what did Yudhisthira,

5. Of long arms, the foremost among all wielders of weapons, say and what did Bhimasena and Arjuna and what did Krishna say?

Vaishampayana said :—

6. Yudhisthira, who was skilful in virtue and wordly profit especially in seasons of calamities. having summoned together all his brothers as also the eternal Vasudeva,

7. That foremost of speakers said these words in a calm spirit: "Go round the army and remain watchful being clad in mail.

8. Our first encounter will be with our grandfather, therefore do you look for the seven leaders of my army.

Krishna said :—

9. By you, O best among the race of Bharatas, have these words pregnant with meaning been said, which indeed are proper in these circumstances which have presented themselves.

10. All this I approve of, O you of long arms, and now do what ought to be done; select seven leaders for your army.

Vaishampayana said :—

11. Then summoning before him Dru-pada, Virata, and that best among the Cini race, and Dhristadyumna the prince of Panchala, and the ruler of the earth Dhrish-taketu,

12. Shikhandin, the prince of Panchala Sahadeva and the king of Magadha—sum-moning these seven heroes of great attri-butes who were anxious for war,

13. Yudhishthira duly installed them as the leaders of his army and made Dhrishta-dyumna the general commander of all.

14. This Dhristadyumna, who was des-tined to be the cause of the end of Drona, was born of the blazing sacrificial fire. And over all these great souled men assembled together,

15. Dhananjaya of curling hairs was made the general; and the guide of Arjuna and the driver of his horses,

16. Was the younger brother of Shan-karashana, Janardana of great intelligence, endued with great beauty. Then seeing that a great battle was near at hand,

17. The one, who had the plough for his weapon (elder brother of Krishna), entered the encampment of the Pandavas, O king, in company with Akrura, Gadha, Shamba, Uddhava,

18. And the son of Rukmini (Pradyumna) and the son of Ahuka and Charudeshna and others. Surrounded and protected by those foremost of the Vrishni race like a herd of powerful tigers,

19. The one of long arms like Vasava protected by Maruts with blue garments on and looking majestic as the peak of the Kailasa,

20. With the gait of a sporting lion, en-dued with beauty and with eyes having the ends reddened by drinking wine (entered there. Seeing him, the virtuous king and Keshava of great effulgence,

21. Rose up from their seats as also did the son of Pritha, and Vrikodara of fierce deeds and the wielder of the Gandiva bow and the other kings that were there.

22. And they assembled together did worship the approaching Halayudha. Then did the Pandava king touch him in the hand by his own hands.

23. And all those kings with Vasudeva at their head greeting him, Halayadha too saluted Virata and Drupada and those who were aged.

24. That chastiser of foes then sat down with Yudhishthira and the son of Rohini then said, with his eyes on Vasudeva, to those rulers of the earth seated together.

25. "There will be a very fierce and harsh massacre of men; it is ordained by the fate surely, I think, and cannot be avoided.

26. And I entertain the hope that I shall see you come out of that battle along with your well wishers without any disease, and without any scars on your persons.

27. All these Kshatriyas, these rulers of the earth have their hour come and there will be a great massacre which will make the earth one mass of clay of flesh and blood".

28. Vasudeva was thus addressed by me again and again in private: "Behave with impartiality to those who are equally related to you, O slayer of Madhu.

29. As the sons of Pandu are to us, so is that ruler of men Duryodhana; and do you therefore help him also for he applied for it again and again.

30. For your sake, however, did the slayer of Madhu, not act up to my words. He has with all his heart set himself to your interests, with his eye on the interests of Dhananjaya.

31. Victory will surely come to the sons of Paundu; such is my opinion, for such is the purpose of Vasudeva.

32. I do not dare to look on this world separated from Krishna and therefore shall I remain inactive in what Krishna wishes.

33. Both of these heroes, well skilled in fighting with maces, are my pupils and I bear the same affection for Duryodhana as for that ruler of men Bhima.

34. Therefore shall I now go to make a pilgrimage to the sacred places on the banks of the Saraswati for I shall not be able to look on with indifference at this mas-sacre of the Kurus."

35. The one of long arms, Rama say-ing this with the leave of the sons of Pandava, went to visit the holy places making the slayer of Adhu return, (he had accompanied him for some distance)

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty-seventh chapter, the journey of Balarama to the sacred places in the Sainya Nir-yana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLVIII

(SAINYA NIRYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said :—

1—2. At this time did there come to the encampment of the Pandavas, the son of the great souled Bhishmaka, otherwise called the king Hiranya Roman, who was the friend of Indra himself, who was the very renowned ruler of the Bhojas, and who was the lord of the entire southern countries. His son was known in all countries by the name of Rukmi, ever devoted to truth,

3. Who was a pupil of that lion of the Kimpnrushas living on the Gandhamadana mountain and who learnt from him the entire science of handling bows in all its four branches ;

4. Who, having long arms, obtained the Vijaya bow of the great Indra himself which was equal in energy to the Gandiva and to the Shranga which had celestial attributes in it.

5. These were the three celestial bows of the denizens of heaven namely, Gandiva belonging to Varuna, Vijaya belonging to the great Indra, and Shranga the bow of Vishnu, having celestial energy.

6. Krishna obtained that bow which struck terror to the soldiers of the enemies. The son of Indra (Arjuna) obtained the Gandiva from the fire on the occasion of burning the Khandava.

7. Rukmi of great energy, obtained the Vijaya from Druma after breaking open the knots and nooses of Mura and slaying Asura by his own energy.

8. And subjugating Naraka the son of Bhumi (earth) while recovering the jewelled ear-rings and sixteen thousand damsels and diverse sorts of gems,

9. Hrishikesha obtained that excellent bow the Shranga. Rukmi, obtaining that bow called Vijaya whose twang was like the roaring of the clouds,

10. Came to the Pandavas as if terrifying the earth. The hero, proud of the strength of his own arms, could not pass, in silence before,

11. The ravishment of Rukmini (his sister) by the wise Vasudeva ; and having resolved "I shall not return without slaying Janardana,"

12. The foremost among wielders of weapons came in pursuit of the scion of Vrishni race, with army having all the four divisions, which occupied a large tract of land as it proceeded,

13. And furnished with diverse sorts of armours and weapons resembled the Ganga when full. He, then coming to that scion of the Vrishni race who is the lord, the object of all devotion,

14. Was defeated by him and was thus put to shame. And he returned not, O king, to Kundina, his capital, since that slayer of hostile heroes, Krishna, was not defeated by him in battle.

15. There he built an excellent city called Bhojakata furnished with a large army and plenty of elephants and horses.

16. That city became famous by the name of Bhojakata, O ruler of men. That king of the Bhojas surrounded by a large army,

17. Numbering an Akshouhini and endowed with great prowess soon came to the son of Pandu. Then did he, clad in a coat of mail and armed with bow, fencer, sword and quivers,

18. With a standard of the hue of the sun, entered into the large army and became known to the sons of Pandu through his desire of doing what was acceptable to Vasudeva.

19. The king Yudhisthira, too, offered him worship after advancing a little ; and he, being worshipped and praised by the son of Pandu as became his station and rank,

20. Saluted those kings in return ; and after resting himself with his army he said, in the midst of those heroes, to Dhananjaya the son of Kunti.

21. "If, O son of Pandu, you are afraid on the eve of the war I shall afford you assistance. The assistance, I will give, cannot possibly be borne by your enemies.

22. There is no man in this world who is equal to me in prowess. I shall slay in battle that portion of your enemy you will allot to my share,

23. Even including Drona and Kripa, or the heroes Bhishma or Kuru or all those rulers of the earth assembled together even, if they stand against you.

24. (Even then) having slain in battle your enemies I shall make over the earth to you". Being thus spoken to in the presence of the virtuous king Keshava,

25. And in the hearing of those chief among the rulers of the earth, and all others who were there and with his eyes on Vasudeva and on the virtuous king the son of Pandu,

26. The son of Kunti said laughingly in a friendly way. "Born in the race of Kurus, especially being the son Pandu,

27. Calling myself the pupil of Drona and getting the help of Vasudeva, how can I say that I am afraid especially as I hold the Gandiva bow ?

28. O hero, when fighting with the great army of Gandharvas in the battle,— who was then my friend ?

29. Then again in that terrific battle between the gods and the Danavas fighting together at Khandava who was then my friend?

30. In my fight with the Nivatakavachas or with the Danavas called Kalakeyas—who was my friend?

31. Then again in the battle with Kurus in the city of Virat—who was my friend?

32. Having paid homage to Rudra, Sakra, Vaishravana, Yama, Varuna, Agni Kripa, Drona and Madhava,

33. And holding firmly the celestial bow the Gandiva and furnished with an inexhaustible mass of arrows and protected by celestial weapons,

34. How can one like myself say "I am afraid" calculated to cast infamy on my name, to even Indra himself who has the thunder-bolt for his weapon, O best among men.

35. I am not afraid, O you of long arms, and I have no necessity for your assistance. Go elsewhere if you please, or remain here if you like."

36. Then Rukmi, returning with that army resembling the sea, came to Duryodhana and spoke in the same strain, O Bharata.

37. Coming to that ruler of the earth did he say the same thing and his help was refused by Duryodhana too who thought himself a hero.

38. Thus two parties, O great king, did not take part in that battle, namely the son of Rohini, the scion of the Vrishni race and the ruler of the earth Rukmi.

39. Rama having gone to visit the sacred places and the son of Bhishmaka having returned in the manner just described the sons of Pandu again sat down for consultation.

40. The assembly, of the virtuous king with all the rulers of the earth, shone as the moon in the sky surrounded by diverse stars, O Bharata.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty eighth chapter, the return of Rukmi in the Sainya Nirvana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLIX.

(SAINYA NIRYANA PARVA)—Contd.

Janamejaya said :—

1. The army having then been prepared in order for battle, O best among the Bharatas, what did the sons of Kuru, urged as they were by destiny itself, do?

Vaishampayana said :—

2. The army having been prepared in order for battle, O Bharata, the great king Dhritarashtra said these words to Sanjaya.

3. "Come, O Sanjaya, and tell me everything in detail of the steps taken in the matter of encamping the army of the Kurus and the Pandavas.

4. In my opinion luck is the more important factor, manliness and prowess being vain and useless; since I, though understanding the disadvantages of war which gives rise only to decay and ruin,

5. Can not yet restrain my son who considers folly to be wisdom and who is addicted to gambling, and cannot thus effect my own good.

6. My understanding is capable, O Suta, of finding out the disadvantage of a particular act but when I approach Duryodhana my understanding fails me

7. Such being the case, O Sanjaya, what will happen must happen (in spite of all that I can do to prevent it). Besides it is the honoured duty of a Kshatrya to quit this life in battle."

Sanjaya said :—

8. This question, that you desire to put, is worthy of you, O great king, but it is not proper that you should lay the fault entirely on Duryodhana.

9. Listen to the end of my speech in detail regarding this matter; that man, who meets with disasters owing to his own bad acts, should not, properly speaking, lay the fault on time or luck nor on the gods.

10. O great king, he, who behaves sinfully in every thing towards men, ought to be killed by the entire world owing to his sinful behaviour.

11. O foremost among the sons of Manu, the Pandavas, defeated at the game of dice, were much persecuted but they bore up all that for they had confidence in you.

12. Hear from me fully of the slaughter that is about to be perpetrated in the battle, of horses, elephants, and kings of immeasurable prowess.

13. Hearing patiently of the massacre of the entire world that is about to take place in the battle, O you of great wisdom, be decided in this point namely

14. A man is not the doer of his virtuous or impious acts. In fact a man acts under compulsion like a wooden machine.

15. Some say that each act is made to be done by god himself; others say that action proceeds from our own free will, while others again say that they are the results of acts in our past lives. These are the three opinions held in this matter. Listen therefore patiently to the disaster that is close on us.

Thus ends the one hundred and fifty ninth chapter, the speech of Sanjaya in the Sainya Nirvana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLX.

(ULUKADUTAGAMANA PARVA)

Sanjaya said :—

1. The great souled sons of Pandu having fixed their encampment at Hiranvati, the sons of Karu too encamped there as usual, O great king.

2. The king Duryodhana, having encamped his soldiers there strongly, and having paid his respects to the rulers of men on his side and posted guards,

3. And taken other measures for the protection of his soldiers, summoned before him Karna, Dusasana, Shakuni, the son of Suvala,

4. And consulted with the kings, O Bharata. The king Duryodhana first consulted with Karna, O Bharata.

5. And having consulted with Karna and also with his brother Dusasana, and that best among men having also consulted with the son of Suvala, O chief among kings,

6. And summoning in private Uluka, said these words O king: "O Uluka, O son of one who is skillful at dice, go to the Pandavas united with the Somakas

7. And going there say this on my behalf within the hearing of Vasudeva; "What has been expected for a long series of years has now come

8. Namely the war between the Pandavas and the Kurus, frightful to the world. Of the very boastful words Sanjaya told me,

9. Proceeding from yourself and your younger brothers having Vasudeva for your ally, with a roar in the midst of the Kurus. O son of Kunti, the time for that has now come.

10. What you have resolved to do, do all." Then do you speak to the eldest son of Kunti on my behalf.

11. "Ho, being a virtuous man, have you set your mind on a wrong course along with your brothers, and all the Somakas and the Kekayas.

12. Do you desire like an inhuman being to destroy the entire world, on the contrary in my opinion you should rather keep all living creatures in safety.

13. It is heard, O best among the Bharatas, that in days of old, Pralhada sang this sloka on his kingdom being wrested by the gods. May you fare well.

14. He, whose standard of righteousness is ever flying in the air like the standard of the gods and whose wicked deeds are concealed, is said to be of the ways of life adopted by the cat.

15. I shall now tell you in this connection an excellent story repeated to my father by Narada, O ruler of men.

16. A cat, wicked-souled and disinclined to action, once on a time went to the banks of the Ganga and stayed there with his arms upraised. He, having set his heart on holy devotion, to inspire confidence in animals, said to all living beings "I shall practise virtue."

17. In course of time birds had much confidence in him and having assembled together they began to praise the cat, O lord of the universe.

18. That eater of birds, having been thus honoured by those feathery creatures, considered his object accomplished and the result of his devotions achieved.

19. After a long time some mice came there and saw him practising virtue and ascetic austerities

20. And ever employed in a great deed with pride. Being sure of this fact, they came to cherish this desire, O king.

21. "We have many enemies; therefore let this one be our maternal uncle and let him therefore protect always all of us, old and young.

22. And they having all approached the cat said this:—"Through your grace we desire to roam about happily.

23. You are our refuge, you are our best friend; all of us therefore place ourselves under your protection.

24. You are ever virtuously inclined—you are ever adopting a pious course; therefore do you, O you of great wisdom, protect us as the wielder of the thunder-bolt protects the gods."

25. Being thus spoken to by all those mice, O lord of the universe, that destroyer of mice then spoke in reply to those mice.

26. "The connection between the two I do not see namely—my austerities and my protecting you, but of course I must act as you ask me for your good.

27. But my words too ought to be always listened to by you. I am weakened by devotion but yet attached to it by firm resolve.

28. I have not the slightest power to move, I now see on reflection; therefore should I be taken every day hence to the river side by you, my dear friends."

29. The mice too saying "very well", O best among the race of Bharatas, placed every one of themselves, old and young, under the protection of the cat.

30. Then did that wicked-souled wretch began to feed on mice and grow fat and in vigour of body.

31. The members of mice began to diminish quickly and the cat too began to grow up endued with strength and energy.

32. Then did those rats, meeting together, said to one another "Our maternal uncle is growing up day by day but we are being speedily reduced in numbers."

33. Then the wisest among the mice, one named Dindika said these words in the assembly of the rats, O king.

34. "You go to the river side together (in advance); after you, I shall go in company with our maternal uncle."

35. These words were applauded by them with the exclamation "well said" "well said" and they acted according to the suggestion of Dindika, which was consistent with reason.

36. Owing to ignorance (of the plan) the cat ate up Dindika that day; then did they united together hold a consultation shortly after. One of the oldest mice named Kilika,

37. Said this words, O king, amongst the members of his race which was indeed the truth. "The desire of our maternal uncle is not to earn virtue—it is only a disguise.

38. The evacuation of animals eating roots and fruits, cannot have hairs in it; his body is growing fatter while we are decreasing in numbers.

39. For these seven and eight days moreover Dindika too is not seen." Hearing this all the mice ran away.

40. The wicked-souled cat too went away where he came from. In the same way are you also, O you of wicked heart, adopting the policy of the cat.

41. You behave to your kinsmen always as the cat behaved to the mice; your words mean one thing while your acts are seen to be quite different,

42. For a display before the world your knowledge of the Vedas, and the harmlessness of your nature; leaving aside this disguise and adopting the life of a Kshatriya,

43. Do all these acts, and then will you be called a righteous man, O best among the men; O best among the Bharatas, having won this earth by the prowess of your arms,

44. Make gifts to the twice-born and due offerings to your forefathers. Seeking the welfare of your mother—that mother who has undergone much trouble for a series of years,

45. Dry up her tears by becoming victorious in battle and conferring exalted honours on her. Five villages only were asked for by you humbly and that even was refused by us,

46. With the thought how can we engage in fight, how can we inspire anger into the sons of Pandu. It was on account of your doing that we cast off the wicked Vidura.

47. Remembering the attempt to burn you up in a house of powdered lac be a man (and fight) as you said to Krishna when he was coming to the assembly of the Kurus.

48. I remain here, O king, ready for peace or for war; remember that the time for that fight is now come, O ruler of men.

49. All this has been made ready by me in view of that, O Yudhishthira. What does a Kshatriya consider to be a greater gain than war?

50. You are born in a Kshatriya race and are known in this world.

51. Having learnt the use of weapons from Drona and from Kripa, O best among Bharatas, you yet seek the protection of Vasudeva, of equal birth and equal strength.

52. You should also say to Vasudeva in the hearing of the son of Pandu. 'For your own sake, and for the sake of Pandavas fight with me with all your power.

53. The form in which you showed yourself in the midst of the assembly by the help of illusion, assuming again, come against me along with Arjuna.

54. Illusion is sometimes frightful but it only inspires rage in him who has taken up arms and is ready for battle.

55. Who can venture to go to heaven and to the sky by the help of illusion and can enter even Rasatala and even the capital of Indra ?

56. In this body of mine I can show many forms but it is not by inspiring fight that a man becomes successful.

57. By the force of the mind alone, does the Creator bring all creatures under his control. you too, O scion of the Vrishni race, said at the time, namely

58. That, killing in battle the son of Dhritarastra I shall bestow an excellent kingdom on the sons of Pritha—Sanjaya informed me of everything that you said—

57. "You declare war with Savyasachin having me for his second." Now being firmly devoted to truth, and for the sake of the Pandavas,

60. Fight with all your might and be a man—and we shall see. That man, who knowing the might of his enemy acts, at the dictates of manliness,

61. And brings grief on his enemies, lives indeed a good life. For no reason, O Krishna, are you considered to be of great renown in this world and now they will know that many are the oxen who are impotent though they have horns.

62. A ruler of man like myself should never fight with you being clad in a coat of mail—you who are the slave of Kansa.

63. To that stupid and dull-headed boy (in wisdom) that voracious eater, that ignorant man,

64. O Uluka, say on my behalf,—to that vicious wight Bhimasena : 'O son of Pritha, in the city of Virata were you before a cook,

65. Known by the name of Ballava and that was all on account of my manliness. Be not false to the resolve you made in the midst of the council in olden times.

66. Drink the blood of Dushasana, if you can. O son of Kunti, what you said namely, that in battle, the sons of Dhritarastra,

67. I shall soon slay, the time for that is now come. You can indeed be rewarded in matters of dishes—both meats and drinks.

68. Great however is the difference between dishes and war. Come, now, fight and be a man. You will be down on the field killed, embracing your mace, O Bharata.

69. The boast you indulged in at that assembly is false, O Vrikodara.' O Uluka, on my behalf do you also speak to Nakula.

70. "Fight now with patience and I shall see your manliness. I shall see too how great is your esteem for Yudhisthira and contempt for myself.

71. Remember now the troubles experienced by Krishna." Speak also on my behalf to Sahadeva in the midst of kings these words.

72—73. "War having now been proclaimed, fight with all your might, O son of Pandu, and remember your troubles." Say also on my behalf to Drupada and Virata : "you are fools for you are not content to have me as your master but on the contrary you have gladly been the slaves of Yudhisthira. This king deserves no praise—probably with this thought do you now come to fight with us.

74. Therefore do you, united together, fight with me to gain your own ends and that of the Pandavas and to bring on my death."

75. Speak to Dhritadyumna, prince of Panchala, on my behalf :—"now is the time for you and you will now meet with death.

76. Coming face to face with Drona in battle shall you know which is good for you. Do you fight for the sake of your well wishers and accomplish a deed hard to do." O Uluka, speak on my behalf thus to Shikhandin ; "the son of Kuru having long arms does not slay you for he holds you to be a woman.

77. That son of Ganga, that foremost among bow men, will not kill you therefore ; do you fight without fear ; fight with all your might, I will see your manliness."

78. Saying this the king laughing aloud said to Uluka : "Speak again to Dhananjaya in the hearing of Vasudava.

79. Either having defeated us you rule over this universe or being yourselves defeated by us sleep the sleep of heroes.

80. Remembering, O son of Pandu, the pain of being exiled from your kingdom and of your residence in the forest and the trouble endured by Krishna, be a man.

81. All the objects for which a Kshatriya lady brings forth a son are now come—strength, prowess, heroism and skilfulness in the use of weapon,

82. And manliness—showing these, in battle, appease your rage. Persecuted, dispirited and exiled for a long time,

83. And deprived of wealth, who is there whose heart would not break. Who is there who being born in a good family, being himself a lord, and not coveting the wealth of others, would not be excited with anger having lost a kingdom which is his by the rights of succession.

84. Let the tall talks that you have made be realized in deeds; he is known to be a worthless man who having indulged in boasts does not realize them in deeds.

85.—86. Recover this kingdom and these territories which are now in the possession of enemies—these are indeed the two objects of war; therefore display your prowess.

87. In a game at dice have you been defeated and Krishna was dragged into the council. Wrath should therefore be displayed by one who thinks himself a man in such circumstances.

88. For twelve years have you been exiled from your home into the woods, and for a whole year have you lived as a slave under Virata.

89. Remembering therefore the trouble of being exiled from the kingdom, the residence in the forest and the sufferings of Krishna, be a man.

90. Show your wrath to them who on the eve of your exile again and again used harsh words to you, for wrath is manliness.

91. Wrath, strength, prowess, knowledge, application and quickness in the handling of weapons—show these now and fight, O son of Pritha, and act like a man.

92. The deities, presiding over each weapon, have now been invoked. Kurushetra is now free from mud, your horses are fat and sleek, your soldiers have been paid their dues, therefore do you fight, along with Keshava to-morrow.

93. Without encountering Bhishma in battle why do you boast? Like that fool who used to boast without ever ascending the Gandhamadana mountain,

94. You too boast in the same way; O son of Kunti, show forth your manliness without boasting. The son of a Suta, excited with great wrath, and that foremost among persons endued with strength namely Shalya,

95. And Drona that foremost among men gifted with strength, who all in battle are equal to the Lord of Sachi himself—without defeating in battle all these, how do you desire the kingdom, O son of Pritha?

96. The one, who is the preceptor in the science of bowmanship as also in the Vedas he who has thoroughly studied these two, he that is foremost in battle and who can never be separated from his army,

97. O son of Pritha, the desire you entertain of vanquishing in battle that Drona, is vain; I never heard that the Meru mountain was ever moved by the wind.

98. But even the wind may move the Meru mountain, the heaven may fall over the earth, the periods now reigning may change, if what you have told me ever happens.

99. Who is there, the son of Pritha or any body else, who, having fought with this grinder of foes, would return home with life and in health,

100. Who is there touching this earth with his foot who, after an encounter with these two and having his body brought in contact with the fierce arrows, would leave the field of battle alive?

101. Why do you, like a frog living in a well, not understand the might of this vast army of assembled monarchs which is hard to be vanquished and which, shining as a celestial army, is protected by kings as heaven itself by the gods?

102. Protected by the kings of the East, West, South, and North, of the Kambhojas, the Shakas, the Khashas, the Shalwas along with the Matsyas, the Kurus of the middle countries, the Mlechhas, the Pulindas, the Dravidas, the Andhras, and the Kanchis,

103. Why do you wish to fight, O fool of little understanding, with me in the midst of this army of elephants—this army composed of various races and which in battle is as incapable of being crossed over as the waves of the Ganga.

104. I know that your quivers are never exhausted of their contents. I know your chariot given to you by Agni. I know you, O son of Pritha, in battle and I know your celestial banners, O Bharata.

105. Fight and do not boast; why do you, O Arjuna, boast so much? One wins a battle by his method of fighting and he does not win it in consequence of boasts.

106. If, O Dhananjaya, people in the world were to succeed owing to boasting then all would have their objects gained for who would be slow to boast.

107. I know that Vasudeva is your ally, I know your Gandiva bow which is six cubits long. I know that there is no warrior equal to you, and knowing all this I deprive you of your kingdom.

108. Man does not obtain success in his desires simply as a matter of course—By mere will force does the Creator make unfavourable circumstances turn into favourable ones and get them under control.

109. The kingdom has been enjoyed by me for thirteen years while you were weeping; and again shall I rule over it after slaying yourself along with your friends.

110. Where was your Gandiva bow when you were defeated at a game of dice and made a slave? And where again was the strength of Bhimasena, O Falguna?

111. Without the help of that praiseworthy Krishna you would not have been liberated at the time, though you had the help of Bhimasena with his mace and Falguna with his Gandiva.

112. She, the daughter of Prishata race, liberated you who had come by the condition of a slave, and were engaged in offices becoming only of the low and in working as slaves.

113. What, I said then of you, namely, that you were like the seed of the sessame without the kernel, was indeed true for did not the son of Pritha (Arjuna) bear long hair when in the city of Virata?

114. The feelings of weariness, which O son of Kunti, were felt by Bhimasena in the palace of Virata, while engaged in the duties of a cook, are a proof of my manliness.

115. Wearing the disguise of an eunuch, and wearing long hair and with hips and waist bands were you engaged in teaching a girl dancing. Such is the punishment which Kshatriys award to a Kshatriya who flies from battle.

116. Nor from fear of Vasudeva, nor from fear of you, O Falguna, shall I give you back the kingdom—therefore do you fight along with Keshava.

117. Neither deception, nor illusion, nor the trick of a conjurer is frightful to one who has taken up arms for fight—these only tend to excite his anger.

118. A thousand Vasudevas, a hundred of Falgunas, having confronted me whose arms are never struck in vain, will fly away in all directions.

119. Go to fight with Bhishma, or rend assunder the mountain by your head or with the help only of your two arms cross the sea of vast expanse,

120. The sea having the son of Sharda-wata as the great fish, Vivinsati as the great serpent, Bhishma as current of immeasurable might, Drona as its invincible crocodile,

121. Karna and Shalya as its small fish and whirl pools, Kamboja, the one sending out flames from his mouth Vrihadvala, the great waves and the son of Somadatta, the Timi fishes,

122. Yuyutsu and Bhagadatta as its gale, Srutayas and the son of Hridika its gulfs and bay, Dussashana its waves, Susena and Chitrayudha its sea elephants and crocodiles,

123. Jayadratha its hidden rocks, Purumitra its depth, Shakuni its water falls. When descending into the sea having inexhaustible weapons as its waves you will feel weary and be rendered senseless, then will your mind feel repentance.

124. Then, O son of Pritha, will your mind be turned from the thought of ruling over the earth like one who has lived a life of infamy giving up all hopes of heaven. To win a kingdom for you is as difficult as to obtain heaven for a man who has never practised devotion.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixtieth chapter, the instruction of Duryodhana to Uluka in Ulukadutagamana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXLI.

(ULUKADUTAGAMANA PARVA)—

Condt.

Sanjaya said :—

1. The son, of the one proficient in the in the game of dice, having reached the encampment of the Pandavas, said to Yudhishthira who was seated with the other sons of Pandu.

2. "You very well know the nature of the words of envoys; therefore it is not proper that you should be angry with me who will only speak what Duryodhana has instructed me."

Yudhishthira said :—

3. O Uluka, you need have no fear; speak out without any fear of trouble, what opinion is held by the son of Dhritarastra, actuated by avarice and having little foresight."

4. Then in the midst of those men of effulgence—those great-souled sons of Pandu and the Srinjayas and the Matsyas and also the renowned Krishna,

5. And also of Drupada with his son and in the presence of Virata also and in the midst of those rulers of the earth he uttered these words.

Uluka said :—

6. The royal son of Dhritarastra, endued with a large mind, said this to you in the hearing of the Kuru heroes; listen to them O Yudhisthira.

7. You had been defeated at a game of dice, and Krishna had been dragged into the council—a man, who thinks himself to be a male, would be justified under these circumstances to show his wrath.

8. Same as sloka 88 of last chapter.

9. Same as sloka 80, .....

10. O son of Pandu, now let what had been said by Bhimasena namely that he would drink the blood of Dusasana—be made good by him, if he can.

N.B.—The slokas 11—22 are the same as 92—103 of the last chapter.

23. Saying this to the king Yudhisthira the son of Dharma Uluka again turned to the one accustomed to victories and said to him.

24—33. Same as 105—114.

34—38. Same as 116—116.

39. With the son of Sharadwata as the great fish, Brihavrala as the great crocodile and the son of Somadatta as the Timi fish.

40. With Bhishma as the current which cannot be crossed, with Drona as the alligator which cannot be approached with Karna and Shalya, as a swarm of small fishes, and Kamboja as the mouth giving out flames.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty first chapter, the speech of Uluka, in the Ulukadutagamana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXII.

(ULUKADUTAGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. Uluka thus repeated before the angry Arjuna the words he had been instructed to say, provoking him still further with those arrows of words as one would provoke a serpent.

2. Hearing these words of his the sons of Pandu were very angry :—indeed they had already been angry before and their anger was only increased by the gamblers son.

3. They all rose up from their seats and threw up their arms, and they began to look on one another like angry snakes.

4. With his mouth speechless, Bhimasena looked on Keshava with his two eyes red and breathing like a serpent.

5. Seeing the son of wind to be very much troubled and overpowered by wrath, the scion of the Dasharha race laughingly said to that gambler's son in reply,

6. "Go back speedily, O son of a gambler, and tell Suyodhana that his words have been heard and their meaning understood. Let it be as he says."

7. Keshava of long arms having said this, O best among kings, again cast his eyes on Yudhisthira endued with great wisdom.

8. Then in the presence of all the Srinjayas, and the renowned Krishna and Drupada with his son and Virata,

9. And of all those rulers of the earth did Uluka speak forth the same words again to Arjuna.

10. Provoking, still further by his arrows of words, him who was already as angry as a snake, he also spoke the words he had been instructed to tell Krishna and others

11. Hearing these harsh and sinful words uttered by Uluka the son of Pritha was very much excited and began to wipe the sweats of his fore head.

12. That assembly, O ruler of men, those mighty car-warriors of the Pandavas, seeing the son of Pritha, in that condition, could not bear it, O great king.

13. Hearing of that insult offered to Krishna and the great-souled son of Pritha those foremost among men, blazed up though they never swerved from the right path, literally with wrath.

14. Dhrishtadyumna, Shikhandin and the great car-warrior Satyaki, and the five Kekaya brothers and the Ghatotkcha the Rakshasha,

15. The sons of Draupadi, and Abhimanyu, and the ruler of the earth Dhristaketu and Bhimasena and the great and powerful car-warriors the twins,

16. All rose up from their seats with their eyes red on account of anger and moving their handsome arms decked with red sandal paste, up and down,

17. The arms which were ornamented with Angadas, Pareharyyas and Keyuras. Then grinding his teeth and licking the corner of his mouth,

18. Vrikodara, the son of Kunti, familiar with the meaning of those gestures, rose up with a big jump, like one burning with wrath.

19. And suddenly raising his eyes and making a gnashing sound with his teeth and rubbing his hands together he said to Uluka these words.

20. "Your words, O fool, have been heard by us—the words that Duryodhana told you with a view to rouse us to action, as if we were weak and inactive. Hear now the words, O fool, which I have to say to that inaccessible one.
21. Repeat this before Suyodhana in the midst of all the Kshatriyas—in the hearing of that son of a Suta, as also of that wicked-souled Shakuni.
22. Owing to our ever being desirous of what is agreeable to an elder brother we have tolerated you so long, O you of sinful habits. Do you not think that as too much (kindness) for you ?
23. Hrishiksha too was sent to the Kurus, by the virtuous king endued with wisdom, desirous of making peace with them which was due to the desire of doing good to this race.
24. Being however urged by fate, you are now desirous of going to the eternal Yama ; come and fight with us and an encounter shall certainly take place to-morrow.
25. By me has been vowed your death and that of your brothers and it will be certainly so, O wicked one. You need not entertain any doubt about it.
26. The ocean, the abode of Varuna, can transgress its banks just now, the mountains may split, but what has been spoken by me can never be false.
27. If even Yama, or Kuvera, or even Rudra is your ally, the Pandavas, will do as they have vowed, O you of exceedingly little sense.
28. I shall be the drinker of the blood of Dussashana even as I wished and whoever among the Kshatriyas comes near me angrily, will go the kingdom of Yama.
26. The words that had been spoken by me in the assembly of the Kshatriyas will certainly be true—I swear by my soul.
30. Hearing the words of Bhimasena Sahadeva too became excited with wrath and with eyes red with anger said these words,
31. Which were worthy of one who considered himself a hero : " Listen, O wicked one, to my words which must be spoken to your father by yourself.
32. There would never have been a dispute between ourselves and the Kurus if there had been no connection between Dhritarashtra and yourself.
33. You, O inimical man, are born for the purpose of destroying the world and the race of Dhritarashtra. O wicked one, you are the slayer of your race.
34. Ever since our birth, your father that sinful man, has ever been desirous of doing harm to us and behaving inhumanly.
35. I however shall cross over to the other side of that sea of malice. First slaying yourself within the very sight of Shakuni,
36. I shall then slay Shakuni himself in the sight of all bow men." Hearing the words of both Bhima and Sahadeva,
37. Falguna said these words to Bhimasena laughingly "O Bhimasena, those who have made themselves enemies of yours will cease to exist.
38. They must come under the influence of the noose of death, though the fools may now be living at their house with a sense of security. Uluka ought not to be spoken to harshly by you, O best among men.
39. What fault can an envoy commit ; they only repeat what they have been instructed to say". Saying this to Bhima of frightful prowess and of long arms,
40. He said to his friends, the heroes with Dhrishtadyumna at their head : "The language of that wicked son of Dhritarashtra has been listened to by you,
41. Foul words used to-wards myself and Vasudeva ; hearing that you have been excited with anger, owing to your desire of doing good to ourselves.
42. Owing to the grace of Vasudeva and the help afforded by yourselves, I do not even care for the entire body of the Kshatriyas of the earth.
43. With your leave now, I shall now give, Uluka, the suitable reply to those words which he is to repeat before Suyodhana.
44. Tomorrow I shall, at the head of my army, give a suitable reply to these words by means of the Gandiva. Eunuchs only resort to words for replies."
45. Then did all those rulers of the earth praise Dhananjaya and those best among kings were struck with wonder at his ready commanding words.
46. The virtuous king (Yudhisthira) then having spoken with humility to all those according to their rank and age said these words.
47. " No good ruler of the earth should bear an insult on himself ; having so long been employed in hearing what you had to say, I shall now speak out my reply."
48. Then did that foremost among the race of Bharatas, hearing the words of Duryodhana, say these words to Uluka which were mild, yet frank.

49. With eyes exceedingly red and breathing like a serpent, brusting with rage and licking the corners of his mouth,

50. He said these words to that gambler's son looking on Janardana and on his brothers, and tossing his large arms.

51. "O Uluka, O gambler's son, go, my dear fellow, and say to Suyodhana that ungrateful one, hostile to ourselves, of wicked soul and a stain on his family.

52. "O wicked one, you ever adopt a crooked behaviour towards the Pandavas. O sinful man, that man, who relying on his own prowess, summons forth his enemy to battle,

53. And without any fear fulfils his words, is indeed a Kshatriya. That wretched man, that worst of his race, however being a Kshatriya and challenging us to battle is coming to fight with us under the leadership of those whom we respect.

54. Relying on your own prowess and on the prowess of those paid by you, challenge the sons of Pritha to fight and be a Kshatriya in every way.

55. He, who challenges to fight his enemies, relying on the prowess of others, is incapable of taking the burnt of the action on himself and this is the sign of a eunuch.

56. Since you think yourself too much being helped by the prowess of others, why do you roar so much at us being yourself weak."

Krishna said :—

57. My words too should be spoken by you to Duryodhana: "First come by the morrow and be a man, O you of sinful intellect.

58. O fool, you think that Janardana will not fight being selected only as a charioteer by the sons of Pritha and so you are not afraid.

59. But this will not be, even if the world is come, and out of anger I shall burn up the entire world like fire consuming straw.

60. By the request of Yudhisthira and of the great souled Falguna I shall act as the charioteer, while that restrainer of self will be fighting.

61. If you go beyond the three worlds—even if you enter the nether regions of the earth—you will see the chariot of Arjuna there on the morrow.

62. You also think that Bhimasena has indulged in idle boasts but you can consider that the blood of Dussasana has already been drunk.

63. Neither the does son of Pritha (Arjuna) nor the king Yudhisthira, nor does Bhimasena, nor do the twins think much of you, though you may talk ever so much.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty second chapter, the speech of Krishna and others in the Ulukadatagmana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXIII.

(ULUKADUTAGAMANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. That foremost of the Bharata race, hearing those words of Duryodhana, looked on that son of a gambler with eyes excessively red.

2. Gudakesha, of great renown, looking on Keshava, said to the gambler's son tossing up his mighty arms.

3. "He, who, relying on his own prowess challenges his enemies to fight and fights with them without being struck with fear, is said to be a man.

4. But he, who challenges his enemies relying on the prowess of others, is the lowest among the Kshatriyas and owing to his weakness he is called the lowest of men.

5. You too think the prowess of others to be your own prowess; being yourself a coward, O fool, you want to have others slain.

6. You now boast, having installed as your leader the oldest of all kings, whose intelligence is directed to the good of others, who has brought his senses under control and who is endued with great wisdom and has made his death certain.

7. O you of wicked intelligence, O you the stain of your race, your intention is known by us. (You thought) the son of Pandu, would, out of kindness, not slay the son of Ganga,

8. Him depending on whose strength you are now boasting. I shall first slay that Bhishma within the sight of all bow men.

9. O gambler's son, going to the Bharatas, and going near the son of Dhritarashtra say that Arjuna or Savyasachin has said "Be it so; on the down of the day there will be war."

10. The one of unfailing prowess (Bhishma) said among those men leading noble lives and delighting the Kurus namely "that I shall slay the army of the Srinjayas and the army of Shalwa; that is my task."

11. O gambler's son going to the assembled Bharatas, say to Suyodhana the son of Dhritarashtra, "(Bhishma also said) I shall also slay the entire world except Drona" and therefore are you not afraid of the Pandavas. Therefore do you consider this kingdom already gained and that the sons of Pandu are in a calamity?

12. Being filled with that proud thought you will however see ruin overtake yourself and I shall first slay you in the army in the presence of the oldest among the Kurus.

13. At sun rise, at the head of your army attend with your chariot and your flags on, that one devoted to truth and protect him. I shall within your sight by my arrows fell down from the chariot Bhishma, your refuge,

14. When the morrow comes Suyodhana will know what it is to boast of seeing the grandfather felled down by my shower of arrows.

15—16. What your brother Dusasana, that man of little foresight, who does not know what virtue is, who is ever hostile to me, who is of sinful intellect and inhuman, has been told by the angry Bhimasena—you will soon see that resolve fulfilled, O Suyodhana.

17. Of too much pride, vanity and of anger and harsh words, of enmity, arrogance and boasts,

18. Of inhumanity, of cutting speeches, of hating virtue, of vice, of speaking ill of others, and of acting against the advice of the old,

19. Of partial opinions and of all vices united together, you shall soon see the sharp effects, O suyodhana.

20. Having Vasudeva for my second and myself being angry, O worst of men, who are you that have hopes of life and of getting the kingdom, O fool.

21. Bhishma, the son of Santanu, and Drona and the son of a Suta being felled down, you will despair of your life, of the kingdom and of the life of your sons.

22. Hearing of the death of your brother and of your son, O Suyodhana, and being struck by Bhimasena you will remember your vices.

23. O gambler's son, I do not know how to make a second resolve. I tell you the truth—all this will truly happen."

24. Yudhishthira too said to Uluka the gambler's son—"Uluka, tell my words when you go to Suyodhana."

25. "It is not proper that you should judge of my conduct to you by your own conduct; know that the difference between us two is the same as the difference between truth and falsehood.

26. I do not desire to harm even the worms and ants; how can I then by any means desire the massacre of my kinsmen?

27. It was for this reason, my dear brothers, that I asked for five villages only before; why is it that you do not realize this great calamity, O you of exceedingly sinful understanding?

28. Having your soul now overpowered by lust and out of folly you are now boasting and for the same reason you do not accept the beneficial words of Vasudeva.

29. What is the use of much speaking now? Fight with all your friends" O gambler's son, speak this to the Kuru, who ever does what I do not like.

30. "Your words have been heard by us and their sense accepted; let it be as you wish." Then did Bhimasena, that son of a king, again say "O Uluka, tell my words to that wicked man of sinful intellect,

31. To that vicious wretch of sinful habits, Suyodhana; "you will have to remain in the belly of a vulture or in the city called by the name of an elephant. And the resolve made by me in the council,

32. I shall make true—I swear by truth. Having slain Dussasana, I shall drink his blood in the battale.

33. I shall break down your thighs after slaying your brothers. I am the death, O Suyodhana, of all the sons of Dhritarashtra.

34. And Abhimanyu is without doubt the death of all the princes. I shall satisfy you by my deeds. Hear again my words.

35. Slaying yourself, O Suyodhana, with all your brothers, I shall strike you on the head with my feet in the sight of the virtuous king."

36. Nakula also, O lord of the earth, then said these words; "O Uluka, O Kauravya, say to Suyodhana, the son of Dhritarashtra,

37. "The words uttered by you have all been heard by me, let them be so; I shall, O Kauravya, do what you have instructed me to do."

38. Sahadeva too, O ruler of men, said these words pregnant with meaning. "O Suyodhana, the hopes entertained by you will be vain.

39. You will grieve, O great king, along with your sons, kinsmen and friends, for this brag of yours at our troubles."

40. The two old kings Virata and Drupada said this to Uluka:—"We are ever willing to be the slaves of a good man and we shall see who is the slave and who the master and who is now powerful in the battle."

41. Shikhandin then said these words to Uluka: "By you should the king ever addicted to vice be thus spoken."

42. Behold me, O king, to be doing hard deeds in the battle. Depending on whose prowess you hope for victory in the battle,

43. I shall fell down that grand father of yours from the chariot. I was surely created by the great souled Creator for the slaying of Bhishma.

44. Therefore shall I slay Bhishma within the sight of all bowmen." Dhristadyumna said this to Uluka, the son of a gambler.

45. Suyodhana, the son of the king should thus be spoken to, on my behalf. "I shall kill Drona along with his host and his friends.

46. The work of which I shall be the doer no one else will do." Then did the virtuous king say the noble words out of kindness to him,

47. "O king, I never desire the massacre of my kinsmen and all this is going to happen owing to your fault.

48. Of course, I shall have to approve of the doings of these followers. Therefore do you go without delay, O Uluka, if you wish it,

49. Or remain here,—may you farewell for we are your kinsmen too." Then Uluka taking leave of Yudhishthira, the son of Dharma, O king,

50. Went where the king Suyodhana was staying. Uluka then coming to the wrathful Duryodhana,

51. Told him all he had been instructed to say by Arjuna as also the manly speeches of Vasudeva, of Bhima and of the virtuous king,

52. And of Nakula, Virata, and Drupada, O Bharata and the speeches of Dhristadyumna and Shikhandi,

53. And the speeches of Keshava and Arjuna—all as he had been instructed to say. The foremost of the Bharata race hearing the words of that gambler's son,

54. Commanded Dussasana, Karna, Sakuni, O Bharata, and his own army as also those of his allies,

55. So that all might be at the head of their respective divisions before sun rise.

Then did messengers instructed by Karna, mount on cars speedily.

56. And others on camels, and others again on good horses went out and ordered the united army at Karna's behest to be ready for battle before sunrise.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixtythird chapter the return of Uluka in the Ulukadutagamana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXIV.

(ULUKADUTAGAMANA PARVA.)

—Continued.

Sanjaya said:—

1. Yudhishthira, the son of Kunti, hearing the words of Uluka, began to move his army at the head of which was Dhristadyumna.

2. That fierce army, immoveable as the earth itself, had all the four divisions, namely foot soldiers, elephants, chariots and horses.

3. The army was protected by men of terrific strength and by the great car-warriors including Arjuna; and under the leadership of Dhristadyumna it was still as the sea.

4. In the van of it were the great bowman, the prince of Panchala, hard to vanquish in battle and Dhristadyumna desirous of an encounter with Drona, attributing particular tasks to each warrior.

5. He gave instructions to car-warriors each according to his strength and energy; and he appointed Arjuna to fight with the son of a Suta, Bhima with Duryodhana,

6. Dhristaketu with Shalya, Uttamanyns with the son of Gautama, Nakula with Aswathama, Saivya with Kritavarman,

7. And he appointed Yuyudhana of the Vrishni race to fight with the king of the Sindhus and also appointed Shikhandin to be in the front for fighting with Bhishma.

8. He also appointed Sahadeva to fight with Shakuni, Chekitana with Shala, and the five sons of Draupadi with the Trigartas,

9. The son of Subhadra with Brishasena and the rest of the rulers of the earth for he regarded him (Abhimanya) as even superior to Arjuna himself in battle.

10. Having thus allotted among those warriors sparately and collectively their respective tasks, that warrior, of the hue of fire, kept Drona for his own share,

11. The great bowman, Dhṛishtadyumna, the general of the commander of the army, endued with intelligence, having prepared his troops, duly waited patiently for the battle.

12. Having arranged the army of the Pandavas as indicated above, he waited calmly on the field of battle for the sake of victory to the sons of Pandu.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty fourth chapter, the appointment of commanders in the Ulukaduta-gamana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXV.

(THE RATHA TIRATHA SANKHYANA PARVA.)

Dhritarashtra said :—

1. The slaying of Bhishma having been promised by Fulguna in battle, what did my foolish sons, Duryodhana and others do?

2. I already see my father, the son of Ganga, slain in battle by the son of Pritha who has a firm grasp on his bow, having Vasudeva for his help-mate.

3. What also did, that great bowman Bhishma, that foremost among strikers, endued with unlimited wisdom, say after he had heard what the son of Pritha had said?

4. What did that oldest and foremost of the Kauravas, the son of Ganga, of great intelligence and prowess, do after obtaining the generalship?

Vaishampayana said :—

5. Sanjaya then submitted to him every thing as it had happened—what had been said by that oldest among the Kurus, Bhishma of immeasurable energy.

Sanjaya said :—

6. Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, having obtained the generalship, said these words to Duryodhana infusing cheerfulness in him.

7. "Having bowed down to Kumara, the god of war, who has a lance in his hand, I shall to-day be your general—no doubt.

8. I am experienced in all matters relating to the army and in diverse artifices and in making the paid soldiers and unpaid ones (volunteers) do their own work.

9. In the matter of marching out troops in fighting and in declaring war I am as much an adept, O great king, as Vrihashpati himself.

10. I am also conversant with the plans of attack and defence, adopted by gods, Gandharvas and human beings, and by means of them I shall deprive the sons of Pandu of their senses. Let your fears be gone.

11. I, who am so, shall fight observing the usual rules and protecting your army according to plans laid down in the holy books. Let your mind's fear be gone."

Duryodhana said :—

12. No fear exists in me, O son of Ganga, from even the gods and Asuras united together, O you of long arms, I tell you this truly

13. How much less reasons have I for fear when I have you as the commander of my armies and that foremost among men, Drona, who takes delight in war, being on my side.

14. You, the best among men, being on my side, victory will be mine and O foremost among the Kurus, kingship over the gods is surely not hard to get.

15. I desire to hear, O Kaurava, of the number of Rathis (car) warriors capable of fighting with a certain number of each of the four divisions together) and also the number of Atirathas (greater warrior than a Rathi) in our own army and in that of the enemies.

16. Our grandfather is familiar with ourselves as also with our enemies and I desire to hear all about it, along with these rulers of the earth.

Bhishma said :—

17. O son of Gandhari, listen to the numbers of Rathi, O chief among kings, in your own army—hear O ruler of the earth, who are the Rathis and who the Atirathis.

18. There are thousands and tens of thousands and millions of Rathis in your army; listen to me, as I speak of them.

19. You, along with all your brothers Dusasana and others, are the foremost among car-warriors.

20. All of you are experienced in striking, cutting and piercing, and whether riding on chariots, or on the elephants you are experienced in the use of the mace, the swords and the shields.

21. You are also skilful drivers of elephants and chariots, you have mastered the science of weapons, and in the science of arrows you are the pupils of Drona and Kripa, the son of Sharadwata.

22. These will slay in battle the princes of Panchala, hard to be vanquished in battle, for the sons of Dhritarashtra, endued with intelligence, have been wronged by the Pandavas.

23. In the same way, I, O foremost among the Bharatas, the commander of all your armies, shall slay your enemies after making the prowess of the Pandavas vain and useless.

24. It is not proper for me to describe my own qualifications; it is all known to you. The foremost of wielders of weapons, the king of the Bhojas, Kritavarman is an Atiratha (mightier car-warrior).

25. He will make your object in fighting successful, no doubt for he is invincible among those familiar with the use of weapons and can hurl arms to a long distance and can hold firmly his weapons.

26. He will slay this army like the great Indra slaying the Danavas. In my opinion, the great bowman Shalya, the king of the Madras, is an Atiratha,

27. Who ever considers him an equal to Vasudeva in every battle; abandoning his own nephews (sister's sons) Shalya that Atiratha, has come over to your side.

28. These will fight in the battle with those great car warriors on the Pandavas' side covering the enemies with arrows as waves covering the ocean. Bhurishravas, that master in the use of weapons, is also your will wisher.

29. The son of Somadatta, that mighty bowman, is a leader of the commanders of car-warriors and he will effect a very great reduction in the strength of the enemy.

30. In my opinion, O great king, the king of the Sindhus is twice a car-warrior and that powerful and best among the car-warriors will fight in the battle, O king.

31. Persecuted by the Pandavas, O king, in his attempt to carry away Draupadi, that slayer of hostile heroes will fight remembering that trouble.

32. After that defeat, severe austerities were practised by him O king; he has obtained a boon, difficult to get, of fighting with the Pandavas in battle.

33. This foremost among the car-warriors, therefore, remembering all this in battle, will fight with the Pandavas, my dear son, even careless of life which is hard to lay down.

Thus end the one hundred and eighty fifth chapter, in the Rathatiratha Sankhyana of the Udyoga Parva,

CHAPTER CLXVI.

(RATHTHIRATHA SANKHYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. In my opinion Sudakshina, of Kamboja, is equal to one Ratha and he will fight in the battle with the enemy desiring the success of your objects.

2. The prowess of this best among car-warriors excited on your behalf, O best among kings, the Kurus in battle with see equal to that of Indra himself.

3. The best of car-warriors under him are strikers with fierce force. The Kambojas, O great king, will cover like the land like a swarm of locusts.

4. Nil of Mahismati clad in a blue coat of mail is a Ratha of your army and with the car-warriors under him he will work havoc among the enemy.

5. My child, in former days, he was made an enemy by Sahadeva; and he will ever fight on your behalf, O you delighter of the Kuru race.

6. In my opinion Vindu and Anuvindu, the princes of Avanti, accomplished in battle and of firm strength and prowess are two of the best Rathas.

7. These two best among men will consume the army of enemy with maces, bearded darts, swords, muskets and long shafts hurled from their hands.

8. Desirous of war they will act in battle each like Yama like two sporting elephants moving in the midst of a herd, O king.

9. In my opinion, the five Trigarta brothers are Rathas and they were made enemies by the sons of Pritha while in the city of Virata.

10. In the battle, they will agitate the army of the son of Pritha like Makaras agitating the Ganga swollen with its waves.

11. They are Rathas, O chief among kings, at whose head is Satyaratha and they will fight in the battle remembering the former wrongs.

12. They were injured by Bhima's younger brother Arjuna, the son of Pandu, O king, when on a car drawn by white steeds, O Bharata, he went out to conquer all the quarters.

13. Having encountered many car-warriors, chiefs of bowmen and leaders of Kshatriyas on the side of Parthas they will forsooth kill them.

14. Your son Lakshmana and the son of Dussasana—both these foremost amongst men can never fly back from the battle.

15. The two young and delicate princes are of light hand and know all the details of fighting and are in every way fit to be leaders.

16. These two, O foremost among the Kurus, I am of opinion, are Rathas, and the heroes attached as they are to the duties of the Kshatsrya will perform noble deeds.

17. That foremost among men, Dandadhara, O great king, is a Ratha and he will fight in your battle protected by his own army.

18. Vrihadvala, too, O king, the prince of the Shalyas, is one of the best among car-warriors and is a Ratha, in my opinion, of great impetousity and prowess.

19. He will fight in the battle delighting his own friends, a wielder of terrible weapons as he is and a mighty Bowman devoted to the good of the son of Dhritarashtra.

20. Kripa, the son of Sharadwata, O king, is the general of the commanders of the Rathas, and careless of his dear life he will consume your enemies.

21. The son of the great Rishi Gautama, or the preceptor Sharadwata, born on a clump of heath, is invincible as the war god Kartikeya himself.

22. Destroying this army strong in numbers and furnished with diverse weapons and bows he will roll in the battle like blazing fire.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty sixth chapter in the Rathatiratha Sankyana of the Udyoga Parva,

CHAPTER CLXVII.

(THE RATHATIRATHA SANKYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. This Shakuni, your maternal uncle, is equal to a single Ratha, O ruler of men; and having brought about hostility with the Pandavas he will fight—there is no doubt of it.

2. His army, when rushing to battle, is hard to vanquish; and furnished with plenty of weapons of all sorts they are of the velocity of the wind in battle.

3. That mighty Bowman, the son of Drona (Ashwathama) surpasses all bowmen and is familiar with diverse modes of warfare and is of firm weapons; he is a Maharatha.

4. The arrows, shot by him from his bow as by the wielder of the Gandiva bow, proceed touching one another.

5. This best among the Rathas, this hero cannot be described by me; if this Maharatha wishes he can burn up the three worlds.

6. He has accumulated wrath and energy by his austerities while living in the hermitage; and this one, endued with great intelligence, has been favoured by Drona with celestial weapons.

7. He has however a great draw back owing to which, O foremost of the Bharata race, I do not consider him as a Ratha or an Atiratha, O best among the rulers of the earth.

8. He is excessively fond of life and that regenerate young man is always desirous of living but there is no body similar to him in the armies of both the parties.

9. By means of a single chariot can he slay even the army of the gods; and by the flaps of his bowstring striking against the leather fence on his left arm, that one, possessed of a powerful body, can rend asunder the mountains.

10. The heroic smiter, of fierce effulgence, has many accomplishments and he will wander about like death himself with rod in hand.

11. Having the shoulders of a lion and endued with great effulgence he will, like the fire that rages at the end of Yuga, extinguish the embers of this battle between the Bharatas.

12. His father, endued with great energy, is better than young persons though he is himself old and he will be the doer of great deeds in battle—of this I have no doubt.

13. Resembling the fire having its source in the dry grass and fuel in the shape of your army and fanned by the force of our weapons, our soldiers will surely consume those on the side of the son of Pandu in battle.

14. This foremost among men, the son of Bharadwaja, is the leader of the groups of car-leaders and will be the doer of fierce deeds.

15. The aged preceptor, the spiritual guide of all those who have undergone the ceremony of investiture on the head, will put an end to all the Srinjayas but Dhananjaya is dear to him.

16. The great Bowman, remembering the blazing virtues acquired by the son of Pritha and his own relation towards him as a preceptor, will never be able to kill him who accomplishes things without exertion.

17. This one (Drona) ever prides himself on the many accomplishments of the son of Pritha, O hero, and the son of Bharadwaja looks on him with greater affection than on his own son.

18. With the assistance of a single car he can slay the gods, the Gandharvas and the human beings united together, with the aid of his heavenly weapons.

19. That foremost of king, Paurava, on your side, is a Maharatha, O king; such is my opinion; he is one of the foremost among car-warriors and will work havoc among the heroes on the enemies' side.

20. With his own large army afflicting the army of his enemies he will consume the Panchalas as the course of fire does the dry grass.

21. Satyasravas, that prince of great strength, is a Ratha on your side, O king and he will work havoc among the armies of the enemies like Death himself.

22. His soldiers, O chief among kings, clad in diverse kinds of armours and armed with diverse weapons, will roam about in the battle killing your enemies.

23. That great carwarrior, Vrishasena, the son of Karna, is one of the foremost of the car-warriors on your side; and that foremost among mighty persons will consume the army of your enemies.

24. Jalasandha, of great energy, is one of the foremost of the Rathas on your side. That scion of the race of Madhu, that slayer of hostile heroes, can even sacrifice his life in battle.

25. Conversant with the science of war, that one of long arms having the shoulders of an elephant will fight in battle scattering the hostile army, seated on a chariot.

26. The best among kings is a Ratha in my opinion, O great king, and for your sake he will sacrifice his life along with his army in this great battle.

27. This one is a mighty warrior and knows to fight according to diverse methods in battle; and O king, he will fight with your enemies casting fear aside.

28. Valhika, who never turns his back on the field of battle, is an Atiratha, O great king; such is my opinion and that hero is equal to the sun himself.

29. Having once reached the field, he will never turn back and he will slay the enemies in battle as continuously as the wind blows.

30. Stayavan, the leader of your armies, O great king, is a Maharatha. A car-warrior himself, he is the doer of wonders in battle and works havoc among the enemies' charioteers.

31. He will certainly not be pained at the sight of battle and he will inspire those of the enemy's soldiers who stand in the way of his chariot with wonder.

32. Showing his strength against his enemies—a thing which is the duty of every good man, this best among men will be the doer of great deeds in your favour.

33. Alambusha, that chief of the Rakshashas of hard deeds, is a Maharatha and O king, he will slay the enemies remembering the old enmity.

34. He is the best car-warrior among all the Rakshashas, and being endued with the powers of illusion he will roam about in the field like an inveterate enemy.

35. The hero Bhagadatta, the ruler of the Pragytisha, endued with fame, is one of the foremost among the wielders of the hook of the elephant and is also skilful in fighting from the chariot.

36. In days of the old there took place a fight between him and the holder of Gandiva, for a number of days, O king, each being desirous of victory over the other.

37. O son of Gandhari, then did he, who thinks Indra to be his friend, conclude peace with that great souled son of Pandu.

38. This one of shouldiers like those of elephants and skilful in battle will fight, O king, like Vasava on the back of the Airavata with the gods.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty seventh chapter, in the Rathatiratha Sankhyana in the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXVIII.

(THE RATATIRATHA SANKYANA PARVA)—Continued

Bhishma said:—

1. Achala and Vrishaka are two Rathas on your side who are hard to vanquish; both the brothers, united together, will destroy your enemies.

2. These two best among men are mighty, inveterate in their hatred, and smiters (of enemies); they are the foremost among the Gandharis, young, handsome and endued with great strength.

3. But this one who is ever your dear friend, who vaunts of bravery in battle and who encourages you, O king in your dispute with the Pandavas,

4. This man vain and mean, Karna, the son of Vikartana, who is your adviser, guide and friend, and who has been placed in too elevated a position by you,

5. This Karna is neither a Rathi nor an Atiratha in battle. Though ever generous he has been deprived of his celestial earrings. All this is owing to the curse of Rama (his preceptor) and the words of a Brahmana.

7. Owing to his being without his natural coat of mail he is only half a Ratha in my opinion; and having once come across Falguna he will not escape him with life.

8. Then did Drona, the foremost among all wielders of weapons, say as a rejoinder: "It is so; what you say is never false.

9. In each battle is he boastful and in each he is seen to be backward. Karna is kind and also becomes confounded; he is therefore in my opinion, equal to half a Ratha."

10. Hearing this, the son of Radha, expanding his eyes in wrath, said to Bhishma piercing him with his hook of words.

11. "O grandfather, at your pleasure, do you pierce me by your arrows of words; at every step do you thus treat me out of your aversion for me, though I have committed no sin.

12. I tolerate all his however for the sake of Duryodhana; you deem me to be behind others (in fight) and a coward.

13. In my opinion you too are only half a Ratha—there is no doubt about this. O son of Ganga, I do not speak an untruth when I say that you are an enemy of the entire universe.

14. You are ever devoted to what is to the injury of the Kurus, but the king knows it not. Who else is there who would seek to sap the energy of these kings that are equal and create discord among them,

15. As you desire to do owing to your hatred towards these that are endued with accomplishments. Neither age, nor wealth, nor friends,

16. Can entitle a Kshatriya to be included in the category of Maharathas, O Kaurava. It is well-known a Kshatriya is superior by virtue of his strength and that the twice-born are superior by virtue of their learning.

17. It is also well-known that Vaisyas are superior by virtue of their wealth and that Sudras are superiors by virtue of their years. Speak for yourself then, as you please, your list of Rathas and Atirathas.

18. Actuated by desire and hatred and acting from ignorance you have enumerated the heroes. O Duryodhana of long arms, it is for you to judge properly. May you fare well.

19. Abandon this wicked Bhishma of unrighteous nature for, O ruler of men, discord once being in your own army it will be difficult to bring union again.

20. This remark applies to your main army, judge then about the subsidiary forces which have been raised from several sources.

21. This discord has entered among our warriors, already, O Bharata; in our very presence he saps our energies.

22. How vast is the difference between the task of estimating the might of Rathas and Bhishma of little intellect. I will meet the armies of the Pandavas.

23. Standing against me who are infallible they will be routed in ten directions—the Pandavas with the Panchalas—like bulls meeting with a tiger.

24. How vast is the difference between real fight, the clash of weapons, good advices, uttered in sweet sounding words on one side and Bhishma who is past the prime of life, of wicked soul and who is urged by fate.

25. Alone he even boasts to fight with the entire universe, and endued with false vision he does not regard any other man as a human being.

26. Certainly, it has been laid down in our holy books that the words of the aged should be listened to, but it does not apply to those who are very old for they are held to be boys.

27. Alone I shall slay the army of the sons of Pandu in a fair fight. The fame however of this will go to Bhishma, O best among kings.

28. By you, O ruler of men, has Bhishma been appointed the commander and all fame goes to the leader and never to an individual soldier.

29. O king, never shall I fight as long as the son of Ganga is alive. When Bhishma is killed I shall fight with all the car-warriors."

Bhishma said :—

30. The great burden (the impending fight) vast as the ocean is ready to fall on me—a calamity which I had foreseen for a series of years.

31. Now is come that time,—that fight, the result of which makes our hairs stand on end. It is not my concern to create dispute among ourselves. It is for this that you now live, O you born of a Suta.

32. For though I am now aged and you but young I shall rend asunder your desire for battle and that of your own life, O you born of a Suta.

33. The weapons hurled at me by Rama the son of Jamadagni did not pain me—What can you do to me then?

34. Good men do not approve of this praise of one's own might. I speak thus (on this occasion) for I have lost my temper O vile one; the stain of your family.

35. In the election of a bridegroom by the daughters of Kashiraja, I, after defeating all the rulers of the earth united together, took away those girls by force.

36. Thousands of such kings, well known names too, along with their armies, were stopped in the battle by me alone.

37. Having come across yourself, an ill-starred man, the Kurus have come upon a great disaster; try to mete out destruction and be a man.

38. In the battle, fight with the son of Pritha, whom you are now challenging and I shall see how you escape out of that fight, O you of exceedingly wicked intelligence."

39. Then did the royal son of Dhritarastra, endued with fame say to him—Look to me, O son of Ganga; the task which has devolved on you is great.

40. Think with your entire heart of my interests; both of you will do great deeds for me.

41. Again do I desire to hear about the best of the car-warriors of the enemy—those who are Atirathas in that side and those that can lead numbers of chariots.

42. O son of Kuru, I desire to hear of the strength and weakness of the enemies for the fight is to take place at the dawn of night."

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty eighth chapter, the quarrel between Bhishma Karna, in the Rathatriatha Sankhyana of the Udyog Parva.

CHAPTER CLXIX (RATHATIRATHA SANKHYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. These are the notable Rathas and Atirathas on your side, O ruler of men, and these, O king, are semi-Rathas; listen now to those of the Pandavas.

2. If you have now any curiosity to learn of the strength of the Pandavas, O ruler of men, then listen to the list of their Rathas along with these rulers of the earth.

3. The king, the son of Pandu and the delight of Kunti, is himself a mighty Ratha; and my dear son, he will roam about in the battle like fire itself; there is no doubt.

4. Bhimasena, O chief among kings, is held to be eight times a Ratha and in a fight with the mace or arrows he has no equal.

5. Filled with pride and endued with the strength of ten thousand elephants he is not human in energy; the two foremost among men, the sons of Madri, are two Rathas.

6. Like the Ashwins in beauty and endued also with energy these two will fight in the very van of their army remembering their hard sufferings.

7. They will roam about like so many Rudras—of that there is no doubt. All of them are great-souled and tall as the trunks of Shala trees.

8. Measuring a span more than other males, all the sons of Pandu, capable of killing lions, are endued with great strength.

9. All of them are devotees, my dear son, and Brahmaharyya vows have been practised by all of them; endued with modesty, those foremost among men are of fierce strength as the tigers.

10. In impetuosity, in striking and crushing all of them are superhuman and by them by all the rulers of the earth had been vanquished at the time of the universal conquest.

11. No human being can bear their weapons, maces and arrows—none can even adjust the string at the time of using the bow, O son of Kuru.

12. In uplifting maces, in shooting arrows, in hitting the target, in eating and in sporting in the dust,

23. Even as children there was great difference between yourself and them. They, all of whom are endued with fierce strength, meeting this army,

14. Will destroy them in battle ; let there therefore be no encounter with them. In the press of battle, each of them can alone slay the entire universe.

15. It was in your presence, O chief among kings, namely what happened in the Rajsuya. The sufferings of Draupadi and the harsh words at the game of vice,

16. Remembering these they will wander about in the battle like Rudra. Regarding Gudakesha (curling hair) of copper eyes having Narayana for his ally,

17. There is no brave car-warrior who can equal him in both the armies ; nor is there any among the gods, human beings or serpents ;

18. Nor even among Rakshashas and Yakshas—how can there then be any among men ? Nor have I heard of any that has been or that will be.

19. O great king, the wise son of Pritha has a chariot which has Vasudeva for its driver and Dhananjaya as the soldier.

20. He has the celestial bow Gandiva and horses that have the speed of wind, celestial coat of mail which is impenetrable and great arrow holders which are inexhaustible ;

21. Groups of arms presented by the great Indra and Rudra and Kuvera and Yama and Varuna and a mace which is fierce to look at,

22. And several foremost weapons for attack—the thunderbolt. Thousands of Danavas living in Hiranyapura,

23. Where slain by him riding on a single chariot. What car-warrior is there who can be equal to him ? Endued with wrath, strong and of true prowess the one of long arms will slay,

24. Your army, protecting his own. Myself or the preceptor can advance against this Dhananjaya.

25. There is no third car-warrior, O chief among kings, in both these armies who can advance against him while he pours showers of arrows.

26. Showing arrows like clouds at the close of the hot season urged by mighty winds the son of Kunti, having Vasudeva for his ally, is waiting for battle. He is young and experienced while both of us are worn out.

Vaishampayana said :—

27—28. Hearing these words of Bhishma and at the time recollecting with their trembling hearts the old might of the sons of Pandu they had themselves witnessed, the fleshy arms, of those kings pasted with sandal, hang down shorn of prowess.

Thus ends the one hundred and sixty ninth chapter in the Rathatiratha Sankhyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXX.

(RATHATIRATHA SANKHYANA PARVA)—Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. O great king, all the five sons of Draupadi are Maharathas. The son of Virata, Uttara is also a mighty Ratha ; such is my opinion.

2. Abhimanyu, of long arms, is a leader of commanders of groups of chariots and that slayer of enemies is equal in battle to the son of Pritha or Vasudeva,

3. Quick in the use of arms, capable of using diverse weapons, spirited and of firm vows, he will show forth his prowess to-day remembering the sufferings of his father.

4. The hero, Satyaki of the race of Madhu, is a leader of commanders of groups of chariots. He is wrathful among the heroes of the Vrishni race and has conquered fear.

5. In the same way, O king, Ulta-manjas is a mighty Ratha in my opinion ; and the powerful Yudhisthira too is a mighty Ratha.

6. Many thousand chariots, elephants and horses of these will fight, casting away all hopes of life, with the desire of securing the interests of the sons of Kunti.

7. United with the sons of Pandu, O chief among kings, O Bharata, they will sweep through your army like fire and wind challenging them.

8. The two, Virata and Drupada, are invincible and experienced in battle. They are great car-warriors and these two foremost among men are endued with great energy.

9. Though old in age they observe the duties of Kshatriya order and they will try, with all their might, to stay in the path walked over by heroes.

10. Owing to their relationship with the Pandavas, O chief among king, those two great bowmen will get an increase of their energy.

11. All men of long arms become heroes or cowards, O foremost among the Kurus, according to the cause for which they fight.

21. All other rulers of the earth, I shall slay, O foremost among the Bharatas—those whom I meet in battle—but not the son of Kunti, O ruler of men.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-second chapter, in the Rathatirth Sankhyana of the Udyoga Parva,

CHAPTER CLXXIII.

AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA.

Duryodhana said:—

1. For what reason, O chief among the Bharatas, will you not slay Shikhandin even though you see him ready to strike you in battle.

2. You said before, O you of long arms: I shall slay the Panchalas with the Somakas. O son of Ganga, tell me how is this, O grand father.

Bhishma said:—

3. Listen, O Duryodhana, to that story along with these rulers of the universe—namely the reason for which I shall not slay Shikhandi even though I see him in battle.

4. O great king, my father the virtuous-souled Shantanu, well known in this world, went the way of the world in due time, O best among the Bharatas.

5. Then did I, O chief among the Bharatas, observing my vows, install my brother Chitrangada on the throne.

6. He too being dead, following the wishes of Satyawati I duly appointed Vichitraviryya in the kingship.

7. Installed by me, O chief among kings, my younger brother the virtuous souled Vichitraviryya looked up to me in everything.

8. I, too being desirous of getting his wives, set my heart on procuring suitable girls from good families.

9. At the time, I heard, O you of long arms, that these were three girls, the daughters of the king of the Kashis going to elect bridegrooms, all of whom were unrivalled in beauty.

10. They were Amva, Amvika, and Amvalika and all the rulers of the earth were invited, O foremost of the Bharatas. Amva was the elder among them, Amvika the second,

11. And Amvalika, O chief among kings, was the youngest princess. Then did I on a single chariot, go to the capital of the king of the Kashis,

12. And saw, O you of long arms, the three girls with their persons ornamented and the kings of the earth who were invited, O lord of the world.

13. Then did I, challenging all those rulers of the earth to fight, carried by force, the girls to my chariot, O best of the Bharats.

14. Knowing that prowess constituted their dower, I took them over to my chariot and said to all those rulers of the earth who were assembled there.

15. "Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, again and again takes these girls away by force; try, O rulers of the earth, with all your might to liberate them. By force do I take them away, O best among men, in your very sight."

16. Then did those lords of the earth rise up with weapons open and wrathfully they urged their drivers, saying, "Make ready the cars, make ready the cars."

17. Then did they rise up with weapons ready—car-warriors on chariots resembling herds of elephants, elephant-warriors on elephants and others ruler of the earth on plump horses.

18. Then did all those rulers of the earth, O lord of the universe, surround me on an all sides with a large troupe of chariots.

19. Then, with a shower of arrows I arrested their rush and vanquished all those rulers of the earth like the king of the gods vanquishing the Danavas.

20. By blazing arrows did I laughingly fell down their diverse banners ornamented with gold, O best among the Bharatas.

21. By one arrow did I lay each to the ground with their horses, elephants, and drivers in battle.

22. Seeing that lightness of hand on my part, they broke up and turned back and vanquishing those kings I came to the city called after the elephant.

23. Then did I make over, O Bharata, those girls to my brother, and submitted that deed, O you of long arms, to Satyawati for information.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy third chapter in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXIV.

AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA:—

*Continued:—Bhishma said:—

1. Approaching then, O chief among the Bharatas, my mother, the mother of heroes, who was the daughter of the Dasha race and saluting her I said these words.

2. "These daughters, of the king of the Kashis having prowess for their dower, have been taken away by me after vanquishing the rulers of the earth."

3. Then smelling my head, with eyes full of tears Satyavati cheerfully said to me. "By luck you have conquered them, my son."

4. The wedding day fixed by permission of Satyavati being near at hand the eldest of the girls of the king of Kashis said these words with modesty.

5. "O Bhishma, you are conversant with virtue, and all sciences and it is proper that you should do the right thing after hearing me.

6. By me was the king of the Shalwas chosen as my bridegroom in my mind and by him before was I selected (as his future wife) in private, unknown to my father.

7. How, O king, acting against the dictates of virtue will you make me, who am desirous of being united with another, reside in your household, O Bhishma, especially born as you are in the Kaurava race.

8. Settling, in your mind, something suitable to this turn of affairs, O best among the Bharatas, it is proper that you should do what you can for me, O you of long arms.

9. It is evident, O lord of the universe, that the king of the Shalwas is expecting me; it is proper for you therefore to permit me to go, O foremost among the Kurus.

10. Act towards me with kindness, O you of long arms, O foremost among the supporters of virtue. It has been heard by me that you are a hero of truthful vows in this world.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy fourth chapter the story of Amva in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXV.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

*Continued.Bhishma said:—

1. Then did I, submitting the matter before our advisers, priests and spiritual guides,

2. Grant that eldest among the girls, Amva to go away, O ruler of men; and the girl too, obtaining the permission, went to the capital of the king of the Shalwas.

3. She was escorted by old twice born men and followed by maid servants; and after travelling the whole distance she reached the presence of that king.

4. She, going to the king of the "Shalwas, said these words:—"I have come, O you of long arms, expecting to be united with you, O you of great intelligence."

5. The king of the Shalwas, however said to him with a laughter, O lord of the universe—"O you of good complexion, I do not desire to take you for my wife for you had before been taken by another.

6. Go therefore, gentle lady, again to Bhishma. I do not desire to have you who had been taken away by Bhishma by force.

7. At that time were you cheerfully led away by Bhishma who vanquished all the kings.

8. O you of fair complexion, I do not desire as my wife, yourself who had been accepted by another, for how can a king like us accept a girl who has before been ravished by another—

9. A king, who is familiar with every science and who lays down laws for others. Go wherever you please, gentle lady, and do not waste your time."

10. Amva, being struck with the darts of love, said to that king:—"Do not speak thus, O ruler of the earth, it can not be so by any means.

11. Never was I cheerfully led away by Bhishma, O chastiser of enemies. Weeping, I was led away by force after he had vanquished the lords of the earth.

12. Accept me, O lord of the Shalwas—accept a girl who is innocent. No religion approves of the desertion of the devoted.

13. I have come here without any loss of time after taking leave of the son of Ganga, who never turns back from the field of battle and with his permission.

14. That Bhishma of long arms does not want me, O lord of the universe and this exertion of Bhishma is for the sake of his brother, I have heard.

15. Those two sisters of mine, Amvika, and Amvalika, who had been led away, have been made over by the son of Ganga to his younger brother Vichitravirya.

16. I do not, O lord of the Shalwas, desire any husband save yourself, O foremost among men,—I swear by my heart.

17. O chief among kings, I do not come to you as one who has before been ravished by another. I am speaking the truth, O lord of the Shalwas—I swear by my soul and by truth.

18. Accept me, O you of big eyes, who who am a girl and have come of my own will desirous of your favours, and without having been ravished by another, O chief among kings."

19. Shalwa however abandoned that daughter of the ruler of the Kashis who spoke thus, O chief among the Bharatas, like a serpent casting off its slough.

20. The king of the Shalwas did not look graciously on that girl who spoke in this and several other strains.

21. Then did that eldest daughter of the ruler of the Kashis struck with grief say with eyes bathed in tears in a voice choked with tears.

22. "Being abandoned by you I shall go wherever I please, O lord of the universe, making the righteous my refuge, for truth is indestructible."

23. At that time the lord of the Shalwas thus abandoned that girl, O Kaurava, who who spoke to him plaintively.

24. Shalwa said to her again and again "go, go, I fear Bhishma, O you of beautiful hips, for you are Bhishma's capture."

25. Being thus spoken to by that Shalwa of short foresight, she issued out of that city sorrowing, weeping like a she-osprey.

Bhishma said :—

26. As she sorrowfully issued out of the capital she thought within herself : " In this world there is no young woman in a more difficult situation than myself.

27. I have been robbed of my friends and wronged by Shalwa nor am I capable of going back to the city called after the elephant.

28. The reason being that I was permitted by Bhishma to leave him with the object of going to Shalwa. Whom shall I blame—myself or Bhishma who is hard to be approached,

29. Or that foolish father who made arrangements for the selection of a husband by myself. It was a fault of mine own that at that time from Bhishma's chariot,

30. I did not leap [down to join Shalwa, when Bhishma was engaged in fierce battle. The result of that is this—namely] that I have been made a fool of.

31. Shame on Bhishma, shame on my idiotic father of foolish heart that fixed valour to be my dower as if I were a woman who could be sold at a price,

32. Shame on myself, shame on king Shalwa, shame also on the creator through whose fault I am now placed in this great difficulty.

33. In all circumstances does a man go through his share of worldly happiness and misery but Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, is the prime cause of this difficulty.

34. I now see that for the present I should have my revenge on that Bhishma either by austerities or by battle, for in my opinion he is the cause of my misery.

35. What ruler of the earth would venture to fight with Bhishma." Thinking thus she went out of the city,

36. To a hermitage of a great souled anchorite of virtuous ways of life and she stayed there for the night surrounded by anchorites.

37. That lady of sweet smiles told them, everything about herself in due order, O Bharata, in detail—the story of her abduction, her liberation and her abandonment by Shalwa.

38. There lived a great Brahmana of rigid vows Shaikhabatya by name, old in devotion and a preceptor of the holy books and the Aranyakas.

39. That anchorite, of eminent devotion, said to that chaste lady who was in extreme difficulty and who was sighing in grief and distress.

40. "Such being the case, gentle lady, what can be done by devotees residing in this hermitage, of great parts and great souled though they be ?"

41. She however thus replied, O king : "Show me this favour. I desire to wander about and to practise hard devotion.

42. The deeds that had been done by me in a previous life out of folly are certainly misdeeds and this is surely the result of that.

43. I do not venture to go back to my kindred, O devotees, rejected and rendered cheerless and wronged by Shalwa.

44. I wish to be instructed here (in asceticism), O ascetics, whose sins have been washed off by you who are god-like; let kindness be shown to me."

45. He then comforted that lady by citing instances and examples and consoled her by promising to do her work along with others among the twice-born.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-fifth chapter, Amva's asceticism, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXVI.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Then did all those anchorites engage themselves in their respective duties and those virtuous ones thought as to what they should do for that lady.

2. Some amongst them then said:—"Let us take her to her father's place," and some of the anchorites thought of finding fault with ourselves.

3. Some thought of going to the king of the Shalwas and ask him to accept the girl; some said 'nay' to this proposal for she was rejected by him.

4. Then did all those anchorites say again to her: "It being so, gentle lady, what can these anchorites do for you, endued with intelligence and self-control though they are?"

5. There is no need for you to roam about in these woods: Listen to words that are of benefit to you and go hence to your father's place; may you fare well.

6. The king, your father, will do what is proper for you and, O blessed lady, you will live there in happiness, endued with all accomplishments as you are.

7. There is no other proper refuge for you, O gentle lady, save your father; for either the father or the husband is the refuge of a woman, O you of fair complexion.

8. A husband is a woman's refuge under smoother circumstances and in a difficult situation a father is the refuge; roaming about is a hard task, especially for those brought up in luxury.

9. Being a princess, you are naturally delicate, O romantic lady; there are many disadvantages, O you of beautiful complexion,

10. In a life in the hermitage while there will be none in your father's place." Then did other anchorites say to that female devotee these words:—

11. "Seeing yourself alone in these dreary and solitary woods kings will court you; therefore do not set your heart on such a life.

Amva said:—

12. I cannot go to the city of Kashi to my father's place for I shall doubtless be disgraced by my friends.

13. O ascetics, in my childhood did I live in my father's place but now I shall not go where my father is; may you fare well.

14. I desire to practise asceticism protected by anchorites so that in the next world too I may not meet with such dire calamities. O foremost among ascetics, therefore am I desirous of practising asceticism.

Bhishma said:—

15. While those regenerate persons were thus thinking of the merit of the case, the royal sage Hotravahana came into that forest.

16. Then did all those ascetics worship that ruler of men and welcome him with their greetings, seat and water.

17. Then did those dwellers of the forest again address that lady in the hearing of that sage after he had taken his seat and rested himself a little.

18. Hearing those words of Amva, the daughter of the king of the Kashtis, O Bharata, that royal sage of great energy, became filled with pity.

19. That king of great austerities, the great-souled royal sage Hotravahana, seeing her and hearing her speak in that way, became filled with pity.

20. The father of her mother then rose trembling (with rage) and placing her on his lap began to comfort her.

21. He asked her the story of her wrongs from its origin and in detail and she too submitted to him everything as it had happened in detail.

22. Then was that royal sage filled with grief and distress and that one of great asceticism resolved, within himself, on his course of action.

23. Trembling, he said to that distressed and sorrowful girl: "Do not go to your father's place, gentle lady. I am the father of your mother.

24. I shall remove your sorrow, depend on me, dear daughter. You have enough of grief, child, since you are so lean.

25. By my advice go to the ascetic Rama, the son of Jamadagni. Rama will remove this heavy and horrible grief of yours.

26. He will slay Bhishma in battle if he does not act up to his words; go to him, that foremost of the Bhrigu race, who, in energy, is equal to the fire that rages at the time of the universal destruction.

27. That great anchorite will place you on the even path." Then shedding tears profusely,

28. And saluting with her head the father of her mother, Hotravahana, she said:—"By your command I shall go there.

29. But shall I be able to see that respected man known throughout the world and how shall he of Bhrigu's race remove my grave sorrow? I desire to know this since I am going there.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-sixth chapter in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXVII.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA).—

Continued.

Hotravahana said:—

1. "You will see Rama, the son of Jamadagni, devoted to truth and endued with great strength in the great forest, practising hard asceticism.

2. Rama ever dwells on that highest among the mountains, called Mahendra. Rishis conversant with the Vedas and Gandharvas and Apsaras also live there.

3. Go there and may you fare well. Tell him these words of mine after saluting that old devotee of firm vows by bowing down your head.

4. Tell him what you want, gentle lady—hearing my name Rama will do all you ask of him.

5. Rama is my friend, child, and he is my well-wisher and is highly pleased with me that hero, the son Jamadagni and the foremost of all wielders of weapons."

6. While Hotravahana that ruler of the earth was thus speaking to that girl, the devoted follower of Rama, Akritavrana, presented himself there.

7. Then did all those Rishis by thousands as also Hotravahana, the king of the Srinjayas, old in years, stand up.

8. Seeing him those dwellers of the forest united together did him the rites of hospitality and then sat down surrounding him, O chief among the Bharatas.

9. Then they began to converse cheerfully and delightfully on subjects that delighted one's heart and which were blessed and divine, O chief among kings.

10. Then at the end of the conversation, the royal sage Hotravahana, endued with a large soul, asked Akritavrana about Rama the foremost among the great Rishis.

11. "Where can I see at present the mighty son of Jamadagni, O you of long arms, O Akritavrana, that foremost among those conversant with the Vedas,

Akritavrana said:—

12. Rama ever speaks of you, my lord, saying: The royal sage Srinjaya, that ruler of the earth, is my dear friend.

13. I think Rama will be here on the morrow. You will see him come here owing to your desire for seeing him.

14. O royal sage, why is the lady come to the forest—whose daughter is she and what is she to you? I desire to know it.

Hotravahana said:

15. She is my grand-child, my lord, the beloved daughter of the king of the Kashis. O sinless one, she was desirous of choosing her own husband along with her two sisters.

16. This eldest daughter of the ruler of the Kashis is known as Amva and, O you whose only wealth is devotion, his two younger daughters are called Amvika and Amvalika.

17. Then was there assembled in the city of Kashi, the entire body of Kshatriya rulers of the earth and there were great rejoicings there, O regenerate Rishi of those princes.

18. Then did Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, endued with great heroism and energy overthrowing all those rulers of the earth, take away the three girls by force.

19. Bhishma of sinless soul, having conquered those rulers of the earth came to the city called after the elephant in company with those girls, O Bharata.

20. That lord after submitting the case to Satyavati ordered for the wedding of his brother Vichitravitya.

21. This girl, seeing all the arrangements made for the wedding, said there to the son of Ganga in the midst of his councillors, O best among the twice-born.

22. "The heroic king of Shalwa has been chosen by me as my husband; O you conversant with virtue, it is not proper that you should give me, who am desirous of another, up to your brother".

23. Bhishma, hearing those words and consulting with his ministers, came to a decision and following the opinion of Satyawati sent her away,

24. Permitted by Bhishma this girl rejoicing went to Shalwa the lord of Saubha in due time and said these words :

25. "I have been dismissed by Bhishma; act righteously towards me for you had before been chosen by me as my husband, O best among the rulers of the earth."

26. Shalwa, however being suspicious about her character, rejected her and she, coming to this hermitage, has become greatly bent on practising asceticism.

27. She was recognized by me owing to her describing her parentage and she thinks Bhishma as the origin of this calamity of hers.

Amva said :—

28. O lord, it is even as this ruler of the earth has said; the progenitor of my mother's self is this Hotravahana of the Srinjaya race.

29. I do not desire to go back to my father's city, O you whose wealth consists in asceticism, from fear of disgrace and out of shame, O great Muni.

30. O best among the twice-born, it is my opinion that what the lord Rama points out to me would be my supreme duty, my lord.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-seventh chapter, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva

CHAPTER CLXXVIII.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Akritavrana said :—

1. For which of these two sorrows do you desire a remedy, O lady. Tell me that truly, O child.

2. If in your opinion, gentle lady, the lord of the Saubhas should be urged, the great-souled Rama, desirous of your good, will urge him.

3. Or if you desire to see the blamable Bhishma vanquished in battle by the wise Rama, he, of Bhrigu's family, will do that too.

4. Hearing the words of Srinjaya, and of yours, O you of beautiful smiles, let what ought to be done this very day be settled.

Amva said :—

5. Led away I had been by Bhishma, but he knew not the true state of my feelings. Bhishma did not know, O Brahmana, that my mind leaned towards Shalwa.

6. Thinking of this in your mind you should settle about this ; do what you think is just.

7. Do that which is just and reasonable towards that best among the Kurus and to the king Shalwa or to both.

8. The root of my distress, as it is, has now been submitted by me and it is proper that you should do in this matter what is reasonable.

Akritavrana said :—

9. It is indeed praiseworthy, gentle lady, that you are speaking these words with your eye towards virtue, O you of fair complexion ; listen to these words of mine.

10. If the blamable one had not led you to the city called after the elephant, Shalwa would have accepted you, O timid lady, with his head bowed down, urged by Rama.

11. But since you, gentle lady, had been taken away by him after gaining a victory, O romantic lady, the king Shalwa has therefore doubts in you, O you of beautiful waist.

12. Bhishma is proud of his bravery and success and therefore it stands to reason that your remedy lies in Bhishma.

Amva said :—

13. This desire has ever obtained in my heart, O Brahmana, that I would have but Bhishma slain in battle.

14. Whoever is blamable, Bhishma or the king of the Shalwas, punish him who has brought about this great distress, O you of long arms.

Bhishma said :—

15. The day passed away while they were conversing on this as also the night which was marked by pleasant breezes that were neither too hot nor too cold, O chief among the Bharatas.

16. Then did Rama come there as if blazing with energy—the anchorite having matted hairs and wearing deer skin was surrounded by his disciples.

17. The great-souled one came, bow in hand, and holding a sword and battle-axe ; and the sinless one approached that ruler of men, Srinjaya, O best among kings.

18. Seeing him the ascetics and the king of great asceticism stood up with clasped hands ; so also did that girl.

19. Earnestly they adored him of the Bhrigu race, with honey and curds and being duly honoured he sat down with them.

20. Then the two, Srinjaya and the son of Jamadagna, sat together conversing on past matters.

21. At the end of their discourse, the royal sage in proper time said these sweet words pregnant with meaning to Rama, the foremost in the race of Bhrigu, endued with great strength.

22. "O Rama, this is my grand-daughter, the daughter of the king of the Kashis, my lord ; hear what she has to say and settle what can be done for her, O you skillful in deeds."

23. Rama said to her—"Repeat your grand story" ; thereupon she said to Rama who was blazing like fire.

24. Saluting the holy feet of Rama with her head she touched them with her lotus-like hands and stood in front of him.

25. Being stricken with grief she wept aloud and with her eyes bathed in tears she betook herself to the refuge of the delighter of Bhrigu's race who was of a worthy refuge.

Rama said :—

26. You are the same to me, O princess, as you are to Srinjaya ; speak out the grief you have in your mind—I shall act up to your words.

Amva said :—

27. My lord, I betake myself now to your refuge for you are of great vows—Tell me, my lord, who am fallen into the mire of grief and liberate me from the heavy calamity.

Bhishma said :—

28. Seeing her beauty and again her youthful person and her extreme delicacy of mould, Rama became engaged in deep thought.

29. "What shall this one say ?" So thought Bhrigu ; thinking thus Rama was silent for a long time filled with pity.

30. The lady, of sweet smiles being again asked to recite her story, said everything as it had happened to him of Bhrigu's race.

§ 31. The son of Jamadagni too hearing those words of the princess first settled as to what he should do and then said to her of beautiful hips.

Rama said :—

32. O beautiful lady, I shall send words to that foremost among the Kurus, Bhishma, and that ruler among men, Hearing them will do, my bidding.

33. If the son of Jahnavi does not do what I say then shall I consume him in battle, O gentle lady, along with his ministers, by the blaze of my weapons.

34. If, O princess, you are not of that opinion, I shall urge that hero, the king of the Shalwas, to the present matter.

Amva said :—

35. O delighter of Bhrigu's race, I had been dismissed by Bhishma as soon as he heard that my mind already had been to the king of the Shalwas.

36. Approaching then the king of Saubha I addressed him in improper words, but he did not accept me being suspicious of my character.

37. Thinking on all this, it is proper that you should think of the means of remedying this by your own knowledge, O delighter of Bhrigu's race.

38. The root of this distress of mine is Bhishma of great vows, since by him was I brought under subjection taking me up by force.

39. Slay Bhishma, O you of long arms, for it is by his doings that I am fallen into such distress, O you foremost among the race of Bhrigu, and that I continue in this growing distress.

40. He is covetous, mean-spirited, and boastful of success, O you of Bhrigu's race ; therefore is it reasonable that you should take revenge on him, O sinless one.

41. When I was being taken away by Bharata, my lord, I made this resolution in my heart, namely, that I should cause this one of great vows to be slain.

42. Therefore do you fulfil this desire of mine, O sinless Rama ; slay Bhishma, O you of long arms, as Purandara slew Vritra.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-eighth chapter, in the Anuvakshyan of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXIX.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

*Continued.Bhishma said :—

1. "O Rama, slay Bhishma," having been thus addressed, my lord, he said to that weeping girl who urged him again and again.

2. "O Princess of Kashi, I do not take up arms from my own desire, O you of fair complexion, except at the bidding of those conversant with the Vedas ; what else shall I do for you ?

3. O Princess, both Bhishma and Shalwa act up to my words and I shall accomplish this work—Do not grieve.

4. But I shall not on any account take up arms except at the bidding of regenerate persons ; for this is the vow I have made.

Amva said :—

5. By some means or other, my distress has its origin in Bhishma ; slay him therefore without delay, my lord.

Rama said :—

6. O princess of Kashi, I tell you again that though Bhishma is worthy of your worship, he will, at my word, take up both your feet on his head.

Amva said :—

7. Kill Bhishma in battle, O Rama, for he roars like an Asura, after challenging him to fight if you desire, what is pleasing to me, O Rama ; besides it is proper that you should perform what you have promised.

Bhishma said :—

8. While the two, Amva and Rama, were thus conversing together, the Rishi, of extremely virtuous soul, said these words :

9. "This is not proper for you, O you of long arms, to abandon a girl who has taken refuge with you. If, O Rama, Bhishma being challenged by you in fight,

10. Either says "I am vanquished" or acts up to your words then the object of this lady will be fulfilled, O delighter of the Bhrigu race.

11. And your promise, my lord, will be redeemed—At the time (of war with the Kshatriyas), this was your promise, O Rama, O great sage.

12. Having conquered all the Kshatriyas at the time you made this promise to the Brahmanas. "If a Brahmana or a Kshatriya or a Vaishya or a Sudra in battle,

13. Becomes the destroyer of a Brahmana I shall slay him" O you of Bhrigu's race—Then, who out of fear will take refuge with me,

14. I shall never be able to abandon by any means so long I have some alive, even if a Kshatriya who has conquered all other Kshatriyas comes to war with me.

15. I shall slay that one, of blazing self though he be" O you of Bhrigu's race.—O Rama, that Bhishma, the supporter of the Kuru race, is even such—Fight with him in battle therefore, O Rama.

Rama said :—

16. I remember the promise that I made before, O you best among the Rishis, but in this instance I shall act in such a way that I may gain my object by peaceful means.

17. This work, aimed at by the princess of Kashis, is indeed great—Taking this lady, I shall go myself there where he is.

18. If Bhishma, proud of his feats in war, does not act up to my commands I shall certainly slay that arrogant one.

19. The arrows, shot forth by me, do not stick in the body of living creatures (but pass clearly through them) ; it is known to you in the war with the Kshatriyas."

20. Rama saying this, along with those conversant with Brahma—those great devotees rose up intending to depart.

21. Then those devotees, staying there for the night, performed their Homa and other ceremonies and went away with the desire of taking my life.

22. Then did Rama depart accompanied by those utterers of Brahma, making for Kurukshetra, O great king, and taking that girl with him.

23. All of them, namely those great-souled ascetics with that foremost among the race of Bhrigu at their head, having reached the river Saraswati, encamped there.

Thus ends the one hundred and seventy-ninth chapter in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXX.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—*Contd.Bhishma said :—

1. On the third day of their encampment, the one of great vows sent me words : "I am come, do what is agreeable to me."

2. Hearing of the arrival of that one endued with great strength at the boundary of my kingdom I went to that lord, the ocean of energy, with great cheerfulness,

3. With a cow before me and surrounded by Brahmanas, priests and preceptors who were equal to the gods themselves.

4. The son of Jamadagni, endued with lustre, seeing me, accepted that worship and said these words.

Rama said:—

5. O Bhishma, in what frame of mind was the daughter of the king of Kashis led away by you though you wanted her not; and why was she again sent away.

6. By you has this lady of spotless fame been robbed of virtue; for touched by you as she has been, for whom would it be proper to marry her?

7. Having been once led away by you she has been rejected by Shalwa; therefore, do at my words accept her, O Bharata.

8. Let this princess fulfil her object, O best among men, and it is not proper, O king, that she should be disgraced by you, O sinless one."

9. Seeing him absent-minded on her account I said—"I cannot again offer her to my brother by any means, O Brahmana,

10. To me she said before—I belong to Shalwa—O you of the Bhrigu race, and permitted by me she went towards his capital.

11. Not out of fear, nor out of pity, nor out of avarice and nor out of a desire to gain my object shall I abandon the duties of the Kshatriya order—such has been the vow made by me."

12. Then did Rama say to me with eyes expanded with wrath:—"If you do not act up to my words, O best among men,

13. I shall slay you along with your ministers;" he said thus to me again and again with eyes expanded with anger.

14. I again and again entreated that best among the Bhrigu race with sweet words, O chastiser among foes, but could not calm him down.

15. I then bowing my head to him said again to the best among the Brahmanas; "What is the reason of your proclaiming war with me?

16. In my childhood had you taught me the use of four kinds of arms, and I am thus your pupil, O you of Bhrigu race."

17. Then did Rama say to me with eyes red with anger—"You know me to be your preceptor, O Bhishma, and yet you will not accept this lady,

18. The daughter of the king of the Kashis for my gratification, O son of Kuru, endued with great intelligence. There is no other way of gratifying me, O delighter of Kuru's race.

19. Accept this lady, O you of long arms, and perpetuate your family. Being severed from the path of rectitude by yourself she gets no husband."

20. I said to Rama, the conqueror of hostile cities who was speaking thus: "This will not be, O regenerate Rishi, what is the use of labouring towards it.

21. O son of Jamadagni, considering that you were my preceptor in days of old I sought to gratify you before, my lord.

22. Who will permit a woman, who sighs for another and who is therefore like a poisonous snake, to remain in his house knowing the great evils thereof.

23. O you of great vows, I shall not for fear of Vasava even forsake my duties; either be gratified with me or do what you please without loss of time.

24. My lord of pure heart, even this Sloka is heard in the Puranas, sung by Maruta endued with a large soul.

25. The abandonment of a preceptor is provided when he is vain or has swerved from the right path or who does not know what his duties are.

26. I respected you very much so long because you were my preceptor; but since you do not know the duties of a preceptor, therefore shall I fight with you,

27. I shall not slay a preceptor in battle, especially as he is a Brahmana and you have been forgiven by me since you are old in devotion.

28. One, who seeing a Brahmana, ready to fight like a friend of the Kshatriyas, wrathfully slays him who flies not from the field,

29. Is not guilty of slaying a Brahmana—such has been authoritatively laid down in the holy books—O you whose only wealth is asceticism, I am a Kshatriya observing the duties of my order.

30. Such a one as myself who treats such according to his merit does not act unrighteously and does not come by evils.

31. When one, able to discriminate the propriety of time and place and knowing both virtue and worldly good, is doubtful of his course, he should without hesitation do that which is virtuous.

32. Since you act unrighteously towards me in a matter connected with profit, I shall certainly fight with you in a great battle.

33. Behold the strength of my arms and superhuman prowess and what I am capable of, under such circumstances.

34. I shall do what I can and O regenerate one, I shall fight with you in Kurukshetra; and since you are desirous to fight, be prepared for battle.

35. Go, O you who are fond of war, and return to the field of Kurukshetra and I shall go there to fight with you, O you whose only wealth is devotion.

35. Being slain by a hundred arrows shot by me, you will obtain those regions earned by your asceticism, being sanctified by my weapons in the battle.

37. Where in days of old, you sanctified the name of your fathers, even there shall I sanctify you, O you of Bhṛigu's race.

38. Therefore come there quickly O you who are hard to vanquish in battle and I shall destroy your boast of days of old, which is even now referred to by Brahmanas,

39. The boast that you have indulged in for a long time past—namely the entire body of Kshatriyas have been conquered by me alone,—listen to the cause thereof.

40. At that time Bhishma was not born not even a Kshatriya like myself—energetic beings were created afterwards—you consumed only straw.

41. He, who will remove your boasts of valour and desire for war, is now born. He is myself, Bhishma, the subjugator of hostile cities and I shall destroy your pride in battle. There is no doubt about it."

42. Then did Rama say to me with a laugh, O Bharata: "It is fortunate, O Bhishma that you want to fight with me in battle."

43. I shall now go, O son of Kuru, to Kurukshetra with you. I shall do what you say. Go there, O chastiser of foes.

44. There will your mother Jahnvi see yourself slain by my hundred arrows, O Bhishma, and be made the food of vultures and other birds of prey.

45. O ruler of the earth, let your mother, worshipped by Siddhas and Charanas seeing yourself slain by me, weep to-day.

46. Your mother of great parts, the daughter of Bhagiratha that gave birth to you, fool that you are, and affected by the desire of fight, is however undeserving of such a sight.

47. Come and let us go together, O Bhishma, who are hard to vanquish in battle and desirous of war; take, O son of Kuru, your chariots etc. O foremost among the Bharatas,

48. To Rama the conquerer of enemies' towns who thus said then I bowed my head and said "Be it so."

49. Rama, saying this, went to Kurukshetra with the desire of war and I too entering the city submitted every thing to Satyawati.

50. Then after performing propitiatory rites and being blessed by my mother and asking the twice born to bless me,

51. I mounted a beautiful chariot made of silver and drawn by white horses, beautiful to look at, furnished with good seats, and covered with tiger skins.

52. It was also furnished with great weapons and all other necessary things and guided by a charioteer of good birth well versed in the art of the management of horses,

53. Careful and well trained in battle and who had seen many deeds of bravery; I too, with my body covered with a white coat of mail,

54. And taking a white bow, went out, O best among the Bharatas with a white umbrella held over my head.

55. I was also fanned by white fans, O ruler of men. I was clad with white garments, white head dress and all my ornaments were white.

56. I went out of the city called after the elephant, being eulogised with prayers for my victory and approached the site of battle namely Kurukshetra.

57. Those horses fleet as the mind or the wind, urged by that charioteer, took me, O king, to the great battle.

58. Myself as also that Rama endued with lustre having reached Kurukshetra was each desirous of showing our prowess.

59. Coming within the sight of that excellent ascetic Rama, I took my good conch and loudly blew it.

60. At the time, O king, there were ascetics and other dwellers of the forest as well as groups of gods with Indra at their head to see that fight.

61. There were seen at the time divine garlands and divine music and masses of clouds.

62. Then did all the devotees, the followers of the scion of Bhṛigu's race, become the spectators and surround us.

63. Then did my divine mother, doing good to all creatures, in her own form say to me, O king,—“what is this desired by you ?

64. O supporter of the Kuru race, going to the son of Jamadagni I shall beg of him again and again saying : Do not fight with Bhishma.

65. Do not, my son fight thus with a Brahmana, O ruler of the earth—do not fight with the son of Jamadagni ;” it was thus that she reproved me.

67. Then did I say to that goddess after bowing to her and clasping my hands all that had happened in the election of husband, O foremost among the Bharatas.

66. He has strength similar to that of Hara and he is the exterminator of the Kshatriya race—Rama with whom you desire to fight is well known to you.

68. I told her also the way Rama had been spoken to by me, O chief among kings, and the old doings of the daughter of the king of the Kashis.

69. Then my mother, the great river, going to Rama and trying to entreat that Rishi, that scion of Bhrigu's race for my sake,

70. Said these words: “Do not fight with Bhishma for he is your pupil” and he too said to her who was beseeching him. “Turn back the purpose of Bhishma. I am here because he does not perform what I desire.

Vaishampayana said:—

71. Then did Ganga, out of affection for her son, come again to Bhishma but he with eyes expanded with wrath did not attend to her words.

72. Then did the great devotee of virtuous soul, the foremost of the race of Bhrigu present himself to his view and that best among the twice born summoned him to fight.

Thus ends the one hundred and eightieth chapter, conversation between Rama and Bhishma, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXI.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Laughingly I said to him who stood there for battle: “Myself riding on a chariot I do not venture to fight with you who are on the ground.

2. Mount on a chariot, O hero, and add just your coat of mail, O you of long arms if, O Rama, you desire to fight with me.”

3. Then did Rama say to me laughingly in the field of battle: “The earth is chariot, O Bhishma, and the Vedas carry me like good horses.

4. The wind is my driver, and the mothers of the Vedas (Gayatri, Savitri and Sarasawati) constitute my coat of mail. Well protected by these, in battle I shall fight, O you delighter of the Kurus.”

5. Saying thus, O son of Gandhari, Rama of true prowess covered me on all sides with a thick shower of arrows.

6. Then did I see the son of Jamadagni seated on a car holding all the principal weapons, endued with beauty and appearing wonderful to the sight.

7. The car was created by his will force and was like a holy and spacious city with celestial horses yoked to it and well protected and ornamented with gold.

8. He was also clad in a coat of mail, O you of long arms, looking like the sun and moon, wielding a bow furnished with a quiver and with his fingers protected by gloves.

9. Akritavrana, desirous of fighting, performed the office of the charioteer in that battle. He was the dear friend of that descendant of Bhrigu and very well versed in Vedas.

10. When he challenged me to fight my heart was very much pleased. The descendant of Bhrigu said to me again and again, “come, come.”

11. Then did I approach him who was blazing like the sun, incapable of being vanquished and endued with great strength. Alone I approached Rama, the exterminator of the Kshatriya race.

12. After receiving three showers of arrows I stopped my horses and dismounting and putting aside my bow, I went on foot to that best among the Rishis.

13. And coming before him I worshipped Rama the best among the twice born and after saluting him addressed him suitably in these excellent words.

14. “Whether you are equal to me or superior I shall fight with you, my lord, though you are my virtuous preceptor. Bless me that I may obtain victory.”

15. Rama said: “O foremost among the Kurus, such should be done by one who desires prosperity. It is virtuous, O you of long arms, to fight with those that are well known.

16. If, O lord of the universe, you had not thus come to me I would have cursed you; fight you in battle with patience, O son of Kuru.

17. I cannot bless you for victory, for I myself am standing here to vanquish you. Go, fight fairly, I am pleased with your conduct."

18. Then did I, after saluting him, quickly mount my chariot and again blew loudly my conch in the field of battle, a conch set with gold.

19. Then did the fight take place between myself and him, O Bharata for a great many days, O king, during which each was desirous of vanquishing the other.

20. In the battle, he first struck me with straight arrows with wings of vulture to the number of six hundred and nine.

21. By that shower, my four horses as also my chariot, O lord of the universe, were completely covered; but clad in a coat of mail, I myself remained calm.

22. Bowing to the gods and especially to the Brahmanas I laughingly said to him who was standing there for battle.

23. "I have shown sufficient respect to yourself as a preceptor, though you have paid little regard to me. Listen again, O Brahmana, to what should be done if you want to acquire virtue.

24. The Vedas that are in your body and the great spirit of Brahma that is there and the great asceticism practised by you—I do not strike at.

25. I shall strike at your Kshatriya-hood since, O Rama, you have adopted the life of a Kshatriya; a Brahmana becomes a Kshatriya owing to his taking up arms.

26. Behold now the strength of my bow; and behold the might of my arms. O hero, I shall cut asunder this bow of yours by my arrows."

27. Then did I hurl towards him a broad headed arrow and by it his bow broke into a million pieces and fell to the ground.

28. In the same way, I shot a hundred arrows furnished with the wings of a vulture on the son of Jamadagni.

29. Piercing through his body and carried along by the wind the arrows sped along dropping blood and acting like serpents.

30. Rama, then with all his body wounded and covered all over with blood, shone in battle like a mountain dropping melted metal.

31. He looked like the Asaka tree, at the end of winter, covered with bunches of red flowers or, O king, like the Kinsuka tree when laden with flowers.

32. Then did Rama, wrathfully taking up another bow, shoot forth arrows well sharpened and furnished with golden wings.

33. Those fierce arrows, which were like flames and poisonous serpents coming from several sides, caused me to tremble at their great force and pierced my very vitals.

34. Then did I, with wrath, shoot on Rama arrows, one hundred in number after summoning all my patience and addressing myself to battle.

35. Rama, struck with those arrows which were like fire or the sun and like poisonous snakes, became like one senseless.

36. Then was I filled with pity and stopped of my own will and said: "Fie, fie on battle and on Kshatriya practices," O Bharata.

37. Being filled with grief I said, "I am a vicious man and what sins have been committed by me for observing the duties of a Kshatriya.

38. For I have hurt with my arrows my preceptor who is a Brahmana of a virtuous soul." After that, O Bharata I did not strike at Jamadagni's son.

39. At this time, at the end of day, the sun of a thousand rays after heating the earth, went to his rooms and the fight too closed for the day.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty-first chapter, the fight between Rama and Bhishma, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXII.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhishma said:—

1. Then did the charioteer, O lord of the universe, who was regarded as being skilful in such matters, draw forth the arrows from his own body and those of the horses as well as that of myself.

2. In the morning, the sun having risen, the fight commenced again, the horses (of both parties) having been bathed and allowed to roll on the ground, and given water and thereby refreshed,

3. Seeing me coming quickly with my coat of mail on and seated on my chariot Rama, of great lustre, got ready his car very carefully.

4. I too, seeing Rama, who was desirous of fight, approaching, keeping aside that best of bows, at once dismounted from my chariot.

5. Having bowed down to him I got on it again and desirous of fight stood before Jamadagna, past the reach of fear.

6. Then did I, all on a sudden, cover him with a great shower of arrows: and he too covered me with shower of arrows.

7. The son, of Jamadagni worked up with wrath, again shot forth on me fearful and sharp arrows having mouths blazing like those of serpents.

8. Then did I at once again and again cut them asunder, O king, by my hundred and thousands of arrows, when they were still in the air.

9. Then did the illustrious son of Jamadagni shoot at me celestial weapons but I thwarted them off, O you of long arms.

10. In fact, O you of long arms, I performed mightier tasks by my weapons on which there was a loud commotion all about, O king.

11. Then did I shoot at the son of Jamadagni the weapons called Vayavya but Rama, O Bharata, warded it off by the weapon called Guhyaka.

12. Then did I after repeating suitable incantations shoot the weapon called Agrneya but Rama thwarted that weapon of mine by one called Varuna, O lord.

13. In this way did I ward off the heavenly weapons of Rama and the energetic Rama too, that chastiser of enemies, conversant with celestial weapons, thwarted off the weapons of mine.

14. There did that best among the twice-born, Rama, the son of Jamadagni, suddenly turning to the right, pierce me in my breast.

15. Then did I, foremost among the Bharatas, faint on that best of cars. My charioteer quickly removed me who was deprived of consciousness.

16. O chief among the Bharatas, seeing me afflicted and struck with the arrows of Rama and removed, being deprived of consciousness,

17. All the followers of Rama, Akritavrana and others and the daughter of the king of the Kashis all set up a loud shout.

18. My consciousness (after a time) having come back I said to my charioteer

"O charioteer. go where Rama is. I am prepared (for battle) for I have now no pains."

19. Then did the charioteer bear me by means of exceedingly beautiful horses which went on dancing as it were, O scion of the Kuru race, and which were of the speed similar to that of the wind.

20. Having then come near Rama and being wrathful I shot forth a shower of arrows, O Kaurava, with the desire of gaining victory over that wrathful one.

21. But that Rama cut asunder those arrows which went along in straight lines, when they were in still in the air, by shooting three arrows for each of mine.

22. Then were all of them (Rama's followers) rejoiced at seeing my well furnished arrows cut asunder in two by hundreds and thousands.

23. Then did I shoot at Rama, the son of Jamadagna with the desire of killing him, blazing arrows of good appearance, guided by death itself.

24. Struck with its force and owing to its impetus, Rama fainted in the field and fell on the ground.

25. Rama falling on the ground all began to cry out Alas, Alas, as might be the case, O Bharata, if the sun were to fall on the earth.

26. Then did all those ascetics and the princess of Kashi, O delighter of the race of Kuru, being filled with anxiety, began to comfort him,

27. By embracing him and slowly passing over the palms of their hands rendered cold by water and by blessings of victory, O Kaurava.

28. Then did Rama, rising up, give vent to these wrathful words:—"Stay, O Bhishma, you are already killed" fixing an arrow to his bow.

29. In that great battle that arrow, shot by him, quickly fell on my right side owing to which I was as much agitated as a tree is shaken by a gale.

30. Then did Rama, after killing my horses in that great battle, cover me up with clusters of arrows shot with lightness of hand and with such precision that each could carry away with it a single hair of my body.

31. Then did I too shoot my weapons with lightness of hand so as to ward off his arrows, O you of long arms, and those arrows (of mine and of Rama) stayed in the air (without falling down).

32. The arrows shot by Rama and myself completely covered the sky so that even the sun, covered by a net of arrows, could not give forth its heat.

33. The very wind then shut up in that net could not pass through it. Then owing to the wind being shut up, and the sun too not being able to impart its rays,

34. And from the clashing of weapons there sprang up a fire and those arrows were ablaze owing to the fire brought into existence by them.

35. At the time, O king, every body on earth, was reduced to ashes. At that time, hundreds, and thousands, and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands,

36. And millions and hundreds of millions of Rama's arrows were shot by that warthful one, all in quick succession.

37. In that battle, I too, by my arrows resembling poisonous snakes, cutting asunder those arrows, made them fill up the earth like snakes cut up in fragments, O ruler of men.

38. Such was the wonderful fight that took place at the time, O best among the Bharatas. Evening having passed away my preceptor also retired.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty second chapter the fight between Rama and Bhishma in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXIII.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. O best among the Bharatas, the next day a hard and terrible fight took place with Rama who had come back.

2. On that occasion did that virtuous souled hero, conversant with celestial weapons, hurl at me, day by day, many celestial weapons.

3. Those weapons I met by weapons capable of meeting them, O Bharata, in that terrific struggle, casting off hopes of life which is so hard to sacrifice.

4. When in this way many weapons were neutralized and baffled by other weapons, O Bharata, Rama, of great energy, fought in that battle with me, casting off hopes of life.

5. Seeing his weapons thus baffled then did the great-souled son of Jamadagni hurl at me the fire weapon called Shakti with its extremity ablaze and shining like a meteor which came to have been shot by Death himself and which pervaded the earth with its effulgence.

6. I too cut asunder that blazing weapon which was coming against me like the blazing sun at the time of the destruction of the universe and felled it to the earth cut up into three pieces by my arrows: then did sweet-smelling breeze blow about me.

7. That one being cut asunder, Rama excited with wrath, hurled twelve other fierce weapons at me. Their appearance, O Bharata, I cannot describe owing to their effulgence and speed.

8. How indeed can I do so? I was struck with fear at seeing all those arrows flying towards me from diverse directions and assuming diverse forms and blazing with effulgence as the twelve suns that rise at the time of the destruction of the universe.

9. Seeing myself surrounded by a net of arrows, I neutralized them by another net of arrows from myself, O king, and then in that battle, I shot twelve arrows by which I neutralized even those terrible looking arrows.

10. Then did the great souled son of Jamadagni, O king, hurl at me fierce arrows having golden handles which were variegated and furnished with golden wings. They were blazing like great meteors.

11. These too, O chief among men, I caused to fall to the ground with the heel of my sword and shield and then shot forth celestial arrows at the celestial horses of Rama and his charioteer in that battle.

12. Seeing those arrows, decked with gold, flying at him like serpents let loose from their holes, the great-souled smiter of the lord of the Haihayas became excited with wrath and again brought forth celestial weapons.

13. Then did a cluster of blazing and fierce arrows looking like a swarm of locusts completely overwhelm my body and my horses and chariot.

14. By those arrows were my chariot, and all the horses and the charioteer completely covered. The yoke, shaft, wheels and wheel spokes were all broken by the force of that downpour of arrows.

15. That down pour of arrows having been finished, I too showered arrows on my preceptor. The mass of Brahmie merit pierced with the shower of arrows began to give forth copious discharges of blood.

16. But in the same measure as Rama was overwhelmed with my arrows, was I also pierced hard with his. When the sun set in the afternoon behind the hills in the west, our combat came to an end.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty third chapter, the combat between Bhishma and Rama in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXIV.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhishma said:—

In the morning when the sun had risen, there again began the fight between myself and the scion of the Bhrigu's race.

2. That foremost of smiters, then seated on a quick-going car, showered nets of arrows on me that fell like clouds on a mountain.

3. Then that well-wisher of mine, my charioteer, overpowered by that shower of arrows, fell down from his place in the car causing anxiety to my mind.

4. Then did my charioteer fall into a deep trance and by reason of his being struck with arrows fell down in the earth and became senseless.

5. Then did the charioteer give up his life being struck with the arrows of Rama and for an instant, O chief among kings, I too was afraid at the time.

6. On my charioteer being killed, and my mind being excited Rama hurled at me arrows charged with death.

7. Then did that scion of the Bhrigu race having drawn up his bow with great force hurle an arrow at me who was overwhelmed at the calamity of my charioteer.

8. That blood-drinking shaft, having fallen on my arrow, came down on the earth taking me along with it.

9. Rama too, thinking me to be dead, O best among the Bharatas, roared aloud like the clouds and sent again and again forth a loud shout along with his followers.

10. Myself having fallen down, Rama, being pleased, gave forth a loud shout along with his followers.

11. The Kurus who were there at my side and those who came there desirous of seeing the fight, became overwhelmed with deep sorrow at my fall.

12. When I had fallen down, I saw O lion among kings, eight twice-born ones blazing like the sun. They there surrounding me and supporting me by their arrows in the midst of the field.

13. Being supported by the twice-born, I did not touch the ground and was held in the air by them as by friends.

14. They sprinkled drops of water on me as I was breathing heavily and then those Brahmanas, bearing me up, said to me.

15. "Fear not, you will still be prosperous" and I suddenly stood up, comforted at those words of theirs, and saw my mother, the best among river, seated on the car.

16. I also saw my horses held by that great river, O chief among the son of Kuru. Having touched the feet of my mother and worshipping the memory of my ancestors, I ascended my chariot.

17. She protected myself with my chariot and horses and the weapons for battle and with clasped hands I sent her away.

18. I then myself held the reins of those horses which had the speed of the wind and fought with the son of Jamadagni till the close of the day.

19. Then O foremost among the Bharatas, in that battle, I shot forth an arrow of great strength and speed on Rama that struck his heart.

20. He then fell down on his knees on the earth, overwhelmed by my arrow with his bow loosened from his grasp, and swooned away.

21. When Rama, the giver of thousands, had fallen down, clouds covered the sky discharging copious blood.

22. Meteors too fell by hundreds and thousands and roared, making every thing shake. And suddenly Rahu swallowed the shining sun.

23. High winds blew and the earth trembled and the vultures and cranes and crows came down with joy.

24. The cardinal points were ablaze and jackals began to cry aloud every moment; and drums untouched began to give forth harsh sound.

25. All these frightful omens occurred on the high-sould Rama falling down on the earth in a swoon.

26. Then Rama, rising up suddenly, approached me, with a view to a renewal of fight, O son of Kuru, being himself excited and made senseless by anger.

27. The one of long arms took up his bow which was strong and also took up an arrow; but I withstood Rama equipped as he was.

28. The great Rishis were filled with pity and that descendant of Bhṛigu was filled with anger and he, the one of immeasurable soul, too neutralised my arrow which was like the fire that rages at the time of the universal destruction.

29. Then did the sun, covered by dust and its effulgence clouded, slowly set and night came on with its cool breezes and then we desisted from war.

30. In this way, O king, was there an end to the fight and again was there a fierce encounter at the dawn of day and so on day after day for three and twenty days.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty fourth chapter, the fight between Rama and Bhishma, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXV.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. Then, during the night, O great king, having bowed to all the Brāhmanas, my fore-fathers, all the gods,

2. To all those beings that walk about in the night, to all elements—earth, water, fire, air and the sky—and to all kings, O lord of earth, I lay down on my bed, and and being all alone, I began to reflect (thus).

3. "This terrible battle, between myself and Jamadagnya, being as it is of high and mighty consequence, lasted for many a day.

4. And yet I have not been able to vanquish, in fight on the field of battle, this twice-born Rama, known as Jamadagnya who is of great might and energy.

5. If indeed, it lies in my power to vanquish this powerful son of Jamadagni, let the gods, well-pleased, show themselves to me during the night.

6. Then, O great king, mangled with arrows, as I lay asleep that night on my right, at about dawn came,

7. Those foremost of Brāhmanas by whom I had been raised up when I had fallen down from chariot, and who had held me and comforted me, saying, "Fear not."

8. Even they, O great king, showing themselves to me (during my sleep) in a dream, stood around me, and spoke these words; Hear them, O perpetuator of Kuru's race,

9. "Rise up and do not fear, O son of Ganga, you have not the least fear, for we will protect you, O son, who are own body.

10. Rama, the son of Jamadagni, by no means will vanquish you in battle. (Rather), you will vanquish Rama in battle, O best of Bharata's race.

11. This well-beloved weapon you will recognise for it was known to you in your previous birth.

12. It appertains to the lord of all creatures (Brahma) and was manufactured by the divine architect; it is named Praswapa, O Bharata. It is not known even to Rama nor to any body else on the earth.

13. Recollect it therefore, O you of mighty arms, and apply it steadily and with all your strength. It will come to you of itself, O you great king and sinless one.

14. By this weapon, by which O son of Kuru, you will hold in check all persons of mighty energy, Rama will not be killed outright, O king of men.

15. No crime will therefore attach to you O giver of honours. And this son of Jamadagni will fall asleep, afflicted by the might of this weapon of yours.

16. Having thus vanquished him, you yourself will raise him up again on the battle-field by that dear weapon, O Bhishma, known as Samvodhana.

17. Do as we tell you, O son of Kuru, seated on your chariot at day-break. Asleep or dead, we consider it to be the same.

18. O king, Rama will not die by any means. Apply, therefore, this (weapon) Praswapa, happily brought for you."

19. Having said this, all those best of Brāhmanas vanished, O king. They were eight in number, resembling one another in appearance, and shone brightly, having no material bodies.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty-fifth chapter, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXVI.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—Cond.

Bhishma said :—

When they had passed away, I awoke. O Bharata; I was filled with great joy as I thought of the dream.

2. Then began that mighty battle between him and me, O Bharata, which was wonderful and which made the hairs of all creatures stand on end.

3. Then Bhargava rained on me a shower of arrows, which I baffled by a (like) shower of arrows, O Bharata.

4. Thereupon he, of great asceticism, was greatly incensed and remembering what had happened the day before, he hurled, with anger, a dart at me,

5. Which was as hard as Indra's thunder-bolt, was equal in effulgence, to the mace of Yama, (god of death) blazing like a flaming fire and licking as it were with its tongue, all quarters of the battle-field.

6. Then, O best among Kurus, it struck me on my shoulder, even then, O perpetrator of Kuru's race, like a lightning ranging in the sky.

7. Thus wounded by Rama, O red-eyed one of mighty arms, blood flowed freely like streams of red earth from a mountain.

8. Greatly incensed, I darted, at the son of Jamadagni, a deadly shaft, comparable to the poison of a serpent only.

9. That hero, the best of the twice-born, struck by it on the forehead, shone beautiful as a mountain with its peak.

10. Filled with great wrath he turned round, and drawing his bow with great strength aimed at me a terrible shaft, resembling death himself and capable of grinding all enemies.

11. That fierce shaft struck me on the breast hissing (through the air) like a serpent, and I fell down to the earth, O king, covered with blood.

12. Regaining my consciousness, I hurled at that intelligent son of Jamadagni a dart, bright and blazing as the lightning flash.

13. That dart fell on the chest of that best of Brahmanas. And, O king, having fainted (from pain) he began to tremble all over.

14. Then his friend, that twice-born and great ascetic named Akritavrana, embraced him again and again and soothed him with words of auspicious import.

15. Thus comforted, Rama was filled with anger and vindictiveness, and that keeper of all observances brought forth a mighty weapon of Brahma.

16. Then, for the purpose of baffling also, I aimed the same excellent weapon of Brahma, which blazed forth, appearing like what happens at the end of the Yuga (at the final destruction).

17. Then those two Brahmic weapons met each other in mid-air, without being able to reach either Rama or myself, O best of Bharata's race.

18. Thereupon, in mid-welkin, only a flame blazed forth, and O lord of earth, all creatures became greatly afflicted.

19. The Rishis, and the gods together with the Gandharvas, O Bharata, became greatly afflicted, struck by the blazing effulgence.

20. Then the earth, with the mountains, forests and trees, began to tremble, and all creatures, becoming heated, became highly afflicted.

21. The firmament, O king, began to burn and the ten points of the compass were filled with smoke. At that moment, those creatures that range the sky could not stay there.

22. While during this time all creatures, with the gods, the Asuras and Rakshasas began uttering exclamations of woe,—O Bharata, "This is the time," thought I and became desirous of shooting,

23. That weapon Praswapa speedily, according to the words of command of the speakers of Brahma. And the Mantras also for using that weapon suddenly came to my mind.

Thus ends the one hundred eighty-sixth chapter, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXVII.

Bhisma said:—

1. Then when I had thus made up my mind there arose a mighty din of tumultuous voices in the sky, O king, saying, "O Bhisma, O son of Kuru's race, do not let go that weapon Praswapa."

2. But for all that I still aimed that weapon at the descendant of Bhrigu. As I was aiming it, Narada addressed me, saying:—

3. "These gods are stationed yonder in the sky, O son of Kuru's race. They are forbidding you to-day, do not aim the weapon Praswapa.

4. Rama is an ascetic, possessed of the attributes of Brahma; he is a Brahman, and moreover your preceptor. Do not O son of Kuru, inflict humiliation on him, by any means,

5. Then I saw those eight speakers of the Brahma, stationed in the sky. O great king, smilingly they spoke these words to me slowly.

6. "O best among Bharata's race, do as Narada has spoken to you, for this, O best among the Bharatas, is highly beneficial to all creatures."

7. Thereupon, withdrawing that mighty weapon Praswapa, I made the Brahma weapon to blaze forth according to the ordinance.

8. Thereupon Rama, beholding that the Praswapa weapon was withdrawn, was greatly excited and suddenly gave out these words—Fool that I am, I am vanquished, O Bhishma. Then the son of Jamadagni saw his father, and the venerable father of his father, who stood there surrounding him, and consoling him, spoke at the time:—

The father said:—

10. Do not display such rashness again, O son, by any means,—especially of going to battle with Bhishma, who is a Kshatriya.

11. This is the duty of a Kshatriya,—viz, to fight; O descendant of Bhrigu, study and the observance of religious austerities are the best wealth of the Brahmanas.

12. This (taking up of arms) was ordered by us to you for some special reasons before this. Then you had taken up your arms most fiercely and performed that unenviable deed (the extermination of the whole Kshatriya race).

13. What time you have fought with Bhishma has been enough, O son. O you of mighty arms, desist from this combat, leave the battle-field.

14. Blessings be to you, let this be enough of taking up the bow. But desist from this now, O invincible one. Practise austerities, O Bhargava.

15. Here is Bhishma, the son of Shantanu, who has been made to desist from battle by all the gods, who are endeavouring to pacify him by saying "Desist from this battle.

16. "Do not fight with Rama, your preceptor"—again and again (saying this) "It is not becoming for you, O perpetuator of the race of Kuru, to vanquish Rama in battle.

17. O son of Ganga, do honour to this Brahmana on the field of battle. We are your superiors and therefore forbid you.

18. Bhishma is one of the foremost of the Vasus. It is only by good luck that you are still living. This Shantanu's son by Ganga is a celebrated Vasu.

19. How can he be vanquished by you? Desist at this point, O descendant of Bhrigu. That best among Pandavas, Arjuna, who is the powerful son of Indra,

20. Who is Nara, who is the lord of all creatures, a hero, who was before this a god, who is without beginning and end, and who, mighty as he is, is known throughout the three worlds as Savyasachin,—is ordained by the self-create (Brahma) to be the death of Bhishma in the ripeness of time."

Bhishma said:—

21. Being thus spoken by his ancestors, Rama thus spoke to them—"I will not desist from the combat—this is the vow I have taken upon myself.

22. Before this, I had never been made to turn back (from combat) on the field of battle. O grandsires, make the Ganga's son to desist from the battle, if it so pleases you.

23. But as for me, I will never hold back from this combat." Then those ascetics, O king, with Richeeka at their head,

24. And accompanied by Narada, came up (to me) and thus spoke:—"Desist from the battle, O son. Honour that foremost of Brahmanas."

25. "No" I said to them "according to the duty of a Kshatriya, this is my vow, that never from battle, I will turn back or suffer my back to be wounded by arrows. Not from coveting any objects of desire, nor from fear, nor for the sake of wealth,

27. Shall I abandon my eternal duty,—this is my fixed resolution." Then all those ascetics, O king, with Narada at their head,

28. And Bhagirathi, my mother, occupied the field of battle (between myself and Rama). I however, stood with my bow and arrows as before, and with fixed resolution as before, on the battle-field, to go on fighting. Then they said to Rama.

29. Once more, all them together, going up to the descendant of Bhrigu, on the battle-field said, said—"The hearts of the Brahmanas are as soft as butter, O son of Bhrigu; be pacified.

30. O Rama, O Rama, O best of Brahmanas, desist from this battle. Bhishma is incapable of being killed by you, as you by Bhishma, O son of Bhrigu's race."

31. Addressing him with these words, and obstructing the battle-field, his forefathers made the descendant of Bhrigu lay aside his weapons.

32. And then I again saw those eight revealers of Brahman, blazing like eight constellations risen (in the sky).

33. They then spoke these words with affection to me, who stood on the field of combat, "O you of mighty arms, go up to Rama, your preceptor. Do what is good to all the world."

34. Beholding that Rama desisted (from battle) at the words of his will-wishers, I also, for the good of the worlds, accepted (their) words.

35. Thereupon severely wounded as I was, I went up to Rama, and bowed down to him. Rama also, that great ascetic, smiling with love, spoke to me.

36. "There is no Kshatriya among all men equal to you on the face of the earth. Go you, O Bhishma, for in this combat I have been highly pleased with you.

37. Then in my presence, summoning that maiden (the daughter of Kashi), the descendant of Bhrigu, spoke (to her) in these modest words, before all the high-souled ones.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty seventh chapter, in Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CLXXXVIII.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA).—

Continued.

Rama said:—

1. In the very sight of all these persons O maiden, I have done better, according to the best of my power, and displayed my highest prowess.

2. And yet I have been unable to gain any superiority over Bhishma, that foremost of all wielders of weapons, though I have exerted to the very best of my power.

3. This (which you have seen) is my highest might,—this is greatest strength. Go whither you like, O blessed lady. What else can I do for you?

4. Take refuge even with Bhishma himself; there exists no other for you. I am vanquished by Bhishma on account of his using such mighty weapons."

5. Then the high-souled Rama, having thus spoken, fetched a deep sigh and remained silent. Then that maiden spoke to the descendant of Bhrigu.

6. "O holy one, it is even as your holy self has said. This Bhishma, of varied intelligence, is invincible in battle even by the very gods.

7. To the best of your power and to the best of your energy you have accomplished my work, and in this battle you have shown irresistible might and diverse kinds of weapons.

8. You have yet been unable to show any superiority (over Bhishma). As for me I shall not go again to this Bhishma. Thither, however, shall I repair, where, O you whose wealth is asceticism, I shall be able myself to (obtain the means to fell down in battle this Bhishma, O you the perpetuator of the race of Bhrigu."

20. Having spoken thus, that maid went away with eyes agitated with wrath; and intending to bring about my death she firmly resolved to practise asceticism.

11. Then that foremost one among Bhrigu's descendants, accompanied by those ascetics, departed, after bidding me farewell for the mountain of Mahendra, O Bharata, whence he had come.

12. Thereupon, ascending my chariot, and praised by the twice-born, I entered the city and immediately informed Satyawati, my mother,

13. Every thing as it had happened, O great king, and she (in her turn) uttered words and congratulations to me. I then appointed intelligent and wise men to watch the proceedings of that maiden.

14. Day after day, they went and learnt whatever she did, being devoted and always stationed at their duty, and brought them to me, always their well-wisher.

15. Even at the time when that maiden went to the woods bent on practising asceticism, I became melancholy and poorly with pain.

16. No Kshattrya has ever by mere prowess vanquished me in battle, except one acquainted with Brahma, O my son and observant of vows and austerities.

17. I then informed even Narada, O king, and also Vyasa of the doings (of that daughter of the king of Kashi), and both of them said to me.

18. "O Bhishma, you need not be depressed on account of the daughter of Kashi. Who can have the power to alter the course of destiny by individual resolution?"

19. That maiden, O great king, having entered the pale of a secluded spot, began practising austerities of superhuman endurance, on the banks of the Yamuna,

20. And she remained in the water of the Yamuna for one year, and another year, that lady remained fasting without food.

21. Without food and emaciated, rough skinned, and bronzed, with matted locks, and begrimed with the mud (of the river), that lady, whose wealth consisted in asceticism, remained fixed and motionless for six months, her only food being the air.

22. And after this she broke her fast by eating a single dry leaf, and then she remained, another year, standing erect in the great river on one foot fired with indignation as she was.

23. And thus she continued for twelve years (her austerities) and made the heaven hot. Nor could she be made to desist from the course by her relatives.

24. Then she went to Vatsabhumi, resorted to by Siddhas and Charanas, and the retreat of high-souled ascetics of pious deeds.

25. And there, in the sacred waters of pilgrimages, she bathed herself night and day, and that daughter of the lord of Kashi roamed about, fierce as she was, according to her desire.

26. Proceeding next to the hermitage of Narada, and then to the auspicious hermitage of Uluka, and to that of Chyavana, and even to the sacred spot of Brahma,

27. And to Prayaga, the sacrificial spot of the gods, and to the forest sacred to the gods and to Bhogavati, O monarch, as also to the hermitage of Kaushika,

28. And to the hermitage of Mandavya O king, as also to the hermitage of Dilipa, to the (sacred) water of Rama's lake, O Kauravya, and to the hermitage of Pailagarga,

29. In these sacred places of pilgrimages that maiden of Kashi, O lord of earth, bathed her body, and all this while practising the austerities difficult of performance.

30. (One day) my mother, (Ganga) while in the waters, spoke these words, O Kaurava why do you take so much pains, O blessed one! Tell me the truth.

31. She then spoke, of whom no one can speak evil, with hands folded to my mother "O fair-eyed one, Rama has been vanquished in battle by Bhishma.

32. Who else, though a lord of earth, can attempt to vanquish him when he stands forward with his arrows? And I am practising these severe austerities for the destruction of Bhishma.

33. I wander about in the earth, O goddess, with the one purpose of obtaining the means of death of that king, and this is the vow I have taken, O goddess, in everything else that I do."

34. Thereupon the ocean-going (Ganga my mother) spoke: "O lady, you are acting crookedly. O faultless one, this object of yours you shall not be able to attain, O weak one.

35. O daughter of Kashi, if you hold to this vow for the destruction of Bhishma, and even if you take leave of your body while performing these austerities,

36. You shall be turned to a tortuous river, O fair one, with water (only in the rains. Your water shall be inaccessible and unknown, and (as you shall be) with water only during the rainy season, you shall be dry for eight months (in the year);

37—38. Filled with dreadful alligators and yourself dreadful, and inspiring terror in all creatures." Having thus spoken, O king, my mother, that lady of great fortune, pretending to smile, dismissed the daughter of Kashi. Thereupon that highly fair one did not even drink water, sometimes for eight months and sometimes for ten months.

39. And the daughter of the king of Kashi, O Kauravya, on account of her love of pilgrimage came to Vatsabhumi, and there she fell down and began to run down (as a river.)

40. And O Bharata, it is recorded that the river in Vatsabhumi, was filled with water only during the rains, and abounded in alligators, was difficult to ford and tortuous (in her course).

41. O king, by merit of her austerities that maiden became a river by only half her body, while by the other half she remained a maiden in Vatsabhumi, as before.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Bhishma said:—

1. Then all the ascetics (living in Vatsabhumi), perceiving her firmly resolved on practising austerities, dissuaded her, and they said "O child, what do you mean to do?"

2. Then to those Rishis hoary with asceticism, spoke the maiden: "I have been undone by Bhishma, and despoiled of those virtues that would have been mine by living with my husband.

3. My observance of vows is for his destruction, and not for the sake of the worlds of happiness, O you that have asceticism for your wealth. Having slain Bhishma I shall attain peace (of mind); this is my resolve.

4. Him by whom this existence has become one of continuous misery, by whom I have been deprived of the region where my husband is, for whom I am neither a woman nor a man in this life,

5. Without slaying in battle that son of Ganga, I will not desist, O ye whose wealth is asceticism. That which I have here spoken in words—even that is the resolve in my heart within.

6. I am disgusted with remaining in this state of mine as a woman, and I am firmly resolved upon attaining the state of a man. I will be revenged upon Bhishma. I should not be dissuaded any more."

7. To that ascetic lady, the god who holds the trident in his hand, and who is the husband of Uma, showed himself in his own form in the midst of those Maharshis.

8. Being asked to solicit her wished for boon, she prayed of the god my defeat. "You will slay him"—thus that god answered that lady of firm resolution.

9. "Thereupon again she said to Rudra—How can it happen, that mine shall be the victory in battle, O god, as I am, a woman?"

10. O lord of Uma, my mind is perfectly calm, so far as regards a woman. And you have also promised, O lord of all creatures, the defeat of Bhishma.

11. Act in such a way that this (promise) may be true, O god who has the bull for the mark, and so that on encountering Bhishma, the son of Santanu in battle, I may slay him."

12. To that maiden Mahadeva (the great god) having the bull for his carrier thus spoke truly—"My words can not be false. They shall turn out true, O blessed one.

13. You will slay Bhishma in battle, for you will attain the state of a man. And you will recollect all this, when you go to another body.

14. Borne in the race of Drupada, you shall be a Maharatha, quick in the use of weapons, skilled in fighting in various ways, and a fierce warrior.

15. As I have spoken, O blessed one, so shall it all be. You will be a man after some time has elapsed."

16. So saying, Mahadeva, otherwise, known as Kaparddin, and having the bull for his carrier, vanished even then and there while the Brahmanas were looking on.

17. Thereupon that faultless damsel of fairest complexion, in the very sight of those great Rishis, having gathered fuel from that wood,

18. And making a large funeral pyre and having set fire (to it), O monarch, with a mind burning with wrath, even in that flaming fire,

19. That eldest daughter of the king of Kashi, O king, entered the fire on the banks of the river Yamuna, saying (as she did so) "For the destruction of Bhishma-sena.

Thus ends the hundred and eighty ninth chapter, in Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXC.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Duryodhana said:—

1. Tell me, O grandsire, how Shikhandin, who had been before a daughter, O son of Ganga, became a man, O foremost of warriors.

Bhishma said:—

2. The chosen and beloved queen of king Drupada, O great king, was childless at first, O monarch.

3. And during this time the highly intelligent king Drupada, pleased by worship, O mighty king, the God Sankara for the sake of offspring.

4. Resolving to bring about my destruction, he took to the severest penances, and said "Let mine be a son, and not a daughter, O Mahadeva;

5. O God, I desire a son, to revenge myself on Bhishma." Then this was said (to him) by Mahadeva—"Your son shall be both male and female.

6. Desist therefore, O protector of the earth, it shall never be otherwise." He (king Drupada) entering his city said to his wife.

7. "I have made a great exertion; O goddess, I have worshipped Shambhu by penances, and I have been told by him.

"Your offspring will first be a female and will then become a man."

8. Though repeatedly solicited, Shiva only said "It is decreed by destiny. It shall not be otherwise, but even as I have told you"

9. Thereupon that lady of great force of mind kept her mind rigidly pure and the wife of king Drupada, at the proper time, went to king Drupada.

10. Agreeably to the decrees of destiny, the wife of Prishata, in due time, conceived, as Narada informed me, O ruler of the Earth.

11. And that goddess, whose eyes resembled the petals of the lotus, continued to hold her foetus. And to that dear wife, O son of Kuru, king Drupada,

12. The mighty-armed one, on account of his affection for his son, ordered all that was agreeable. And O Kaurava, his wife obtained everything that she desired.

13. And in due time, that goddess, the queen of the childless lord of earth, king Drupada,

14. Even that lady of great force of mind, O lord of men, gave birth to a daughter of great beauty.

15. O great king, thereupon the king Drupada gave out to all—this is my son—and for this daughter, who was concealed,

16—17. O lord of men, (he) caused all the necessary rites to be performed just as if it were a son. And the imperial wife of Drupada protected the secret with all due care, saying, "This is a son indeed." And neither did any one else other than the son of Prishata know (the child to be a) daughter, in all that city.

18. Reverencing the words of that god of immeasurable glory, he kept to himself that she was a daughter, and said,—“This is a male child.”

19. And that king caused all the rites prescribed for a son during infancy to be performed according to all due ordinances, and named her Shikhandin.

20. I alone, by means of spies, and through the words of Narada, and through the words of the god (Shiva) and also from the austerities of Amva, was informed (of the child being a son).

Thus ends the one hundred and ninetieth chapter in Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXCI.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

*Continued.Bhisma said :—

1. Drupada betowed all possible care on all the (necessary) accomplishments of his daughter, O vanquisher of foes, teaching her writing, painting and all the arts.

2—3 And in (the practice of) arrows and (other) weapons O great king, she became a disciple of Drona. And O great king, the mother of that child, a lady of the fairest complexion, urged the king for a wife for that daughter, as if she were a son. Thereupon the son of Prishata, perceiving her to have attained youth, became thoughtful along with his wife, considering her to be a female.

Drupada said :—

4. This daughter of mine, who now adds to my woe, has attained her youth. And she has been concealed by me on the (strength of the) words of the holder of the trident.

His wife said :—

5. O great king, that (word) will never prove false. How can it be proper for the Creator of the three worlds to speak anything false on this earth?

6. If it pleases you, O king, hear what I say. And then having listened to it, the descendant of Prishata may take to his own wisdom.

7. According to due rites, cause him to take a wife, with all care. Those words of him (Shiva) will turn out true—even this is my firm belief.

8. Then that royal couple, making a firm resolution as regards that work, chose as a bride the maiden daughter of the king Dasharnakas.

9. Thereupon the king Drupada—the lion among kings, having heard of the (respective) purity of descent of the lineage of all kings, chose the daughter of the king of the Dasharnaka territory as the wife of Shikhandin.

10. That king Dasharnaka, known as Hiranyavarman (or the golden-armoured) even that ruler of earth gave away his daughter to that Shikhandin.

11. And throughout all the Dasharnaka territories that king was a mighty one, and incapable of being conquered. He was protected by a golden armor, was irresistible, had a large army and was high-souled.

12. And some time after the wedding had been performed, that daughter, O best of kings, attained her youth; and that daughter, Shikhandin, had also attained her youth.

13. And Shikhandin, being wedded, returned to Kampilya. And then after a certain time she (daughter of Hiranyavarman) came to know her to be a woman. And the daughter of Hiranyavarman, knowing Shikhandin to be a woman,

14. Represented to her nurses and lady companions with shame (this fact) about the maiden daughter of the king of the Panchalas, viz. Shikhandin.

15. Then those nurses from the Dasharna territories, O best among kings, became greatly afflicted, and despatched emissaries (to their king).

16. Thereupon all the emissaries to the king of the Dasharna territories informed him of the deception that had been practised, as it had happened. And that king became filled with anger.

17. And, O great king, Shikhandin also at that time conducted himself like a male at the royal court with great joy, setting aside as it were his feminine nature.

18. After the lapse of a few days, O best of the race of Bharata, on hearing of this fact (Shikhandin bearing himself like a male), Hiranyavarman, O great king, was afflicted with anger.

19. Thereupon the king of Dasharna country, being filled with terrible anger, sent an ambassador to the court of king Drupada.

20. Then the ambassador of the golden-armoured king having alone approached the king Drupada, took him aside and spoke these words to him in private.

21. "The king of the Dasharna country, O king, has spoken these words to you, being deceived by you and enraged with you at the deception, O sinless one.

22. "You have insulted me. Surely it was not considerately done that you wanted my daughter for your daughter from folly.

23. Take now the fruit of that act of deception, O wicked one, for I will now slay you with all your relatives and ministers. Wait a bit."

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-first chapter, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXCI.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—Contd.

Bhishma said:—

1. Thus addressed by that messenger, O king, the king Drupada, like a thief caught (red handed), could not utter a word.

2. He made great efforts, for the purpose of pacifying his son's (daughter) father-in-law, by means of messengers, instructing them to say sweetly and persuasively,—
'It is not so.'

3. That king (Hiranyavarman), thereupon once more ascertained the real fact, that the offspring of the king of the Panchalas was a daughter, and went forth (out of his city) without delay.

4. He then sent information to all his friends (who were) of immeasurable strength, regarding the deception that had been practised upon his daughter, according to the message of the nurses.

5. Then that best of kings, having mustered a large army, formed the resolution of marching against the king Drupada, O Bharata.

6. Then that ruler of the earth, Hiranyavarman held a consultation with his ministers, O great king, (as to the course to be taken) against the king of the Panchalas.

7. It was then and there resolved with certainty among those high-souled kings,—
"If this be really true that Shikhandin is a daughter, O king, then having bound the king of the Panchalas, we shall drag him (here) and having installed another king who will rule over the people,

9. We will slay this king of the Panchalas along with Shikhandin.

10. Knowing this to be the fixed resolve, the king (Hiranyavarman) once more sent messengers to the son of Prishata—(with the message). "I shall slay you, wait a little."

Bhisma said:—

11. That king was by nature not courageous, and was quiet. King Drupada, though a ruler of the earth, was dreadfully alarmed.

12. Having despatched messengers to the Dasharna king, king Drupada, fainting with grief, approached his wife in secret and spoke these words.

13. Being filled, as the Panchala king was, with great fear and struck with grief at his heart, he said to the beloved mother of Shikhandin.

14. "My son's father-in-law, king Hiranyavarman, having mustered a large army, is advancing against me with anger, powerful as he is.

15. Fools that we both (of us) are, what are we to do now, as regards this daughter of ours? Your son Shikhandin is very much suspected to be a daughter.

16. Under this suspicion, (king Hirarnya-varman), thinking—I have been deceived,—wants to slay me with his friends and army carefully mustered.

17. O you of beautiful hips, tell me what is truth in (this case) and O beautiful lady, what is false. O auspicious one, having heard from you, I will make arrangements (how to act).

18. I have been thrown in danger, as well this daughter Shikhandin. You also, O imperial lady of the finest complexion, are in great danger.

19. As I ask you, tell me what the truth is, for the relief of all (of us). O lady with beautiful hips and fair smiles, it depends on your words as to what ought to be speedily done.

20. Do you not fear, neither (let) Shikhandin (fear), for I will make suitable arrangements through kindness though I have been deprived from the duties to a son.

21. That ruler of the earth, the king of the Dasharna country has been deceived by me. Speak, therefore O highly blessed lady, so that I may do what should be for the benefit (of all)."

22. That goddess-like lady, being thus addressed before all the ministers by the king, for the proclamation of his innocence to others, though he knew everything, replied to the lord of the earth.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-second chapter, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXCI.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhisma said:—

1. The mother of Shikhandin, O mighty-armed ruler of men, related to her husband all about her daughter Shikhandin in accordance with the real facts.

2. Childless as I was, O great king, and from fear of my companion-wives, my daughter Shikhandin, when born, was represented to you as a son,

3. O best of men, you had, also, from love of me, corroborated it and O best among kings, the rites belonging to a son were performed for this daughter.

4. And a wife was given to her, O king. <sup>was</sup> the daughter of the king of the Dasharna territories and it was approved of by me; seeing as I did the meaning of the words of that diety, "Born as a maiden, she will become a male" we ignored this fact of her being a daughter.

5. Hearing this, king Drupada known as Yajnasena, having informed all his councillors of all these facts, held a consultation, O king, as to the best means of protecting his subjects.

6. Although he had himself deceived the king of the Dasharna country, yet sanctioning the alliance as quite proper, he began to settle his plans with concentrated attention.

7. Naturally well-defended, O Bharata, (he) began to fortify his city, at the time of danger, in all possible ways, and adorned it (with works of defence).

8. But the king was nevertheless afflicted with great grief, together with his queen, O best among Bharata's race, at this enmity with the king of Dasharna territories.

9. Considering in his mind as to how there might not be this great enmity with his son's father-in-law, he began to worship the gods.

10. Thereupon, perceiving him to be devoted to the gods, O king, and paying his worship, his wife, that goddess-like lady spoke these words.

11. "Though in prosperity, the worship of gods is truly prescribed by all righteous men, what then (ought to be said) about those who ate in distress? Therefore, worship your superiors.

12. Pay worship also to all the gods with large presents (to the Brahmanas) and let the sacred fires be ablaze, to pacify the Dasharna king.

13. O my lord, think in your mind (about a way) for pacification without involving a war. Through the grace of the gods, all this will happen.

14. Do as you had been counselled when you consulted with your ministers, O you with large eyes, for the preservation of this city, O king.

15. When earthly power is joined to godly power, it will surely succeed, O king. But there is no success when these are against each other,

16. Therefore, having taken the necessary steps as regard this city with your ministers, pay adoration, O lord of earth, to the gods according to your desire.

17. Perceiving those two, overwhelmed with grief, talking to each other, that daughter Shikhandin, ascetic as she was, was filled with shame.

18. Thereupon she thought (within herself), "these two (my father and mother) are afflicted with grief on my account." Then she made up her mind for destroying her own life.

19. Having firmly taken this resolution and been deeply afflicted with grief, she went out to a deep and lonely forest, abandoning her house.

20. That forest, O king, was inhabited by a very rich and powerful Yakska named Sthunakarna and it was through his fear that men forsook that forest.

21. And there was the abode of Sthuna, washed with lime, from which issued smoke bearing the smell of fried paddy, and (surrounded) with high walls with a gate way.

22. Entering it, the daughter of king Drupada Shikhandin, O king, began to reduce her body by remaining without food for many a day.

23. That Yaksha Sthuna, who was endued with kindness, showed himself to her (and said), "for what purpose have you begun this proceeding? Tell me and do not make delay, for I will do it."

24. "It cannot be performed"—she replied to the Yaksha again and again. But that Guhyaka returned her answer immediately (by saying) "I shall surely do it."

25. "O daughter of the king, I am an attendant of the god of wealth, and I can grant boons. I will bestow even what is unbestowable. So tell me what you desire."

26. Thereupon Shikhandin related to that chief of the Yakshas, named Sthunakarna, O Bharata, everything in detail.

Shikhandin said :—

27. "O Yaksha, my father, bereft of a son, will very soon meet with destruction, for the lord of the Dasharna territories is marching against him with anger.

28. That golden-armoured king is very powerful, and of great energy. Therefore protect me, O Yaksha, and my father and mother.

29. The pacification of my grief has been promised by you. Let me become a man, O Yaksha, through your grace, O faultless one.

30. So long as that king does not depart from my city, bestow your grace, O great Yaksha and Guhyaka.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety third chapter, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXXCIV.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Bhishma said :—

1. At length the Yaksha, hearing the words of Shikhandin, said, afflicted by destiny, after considering in his mind,

2. Truly, it was decreed to be so for my (Bhishma's) grief, O Kaurava. "O fair one I will accomplish your wish, but listen to a condition.

3. I will bestow upon you my own manhood, for a certain period. But, (after its lapse) you will have to come in (due) time. Now, speak the truth to me.

4. Master as I am, I have the power to do whatever I wish; I can range in the sky for I can roam about freely according to my will. Through my grace, save your city and your friends completely.

5. I will take on myself this your maidenhood, O daughter of a king. Pledge yourself to me (as to the condition) and I will do what is dear to you."

Shikhandin said :—

6. O you of good vows, I will return to you your manhood, O God. Only for a certain period bear my womanhood, O night-ranger.

7. On the departure of the Dasharna king, who is known as the golden-armoured hero, I will become a woman, and you will become a man.

Bhishma said :—

8. Having spoken thus, they two made an agreement O king, and they transferred to each other their (respective) sexes.

9. The Yaksha Sthuna took upon himself (her) maidenhood, O Bharata, and Shikhandin obtained the blazing form of the Yaksha.

10. Thereupon Shikhandin, the Panchalya, having obtained manhood, O king, entered the city and went to his father with great joy.

11. And he related everything as it had fallen out to the king Drupada. Hearing this he became filled with exceeding joy.

12. And together with his wife, he re-collected the words of Maheshwara. Then he sent words to the king of the Dasharna land, O king.

13. "This offspring is a male. May you believe this." At length the Dasharnaka king suddenly approached,

14. Drupada the king of the Panchalas, being filled with grief and sorrow. Thereupon having reached Kampilya, the lord of Dasharna,

15. Sent a messenger, one of the best of those who know the Vedas, after having paid him (due) honours. "Tell that most wretched king of the Panchalas according to my words,

16. "That as you selected my daughter for your daughter, O wicked one, so you will see the fruit of that insult very soon, no doubt,"

17. Thus addressed, that Brahmana messenger, despatched by that Dasharna king, travelled towards the city, O best of kings.

18. That priest then arrived at the city of Drupada. And to him, the Panchala king paid all homage by offering a cow and the arghya (a mixture of honey, milk &c paid as a homage on one's arrival at a house).

19. And (the Panchala king) went up to him along with Shikhandin, O great king. But he (the messenger) did not accept that homage, but said these words,

20. Which had been communicated by that warrior king, the golden-armoured one. "As I have been deceived, O you of vile conduct, by your daughter,

21. Receive, therefore, O wicked one, the (fruit) an account of the criminal act (of yours); give battle, O king, to me, on the field of battle, without delay.

22. I will forthwith slay your ministers, offspring and friends." The king having heard this, the result of that insult,

23. And being thus addressed by the king of Dasharna through his priest, in the presence of his ministers, Drupada assumed a tone of friendship, O best of Bharata's race.

24. "What you have spoken, O Brahmana, according to the words of my kinsman (son's father-in-law) receive its reply,—my messenger will give the answer to the king."

25. King Drupada then despatched a Brahmana messenger, versed in all the Vedas to the high-souled golden armoured one.

26. Approaching the king, viz, the lord of the Dasharna land he gave the reply, O king, as it had been spoken, O king, by Drupada.

27. "Make an enquiry and let this be made clear that this prince, is my son. You have been misinformed by some body; but this is surely unworthy of belief."

28. Thereupon that king, hearing (the words) of the Drupada, became dejected, and sent some choice, youthful ladies of great beauty to Shikhandin to ascertain whether he was a man or a woman.

29. Those ladies, who had been despatched, having learnt the truth, praised all about Shikhandin who was a man of great strength, O best of Kuru's race, to the king of the Dasharna country.

30. Having made this test, the king, gladdened at heart, going up to his kinsman (his daughter's father-in-law) lived with him (some time) with gladness.

31. And that lord of men gave away with joy to Shikhandin great wealth, and elephants, horses and cattle and slaves also in large numbers.

32. And he departed, being worshipped, after having rebuked his daughter. After the gladdened king with the golden armour, on being pacified,

33. Had made his departure, Shikhandin was filled with joy for some time. After the lapse of a certain period, Kuvera, who had been for his bearers, making a journey through the earth, came to the abode of Sthuna.

34. Moving to and fro over his abode, the protector of all wealth observed that the mansion of the Yaksha Sthuna was beautifully adorned with diverse sorts of garlands;

35. And with fragrant roots (of plants) and scented with the smoke of sweet incense, and ornamented with banners and well supplied with food and drink.

36. Seeing that spot of his, ornamented in every way, and (everywhere filled with garlands of gems and precious stones and gold,

37. And breathing with the fragrance of various sorts of flowers, and looking beautiful being well-swept and watered, the lord of all Yakshas at length spoke to his attendant Yakshas.

38. "This mansion of Sthuna is well-adorned, O ye (followers) of immeasurable powers. Why does not this fool, however, approach me?"

39. As this fool does not approach me, though knowing (that I am here), therefore he should be inflicted on a severe punishment. This is what I think.

The Yakshas said :—

40. O king, a daughter was born to king Drupada, by name Shikhandin. For her sake, on some account, he has given away his manhood.

41. Having taken her womanhood (on himself) he remains in this abode, being a woman. He does not approach (you), bashful on account of her holding the form of a woman.

42. It is for this reason, O king, that Sthuna does not approach you to-day. Having (now) heard (this) do as it seems proper. "Let the car be stopped here.

43. Let Sthuna be brought, I shall inflict punishment on him." Said thus the lord of the Yakshas again and again.

44. "Being summoned, O lord of the earth, he came before the king of the Yakshas ; and O great king, having the form of a female, he stood bashfully.

45. Then the giver of wealth cursed him in his anger, O descendant of Kuru's race, "even thus let the womanhood of this sinful one remain, O Guhyakas !"

46. And then that high-souled lord of Yakshas (again) said, "As you have humiliated all Yakshas by giving away your own sex to Shikhandin, O you of sinful understanding and by taking her female sex, O you of sinful deeds,

47. As you have perpetrated this, O you of evil understanding, which had never been attempted by any one (before this), so from this day forth you shall remain a woman, and she a man.

48. The Yakshas then began to appease (the anger of) Vaishravana, for the sake of Sthuna karna, (saying) "set a limit to your curse" again and again.

49. Then that high-souled lord of the Yakshas, O son, answered his followers,—all those Yakshas,—with the desire of setting a limit to (his) curse.

50. "On the death of Shikhandin O ye Yakshas of high minds, he shall regain his own form. Therefore let the Yaksha Sthuna be free from anxiety."

51. Having thus spoken, that mighty god, king of the Yakshas, departed well-honoured, with all those followers, who travelled (a great distance) in a moment.

52. Sthuna, having received this curse, remained there. In due time Shikhandin came with all speed to that night-ranger.

53. Approaching him, he said these words—"I am come. (to you) O god. "Thereupon Sthuna said to him again and again—I am pleased (with you)."

54. Seeing that prince Shikhandin come to him without guile, he related to Shikhandin everything as it had happened.

The Yaksha said :—

55. "It is not your fault, O princess, that I have (thus) been cursed by Vaishravana (but of my own destiny). Depart now according to your pleasure, and live with all happiness on this earth.

56. It is my belief that it was ordained before hand, and is incapable of being altered—viz., his coming here and my seeing Paulastya (the god of wealth)."

Bhishma said :—

57. Thus addressed by the Yaksha Sthuna O Bharata, Shikhandin went back to the city filled with great joy.

58. And he worshipped with great sumptuousness and with scents and garlands of all sorts, all those of the twice-born, and the gods and the (sacred) trees and cross-ways.

59. And Drupada, the king of Panchalas, became exceedingly joyful, with his son Shikhandin who had obtained his desire, and as well as with his friends.

60. And then he gave away to Drona as a disciple, O best of the race, his son Shikhandin, who had been before (this) a daughter, O king.

61. And the king's son, Shikhandin, obtained (the knowledge) of the science of arms with its four divisions (receiving, holding, using, and baffling weapons), as also yourselves and Dhrishtadyumna of Prishata's race.

62. To me however, my spies who had been set on Drupada by me, (in the guise of) being idiots, who were blind and deaf, related all things as they happened, O son.

63. In this way it is, O great king, that the son of Drupada is both a man and woman, and he was born as Shikhandin, O best of Kurus, and as the best of car-warriors.

64. (Thus it happened), O best among Bharata's race, that the eldest daughter of the king of Kashi, known by the name of Amva, is born in the family of Drupada as Shikhandin.

65. I will not look for a single moment, nor even strike, though appearing before me with his bow in his hand with the desire of fighting.

66. This is the vow which I have taken for all time, and it is known to all the earth—that on women, or on those who had been women before, on those whose names were those of women, or even those whose appearance resembles that of a woman,

67. I will not let go my weapons, O son of Kuru's race, I will not, for this reason, slay this Shikhandin.

68. I know this truth about the birth of Shikhandin, O son, and therefore I will not slay him in any battle, though with weapon in his hand.

69. If Bhishma slays a woman, all right-minded men will censure him and therefore I will not slay him,—even if I see him standing on the battle field.

Vaishampayana said :—

70. On hearing this, king Duryodhana, a descendant of Kuru's race, having reflected for a moment, considered this to be fitting in Bhishma.

CHAPTER CXCV.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Sanjaya said :—

1. When the night had dawned, your son again, in the midst of all the army, asked his Grandsire.

2. "This army of the son of Pandu, O son of Ganga, ready for fight, abounding in men and elephants, and crowded with mighty chariot-warriors,

3. Protected by such great archers of mighty strength as Bhima and Arjuna, equal to the Regents (of the worlds) and Dhristadyumna as its leader,

4. Which is incapable of being vanquished and irresistible and appearing like a raging ocean,—this ocean of soldiers, incapable of being ruffled even by the very gods in a mighty battle,

5. By what time, O son of Ganga, of great effulgence, can you annihilate and (in what time) the mighty archer (our preceptor) Drona or Kripa, of great strength.

6. Or Karna, who glories in battle, or that best of the twice-born, the son of Drona, (can destroy it)? Ye, that are well-versed in celestial weapons, are in my army.

7. I very much desire to know this. I have a mighty curiosity in my heart always (to know this). (O mighty-armed one,) it is met for you to tell me this.

Bhishma said :—

8. This is, indeed, becoming just like yourself O best of Kurus, and O lord of the earth that you desire to know the strength and weakness of your enemies.

9. Hear therefore, O king, of my utmost power which I can exert in battle, both with reference to the power of my weapons in battle, and also that of my arms, O you of mighty arms.

10. Ordinary men ought to be fought without artifice, and with deceptive artifices one versed in them;—this is the rule that has been settled.

11. O highly blessed one, I can slay the army of the Pandavas, by making a division of the day, and taking the morning each day for my share,

12. Ten thousand soldiers, by this division, O you of great effulgence, and of ear-warriors, one thousand—this I think (I can take as) my share.

13. According to this way, being always with my armour, and always (spending my time) in action, I can annihilate this huge army in a certain period, O Bharata.

14. But if I shoot my mighty weapons I can slay (at once) hundreds and thousands; being stationed in battle, I can slay (the army) in a month, O Bharata.

Sanjaya said :—

15. Hearing these words of Bhishma king Duryodhana then asked Drona, the foremost of Angira's race, O great king,

16. "O preceptor, in what time can you annihilate the soldiers of the son of Pandu?" Drona replied to him, as if smilingly.

17. "I am old and my energy and prowess of exertion have become weak, O mighty-armed one. I can consume this army of the Pandavas by the fire of my weapons,

18. Just like Bhishma, the son of Santanu, by a month's time; so I think. This is my utmost power—this is my greatest strength."

19. Then Sharadwata's son, Kripa replied "In two month's time." And the son of Drona promised the destruction of the army in ten nights.

20. Karna, knowing as he did (the use of) mighty weapons, promised it in five nights. Hearing those words of the son of Suta, the son of the ocean-going (Ganga),

21. Laughed an audible laugh, and spoke these words. "As long as the son of Pritha, holding his weapons and conch and bows in battle,

22. You do not encounter, O son of Radha, coming as he does in battle, on his chariot guided by Vasudeva, so long can you think so. You are indeed capable of saying anything again, even what you please.

Thus ends the one hundred and eighty fifth chapter, in the Amvopakshyana in the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXCVI.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Hearing this, the son of Kunti (Yudhishtira) summoned all his brothers. Having summoned (them), O best of the Bharata race, he spoke these words.

Yudhishtira said:—

2. The spies, whom I have in the army of the son of Dhritarashtra, brought me this news when the night had passed away.

3. 'Duryodhana asked the son of Ganga of high vows, "O lord! in what time can you annihilate the army of the sons of Pandu?"

4. And the wicked son of Dhritarashtra was answered—"In a month." And in that same time Drona also has promised.

5. And we have heard that the son of Gautama has promised the same in double that time, and the son of Drona has promised (the same) in ten nights, acquainted as he is with mighty weapons.

6. Then Karna, who knows (the use of) celestial weapons, being asked in the army of the Kurus, has pledged himself to slay us with our armies in five days.

7. On this account, I also desire, to hear your words, O Arjuna, in what time you are able to destroy our enemies, O Falguna.'

8. Thus addressed Dhananjaya, with thick hair, looking towards Vasudeva, spoke these words.

9. 'All these are high-minded heroes accomplished in arms, and capable of fighting in diverse ways, and they can, no doubt, O great king, slay us.

10. But let your mind be free from anxiety; I say truly that I can, with the aid of Vasudeva, root out, on a single car,

11. The three worlds with all their celestials and all things moveable and immovable, and all beings that were, or are to be, in the twinkling of an eye; such is what I think.

12. That terrible and mighty weapon which the lord of all gods bestowed on me in the combat hand-to-hand, with (Mahadeva in the guise of) a hunter,—even that (weapon) is with me.

13. That (weapon) which the lord of all gods uses when he annihilates all forms of existence, even that O best among men, is with me.

14. The son of Ganga does not know that (weapon), nor Drona, nor the son of Gautama, neither also the son of Drona; O king, whence, then, can the son of Suta (know)?

15. It is not, however, proper to annihilate in a battle, by means of celestial weapons ordinary men. We will by artless fighting vanquish our foes.

16. Again, these foremost among men are your allies, O king. They are all acquainted with celestial weapons, and all of them, are desirous of battle.

17. All of them have performed sacrificial rites in company with their wives, after they had become versed respectively in Vedas, and have never been conquered. They can destroy the army of even the gods in battle, O son of Pandu.

18. And Shikhandin, Yuyudhana, and Dhristadyumna, of Prishata's race, and Bhimasena, and these twins, Yudhamanyu and Uttamoujas,

19. And both of them viz, Virata and Drupada, who are equal to Bhishma and Drona (respectively) in battle, and the powerful Shankha and the son of Hidimba of great strength,

20. And his son Anjanaparva, of great strength and prowess, and the descendant of Shini's race, well versed in fighting, and who is your ally,

21. And the powerful Abhimanyu, and the five sons of Draupadi are also at your service. And you too are alone capable of annihilating even the three worlds.

22. O you of effulgence equal to Shakra (Indra), that person on whom you cast a look of anger, surely meets with death for it has been seen and so I know, O Kurava.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety-sixth chapter, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXC VII.
(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. Then, the next morning, when all was cloudy, all the kings, advanced against the son of Pandu, being excited by Duryodhana the son of Dhritarashtra.
2. And they were all purified by having bathed and (decked) with garlands, and clothed in white raiments. And having taken their weapons, and raised banners, they received the blessings, after the sacred fires had been lighted.
3. All of them were versed in the Vedas, and were powerful warriors, and all of them had always ably observed their vows, and all could do as they pleased, and all showed signs of having (previously) fought.
4. Desirous of earning for themselves regions of bliss in the next world, and in battle, might and strength, they had their attention fixed and had faith in each other.
5. (First of all) Vinda and Anuvinda, both of Avanti, and the Kakayas with the Valhikas went out with Bharadwaja at their head.
6. Then (came) Ashwathaman and the son of Shantanu, and Jayadratha of the Sindhu country, and those kings who came from the south and west and other mountainous territories.
7. And then the Gandharva king named Shakuni and all those who came from the east and north from all parts, and the Shakas, Kiratas, Yavanas, Shivas and the Vasatis,
8. All these with their respective forces, surrounded their Maharathas, and all the Maharathas went out in the second division of the army.
9. Then (came) Kritavarman with his forces, and the great car-warrior Trigatta, and king Duryodhana, surrounded by his brothers.
10. And Shalya and Brihadratha the monarch of the Koshalas, marched in the rear, led by the sons of Dhritarashtra.
11. And these followers of the great and mighty son of Dhritarashtra, uniting together according to the proper mode took up their station, all clad in armour, on the back part of the plains of Kurukshetra.
12. And Duryodhana caused his camp to be so made, O Bharata, as to look like a second Hastinapur, well-ornamented.
13. And, O great king, even the clever men who lived in the city could not detect any distinguishing feature of their encampment from the city.

14. And the descendant of Kuru, a lord of the earth, caused camps similar to this, inaccessible (to others), to be made, by hundreds and thousands, for the kings.

15. That encampment of war stood on a circular area of five yojanas. And into them, O king, he made soldiers with their horses &c. enter in groups of hundreds.

16. Therein those rulers of earth entered, according to their respective strength and prowess, in camps which abounded in things by thousands.

17. And king Duryodhana ordered provisions of the best kind for high-souled (warriors) with their forces, consisting of infantry,

18. And elephants, horses and other men. Those who lived by mechanical arts and those who followed them there as bards, singers and panegyrists.

19. And merchants and prostitutes and spies, and those who came as sight-seers,—the Kuru king looked into (the needs of) all of them, with all proper care.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety seventh chapter, the marching out of the armies, in the Amvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.

CHAPTER CXC VIII.

(AMVOPAKSHYANA PARVA)—

Continued.

Vaishampayana said:—

1. In the same way the virtuous king Yudhisthira, son of Kunti, urged the warriors headed by Dhristadyumna, O Bharata.
2. He ordered the leaders and commander of the Chedis, Kashis, and Karushas, Dhristaketu, of steady prowess, and the slayer of foes,
3. And Virata, and Drupada, and Yayudhana and Shikhandin, and the mighty archers, rulers of Panchala, the two Yudhamanya and Uttamanjas (to advance).
4. Those warriors, clad in variegated armours, and bearing golden ear-rings, shone like fires on the sacrificial altars when the clarified butter is poured (on them).
5. Those mighty archers shone beautiful like burning constellations. At length, having paid due homage to the army, that best among men,
6. The ruler of the earth, ordered those forces to advance. And king Yudhisthira ordered for those high-souled (warriors) with forces, consisting of infantry,

7. Together with elephants and steeds and other followers, provisions of the best kind, as well as for those who lived by means of mechanical arts.

8. And the son of Pandu ordered Abhimanyu and Brihanta and all the Draupadeyas, (the five sons of Draupadi), headed by Dhristadyumna, to advance.

9. And then he sent forth the second division of the army with Bhima, Yajudhana and Dhananjaya, the son of Pandu.

10. And the noise of the warriors as they put on the equipments of war, and moved and ran about, cheered as they were, reached the very heavens.

11. Last of all, that ruler of the earth himself went forth in the rear, with other rulers of the earth, accompanied by Virata and Drupada.

12. Then that army, of terrible archers, commanded by Dhristadyumna, as it moved to and fro, looked like the full Ganga, silently rushing on.

13. Then the intelligent (Yudhisthira) again arranged his troops (in a different order), confounding the knowledge of the sons of Dhritarashtra.

14.—16. And the son of Pandu ordered the five sons of Draupadi who were mighty bowmen, and Abhimanyu Nakula and Sahadeva, and all the Pravakas, and ten thousand horses and elephants; and ten thousand foot-soldiers, and five hundred chariots, to be the first division of the army, under the irresistible Bhimsena. And the son of Pandu (ordered) in the middle (division of his army) Virata and Jayatsena,

17. And the two Maharathas, the ruler of Panchala, Yudhamanyu and Uttamoujas, who were high-souled (warriors) of great prowess holding clubs and bows.

18. And in this middle division followed Vasudeva and Dhananjaya. And these were men well-accomplished in arms, burning with anger.

19. Amongst them were twenty thousand horses ridden by brave warriors, and five thousand elephants and cars on all sides round.

20. Those warriors who composed the infantry, armed with bows, swords, and maces, followed by thousands in the vanguard, and thousands in the rear.

21. And in that part of that ocean of forces, where Yudhisthira himself (was), was stationed a large number of rulers of the earth.

22. And in that part (were) thousands of elephants, and ten thousands of steeds, as well as thousands of cars and foot-soldiers O Bharata.

23. And Chekitana, with his own mighty force, O best among kings, and king Dhri-staketu, the leader of the Chedis, marched forth.

24. And there (was) also Satyaki, that archer and the best of the car-warriors among the Vrishnis, surrounded by hundreds and thousands of chariots, and leading (them) forward, powerful as he was.

25. And those foremost among men, seated on their chariots, Kshattrahan and Kshattradeva, followed behind, protecting the rear.

26. And there were (in the rear) carts shops, vehicles, and beast of burden of all kinds and thousands of elephants and ten thousands of steeds. And all the children and women, and those who were emaciated and weak.

27. And with the animals carrying his treasures, and his granaries and uniting all these by means of an army of elephants, king Yudhisthira slowly marched forward.

28. Him (Yudhisthira) followed Sauchitta, an unswerving adherent of truth, and who was invincible in battle, and Shrenimat, and Vasudeva, and Vibhu, the son of the of the Kashis.

29. And they followed him, with twenty thousand chariots, and a hundred million steeds (of that mighty army) with great bells,

30. And twenty thousand elephants who smote with their tusks resembling ploughshare all of good breed, and with spilt temples and moving about like masses of clouds.

31. And besides these, O Bharata, thousand elephants and another ten thousands elephants which were in the seven divisions of the army of Yudhisthira in that battle,

32. With temporal juice flowing down and with the temples rent, followed the king like so many moving mountains.

33. Such was the terrible array of forces of that wise son of Kunti, relying on the help of which he fought with Suyodhana, the son of Dhritarashtra.

34. And above these other men, by hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands of groups of thousands, followed their (sons of Pandu) forces, roaring loudly.

35. And those men by thousands and tens of thousands, filled with joy, beat their drums by thousands, and blew their conches by tens of thousands.

Thus ends the one hundred and ninety eighth chapter, marching of soldiers in the Anvopakshyana of the Udyoga Parva.
